The soverain honour of Divinity.

The compound epithets of Sylvester are sometimes happy and picturesque. Campbell cited with high commendation these lines on morning :

Arise betimes, while th' Opal-colour'd Morn,
In golden pomp doth May-day's door adorn.

On the other hand, some of his images are in ludicrously bad taste. Dryden says when he was a boy he was rapt into ecstasy—afterwards repented of—with this notable passage (from the 'First Day of the II. Weeke') :

But, when the Winter's keener breath began
To crystallize the Baltike Ocean,
To glaze the Lakes, and bridle-up the Flouds,
And perriwig with wool the balde-pate Woods.

Two happier specimens may be added :

The Sun.

All-hail pure Lamp, bright, sacred and excelling ;
Sorrow and Care, Darknes, and Dread repelling :
Thou World's great Taper, Wicked men's just Terror,
Mother of Truth, true Beautie's only Mirror,
God's eldest daughter : O ! how thou art full
Of grace and goodnes ! O ! how beautifull !

Plurality of Worlds.

I'l ne'r belevee that the Arch-Architect,
With all these Fires the Heav'nly Arches deckt
Onely for Shew, and with these glistring shields
T' amaze poor Shepheards watching in the fields.
I'l ne'r belevee that the least Flowr that pranks
Our Garden borders, or the Common banks,
And the least stone that in her warming Lap
Our kind Nurse Earth doth covetously wrap,
Hath some peculiar vertue of its own ;
And that the glorious Stars of Heav'n have none.

Of the parallels between Sylvester and Milton that have been pointed out, we quote two.

Milton in his version of Psalm cxxxvi. has :

The ruddy waves he cleft in twain
Of the Erythraean main.

Now, Sylvester had in his Du Bartas given :

His dreadful voice to save his ancient sheep
Did cleave the bottom of the Erythraean deep ;

and in Bethulia's Rescue :

Where th' Erythraean ruddy billows roar.

Milton, again, in the same psalm wrote :

But full soon this did devour
The tawny king with all his power ;

echoing Sylvester's—

But contrary the Red Sea did devour
The barbarous tyrant with his mighty power.

This certainly does seem to argue Milton's familiarity with Sylvester's works, and the fact that Sylvester's words had impressed themselves on Milton's memory. But the parallels, of which these are perhaps as observable as any, mainly affect mere incidental expression. And, unlike the one-legged William Lauder (1680?–1771), who tried by parallels real and garbled to prove Milton a deliberate copier of other men's ideas and phrases and lines, Dunster expressly says : ' Nothing can be further from my intention than to insinuate that Milton was a plagiarist or servile imitator ; but I conceive that, having read these sacred poems of very high merit, at the immediate age when his own mind was beginning to teem with poetry, he retained numberless thoughts, passages, and expressions therein so deeply in his mind that they hung inherently in his imagination, and became as it were naturalised there.'

Sylvester's translation of Du Bartas began to appear in 1592, but was not completed till 1611. Some of his original pieces have quaint titles such as were then affected by many authors ; for example : Lachrymæ Lachrymarum, or the Spirit of Teares distilled for the ontmely Death of the incomparable Prince Panaretus (Henry, son of King James I.), 1612 ; Tobacco Battered and the Pipes Shattered about their Eaves, that idly Idolize so base and barbarous a Weed, or at least-wise over-love so loathsome Vanitie, by a Volley of Holy Shot thundered from Mount Helicon (1615). Dunster's book was Considerations on Milton's Early Reading (1800). Grosart reprinted Sylvester's work ('Chertsey Worthies,' 1880). See H. Ashton's Du Bartas en Angleterre (1908).

Christopher Marlowe was by far the greatest of Shakespeare's precursors in the drama—a fiery spirit, who gave character and energy to the stage (see above at page 241), and was the first English writer who had perfect command of sonorous and varied blank verse. Born at Canterbury, and baptised on the 26th of February 1564, he was the son of a shoemaker, but through the aid of a local patron he was admitted into the King's School of his native town. Thence he proceeded in 1581 to Benet or Corpus College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1583, and M.A. in 1587. How he occupied himself after taking his bachelor's degree is not known ; he may have served as a soldier in the Low Countries. Tamburlaine the Great was successfully brought out on the stage in 1587, was printed in 1590, and long continued a favourite. Shakespeare makes ancient Pistol quote jestingly the awkward line :

Holla, ye pampered jades of Asia !

But amidst the rant and fustian of Tamburlaine there are passages of great beauty and grandeur, and the versification justifies Ben Jonson's compliment to 'Marlowe's mighty line.' Marlowe and his hero had in them something of the audacity, the overreaching ambition and self-confidence, of the Renaissance, illustrated in the lofty lines (leading up, however, to an anti-climax !):

Our souls whose faculties can comprehend
The wondrous architecture of the world
And measure every wandering planet's course,
Still climbing after knowledge infinite
And always moving as the restless spheres,
Will us to wear ourselves and never rest
Until we reach the ripest fruit of all—
That perfect bliss and sole felicity,
The sweet fruition of an earthly crown.

It was Marlowe who revolutionised the diction of the popular drama, adopting in place of rhymed couplets the blank verse heretofore associated with classical dramas of the Senecan type. And of blank verse, till now conventional and monotonous, he fashioned a new and powerful instrument of dramatic expression, not merely by shifting the accent freely, but by substituting trochees, dactyls, tribrachs, and spondees for the inevitable iambi of his predecessors; yet Nash and Greene both affected to think slightly of blank verse as managed by him. The following specimen of Marlowe's sonorous exaggeration is a description of Tamburlaine, who, at first spoken of at the royal court as a 'sturdy Scythian thief' and 'a paltry Scythian with his Tartarian rout,' is to be easily taken captive, but looms larger and larger on the historic canvas:

Of stature tall, and straightly fashioned,
Like his desire lift upwards and divine; lifted
So large of limbs, his joints so strongly knit,
Such breadth of shoulders, as might mainly bear
Old Atlas' burthen. 'Twixt his manly pitch
A pearl more worth than all the world is placed:
Wherein by curious sovereignty of art
Are fixed his piercing instruments of sight,
Whose fiery circles bear encompassed
A heaven of heavenly bodies in their spheres,
That guides his steps and actions to the throne
Where Honour sits invested royally.
Pale of complexion, wrought in him with passion,
Thirsting with sovereignty and love of arms;
His lofty brows in folds do figure death;
And in their smoothness amity and life.
About them hangs a knot of amber hair,
Wrapped in curls, as fierce Achilles' was,
On which the breath of heaven delights to play,
Making it dance with wanton majesty.
His arms and fingers, long and sinewy,
Betokening valour and excess of strength;
In every part proportioned like the man
Should make the world subdued to Tamburlaine. . . .

Tamburlaine at the close of the first part thus addresses his queen:

Then sit thou down, divine Zenocrate;
And here we crown thee Queen of Persia,

And all the kingdoms and dominions
That late the power of Tamburlaine subdued.
As Juno, when the giants were suppressed,
That darted mountains at her brother Jove,
So looks my love, shadowing in her brows
Triumphs and trophies for my victories;
Or, as Latona's daughters, bent to arms,
Adding more courage to my conquering mind.

His second play, The Tragical History of Dr Faustus (1604; 2nd ed. 1616), based on the familiar folk-tale, exhibits a far wider range of dramatic power than his first. The hero studies necromancy, and makes a solemn disposal of his soul to Lucifer, on condition of having a familiar spirit at his command and unlimited enjoyment for twenty-four years; during which period Faustus visits different countries, 'calls up spirits from the vasty deep,' and revels in luxury and splendour. At length the time expires, the bond becomes due, and evil spirits enter, amidst thunder and lightning, to claim his forfeit life. From this plot Marlowe constructed a powerful though irregular play. Passages of terrific grandeur and thrilling agony are intermixed with low humour and preternatural machinery, sometimes grotesque or ludicrous. The play is, indeed, rather a series of detached scenes than a complete drama; and some of the scenes (especially the comic parts in the second edition) are obviously not Marlowe's. The ambition of Faustus is a sensual, not a lofty ambition. A feeling of curiosity and wonder is excited by his necromancy and his compact with Lucifer; but we do not fairly sympathise with him till all his disguises are stripped off and his meretricious splendour is succeeded by horror and despair. Then when he stands on the brink of everlasting ruin, waiting for the fatal moment, imploring yet distrusting repentance, a scene of entrancing interest, fervid passion, and overwhelming pathos carries captive the sternest heart and proclaims the triumph of the tragic poet. A. H. Bullen held that the greater part of the matter added in the 1616 edition (that used by Charles Lamb, for example) is certainly not Marlowe's workmanship, and that only an insane critic would maintain that the comic scenes even of the 1604 edition are from his pen. Marlowe knew he had not the gift of humour, and probably, in Bullen's opinion, never attempted to write a comic scene. We follow the text of 1604 as given by Bullen. The first extract is a part of Faustus's soliloquy and conversation with Valdes and Cornelius. 'German Valdes' is doubtless a slip or misprint for Juan de Valdes (1500-44), a Spanish heretic, often confused with his twin-brother Alfonso, who died at Vienna Latin secretary to Charles V. Juan's 'Dialogue between Mercury and Charon' roused the Inquisition, so that he had to flee to Italy; he was an influential mystic, probably anti-Trinitarian, not a magician. Cornelius Agrippa (1486-1535), a great German occult philosopher, had also the repute of being a magician.

Faustus. How am I glutted with conceit of this !
 Shall I make spirits fetch me what I please,
 Resolve me of all ambiguities,
 Perform what desperate enterprise I will ?
 I'll have them fly to India for gold,
 Ransack the ocean for orient pearl,
 And search all corners of the new-found world
 For pleasant fruits and princely delicates ;
 I'll have them read me strange philosophy
 And tell the secrets of all foreign kings ;
 I'll have them wall all Germany with brass,
 And make swift Rhine circle fair Wertenberg,
 I'll have them fill the public schools with silk,
 Wherewith the students shall be bravely clad ;
 I'll levy soldiers with the coin they bring,
 And chase the Prince of Parma from our land,
 And reign sole king of all the provinces ;
 Yea, stranger engines for the brunt of war
 Than was the fiery keel at Antwerp's bridge¹
 I'll make my servile spirits to invent.

Wittenberg.

Enter VALDES and CORNELIUS.

Come, German Valdes and Cornelius,
 And make me blest with your sage conference.
 Valdes, sweet Valdes, and Cornelius,
 Know that your words have won me at the last
 To practise magic and concealed arts :
 Yet not your words only, but mine own fantasy
 That will receive no object, for my head
 But ruminates on necromantic skill.
 Philosophy is odious and obscure,
 Both law and physic are for petty wits ;
 Divinity is basest of the three,
 Unpleasant, harsh, contemptible, and vile :
 'Tis magic, magic that hath ravished me.
 Then, gentle friends, aid me in this attempt ;
 And I that have with concise syllogisms
 Gravelled the pastors of the German church,
 And made the flowering pride of Wertenberg
 Swarm to my problems, as the infernal spirits
 On sweet Musæus² when he came to hell,
 Will be as cunning as Agrippa was,
 Whose shadow made all Europe honour him.

(From Scene i.)

¹ At the siege of Antwerp by Parma in 1585, a fire-ship laden with explosives blew up the bridge. ² Musæus in Hades (Æneid, Book vi.).

Faustus's questions to Mephistophilis and the answer of the evil genius flash lurid light :

Faust. And what are you that live with Lucifer ?

Meph. Unhappy spirits that fell with Lucifer,
 Conspired against our God with Lucifer,
 And are for ever damned with Lucifer.

Faust. Where are you damned ?

Meph. In hell.

Faust. How comes it then that thou art out of hell ?

Meph. Why this is hell, nor am I out of it :
 Think'st thou that I who saw the face of God,
 And tasted the eternal joys of Heaven,
 Am not tormented with ten thousand hells,
 In being deprived of everlasting bliss ?

(From Scene iii.)

The conversation of the Master with his scholars in the last (sixteenth) scene—there is no division into acts—when Faustus's time has come, is much shorter and better in the 1604 edition :

Faust. Ah, gentlemen !

1st Scholar. What ails Faustus ?

Faust. Ah, my sweet chamber-fellow, had I lived with thee, then had I lived still, but now I die eternally. Look, comes he not, comes he not ?

1st Sch. Oh my dear Faustus, what imports this fear ?

2nd Scholar. Is all our pleasure turned to melancholy ?

3rd Scholar. He is not well with being over-solitary.

2nd Sch. If it be so, we will have physicians, and Faustus shall be cured.

1st Sch. 'Tis but a surfeit, sir ; fear nothing.

Faust. A surfeit of deadly sin that hath damned both body and soul.

2nd Sch. Yet, Faustus, look up to Heaven ; remember God's mercies are infinite.

Faust. But Faustus's offences can never be pardoned : the serpent that tempted Eve may be saved, but not Faustus. O gentlemen, hear me with patience, and tremble not at my speeches. Though my heart pants and quivers to remember that I have been a student here these thirty years, oh, would I had ne'er seen Wertenberg, never read book ! and what wonders have I done, all Germany can witness, yea, all the world : for which Faustus hath lost both Germany and the world ; yea, Heaven itself, Heaven the seat of God, the throne of the blessed, the kingdom of joy—and must remain in Hell for ever, Hell, ah Hell, for ever ! Sweet friends, what shall become of Faustus being in Hell for ever ?

2nd Sch. Yet, Faustus, call on God.

Faust. On God, whom Faustus hath abjured ! on God, whom Faustus hath blasphemed ! Ah my God, I would weep, but the devil draws in my tears. Gush forth blood instead of tears. Yea, life and soul ! Oh, he stays my tongue : I would lift up my hands, but see, they hold them, they hold them !

Scholars. Who, Faustus ?

Faust. Lucifer and Mephistophilis. Ah gentlemen, I gave them my soul for cunning !

Scholars. God forbid !

Faust. God forbade it indeed, but Faustus hath done it : for the vain pleasure of four-and-twenty years hath Faustus lost eternal joy and felicity. I writ them a bill with mine own blood ; the date is expired : the time is come, and he will fetch me.

1st Sch. Why did not Faustus tell of this before, that divines might have prayed for thee ?

Faust. Oft have I thought to have done so ; but the devil threatened to tear me in pieces if I named God ; to fetch me body and soul if I once gave ear to divinity ; and now 'tis too late. Gentlemen, away ! lest you perish with me.

2nd Sch. Oh, what shall we do to save Faustus ?

Faust. Talk not of me, but save yourselves, and depart.

3rd Sch. God will strengthen me ; I will stay with Faustus.

1st Sch. Tempt not God, sweet friend, but let us into the next room and there pray for him.

Faust. Ay, pray for me, pray for me ; and what noise soever you hear, come not unto me, for nothing can rescue me.

2nd Sch. Pray thou, and we will pray, that God may have mercy upon thee.

Faust. Gentlemen, farewell ; if I live till morning, I'll visit you : if not—Faustus is gone to hell.

Scholars. Faustus, farewell.

[Exeunt Scholars.—The clock strikes eleven.

Faust.

Ah Faustus,

Now hast thou but one bare hour to live,
 And then thou must be damned perpetually.
 Stand still, you ever-moving spheres of Heaven,
 That time may cease and midnight never come.
 Fair Nature's eye, rise, rise again, and make Perpetual day ! or let this hour be but
 A year, a month, a week, a natural day,
 That Faustus may repent and save his soul.
*O lente lente currite, noctis equi.*¹

The stars move still, time runs, the clock will strike,
 The Devil will come, and Faustus must be damned.
 Oh, I will leap up to my God ! Who pulls me down ?
 See where Christ's blood streams in the firmament :
 One drop would save my soul—half a drop : ah my Christ !

Ah, rend not my heart for naming of my Christ !
 Yet will I call on him : O spare me, Lucifer !—
 Where is it now ? 'tis gone ! And see where God
 Stretcheth out his arm and bends his ireful brow.
 Mountains and hills, come, come and fall on me,
 And hide me from the heavy wrath of God.
 No ! no !

Then I will headlong run into the earth :
 Earth, gape ! O no, it will not harbour me !
 You stars that reigned at my nativity,
 Whose influence have allotted Death and Hell,
 Now draw up Faustus like a foggy mist
 Into the entrails of yon labouring cloud ;
 That when you vomit forth into the air,
 My limbs may issue from your smoky mouths,
 So that my soul may but ascend to heaven.

[The clock strikes the half-hour.]

Oh, the half-hour is past !

'Twill all be past anon, O God !

If thou wilt not have mercy on my soul.
 Yet for Christ's sake whose blood hath ransomed me
 Impose some end to my incessant pain.
 Let Faustus live in Hell a thousand years,
 A hundred thousand, and—at last—be saved !
 O, no end is limited to damned souls.
 Why wert thou not a creature wanting soul ?
 Or why is this immortal that thou hast ?
 Pythagoras' Metempsychosis, were that true,
 This soul should fly from me, and I be changed
 Unto some brutish beast.

All beasts are happy, for when they die,
 Their souls are soon dissolved in elements ;
 But mine must live still to be plagued in Hell.
 Curst be the parents that engendered me !
 No, Faustus : curse thyself : curse Lucifer,
 That hath deprived thee of the joys of Heaven.

[The clock strikes twelve.]

It strikes, it strikes ; now, body, turn to air,
 Or Lucifer will bear thee quick to Hell.

[Thunder and lightning.]

O soul, be changed into little water-drops,
 And fall into the ocean : ne'er be found.

Enter Devils.

My God ! my God ! look not so fierce on me.
 Adders and serpents, let me breathe a while :
 Ugly Hell, gape not ! come not, Lucifer !
 I'll burn my books : Ah Mephistophilis !

[Exeunt Devils with FAUSTUS.]Enter CHORUS.

Cho. Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight,

And burned is Apollo's laurel bough
 That sometimes grew within this learned man :
 Faustus is gone ; regard his hellish fall,
 Whose fiendish fortune may exhort the wise
 Only to wonder at unlawful things ;
 Whose deepness doth entice such forward wits
 To practise more than heavenly power permits.

There is a fine apostrophe to Helen of Greece, whom Mephistophilis conjures up 'between two Cupids,' to gratify the sensual gaze of Faustus :

Was this the face that launched a thousand ships
 And burned the topless towers of Ilium ?
 Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss !
 Her lips suck forth my soul—see where it flies.
 Come, Helen, come, give me my soul again :
 Here will I dwell, for heaven is in these lips,
 And all is dross that is not Helena.
 I will be Paris, and for love of thee,
 Instead of Troy shall Wertenberg be sacked ;
 And I will combat with weak Menelaus,
 And wear thy colours on my plumed crest :
 Yea, I will wound Achilles in the heel,
 And then return to Helen for a kiss.
 Oh, thou art fairer than the evening air,
 Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars !
 Brighter art thou than flaming Jupiter
 When he appeared to hapless Semele ;
 More lovely than the monarch of the sky
 In wanton Arethusa's azure arms ;
 And none but thou shalt be my paramour.

(From Scene xiv.)

Faustus long held the stage, and was revived at the Restoration. Faust is first heard of in Germany in 1507 ; the folk-tale on his life had appeared in various shapes in Germany from 1587 down.
 Marlowe's play, in a German version, was acted in Germany by English players in 1608 and 1626 ;
 and the play was not without influence on the Faust of Goethe, who greatly admired Marlowe's.

Before 1593 Marlowe produced three other dramas, The Jew of Malta, The Massacre at Paris, and Edward II. The more malignant passions of the human breast have rarely been represented with greater power than in the Jew of Malta, in some respects the prototype of the Merchant of Venice (see below at Shakespeare), though, as Charles Lamb pointed out, whereas Shylock at the worst was a man, Barabas is a mere monster, who 'kills in sport, poisons whole nunneries, invents infernal machines.' Yet in the earlier scenes he behaves like a very human man, and there is some fine poetry put in his mouth. After he has been stripped of house and wealth by the Church authorities his friends try vainly to comfort him :

1st Jew. Yet, brother Barabas, remember Job.

Bar. What tell you me of Job ? I wot his wealth
 Was written thus : he had seven thousand sheep,
 Three thousand camels, and two hundred yoke
 Of labouring oxen, and five hundred
 She asses : but for every one of those,

Had they been valued at indifferent rate,
 I had at home, and in mine argosy,
 And other ships that came from Egypt last,
 As much as would have bought his beasts and him,
 And yet have kept enough to live upon :
 So that not he, but I may curse the day,
 Thy fatal birth-day, forlorn Barabas ;
 And henceforth wish for an eternal night,
 That clouds of darkness may inclose my flesh,
 And hide these extreme sorrows from mine eyes :
 For only I have toiled to inherit here
 The months of vanity and loss of time,
 And painful nights have been appointed me.

2nd Jew. Good Barabas, be patient.

Bar. Ay, I pray, leave me in my patience. You,
 Were ne'er possessed of wealth, are pleased with want ;
 But give him liberty at least to mourn,
 That in a field amidst his enemies
 Doth see his soldiers slain, himself disarmed,
 And knows no means of his recovery :
 Ay, let me sorrow for this sudden chance ;
 'Tis in the trouble of my spirit I speak ;
 Great injuries are not so soon forgot.

1st Jew. Come, let us leave him ; in his ireful mood
 Our words will but increase his ecstasy.

His house has been straightway turned into a nunnery, and he sends his daughter Abigail, ostensibly to become a novice, really to steal back some gold and jewels he had hid beneath a movable plank. While waiting outside he thus soliloquises :

Thus, like the sad presaging raven, that tolls
 The sick man's passport in her hollow beak,
 And in the shadow of the silent night
 Doth shake contagion from her sable wings ;
 Vexed and tormented runs poor Barabas
 With fatal curses towards these Christians.
 The uncertain pleasures of swift-footed time
 Have ta'en their flight, and left me in despair ;
 And of my former riches rests no more
 But bare remembrance, like a soldier's scar,
 That has no further comfort for his maim.
 O thou, that with a fiery pillar led'st
 The sons of Israel through the dismal shades,
 Light Abraham's offspring ; and direct the hand
 Of Abigail this night ; or let the day
 Turn to eternal darkness after this !
 No sleep can fasten on my watchful eyes,
 Nor quiet enter my distempered thoughts,
 Till I have answer of my Abigail.

And when Abigail throws down the bags from the window he hugs them, and in words almost anticipating Shakespeare's, 'My daughter ! O my ducats !
 O my daughter !' gasps :

O girl ! O gold ! O beauty ! O my bliss !

Edward II. is, as a play, greatly superior to the two named with it : though it has not the majestic poetry of Faustus and the first two acts of the Jew of Malta, it is a noble drama, with ably-drawn characters and splendid scenes. Another tragedy, Lust's Dominion, was published long after Marlowe's death, with his name as author on the title-page. Collier showed that this play, as printed, was a much later production, and was probably written by Dekker and others ; but it contains passages and characters characteristic of Marlowe's style, and he may have written the original outline.

 The old play of Taming of a Shrew, printed in 1594
 (a precursor of Shakespeare's), contains numerous passages manifestly borrowed from Marlowe's acknowledged works, and hence it has been quite unreasonably argued that he was its author. Great uncertainty hangs over many of the old dramas, from the common practice of managers of theatres employing different authors, at subsequent periods,
 to furnish additional matter for established plays.
 Even Faustus was dressed up in this manner. In 1597—four years after Marlowe's death—Dekker was paid 20s. for making additions to this tragedy ;
 and in other five years Birde and Rowley were paid £4 for further additions to it. Another source of uncertainty as to the paternity of old plays was the unscrupulous manner in which booksellers appropriated any popular name of the day and affixed it to their publications. Marlowe joined with Nash in writing Dido, Queen of Carthage, a tragedy of small value, though it contains some true poetry ; and there is little doubt that he had a hand in the three parts of Shakespeare's Henry VI., probably also in Titus Anronicus.
 His translation of the Elegies of Ovid was burnt as licentious by order of the Archbishop of Canterbury, yet it was often reprinted in defiance of the ecclesiastical interdict.

His influence on Shakespeare is marked, especially in the early plays (see the article on Shakespeare). Marlowe never tried comedy—fortunately ; for he seems to have had no humour.
 He had no conception of true love or of a noble woman's character. And the sweetness, light, sympathy, and morality (not in a precisian but yet very indecisive sense) of his great successor, Shakespeare, were foreign to Marlowe's usual mood.

Marlowe lived a wild life, and came to an early and unhappy end ; at twenty-nine, on the 1st of June 1593, he was stabbed in a quarrel at Deptford (over a tavern reckoning) by one Ingram Frizer, 'gentleman,' and, according to the finding of the coroner's jury, 'then and there instantly died.' (See Death of Christopher Marlowe, by J. L.
 Hotson, 1925.) Highly-coloured accounts of his death were given by Puritanical writers. His free-thinking ways were notorious : Greene, writing the Groats-worth of Wit in the preceding autumn, charged him with utter atheism (see above at page 326). Whether his unbelief was dogmatic atheism or not—it seems rather to have been a variety of Unitarianism or theism—it was sufficiently pronounced to attract the notice of the authorities, who were taking proceedings against him and others at the time of his death, and had issued a warrant for his arrest. The last words of Greene's address to him are ominous : 'Defer not with me till this last point of extremitie ; for little knowest thou how in the end thou shalt be visited.' A noble compliment was paid to the genius of this unfortunate poet by his fellow-dramatist, Michael Drayton :

Next Marlowe, bathed in the Thespian springs,
Had in him those brave translunary things
That the first poets had : his raptures were
All air and fire, which made his verses clear ;
For that fine madness still he did retain,
Which rightly should possess a poet's brain.

Sir Sidney Lee thought Marlowe was probably associated with Shakespeare in bringing the second and third parts of Henry VI. into final shape, and that he may have had a share in writing the anonymous Edward III. (see below at Shakespeare). Originality, first attribute of genius, belongs in an eminent degree to the ill-fated Marlowe. Swinburne found greater discrimination of character, and figures more lifelike, in Marlowe's Edward II. than in Shakespeare's Richard II. Gaveston, reading a letter, is thus introduced :

Gav. 'My father is deceased ! Come, Gaveston,
And share the kingdom with thy dearest friend.'
Ah ! words that make me surfeit with delight !
What greater bliss can hap to Gaveston
Than live and be the favourite of a king !
Sweet prince, I come ; these, these thy amorous lines
Might have enforced me to have swum from France,
And, like Leander, gasped upon the sand,
So thou would'st smile, and take me in thine arms.
The sight of London to my exiled eyes
Is as Elysium to a new-come soul ;
Not that I love the city, or the men,
But that it harbours him I hold so dear—
The king, upon whose bosom let me lie,
And with the world be still at enmity.
What need the arctic people love starlight,
To whom the sun shines both by day and night ?
Farewell base stooping to the lordly peers !
My knee shall bow to none but to the king.
As for the multitude, that are but sparks,
Raked up in embers of their poverty ;—
Tanti ; I'll fawn first on the wind
That glanceth at my lips, and flieth away.
But how now, what are these ?

In Charles Lamb's judgment, the death-scene of Edward II., at Berkeley Castle, when the king is left alone with Lightborn, the murderer, 'moves pity and terror beyond any scene, ancient or modern,' and may indeed challenge comparison with Shakespeare's death of Richard II. :

Edward. Who's there ? what light is that ? wherefore com'st thou ?

Lightborn. To comfort you, and bring you joyful news.

Edw. Small comfort finds poor Edward in thy looks ! Villain, I know thou com'st to murder me.

Light. To murder you, my most gracious lord ! Far is it from my heart to do you harm.

The queen sent me to see how you were used,
For she relents at this your misery :

And what eyes can refrain from shedding tears,
To see a king in this most piteous state.

Edw. Weep'st thou already ? list a while to me,

And then thy heart, were it as Gurney's¹ is,
Or as Matrevis',¹ hewn from the Caucasus,
Yet will it melt, ere I have done my tale.
This dungeon where they keep me is a sink
Wherein the filth of all the castle falls.

Light. O villains !

Edw. And there, in mire and puddle, have I stood
This ten days' space ; and lest that I should sleep,
One plays continually upon a drum.
They give me bread and water, being a king ;
So that, for want of sleep and sustenance,
My mind's distempered, and my body's numbed,
And whether I have limbs or no, I know not.
O would my blood drop out from every vein,
As doth this water from my tattered robes !
Tell Isabel, the queen, I looked not thus,
When for her sake I ran at tilt in France,
And there unhorsed the Duke of Cleremont.

Light. O speak no more, my lord ! this breaks my heart.
Lie on this bed, and rest yourself a while.

Edw. These looks of thine can harbour nought but death :

I see my tragedy written in thy brows.

Yet stay a while, forbear thy bloody hand,

And let me see the stroke before it comes,

That even then, when I shall lose my life,

My mind may be more steadfast on my God.

Light. What means your highness to mistrust me thus ?

Edw. What mean'st thou to dissemble with me thus ?

Light. These hands were never stained with innocent blood,

Nor shall they now be tainted with a king's.

Edw. Forgive my thought, for having such a thought.

One jewel have I left, receive thou this.

Still fear I, and I know not what's the cause,

But every joint shakes as I give it thee.

Oh, if thou harbour'st murder in thy heart,

Let the gift change thy mind, and save thy soul.

Know that I am a king : Oh, at that name

I feel a hell of grief. Where is my crown ?

Gone, gone ; and do I still remain alive ?

Light. You're overwatched, my lord ; lie down and rest.

Edw. But that grief keeps me waken, I should sleep ;

For not these ten days have these eyelids closed.

Now as I speak they fall, and yet with fear

Open again. O wherefore sitt'st thou here ?

Light. If thou mistrust me, I'll be gone, my lord.

Edw. No, no ; for if thou mean'st to murder me,

Thou wilt return again ; and therefore stay.

Light. He sleeps.

Edw. O let me not die ; yet stay, O stay a while.

Light. How now, my lord ?

Edw. Something still buzzeth in mine ears,

And tells me if I sleep, I never wake ;

This fear is that which makes me tremble thus.

And therefore tell me wherefore art thou come ?

Light. To rid thee of thy life. Matrevis, come.

Edw. I am too weak and feeble to resist :

Assist me, sweet God, and receive my soul.

¹ Gurney and Matrevis were Edward's keepers.

The following scene, in which the nobles remonstrate with Edward II., has also something of the Shakespearian manner :

Edward. How now ? What noise is this ?
Who have we here ? Is't you ?

Young Mortimer. Nay, stay my lord : I come to bring you news :

Mine uncle's taken prisoner by the Scots.

Edw. Then ransom him.

Lancaster. 'Twas in your wars ; you should ransom him.

Y. Mor. And you shall ransom him, or else—

Kent. What ! Mortimer, you will not threaten him ?

Edw. Quiet yourself ; you shall have the broad seal To gather for him throughout the realm.

Lanc. Your minion, Gaveston, hath taught you this.

Y. Mor. My lord, the family of the Mortimers Are not so poor but would they sell their land, 'Twould levy men enough to anger you.

We never beg, but use such prayers as these.

Edw. Shall I still be haunted thus ?

Y. Mor. Nay, now you're here alone, I'll speak my mind.

Lanc. And so will I, and then, my lord, farewell.

Y. Mor. The idle triumphs, masques, lascivious shows, And prodigal gifts bestowed on Gaveston, Have drawn thy treasury dry, and made thee weak : The murmuring commons, overstretched, break.

Lanc. Look for rebellion, look to be deposed ; Thy garrisons are beaten out of France, And, lame and poor, lie groaning at the gates. The wild Oney, with swarms of Irish kernes, Lives uncontrolled within the English pale. Unto the walls of York the Scots make road, And unresisted draw away rich spoils.

Y. Mor. The haughty Dane commands the narrow seas, While in the harbour ride thy ships unriggerd.

Lanc. What foreign prince sends thee ambassadors ?

Y. Mor. Who loves thee but a sort of flatterers ?

Lanc. Thy gentle queen, sole sister to Valois, Complains that thou hast left her all forlorn.

Y. Mor. Thy court is naked, being bereft of those That make a king seem glorious to the world— I mean the Peers, whom thou shouldst dearly love : Libels are cast against thee in the street, Ballads and rhymes made of thy overthrow.

Lanc. The northern borderers seeing their houses burned, Their wives and children slain, run up and down Cursing the name of thee and Gaveston.

Y. Mor. When wert thou in the field with bannerspread, But once ? and then thy soldiers marched like players With garish robes, not armour ; and thyself Bedaubed with gold, rode laughing at the rest, Nodding and shaking of thy spangled crest, Where women's favours hung like labels down.

Lanc. And therefore came it that the fleeing Scots To England's high disgrace have made this jig :

' Maids of England, sore may you mourn

For your lemans you have lost at Bannocksbourne,

' With a heave and a ho.

What weeneth the King of England

So soon to have won Scotland ?

With a rombelow.'

The concluding ditty is that quoted by Fabyan as having been sung by the Scots after Bannockburn (see above at page 171).

Detached lines and passages in Edward II. possess much poetical beauty or imaginative power. Thus, in answer to Leicester, the king says :

Leicester, if gentle words might comfort me,
Thy speeches long ago had eased my sorrows ;
For kind and loving hast thou always been.
The griefs of private men are soon allayed,
But not of kings. The forest deer being struck,
Runs to an herb that closeth up the wounds :
But when the imperial lion's flesh is gored,
He rends and tears it with his wrathful paw,
And highly scorning that the lowly earth
Should drink his blood, mounts up to the air.

Young Mortimer's device for the royal pageant was :

A lofty cedar tree fair flourishing,
On whose top branches kingly eagles perch,
And by the bark a canker creeps me up,
And gets into the highest bough of all.

For the story Marlowe follows not so much Fabyan as the chronicles of Stow, Holinshed, and Baker.

Marlowe's unfinished poem of Hero and Leander, founded on the classic story of the sixth-century Musæus, was first published in 1598. Marlowe completed the first and second Sestiads of his paraphrase, and they were reprinted with a completion (four sestiads) by Chapman in 1598. A few lines will show his command of the heroic couplet :

It lies not in our power to love or hate,
For will in us is overruled by fate.
When two are stripped, long ere the race begin,
We wish that one should lose, the other win.
And one especially do we affect
Of two gold ingots, like in each respect.
The reason no man knows : let it suffice
What we behold is censured by our eyes :
Where both deliberate, the love is slight :
Who ever loved, that loved not at first sight ?

The last memorable line was quoted from the 'Dead Shepherd' by Shakespeare in As You Like It. 'Blood is the god of war's rich livery,' 'Above our life we love an absent friend,' 'More childish valorous than worldly wise,' are pregnant single lines ; 'Things past recovery are hardly cured with exclamations' has a modern ring.

Of the following pieces which first appeared in the Passionate Pilgrim (see page 257), the first is in England's Helicon given as by Marlowe, and the second by 'Ignoto.' But in one copy the initials of Sir Walter Raleigh are attached ; and we have the explicit statement of Izaak Walton that the pieces were really by Marlowe and Raleigh respectively—an attribution now generally accepted. Posterity also agrees with Walton that Marlowe's poem is 'choicely good.'

The Passionate Shepherd to his Love.

Come live with me and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove
That hills and vallies, dales and fields,
Woods or steepy mountain yields.

And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers, to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses,
And a thousand fragrant posies;
A cap of flowers and a kirtle
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;

A gown made of the finest wooll,
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold;

A belt of straw and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs:
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Come live with me, and be my love.

The shepherd swains shall dance and sing,
For thy delight, each May-morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me, and be my love.

The Nymph's Reply.

(By Sir Walter Raleigh.)

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee, and be thy love.

But Time drives flocks from field to fold,
When rivers rage and rocks grow cold;
And Philomel becometh dumb,
The rest complains of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton fields
To wayward winter reckoning yields;
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,
Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cup, thy kirtle, and thy posies,
Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten,
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
Thy coral clasps and amber studs;
All these in me no means can move
To come to thee, and be thy love.

But could youth last, and love still breed,
Had joys no date, nor age no need,
Then those delights my mind might move
To live with thee, and be thy love.

Richard Carew (1555-1620), of Antony House in East Cornwall, was bred at Christ Church, Oxford, but spent most of his life as an active and cultured country gentleman on his own estate. He was the first to essay an English rendering of Tasso; but of his translation—Godfrey of Bulloigne or the Recoverie of Hierusalem—only five cantos appeared (1594). Carew kept much closer to his original than Fairfax did, was often correct where

Fairfax blundered, and was sometimes (though seldom) as rhythmical. The apostrophe in the first book will serve for comparison with Fairfax's version (given below at page 445):

O Muse! thou that thy head not compassest
With fading bayes which Helicon doth beare;
But bove in skyes, amidst the Quyers blest,
Dost golden crowne of starres immortal weare,
Celestiall flames breath thou into my brest,
Enlighten thou my song; and pardon where
I fainings weave with truth, and verse with art
Of pleasings deckt, wherein thou hast no part.

His entertaining Survey of Cornwall (1602) describes the manners and customs of the people, and gives a pretty full account, with specimens, of the Cornish language, then still spoken. He does not omit the 'common byword—By Tre, Pol, and Pen, you shall know the Cornishmen;' and then goes on to record a sad fact:

But the principall love and knowledge of this language lived in Doctor Kennall the civilian, and with him lyeth buried: for the English speach doth still encroche upon it, and hath driven the same into the uttermost skirts of the shire. Most of the inhabitants can no word of Cornish; but very few are ignorant of the English: and yet some so affect their owne as to a stranger they will not speake it: for if meeting them by chance you enquire the way or any such matter, your answer shal be, Meea navidva cowzasawzneck, 'I can speake no Saxonage.' The English which they speake is good and pure as receyving it from the best hands of their owne gentry and the easterne marchants: but they disgrace it in part with a broad and rude accent, and eclipsing (somewhat like the Somersetshire men) specially in pronouncing names.

His Epistle concerning the Excellencies of the English Tongue (1605) is slight but interesting. He argues that in the four main points—significance, easiness, copiousness, and sweetness—'English is comparable if not preferable to any other in use at this day.' The ground language 'appertaineth to the old Saxon;' and our having borrowed 'from the Dutch, the Britaine, the Roman, the Dane, the French, the Italian, the Spaniard,' so far from 'making Littletons hotch-potch of our tongue or a Babelish confusion,' is amply warranted by the results, especially by the copiousness secured. (Littleton's Tenures, reproduced in 'Coke-upon-Littleton,' was long the standard authority on the branch of English law called Hotchpot.) The conclusion is:

Moreover, the Copiousnesse of our Language appeareth in the diversitie of our Dialects; for we have Court and we have Countrie English, we have Northerne and Southerne, grosse and ordinarie, which differ each from the other not onely in the Terminations, but also in many words, termes, and phrases, and expresse the same thinges in divers sorts, yet all right English alike. Neither can any Tongue, as I am perswaded, deliver a Matter with more Variety than ours, both plainly, and by Proverbes and Metaphors: for example, when we would be rid of one, we use to say, Be going, trudge, packe; Bee faring hence; Away; Shift; and by Circumlocation, Rather your Rosome than your Companie; Lets see your backe; Come againe when I bid you, when you are called, sent for, intreated, willed, desired, invited; Spare us your place; Another in your stead; A ship of salt for you; Save your credite; You are next the doore; The doore is open for you; There is no body holdeth you; No body teares your sleeve, &c. . . . And in a word, to close up these proofs of our Copiousnesse, look into our imitations of all sorts of Verses afforded by any other Language, and you shall finde that Sir Philip Sidney, M. Puttenham, M. Stanihurst, and divers more have made use how farre we are within compasse of a fore-imagined possibilitie in that behalfe.

I come now to the last and sweetest point, of the sweetness of our Tongue, which shall appeare the more plainly if we match it with our Neighboures. The Italian is pleasante, but without Sinews, as a still fleeting Water; the French delicate, but even nice as a Woman, scarce daring to open her Lippes, for feare of marring her Countenance; the Spanish Majestical, but fulsome, running too much on the o, and terrible like the Devill in a Play; the Dutch manlike, but withall very harsh, as one ready at every word to picke a quarrel. Now we, in borrowing from them, give the Strength of Consnants to the Italian, the full Sound of Words to the French, the Varietie of Terminations to the Spanish, and the mollifying of more Vowels to the Dutch; and so, like Bees, gather the Honey of their good Properties, and leave the Dregs to themselves. And thus when substantialnesse combineth with delightfullnesse, fullnesse with finenesse, seemlinesse with portlinesse, and currantnesse with staidnesse, how can the Language which consisteth of all these sound other than most full of Sweetnesse?

Againe, the long wordes that we borrow being intermingled with the short of our owne store, make up a perfect Harmonie, by culling from out which Mixture (with judgment) you may frame your Speech according to the Matter you must worke on, majesticall, pleasant, delicate, or manly, more or lesse, in what sort you please. Adde hereunto, that whatsoever Grace any other Language carrieth in Verse or Prose, in Tropes or Metaphors, in Eccho's and Agnominations, they may all be lively and exactly represented in ours. Will you have Plato's Veine? read Sir Thomas Smith; the Ionicke? Sir Thomas Moore; Cicero's? Ascham; Varro? Chaucer; Demosthenes? Sir John Cheeke; who hath comprised all the Figures of Rhetoricke. Will you read Virgil? take the Earle of Surry; Catullus? Shakspeare, and Barlowes Fragment; Ovid? Daniel; Lucan? Spencer; Martial? Sir John Davies, and others. Will you have all in all for Prose and Verse? take the Miracle of our Age, Sir Philip Sidney.

And thus, if mine owne Eies bee not blinded by Affection, I have made yours to see, that the most renowned of all other Nations have laid up as in a Treasure and entrusted the divisos orbe Britannos with the rarest Jewels of the Lips Perfections; whether you respect the Understanding for Significancie, or the Memorie for Easinesse, or the Conceit for Plentifullnesse, or the Eare for Pleasantnesse: wherein if enough be delivered, to add more than enough were superfluous; if too little, I leave it to be supplied by better stored Capacities; if ought amisse, I submit the same to the Discipline of everie able and impartial Censurer.

Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke (1554–1628), born at Beauchamp Court, Warwickshire; from Shrewsbury passed to Jesus College, Cambridge; with his school friend Philip Sidney visited Heidelberg (1577); sat in parliament and held various offices under Elizabeth and James I.; in 1603 was made a Knight of the Bath, and in 1620 Lord Brooke. He was stabbed by an old servant who had found he was not mentioned in his master's will; the man, struck with remorse, then slew himself. Greville's tomb may still be seen in St Mary's Church at Warwick, with the emphatic epitaph written by himself: 'Fulke Grevill, servant to Queene Elizabeth, conceller to King James, frénd to Sir Philip Sidney.' He was a thoughtful, sententious author both in prose and verse, though nearly all his productions were unpublished till after his death. Among them were a Life of Sidney; verse treatises on such subjects as learning, fame, war, monarchy, and religion; two tragedies; and Cælia (109 sonnets). Sonnet lxxxiv., 'Farewell sweet boy, complaine not of my truth,' was reconstructed by Coleridge in his 'Farewell to Love.' The complete works of Lord Brooke were collected and edited by Dr Alex. B. Grosart (4 vols. 1870), who also published The Friend of Sir Philip Sidney (1895). A few stanzas from the Treatise on Monarchy describing the prehistoric age will show the dignified style of Fulke Greville's verse:

There was a time before the times of Story
When Nature reign'd instead of Laws or Arts,
And mortal gods, with men made up the glory
Of one Republick by united hearts.

Earth was the common seat, their conversation
In saving love, and our's in adoration.

For in those golden days, with Nature's chains
Both King and People seem'd conjoyn'd in one;
Both nurst alike, with mutual feeding veins,
Transcendency of either side unknown;
Princes with men using no other arts
But by good dealing to obtain good hearts.

Power then maintaintd it self even by those arts
By which it grew: as Justice, Labor, Love;
Reserv'd sweetness did it self impart
Even unto slaves, yet kept it self above,
And by a meek descending to the least,
Enviless sway'd and govern'd all the rest.

Order there equal was; Time courts ordain'd
To hear, to judge, to execute, and make
Few and good rules, for all griefs that complain'd;
Such care did princes of their people take
Before this art of Power allay'd the Truth:
So glorious of Man's greatness is the youth.

What wonder was it then if those thrones found
Thanks as exorbitant as was their merit?
Wit to give highest tributes, being bound
And wound up by a princely ruling spirit
To worship them for their gods after death
Who in their life exceeded humane faith?

William Shakespeare.

Shakespeare, the greatest poet and dramatist not merely of the Elizabethan and Jacobean eras, but of any age or country, was born nearly six years after the accession of Queen Elizabeth. His life extended over fifty-two years, and when he died James I. had occupied the throne of England for thirteen years. Of his elder literary contemporaries, Sir Walter Raleigh was his senior by twelve years; John Lyly and Richard Hooker each by ten years; Robert Greene by four; Francis Bacon by three; and Christopher Marlowe, his tutor in tragedy, by only two months. Of his younger contemporaries, Ben Jonson was his junior by nine years, John Fletcher by eleven, Massinger by nineteen, and Francis Beaumont by twenty. Milton, who, from both chronological and critical points of view, was next Shakespeare the greatest English poet, was born when Shakespeare was forty-four years old, and was only contemporary with him for the first eight years of life.

I. The obscurity with which Shakespeare's biography has been long credited is greatly exaggerated.¹ The mere biographical information accessible is far more definite and more abundant than that concerning any other dramatist of the day. Shakespeare's father, John Shakespeare, was a dealer in agricultural produce at Stratford-on-Avon, a prosperous country town in the heart of England. John Shakespeare was himself son of a small farmer residing in the neighbouring village of Snitterfield. The family was of good yeoman stock. Shakespeare's mother, Mary Arden, was also daughter of a local farmer who enjoyed somewhat greater wealth and social standing than the poet's father and his kindred. William Shakespeare, the eldest child that survived infancy, was baptised in the parish church of Stratford-on-Avon on 26th April 1564.

The poet was educated with a younger brother, Gilbert, at the public grammar-school of Stratford—an institution re-established by Edward VI. on a mediæval foundation. The course of study was mainly confined to the Latin classics, and Shakespeare proved his familiarity with the Latin school-books in use at Elizabethan grammar-schools by quoting many phrases from them in his earliest play, Love's Labour's Lost. Until Shakespeare was thirteen years old his father's fortunes prospered. Within that period John Shakespeare took a prominent part in the municipal affairs of Stratford. After holding many inferior offices, he was elected an alderman in 1565, and in 1568 he became bailiff or mayor. But about 1577 his business declined, and he was involved for many years afterwards in a series of pecuniary difficulties. As a consequence his eldest son was removed from school at the early age of thirteen or thereabouts, and was brought into the paternal business to buy and sell agricultural produce. But he was not destined to render his family much assistance in that capacity. In 1582, when eighteen years old, he increased his father's anxieties by marrying. His wife Anne was daughter of Richard Hathaway, a farmer residing in the adjoining hamlet of Shottery. She was no less than eight years her lover's senior. There is good reason to believe that Shakespeare was a reluctant party to the marriage, to which he was driven by the lady's friends in order to protect her reputation. The ceremony took place in November 1582, and a daughter, Susanna, was born in the following May. A year later twins were born, a son and daughter, named respectively Hamnet and Judith. Shakespeare had no more children, and it is probable that in 1585 he left his family at Stratford to seek a livelihood elsewhere, and for some twelve years saw little or nothing of his wife and children.

A credible tradition assigns the immediate cause of Shakespeare's abandonment of his country home to a poaching adventure in Sir Thomas Lucy's park at Charlecote, which is situated within five miles of Stratford. It is related that he was caught there in the act of stealing deer and rabbits, and was ordered to be whipped and imprisoned by the owner, Sir Thomas Lucy. Shakespeare is reported to have penned bitter verses (which have not survived) on his prosecutor, and Lucy's threat of further punishment is said to have finally driven Shakespeare from Stratford. He subsequently avenged himself on Sir Thomas Lucy by caricaturing him as Justice Shallow in the Second Part of Henry IV. and The Merry Wives of Windsor.

There is a further tradition that Shakespeare on leaving Stratford served as schoolmaster in an adjacent village. But there is little doubt that at an early date in 1586, when twenty-two years old, he travelled on foot to London, passing through Oxford on the way. It was with the capital city of the country that the flower of his literary life was to be identified. London was chiefly his home during the twenty-three years that elapsed between 1586 and 1609, between the twenty-third and forty-sixth years of his age.

Probably only one resident in London was already known to him on his arrival—Richard Field, who some seven years before had left Stratford to be bound apprentice to the London printer Vautrollier. Field subsequently printed for Shakespeare the earliest work that he sent to press. On his settlement in the metropolis Shakespeare sought a living at the theatre. It is said that at first he tended visitors' horses outside a playhouse. In a very short time he was employed inside the playhouse, probably as call-boy; but opportunity of trying his skill as an actor was given him, and he stood the test sufficiently well to gain speedy admission to one of the chief acting companies of the day. The acting company to which Shakespeare was admitted may with safety be identified with that under the patronage of Queen Elizabeth's favourite, the Earl of Leicester; on Leicester's death in 1588 the patronage of the company, which implied a merely nominal relationship, passed in succession to Lord Strange, afterwards Earl of Derby (d. 1594); to Lord Hunsdon, Lord Chamberlain (d. 1596); to Lord Hunsdon's son, also Lord Chamberlain; and finally, on Queen Elizabeth's death in 1603, to the new king, James I. Thus Shakespeare's company, which at the time he joined it was known as Lord Leicester's players, afterwards bore the successive titles of Lord Strange's company (1588-92), the Lord Chamberlain's company (1592-96), Lord Hunsdon's company (1596-97), again the Lord Chamberlain's company (1597-1603), and finally of the King's company from the accession of James I. in 1603. When he joined the company it was doubtless performing at The Theatre, the earliest playhouse built in England; it was erected in Shoreditch in 1576 by James Burbage, father of the great actor, Richard Burbage. While the company was under Lord Strange's patronage it found new quarters in the Rose, a theatre built in 1592 on the Bankside, Southwark. This was the earliest scene of Shakespeare's conspicuous successes alike as actor and dramatist. During 1594 Shakespeare frequented for a short time the stage of another new theatre at Newington Butts, and between 1595 and 1599 the stages of the oldest playhouses in the kingdom—the Curtain and The Theatre in Shoreditch. In 1599 yet another new theatre was built on the Bankside, Southwark; this was the famous Globe Theatre, an octagonal wooden structure. With that theatre Shakespeare's professional career was almost exclusively identified for the rest of his life, and in its profits he acquired an important share. At the close of 1609, when his theatrical career was nearing its end, Shakespeare's company occupied a second stage in addition to that of the Globe—the stage of the Blackfriars Theatre.

Acting companies in Shakespeare's day seldom remained in London during the summer or early autumn. They toured in the provinces, and it is reasonable to suppose that Shakespeare visited many English towns in his capacity of a travelling actor. There is small foundation for the conjecture that he extended his journeys to Scotland, and practically none for the view that he visited the Continent, although several companies of English actors are known to have performed at foreign courts.

Little information survives of the exact rôles which Shakespeare undertook. Few extant documents refer directly to performances by him. But at Christmas 1594, it is important to note, he joined William Kemp, the chief comedian of the day, and Richard Burbage, the greatest tragic actor, in 'two several comedies or interludes' which were played on St Stephen's Day and on Innocents' Day (December 27 and 28) at Greenwich Palace before the queen. Shakespeare's appearance at court for the first time on this occasion in 1594 sufficiently indicates his growing fame in the worlds alike of fashion and the theatre. Subsequently his name heads the list of original performers in Ben Jonson's Every Man in his Humour (1598), and he was one of the original performers in Jonson's Sejanus (1603). The dramatist's early biographer, Nicholas Rowe, recorded the performance by Shakespeare of 'the Ghost in his own Hamlet,' and John Davies of Hereford noted that 'he played some kingly parts in sport.' One of Shakespeare's younger brothers, presumably Gilbert, recalled at a long subsequent date his brother's performance of Adam in As You Like It. In the 1623 folio edition of Shakespeare's 'Works,' his own name headed the prefatory list of 'the principall actors in these playes.'

II. But it is not his histrionic activity that lends real interest to Shakespeare's name or history; it is his unmatchable achievement in dramatic poetry. His earliest experience as a dramatic writer was gained in the way of revising plays by other writers who had sold their works to the manager of his company. Much that thus came from his pen in his early days has possibly remained concealed in plays attributed to other authors. In a few cases, however, his labours as reviser were publicly acknowledged or have been detected by critics; they have usually proved to be so thorough that the revised compositions are entitled to rank among original efforts. It is difficult to fix precisely the date at which his dramatic writing, whether as reviser or independent author, began. It is probable that the whole of it was done between 1591 and 1611. During that time he apparently produced on the average two new or adapted plays each year.

The exact order in which Shakespeare's Plays were written cannot be given with any certainty. Only sixteen of the thirty-seven plays commonly assigned to him were published in his lifetime, and the date of publication rarely indicates the date of composition: a piece was often published many years after it was written. But the subject-matter and metre both afford rough clues to the period in the dramatist's lifetime to which the play may be referred. Although Shakespeare's songs and poems prove him a master of lyric verse of varied metres, all but a small fragment of his dramatic work is in blank-verse, and Shakespeare's blank-verse underwent much change in construction in the course of his career. In his earlier years he strictly adhered to formal rules of pause and stress; the lines are clearly marked off from one another by an inevitable rest after the fifth accented syllable. At the same time rhyming couplets are frequent. Fantastic conceits and puns or plays upon words constantly recur. In Shakespeare's matured work few of these features find a place. The poet ignores the artificial restrictions imposed by the laws of prosody. He varies the pauses of his blank-verse lines indefinitely, in order that they may respond to every call of human feeling. Unemphatic syllables often end the lines, and render stress there impossible. The flexibility or pliancy is increased by the introduction of extra-metrical syllables at the end of lines or occasionally in the middle. In later plays rhyme almost entirely disappears.

The following passages illustrate the main differences in the character of Shakespeare's early and late blank-verse. The first extract is from Love's Labour's Lost (Act II. sc. i. ll. 9-19):

Boyet. Be now as prodigal of all dear grace,
As Nature was in making graces dear,
When she did starve the general world beside,
And prodigally gave them all to you.

Princess. Good Lord Boyet, my beauty, though but mean,

Needs not the painted flourish of your praise :
Beauty is bought by judgement of the eye,
Not uttered by base sale of chapmen's tongues :
I am less proud to hear you tell my worth
Than you much willing to be counted wise
In spending your wit in the praise of mine.

The next extract is from one of the very latest plays, The Tempest (Act V. sc. i. ll. 153-171):

Prospero. I perceive, these lords
At this encounter do so much admire,
That they devour their reason, and scarce think
Their eyes do offices of truth, their words
Are natural breath : but, howsoever you have Been jostled from your senses, know for certain
That I am Prospero, and that very duke
Which was thrust forth of Milan ; who most strangely
Upon this shore, where you were wreck'd, was landed,
To be the lord on 't. No more yet of this ;
For 'tis a chronicle of day by day,
Not a relation for a breakfast, nor Befitting this first meeting. Welcome, sir ;
This cell's my court : here have I few attendants,
And subjects none abroad : pray you, look in.
My dukedom since you have given me again,
I will requite you with as good a thing ;
At least bring forth a wonder, to content ye,
As much as me my dukedom.

At the same time it is noticeable that nearly a third of Shakespeare's dramatic work is in prose, which, commonly lucid and pointed and free from diffuseness or ornament, shows no radical change in character at any period of his career. A study of Shakespeare's prose does not materially help the student in determining the chronology of the plays. The only fact about his use of prose that is of much importance in this connection is that prose figures to a larger extent in the work of middle life than in that of his early or late years. It is not always easy to determine the principles which governed Shakespeare's employment of prose in place of metre, but in the writings of his middle life he almost invariably placed it in the mouths of the humorous or 'low-comedy' characters (e.g. Falstaff), of the spokesmen of mobs, of clowns, fools, and of ladies when they are speaking confidentially to one another ; letters and quoted documents are usually in prose. How admirably terse and direct could be Shakespeare's epistolary style may be judged from Macbeth's letter to his wife (Macbeth, Act I. sc. v. l. 1) :

They met me in the day of success ; and I have learned by the perfectest report, they have more in them than mortal knowledge. When I burned in desire to question them further, they made themselves air, into which they vanished. Whiles I stood rapt in the wonder of it, came missives from the king, who all-hailed me 'Thane of Cawdor ;' by which title, before, these weird sisters saluted me, and referred me to the coming on of time, with 'Hail, king that shalt be !' This have I thought good to deliver thee, my dearest partner of greatness, that thou mightst not lose the dues of rejoicing, by being ignorant of what greatness is promised thee. Lay it to thy heart, and farewell.

As in his treatment of metre, so in his choice and handling of subject-matter, differences are discernible in Shakespeare's plays which clearly suggest the gradual but steady development of dramatic power and temper, and separate with some definiteness early from late work. The comedies of Shakespeare's younger days often trench upon the domains of farce ; those of his middle and later life approach the domain of tragedy. Tragedy in his hands markedly grew, as his years advanced, in subtlety and intensity. His tragic themes became more and more complex, and betrayed deeper and deeper knowledge of the workings of human passion. In one respect only was Shakespeare's method unchangeable. From first to last it was his habit to borrow his plots, though he freely altered and adapted them to suit his growing sense of artistic fitness. The range of literature which he studied in his search for tales whereon to build his dramas was extraordinarily wide. He consulted not merely chronicles of English history (Ralph Holinshed's, for example), on which he based his English historical plays, but he was widely read in the romances of Italy (mainly in French or English translations), in the biographies of Plutarch, and in the plays and romances of English contemporaries. His Roman plays of Julius Cæsar, Antony and Cleopatra, and Coriolanus closely follow the narratives of the Greek biographer. A romance by his contemporary, Thomas Lodge, suggested the fable of As You Like It. Novels by Bandello are the ultimate sources of the stories of Romeo and Juliet, Much Ado about Nothing, and Twelfth Night. All's Well that Ends Well and Cymbeline largely rest on foundations laid by Boccaccio ; the tales of Othello and Measure for Measure are traceable to Giraldi Cinthio. Belleforest's Histoires Tragiques, a collection of French versions of the Italian romances of Bandello, was often in Shakespeare's hands. But although Shakespeare's borrowings were large and open-handed, his debt was greater in appearance than reality. His power of assimilation was exceptionally strong, and the books that he read can only be likened to base ore on which he brought to bear the magic of his genius, with the result that he transmuted it into gold.

Love's Labour's Lost, to which may be assigned priority in point of time of all Shakespeare's dramatic productions, may, from internal evidence, be allotted to 1591. It contains 1028 five-measure rhyming lines out of a total of 2789, and puns are very numerous. The names of the chief characters are drawn from the leaders in the civil war in France, which was in progress between 1589 and 1594, and many matters that were then occupying the minds of those who moved in fashionable and political circles are touched upon. The piece is conceived in an airy vein of good-humoured satire, but genuine poetic feeling breaks forth in the speeches of the hero, Biron (cf. Act IV. sc. iii. ll. 289-365). The play was revised in 1597, probably for a performance at court, and was first published in the following year. Shakespeare's name there first appeared on a title-page as that of author of a play.

The Two Gentlemen of Verona, a comedy of love and friendship, belongs to the same period. The story resembles one in the Spanish pastoral romance of Diana, by George de Montemayor. There is much fascinating poetry in the serious portions of the play, but the note is often lyric rather than dramatic—a sure sign of youthful composition. There is a lyrical irrelevancy, for example, in much of Julia's ingenuous plea in favour of letting her love for Proteus have full play (Act II. sc. vii. ll. 24-38):

The more thou damm'st it up, the more it burns.
The current that with gentle murmur glides,
Thou know'st, being stopp'd, impatiently doth rage;
But when his fair course is not hindered,
He makes sweet music with the enamell'd stones,
Giving a gentle kiss to every sedge
He overtaketh in his pilgrimage;
And so by many winding nooks he strays,
With willing sport, to the wild ocean.
Then let me go, and hinder not my course:
I'll be as patient as a gentle stream,
And make a pastime of each weary step,
Till the last step have brought me to my love;
And there I'll rest, as after much turmoil
A blessed soul doth in Elysium.

The Two Gentlemen was first published in the first folio edition of the works in 1623.

Shakespeare's next play, The Comedy of Errors, also first published in 1623, was for the most part a boisterous farce, resembling in subject-matter the Menachmi of Plautus. But the impressive dénouement (Act v. sc. i.) in which the shrewish wife Adriana confesses her sins against her husband, and is solemnly rebuked by the Abbess, is in the finest spirit of sober and restrained comedy. The speech of the Abbess is especially noteworthy (Act v. sc. i. ll. 68-86):

Abbess. The venom clamours of a jealous woman
Poisons more deadly than a mad dog's tooth.
It seems his sleeps were hinder'd by thy railing:
And thereof comes it that his head is light.
Thou say'st his meat was sauced with thy upbraidings:
Unquiet meals make ill digestions;
Thereof the raging fire of fever bred;
And what's a fever but a fit of madness?
Thou say'st his sports were hinder'd by thy brawls:
Sweet recreation barr'd, what doth ensue
But moody [moping] and dull melancholy,
Kinsman to grim and comfortless despair;
And at her heels a huge infectious troop
Of pale distemperatures and foes to life?
In food, in sport, and life-preserving rest
To be disturb'd, would mad or man or beast:
The consequence is, then, thy jealous fits
Have scared thy husband from the use of wits.

It was after the production of these plays, which show great but not unparalleled ability, that Shakespeare produced his first tragedy, Romeo and Juliet. The work gave conclusive evidence of a poetic and dramatic instinct of unprecedented quality. As a tragic poem on the theme of love it has no rival in any literature. It was based upon a tragic romance of Italian origin, which was already popular in English versions (see pages 262, 263). The date of composition may, perhaps, be gathered from the Nurse's speech, 'Tis since the earthquake now eleven years.' No earthquake had been experienced in England in the sixteenth century after 1580, and a few parallelisms with Daniel's Complainte of Rosamond, published in 1591, seem to point to its completion in that year. An anonymous and surreptitious quarto edition was published in 1597 and an authentic quarto appeared in 1599. The speech of Romeo at the tomb of Juliet before he drinks the poison illustrates the intensity of Shakespeare's dramatic feeling and insight at this early stage in his career (Act v. sc. iii. ll. 91-120):

O my love! my wife!
Death, that hath suck'd the honey of thy breath,
Hath had no power yet upon thy beauty:
Thou art not conquer'd; beauty's ensign yet
Is crimson in thy lips and in thy cheeks,
And death's pale flag is not advanced there.
Tybalt, liest thou there in thy bloody sheet?
O, what more favour can I do to thee
Than with that hand that cut thy youth in twain
To sunder his that was thine enemy?
Forgive me, cousin! Ah, dear Juliet,
Why art thou yet so fair? shall I believe
That unsubstantial death is amorous,
And that the lean abhorred monster keeps
Thee here in dark to be his paramour?
For fear of that, I still will stay with thee,
And never from this palace of dim night
Depart again: here, here will I remain.

With worms that are thy chambermaids ; O, here
Will I set up my everlasting rest,
And shake the yoke of inauspicious stars
From this world-wearied flesh. Eyes, look your last !
Arms, take your last embrace ! and, lips, O you
The doors of breath, seal with a righteous kiss
A dateless bargain to engrossing death !
Come, bitter conduct, come, unsavoury guide !
Thou desperate pilot, now at once run on
The dashing rocks thy sea-sick weary bark.
Here's to my love ! '[Drinks.] O true apothecary !
Thy drugs are quick. Thus with a kiss I die.

With characteristic versatility Shakespeare soon turned his attention to a very different species of dramatic work—the dramatisation of episodes in English history. The first efforts in this kind with which his name can be associated—the three parts of Henry VI.—were versions of other men's works which he had revised. They mainly treat of the civil wars in progress during the reign of the politically weak and superstitious king, Henry VI. On March 3, 1592, Henry VI., the piece subsequently known as The First Part of Henry VI., was acted at the Rose Theatre by Lord Strange's company of actors. A second piece in continuation of the theme quickly followed, and a third, treating of the concluding incidents of Henry VI.'s reign, was played in the early autumn. The first of the three plays, which was originally published in the collected edition of Shakespeare's works, shows sparse marks of Shakespeare's workmanship. It was probably a hasty revision by Marlowe and Shakespeare of a crude and clumsy piece of independent origin. Shakespeare's genuine thought and expression are visible in such a brilliant passage as (1 Henry VI., Act I. sc. ii. ll. 133-5) :

Glory is like a circle in the water,
Which never ceaseth to enlarge itself
Till by broad spreading it disperse to nought.

But very few scenes bear the impress of his style ; the rest, including the barbarous handling of the story of Joan of Arc, are from a far inferior pen. The second and third parts of Henry VI., which were first connected with Shakespeare's name on their publication in the First Folio, had been printed previously under other titles, and in forms very different from that which they subsequently assumed in the First Folio. The second part of Shakespeare's Henry VI. was first published in 1594 with the title The first part of the contention betwixt the two famous houses of Yorke and Lancaster ; and the third part was printed in 1595 as The true tragedie of Richard, Duke of Yorke. There seems little doubt that The first part of the contention and The True Tragedie were by Marlowe aided by Shakespeare, but were not themselves original compositions, being liberally constructed out of older pieces now lost. The second and third parts of Henry VI., as they figure in the First Folio, were doubtless the outcome of a further revision of the Contention and True Tragedie, for which Shakespeare may be held to have been mainly responsible. One of the most notable amplifications of the True Tragedie is the touching soliloquy, while the battle of Towton is raging, of Henry VI., who there pathetically contrasts the happiness of a shepherd's life with that of a king (3 Henry VI., Act II. sc. v. ll. 21-54) :

O God ! methinks it were a happy life,
To be no better than a homely swain ;
To sit upon a hill, as I do now,
To carve out dials quaintly, point by point,
Thereby to see the minutes how they run,
How many make the hour full complete ;
How many hours bring about the day ;
How many days will finish up the year ;
How many years a mortal man may live.
When this is known, then to divide the times :
So many hours must I tend my flock ;
So many hours must I take my rest ;
So many hours must I contemplate ;
So many hours must I sport myself ;
So many days my ewes have been with young ;
So many weeks ere the poor fools will ean ;
So many years ere I shall shear the fleece :
So minutes, hours, days, months, and years,
Pass'd over to the end they were created,
Would bring white hairs unto a quiet grave.
Ah, what a life were this ! how sweet ! how lovely !
Gives not the hawthorn-bush a sweeter shade
To shepherds looking on their silly sheep,
Than doth a rich embroider'd canopy
To kings that fear their subjects' treachery ?
O, yes, it doth ; a thousand-fold it doth.
And to conclude, the shepherd's homely curds,
His cold thin drink out of his leather bottle,
His wonted sleep under a fresh tree's shade,
All which secure and sweetly he enjoys,
Is far beyond a prince's delicates,
His viands sparkling in a golden cup,
His body couched in a curious bed,
When care, mistrust, and treason waits on him.

Shakespeare's final revision of the trilogy of plays dealing with the reign of Henry VI. met with a triumphant reception on the stage. But older dramatists grew jealous, and in the autumn of 1592 one of them, Robert Greene, denounced the younger dramatist in A Groat's-worth of Wit as 'an upstart crow beautified with our feathers, that with his Tygers heart wrapt in a players hide supposes he is as well able to bumbast out a blanke verse as the best of you, and being an absolute Johannes factotum is, in his own conceit, the only Shake-scene in a countrie.' The italicised words parody a line in 3 Henry VI. (Act I. sc. iv. l. 137), 'Oh Tiger's heart wrapped in a woman's hide.' The publisher of Greene's ill-natured attack on Shakespeare, Henry Chettle, at the end of the year apologised to the young writer for the rancour of Greene's pen, in the preface to a tract called Kind Hartes Dreame. Chettle frankly acknowledged Shakespeare's civility of demeanour, excellence in his quality of actor, uprightness of dealing, and 'facetious grace in writing.'

Shakespeare pursued the path which he first essayed in the plays of Henry VI. in the two tragedies that succeeded them—Richard III. and Richard II. In Richard III. Shakespeare plainly shows a conscious resolve to follow in Marlowe's footsteps. The tragedy takes up the history near the point at which the third part of Henry VI. left it. The hero's hypocrisy is pictured with much irony. The study of vicious ambition is rarely relieved by poetic passages, but a peculiarly Shakespearean outburst of poetic sentiment characterises the description by Tyrrel of the murder of the princes in the Tower (Act IV. sc. iii. ll. 4–22):

Dighton and Forrest, whom I did suborn
To do this ruthless piece of butchery,
Although they were flesh'd villains, bloody dogs,
Melting with tenderness and kind compassion
Wept like two children in their deaths' sad stories.
'Lo, thus,' quoth Dighton, 'lay those tender babes:'
'Thus, thus,' quoth Forrest, 'girdling one another
Within their innocent alabaster arms:
Their lips were four red roses on a stalk,
Which in their summer beauty kiss'd each other.
A book of prayers on their pillow lay;
Which once,' quoth Forrest, 'almost changed my mind;
But O! the devil'—there the villain stopp'd;
Whilst Dighton thus told on: 'We smothered
The most replenished sweet work of nature
That from the prime creation e'er she framed.'
Thus both are gone with conscience and remorse;
They could not speak; and so I left them both,
To bring this tidings to the bloody king.

Richard II. seems to have followed Richard III. without delay, and here again the influence of Marlowe is strongly marked. Marlowe's Edward II. clearly inspired Richard II. The sober note of patriotism and of reverence for the best traditions of the country, which was characteristic of all Shakespeare's historical plays, was sounded with exceptional effect in John of Gaunt's dying speech (Act II. sc. i. ll. 31–68):

Methinks I am a prophet new inspired
And thus expiring do foretell of him:
His rash fierce blaze of riot cannot last;
For violent fires soon burn out themselves;
Small showers last long, but sudden storms are short;
He tires betimes that spurs too fast betimes;
With eager feeding food doth choke the feeder:
Light vanity, insatiate cormorant,
Consuming means, soon preys upon itself.
This royal throne of kings, this scepter'd isle,
This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-paradise,
This fortress built by Nature for herself
Against infection and the hand of war;
This happy breed of men, this little world,
This precious stone set in the silver sea,
Which serves it in the office of a wall,
Or as a moat defensive to a house,
Against the envy of less happier lands;

This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England,
This nurse, this teeming womb of royal kings,
Fear'd by their breed and famous by their birth,
Renowned for their deeds as far from home,
For Christian service and true chivalry,
As is the sepulchre in stubborn Jewry
Of the world's ransom, blessed Mary's Son;
This land of such dear souls, this dear dear land,
Dear for her reputation through the world,
Is now leased out—I die pronouncing it—
Like to a tenement or pelting farm:
England, bound in with the triumphant sea,
Whose rocky shore beats back the envious siege
Of watery Neptune, is now bound in with shame,
With inky blots and rotten parchment bonds:
That England, that was wont to conquer others,
Hath made a shameful conquest of itself.
Ah, would the scandal vanish with my life,
How happy then were my ensuing death!

Both Richard III. and Richard II. were published anonymously in 1597. Between February 1593 and the end of the year the London theatres were closed owing to the plague; but Shakespeare's pen was busily employed, and 1594 probably proved more prolific than any other year of his life. To it may be assigned the greater part of three plays—Titus Andronicus, The Merchant of Venice, and King John.

Titus Andronicus, a sanguinary and revolting picture of the decadence of imperial Rome, was probably only in part Shakespeare's work. It was suggested by a piece called Titus and Vespasian, which was acted by Lord Strange's men in 1592, and is now only extant in a German version published in 1620. Titus Andronicus was acted by the Earl of Sussex's men on January 23, 1593–4, as a 'new' piece. It was subsequently performed by Shakespeare's company. Internal evidence suggests that Kyd wrote much of it. But there are many powerful passages for which Shakespeare alone could have been responsible. The heart-rending speech in which the hero laments the ruin that overtakes his children contains such lines as these (Act III. sc. i. ll. 93–97):

For now I stand as one upon a rock,
Environ'd with a wilderness of sea;
Who marks the waxing tide grow wave by wave,
Expecting ever when some envious surge
Will in his brinish bowels swallow him.

Then, turning to his tongueless daughter, he adds (Ibid., ll. 111–113):

When I did name her brothers, then fresh tears
Stood on her cheeks, as doth the honey-dew
Upon a gather'd lily almost wither'd.

In The Merchant of Venice Shakespeare showed to splendid advantage his power of investing ancient legends with genuinely dramatic point and poetry. Ser Giovanni's Il Pecorone, a fourteenth-century collection of Italian novels, supplied him with the main plot of the pound of flesh.

Stephen Gosson, in his Schoole of Abuse (1579), mentions a lost play called The Jew, in which apparently the tales of the pound of flesh and the caskets were combined. Robert Wilson's extant play of the Three Ladies of London roughly anticipated some of Shakespeare's scenes between the Jewish creditor Shylock and his debtor Antonio. Shakespeare's Jew is a far subtler study of Jewish character than Marlowe achieved in his Jew of Malta, and the delicate comedy which relieves the serious interest attaching to Shylock's fate lay wholly out of Marlowe's reach. But Shakespeare, in the Merchant of Venice, betrayed the last definable traces of his discipleship to Marlowe. Marlowe's Jew of Malta was the forerunner of Shylock, although the topic was doubtless immediately suggested to Shakespeare by the popular excitement aroused in London by the recent execution of the queen's Jewish physician, Roderigo Lopez. Passages notable for high poetic feeling and for eloquent ratiocination abound in the Merchant of Venice. Shylock's claim to be treated as a man, Portia's plea for mercy, Lorenzo's speech on the power of music, and Bassanio's exposure of the deceitfulness of appearances illustrate the play's wealth of thought and beauty of language. One of the most beautiful passages is the speech in which Portia accepts the suit of her lover Bassanio (Act III. sc. ii. ll. 149-175):

You see me, Lord Bassanio, where I stand,
Such as I am: though for myself alone
I would not be ambitious in my wish,
To wish myself much better; yet, for you
I would be trebled twenty times myself;
A thousand times more fair, ten thousand times
More rich;
That only to stand high in your account,
I might in virtues, beauties, livings, friends,
Exceed account; but the full sum of me
Is sum of something, which, to term in gross,
Is an unlesson'd girl, unschooled, unpractised;
Happy in this, she is not yet so old
But she may learn; happier than this,
She is not bred so dull but she can learn;
Happiest of all is that her gentle spirit
Commits itself to yours to be directed,
As from her lord, her governor, her king.
Myself and what is mine to you and yours
Is now converted: but now I was the lord
Of this fair mansion, master of my servants,
Queen o'er myself; and even now, but now,
This house, these servants, and this same myself
Are yours, my lord: I give them with this ring;
Which when you part from, lose, or give away,
Let it presage the ruin of your love,
And be my vantage to exclaim on you.

The Merchant of Venice may have been first produced under the name of the Venesyon Comedy on August 25, 1594. It was revised later, and was not published until 1600, when two editions appeared, each printed from a different stage copy.

Turning once again to English history, Shakespeare, also in 1594, adapted his drama of King John from a worthless play called The Troublesome Raigne of King John (1591). This old piece was fraudulently reissued in 1611 as 'written by W. Sh.' and in 1622 as by 'W. Shakespeare.' The three chief characters in Shakespeare's King John—the mean and cruel king, the desperately wronged and passionate Constance, and the soldierly humorist Falconbridge—are in all essentials Shakespeare's own invention. In Arthur boyish emotion is portrayed with a freshness and truthfulness that are scarcely known elsewhere in dramatic literature. As in other of Shakespeare's historical plays, the general effect of the tragic history of King John is to instil a reasonable and honourable patriotism, to which the Bastard's concluding lines give very eloquent expression (Act V. sc. vii. l. 112-end):

This England never did, nor ever shall,
Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror,
But when it first did help to wound itself.
Now these her princes are come home again,
Come the three corners of the world in arms,
And we shall shock them. Nought shall make us rue,
If England to itself do rest but true.

III. At the same epoch in his career (1591-4) as saw these remarkable efforts in the drama, Shakespeare also wrote and published two Narrative Poems, both of which paraphrased with melodious fluency Ovidian themes of somewhat lascivious tendency. In May 1593 Richard Field, Shakespeare's fellow-townsmen, published the first poem, Venus and Adonis. The character of the verse may be illustrated by Venus's lament over the body of the dead Adonis (ll. 1075-1080):

Alas, poor world, what treasure hast thou lost!
What face remains alive that's worth the viewing?
Whose tongue is music now? what canst thou boast
Of things long since, or any thing ensuing?
The flowers are sweet, their colours fresh and trim;
But true-sweet beauty lived and died with him.

No name appeared on the title-page, but there was a fully-signed dedication addressed to a brilliant young nobleman, Henry Wriothesley, third Earl of Southampton. A year later Shakespeare's poem of Lucrece appeared, and it too was dedicated to the Earl of Southampton. A more serious note is often sounded here than in the earlier poem, and there are many reflections on human affairs which embody convictions cherished by Shakespeare through life; for example (ll. 1240-1246):

For men have marble, women waxen, minds,
And therefore are they form'd as marble will;
The weak oppress'd, the impression of strange kinds
Is formed in them by force, by fraud, or skill:
Then call them not the authors of their ill,
No more than wax shall be accounted evil
Wherein is stamp'd the semblance of a devil.

These two volumes constituted Shakespeare's first appeal to the reading public, and they were welcomed with unqualified enthusiasm. Spenser and other contemporary men of letters panegyrised the genius which the poems betrayed. The general reader showed himself no less appreciative. No fewer than seven editions of Venus appeared between 1594 and 1602, and an eighth followed in 1607. Lucrece achieved a fifth edition in the year of Shakespeare's death.

In other directions Shakespeare was strengthening his position and reputation. He was gaining personal esteem in influential quarters outside the circles of actors and men of letters. The Earl of Southampton, as the dedicatory addresses before his narrative poems show, had become his acknowledged patron. His 'civil demeanour' recommended him to the habitués of the court, and his summons to act before Queen Elizabeth at Christmas 1594 indicated the courtiers' personal interest in him. Thenceforth his plays were frequently performed before the queen by himself and his fellow-actors at her palaces of Whitehall, Richmond, and Greenwich, and his recognition as the greatest poet and dramatist of the day steadily grew.

The bulk of Shakespeare's Sonnets were, doubtless, written in 1594, soon after he had sought and won the patronage of the Earl of Southampton. At that date the sonnet enjoyed a popularity among poets in England that has never been equalled. Shakespeare characteristically tried his hand on the popular poetic instrument when its vogue was at its height. The metrical form of his sonnets is that peculiar to the English sonneteers (three decasyllabic quatrains, each rhyming alternately, and a concluding rhyming couplet). In literary value the extant collection is notably unequal, but the best examples reach levels of lyric melody and meditative energy that are not matched elsewhere in poetry. Among the finest of Shakespeare's sonnets are these :

XXX.

When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
I summon up remembrance of things past,
I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
And with old woes new wail my dear time's waste :
Then can I drown an eye, unused to flow,
For precious friends hid in death's dateless night,
And weep afresh love's long since cancelled woe,
And moan the expense of many a vanish'd sight :
Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,
And heavily from woe to woe tell o'er
The sad account of fore-bemoaned moan,
Which I new pay as if not paid before.
But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
All losses are restored and sorrows end.

XXXIII.

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
Flatter the mountain tops with sovereign eye,
Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy ;

Anon permit the basest clouds to ride
With ugly rack on his celestial face,
And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace :
Even so my sun one early morn did shine
With all triumphant splendour on my brow ;
But, out, alack ! he was but one hour mine,
The region cloud hath mask'd him from me now.
Yet him for this my love no whit disdaineth ;
Suns of the world may stain when heaven's sun staineth.

LIII.

What is your substance, whereof are you made,
That millions of strange shadows on you tend ?
Since every one hath, every one, one shade,
And you, but one, can every shadow lend.
Describe Adonis, and the counterfeit
Is poorly imitated after you ;
On Helen's cheek all art of beauty set,
And you in Grecian tires are painted new :
Speak of the spring and foison of the year,
The one doth shadow of your beauty show,
The other as your bounty doth appear ;
And you in every blessed shape we know.
In all external grace you have some part,
But you like none, none you, for constant heart.

CXVI.

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments. Love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove :
O, no ! it is an ever-fixed mark,
That looks on tempests and is never shaken ;
It is the star to every wandering bark,
Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.
Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
Within his bending sickle's compass come ;
Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
But bears it out even to the edge of doom.
If this be error and upon me proved,
I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

On the other hand, some of Shakespeare's sonnets sink almost into inanity beneath the burden of quibbles and conceits. Take, for example :

XLVI.

Mine eye and heart are at a mortal war,
How to divide the conquest of thy sight ;
Mine eye my heart thy picture's sight would bar,
My heart mine eye the freedom of that right.
My heart doth plead, that thou in him dost lie,
A closet never pierced with crystal eyes,
But the defendant doth that plea deny,
And says in him thy fair appearance lies.
To 'cide this title is impanneled
A quest of thoughts, all tenants to the heart ;
And by their verdict is determined
The clear eye's moiety and the dear heart's part :
As thus ; mine eye's due is thine outward part,
And my heart's right thine inward love of heart.

There is no evidence that the order in which the sonnets were first printed followed the order in which they were written. The same train of thought is at times pursued continuously through two or more sonnets, and thus the collection resembles a series of independent poems, some in a varying number of fourteen-line stanzas. But, beyond the fact that the vein throughout is more or less amorous, there is no close logical continuity in the arrangement of the whole. The majority of the sonnets, numbered i. to cxxvi., are addressed to a young man, and most of the remaining twenty-six poems are addressed to a woman, but both groups include meditative soliloquies in the sonnet-form which are addressed to no person at all.

The sonnets of Shakespeare's contemporaries were for the most part literary exercises, reflecting the influence of French and Italian sonneteers. Genuine emotion or the writer's personal experience very rarely inspired them. At a first glance a far larger proportion of Shakespeare's sonnets give the reader the illusion of personal confessions than those of any contemporary, but when allowance has been made for the current conventions of Elizabethan sonneteering, as well as for Shakespeare's unapproached affluence in dramatic instinct and invention—which enabled him to identify himself with every phase of human emotion—the autobiographic element in his sonnets, although it may not be dismissed altogether, is seen to shrink to comparatively slender proportions. He borrows very many contemporary sonneteers' words and thoughts, although he so fused them with his fancy as often to transfigure them. A personal note may have escaped him in the sonnets in which he gives voice to a sense of melancholy and self-remorse, but his dramatic instinct never slept, and there is no positive proof that he is doing more, even in those sonnets, than to produce dramatically the illusion of a personal confession. For example, in the numerous sonnets in which Shakespeare boasted that his verse was so certain of immortality that it was capable of immortalising the person to whom it was addressed, he gave voice to no involuntary exaltation of his own spirit or spontaneous ebullition of his own feeling. He was merely handling a theme that Ronsard and Desportes, emulating Pindar, Horace, Ovid, and other classical poets, had lately made a commonplace of the poetry of Europe, and a formal topic among all English sonneteers. The imitative element is hardly less conspicuous in most of the sonnets that Shakespeare distinctly addresses to a woman.

Only in one group, composed of six sonnets scattered through the collection, is there traceable a strand of wholly original sentiment, boldly projecting from the web into which it is wrought. This series of six sonnets deals with a love-adventure of no normal type. Sonnet cxliv. opens with the lines :

Two loves I have of comfort and despair,
Which like two spirits do suggest [i.e. prompt] me still :
The better angel is a man right fair,
The worser spirit a woman colour'd ill.

The woman, the sonneteer continues, has corrupted the man and drawn him from his side. Five other sonnets treat the same theme. In three addressed to the man (xl., xli., and xlii.) the poet mildly reproaches his youthful friend for having sought and won favours of a woman whom he himself loved 'dearly,' but the trespass is forgiven on account of the friend's youth and beauty. In the two remaining sonnets (cxxxiii. and cxxxiv.) the poet addresses the woman, and rebukes her for having enslaved not himself but 'his next self'—his friend. It is conceivable that these six sonnets rest on a genuine experience of the poet, although a half-jesting reference to the amorous adventure, which would deprive it of very serious import, was possibly made to it at the time by a literary comrade. A poem that was licensed for publication on September 3, 1594, was published immediately under the title of Willobie his Avis, or the True Picture of a Modest Maid and of a Chaste and Constant Wife. There, a character, described as 'the old player W. S.,' doubtless Shakespeare himself, mocks a rejected lover because, he explains at length, he has just recovered his own equanimity after much suffering from feminine caprice.

But if few of Shakespeare's sonnets can safely be regarded as autobiographical revelations of sentiment, many of them offer evidence of the relations in which he stood to a patron, and of the position that he sought to fill in the circle of that patron's literary clients. There is no difficulty in detecting the lineaments of the Earl of Southampton in those of the man who is distinctively greeted in the sonnets as the poet's sole patron. That the Earl of Southampton was Shakespeare's only patron is not merely suggested by the terms in which the poet dedicated to him each of his two narrative poems, Venus and Adonis and Lucrece, but by the tradition handed down by Sir William D'Avenant that the earl treated Shakespeare with exceptional munificence, and 'once gave him a thousand pounds to enable him to go through with a purchase which he heard he had a mind to.' Twenty sonnets are couched in the phraseology habitual at the time to authors when penning dedications of their works to patrons. Three of these (xxvi., xxxii., and xxxvi.) merely translate into the language of poetry the expressions of devotion which had already done duty in the prose dedicatory epistle to the Earl of Southampton that prefaces Lucrece. That epistle to Southampton runs :

The love I dedicate to your lordship is without end : whereof this pamphlet, without beginning, is but a superfluous moiety. The warrant I have of your honourable disposition, not the worth of my untutored lines, makes it assured of acceptance. What I have done is yours, what I have to do is yours, being part in all I have, devoted yours. Were my worth greater, my duty would show greater ; meanwhile, as it is, it is bound to your lordship, to whom I wish long life, still lengthened with all happiness.—Your lordship's in all duty,

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

Sonnet xxvi. is a gorgeous rendering of these sentences :

Lord of my love, to whom in vassalage
Thy merit hath my duty strongly knit,
To thee I send this written ambassage,
To witness duty, not to show my wit :
Duty so great, which wit so poor as mine
May make seem bare, in wanting words to show it,
But that I hope some good conceit of thine
In thy soul's thought, all naked, will bestow it ;
Till whatsoever star that guides my moving,
Points on me graciously with fair aspect,
And puts apparel on my tatter'd loving,
To show me worthy of thy sweet respect :
Then may I dare to boast how I do love thee ;
Till then not show my head where thou mayst prove me.

In several sonnets the poet confesses to a sense of jealousy of one or more rival poets who, by dint of 'richly compiled' 'comments' of his patron's 'praise,' threaten to divert to themselves his patron's favours. The rival poets with their 'precious praise by all the muses filed' (lxxxv. 4) must be sought among the writers who eulogised Southampton and are known to have shared his patronage. Such writers were very numerous, but the poet whom Shakespeare depicts as his chief rival is with much probability identified with the young poet and scholar Barnabe Barnes, a poetic panegyrist of Southampton and a prolific sonneteer, whose promise, widely acknowledged at the time that Shakespeare was writing his sonnets, was not destined for conspicuous fulfilment in the future.

Besides the twenty 'dedicatory' sonnets, which specifically address a young man as the poet's patron, many avow wholly disinterested 'love,' in the Elizabethan sense of friendship, for a handsome youth of wealth and rank. There is good ground for the conclusion that the sonnets of disinterested friendship also have Southampton for their subject. The sincerity of the poet's sentiment is often open to doubt in these poems, but they seem inspired by a genuine intimacy subsisting between Shakespeare and a young Mæcenas. Extravagant compliment—'gross painting' Shakespeare calls it—was more conspicuous in the intercourse of patron and client during the last years of Elizabeth's reign than in any other epoch. There is nothing in the vocabulary of affection which Shakespeare employed in his sonnets of 'love' or friendship to conflict with the theory that they were inscribed to his literary patron Southampton, with whom he was at the moment on the terms of close intimacy that normally subsisted between the literary clients and their patrons. Every compliment, in fact, paid by Shakespeare to the youth applies to Southampton. In real life, beauty, birth, wealth, and wit sat 'crowned' in the earl, whom poets acclaimed the handsomest of Elizabethan courtiers, as plainly as in the hero of the poet's verse.

Southampton has left in his correspondence ample proofs of his literary learning and cultured taste, and, like the hero of the sonnets, was 'as fair in knowledge as in hue.' The opening sequence of seventeen sonnets, in which a youth of rank and wealth is admonished to marry and beget a son so that 'his fair house' may not fall into decay, can only have been addressed to a young peer like Southampton, who was as yet unmarried, had vast possessions, and was the sole male representative of his family. To no other peer of the day are the poet's words so exactly applicable. Striking evidence of the identity of the youth of the sonnets of 'friendship' with Southampton is found in the likeness of feature and complexion which characterises the poet's description of the youth's 'fair' outward appearance and the extant pictures of Southampton as a young man which are now at Welbeck. External evidence thus agrees with internal evidence in identifying the lauded patron of the sonnets with the Earl of Southampton, and they suggest that Shakespeare when his fame was in the making stood to the earl in much the same relation as Ariosto to the Duke Alfonso d'Este, or Ronsard to Margaret, Duchess of Savoy.

Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds—

was quoted in the play of Edward III., which was probably written before 1595. Meres, writing in 1598, enthusiastically commends Shakespeare's 'sugred sonnets among his private friends,' and mentions them in close conjunction with his two narrative poems. William Jaggard piratically inserted in 1599 two of the most mature of the series (Nos. cxxxviii. and cxliv.) in his Passionate Pilgrim. In 1609 Shakespeare's sonnets were surreptitiously published by a publisher of small reputation, Thomas Thorpe.

Thorpe dedicated the volume to 'Mr W. H.' in these terms :

TO. THE. ONLIE. BEGETTER. OF.
THESE. INSVING. SONNETS.
MR. W. H. ALL. HAPPINESSE.
AND. THAT. ETERNITIE.
PROMISED.
BY.
OUR. EVER LIVING. POET.
WISHETH.
THE. WELL-WISHING.
' ADVENTVRER. IN.
SETTING.
FORTH.

T. T.

The dedication, although, according to Thorpe's habitual style of writing, bombastic in expression and wilfully intricate in the arrangement of the words, follows a common dedicatory formula : in numerous books of the day the dedicatory 'wisheth' his patron 'all happiness and eternitie.' In this instance 'the well-wishing adventurer in setting forth'

—i.e. the publisher, Thomas Thorpe—wisheth, in the conventional language of contemporary dedications, 'all happinesse and that eternitie promised by our ever-living poet'—i.e. such eternity as Shakespeare in the text of his sonnets foretold for his own verse—'to Mr W. H. the onlie begetter of these ensuing sonnets'—i.e. to the man who had, by his sole efforts, gotten or procured ('beget' in Elizabethan English was frequently used in the sense of 'get' or 'procure') a copy of the manuscript of Shakespeare's sonnets, and had thereby given Thorpe his opportunity of printing and publishing them. In 1600 Thorpe had under similar circumstances dedicated a hitherto unpublished work by Marlowe—The First Book of Lucan—to Edward Blount, a friend in the trade. 'Mr W. H.,' whom Thorpe made the patron of the original edition of Shakespeare's sonnets in 1609, was probably William Hall, a publisher's assistant, who for some years occupied himself in procuring unprinted manuscripts for disposal among stationers in the position of Thorpe.

The common practice of publishers of the day of the type of Thorpe in choosing uninfluential patrons for the publication of manuscripts that fell surreptitiously into their hands renders impossible the popular identification of 'Mr W. H.' with the influential young man to whom many of the sonnets were anonymously addressed by Shakespeare. By an irresponsible guess, which is vitiated by an obvious error, the initials of Thorpe's patron have been identified with those of William Herbert, third Earl of Pembroke. The Earl of Pembroke succeeded to his title in 1601, and it was contrary to law and custom for a dependent in the position of a publisher to employ any other than the formal designation in addressing a noble patron. The letters 'W. H.,' moreover, at no time in the Earl of Pembroke's life represented the initials of his name. From his birth until his succession to his father's title he was known solely as Lord Herbert. No evidence exists to show that Shakespeare was in personal relations with the Earl of Pembroke at any period. After Shakespeare's death the First Folio (1623) was dedicated to Pembroke and his brother, the Earl of Montgomery, by Shakespeare's friends and theatrical colleagues. It was the fashion of the moment for authors and publishers to dedicate to these patrons jointly publications of importance. Pembroke, too, was in 1623 Lord Chamberlain and ex officio controller of the stage. The words and tone in which Shakespeare's posthumous editors addressed the brothers plainly show that the poet was in his lifetime solely known to the brother-earls—was solely the object of their favour—in his capacity of popular dramatist and of 'servant' of the king—i.e. of member of the king's company of players.

IV. Shakespeare's endeavours to maintain his position in the favour of a wealthy patron, to which his sonnets bear testimony, never interrupted the literary labours to which the best years of his life were consecrated. His industry never drooped. To the winter season of 1595 probably belonged A Midsummer Night's Dream, which may well have been written to celebrate a marriage in the circles of the court. Hints for the plot and characters have been traced to many sources, but the final scheme of the beautiful and delicate fairy comedy is of Shakespeare's freshest invention. Titania's directions when bidding the fairies attend on the 'translated' Bottom are instinct with the finest conceivable play of fancy (Act III. sc. i. ll. 150–160):

Be kind and courteous to this gentleman ;
Hop in his walks and gambol in his eyes ;
Feed him with apricocks and dewberries,
With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries ;
The honey-bags steal from the humble-bees,
And for night-tapers crop their waxen thighs,
And light them at the fiery glow-worm's eyes,
To have my love to bed and to arise ;
And pluck the wings from painted butterflies,
To fan the moonbeams from his sleeping eyes :
Nod to him, elves, and do him courtesies.

All's Well that Ends Well belongs to the same period. Its plot is a sombre and somewhat offensive story traceable to Boccaccio. Shakespeare's treatment of it is mainly remarkable for his development of the character of the heroine, Helena, who, despite the immodesty of her actions, ranks with the greatest of Shakespeare's female creations. Her secret attachment for the worthless Bertram, whose rank places him beyond her reach, is touchingly expressed in her soliloquy (Act I. sc. i. ll. 76–92):

My imagination
Carries no favour in't but Bertram's.
I am undone : there is no living, none,
If Bertram be away. 'Twere all one
That I should love a bright particular star
And think to wed it, he is so above me :
In his bright radiance and collateral light
Must I be comforted, not in his sphere :
The ambition in my love thus plagues itself :
The hind that would be mated by the lion
Must die for love. 'Twas pretty, though a plague,
To see him every hour ; to sit and draw
His arched brows, his hawking eye, his curls,
In our heart's table ; heart too capable
Of every line and trick of his sweet favour :
But now he's gone, and my idolatrous fancy
Must sanctify his reliques.

The Taming of the Shrew, which is mainly of farcical character, was based on an old farcical comedy, The Taming of a Shrew, first published in 1594. The underplot of Bianca and her lovers was probably due to a coadjutor. In Shakespeare's Induction, of which the drunken tinker Christopher Sly is the hero, Shakespeare introduces many literal references to Stratford and his native county. Similar references figure in the Second Part of Henry IV. and in The Merry Wives of Windsor, which followed the Taming of the Shrew at no long interval. Such allusions are probably attributable to Shakespeare's resumption of relations with his native place at the time of the composition.

In 1597, turning again to English history, he produced the two parts of Henry IV. Although in the First Part the character of Hotspur is drawn with great vividness, and in both parts Prince Hal is depicted with unflagging spirit, the two pieces owe the enthusiastic affection in which they have been held since their first production on the stage to Shakespeare's creation of the deathless character of Falstaff. In Falstaff, Shakespeare's purely comic power culminated. Every syllable of his utterances should be studied. Probably his richness of temperament may be gauged, as well as anywhere, by the shrewdly comic speech which he mockingly addresses to Prince Hal in his assumed character of the king, Prince Hal's father (Act II. sc. iv. ll. 387-418). His assumption of the kingly rôle justly evokes from Mistress Quickly the characteristic compliment, 'O Jesu! he doth it as like one of those harlotry players as ever I see':

Fal. Harry, I do not only marvel where thou spendest thy time, but also how thou art accompanied: for though the camomile, the more it is trodden on the faster it grows, yet youth, the more it is wasted the sooner it wears. That thou art my son, I have partly thy mother's word, partly my own opinion, but chiefly a villanous trick of thine eye, and a foolish hanging of thy nether lip, that doth warrant me. If then thou be son to me, here lies the point; why, being son to me, art thou so pointed at? Shall the blessed sun of heaven prove a micher and eat blackberries? a question not to be asked. Shall the son of England prove a thief and take purses? a question to be asked. There is a thing, Harry, which thou hast often heard of, and it is known to many in our land by the name of pitch: this pitch, as ancient writers do report, doth defile; so doth the company thou keepest: for, Harry, now I do not speak to thee in drink but in tears, not in pleasure but in passion, not in words only, but in woes also: and yet there is a virtuous man whom I have often noted in thy company, but I know not his name.

Prince. What manner of man, an it like your majesty?

Fal. A goodly portly man, i' faith, and a corpulent; of a cheerful look, a pleasing eye, and a most noble carriage; and, as I think, his age some fifty, or, by'r lady, inclining to three score; and now I remember me, his name is Falstaff: if that man should be lewdly given, he deceiveth me; for, Harry, I see virtue in his looks. If then the tree may be known by the fruit, as the fruit by the tree, then, peremptorily I speak it, there is virtue in that Falstaff: him keep with, the rest banish. And tell me now, thou naughty varlet, tell me, where hast thou been this month?

Henry IV. was followed by The Merry Wives of Windsor, which, according to early traditions, was designed to satisfy Queen Elizabeth's curiosity to learn how Falstaff would bear himself when in love. The result was a farcical comedy reflecting the bluff temper of contemporary middle-class society.

At the same time, the spirited character of Prince Hal was specially congenial to Shakespeare, and after devoting one play to Falstaff, he devoted another to the later career of the prince who succeeded to the throne as Henry V. Shakespeare's chronicle-play of Henry V. was produced in 1599, probably at the newly-built Globe Theatre. It abounds in patriotic sentiment. Most of the speeches of the hero are familiar in anthologies. The soliloquy of the king on the emptiness of the ceremonial homage that is paid to royalty, the orations in which he condemns the conspirators Cambridge, Grey, and Scroop, or reproves his cousin Westmoreland for regretting the smallness of the English force on the eve of Agincourt, are masterly specimens of spirited eloquence. The choruses before the acts, too—notably the first—are splendidly phrased, and there is abundant variety in the comic element, although it lacks the great presence of Falstaff. When Pistol announces to his companions:

For Falstaff he is dead,

And we must yearn therefore,

the disreputable Bardolph remarks, with a wonderful touch of pathos, 'Would I were with him wheresome'er he is, either in heaven or in hell.' The hostess opens her description of the hero's last hours thus (Act II. sc. iii. l. 9):

Nay, sure, he's not in hell: he's in Arthur's bosom, if ever man went to Arthur's bosom. A' made a finer end and went away an it had been any christom child; a' parted even just between twelve and one, even at the turning o' the tide: for after I saw him fumble with the sheets, and play with flowers, and smile upon his fingers' ends, I knew there was but one way; for his nose was as sharp as a pen, and a' babbled of green fields.

Henry V. completed the series of Shakespeare's Histories, which may be likened to detached books of an English Iliad. They form collectively a kind of national epic. The late play of Henry VIII., which is only partially by Shakespeare, must be considered apart.

Some reflections of the public affairs in which Shakespeare had personal interest appear in Henry V. In the chorus before the last act of the play Shakespeare makes friendly allusion to the expected return from Ireland of the Earl of Essex, the close friend of his patron, the Earl of Southampton. Subsequently, in 1601, Essex and Southampton were leaders in a rebellion against the queen's authority in London, with the result that Essex was executed and Southampton received a sentence of imprisonment for life. Shakespeare thus lost a generous patron, but by the end of the sixteenth century his career was in the full tide of its triumphant progress. In literary and theatrical society his influence was then supreme. He was in a position to befriend younger men of genius like Ben Jonson, and was a prominent figure in the meetings of Jonson and his literary associates at the Mermaid Tavern in Bread Street. In 1598 Francis Meres, a learned graduate of Cambridge, writing of contemporary literature in his Palladis Tamia, eulogised Shakespeare as the greatest man of letters of the day: 'The Muses would speak Shakespeare's fine filed phrase if they could speak English.' Unprincipled publishers placed Shakespeare's name on the title-pages of books by other pens in order to attract purchasers. Between 1595 and 1608 six plays in which he had no hand—Lochrine, Thomas Lord Cromwell, The Puritan, Oldcastle, The London Prodigal, and The Yorkshire Tragedy—came forth with Shakespeare's name or initials on the title-pages. The pirate publisher, William Jaggard, produced in 1599 a poetic anthology, entitled The Passionate Pilgrim, 'by W. Shakespeare,' although only five out of the twenty pieces were from the poet's pen. Obscure mystical verses, on the Phoenix and the Turtle, which may be genuine work of Shakespeare's, were printed above his full signature in 1601, with poems by other writers of note, in Robert Chester's Love's Martyr.

V. Meanwhile Shakespeare had resumed relations with Stratford. He was doubtless there on August 11, 1596, when his only son Hamnet was buried in the parish church. Thenceforth he devoted much of his energies to endeavours to restore the fame and fortune of his family in his native place, and though he continued to spend the greater part of many subsequent years in London, he thenceforth paid more than one visit annually to Stratford. His father's debts had grown in his long absence, and his wife had also borrowed money for her support. But his return finally relieved his kindred of all pecuniary anxiety. By his advice his father, at the end of 1596, applied to the College of Heralds in London for a grant of arms. The negotiations were protracted through three years, but in 1599 the authorities acceded to the request of the poet and his father, assigning to the family a 'gold shield with a bend sable bearing a golden spear, with a crest of a falcon with wings displayed (silver), supporting a spear (gold).' The motto ran, 'Non sanz droict.' These arms were thenceforth used by the poet and his children. By way of corroborating his position, he purchased on May 4, 1597, the largest house in Stratford, called New Place.

In 1598 three letters, written by Shakespeare's fellow-townsmen, and still extant at Stratford, give evidence of his local reputation as a man of wealth and influence. One letter, dated October 25, 1598, is an appeal addressed to Shakespeare by Richard Quiney for a loan of £30. The financial prosperity which is indicated in the correspondence is readily traceable to Shakespeare's professional earnings, although his wealthy patron, Southampton, is said to have supplemented them in his early years by generous gifts. Before 1599 he wrote nineteen plays, besides revising dramatic work by other pens. After 1599 he wrote eighteen plays. Such extensive literary work probably brought him on the average at least £35 a year, equivalent to some £300 in modern currency. But Shakespeare was also an actor, and actors' salaries were high; from that source Shakespeare must, according to the current rates of remuneration, have derived an average income of £130, exceeding £1000 in modern currency. Subsequently a third source of income was added. When, in the winter of 1598, the Globe Theatre was built, the proprietors presented Shakespeare with a substantial share in the profits, which were always large and always increasing. Towards the close of his life he was also allotted a share in the receipts of the Blackfriars Theatre, but it was from the Globe that he, as part-owner, actor, and dramatist, clearly derived, when at the zenith of his career, an ample and substantial income. In the later years of his life he could not have earned less than £600 a year. It was reported at the time that 'he spent at the rate of £1000.' Part of his professional revenues he invested in real property at Stratford. In 1602 he purchased for £320 one hundred and seven acres of arable land near the town, as well as a cottage and garden adjoining New Place. In 1610 he acquired twenty acres of pasture. Meanwhile, in 1605, he bought for £440 an unexpired term of a lease of a moiety of the Stratford tithes. This negotiation involved him in some legal embarrassments, but, as is common among men of wealth, Shakespeare stood rigorously by his rights in all his business relations, and often appeared as plaintiff in the local courts.

The calls of business never, however, impeded Shakespeare's literary activity. Despite the somewhat complicated financial transactions in which he was engaged at the time at Stratford, it was in 1599 that he composed his three most finished and most characteristic comedies, Much Ado about Nothing, As You Like It, and Twelfth Night. In each there are almost as much serious episode and earnest reflection as humorous jest, badinage, and comic dialogue. The sad central story of Hero and Claudio in Much Ado is of Italian origin, but the brilliant comedy of Benedick and Beatrice and the quaint humour of the watchman Dogberry and Verges are wholly original. As You Like It, a pastoral comedy with exceptionally varied dramatis personæ, was adapted from Lodge's romance of Rosalind. The smaller characters are as well worthy of study as the greater. The lips of the shepherdess Phebe—a very subordinate character—for example, echo with rare fidelity the accents of the perennial village coquette; her reminiscence of her interview with Ganymede is as finely pointed as any speech in the play (Act III. sc. v. ll. 108-138):

Phebe. Think not I love him, though I ask for him;
'Tis but a peevish boy; yet he talks well;
But what care I for words? yet words do well
When he that speaks them pleases those that hear.
It is a pretty youth; not very pretty:
But, sure, he's proud, and yet his pride becomes him:
He'll make a proper man: the best thing in him

Is his complexion ; and faster than his tongue
 Did make offence his eye did heal it up.
 He is not very tall ; yet for his years he 's tall :
 His leg is but so so ; and yet 'tis well :
 There was a pretty redness in his lip,
 A little ripier and more lusty red
 Than that mix'd in his cheek ; 'twas just the difference
 Betwixt the constant red, and mingled damask.
 There be some women, Silvius, had they mark'd him
 In parcels as I did, would have gone near
 To fall in love with him : but, for my part,
 I love him not nor hate him not ; and yet
 I have more cause to hate him than to love him :
 For what had he to do to chide at me ?
 He said mine eyes were black and my hair black ;
 And, now I am remember'd, scorn'd at me :
 I marvel why I answer'd not again :
 But that's all one ; omittance is no quittance.
 I'll write to him a very taunting letter,
 And thou shalt bear it : wilt thou, Silvius ?
Silvius. Phebe, with all my heart.
Phebe. I'll write it straight ;
 The matter's in my head and in my heart :
 I will be bitter with him and passing short.
 Go with me, Silvius.

Twelfth Night, like Much Ado, is indebted to an Italian story. Though probably written about 1600, the earliest reference to it was made by Henry Manningham, a barrister of the Middle Temple, who described a performance of the piece at the hall of his Inn on February 2, 1602. The leading themes of Viola's passion for the Duke Orsino, and the Duke's passion for Olivia, belong to serious romance, and a pathetic note infects the humorous characterisation of Malvolio, whose vanity almost issues in a tragic dénouement ; but Sir Toby Belch, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, and Maria are conceived wholly in the comic vein. In Twelfth Night, as in Much Ado and As You Like It, Shakespeare's lyric genius showed itself in perfection. The songs with which the three plays are interspersed include the verses (Twelfth Night, Act II. sc. iii. l. 38) :

O mistress mine, where are you roaming ?
 O, stay and hear ; your true love's coming,
 That can sing both high and low :
 Trip no further, pretty sweeting ;
 Journeys end in lovers meeting,
 Every wise man's son doth know.

What is love ? 'tis not hereafter ;
 Present mirth hath present laughter ;
 What's to come is still unsure :
 In delay there lies no plenty ;
 Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty,
 Youth's a stuff will not endure.

In 1601 Shakespeare made a new departure by dramatising an incident in Roman history—the death of Julius Cæsar—which he read in North's noble translation of Plutarch's Lives. The play of Julius Cæsar is a penetrating study of political life and character. The dramatis personæ are balanced and contrasted with minutest care.

Hardly a better example of the Shakespearean power of making a speaker reveal, as it were, unconsciously and unpremeditatedly his true quality could be quoted than the speech in which Cæsar hints to Antonius his suspicious fear of Cassius, and thereby betrays his own degeneracy (Act I. sc. ii. ll. 192–214) :

Cæsar. Let me have men about me that are fat,
 Sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights :
 Yond Cassius has a lean and hungry look ;
 He thinks too much : such men are dangerous.

Antonius. Fear him not, Cæsar ; he 's not dangerous ;
 He is a noble Roman, and well given.

Cæsar. Would he were fatter ! but I fear him not :
 Yet if my name were liable to fear,
 I do not know the man I should avoid
 So soon as that spare Cassius. He reads much ;
 He is a great observer, and he looks
 Quite through the deeds of men : he loves no plays,
 As thou dost, Antony ; he hears no music :
 Seldom he smiles, and smiles in such a sort
 As if he mock'd himself, and scorn'd his spirit
 That could be moved to smile at any thing.
 Such men as he be never at heart's ease
 Whiles they behold a greater than themselves,
 And therefore are they very dangerous.
 I rather tell thee what is to be fear'd
 Than what I fear ; for always I am Cæsar.
 Come on my right hand, for this ear is deaf,
 And tell me truly what thou think'st of him.

Soon after the production of Julius Cæsar, Shakespeare's theatrical prospects, like those of others engaged in theatrical enterprise in London, were for a time somewhat seriously imperilled. In 1600 the Puritans of the city of London, who were always hostile to the theatres, sought to induce the Privy Council to forbid the continuance of more than two playhouses in Middlesex and Surrey, but though the Council issued a prohibition in accordance with the Puritan citizens' wish, it was suffered to remain inoperative. More threatening was the sudden popularity which companies of boy actors in London suddenly acquired in the sight of playgoers in the winter of 1600. In the following year Shakespeare described in his new play of Hamlet how the boys' performances absorbed the favour of the playgoers of London, and how the theatres which were in the hands of the men actors were for the time deserted. Shakespeare's perverse-tempered friend, Ben Jonson, further complicated the situation by throwing in his lot with the boys, for whom he wrote plays that were rapturously received by the public. But the vogue of the boys, with which Shakespeare was naturally out of sympathy, declined as rapidly as it had risen. Its fall may partly be attributed to the triumphant success with which Shakespeare's great tragedy of Hamlet was first produced by the men players in 1602. An old play on the same subject is lost, but from it Shakespeare probably derived useful hints. The story belongs to Danish history, and had been adapted by Bandello, whose version was accessible to Shakespeare in the French rendering by Belleforest. The piece, which is mainly a psychological study, is the longest of Shakespeare's plays, but the intensity of interest with which Shakespeare invested the subtle character of the hero rendered the tragedy the most popular of all his productions.

In numerous familiar soliloquies Hamlet reveals the course of the struggle proceeding within his brain between his irresistible tendency to introspective meditation and his consciousness of the pressing need for action, which the working of his mind deprived him of the power of taking. The internal conflict is nowhere so forcibly depicted as when the young prince meets a detachment of the army of Fortinbras, and a captain tells him that they are on their way to fight the Poles (Act IV. sc. iv. ll. 18-19),

To gain a little patch of ground
That hath in it no profit but the name.

The callous admission of so unsubstantial an incitement to action stirs in Hamlet this torturing reflection on his own habit of inaction (Act IV. sc. iv. ll. 32-66):

How all occasions do inform against me,
And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,
If his chief good and market of his time
Be but to sleep and feed? a beast, no more.
Sure, he that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before and after, gave us not
That capability and god-like reason
To fust in us unused. Now, whether it be Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple
Of thinking too precisely on the event,—
A thought which, quartered, hath but one part wisdom
And ever three parts coward,—I do not know
Why yet I live to say 'This thing's to do,'
Sith I have cause, and will, and strength, and means
To do't. Examples gross as earth exhort me:
Witness this army, of such mass and charge,
Led by a delicate and tender prince,
Whose spirit with divine ambition puff'd
Makes mouths at the invisible event,
Exposing what is mortal and unsure
To all that fortune, death, and danger dare,
Even for an egg-shell. Rightly to be great
Is not to stir without great argument,
But greatly to find quarrel in a straw
When honour's at the stake. How stand I then,
That have a father kill'd, a mother stain'd,
Excitements of my reason and my blood,
And let all sleep, while to my shame I see
The imminent death of twenty thousand men,
That for a fantasy and trick of fame
Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot
Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,
Which is not tomb enough and continent
To hide the slain? O, from this time forth,
My thoughts be bloody, or be nothing worth!

Troilus and Cressida, although published for the first time in 1609, belongs to the same period as Hamlet. It is based on a mediæval story of the Trojan war, and is little influenced by the classical spirit. The heroine, Cressida, contrary to literary tradition, is represented by Shakespeare as a heartless coquette. The speeches of the Greek generals abound in pithily expressed philosophy of universal application. Especially notable are the eloquent meditations of Ulysses. Nowhere else has the doctrine of the inevitableness of rank in the physical, political, and social worlds, or the need of a due observance of it, been set forth with greater nobility of language than in the speech which Ulysses addresses to his colleagues in the Grecian camp before Agamemnon's tent (Act I. sc. iii. ll. 75-137):

Ulysses. Troy, yet upon his basis, had been down
And the great Hector's sword had lack'd a master,
But for these instances.

The specialty of rule hath been neglected:
And, look, how many Grecian tents do stand
Hollow upon this plain, so many hollow factions.
When that the general is not like the hive
To whom the foragers shall all repair,
What honey is expected? Degree being vizarded,
The unworthiest shows as fairly in the mask.
The heavens themselves, the planets and this centre,
Observe degree, priority and place,
Insisture, course, proportion, season, form,
Office and custom, in all line of order:
And therefore is the glorious planet Sol
In noble eminence enthroned and sphered
Amidst the other; whose medicinable eye
Corrects the ill aspects of planets evil,
And posts like the commandment of a king,
Sans check to good and bad: but when the planets
In evil mixture to disorder wander,
What plagues and what portents, what mutiny,
What raging of the sea, shaking of earth,
Commotion in the winds, frights, changes, horrors,
Divert and crack, rend and deracinate
The unity and married calm of states
Quite from their fixture! O, when degree is shaken,
Which is the ladder to all high designs,
The enterprise is sick! How could communities,
Degrees in schools and brotherhoods in cities,
Peaceful commerce from dividable shores,
The primogenitive and due of birth,
Prerogative of age, crowns, sceptres, laurels,
But by degree, stand in authentic place?
Take but degree away, untune that string,
And, hark, what discord follows! each thing meets
In mere oppugnancy: the bounded waters
Should lift their bosoms higher than the shores,
And make a sop of all this solid globe:
Strength should be lord of imbecility,
And the rude son should strike his father dead:
Force should be right; or rather, right and wrong,
Between whose endless jar justice resides,
Should lose their names, and so should justice too.
Then every thing includes itself in power,
Power into will, will into appetite;
And appetite, an universal wolf,
So doubly seconded with will and power,
Must make perforce an universal prey,
And last eat up himself. Great Agamemnon,
This chaos, when degree is suffocate,
Follows the choking.
And this neglect of degree it is

That by a pace goes backward, with a purpose
It hath to climb. The general's disdain'd
By him one step below; he by the next;
That next by him beneath: so every step,
Example'd by the first pace that is sick
Of his superior, grows to an envious fever
Of pale and bloodless emulation:
And 'tis this fever that keeps Troy on foot,
Not her own sinews. To end a tale of length,
Troy in our weakness stands, not in her strength.

Hardly less penetrating are the same speaker's reflections on the tendency of human nature to value what is new to the neglect of the good that is old, when he reminds Achilles that his early fame cannot resist the advance of Ajax's newer-born reputation (Act III. sc. iii. ll. 145-153):

Time hath, my lord, a wallet at his back
Wherein he puts alms for oblivion,
A great-sized monster of ingratitudes:
Those scraps are good deeds past, which are devour'd
As fast as they are made, forgot as soon
As done: perseverance, dear my lord,
Keeps honour bright: to have done, is to hang Quite out of fashion, like a rusty mail
In monumental mockery.

VI. On March 24, 1603, Queen Elizabeth died. Although she had proved an appreciative patron of Shakespeare, her successor, James I., showed him and his associates far more pronounced favour. Very soon after his accession James bestowed on the company of actors to which Shakespeare belonged the title of the King's Servants, and gave them the rank of grooms of the royal chamber. Thenceforth Shakespeare and his colleagues took part in all great court festivities, while Shakespeare's plays were repeatedly performed in the royal presence.

During the first six years of the new reign Shakespeare was engaged on his greatest achievements in tragedy. Othello seems to have been the first new piece by Shakespeare that was acted before James, and it was quickly followed by Measure for Measure. The stories of both come originally from an Italian collection of romances, the Hecatommithi of Cinthio. Cinthio's story of Measure for Measure was accessible in both French and English, but Othello is not known to have been translated out of the Italian before Shakespeare treated it. With masterly genius Shakespeare reconstructed leading episodes in both romances. Othello displayed his fully-matured powers to splendid advantage. An unfaltering equilibrium is maintained in the treatment of plot and character alike. Almost every sentence in Othello's dying speech has become proverbial (Act V. sc. ii. ll. 341-359):

Soft you; a word or two before you go.
I have done the state some service, and they know't.
No more of that. I pray you, in your letters,
When you shall these unlucky deeds relate,
Speak of me as I am; nothing extenuate,
Nor set down aught in malice: then must you speak

Of one that loved not wisely but too well;
Of one not easily jealous, but, being wrought,
Perplex'd in the extreme; of one whose hand,
Like the base Indian, threw a pearl away
Richer than all his tribe; of one whose subdued eyes,
Albeit unused to the melting mood,
Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees
Their medicinal gum. Set you down this;
And say besides, that in Aleppo once,
Where a malignant and a turban'd Turk
Beat a Venetian and traduced the state,
I took him by the throat, the circumcised dog,
And smote him, thus. [Stabs himself.]

Measure for Measure, which deals mainly with the virtue of chastity, contains one of the finest scenes (between Angelo and Isabella, Act II. sc. ii. l. 43 seq.) and one of the greatest speeches (Claudio on the fear of death, Act III. sc. i. ll. 119-133) in the range of Shakespearean drama. Claudio's speech, very human if very cowardly, runs:

Ay, but to die, and go we know not where;
To lie in cold obstruction and to rot;
This sensible warm motion to become
A kneaded clod; and the delighted spirit
To bathe in fiery floods, or to reside
In thrilling region of thick-ribbed ice;
To be imprison'd in the viewless winds,
And blown with restless violence round about
The pendent world; or to be worse than worst
Of those that lawless and incertain thought
Imagine howling:—'tis too horrible!
The weariest and most loathed worldly life
That age, ache, penury, and imprisonment
Can lay on nature is a paradise
To what we fear of death.

Macbeth is on the same lofty level of tragic art as Othello. The subject, drawn from Scottish history, especially appealed to King James and his court. It is the shortest of all Shakespeare's tragedies, and the most rapid in action. Very sure and very subtle is the revelation of character offered by Shakespeare's portraits of Macbeth and his wife. In the hero there is a peculiar mingling of covetous ambition and reckless physical courage, with a highly developed imaginative faculty which lends his utterance in the catastrophe of his career a weird splendour of phrase at the same time that it invests it with strange aloofness of feeling. He receives the crushing news of the death of his wife, on whose strength of will and practical temperament his action in former seasons of crisis wholly depended, thus (Act V. sc. v. ll. 15-28):

Macbeth. Wherefore was that cry?
Seyton. The queen, my lord, is dead.
Macbeth. She should have died hereafter;
There would have been a time for such a word.
To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow,
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,
To the last syllable of recorded time;
And all our yesterdays have lighted fools

The way to dusty death. Out, out, brief candle !
Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage
And then is heard no more : it is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury,
Signifying nothing.

King Lear, the most heart-rending of all Shakespeare's tragedies, was acted at court on December 26, 1606. It was based on a legend of British history, but Shakespeare so re-created the story that all the pity and terror of which tragedy is capable reached their climax in his treatment of it. There is awful beauty in the speeches of the demented king in the concluding scenes. The words which lead up to his recognition of his daughter Cordelia are unsurpassable in their pathos (Act IV. sc. vii. ll. 59-70) :

Pray do not mock me :

I am a very foolish fond old man,
Fourscore and upward, not an hour more nor less ;
And, to deal plainly,
I fear I am not perfect in my mind.
Methinks I should know you and know this man ;
Yet I am doubtful ; for I am mainly ignorant
What place this is, and all the skill I have Remembers not these garments, nor I know not Where I did lodge last night. Do not laugh at me ;
For, as I am a man, I think this lady
To be my child Cordelia.

Timon of Athens, although the hero was cast in the mould of Lear, falls far short of its three predecessors. Shakespeare was not responsible for the whole. Nearly all Acts iii. and v. came from an inferior pen. The coadjutor may possibly have been George Wilkins, who may safely be credited with aiding Shakespeare in the romantic play of Pericles at the same date (1607-1608). Only Acts iii. and v. and part of Act iv. of Pericles can confidently be assigned to the great dramatist, but these scenes form a self-contained whole, and are characterised by a matured felicity of expression. Witness the simple lament of Marina, the desolate heroine, while scattering flowers on her nurse's grave (Act IV. sc. i. ll. 13-20) :

No, I will rob Tellus of her weed,
To strew thy green with flowers : the yellows, blues,
The purple violets, and marigolds,
Shall, as a carpet, hang upon thy grave,
While summer days do last. Ay me ! poor maid,
Born in a tempest, when my mother died,
This world to me is like a lasting storm,
Whirring me from my friends.

Of like calibre are the words of Pericles when his daughter Marina, whom he thinks to be dead, presents herself to him (Act V. sc. i. ll. 106-112) :

My dearest wife was like this maid, and such a one
My daughter might have been : my queen's square brows ;
Her stature to an inch ; as wand-like straight,
As silver-voic'd ; her eyes as jewel-like
And cas'd as richly ; in pace another Juno,

Who starves the ears she feeds, and makes them hungry,
The more she gives them speech.

Pericles was published in 1608. On the same day that license for its publication was obtained, a more impressive piece of literature, Antony and Cleopatra, was announced to be also ready for the press, although its publication was delayed for fifteen years. For the plot of Antony and Cleopatra Shakespeare had recourse again to North's translation of Plutarch. To the theme he brought all his vitalising power, and the tragedy marks the zenith of his achievement. The irresistible spell that it exerts on readers justifies the application to it of the familiar words in which Enobarbus describes the heroine (Act II. sc. ii. ll. 239-242) :

Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale
Her infinite variety : other women cloy
The appetites they feed, but she makes hungry
Where most she satisfies.

Antony and Cleopatra was most worthily followed at no long interval by Coriolanus, which also owes its birth to Shakespeare's study of North's translation of Plutarch. Despite the austere temper of the play, the dramatic interest is in Coriolanus sustained as unflaggingly as in Othello.

Coriolanus was Shakespeare's last excursion into the true realms of tragedy. The three latest plays that came from his unaided pen, Cymbeline, Winter's Tale, and The Tempest, belong to a category of their own, apart alike from comedy and tragedy. Though many of the episodes are poignantly pathetic, all end happily, and their tone is throughout placid and tranquil, in marked contrast with the tempestuous temper of the great series of plays immediately preceding them. The first of the concluding trinity, Cymbeline, is especially notable for the fascination of the heroine, Imogen, the crown and flower of Shakespeare's female characters. The story is freely adapted from Holinshed's Chronicle of British History, interwoven with a story from Boccaccio. The play contains the splendid dirge, 'Fear no more the heat o' the sun,' which clothes the most solemn sentiment in a lyric garb of exceptional verbal and metrical simplicity (Act IV. sc. ii. ll. 259-282) :

Guidarius. Fear no more the heat o' the sun,
Nor the furious winter's rages ;
Thou thy worldly task hast done,
Home art gone, and ta'en thy wages :
Golden lads and girls all must,
As chimney-sweepers, come to dust.

Arviragus. Fear no more the frown o' the great ;
Thou art past the tyrant's stroke ;
Care no more to clothe and eat ;
To thee the reed is as the oak :
The sceptre, learning, physic, must
All follow this and come to dust.

Gui. Fear no more the lightning-flash,
Arv. Nor the all-dreaded thunder-stone ;
Gui. Fear not slander, censure rash ;
Arv. Thou hast finish'd joy and moan :

Both. All lovers young, all lovers must
Consign to thee, and come to dust.

Gui. No exorciser harm thee!

Arv. Nor no witchcraft charm thee!

Gui. Ghost unlaid forbear thee!

Arv. Nothing ill come near thee!

Both. Quiet consummation have;
And renowned be thy grave!

The Winter's Tale was witnessed at the Globe Theatre on May 15, 1611, by a playgoer, Dr Simon Forman, who placed the fact on record, but the piece was doubtless produced in the preceding winter. The story was drawn from a popular romance of Pandosto by Shakespeare's early foe, Robert Greene, but Shakespeare introduced many changes. The thievish peddler, Autolycus, is his own invention, and into his roguish mouth are placed some of the most spirited of Shakespeare's lyrics (cf. Act IV. sc. ii. ll. 1-12). At the same time the pastoral incident throughout the Winter's Tale is the freshest of all Shakespeare's presentations of country life; witness Perdita's beautiful speeches at the sheep-shearing feast (Act IV. sc. iii. l. 70 seq.), which include lines (118-128) like these:

Daffodils,

That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty; violets dim,
But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes
Or Cytherea's breath; pale primroses,
That die unmarried, ere they can behold
Bright Phoebus in his strength, a malady
Most incident to maids; bold oxlips and
The crown imperial; lilies of all kinds,
The flower-de-luce being one! O, these I lack,
To make you garlands of, and my sweet friend,
To strew him o'er and o'er!

The Tempest, probably written in 1611, was suggested by the shipwreck off the hitherto unknown Bermuda Islands in the summer of 1609 of a fleet bound for the Indies. The islands were currently reported by the surviving mariners to be the home of mysterious sounds and devils. It is clear that Shakespeare studied many recent pamphlets which reported the wreck of the fleet, but at the same time he incorporated in the Tempest the result of study of other books of travel in the New World. Nowhere did Shakespeare give rein to his imagination with more imposing effect than in the Tempest. The tone is marked at all points by great solemnity of thought, and endeavours have been made to represent it as a conscious effort in metaphysics rather than a work of poetic fancy. There is little ground to justify a metaphysical interpretation. Shakespeare was merely developing with the increased seriousness of middle life some dramatic themes and characters with which he had already dealt less perfectly in earlier ventures. Miranda is of the school of Marina of Pericles and of Perdita of the Winter's Tale. Ariel belongs to the world of

Puck in A Midsummer Night's Dream, although the later delineation is in the severer colours that were habitual to Shakespeare's maturity. Caliban is an imaginary portrait, conceived with matchless vigour and vividness, of the aboriginal savage of the New World, of whom Shakespeare had read in travellers' tales or heard from their lips. Prospero, the guiding providence of the romance, has been fancifully identified with Shakespeare himself, who probably bade farewell in the Tempest to the enchanted work of his life. There is no just ground for the identification. The conditions of the story and of Prospero's character fully account for his magnanimous renunciation of his magical faculty as soon as by its exercise he had restored his shattered fortunes. Prospero's words of renunciation run (Act v. sc. i. ll. 33-57):

Ye elves of hills, brooks, standing lakes, and groves;
And ye that on the sands with printless foot
Do chase the ebbing Neptune, and do fly him
When he comes back; you demi-puppets that
By moonshine do the green sour ringlets make,
Whereof the ewe not bites, and you whose pastime
Is to make midnight mushrooms, that rejoice
To hear the solemn curfew; by whose aid—
Weak masters though ye be—I have bedimm'd
The noontide sun, call'd forth the mutinous winds,
And 'twixt the green sea and the azured vault
Set roaring war: to the dread rattling thunder
Have I given fire, and rifted Jove's stout oak
With his own bolt; the strong-based promontory
Have I made shake, and by the spurs pluck'd up
The pine and cedar: graves at my command
Have waked their sleepers, oped, and let 'em forth
By my so potent art. But this rough magic
I here abjure; and, when I have required
Some heavenly music—which even now I do—
To work mine end upon their senses, that
This airy charm is for, I'll break my staff,
Bury it certain fathoms in the earth,
And deeper than did ever plummet sound
I'll drown my book.

VII. Although Shakespeare abandoned dramatic composition in 1611, or thereabouts, he left with the manager of his company unfinished drafts of more than one play, which at a later date other dramatists were commissioned to complete. Shakespeare's place at the head of the acting dramatists of the day was taken by John Fletcher, and it was he, with occasional aid from another distinguished writer, Philip Massinger, who put the finishing touches to Shakespeare's uncompleted work. One of the plays which is known to have been due to this copartnership is lost. It was called Cardenio, and was based on a story in Cervantes' novel of Don Quixote, the first part of which was originally published in an English translation in 1612. Two other pieces, The Two Noble Kinsmen and Henry VIII., in which the hands of both Fletcher and Shakespeare are traceable still survive. The Two Noble Kinsmen, when first printed in 1634, was stated to be the joint production of 'the memorable worthies of their time, Mr John Fletcher and Mr William Shakespeare, gentlemen.' The main plot is based on Chaucer's Knights Tale, and in the scenes developing that story Shakespeare's hand is plainly visible. The opening song, sung by Athenian nymphs who are strewing flowers at the wedding of Theseus and Hippolyta, has the true Shakespearean ring (Two Noble Kinsmen, Act I. sc. i.—Beaumont and Fletcher):

Roses their sharp spines being gone,
Not royal in their smells alone,
But in their hue;
Maiden pinks, of odour faint,
Daisies smell-less, yet most quaint,
And sweet thyme true;

Primrose, first-born child of Ver,
Merry spring-time's harbinger,
With her bells dim:
Oxlips in their cradles growing,
Marigolds on death-beds blowing,
Lark-heels trim;

All, dear Nature's children sweet,
Lie 'fore bride and bridegroom's feet,
Blessing their sense! [Strewing flowers.]
Not an angel of the air,
Bird melodious or bird fair,
Be absent hence!

The crow, the slanderous cuckoo, nor
The boding raven, nor chough hoar,
Nor chatt'ring pie
May on our bride house perch or sing,
Or with them any discord bring,
But from it fly!

Henry VIII. was in course of performance at the Globe Theatre on June 29, 1613, when the firing of some cannon on the stage set the play-house in flames. The house was burned down, and was rebuilt next year. Henry VIII. is a loosely constructed drama, and resembles a historical masque. It was first printed in the First Folio edition of Shakespeare's works of 1623 as Shakespeare's sole production. But there are at least thirteen scenes which on metrical grounds are to be assigned to the pen of Fletcher, possibly with occasional aid from Massinger. Wolsey's magnificent farewell to Cromwell (Act III. sc. ii. ll. 412-459), though in metre and language it often recalls the work of Fletcher, is of a greatness far excelling anything positively known to proceed from Fletcher's pen:

Wolsey. Go, get thee from me, Cromwell;
I am a poor fall'n man, unworthy now
To be thy lord and master: seek the king;
That sun, I pray, may never set! I have told him
What and how true thou art: he will advance thee;
Some little memory of me will stir him—
I know his noble nature—not to let
Thy hopeful service perish too: good Cromwell,
Neglect him not; make use now, and provide

For thine own future safety.

Cromwell.

O my lord!

Must I, then, leave you? must I need forgo
So good, so noble, and so true a master?
Bear witness, all that have not hearts of iron,
With what a sorrow Cromwell leaves his lord.
The king shall have my service, but my prayers
For ever and for ever shall be yours.

Wol. Cromwell, I did not think to shed a tear
In all my miseries; but thou hast forc'd me,
Out of thy honest truth, to play the woman.
Let's dry our eyes: and thus far hear me, Cromwell;
And, when I am forgotten, as I shall be,
And sleep in dull cold marble, where no mention
Of me more must be heard of, say I taught thee;
Say, Wolsey, that once trod the ways of glory,
And sounded all the depths and shoals of honour,
Found thee a way, out of his wreck, to rise in;
A sure and safe one, though thy master missed it.
Mark but my fall and that that ruin'd me.
Cromwell, I charge thee, fling away ambition:
By that sin fell the angels; how can man then,
The image of his Maker, hope to win by it?
Love thyself last: cherish those hearts that hate thee;
Corruption wins not more than honesty.
Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace,
To silence envious tongues. Be just, and fear not:
Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's,
Thy God's, and truth's; then if thou fall'st, O Cromwell,
Thou fall'st a blessed martyr! Serve the king;
And prithee, lead me in:
There take an inventory of all I have,
To the last penny; 'tis the king's: my robe,
And my integrity to heaven, is all
I dare now call mine own. O Cromwell, Cromwell!
Had I but served my God with half the zeal
I serv'd my king, he would not in mine age
Have left me naked to mine enemies.

Crom. Good sir, have patience.

Wol.

So I have. Farewell

The hopes of court! my hopes in heaven do dwell.

This may safely be assigned to Shakespeare, although in it Shakespeare seems to have given proof of his versatility by echoing in a glorified key the habitual strain of Fletcher.

With Henry VIII. Shakespeare's work was done. After his retirement from active connection with the theatre his plays were still performed at court and on the public stages, but the last five years of his life were mainly passed at Stratford. In 1613 he paid a short visit to London in order to make what proved his last investment in real estate. He purchased a house in the neighbourhood of the Blackfriars Theatre for £140, of which he left £60 on mortgage. The deed of conveyance bears the date March 10th, and is now in the Guildhall Library. A second deed dated next day and relating to the mortgage is now in the British Museum. Both documents bear Shakespeare's signature. The Blackfriars house was leased immediately to a resident in the neighbourhood. In July 1614 John Combe, a wealthy inhabitant of Stratford, died and left Shakespeare £5. At the end of the year Shakespeare was involved in a quarrel between the corporation of Stratford and the son of his friend Combe, who made an attempt to enclose the common field, which belonged to the corporation. The municipal authorities made vain efforts to enlist Shakespeare's sympathy on their side, but Shakespeare appears to have supported the rapacious landlord. The corporation was successful in the struggle.

Shakespeare's health was failing at the beginning of 1616, and on 25th January he caused Francis Collins, a solicitor of Warwick, to draft his will, but the document was for the time left unsigned. According to a local tradition, a month or two later he entertained at his house two literary friends, Michael Drayton and Ben Jonson. They had, it was reported, 'a merry meeting,' but 'itt seems drank too hard, for Shakespeare died of a feavour there contracted.' Whether this record be correct or not, there is little doubt that his illness recurred in March, and that, after revising the will which had been drafted in January, he then duly completed its execution. He died on Tuesday, April 23, 1616, at the age of fifty-two. He was buried, two days later, inside Stratford Church, near the northern wall of the chancel. Over the poet's grave were inscribed the lines :

Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear
To dig the dust enclosed heare ;
Bleste be the man that spares these stones,
And curst be he that moves my bones.

Before 1623 a monument by a London sculptor of Dutch birth, Gerard Johnson, was affixed to the wall overlooking the grave. It includes a half-length figure of the dramatist, whose hands are disposed as if in the act of writing. The inscription runs as follows :

Judicio Pylum, genio Socratem, arte Maronem,
Terra tegit, populus mæret, Olympus habet.

Stay passenger, why goest thou by so fast ?
Read, if thou canst, whom envious death hath plast
Within this monument ; Shakespeare with whome
Quick nature dide ; whose name doth deck ys tombe
Far more then cost ; sith all yt he hath writt
Leaves living art but page to serve his witt.

Obiti ano. doi 1616. Aetatis 53. Die 23 Ap.

Shakespeare was survived by his wife and two daughters. The widow died on August 6, 1623, at the age of sixty-seven, and was buried near the poet two days later. Both his daughters married. The younger, Judith, had become the wife of a neighbour's son, Thomas Quiney, two months before the poet's death (February 10, 1616). She was the mother of three sons, all of whom died young. Surviving husband, sons, and sister, she died at Stratford on February 9, 1662, in her seventy-seventh year. The elder daughter, Susanna, had married, in 1608, John Hall, a physician at Stratford. She was buried in Stratford Church, July 11, 1649, aged fifty-six. The inscription on her tombstone attests that she was endowed, in the opinion of her neighbours, with something of her father's wit and wisdom. Mrs Hall's only child, Elizabeth, was the last surviving descendant of the poet. She married twice, her first husband being Thomas Nash of Stratford (1593-1647); her second husband was Sir John Barnard (or Bernard) of Abington, Northamptonshire. Lady Barnard died childless at her husband's house at Abington, and was buried in the church there on February 17, 1670.

Shakespeare's will was proved by John Hall, his son-in-law, and joint-executor with his daughter, Mrs Hall, in London on 22nd June following his death. It has been stated, on the strength of the religious exordium to the will, that Shakespeare died a Roman Catholic, but, in point of fact, the exordium was the conventional formula, and proves nothing respecting the testator's personal belief. Shakespeare's elder daughter, Susanna Hall, was made by the will mistress of New Place and practically of all the poet's property. To his wife, whose name did not appear in the original draft, Shakespeare left in the final draft only his second best bed and its furniture. There is some probability in the theory that his relations with her were not of a very cordial nature, but the slender bequest in the will cannot reasonably be taken as indicating a desire on the part of the poet to publish his indifference or dislike. It is likely that her age and ignorance of affairs unfitted her in the poet's eyes for the control of property, and she was accordingly committed to the care of his elder daughter. To his granddaughter, Elizabeth Hall, afterwards Lady Barnard, the poet bequeathed his plate, with the exception of a silver and gilt bowl, which went to his younger daughter Judith. The latter also received, with a tenement in Chapel Lane (in remainder to the elder daughter), £300. Among other legatees, each of the dramatist's fellow-actors, Heming, Burbage, and Condell, received a sum of 26s. 8d. wherewith to buy memorial rings.

VIII. Of the thirty-seven plays of which Shakespeare was the author, only sixteen were published (in quarto) before his death. No less than twenty-one remained in manuscript; but two of these, the second and third parts of Henry VI., had been issued in imperfect drafts, under the titles respectively of the Contention and the True Tragedy. Othello was the first of the unpublished plays to be issued after the poet's death; it appeared in 1622.

In 1623 the first attempt was made to issue a complete edition of Shakespeare's plays. The two actor-friends of the dramatist, John Heming and Henry Condell, were mainly responsible for the venture, but the expenses were defrayed by a small syndicate of printers and publishers. Of these, the chief were the printers William Jaggard and his son Isaac. Their partners were the booksellers William Aspley, John Smethwick, and Edward Blount. Edward Blount and Isaac Jaggard obtained on November 8, 1623, a license for the publication of sixteen of the twenty plays by Shakespeare that were not previously in print. The volume known as the First Folio seems to have been accessible to the public in the course of the same month. It included thirty-six plays; Pericles, though already in print, was omitted. On the title-page was engraved the crude portrait by Martin Droeshout, which Ben Jonson, in lines printed on the fly-leaf, declared to hit the poet to the life. Commendatory verses included a splendid eulogy by Ben Jonson and poems by Hugh Holland, Leonard Digges, and I. M.—perhaps Jasper Mayne. The dedication was signed by Heming and Condell, and was addressed to the brothers, William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Chamberlain, and Philip Herbert, Earl of Montgomery. In a succeeding address 'to the great variety of readers' the same writers declare that their object in undertaking the publication was solely 'to keep the memory of so worthy a friend and fellow alive as was our Shakespeare.' The work is carelessly printed, and abounds in typographical errors. The text, which in the case of twenty-one of the plays is not accessible elsewhere, was drawn from more or less edited playhouse copies, and it is doubtful if in any instance the exact form in which a play came from Shakespeare's pen was presented in the volume. In the case of the fifteen plays that had previously appeared in quarto the folio text discloses numerous differences. The editors declared that the folio text was alone authentic, but this claim cannot be accepted without qualification. The imperfect quarto versions of the Merry Wives of Windsor and Henry V. are replaced in the folio by satisfactory texts; but the quarto texts of Love's Labour's Lost, A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Richard II. are superior to those of the folio. Most of the great plays of which the sole version is preserved in the folio are defaced by corrupt passages. Such, notably, are Coriolanus, All's Well that Ends Well, and Macbeth. Nevertheless, the First Folio remains intrinsically the most valuable volume in English literature; perfect copies, which are rarely met with, fetch very high prices both in this country and America. Over 180 copies have been traced. The original price was £1. During the nineteenth century prices soared from about £40 to £1700. A copy (known as the Daniel Copy) fetched £8600 by the Tercentenary year (1923).

The folio was reprinted in 1632, and a third edition appeared in 1663 without serious change; but the third issue reappeared in the following year with an appendix of seven plays 'never before printed in folio.' The new pieces included Pericles, which had been published separately in quarto in Shakespeare's lifetime, and six other plays by other hands, which had also been published separately in Shakespeare's lifetime, and had been unjustifiably attributed to his pen by unscrupulous publishers, although it was obvious he had no hand in them. The names of the spurious plays were The London Prodigal, The History of Thomas Lord Cromwell, Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, The Puritan Widow, A Yorkshire Tragedy, and The Tragedy of Locrine. A fourth edition of the folio appeared in 1685 with the spurious appendix.

The editors of the First Folio anticipated the final and universal verdict of the character of Shakespeare's achievements when they wrote, 'These plays have had their trial already and stood out all appeals.' The laws of the classical drama, which Shakespeare's plays defied, still commanded respect in Shakespeare's day, but even lovers of the ancient ways acknowledged that the force of his genius had revealed new methods of dramatic art hitherto unsurpassed and unsuspected. Ben Jonson, a champion of classical theories of art, in commendatory verses prefixed to the First Folio, claimed that Shakespeare had put to shame the poets of Greece and Rome. Through the three centuries that have elapsed since the great dramatist reached the maturity of his powers, his reputation has steadily grown in volume. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries there were seasons of ebb or stagnation in the spread of his fame. After the Restoration public taste in England veered towards the French and classical dramatic models, and clumsy efforts were made to adapt Shakespeare's plays to the current vein of sentiment. Dryden, D'Avenant, Shadwell, Nathan Tate, and others boldly travestied Shakespeare's text in revised versions of his plays. But the eclipse of Shakespeare's vogue was partial and temporary, and the Restoration adaptations quickly sank into oblivion. On the continent of Europe a resolute endeavour was made in the eighteenth century to prove Shakespeare unworthy of the honour that was paid him by his fellow-countrymen. Voltaire, the great French writer, who long dominated the taste of Europe, made desperate efforts to prove Shakespeare a barbarian, and his work a mass of indecency and incoherence, which was only occasionally illumined by the true spirit of poetry. But Voltaire's conclusions were powerfully disputed by the German critic Lessing, and when in course of time Shakespeare's works appeared in competent translations in the various languages of Europe, Voltaire's views ceased to influence European opinion.

Throughout the nineteenth century Shakespeare's fame steadily marched onwards as in triumphal progress, not only among his own countrymen, but among intelligent men and women of other countries. In Germany, Shakespeare's work is studied as closely and as enthusiastically as in England or America; and in France, Italy, and Russia reverence for it and him is increasing year by year. On the English stage the name of every actor and actress since Betterton, the great actor of the period of the Restoration, has been identified with Shakespearean parts, and for the last hundred years every actor or actress of ambition in Germany, France, or Italy has been well content to base his or her claim to reputation on the histrionic interpretation of Shakespearean rôles. It may consequently be asserted that in every quarter of the globe to which civilised life has penetrated Shakespeare's power is now recognised. It is universally allowed that in knowledge of human character, in wealth of humour, in depth of passion, in fertility of fancy, in command of all the force and felicity of language, and in soundness of judgment, he has no rival in the literature of any nation or epoch. His unassailable supremacy ultimately springs from the versatile working of his insight and intellect by virtue of which his pen limned with unerring precision almost every gradation of thought and emotion that animates the living stage of the world. His genius enabled him to give being in his pages to all the shapes of humanity that present themselves on the highway of life. So mighty a faculty thus sets at naught the common limitations of nationality and is acclaimed by the whole civilised world.

SIDNEY LEE.

SHAKESPEARE'S PORTRAITS.—According to Aubrey's account, Shakespeare was 'a handsome well-shaped man,' and it is to be regretted that no wholly satisfactory portrait of him exists. The rudely-carved bust on the monument in Stratford Church and the copperplate engraving on the title-page of the First Folio were honest endeavours to depict the poet's features, but are not remarkable as works of art. Both, moreover, were produced after the poet's death. Numerous paintings have from time to time been claimed to be contemporary portraits of Shakespeare, but in no case has the claim been fully sustained. The 'Flower portrait' or 'Droeshout painting,' in the Stratford-on-Avon Memorial Gallery, is held by some to be the original painting on which Droeshout based his engraving in the First Folio. Of considerable interest, too, is the Chandos portrait in the National Portrait Gallery, London (named after a former owner, the Duke of Chandos). The tradition that it was from the brush of Shakespeare's friend and fellow-actor, Richard Burbage, cannot be corroborated; it was doubtless painted for an admirer of the dramatist some years after his death, from somewhat fanciful verbal descriptions of his appearance.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—For early editions see Pollard's Shakespeare's Folios and Quartos (1909), and the Shakespeare Association Studies in the First Folio (1924), which includes 'Shakespeare's Portraiture,' by M. H. Spielmann. In the eighteenth century Shakespeare was edited critically for the first time, and numerous efforts were made by a long succession of editors to free the text from the incoherences which disfigured the folio version. The earliest of the critical editors of Shakespeare was Nicholas Rowe, whose edition appeared in 1709. The poet Pope brought out an edition in 1725, and this was followed in 1733 by the work of Lewis Theobald, who proved himself a masterly emendator. Sir Thomas Hanmer's edition was published in 1744. Bishop Warburton revised Pope's edition in 1747. Dr Johnson's edition appeared in 1765, and that of Edward Capell, the most industrious of all students of the text and contemporary literature, in 1768. The learned, although somewhat freakish, George Steevens greatly improved Dr Johnson's work in a reissue in 1773, which was often republished. In 1790 Edmund Malone completed an edition of high archaeological value. In 1803 appeared the first variorum edition, in twenty-one volumes; this was prepared by Isaac Reed from notes made by George Steevens. The second variorum, mainly a reprint of the first, is dated 1813; the third (1821), prepared by James Boswell, the son of Dr Johnson's biographer, was largely based on material amassed by Malone. A new variorum was edited by H. H. Furness of Philadelphia, 1871-1912, and thereafter by H. H. Furness, jun. Valuable editions were prepared by Alexander Dyce in 1857; by Nicolaus Delius, 1854-61; by Howard Staunton, 1858-60; and by the Cambridge editors, W. G. Clark and Aldis Wright, 1863-66, who also did the handy Globe edition (1 vol. 1864). Among recent complete annotated editions are The Temple Shakespeare, edited by Gollancz (40 vols. 1894-96), The Eversley, ed. by C. H. Herford (10 vols. 1899), The Caxton, ed. by Sir Sidney Lee (20 vols. 1910), The Arden, ed. by Craig and Case (39 vols. 1899-1924). Editions in progress are The New Cambridge Shakespeare, ed. by Quiller Couch and Dover Wilson, The Players' Shakespeare, ed. by Granville Barker, and The Yale Shakespeare. The Sonnets were edited by Tucker (1924) and by Tucker Brooke (1936). The Shakespeare Apocrypha, ed. Tucker Brooke (1908), contains Sir Thomas More, the MS. of which play is held by many scholars to be partly in Shakespeare's handwriting. See also for disputed works, Pollard's Shakespeare's Fight with the Pirates (1920), and J. M. Robertson's Shakespeare Canon (1922-32).

Elaborate materials for a biography were collected by J. O. Halliwell-Phillipps in his Outlines of the Life of Shakespeare (7th ed. 1887). The best lives of Shakespeare are by Sir E. K. Chambers (1930) and by Sir Sidney Lee (4th ed. 1925). And see the Life by J. Q. Adams (1923), Elton's William Shakespeare, his Family and Friends (1904), works by C. W. Wallace on his new Shakespeare discoveries (1909 et seq.), Herford's Sketch of Recent Shakespearean Investigation (1923), and Chambers's Elizabethan Stage (1923).

For notices of Stratford, Sir Sidney Lee's Stratford-on-Avon to the Death of Shakespeare (1890), and Mrs C. C. Stopes's Shakespeare's Warwickshire Contemporaries (new ed. 1907) and Shakespeare's Environment (1914) may be consulted. H. T. Stephenson's Shakespeare's London (1910), and the Shakespeare Tercentenary Book of Homage (1916) and Shakespeare's England (2 vols. 1916) also contain much material respecting Shakespeare's social environment. Francis Douce's Illustrations of Shakespeare (1807; new ed. 1839), Shakespeare's Books, by H. R. D. Anders (1904), Shakespeare's Library (ed. J. P. Collier and W. C. Hazlitt, 1875), Shakespeare's Plutarch (ed. Brooke, 1909), and Shakespeare's Holinshed (ed. W. G. Boswell-Stone, 1896) are of service in tracing the sources of Shakespeare's plots. Alexander Schmidt's Shakespeare Lexicon (new ed. 1904) and E. A. Abbott's Shakesperian Grammar (1869; new ed. 1893) are valuable aids to a study of the text. Useful concordances to the Plays have been prepared by Mrs Cowden-Clarke (1845), to the Poems by Mrs H. H. Furness (Philadelphia, 1875), and to Plays and Poems by John Bartlett (1 vol. 1895). Munro's Shakespeare Allusion Book (new ed. 1932) is useful also. The publications of the (Old) Shakespeare Society (1841-53), of the New Shakspeare Society (since 1874), and of the Deutsche Shakespeare-Gesellschaft of Weimar (since 1865) comprise many papers of value in the æsthetic, textual, historical, and biographical study of Shakespeare. A. Ralli in 1932 published A History of Shakespearean Criticism. The most important critical studies by Englishmen are Coleridge's Notes and Lectures (collected by T. Ashe, 1833), Hazlitt's Characters of Shakspeare's Plays (1817), Dowden's Shakspeare, his Mind and Art (1875), Swinburne's A Study of Shakspeare (1879) and The Age of Shakspeare (1906), and Sir W. Raleigh's Shakspeare (1907). Reference may be made with advantage to F. E. Schelling's Elizabethan Drama (1908), T. S. Baynes's Shakespeare Studies (1893), Sir A. W. Ward's English Dramatic Literature (new ed. 1899), R. G. Moulton's Shakespeare as a Dramatic Artist (1885), A. C. Bradley's Shakespearean Tragedy (1904), Brander Matthews's Shakespeare as a Playwright (1913), and F. S. Boas's Shakespeare and his Predecessors (1895), J. M. Robertson's Problem of the Shakespeare Sonnets (1926), J. Middleton Murry's Shakespeare (1935), and J. Dover Wilson's What Happens in Hamlet (1935). H. Granville-Barker published a series of Prefaces to Shakespeare (1927 et seq.), and, with G. B. Harrison, A Companion to Shakespeare Studies (1934). The essays on Shakespeare's heroines by Mrs Jameson (1832) and Lady Martin (1885) are pleasant reading. Among numerous German criticisms of Shakespeare are fragmentary notices in Goethe's works, Heine's Shakespeare's Heroines, and Kreyssig's study. Ulrici and Gervinus are of smaller value. Brandes's William Shakespeare was published in an English translation (1898, 2 vols.). Among French critics are Guizot's Shakespeare et son Temps (1852), and Alfred Mézières's Shakespeare, ses Œuvres et ses Critiques (1860). Extensive bibliographies of Shakespeare's works and Shakespeareana are given in W. Jaggard's Shakespeare Bibliography (1911), Sir S. Lee's Shakespeare, H. C. Bartlett's Mr William Shakespeare (1922), and A Shakespeare Reference Library (English Assn. 1925); in Ebisch and Schücking's Shakespeare Bibliography (1930; supplement 1936); in the Cambridge History (vol. v.), in the D.N.B., in the British Museum Catalogue (separate Guide, 1923).

George Chapman, the translator of Homer, was born near Hitchin about 1559, is supposed to have studied at Oxford and at Cambridge, and died in 1634. Wood describes him as 'a person of most reverend aspect, religious and temperate, qualities rarely meeting in a poet.' He enjoyed the royal patronage of King James and Prince Henry, and the friendship of Spenser, Jonson, and Shakespeare. According to Oldys, he 'preserved in his conduct the true dignity of poetry, which he compared to the flower of the sun, that disdains to open its leaves to the eye of a smoking taper.' Chapman wrote early and copiously for the stage. His first play, The Blind Beggar of Alexandria, was produced in 1596. All Fools, a good comedy, probably belongs to 1599. In 1598 he completed Marlowe's Hero and Leander, but not with Marlowe's music. After some experiments on parts of the Iliad, the great and complete translation was produced in 1611 in fourteen-syllable rhyming couplets. Chapman's equivalents for the compound Homeric epithets, the far-shooting Phœbus, the ever-living gods, the many-headed hill, silver-footed Thetis, the triple-feathered helm, high-walled Thebes, the strong-winged lance, &c., were happily chosen: vigour, old-world majesty, and passion are not wanting; and though Pope's version put Chapman's out of fashion, though some of Chapman's merits are quite unhomeric, Charles Lamb, Coleridge, and Keats restored the older translation to favour, and spite of obscurities, conceits, harshnesses, and serious slips in Greek, the translation still ranks as a great achievement. The Odyssey (1616) followed in ten-syllable couplets. The conclusion of Book xix. of the Iliad runs thus in Chapman:

The host set forth, and pour'd his steel waves far out of the fleet. [sleet
And as from air the frosty north wind blows a cold thick
That dazzles eyes, flakes after flakes incessantly descending:
So thick helms, curets, ashen darts, and round shields,
never ending,
Flow'd from the navy's hollow womb: their splendours gave heaven's eye [the sky.
His beams again; earth laugh'd to see her face so like Arms shin'd so hot, and she such clouds made with the dust she cast, [so fast.
She thunder'd, feet of men and horse importun'd her
In midst of all, divine Achilles his fair person arm'd,
His teeth gnash'd as he stood, his eyes, so full of fire,
they warm'd,
Unsuffer'd grief and anger at the Trojans so combin'd.
His greaves first us'd, his goodly curets on his bosom
shin'd; [the moon:
His sword, his shield that cast a brightness from it like
And as from sea sailors discern a harmful fire, let run
By herdsmen's faults, till all their stall flies up in wrestling flame, [none came
Which being on hills is seen far off; but being alone,
To give it quench; at shore no neighbours, and at sea their friends
Driven off with tempests; such a fire from his bright shield extends

His ominous radiance; and in heaven impress'd his servent blaze. [place
His crested helmet, grave and high, had next triumphant
On his curl'd head, and like a star it cast a spurry ray,
About which a bright thick'ned bush of golden-hair did play, [arm'd, he tried
Which Vulcan forg'd him for his plume. Thus complete
How fit they were, and if his motion could with ease abide Their brave instruction: and so far they were from hind'ring it,
That to it they were nimble wings, and made so light
his spirit, [to air.
That from the earth the princely captain they took up
Then from his armoury he drew his lance, his father's spear, [alone
Huge, weighty, firm; that not a Greek but he himself
Knew how to shake; it grew upon the mountain Pelion,
From whose height Chiron hew'd it for his sire; and fatal 'twas [Pelias.
To great-soul'd men—of Peleus and Pelion, surnamed
Then from the stable their bright horse Automedon withdraws,
And Alcymus put poitrils on, and cast upon their jaws
Their bridles; hurling back the reins, and hung them on the seat. [doth get
The fair scourge then Automedon takes up, and up To guide the horse: the fight's seat last Achilles took behind, [heaven had shin'd.
Who look'd so arm'd as if the sun there fall'n from
And terribly thus charg'd his steeds: Xanthus and Balios,
Seed of the harpy, in the charge ye undertake of us,
Discharge it not, as when Patroclus ye left dead in field.
But when with blood, for this day's fast observ'd, revenge shall yield
Our heart satiety, bring us off. Thus, since Achilles spake
As if his aw'd steeds understood, 'twas Juno's will to make Vocal the palate of the one, who shaking his fair head,
(Which in his mane, let fall to earth, he almost buried,) Thus Xanthus spake: Ablest Achilles, now (at least) our care
Shall bring thee off; but not far hence the fatal minutes are
Of thy grave ruin. Nor shall we be then to be reprov'd,
But mightiest fate, and the great God. Nor was thy best lov'd
Spoil'd so of arms by our slow pace, or courage's empaire;
The best of gods, Latona's son, that wears the golden hair,
Gave him his death's wound, though the grace he gave to Hector's hand.
We, like the spirit of the west, that all spirits can command [must go,
For pow'r of wing, could run him off: but thou thyself
So fate ordains, God and a man must give thee overthrow.
This said, the Furies stopp'd his voice. Achilles, far in rage, [presage
Thus answer'd him: It fits not thee thus proudly to
My overthrow; I know myself it is my fate to fall
Thus far from Phthia; yet that fate shall fail to vent her gall [horrid deeds;
Till mine vent thousands. These words us'd, he fell to Gave dreadful signal, and forthright made fly his onehoof'd steeds.

Cūret or curets, an old form of cuirass; spurry, many-pointed;
poitrils, harness for the breast; empaïre, diminution.

But however spirited and stately as a translator, Chapman proved rather an undramatic dramatist. He continued to supply the theatre with tragedies and comedies up to 1620, or later ; yet of the dozen that have descended to us, not one possesses real vivifying dramatic power. In didactic observation and description he is sometimes happy, and hence he has been praised for possessing 'more thinking' than many of his contemporaries. His tendency to an epic method of narrative is frequently apparent and injurious to effect. But in many single passages he shows great poetic power and beauty, surpassing in this respect, in Sir A. W. Ward's judgment, all the Elizabethans but Shakespeare. Eastward Hoe was written in conjunction with Jonson and Marston, but is mainly Chapman's, according to Ward, who pronounces it 'one of the liveliest and healthiest, as it is one of the best-constructed comedies of the age.' As to the imprisonment of the authors for their political allusions, see below in the article on Jonson. The Gentleman

Usher contains at least one fine scene (Act iv.). Its sequel, Monsieur d'Olive, is, Sir A. W. Ward thinks, 'one of our most diverting Elizabethan comedies.' Bussy d'Ambois and The Revenge of Bussy d'Ambois give a striking picture of the intrigues at the court of Henry III. of France, and illustrate Chapman's love of similes and metaphors, as well as the power and beauty of his versification ; occasionally bombast is mixed with true poetry, though not so as to justify Dryden's denunciations. The Conspiracie and the Tragedie of Charles Duke of Byron are undramatic, but contain some fine things. In a sonnet prefixed to the comedy of All Fools (1605), Chapman says that he was 'marked with age for aims of greater weight.'

Other plays are May Day (1611), The Widow's Tears (1612), and Cæsar and Pompey (1631). The posthumous tragedies, Alphonsus Emperour of Germany and Revenge for Honour, bear his name with doubtful right. The former, on the candidature of Richard of Cornwall for the imperial throne, is appallingly bloody, and exhibits greater horrors than Kyd's worst passages. A peculiarity is, that the dialogue is freely interspersed with German words and lines, printed in German black letter, but so monstrously misspelt as at times to be barely intelligible. The Ball, a comedy, and The Tragedie of Chabot were the joint work of Chapman and Shirley. The best of Chapman's dramatic works, Eastward Hoe and Chabot, were written in collaboration with others. Among Chapman's non-dramatic works are Enthymia Raptus, Petrarch's Seven Penitentiall Psalmes, The Divine Poem of Musæus, and The Georgicks of Hesiod. The first act of All Fools contains some of Chapman's most characteristic work ; it opens thus with a conversation between the three friends, Rinaldo, Fortunio, and Valerio :

Rinaldo. Can one self cause, in subjects so alike
As you two are, produce effect so unlike ?
One like the Turtle all in mournful strains,
Wailing his fortunes ; th' other like the Lark
Mounting the sky in shrill and cheerful notes,
Chanting his joys aspired : and both for love ?
In one, love raiseth by his violent heat
Moist vapours from the heart into the eyes,
From whence they drown his breast in daily showers :
In th' other, his divided power infuseth
Only a temperate and most kindly warmth,
That gives life to those fruits of wit and virtue,
Which the unkind hand of an uncivil father
Had almost nipp'd in the delightful blossom.

Fortunio. O, brother,
Love rewards our services
With a most partial and injurious hand,
If you consider well our different fortunes :
Valerio loves, and joys
the dame he loves ;
I love, and never can enjoy the sight
Of her I love ; so far from conquering
In my desires' assault, that I can come
To lay no battery to the fort I seek,
All passages to it so strongly kept,

GEORGE CHAPMAN.

From a Print (Wm. Pass fecit) in the British Museum.

By strait guard of her father.

Rin. I dare swear,
If just desert in love measured reward,
Your fortune should exceed Valerio's far ;
For I am witness (being your bedfellow)
Both to the daily and the nightly service
You do unto the deity of love,
In vows, sighs, tears, and solitary watches.
He never serves him with such sacrifice,
Yet hath his bow and shafts at his command :
Love's service is much like our humorous lords,
Where minions carry more than servitors,
The bold and careless servant still obtains ;
The modest and respective nothing gains ;
You never see your love unless in dreams,
He—Hymen puts in whole possession.
What different stars reign'd when your loves were born,
He forced to wear the willow, you the horn ?
But, brother, are you not ashamed to make Yourself a slave to the base lord of love,
Begot of fancy, and of beauty born ?
And what is beauty ? a mere quintessence,
Whose life is not in being, but in seeming ;
And therefore is not to all eyes the same,
But like a cozening picture, which one way
Shows like a crow, another like a swan ;
And upon what ground is this beauty drawn ?

Upon a woman, a most brittle creature,
And would to God (for my part) that were all.

For. But tell me, brother, did you never love?

Rin. You know I did, and was beloved again,
And that of such a dame as all men deem'd
Honour'd, and made me happy in her favours:
Exceeding fair she was not; and yet fair
In that she never studied to be fairer
Than Nature made her; beauty cost her nothing,
Her virtues were so rare, they would have made
An Ethiop beautiful: at least so thought
By such as stood aloof, and did observe her
With credulous eyes; but what they were indeed
I'll spare to blaze, because I loved her once,
Only I found her such, as for her sake,
I vow eternal wars against their whole sex,
Inconstant shuttlecocks, loving fools and jesters,
Men rich in dirt, and titles sooner won
With the most vile than the most virtuous;
Found true to none: if one amongst whole hundreds
Chance to be chaste, she is so proud withal,
Wayward and rude, that one of unchaste life
Is oftentimes approved a worthier wife:
Undressed, sluttish, nasty to their husbands,
Spunged up, adorned, and painted to their lovers:
All day in ceaseless uproar with their households,
If all the night their husbands have not pleased them;
Like hounds, most kind, being beaten and abused;
Like wolves, most cruel, being kindest used.

For. Fie, thou profanest the deity of their sex.

Rin. Brother, I read that Egypt heretofore
Had Temples of the richest frame on earth;
Much like this goodly edifice of women:
With alabaster pillars were those Temples
Upheld and beautified, and so are women,
Most curiously glazed, and so are women,
Cunningly painted too, and so are women,
In outside wondrous heavenly, so are women;
But when a stranger view'd those fanes within,
Instead of gods and goddesses, he should find
A painted fowl, a fury, or a serpent;
And such celestial inner parts have women.

Valerio. Rinaldo, the poor fox that lost his tail,
Persuaded others also to lose theirs:
Thyself, for one perhaps that for desert
Or some defect in thy attempts refused thee,
Revilest the whole sex, beauty, love, and all.
I tell thee Love is Nature's second sun;
Causing a spring of virtues where he shines,
And as without the sun, the world's great eye,
All colours, beauties, both of Art and Nature,
Are given in vain to men, so without love
All beauties bred in women are in vain;
All virtues born in men lie buried,
For love informs them as the sun doth colours,
And as the sun, reflecting his warm beams
Against the earth, begets all fruits and flowers;
So love, fair shining in the inward man,
Brings forth in him the honourable fruits
Of valour, wit, virtue, and haughty thoughts,
Brave resolution, and divine discourse:
Oh, 'tis the Paradise, the heaven of earth;
And didst thou know the comfort of two hearts,
In one delicious harmony united,
As to joy one joy, and think both one thought,
Live both one life, and therein double life;

To see their souls met at an interview
In their bright eyes, at parley in their lips,
Their language, kisses: and to observe the rest,
Touches, embraces, and each circumstance
Of all love's most unmatched ceremonies:
Thou wouldst abhor thy tongue for blasphemy.
Oh! who can comprehend how sweet love tastes
But he that hath been present at his feasts?

Rin. Are you in that vein too, Valerio?
'Twere fitter you should be about your charge,
How plough and cart goes forward; I have known
Your joys were all employ'd in husbandry,
Your study was how many loads of hay
A meadow of so many acres yielded;
How many oxen such a close would fat.
And is your rural service now converted
From Pan to Cupid? and from beasts to women?
Oh, if your father knew this, what a lecture
Of bitter castigation he would read you!

Val. My father? why, my father? does he think
To rob me of myself? I hope I know
I am a gentleman; though his covetous humour
And education hath transform'd me baily,
And made me overseer of his pastures,
I'll be myself in spite of husbandry. [Enter GRATIANA.]
And see, bright heaven, here comes my husbandry.
Here shall my cattle graze, here Nectar drink,
Here will I hedge and ditch, here hide my treasure:
O poor Fortunio, how wouldst thou triumph,
If thou enjoy'd'st this happiness with my sister!

For. I were in heaven if once 'twere come to that.

Rin. And methinks 'tis my heaven that I am past it.

'Young men think old men are fools: but old men know young men are fools' is well put.
'Death and his brother sleep,' so often and so variously linked in contrast by the poets, are by Chapman thus conjoined:

Since sleep and death are called the twins of nature.

We are reminded of Bunyan by:

He that to nought aspires doth nothing need:
Who breaks no law is subject to no king.

A homely simile is:

Shoes ever overthrow that are too large,
And hugest cannon burst with overcharge.

There are many ways of putting what Chapman words so: 'An Englishman, being flattered, is a lamb; threatened, a lion.' 'Man is a name of honour for a king' is a pithy single line or sentence;
so are 'He that is one man's slave is free from none;' 'Flatterers look like friends as wolves like dogs;' 'Danger the spur of great minds;' 'A death for love's no death, but martyrdom.' What Keats felt when he 'heard Chapman speak out loud and bold' we know from Keats's most famous sonnet, 'On first looking into Chapman's Homer.'

Francis Bacon.

Lord Bacon is the name by which contemporaries and succeeding generations have agreed to speak of the aggressive intellectual reformer, the great English writer, the servile statesman, the corrupt Chancellor, who by etiquette and the rules of the peerage should rather be spoken of as Lord Verulam or Viscount St Albans; in his Apophthegms he spoke of himself as 'the Lord Bacon,' as well as 'the Lord St Albans.' Born at York House in the Strand on the 22nd of January 1561, Francis Bacon was the younger son by his second marriage of Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal; his mother, Ann, daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, was a lady of strong will and great accomplishments, and a zealous Calvinist. In childhood he displayed such vivacity of intellect and sedateness of behaviour that Queen Elizabeth used to call him her young Lord-Keeper; and at the age of twelve he was sent to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he early became disgusted with the Aristotelian philosophy, which still held unquestioned sway in the great English schools of learning. This dislike of the philosophy of Aristotle, as Bacon himself declared to his secretary, Dr Rawley, he fell into, 'not for the worthlessness of the author, to whom he would ever ascribe all high attributes, but for the unfruitfulness of the way, being a philosophy only strong for disputations and contentions, but barren of the production of works for the benefit of the life of man.' After spending two years at Cambridge, he began the study of law at Gray's Inn (1576); but that same year he went to France for about three years with Sir Amyas Paulet, the English ambassador. His observations on foreign affairs were afterwards published in a work entitled Of the State of Europe. By the sudden death of his father in 1579, he was compelled to return hastily to England and engage in some profession. After in vain soliciting his uncle, Lord Burghley, to procure for him such a provision from Government as might allow him to devote his time to literature and philosophy, he returned to the study of the law, was called to the Bar in 1582, and became a bencher of his inn in 1586. While engaged in practice as a barrister he did not forget philosophy; early in life he sketched his vast (but never completed) work, The Instauration of the Sciences. He became member of Parliament for Melcombe Regis in 1584, for Taunton in 1586, and for Middlesex in 1593. In 1584 he sought to attract the queen's attention by addressing to her a paper of advice in which, with a boldness unique in a barrister of three-and-twenty, he argued for more tolerance in the treatment of recusants; and in 1589 he wrote a pamphlet on the controversies in the Anglican Church, in which he pleaded for elasticity in matters of doctrine and discipline. As an orator he is highly extolled by Ben Jonson.

In one of his speeches he distinguished himself by taking the popular side in a question respecting some large subsidies demanded by the court, and gave great offence to Her Majesty. To Lord Burghley and his son, Robert Cecil, Bacon continued to pay court in hope of advancement, till at length, finding himself disappointed in that quarter, he attached himself to Burghley's rival, Essex, who, with all the ardour of a generous friendship, endeavoured in vain to procure for him in 1593 the office first of Attorney and then of Solicitor General, and in 1596 that of Master of the Rolls. Essex in some degree soothed Bacon's disappointment by presenting him with an estate at Twickenham, which he afterwards sold for £1800. Bacon recommended his patron to resort to petty flattery of the queen, misunderstanding his frank character; and advised him to undertake the suppression of Tyrone's rebellion (1598). When Essex was brought to trial after his return from Ireland in disgrace in 1599, the friend whom he had so greatly obliged was associated at his own request (in a subordinate capacity) with the prosecuting counsel, in the hope, as he said, of aiding his patron; but Essex was dismissed from all his offices. When Essex broke into open rebellion in 1601, Bacon voluntarily endeavoured to secure his conviction on the capital charge of treason. He complied, moreover, after the earl's execution, with the queen's request that he should write A Declaration of the Practices and Treasons attempted and committed by Robert, Earl of Essex, which was printed by authority; and in another paper he defended his own conduct on the ground that the claims of the State must override those of friendship. In Elizabeth's last years Bacon tried to mediate between Crown and Parliament, and himself advised tolerance in Ireland.

After the accession of James the fortunes of Bacon began to improve. He made extravagant professions of loyalty, planned schemes for the union of England and Scotland, and proved that the difficulties between king and commons could easily be arranged. He was knighted in July 1603, and in subsequent years obtained successively the offices of King's Counsel, Solicitor-General (1607), and Attorney-General (1613). In the execution of his duties he did not scruple to lend himself to the most arbitrary measures of the court, and in 1615 he even assisted in an attempt to extort a confession of treason, under torture, from an old clergyman of the name of Peacham. Torture was applied, not at Bacon's suggestion, but with his assent, and he examined the prisoner while on the rack, without result. Peacham was then tried in King's Bench, Bacon undertaking to confer with each judge so as to secure a conviction. Coke resisted Bacon's advice, and in consequence Bacon helped to get Coke dismissed.

Although his income had now been greatly enlarged by the emoluments of office and a marriage with the daughter of a wealthy alderman, his extravagance and that of his servants, which he seems to have been too good-natured to check, continued to keep him in difficulties. He cringed to the king and his favourite, Buckingham; and at length, on the 7th of January 1618, he attained the summit of his ambition, by being created Lord High Chancellor of England; and in July he was raised to the peerage as Baron Verulam—a title which gave place in January 1621 to that of Viscount St Albans. As Chancellor it cannot be disputed that, both in his political and judicial capacities, he grossly deserted his duty. Not only did he suffer Buckingham to interfere with his decisions as a judge, but, by accepting numerous presents or bribes from suitors, he gave occasion, in 1621, to a parliamentary inquiry, which ended in his condemnation and disgrace. It has been argued that he did not allow the presents he received to influence his decisions, or but rarely. But he fully confessed to the twenty-three articles of corruption which were laid to his charge; and when waited on by a committee of the House of Lords, appointed to inquire whether the confession was subscribed by himself, he answered, 'It is my act, my hand, my heart: I beseech your lordships to be merciful to a broken reed.' It was decided that he be fined £40,000, imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and banished from Parliament and court. He was soon released and pardoned, but not allowed to return to court, and retired to Gorhambury, near St Albans. He had now ample leisure to attend to his philosophical and literary pursuits; even while he was engaged in business these had not been neglected. In 1597 he published Meditationes Sacrae, a Table of the Colours of Good and Evil, and ten Essays. In 1612 he reprinted the Essays, increased to thirty-eight; and finally, in 1625, he again issued them, 'newly written,' and now fifty-eight in number. These, as he himself says, 'come home to men's business and bosoms; and, like the late new halfpence, the pieces are small and the silver is good.' The Essays immediately acquired a popularity and credit they have maintained till now. Dugald Stewart says the work was 'one of those where the superiority of his genius appears to the greatest advantage, the novelty and depth of his reflections often receiving a strong relief from the triteness of his subject. It may be read from beginning to end in a few hours, and yet, after the twentieth perusal, one seldom fails to remark in it something overlooked before. This, indeed, is a characteristic of all Bacon's writings, and is only to be accounted for by the inexhaustible aliment they furnish to our own thoughts, and the sympathetic activity they impart to our torpid faculties.' The Essays, by which Bacon is best known as an author, may fairly be regarded as his most original work. In 1605 he published Of the Proficiency and Advancement of Learning, Divine and Human, which, afterwards published in a Latin expansion with the title De Augmentis Scientiarum, constitutes the first part of his great (but unfinished) Instauratio Scientiarum, meant to be a review and encyclopædia of all knowledge. The second part, entitled Novum Organum, was that on which his high reputation as a philosopher was mainly grounded, and on the composition of which he bestowed most labour. It was written in Latin, and appeared in 1620. In the first part of the Advancement of Learning, after considering the excellence of knowledge and the means of disseminating it, together with what had already been done for its advancement, he divides learning into the three branches of history, poetry, and philosophy, having reference to 'the three parts of man's understanding'—memory, imagination, and reason. The first aphorism of the Novum Organum furnishes a key to the author's leading doctrines: 'Man, being the servant and interpreter of nature, can do and understand so much, and so much only, as he has observed in fact or in thought of the course of nature.' His new method—novum organum—of employing the understanding in adding to human knowledge is expounded in this work, and more or less fully in all his philosophical treatises. He first abandons the deductive logic of Aristotle and the schoolmen, in which preconceived theories were constructed without reference to actual fact, and were syllogistically arranged to lead to elaborate conclusions never tested by observation and experiment. Bacon relied on inductive methods—on the accumulation and systematic analysis of isolated facts to be obtained by observation and experiment. From this assemblage of facts alone were any conclusions to be drawn. The induction was to rest not on a simple enumeration of phenomena, a method familiar to predecessors of Bacon, but on their careful selection and arrangement, with necessary rejections and eliminations. 'Phantoms of the human mind'—'idols' (eidōla) of the tribe, the cave, the market-place, and the theatre, as Bacon called them—inherited by man, or produced by his environment, were exposed and swept aside. Nothing was to obscure the 'dry light of reason.' Bacon took all knowledge for his province, and his inductive system was to arrive at the causes not only of natural but of all moral and political effects. While developing his new scientific method Bacon made some shrewd scientific observations—he described heat as a mode of motion, and light as requiring time for transmission; but in many things he was even behind the scientific knowledge of his time. His system was never finished. He never reached his examination of metaphysics—of final causes—which was to succeed his treatment of physics.

Some other parts of the Instauratio were drafted or nearly completed. The Sylva Sylvarum is devoted to the facts and phenomena of natural science, including suggestions and original observations made by Bacon himself. Other discussions concern the winds, life and death, the dense and the rare,

Next in popularity to the Essays was the treatise Of the Wisdom of the Ancients (in Latin, 1609; trans. 1610), wherein Bacon attempts, generally with more ingenuity than success, to discover secret meanings in the mythological fables of antiquity. The New Atlantis, described below, was also one of the most popular of the works. The History of King Henry VII. is held by Spedding to have been the first to give any true picture of the king or of his reign, and to have given really valuable guidance to all who have since treated the period. He translated some of the Psalms into verse; drew up a confession of faith amidst his worst troubles; and composed three prayers, one of which Addison praised for its unexampled elevation of thought. There were also a number of minor treatises and unfinished works, including Maxims of the Law and other professional treatises, and a collection of Apophthegms, anecdotes and witticisms ancient and modern, many of them little above the level of Joe Miller.

After retiring from public life, Bacon, though enjoying an annual income of £2500, continued to live in so ostentatious a style that at his death in 1626 his debts amounted to upwards of £22,000. His devotion to science appears to have been the immediate cause of his death. Travelling in his carriage when there was snow on the ground, he began to consider whether flesh might not be preserved by snow as well as by salt. In order to make the experiment he alighted at a cottage near Highgate, bought a hen, and stuffed it with snow. This so chilled him that he was unable to return home, but went to the Earl of Arundel's house in the neighbourhood, where his illness was so much increased by the dampness of a bed into which he was put that he died in a few days, 9th April 1626. He was buried in St Michael's Church at St Albans. In a letter to the earl, the last which he wrote, after comparing himself to the elder Pliny, 'who lost his life by trying an experiment about the burning of Mount Vesuvius,' he does not forget to mention his own experiment, which, says he, 'succeeded excellently.'

The overstatement by his admirers of Bacon's claims to universal and unparalleled admiration as the greatest of modern philosophers does him ultimately an injustice, and his contributions to science and scientific progress have been too jealously and grudgingly criticised. Pope's epigram, 'The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind,' is too complimentary to his wisdom and too hard on his character; Macaulay's praise and blame, glorification and vituperation, are ill balanced in the same way. It is absurd to regard him as the inventor of experimental science, or as having devised a perfect method. Where he actually expounds scientific facts he makes gross blunders; he was not even abreast of the science of his own day; he never mentions Harvey's circulation of the blood, and he persistently rejected the Copernican system. He was not, in philosophy proper, a scientific thinker at all. His scientific importance depends on his insistence on the facts that man is the servant and interpreter of nature, that truth is not derived from authority, and that knowledge is the fruit of experience. The inductive method was practised before his time, but he was the first to show its vast importance and to recognise its scientific justification; the impetus his methods gave to future scientific investigation is indisputable. He turned the tide in favour of experimental research, and though he is not, as used to be said, the father of English philosophy too, the precursor of Locke and Hume, his empiricism gave a tone to English philosophical speculation. His own character is strangely complex. He had an unparalleled belief in himself, which warranted him in ignoring the ordinary laws of morality. He was conscious of possessing intellectual power sufficient to revolutionise the relations of man and nature, and he was slow to recognise any moral obstacle that came in the way of his attaining the wealth and position needed for realising his vast intellectual ambition. He found himself drawn to politics in order to obtain power; but he always regarded himself as a stranger in the political sphere: he failed as a manager of men, and he made shipwreck of his life. But with calm confidence he wrote in his will, 'For my name and memory, I leave it to men's charitable speeches and to foreign nations and the next ages.' His eminence in the sphere of practical philosophy, as a master of pregnant thoughts clothed in splendid, nervous, dignified, and for his time singularly concise and trenchant English, is recognised by everybody.

The five following extracts are from the Essays:

Of Death.

Men fear death, as children fear to go in the dark: and as that natural fear in children is increased with tales, so is the other. Certainly the contemplation of death as the wages of sin and passage to another world is holy and religious; but the fear of it as a tribute due unto nature is weak. Yet in religious meditations there is sometimes mixture of vanity and of superstition. You shall read in some of the friars' books of mortification, that a man should think with himself what the pain is if he have but his finger's end pressed or tortured; and thereby imagine what the pains of death are, when the whole body is corrupted and dissolved; when many times death passeth with less pain than the torture of a limb: for the most vital parts are not the quickest of sense. And by him that spake only as a philosopher and natural man, it was well said, Pompa mortis magis terret quam mors ipsa. Groans, and convulsions, and a discoloured face, and friends weeping, and blacks, and obsequies, and the like, shew death terrible. It is worthy the observing that there is no passion in the mind of man so weak but it mates and masters the fear of death: and therefore death is no such terrible enemy, when a man hath so many attendants about him, that can win the combat of him. Revenge triumphs over death; love slights it; honour aspireth to it; grief flyeth to it; fear pre-occupateth it; nay, we read, after Otho the emperor had slain himself, pity, which is the tenderest of affections, provoked many to die out of mere compassion to their sovereign, and as the truest sort of followers. Nay, Seneca adds, niceness and satiety: cogita quamdiu eadem feceris; mori velle, non tantum fortis, aut miser, sed etiam fastidiosus potest. A man would die, though he were neither valiant nor miserable, only upon a weariness to do the same thing so oft over and over. It is no less worthy to observe, how little alteration in good spirits the approaches of death make; for they appear to be the same men till the last instant. Augustus Cæsar died in a compliment: Livia, conjugii nostri memor vive, et vale. Tiberius in dissimulation; as Tacitus saith of him: Jam Tiberium vires et corpus, non dissimulatio, deserebant. Vespasian in a jest . . . : Ut puto, Deus fio. Galba with a sentence: Peri, si ex re sit populi Romani; holding forth his neck. Septimius Severus in dispatch: Adeste, si quid mihi restat agendum; and the like. Certainly the Stoics bestowed too much cost upon death, and by their great preparations made it appear more fearful. Better saith he [Juvenal], qui finem vite extremum inter munera ponit natura. It is as natural to die, as to be born; and to a little infant perhaps the one is as painful as the other. He that dies in an earnest pursuit is like one that is wounded in hot blood; who for the time scarce feels the hurt; and therefore a mind fixt and bent upon somewhat that is good doth avert the dolours of death: but above all believe it, the sweetest canticle is Nunc dimittis; when a man hath obtained worthy ends and expectations. Death hath this also; that it openeth the gate to good fame, and extinguisheth envy—extinctus amabitur idem.

Of Studies.

Studies serve for delight, for ornament, and for ability. Their chief use for delight is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in the judgment and disposition of business; for expert men can execute, and perhaps judge of particulars, one by one; but the general counsels and the plots and marshalling of affairs come best from those that are learned. To spend too much time in studies is sloth; to use them too much for ornament is affectation; to make judgment wholly by their rules is the humour of a scholar; they perfect nature and are perfected by experience—for natural abilities are like natural plants, that need pruning by study; and studies themselves do give forth directions too much at large, except they be bounded in by experience. Crafty men condemn studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them; for they teach not their own use; but that is a wisdom without them, and above them, won by observation. Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested: that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read, but not curiously; and some few to be read wholly, and with diligence and attention. Some books also may be read by deputy, and extracts made of them by others; but that would be only in the less important arguments, and the meaner sort of books; else distilled books are, like common distilled waters, flashy things. Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man: and, therefore, if a man write little, he had need have a great memory; if he confer little, he had need have a present wit; and if he read little, he had need have much cunning, to seem to know that he doth not.

Of Beauty.

Virtue is like a rich stone, best plain set; and surely virtue is best in a body that is comely, though not of delicate features, and that hath rather dignity of presence than beauty of aspect; neither is it almost seen, that very beautiful persons are otherwise of great virtue; as if nature were rather busy not to err, than in labour to produce excellency; and therefore they prove accomplished, but not of great spirit; and study rather behaviour than virtue. But this holds not always: for Augustus Cæsar, Titus Vespasianus, Philip le Bel of France, Edward IV. of England, Alcibiades of Athens, Ismael, the sophy of Persia, were all high and great spirits, and yet the most beautiful men of their times. In beauty, that of favour is more than that of colour; and that of decent and gracious motion more than that of favour. That is the best part of beauty which a picture cannot express; no, nor the first sight of the life. There is no excellent beauty that hath not some strangeness in the proportion. A man cannot tell whether Apelles or Albert Durer were the more trifler; whereof the one would make a personage by geometrical proportions: the other, by taking the best parts out of divers faces to make one excellent. Such personages, I think, would please nobody but the painter that made them. Not but I think a painter may make a better face than ever was; but he must do it by a kind of felicity (as a musician that maketh an excellent air in music), and not by rule. A man shall see faces, that, if you examine them part by part, you shall find never a good: and yet altogether do well. If it be true that the principal part of beauty is in decent motion, certainly it is no marvel though persons in years seem many times more amiable; pulchrorum autumnus pulcher; for no youth can be comely but by pardon, and considering the youth as to make up the comeliness. Beauty is as summer fruits, which are easy to corrupt and cannot last; and, for the most part, it makes a dissolute youth, and an age a little out of countenance; but yet certainly again, if it light well, it maketh virtues shine, and vices blush.

Of Deformity.

Deformed persons are commonly even with nature; for as nature hath done ill by them, so do they by nature, being for the most part, as the Scripture saith, 'void of natural affection;' and so they have their revenge of nature. Certainly there is a consent between the body and the mind, and where nature erreth in the one, she ventureth in the other: Ubi peccat in uno, periclitatur in altero: but because there is in man an election touching the frame of his mind, and a necessity in the frame of his body, the stars of natural inclination are sometimes obscured by the sun of discipline and virtue; therefore it is good to consider of deformity, not as a sign which is more deceivable, but as a cause which seldom faileth of the effect. Whosoever hath any thing fixed in his person that doth induce contempt, hath also a perpetual spur in himself to rescue and deliver himself from scorn; therefore, all deformed persons are extreme bold; first, as in their own defence, as being exposed to scorn, but in process of time by a general habit. Also it stirreth in them industry, and especially of this kind, to watch and observe the weakness of others, that they may have somewhat to repay. Again, in their superiors, it quencheth jealousy towards them, as persons that they think they may at pleasure despise: and it layeth their competitors and emulators asleep, as never believing they should be in possibility of advancement till they see them in possession. So that upon the matter, in a great wit, deformity is an advantage to rising. Kings in ancient times, and at this present in some countries, were wont to put great trust in eunuchs, because they that are envious towards all are more obnoxious and officious towards one; but yet their trust towards them hath rather been as to good spies and good whisperers, than good magistrates and officers: and much like is the reason of deformed persons. Still the ground is, they will, if they be of spirit, seek to free themselves from scorn; which must be either by virtue or malice;

and therefore let it not be marvelled if sometimes they prove excellent persons; as was Agesilaus, Zanger the son of Solyman, Æsop, Gasca, president of Peru; and Socrates may go likewise amongst them, with others.

Of Adversity.

The virtue of prosperity is temperance; the virtue of adversity is fortitude. Prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament; adversity is the blessing of the New, which carrieth the greater benediction, and the clearer revelation of God's favour. Yet even in the Old Testament, if you listen to David's harp, you shall hear as many hearse-like airs as carols; and the pencil of the Holy Ghost hath laboured more in describing the afflictions of Job than the felicities of Solomon. Prosperity is not without many fears and distastes; and adversity is not without comforts and hopes. We see in needle-works and embroideries, it is more pleasing to have a lively work upon a sad and solemn ground, than to have a dark and melancholy work upon a lightsome ground: judge therefore of the pleasure of the heart by the pleasure of the eye. Certainly virtue is like precious odours, most fragrant where they are incensed or crushed; for prosperity doth best discover vice, but adversity doth best discover virtue.

Weighty words are scattered through all the essays, and many phrases or sentences have become proverbial. It is the essay 'Of Marriage and Single Life' that begins, 'He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune; for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief.' That 'Of Parents and Children' has: 'Children sweeten labours, but they make misfortunes more bitter; they increase the cares of life, but they mitigate the remembrance of death.' That 'Of Revenge' gives a famous definition: 'Revenge is a wild kind of justice, which the more man's nature runs to, the more ought law to weed it out. For as for the first wrong, it doth but offend the law; but the revenge of that wrong putteth the law out of office.' 'Of Gardens' he says: 'God Almighty first planted a garden; and indeed it is the purest of human pleasures. It is the greatest refreshment to the spirit of man; without which buildings and palaces are but gross handy-works: and a man shall ever see that when ages grow to civility and elegancy, men come to build stately sooner than to garden finely; as if gardening were the greater perfection.' 'Of Building' we have the pregnant remark: 'Houses are built to live in, and not to look on: therefore let use be preferred before uniformity except where both may be had. Leave the goodly fabrics of houses for beauty only to the enchanted palaces of the poets; who build them with small cost.' And another essay commences: 'Dissimulation is but a faint kind of policy or wisdom; for it asketh a strong wit and a strong heart to know when to tell truth and to do it. Therefore it is the weaker sort of politicians who are the greatest dissemblers.' From the same rich source are: 'A crowd is not company; and faces are but a gallery of pictures ; and talk but a tinkling cymbal, where there is no love ;' 'Lookers on many times see more than the gamesters.' He seems to have coined new proverbs as easily as he quoted old ones—'The remedy worse than the disease,' &c.—and wittily moulded anew the wisdom of the ancients. Thus he takes the Scriptural proverb about riches making themselves wings, and adds a new thought : 'Riches have wings, and sometimes they fly away of themselves, sometimes they must be set flying to bring in more.' The idea 'Knowledge is power,' which Bacon repeatedly expresses, is to be found, it should be noted, in the Meditationes Sacrae of his mediæval namesake, Roger Bacon.

Bacon left the following fragment for the beginning of a History of Henry VIII., in continuation of his Henry VII.—all that was ever written of it :

After the decease of that wise and fortunate king, Henry the seventh, who died in the height of his prosperity, there followed, as useth to do, when the sun setteth so exceeding clear, one of the fairest mornings of a kingdom that hath been known in this land, or any where else. A young king about eighteen years of age, for stature, strength, making, and beauty, one of the goodliest persons of his time. And though he were given to pleasure, yet he was likewise desirous of glory ; so that there was a passage open in his mind by glory, for virtue. Neither was he unadorned with learning, though therein he came short of his brother Arthur. He had never any the least pique, difference, or jealousy with the king his father, which might give any occasion of altering court or council upon the change ; but all things passed in a still. He was the first heir of the white and red rose ; so that there was no discontented party now left in the kingdom, but all men's hearts turned towards him : and not only their hearts, but their eyes also ; for he was the only son of the kingdom. He had no brother ; which though it be a comfortable thing for kings to have, yet it draweth the subjects' eyes a little aside. And yet being a married man in those young years, it promised hope of speedy issue to succeed in the crown. Neither was there any queen mother, who might share any way in the government, or class with his counsellors for authority, while the king intended his pleasure. No such thing as any great and mighty subject, who might any way eclipse or overshadow the imperial power. And for the people and state in general, they were in such lowness of obedience, as subjects were like to yield, who had lived almost four and twenty years under so politic a king as his father ; being also one who came partly in by the sword ; and had so high a courage in all points of regality ; and was ever victorious in rebellions and seditions of the people. The crown extremely rich, and full of treasure, and the kingdom like to be so in a short time. For there was no war, no dearth, no stop of trade or commerce ; it was only the crown which had sucked too hard, and now being full, and upon the head of a young king, was like to draw less. Lastly, he was inheritor of his father's reputation, which was great throughout the world. He had strait alliance with the two neighbour states, an ancient enemy in former times, and an ancient friend, Scotland and Burgundy. He had peace and amity with France, under the assurance, not only of treaty and league, but of necessity and inability in the French to do him hurt, in respect that the French king's designs were wholly bent upon Italy : so that it may be truly said, there had scarcely been seen or known in many ages such a rare concurrence of signs and promises of a happy and flourishing reign to ensue, as were now met in this young king, called after his father's name, Henry the eighth.

The New Atlantis records the discovery of a magnificent island in the northern Pacific, whose eminently Christian, courteous, chaste, and cultured inhabitants protect themselves against the evil communications of a corrupt world by deliberately isolating themselves in their self-sufficing fatherland. Strangers are discouraged from landing save under special circumstances ; and, needing nothing from abroad, the islanders carry on no traffic with foreign parts, though they send out carefully disguised, specially selected commissioners to report on all that is noteworthy in the way of science or learning, invention or discovery, amongst the outsiders. The 'New Atlantis' is so called in contrast with the other or great Atlantis, which is identified with the American continent ; and the romance has points in common with More's Utopia (referred to by an islander, not altogether approvingly, as 'a book of one of your men, of a feigned commonwealth'), Voltaire's Candide, Johnson's Rasselas, and still more oddly with The Book of Mormon, for there is word of the prehistoric civilised races who preceded the North American Indians, and the favoured islanders—possibly descended from Nachoran, 'another son' of Abraham—receive a direct and immediate gift of the sacred Scriptures in book form, as also of the miraculous power to read them without difficulty. The New Atlantis is, as a romance, painfully didactic, but is in other respects curiously interesting, though it has only here and there the charm of Bacon's best style, and is obviously but a fragment of an undeveloped scheme. The voyage is thus described :

We sailed from Peru, where we had continued by the space of one whole year, for China and Japan, by the South Sea, taking with us victuals for twelve months ; and had good winds from the east, though soft and weak, for five months' space and more. But then the wind came about, and settled in the west for many days, so as we could make little or no way, and were sometimes in purpose to turn back. But then, again, there arose strong and great winds from the south, with a point east, which carried us up, for all that we could do, towards the north : by which time our victuals failed us, though we had made good spare of them. So that, finding ourselves in the midst of the greatest wilderness of waters in the world, without victual, we gave ourselves for lost men, and prepared for death. Yet we did lift up our hearts and voices to God above, who sheweth his wonders in the deep ; beseeching him of his mercy, that as in the beginning he discovered the face of the deep, and brought forth dry land; so he would now discover land to us, that we might not perish. And it came to pass, that the next day, about evening, we saw within a kenning before us, towards the north, as it were thick clouds, which did put us in some hope of land; knowing how that part of the South Sea was utterly unknown, and might have islands or continents, that hitherto were not come to light. Wherefore we bent our course thither, where we saw the appearance of land all that night; and in the dawning of the next day, we might plainly discern that it was a land, flat to our sight, and full of bosage, which made it shew the more dark. And after an hour and a half's sailing, we entered into a good haven, being the port of a fair city; not great indeed, but well built, and that gave a pleasant view from the sea: and we thinking every minute long till we were on land, came close to the shore, and offered to land. But straightways we saw divers of the people with bastons in their hands, as it were, forbidding us to land; yet without any cries or fierceness, but only as warning us off by signs that they made. Whereupon, being not a little discomforted, we were advising with ourselves what we should do. During which time there made forth to us a small boat, with about eight persons in it; whereof one of them had in his hand a tipstaff of a yellow cane, tipped at both ends with blue, who came aboard our ship, without any shew of distrust at all. And when he saw one of our number present himself somewhat afore the rest, he drew forth a little scroll of parchment, somewhat yellower than our parchment, and shining like the leaves of writing-tables, but otherwise soft and flexible, and delivered it to our foremost man. In which scroll were written in ancient Hebrew, and in ancient Greek, and in good Latin of the school, and in Spanish, these words: 'Land ye not, none of you, and provide to be gone from this coast within sixteen days, except you have farther time given you: meanwhile if you want fresh water, or victual, or help for your sick, or that your ship needeth repair, write down your wants, and you shall have that which belongeth to mercy.'

Ultimately the voyagers were most kindly received in 'the Strangers' House,' hospitably entertained at the public expense, and their sick doctored, on condition only of their keeping within the bounds prescribed to them. When they naturally wished to know how their hosts had received Christianity, they were told a marvellous tale how 'about twenty years after the ascension of our Saviour,' out of a pillar of fire a cedar-wood ark came sailing shorewards in presence of all the inhabitants of the city of Renfusa, containing a letter from the apostle Bartholomew and a complete copy on parchment of the Old and New Testaments—including, Bacon notes, those 'books of the New Testament which were not at that time written;' though he evidently thought most of the books were extant in A.D. 53 or thereabouts. Then or later they also became possessed of the otherwise wholly lost encyclopædic work which Solomon 'wrote of all plants from the cedar of Libanus to the moss that groweth out of the wall.' And they were miraculously empowered to read these sacred books as if they had been written in their own language.

The following remarkable communication by the governor of the Strangers' House distinctly trenches on the province of The Book of Mormon and of Solomon Spaulding's romance:

'You shall understand, that which perhaps you will scarce think credible, that about three thousand years ago, or somewhat more, the navigation of the world, especially for remote voyages, was greater than at this day. Do not think with yourselves, that I know not how much it is increased with you within these six-score years: I know it well; and yet I say greater then than now: whether it was, that the example of the ark, that saved the remnant of men from the universal deluge, gave men confidence to adventure upon the waters, or what it was, but such is the truth. The Phœnicians, and especially the Tyrians, had great fleets. So had the Carthaginians their colony, which is yet farther west. Toward the east, the shipping of Egypt, and of Palestine, was likewise great. China also, and the great Atlantis, that you call America, which have now but junks and canoes, abounded then in tall ships. This island, as appeareth by faithful registers of those times, had then fifteen hundred strong ships, of great content. Of all this there is with you sparing memory, or none; but we have large knowledge thereof.

'At that time this land was known and frequented by the ships and vessels of all the nations before named. And, as it cometh to pass, they had many times men of other countries, that were no sailors, that came with them; as Persians, Chaldeans, Arabians, so as almost all nations of might and fame resorted hither; of whom we have some stirps and little tribes with us at this day. And for our own ships, they went sundry voyages, as well to your Straits, which you call the pillars of Hercules, as to other parts in the Atlantic and Mediterranean Seas; as to Peguin, which is the same with Cambaline, and Quinzy upon the Oriental Seas, as far as to the borders of the East Tartary. [There is some confusion here for which neither Marco Polo nor Sebastian Münster is responsible. Pegu has no connection with Cambaluc or Cambalu, i.e. Peking; nor that with Quinzy, Quinsay, Kinsai, or Khing-sai, i.e. Hang-chow-foo. And neither Peking nor Hang-chow is on the oriental sea.]

'At the same time, and an age after, or more, the inhabitants of the great Atlantis did flourish. For though the narration and description which is made by a great man with you, that the descendants of Neptune planted there; and of the magnificent temple, palace, city and hill; and the manifold streams of goodly navigable rivers, which, as so many chains, environed the same site and temple; and the several degrees of ascent, whereby men did climb up to the same, as if it had been a scala cali, be all poetical and fabulous: yet so much is true, that the said country of Atlantis, as well that of Peru, then called Coya, as that of Mexico, then named Tyrambel, were mighty and proud kingdoms in arms, shipping, and riches: so mighty, as at one time, or at least within the space of ten years, they both made two great expeditions, they of Tyrambel, through the Atlantic to the Mediterranean Sea; and they of Coya, through the South Sea upon this our island: and for the former of these, which was into Europe, the same author amongst you, as it seemeth, had some relation from the Egyptian priest whom he citeth. For assuredly, such a thing there was, but whether it were the ancient Athenians that had the glory of the repulse and resistance of those forces, I can say nothing; but certain it is, there never came back either ship, or man, from that voyage. Neither had the other voyage of those of Coya upon us had better fortune, if they had not met with enemies of greater clemency. For the king of this island, by name Altabin, a wise man, and a great warrior, knowing well both his own strength, and that of his enemies, handled the matter so, as he cut off their land-forces from their ships, and entailed both their navy and their camp with a greater power than theirs, both by sea and land; and compelled them to render themselves without striking stroke: and after they were at his mercy, contenting himself only with their oath, that they should no more bear arms against him, dismissed them all in safety. But the divine revenge overtook not long after those proud enterprises. For within less than the space of one hundred years, the great Atlantis was utterly lost and destroyed; not by a great earthquake, as your man saith, for that whole tract is little subject to earthquakes, but by a particular deluge or inundation: those countries having, at this day, far greater rivers and far higher mountains, to pour down waters, than any part of the old world. But it is true that the same inundation was not deep; not past forty foot, in most places, from the ground: so that although it destroyed man and beast generally, yet some few wild inhabitants of the wood escaped. Birds also were saved, by flying to the high trees and woods. For as for men, although they had buildings in many places higher than the depth of the water; yet that inundation, though it were shallow, had a long continuance; whereby they of the vale, that were not drowned, perished for want of food, and other things necessary. So as marvel you not at the thin population of America, nor at the rudeness and ignorance of the people; for you must account your inhabitants of America as a young people; younger a thousand years, at the least, than the rest of the world; for that there was so much time between the universal flood and their particular inundation. For the poor remnant of human seed, which remained in their mountains, peopled the country again slowly, by little and little: and being simple and savage people, not like Noah and his sons, which was the chief family of the earth, they were not able to leave letters, arts, and civility to their posterity; and having likewise in their mountainous habitations been used, in respect of the extreme cold of those regions, to clothe themselves with the skins of tigers, bears, and great hairy goats, that they have in those parts: when after they came down into the valley, and found the intolerable heats which are there, and knew no means of lighter apparel, they were forced to begin the custom of going naked, which continueth at this day.'

The most characteristic institution of the island is Solomon's House, or the College of the Six Days' Works, and Bacon's chief interest in the whole affair was in the description of this 'model of a college for the interpreting of nature and the producing of great and marvellous works for the benefit of men.' Amongst the 'riches of Solomon's House,' the first to be named are low-level and high-level observatories and experimental stations. The 'low region' is in caves or shafts sunk six hundred fathoms, some of them under great hills and mountains. The high-level ones are thus described:

'We have high towers; the highest about half a mile in height; and some of them likewise set upon high mountains; so that the vantage of the hill with the tower, is in the highest of them three miles at least. And these places we call the upper region: accounting the air between the high places and the low, as a middle region. We use these towers, according to their several heights and situations, for insolation, refrigeration, conservation, and for the view of divers meteors; as winds, rain, snow, hail, and some of the fiery meteors also. And upon them, in some places, are dwellings of hermits, whom we visit sometimes, and instruct what to observe.'

Solomon's House gave no hesitating approval to systematic vivisection:

'We have also parks and inclosures of all sorts of beasts and birds, which we use not only for view or rareness, but likewise for dissections and trials; that thereby we may take light what may be wrought upon the body of man. Wherein we find many strange effects; as continuing life in them, though divers parts, which you account vital, be perished, and taken forth; resuscitating of some that seem dead in appearance, and the like. We try also all poisons and other medicines upon them, as well of chirurgery as physic. By art likewise, we make them greater or taller than their kind is; and contrariwise dwarf them, and stay their growth: we make them more fruitful and bearing than their kind is; and contrariwise barren, and not generative.'

How far Bacon was from the truth as it is in modern science may be seen from other departments of the college, which abet spontaneous generation: 'We have also means to make divers plants rise by mixtures of earths without seeds; and likewise to make divers new plants differing from the vulgar; and to make one tree or plant turn into another. . . . We make a number of kinds of serpents, worms, flies, fishes of putrefaction; whereof some are advanced in effect to be perfect creatures like beasts or birds, and have sexes and do propagate.' The New Atlantis ends abruptly, after describing at some length several of the various departments of the college.

Bacon's adhesion to various anti-scientific maxims is also conspicuous in his Sylva Sylvarum or Natural History, where there is a chapter 'Of the insecta bred of putrefaction,' for example. Here too he prescribes experiments for the 'version and transmutation of air into water,' and others for the making of gold from silver or copper (quicksilver is useless for the purpose). 'The world hath been much abused by the opinion of making gold: the work itself I judge to be possible; but the means hitherto propounded to effect it are in the practice full of error and imposture, and in the theory full of unsound imagination.'

Confidence in the importance of his work is expressed in the following characteristic sentences (quoted from the translation of the Novum Organum prepared for Stebbing's edition):

I have made a beginning of the work—a beginning, as I hope, not unimportant:—the fortune of the human race will give the issue;—such an issue, it may be, as in the present condition of things and men's minds cannot easily be conceived or imagined. For the matter in hand is no mere felicity of speculation, but the real business and fortunes of the human race, and all power of operation. For man is but the servant and interpreter of nature: what he does and what he knows is only what he has observed of nature's order in fact or in thought; beyond this he knows nothing and can do nothing. For the chain of causes cannot by any force be loosed or broken, nor can nature be commanded except by being obeyed. And so those twin objects, human Knowledge and human Power, do really meet in one; and it is from ignorance of causes that operation fails.

And all depends on keeping the eye steadily fixed upon the facts of nature and so receiving their images simply as they are. For God forbid that we should give out a dream of our own imagination for a pattern of the world; rather may he graciously grant to us to write an apocalypse or true vision of the footsteps of the Creator imprinted on his creatures.

Bacon's verses have a somewhat exceptional interest in view of the Bacon-Shakespeare propaganda. Two poems have often been printed as his on very doubtful authority. That beginning—

The man of life upright
Whose guiltless heart is free
From all dishonest deeds,
Or thought of vanity,

is now known to be Campion's. The other, included at first in Palgrave's Golden Treasury, is a translation or paraphrase of a Greek epigram of uncertain authorship. The paraphrase was ascribed to Bacon as early as 1629, three years after his death, and was accepted by Spedding as his. It is suggestive and metrical, and well worthy of a 'metaphysical poet,' but is hardly a triumphant poetical achievement, as may be seen from the first verse:

The world's a bubble and the life of man
Less than a span;
In his conception wretched, from the womb
So to the tomb:
Curst from the cradle and brought up to years
With cares and fears.
Who then to frail mortality shall trust
But limns the water or but writes in dust.

But Bacon certainly executed a metrical Translation of Certain Psalms, seven in number; for he published them in his own name (1624), with a grateful dedication to his friend George Herbert. They are the only verses we can confidently say were written by the Lord Chancellor, and they give no very high idea of what he could do when he assumed his singing robes. The First Psalm is versified in this fashion:

Who never gave to wicked reed counsel
A yielding and attentive ear;
Who never sinners' paths did tread,
Nor sat him down in scorner's chair,
But maketh it his whole delight
On law of God to meditate;
And therein spendeth day and night:
That man is in a happy state.

The Hundred and Forty-ninth is even less worthy of the author of such majestic prose, and as poetry is clearly below the ordinary level of Sternhold and Hopkins. The first verse runs:

O sing a new song to our God above,
Avoid prophane ones, 'tis for holy quire:
Let Israel sing songs of holy love
To him that made them, with their hearts on fire:
Let Sion's sons lift up their voice and sing
Carols and anthems to their heav'nly King.

Attempts have sometimes been made to extend portentously Bacon's literary bequest to posterity. From Delia Bacon's time (1857) to the present day the voice of the paradoxist has from time to time been heard proclaiming to an incredulous world the faith that Bacon is the author or joint-author of some or most or all of Shakespeare's plays. Because Shakespeare was not a really great actor and was regardless of his fame, because he did not publish his own plays, because the player was illiterate while the plays were learned, because the plays must have been written by the greatest man of that or all time, because Bacon was great enough to have written them, because of coincidences between Bacon's thought and the playwright's, because of cryptograms worked into the texture of the plays (Donnelly), because the more important of the plays fit exactly into gaps left by Bacon in the system of his prose works (Bormann)—for these and other reasons we are asked to believe this eccentric theory. Delia Bacon wrote the Philosophy of the Plays of Shakespeare Unfolded in 1857. Donnelly's Great Cryptogram (1888) tried to prove that Bacon's cryptogram was found throughout Shakespeare. The same argument may of course be extended—and has been extended—to claim for Bacon what is best in Marlowe, Burton, and even Montaigne!—surely with the effect of a reductio ad absurdum. C. Stopes issued pamphlets on the question in 1888-89. See also books by Sir E. D. Lawrence and Sir G. G. Greenwood; Andrew Lang's Shakespeare, Bacon, and the Great Unknown (1912); and J. M. Robertson's The Baconian Heresy: a Confutation (1913). Two notable German contributions were J. Schipper, Zur Kritik der Shakespeare-Bacon Frage (against, Vienna, 1889), and Edwin Bormann, Das Shakespeare Geheimniss (1894; trans. The Shakespeare Secret, 1896). The first life of Bacon was by his 'learned chaplain,' William Rawley (c. 1588-1667); it appeared in 1657, and went into a second edition in 1661. The standard edition of Bacon's works is that of Spedding, Ellis, and Heath (14 vols. 1857-74), seven volumes of which are occupied by the apologetic Life and Letters by Jas. Spedding. See also Macaulay's brilliant attack, the article in the Dictionary of National Biography by Dr S. R. Gardiner and Dr Fowler; monographs by Dean Church (1884, 1925), Sturt (1932), and Williams (1933); Lives by Dr Abbott (1885), G. W. Steevens (1910); Life and Philosophy by Nichol (1890); and for the philosophy, Kuno Fischer's monograph (trans. 1857) and Fowler's edition of the Novum Organum (1878).

Lancelot Andrewes (1555-1626), successively bishop of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester, and a privy-councillor, had the good fortune to enjoy the favour of three sovereigns, and his death was mourned by the youthful muse of Milton. Born at All Hallows Barking, in London, and bred at Merchant Taylors' and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, he was at thirty-four Master of the Hall and prebendary of St Paul's, and was reputed next to Ussher the most learned divine of the day. In patristic learning he stood alone. By his defence of James against Bellarmine—James having written an apology for the new oath of allegiance—he secured the special favour of the king. He attended the Hampton Court Conference, and went with the king to Scotland in 1617 to try to persuade the Scots that episcopacy was better than presbytery. Andrewes was a strong High Churchman, and, like his protégé and friend Laud, attached importance to a high ritual: the Puritan Prynne describes with open disgust the 'Popish furniture' of his private chapels both at Ely and at Winchester. Yet personally he was, unlike Laud, tolerant towards those who thought differently, and was revered for his devoutness by many strict Puritans. He was master of fifteen languages, was of sufficient depth in philosophy to be consulted by Bacon, and was almost equally noted for his charity, his munificence, and his wit. Dr Neale, Bishop of Durham, and Andrewes were standing behind the king's chair at dinner, when James suddenly turned to them and said, 'My lords, cannot I take my subjects' money when I want it, without all this formality in Parliament?' Neale replied, 'God forbid, sir, but you should; you are the breath of our nostrils.' The king then addressed Andrewes: 'Well, my lord, and what say you?' 'Sir,' replied Andrewes, 'I have no skill to judge of parliamentary cases.' The king answered, 'No puts-off, my lord; answer me presently.' 'Then, sir,' said he, 'I think it lawful for you to take my brother Neale's money, for he offers it.' He was accounted the greatest preacher of his time, 'the star of preachers,' 'an angel in the pulpit;' but to a taste moulded on the later and more flowing style of Jeremy Taylor and Tillotson, the power and impressiveness of his sermons and their wealth of matter and illustration are obscured by the abruptness of the transitions, the tags of Latin and Greek, and the extraordinary verbal conceits or puns—'If it be not Immanu-el it will be Immanu-hell;' 'Immanu-el and Immanu-all.' The following extract is a fair specimen:

Of Angels and Men.

Of the parties compared; angels and men, these two we must first compare, that we may the more clearly see the greatness of the grace and benefit, this day vouchsafed us. No long processe will need to lay before you how farre inferiour our nature is to that of the angels: it is a comparison without comparison. It is too apparant, if we be laid together or weighed together, we shall be found minus habentes, farre too light. They are in expresse termes said (both in the Old and in the New Testament) to excell us in power: and as in power, so in all the rest. This one thing may suffice to shew the oddes: that our nature; that we, when we are at our very highest perfection, it is even thus expressed that we come neare, or are therein like to, or as an angell. Perfect beautie, in Saint Stephen: they saw his face, as the face of an angell. Perfect wisdom in David: my lord the king is wise, as an angel of God. Perfect eloquence in Saint Paul: though I spake with the tongues of men, nay of angels. All our excellencie, our highest and most perfect estate, is but to be as they: therefore, they above us farre.

But to come nearer: What are angels? Surely they are spirits, glorious spirits, heavenly spirits, immortal spirits. For their nature or substance, spirits; for their quality or property, glorious; for their place or abode, heavenly; for their durance or continuance, immortal.

And what is the seed of Abraham, but as Abraham himselfe is? And what is Abraham? Let him answer himselfe: I am dust and ashes. What is the seed of Abraham? Let one answer in the persons of all the rest; dicens putredini, &c., saying to rottennesse, thou art my mother, and to the wormes, yee are my brethren.

1. They are spirits; now what are we, what is the seed of Abraham? Flesh. And what is the very harvest of this seed of flesh? What but corruption, and rottenness, and worms. There is the substance of our bodies.

2. They glorious spirits; we vile bodies (beare with it, it is the Holy Ghost's owne terme, Who shall change our vile bodies). And not only base and vile, but filthy and uncleane: ex immundo conceptum semine, conceived of unclean seed: there is the metall. And the mould is no better, the wombe wherein we were conceived, vile, base, filthy, and uncleane. There is our qualitie.

3. They heavenly spirits, angels of heaven: that is, their place of abode is in heaven above, ours is here below in the dust; inter pulices, et culices, tineas, araneas, et vermes; our place is here among fleas and flies, moths, and spiders, and crawling wormes. There is our place of dwelling.

4. They are immortal spirits; that is their durance. Our time is proclaimed in the prophet: Flesh, all flesh is grasse, and the glory of it as the floure of the field (from April to June). The sithe commeth; nay, the wind but bloweth, and we are gone, withering sooner than the grasse, which is short: nay, fading sooner than the floure of the grasse, which is much shorter: nay, saith Job, rubbed in peeces more easily than any moth.

This we are to them if you lay us together; and if you weigh us upon the ballance, we are altogether lighter than vanity itself: there is our weight. And if you value us, man is but a thing of nought: there is our worth. Hoc est omnis homo; this is Abraham, and this is Abraham's seed: and who would stand to compare these with angels? Verily, there is no comparison; they are, incomparably, farre better than the best of us.

Now then: this is the rule of reason, the guide of all choice, evermore to take the better and leave the worse. Thus would man doe; hac est lex hominis. Here then commeth the matter of admiration: notwithstanding these things stand thus, betweene the angels and Abraham's seed: (they, spirits, glorious, heavenly, immortal;) yet tooke He not them; yet, in no wise, tooke He them; but the seed of Abraham. The seed of Abraham, with their bodies, vile bodies, earthly bodies of clay, bodies of mortalitie, corruption, and death: these Hee tooke, these Hee tooke for all that. Angels, and not men; so, in reason, it should be: men, and not angels; so it is: and, that granted to us, that denied to them. Granted to us, so base; that denied them, so glorious. Denied, and strongly denied; Où οὐδέπω; not, not in any wise, not at any hand, to them. They, every way, in every thing else, above, and before us; in this, beneath and behinde us. And we (unworthy, wretched men that we are,) above and before the angels, the Cherubim, the Seraphim, and all the principalities, and thrones, in this dignitie. This being beyond the rules and reach of all reason, is surely matter of astonishment: Τότρο, &c. (saith Saint Chrysostome,) this, it casteth me into an extasie, and maketh me to imagine, of our nature, some great matter, I cannot well expresse what. Thus it is: it is the Lord, let Him doe what seemeth good in His owne eyes.

In his lifetime Andrewes published nothing but the Latin controversial works in defence of the king's views. In 1628 ninety-six sermons were published from his MSS. by King Charles's command, Laud being one of the editors. Even more memorable were the Manual of Private Devotions, Manual of Directions for the Sick, and Prayer for the Holy Communion, translated by Drake (1648) from Andrewes's Greek and Latin original. The Devotions is the most famous, though meant by Andrewes solely for his own use. The first part of it is in Greek, the second in Latin; and in whole or in part has been repeatedly translated (as by Stanhope and Horne in the eighteenth century, and since by Neale, Cardinal Newman, Venables, and Whyte), and has been found of great profit by all schools of Christians. Cardinal Newman's translation of the first part appeared in the Tracts for the Times. See Lives by Russell (1863), Otley (1894), Maclean (1910); Dr Whyte's edition of the Devotions (1900); and T. S. Eliot's book (1928).

John Davis (1550?-1605), of Sandridge, near Dartmouth, always spelt his name Davys, and must not be confounded with another navigator, later and less interesting, John Davis of Limehouse (d. 1622). Davys of Sandridge was one of the most distinguished among the intrepid navigators of Queen Elizabeth's reign whose adventures are given by Hakluyt. In 1585 and the two following years he made three voyages to the Arctic Seas in search of a north-west passage to China, and on his third voyage, in a bark of twenty tons, discovered the strait to which his name (in the spelling Davis) has ever since been applied. In 1595 he himself published a small and now exceedingly rare volume, entitled The Worlde's Hydrographical Discription, 'wherein,' as we are told in the title-page, 'is proved not onely by auctoritie of writers, but also by late experience of travellers, and reasons of substantiall probabilitie, that the worlde in all his zones, clymats, and places, is habitable and inhabited, and the seas likewise universally navigable, without any naturall anyoyance to hinder the same; whereby appeares that from England there is a short and speedie passage into the South Seas to China, Molucca, Phillipina, and India, by northerly navigation, to the renowne, honour, and benefit of her majesties state and communalty.' In corroboration of these positions he gives a short narrative of his voyages, which, notwithstanding their unsuccess, seem to him to show that America is an island, and that a north-west passage exists. Davis next made two ill-fated voyages to the South Seas, and as pilot of a Dutch vessel bound to the East Indies. In his last voyage as pilot of an English ship of 240 tons he was killed in a desperate encounter with Japanese pirates. Besides his chief work, he wrote a very successful treatise on navigation, The Seaman's Secrets. Both were edited in 1878 for the Hakluyt Society by Captain A. H. Markham.

In Search of the North-west Passage.

In my first voyage not experienced of the nature of those climates, and having no direction either by Chart, Globe, or other certaine relation in what altitude that passage was to be searched, I shaped a Northerly course, and so sought the same towards the South, and in that my Northerly course I fell upon the shore which in ancient time was called Groenland, five hundred leagues distant from the Durseys, West north west Northerly, the land being very high and full of mightie mountaines all covered with snowe, no viewe of wood, grasse, or earth to be seene, and the shore two leagues off into the sea so full of yce as that no shipping cold by any meanes come neere the same. The lothsome vewe of the shore, and irksome noyse of the yce was such that it bred strange conceites among us, so that we supposed the place to be wast and voyd of any sensible or vegitable creatures, whereupon I called the same Desolation; so coasting this shore towards the South in the latitude of sixtie degrees, I found it to trend towards the west. I still followed the leading therof in the same height, and after fiftie or sixtie leagues it fayled and lay directly north, which I still followed, and in thirtie leagues sayling upon the West side of this coast by me named Desolation, we were past all the yce and found many greene and pleasant Isles bordering upon the shore, but the mountaines of the maine were still covered with great quantities of snowe. I brought my shippe among those Isles, and there mored to refreshe our selves in our wearie travell, in the latitude of sixtie foure degrees or there about. The people of the cuntry having espyed our shippes came downe unto us in their Canoas, holding up their right hand to the Sunne and crying Yliaout, would strike their breasts; we doing the like, the people came aboard our shippes, men of good stature, unbearded, small eyed and of tractable conditions; by whome, as signes would permit, we understoode that towards the North and West there was a great sea, and using the people with kindenese in giving them nayles and knives which of all things they most desired, we departed, and finding the sea free from yce, supposing our selves to be past al daunger, we shaped our course West northwest, thinking thereby to passe for China, but in the latitude of sixtie sixe degrees, wee fell with an other shore, and there founde an other passage of 20 leagues broad directly West into the same, which we supposed to bee our hoped straight. We entered into the same thirtie or fortie leagues, finding it neither to wyden nor straighten; then, considering that the yeere was spent, for this was in the fine of August, and not knowing the length of this straight and dangers thereof, we tooke it our best course to returne with notice of our good successe for this small time of search. And so retourning in a sharpe fret of Westerly windes, the 29 of September we arrived at Dartmouth. And acquainting master Secretary with the rest of the honorable and worshipfull adventurers of all our proceedings, I was appointed againe the seconde yeere to search the bottome of this straight, because by all likelihood it was the place and passage by us laboured for.

In this second attempt the marchants of Exeter and other places of the West became adventurers in the action, so that, being sufficiently furnished for sixe moneths, and having direction to search these straights until we found the same to fall into an other sea upon the West side of this part of America, we should againe returne, for then it was not to be doubted but shipping with trade might safely bee conveyed to China and the parts of Asia. We departed from Dartmouth, and arriving unto the south part of the coast of Desolation, coasted the same upon his west shore to the latitude of sixtie sixe degrees, and there anchored among the Isles bordering upon the same, where wee refreshed our selves. The people of this place came likewise unto us, by whom I understood through their signes that towards the North the sea was large.

At this place the chiefe ship whereupon I trusted, called the Mermayd of Dartmouth, found many occasions of discontentment, and being unwilling to proceed shee there forsook me. Then considering how I had given my faith and most constant promise to my worshipfull good friend master William Sanderson, who of all men was the greatest adventurer in that action, and tooke such care for the perfourmance thereof that he hath to my knowledge at one time disbursed as much money as any five others whatsoever out of his owne purse, when some of the companie have been slacke in giving in their adventure. And also knowing that I should loose the favour of M. Secretary Walsingham if I should shrink from his direction, in one small barke of 30 Tunnes whereof master Sanderson was owner, alone without farther comfort or company I proceeded on my voyage, and arriving at these straights followed the same eightie leagues, until I came among many Islands, where the water did ebbe and flowe sixe sadome up right, and where there had bene great trade of people to make traine. But by such thinges as there we found wee knew that they were not Christians of Europe that had used that trade; in fine, by searching with our boat we found small hope to passe any farther that way, and therefore retourning agayne recovered the sea and coasted the shore towards the South, and in so doing (for it was to late to search towards the North) wee found another great inlet neere fortie leagues broad where the water entered in with violent swiftnesse. This we likewise thought might be a passage, for no doubt the North partes of America are all Islands by ought that I could perceive therein: but because I was alone in a small barke of thirtie tunnes and the yeere spent, I entred not into the same, for it was now the seventh of September, but coasting the shore towards the South wee saw an incredible number of birds. Having divers fishermen aboard our barke they all concluded that there was a great skull of fish. We being unprovided of fishing furniture, with a long spike nayle made a hooke, and fastening the same to one of our sounding lines, before the bait was changed we tooke more than fortie great Cods, the fishe swimming so abundantly thicke about our barke as is incredible to bee reported, of which with a small portion of salt that we had wee preserved some thirtie couple or thereabouts, and so returned for England. And having reported to M. Secretarie Walsingham the whole successe of this attempt, hee commanded me to present unto the most honourable Lorde high Treasurour of England some part of that fish: which when his Lordship saw and hearde at large the relation of this second attempt, I received favourable countenance from his honour, advising mee to prosecute the action, of which his Lordship conceived a very good opinion. The next yere, although divers of the adventurers fell from the action, as all the Westerne Marchants and most of those in London, yet some of the adventurers both honourable and worshipfull continued their willing favour and charge, so that by this meanes the next yere two shippes were appointed for the fishing and one pinnesse for the discoverie.

Departing from Dartmouth, through Gods mercifull favour I arrived at the place of fishing and there according to my direction I left the two ships to follow that busines, taking their faithful promise not to depart until my returne unto them, which shoulde be in the fine of August, and so in the barke I proceeded for the discoverie: but after my departure in sixteene dayes the shippes had finished their voyage, and so presently departed for England, without regard of their promise. My selfe, not distrusting any such hard measure, proceeded for the discoverie and followed my course in the free and open sea betweene North and North west, to the latitude of 67 degrees, and there I might see America west from me, and Desolation east; then when I saw the land of both sides, I began to distrust that it would prove but a gulfe. Notwithstanding, desirous to knowe the full certainty, I proceeded, and in 68 degrees the passage enlarged, so that I could not see the westerne shore; thus I continued to the latitude of 73 degrees in a great sea, free from yce, coasting the westerne shore of Desolation. The people came continually rowing out unto me in their Canoes, twenty, forty, and one hundred at a time, and would give me fishes dried, Salmon, Salmon peale, Cod, Caplin, Lumpe, Stonebase, and such like, besides divers kindes of birds, as Partridge, Fesant, Guls, Sea birds, and other kindes of flesh. I still laboured by signes to knowe from them what they knew of any sea towards the North; they still made signes of a great sea as we understood them; then I departed from that coast, thinking to discover the North parts of America. And after I had sayled towards the west 40 leagues I fel upon a great banke of yce; the winde being North and blew much, I was constrained to coast the same toward the South, not seeing any shore West from me, neither was there any yce towards the North, but a great sea, free, large, very salt and blew, and of an unsearcheable depth. So coasting towards the South I came to the place where I left the ships to fish, but found them not. Then being forsaken and left in this distresse, referring my selfe to the mercifull providence of God, I shaped my course for England, and unhopd for of any, God alone releiving me, I arrived at Dartmouth. By this last discoverie it seemed most manifest that the passage was free and without impediment toward the North, but by reason of the Spanish fleete and unfortunate time of M. Secretaries death, the voyage was omitted and never sithins attempted.

Dursey Island and rocks are off the south-west coast of Ireland; 'Yliaout,' according to Davis's own Eskimo vocabulary, is 'I meane no harm'; traine, train-oil; skull of fish, school; the capelin is a small fish like a smelt, the lumpe is the lump-fish, the stonebase the black bass; the partridges and pheasants were presumably ptarmigan.

Sir John Harington, or HARRINGTON (1561-1612), translator of Ariosto, and son of the John Harington already noticed (page 264), was a courtier of Elizabeth, and godson of the queen. He was born at Kelston, near Bath; from Eton passed in 1578 to Christ's College, Cambridge; and in 1599 served in Ireland under Essex, by whom, much to the queen's displeasure, he was knighted on the field. His Short View of the State of Ireland (first published in 1880) is modern in tone and much kindlier to the Irish people than was usual. He wrote a collection of epigrams, some Rabelaisian pamphlets, and a Brief View of the Church, in which he reprobates the marriage of bishops. His Ariosto (1591), in the measure of the original, is a paraphrase rather than a translation, and is easy rather than admirable. Some of his epigrams (ed. McClure, 1927) are pointed and some coarse. The first book of the Orlando Furioso (i.e. Roland Distraught) thus opens:

Of Dames, of Knights, of armes, of loves delight,
Of courtesies, of high attempts I speake,
Then when the Moores transported all their might
On Africke seas, the force of France to break:

Incited by the youthfull heate and spight
Of Agramant their King that vow'd to wreake
The death of King Trayano (lately slaine)
Upon the Romane Emperour Charlemaine.

I will no lesse Orlandos acts declare,
(A tale in prose ne verse yet sung or said,)
Who fell bestraught with love, a hap most rare,
To one that erst was counted wise and stayd :
If my sweet Saint that causeth my like care,
My slender muse afford some gracious ayd,
I make no doubt but I shall have the skill.
As much as I have promist to fulfill.

And this is how, in the last stanza of the poem (in forty-six books), Rogero kills fierce Rodomount :

And lifting his victorious hand on hie,
In that Turks face he stabd his dagger twise
Up to the hilts, and quickly made him die,
And rid himselfe of trouble in a trice :
Downe to the lake, where damned ghosts do lie,
Sunke his disdainfull soule, now cold as ise,
Blaspheming as it went, and cursing lowd,
That was on earth so loftie and so proud.

Of Treason.

Treason doth never prosper : what 's the reason ?
For if it prosper, none dare call it Treason.

Of Fortune.

Fortune, men say, doth give too much to many,
But yet she never gave enough to any.

Against Writers that Carpe at other Men's Books.

The Readers and the Hearers like my books,
But yet some Writers cannot them digest ;
But what care I ? for when I make a feast,
I would my Guests should praise it, not the Cooks.

Of a Precise Taylor.

A Taylor, thought a man of upright dealing,
True but for lying, honest but for stealing,
Did fall one day extreemly sick by chance,
And on the sudden was in wondrous trance ;
The Fiends of hell mustring in fearful manner,
Of sundry coloured silkes displayed a banner
Which he had stolne, and wisht, as they did tell,
That he might find it all one day in hell.
The man, affrighted with this apparition,
Upon recovery grew a great Precisian :
He bought a Bible of the best translation,
And in his life he shewed great reformation ;
He walked mannerly, he talked meekly,
He heard three lectures and two sermons weekly ;
He vowed to shunne all companies unruly,
And in his speech he used no oath but Truly ;
And zealously to keepe the Sabbath's rest,
His meat for that day on the ev'n was drest ;
And least the custome which he had to steale
Might cause him sometimes to forget his zeale,
He gives his journeyman a speciall charge,
That if the stuffe allowed fell out too large,
And that to filch his fingers were inclined,
He then should put the Banner in his minde.
This done (I scant can tell the rest for laughter)
A Captaine of a ship came three daies after,
And brought three yards of velvet and three-quarters,
To make Venetians downe below the garters.

He that precisely knew what was enuffe,
Soon slipt away three-quarters of the stuffe ;
His man, espying it, said in derision :
'Remember, master, how you saw the vision !'
'Peace, knave !' quoth he ; 'I did not see one ragge
Of such a coloured silke in all the flagge.'

The Nugæ Antiquæ, from his papers, published in 1769 by a descendant, are far from being mere trifles. They are an olla podrida containing things of very various interest and importance—many letters of Sir John Cheke ; letters and poems by the elder Harington ; letters, verses, and translations by Queen Elizabeth ; and poems by many hands. Among Sir John Harington's own contributions is a detailed record of his experiences and observations during the marchings, fightings, and parleyings of Essex's forces in Ireland ; a long account of Queen Elizabeth's last illness ; and an amazing description of a pageant at the court of James I., which turned out a series of lamentable fiascos because of the shamefully drunken condition of the royal guest, King Christian of Denmark ; of the court ladies and gentlemen ; and of the players, Faith, Hope, Charity, and Peace. There is also a delightfully incredible story of the preternatural sagacity of a seventeenth-century dog in a letter from its proud master to Prince Henry. This besides a series of lives of exemplary bishops of the Church of England from the same industrious pen.

The following extract from Harington's account of an interview with Hugh O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone, during a 'cessation' in the fighting (when he had professed penitence and promised to renounce the title of O'Neill) shows the redoubtable arch-rebel and leader of the wild Irishry in an unusual light and quite an attractive character :

But staying at Dundalk till the 15th of this month, and no news certain of the earl's coming, I went to see the Newry, and from thence to Darlingford by the narrow water, and was hindred by waters that I could not come back to Sir William Warren before his first meeting with the Earl Tyrone, which was on the 17th day ; [at] what time how far they proceeded I know not, but it appeared that the earl was left in good disposition, because he kept his hour so well the next morning : and as I found after, Sir William had told him of me, and given such a report of me above my desert, that next day when I came the earl used far greater respect to me than I expected ; and began debasing his own manner of hard life, comparing himself to wolves that fill their bellies sometime and fast as long for it ; then excused himself to me that he could no better call to mind myself, and some of my friends that had done him some courtesy in England, and been oft in his company at my Lord of Ormond's ; saying these troubles had made him forget almost all his friends.

After this he fell to private communication with Sir William, to the effecting of the matters begun the day before ; to which I thought it not fit to intrude myself, but took occasion the while to entertain his two sons, by posing them in their learning and their tutors, which were one Fryar Nangle, a Franciscan, and a younger scholar whose name I know not; and finding the two children of good towardly spirit, their age between thirteen and fifteen, in English cloths like a nobleman's sons; with velvet gerkins and gold lace; of a good chearful aspect, freckle-faced, not tall of stature, but strong, and well set; both of them [learning] the English tongue; I gave them (not without the advice of Sir William Warren) my English translation of 'Ariosto,' which I got at Dublin; which their teachers took very thankfully, and soon after shewed it the earl, who call'd to see it openly and would needs hear some part of it read. I turn'd (as it had been by chance) to the beginning of the 45th canto—

Looke, how much higher Fortune doth erect
The clymyng wight, on her unstable wheele,
So much the nigher may a man expect
To see his head where late he saw his heele:
On t'other side, the more man is oppressed,
And utterly ov'rthrowne by Fortune's lowre;
The sooner comes his state to be redressed,
When wheele shal turne and bring the happy houre—

and some other passages of the book, which he seemed to like so well, that he solemnly swore his boys should read all the book over to him.

Then they fell to communication again, and calling me to him, the earl said that I should witness and tell my Lord Lieutenant, how against all his confederates' wills, Sir William had drawn him to a longer cessation, which he would never have agreed to, but in confidence of my lord's honourable dealing with him; for, saith he, 'now is my harvest time, now have my men their six weeks pay afore-hand, that they have nothing to do but fight; and if I omit this opportunity, and you shall prepare to invade me the mean time, I may be condemned for a fool.'

Also one pretty thing I noted, that the paper being drawn for him to sign, and his signing it with O'Neal, Sir William (though with very great difficulty) made him to new write it, and subscribe, Hugh Tyrone. Then we broke our fasts with him, and at his meat he was very merry, and it was my hap to thwart one of his priests in an argument, to which he gave reasonable good ear and some approbation. He drank to my lord's health, and bade me tell him he loved him, and acknowledged this cessation had been very honourably kept. He made likewise a solemn protestation that he was not ambitious, but sought only safety of his life and freedom of his conscience, without which he would not live, though the Queen would give him Ireland.

The epigram on carping writers is in the same metre as Raleigh's poem on Sidney (page 308), and rhymes as in the In Memoriam metre used by Lord Herbert of Cherbury. There is a Life of Harington by Sir Clements Markham in the Roxburghe Club edition (1880) of Harington's tract on James's right to succeed Elizabeth.

Sir Henry Wotton—famed less as a poet than as a diplomatist and man of the world in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.—was born at the ancestral seat, Boughton Place, Maidstone, 30th March 1568. After receiving his education at Winchester and New and Queen's Colleges, Oxford, where he became the intimate of Donne, he spent the years 1588–95 on the Continent—Bavaria, Austria, Italy, Switzerland, and France—and made the acquaintance of Beza and Casaubon. He then attached himself to the service of the Earl of Essex, the favourite of Elizabeth, but on his friend's fall from favour withdrew to France and Italy. Having gained the friendship of King James of Scotland, when sent by the Duke of Florence to warn him of a plot to poison him, he was employed by James, on his ascending the English throne, as ambassador to Venice. A versatile and lively mind qualified Sir Henry in an eminent degree for this situation, of the duties of which we have his own idea in his well-known definition of an ambassador as 'an honest man sent to lie abroad for the good of his country.' This was originally written in Latin in a friend's album in Germany (though one would think it must have been conceived in English, the pun being essentially English); the publication of it by the scurrilous controversialist Scioppius lost him the king's favour for a time. But he was employed as ambassador at Venice in 1604–19 and 1621–24. A mission to Vienna (1620) was with the hopeless attempt of making the policy of James I. seem dignified in respect of the deadly struggle begun between his son-in-law, the Elector Palatine, elected King of Bohemia, and the emperor: James I.'s cheap efforts at mediation were scouted by the emperor. At Venice, Wotton was the friend of scholars like Paolo Sarpi, a connoisseur in all matters of art, a collector of pictures, a bountiful, public-spirited, popular, and hospitable ambassador. A sudden change of court favour lost him the Venetian embassy; his salary was in arrears, he was deep in debt, and without income or appointment, when by the mediation of Prince Charles he was made Provost of Eton (1624), having just before published The Elements of Architecture. To qualify himself fully he took deacon's orders; and it was not without regretful longings for the great world he had left that he settled down to his duties at Eton, where he died in December 1639, in the seventy-second year of his age. While resident abroad, he embodied the result of his inquiries into political affairs in a work called The State of Christendom; or a most Exact and Curious Discovery of many Secret Passages and Hidden Mysteries of the Times. This, however, was not printed till eighteen years after his death, like his Life of Buckingham and his 'parallel' between Essex and Buckingham. His writings were published in 1651, under the title of Reliquia Wottoniana, prefaced by Izaak Walton's exquisite biography in miniature. Dr Hannah says none of his pieces has been traced to an earlier date than 1602, but about 1586 he wrote a lost tragedy, Tancredo. He was a scholar and patron of men of letters, and his enthusiastic commendation of Milton's Comus—a copy of which the poet had sent to him—stands to his credit. Sir Henry was an easy, amiable man, an angler, and an 'undervaluer of money,' as Walton, who used to fish and converse with him, says. Two of his poems are specially well known to lovers of seventeenth-century verse:

The Character of a Happy Life (c. 1614).

How happy is he born and taught
That serveth not another's will ;
Whose armour is his honest thought,
And simple truth his utmost skill.

Whose passions not his masters are ;
Whose soul is still prepar'd for death,
Unti'd unto the World by care
Of publick fame or private breath.

Who envies none that chance doth raise,
Nor vice hath ever understood ;
How deepest wounds are given by praise,
Nor rules of State, but rules of good.

Who hath his life from rumours freed ;
Whose conscience is his strong retreat ;
Whose state can neither flatterers feed,
Nor ruine make Oppressors great.

Who God doth late and early pray
More of his grace then gifts to lend ;
And entertains the harmless day
With a Religious Book or Friend.

This man is freed from servile bands
Of hope to rise or fear to fall :
Lord of himself, though not of Lands,
And, having nothing, yet hath all.

On his Mistress, the Queen of Bohemia (c. 1620).

You meaner Beauties of the Night,
That poorly satisfie our Eyes
More by your number than your light,
You Common people of the Skies ;
What are you when the Sun shall rise ?

You curious Chanters of the Wood,
That warble forth Dame Nature's lays,
Thinking your Voices understood
By your weak accents ; what 's your praise,
When Philomel her voice shall raise ?

You Violets that first appear,
By your pure purple mantles known
Like the proud Virgins of the year,
As if the Spring were all your own ;
What are you when the Rose is blown ?

So, when my Mistriss shall be seen
In Form and Beauty of her mind,
By Vertue first, then Choice, a Queen,
Tell me if she were not designed
Th' Eclipse and Glory of her kind ?

The last-quoted poem has been not unjustly described as an imperishable lyric. Other poems often cited are 'On a bank as I sate a-fishing,' 'Tears at the Grave of Sir Albertus Morton,' and the couplet on the death of the latter's wife :

He first deceas'd ; she for a little tri'd
To live without him : lik'd it not, and di'd.

His prose is perhaps hardly worthy of his varied powers ; he began many things, and finished too few, being fastidious. But almost all his prose—though it is unequal in style, and some laboriously worded passages contain little better than commonplace—is enlivened by happy strokes of wit and real humour, quaint conceits (sometimes passing into artificiality), apt allusions, and the wisdom of a man of the world. Amongst his prose pieces are a Survey of Education (unfinished), a tedious panegyric of Charles I., 'characters,' and aphorisms on education. Characteristic was his advice to Milton, when he went to Italy, to 'keep his thoughts close, and his countenance loose,' and his recommendation to a young diplomatist 'that to be in safety himself and serviceable to his country' he should always speak the truth ; 'and by this means, your truth will secure yourself, if you shall ever be called to any account ; and 'twill also put your Adversaries (who will still hunt counter) to a loss in all their disquisitions and undertakings.' Other famous sayings of his are that at Hastings 'the English would not run away and the Normans could not ;' 'All that went for good and bad in Caesar was clearly his own ;' 'Great deservers do grow intolerable presumers ;' and that 'hanging was the worst use a man could be put to.'

Besides the Life by Walton prefixed to the Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, there are monographs by Sir A. W. Ward (1898) and L. P. Smith (1907). Dyce edited his poems in 1843, and Hannah in 1845.

Sir John Davies (1569–1626), lawyer, statesman, and poet, of good Wiltshire family, studied at Queen's College, Oxford. Between 1594 and 1596, while a student of the Middle Temple, he published Orchestra, or a Poem of Dancing, in a Dialogue between Penelope and one of her Wooers, in which he represents Penelope as declining to dance with Antinous ; whereon Antinous lectures her upon the antiquity and universality of that elegant exercise, whose merits are described in verses partaking of the flexibility and grace of the subject. This 'sudden rash half-capreol of his wit,' as he called it, is in a seven-line stanza, obviously imitating Spenser, and is a harmonious poem in the conceit that natural phenomena have rhythmical motions and may be said to dance. The following is a fairly representative passage :

And now behold your tender nurse, the Ayre,
And common neighbour, that aye runns around,
How many pictures and impressions faire
Within her empty regions are there found,
Which to your senses dauncing do propound ; senses
For what are breath, speech, echoes, musicke, winds,
But dauncings of the ayre in sundry kinds ?

For when you breath, the ayre in order moves,
Now in, now out, in time and measure trew ;
And when you speake, so well she dauncing loves,
That doubling oft, and oft redoubling new,
With thousand formes she doth herselfe endew :
For all the words that from our lips repaire,
Are nought but tricks and turnings of the ayre.

Hence is her prattling daughter, Echo, borne,
That daunces to all voyces she can heare :
There is no sound so harsh that shee doth scorne,
Nor any time wherein shee will forbear
The ayrie pavement with her feet to weare :

And yet her hearing sence is nothing quick,
For after time she endeth every trick.

And thou, sweet Musicke, dauncing's onely life,
The eare's sole happinesse, the ayre's best speach,
Loadstone of fellowship, charming rod of strife,
The soft mind's Paradice, the sicke mind's leach,
With thine own tong thou trees and stones canst teach,
That when the aire doth dance her finest measure,
Then art thou born, the gods' and men's sweet pleasure.

Lastly, where keepe the Winds their revelry,
Their violent turnings, and wild whirling hayes,
But in the ayre's tralucent gallery? translucent
Where shee herselfe is turnd a hundreth wayes,
While with those maskers wantonly she playes:
Yet in this misrule, they such rule embrace,
As two at once encomber not the place.

To 'dance the hay' is to dance in a ring.
Anticipations of thoughts in more than one modern author have been found in the verses on the tides that closely follow:

For loe, the Sea that fleets about the Land,
And like a girdle clips her solide waist,
Musicke and measure both doth understand:
For his great chrystall eye is alwayes cast
Up to the Moone, and on her fixed fast:
And as she daunceth in her pallid spheere
So daunceth he about the center heere.

Sometimes his proud greene waves in order set,
One after other flow into the shore,
Which when they have with many kisses wet,
They ebbe away in order as before;
And to make knowne his courtly love the more,
He oft doth lay aside his three-forkt mace,
And with his armes the timorous earth embrace.

The poem on dancing is said to have been written in fifteen days. It was published in 1596; and the same year he showed a temper other than poetical by breaking his stick over the head of a fellow-Templar who had provoked him by mistimed raillery—oddly enough the same wit to whom he had dedicated his Orchestra. Davies was promptly disbarred, and was not readmitted till after ample apologies in 1601. His next venture was a new departure for the gay but chastened wit—his famous Nosce Teipsum, or Poem on the Immortality of the Soul, which, first published in 1599, passed through four other editions in the author's lifetime. Davies accompanied the commissioners who brought to James VI. of Scotland the official announcement of Queen Elizabeth's death (not the unofficial Sir Robert Carey on his headlong ride); and James at once took the author of Nosce Teipsum into high favour. It was at this time that Bacon wrote to Davies the letter begging him to use his interest with the king in favour of concealed poets—whatever the term may have meant—of which the Bacon-Shakespeare faction make so much. James made Davies Solicitor-General and Attorney-General for Ireland, and knighted him; having been Speaker of the Irish Parliament, and shown great zeal in the plantation of Ulster, he returned to English law practice, sat for Newcastle in the House of Commons, and was King's Sergeant and newly appointed Chief-Justice at his death.

Davies, especially in Nosce Teipsum, represents, like Donne, a complete revolt against the love-lyrics and pastorals of the earlier Elizabethans, but has most in common with the didactic poet Fulke Greville, Sidney's friend, who had more of the stuff of poetry within him than Davies. Nosce Teipsum deals with subjects of profound interest in a philosophical rather than a poetical temper; many of the best passages are eloquent; the plan is compact, and the argument logical. Campbell said: 'In the happier parts of his poem we come to logical truths so well illustrated by ingenious similes, that we know not whether to call the thoughts more poetically or philosophically just. The judgment and fancy are reconciled, and the imagery of the poem seems to start more vividly from the surrounding shades of abstraction.' The versification of the poem (long quatrains) was afterwards copied by D'Avenant and Dryden, and used by Gray in the Elegy. Hallam said there was hardly a languid verse; but there are few passages that have as much claim to be called poetry as these reasons for the soul's immortality:

All moving things to other things doe move
Of the same kind, which shews their nature such;
So earth falls downe, and fire doth mount above,
Till both their proper elements doe touch.

And as the moysture which the thirstie earth
Suckles from the sea to fill her empty veins,
From out her wombe at last doth take a birth,
And runs a nymph along the grassie plaines;
Long doth shee stay, as loth to leave the land,
From whose soft side she first did issue make;
Shee tastes all places, turnes to every hand,
Her flowry bankes unwilling to forsake.

Yet nature so her streames doth lead and carry
As that her course doth make no finall stay,
Till she herselfe unto the sea doth marry,
Within whose watry bosome first she lay.

E'en so the soule, which in this earthly mold
The Spirit of God doth secretly infuse,
Because at first she doth the earth behold,
And onely this materiall world she viewes.

At first her mother-earth she holdeth deare,
And doth embrace the world and worldly things;
She flies close by the ground, and hovers here,
And mounts not up with her celestiall wings:

Yet under heaven she cannot light on ought
That with her heavenly nature doth agree;
She cannot rest, she cannot fix her thought,
She cannot in this world contented bee.

For who did ever yet, in honour, wealth,
Or pleasure of the sense, contentment find?
Who ever ceasd to wish when he had health,
Or having wisdom was not vext in mind?

Then as a bee which among weeds doth fall,
Which seeme sweet flowers, with lustre fresh and gay,

She lights on that, and this, and tasteth all,
But, pleas'd with none, doth rise and soare away.

So, when the soule finds here no true content,
And, like Noah's dove, can no sure footing take,
She doth returne from whence she first was sent,
And flies to him that first her wings did make.

Davies also wrote a series of Hymns to Astraea in acrostics to the glory of ELISA BETHA REGINA, and some of his shorter poems were printed in Davison's Rapsody and other collections. He wrote in prose on law subjects and the state of Ireland, and edited in the Norman-French still current a collection of Cases et matters in Ley resolutes and adjudges en les Courts del Roy en cest Realme [i.e. Ireland]. His wife, Lady Eleanor Davies, also a poetess, turned prophethess on the strength of the anagram on her name, Reveal O Daniel, and was not cured by the counter-anagram of the witty Dean of Arches, Never so mad a ladie! Sir John's works were printed by Grosart in the 'Fuller Worthies' (3 vols. 1869-76); the complete poems in the 'Old English Poets' (2 vols. 1876).

John Davies of Hereford (1565?-1618), poet, was of Welsh descent, and is sometimes spoken of as the Welsh poet. He became famous as a writing-master, and practised this profession in Oxford and London. But he found time to write a vast number (too great!) of poems, longer and shorter, on sacred, philosophical, and other themes, eclogues, elegies, and eulogies, for the most part in a very tedious manner. Mirum in Modum discusses in verse God's glory and the soul's shape; Microcosmus deals with psychology. Some of his sonnets are good, and there was a noted poem on The Picture of an Happy Man, full of antitheses of the nature of solemn puns, and beginning thus:

How blest is he though ever crost that can all Crosses Blessings make;
That findes himself ere he be lost,
and lose that found for Vertues sake.

Yea blest is he in life and death,
that feares not Death nor loves this Life;
That sets his Will his wit beneath,
and hath continuall peace in strife. . . .

and ends:

This Man is great with little state,
Lord of the World epitomiz'd,
Who with staid Front outfaces Fate,
and being emptie is suffic'd,
Or is suffic'd with little, sith at least
He makes his Conscience a continuall Feast.

His poems fill two large quarto volumes of Dr Alexander B. Grosart's 'Chertsey Worthies Library' (1873).

Sir Robert Carey, or CARY, first Earl of Monmouth (c.1560-1639), wrote one of the earliest autobiographies in the language. Tenth son of Lord Hunsdon, he served upon several embassies, fought by land and sea, was a warden of the Border marches, was knighted by Essex in 1591, and became Baron of Leppington in 1622, Earl of Monmouth in 1626. His interesting Memoirs were edited by the Earl of Cork and Orrery in 1759, and by Scott in 1808. In 1589 Carey walked for a wager from London to Berwick (342 miles) in twelve days, and won £2000; in March 1603 he rode from near London to Edinburgh in about sixty hours, to bring the news of Queen Elizabeth's death to James VI., in direct defiance of the orders of the Government, who were preparing to despatch a dignified and formal commission, which arrived two days after Carey (see page 395).

A Scottish Raider.

There was a favourite of Sir Robert Car's, a great thief, called Geordie Bourne. This gallant, with some of his associates, would in a bravery come and take goods in the East March. I had that night some of the garrison abroad. They met with this Geordie and his fellows, driving of cattle before them. The garrison set upon them, and with a shot killed Geordie Bourne's uncle, and he himself, bravely resisting, till he was sore hurt in the head, was taken. After he was taken, his pride was such as he asked who it was that durst avow that night's work? But when he heard it was the garrison, he was then more quiet. But so powerful and awful was this Sir Robert Car and his favourites, as there was not a gentleman in all the East March that durst offend them. Presently after he was taken, I had most of the gentlemen of the March come to me, and told me that now I had the ball at my foot, and might bring Sir Robert Car to what condition I pleased; for that this man's life was so near and dear unto him, as I should have all that my heart could desire for the good and quiet of the country and myself, if upon any condition I would give him his life. I heard them and their reasons; notwithstanding, I called a jury the next morning, and he was found guilty of March-treason. Then they feared that I would cause him to be executed that afternoon, which made them come flocking to me, humbly intreating me that I would spare his life till the next day: and if Sir Robert Car came not himself to me, and made me not such proffers as I could not but accept, that then I should do with him what I pleased. And further, they told me plainly that if I should execute him before I had heard from Sir Robert Car, they must be forced to quit their houses and fly the country; for his fury would be such against me and the March I commanded, as he would use all his power and strength to the utter destruction of the East March. They were so earnest with me that I gave them my word he should not die that day. There was post upon post sent to Sir Robert Car; and some of them rode to him themselves to advertise him in what danger Geordie Bourne was: how he was condemned, and should have been executed that afternoon, but by their humble suit I gave them my word that he should not die that day; and therefore besought him that he would send to me with all the speed he could, to let me know that he would be the next day with me, to offer me good conditions for the safety of his life. When all things were quiet, and the watch set at night, after supper, about ten of the clock, I took one of my men's liveries, and put it about me, and took two other of my servants with me in their liveries, and we three, as the Warden's men, came to the Provost Marshal's, where Bourne was, and were let into his chamber. We sat down by him, and told him that we were desirous to see him, because we heard he was stout and valiant, and true to his friend; and that we were sorry our master could not be moved to save his life. He voluntarily of himself said, that he had lived long enough to do so many villanies as he had done; and withal told us that he had lain with above forty men's wives, what in England, what in Scotland; and that he had killed seven Englishmen with his own hands, cruelly murdering them: that he had spent his whole time in whoring, drinking, stealing, and taking deep revenge for slight offences. He seemed to be very penitent, and much desired a minister for the comfort of his soul. We promised him to let our master know his desire, who, we knew, would presently grant it. We took our leaves of him; and presently I took order that Mr Selby, a very worthy honest preacher, should go to him, and not stir from him till his execution the next morning: for after I had heard his own confession, I was resolved no conditions should save his life; and so took order that at the gates opening the next morning he should be carried to execution, which accordingly was performed.

The Sir Robert Car of Carey's story was Sir Robert Ker of Cessford, warden-depute of the Middle Marches in 1594, who played a conspicuous part in the stirring history of the time. He was himself put in ward as a raider by Lord Hunsdon, had to do with more slaughters than one, was more than once denounced a rebel and had to flee his country, but in 1600 was created Lord Roxburgh, and in 1616 Earl of Roxburgh.

The Dying of Queen Elizabeth.

I took my journey about the end of the year 1602. When I came to court, I found the Queen ill disposed, and she kept her inner lodging; yet she, hearing of my arrival, sent for me. I found her in one of her withdrawing chambers, sitting low upon her cushions. She called me to her; I kissed her hand, and told her it was my chiefest happiness to see her in safety, and in health, which I wished might long continue. She took me by the hand, and wrung it hard, and said, 'No, Robin, I am not well,' and then discoursed with me of her indisposition, and that her heart had been sad and heavy for ten or twelve days; and in her discourse, she fetched not so few as forty or fifty great sighs. I was grieved at the first to see her in this plight; for in all my lifetime before, I never knew her fetch a sigh, but when the Queen of Scots was beheaded. Then, upon my knowledge, she shed many tears and sighs, manifesting her innocence, that she never gave consent to the death of that Queen.

I used the best words I could, to persuade her from this melancholy humour; but I found by her it was too deep-rooted in her heart, and hardly to be removed. This was upon a Saturday night, and she gave command, that the great closet should be prepared for her to go to chapel the next morning. The next day, all things being in a readiness, we long expected her coming. After eleven o'clock, one of the grooms came out, and bade make ready for the private closet; she would not go to the great. There we stayed long for her coming, but at the last she had cushions laid for her in the privy chamber hard by the closet door, and there she heard service. From that day forwards, she grew worse and worse. She remained upon her cushions four days and nights at the least. All about her could not persuade her, either to take any sustenance, or go to bed. The Queen grew worse and worse, because she would be so, none about her being able to persuade her to go to bed. My Lord Admiral was sent for, (who, by reason of my sister's death, that was his wife, had absented himself some fortnight from court;) what by fair means, what by force, he got her to bed. There was no hope of her recovery, because she refused all remedies. On Wednesday, the 23d of March, she grew speechless. That afternoon, by signs, she called for her council, and by putting her hand to her head, when the king of Scots was named to succeed her, they all knew he was the man she desired should reign after her. About six at night she made signs for Archbishop Whitgift and her chaplains to come to her, at which time I went in with them, and sat upon my knees full of tears to see that heavy sight. Her Majesty lay upon her back, with one hand in the bed, and the other without. The bishop kneeled down by her, and examined her first of her faith; and she so punctually answered all his several questions, by lifting up her eyes, and holding up her hand, as it was a comfort to all the beholders. Then the good man told her plainly what she was, and what she was to come to; and though she had been long a great Queen here upon earth, yet shortly she was to yield an account of her stewardship to the King of kings. After this he began to pray, and all that were by did answer him. After he had continued long in prayer, till the old man's knees were weary, he blessed her, and meant to rise and leave her. The Queen made a sign with her hand. My sister Scroop knowing her meaning, told the bishop the Queen desired he would pray still. He did so for a long half hour after, and then thought to leave her. The second time she made sign to have him continue in prayer. He did so for half an hour more, with earnest cries to God for her soul's health, which he uttered with that fervency of spirit, as the Queen, to all our sight, much rejoiced thereat, and gave testimony to us all of her Christian and comfortable end. By this time it grew late, and every one departed, all but her women that attended her.

This that I heard with my ears, and did see with my eyes, I thought it my duty to set down, and to affirm it for a truth, upon the faith of a Christian; because I know there have been many false lies reported of the end and death of that good lady.

Francis Meres (1565-1647) is often quoted as an authority on the literary history of this period in virtue of his Palladis Tamia. He was sprung of good old Lincolnshire stock, studied at Cambridge, became M.A. of both universities, and from 1602 was rector of Wing, in Rutland. He published one or two religious works, but is only remembered for the Palladis Tamia, which is not so much a book, or, as he calls it, 'a comparative discourse of our English Poets with the Greek, Latin, and Italian poets,' as a meagre catalogue raisonné, in which English authors from Chaucer's day to his own time are in a sentence or short paragraph characterised and linked with some Greek, classical Latin, or modern Latin poet to whom Meres thought they presented an analogy. Some of the remarks are sensible, some really pregnant, many jejune and pointless to a degree; occasionally there is only a mere scrap of biographical fact. Sir Philip Sidney is 'our rarest poet,' and the Arcadia 'his immortal poem.' Than Spenser's Faerie Queene 'he knows not what more excellent or exquisite poem may be written.' The next may be quoted in full:

As the soul of Euphorbus was thought to live in Pythagoras, so the sweet witty soul of Ovid lives in mellifluous and honey-tongued Shakespeare. Witness his Venus and Adonis; his Lucrece; his sugared sonnets among his private friends, etc.

As Plautus and Seneca are accounted the best for comedy and tragedy among the Latins, so Shakespeare among the English is the most excellent in both kinds of the stage. For comedy, witness his Gentlemen of Verona; his Errors; his Love's Labour's Lost; his Love's Labour's Won [All's Well that Ends Well]; his Midsummer Night's Dream; and his Merchant of Venice. For tragedy: his Richard II., Richard III., Henry IV., King John, Titus Andronicus, and his Romeo and Juliet. As Epius Stolo [so in Meres: really the grammarian Aelius Stilo, who flourished about 100 B.C.] said that the muses would speak with Plautus's tongue if they would speak Latin; so I say that the muses would speak with Shakespeare's fine filed phrase if they were to speak English.

But the paragraph immediately preceding says that Warner, in Albion's England, 'hath most admirably penned the history of his own country;' that Meres had heard the best wits of both universities style him the English Homer; and Meres adds that (this is Meres's own judgment), 'as Euripides is the most sententious among the Greek poets, so is Warner among our English poets!' The conclusion of the literary survey is:

As the poet Lycophron was shot to death by a certain rival of his, so Christopher Marlow was stabbed to death by a baudy serving-man, a rival of his in his lewd love.

Then follows a still more meagre list of English painters and English musicians, named as before with their classical prototypes: Nicholas Hilliard, Isaac Oliver, and John de Creetes in England, 'very famous for their painting,' correspond to Apelles, Zeuxis, and Parrhasius in Greece!

Palladis Tamia, Wit's Treasury, was published in 1598, being the second volume of a series of which the first (1597) was called Politeuphuia, Wit's Commonwealth (apophthegms, &c.). Two other little volumes completed the series, otherwise unimportant. Tamia is a Greek word for 'treasury.'

Gervase Markham (1568?-1637) has been reputed 'the first English hackney writer,' and was believed to have imported the first Arab horse into England. His industry as author, translator, and compiler was enormous, and his work was, some of it, distinctly meritorious, as well as advantageous to the kingdom. He served in the Low Country wars and in Ireland before, about 1593, he settled down to miscellaneous writing. In 1595 he published his poem (174 eight-line stanzas) on the battle of the Revenge; some of its phrases reappear in Tennyson's (more condensed) story. He versified the Song of Solomon, and wrote poems describing the feelings of St John and Mary Magdalene at the loss of their Lord; and he wrote a lengthy continuation of Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia. He also translated from the Italian, and had a share in two dramas. But his principal work was in prose—much of it very pedestrian prose, though elsewhere quaint and not without merits of its own. The Discourse of Horsemanshippe (1593) was the first of eight or nine separate publications (though constantly repeating themselves, according to his fashion) on horses and farriery. The Young Sportsman's Instructor is one of many books on archery, fowling, angling, cock-fighting, and hawking and hunting. Country Contentments (1611) passed through a dozen editions; its second part, The English Huswife, being also separately reissued. The English Husbandman (3 parts, 1613-15) and Cheap and Good Husbandry (1614; 13th ed. 1676) are two out of many books on farming and improving land. Then there was also a series of books on soldiering and military exercises. Even with this record, he left works which yet remain in MS. Country Contentments thus discourses 'Of Angling, the Vertue, Use and Antiquity':

Since Pleasure is a Rapture, or power in this last Age stoln into the hearts of men, and there lodged up with such careful guard and attendance, that nothing is more Supream, or ruleth with greater strength in their affections; and since all are now become the Sons of Pleasure, and every good is measured by the delight it produceth: what work unto men can be more thankful then a discourse of that pleasure which is most comely, most honest, and giveth the most liberty to Divine Meditation? and that without all question is the Art of Angling, which having ever been most hurtlessly necessary, hath been the sport or Recreation of Gods Saints, of most holy Fathers, and of many Worthy and Reverend Divines, both dead and at this time breathing.

For the use thereof (in its own true and unabused nature) carrieth in it neither covetousness, deceit, nor anger, the three main spirits which ever (in some ill measure) rule in all other pastimes; neither are alone predominant without the attendance of their several hand-maids, as Theft, Blasphemy, or Bloodshed; for in Dice-play, Cards, Bowls, or any other sport, where money is the goal to which mens minds are directed, what can mans avarice there be accounted other then a familiar Robbery, each seeking by deceit to couzen and spoyl others of the blisse of meanes which God hath bestowed to support them and their families? . . .

But in this Art of Angling there is no such evil, no such sinful violence, for the greatest thing it coveteth is for much labour a little Fish, hardly so much as will suffice Nature in a reasonable stomach: for the Angler must intice, not command his reward, and that which is worthy millions to his contentment, another may buy for a groat in the Market. His deceit worketh not upon men, but upon those Creatures whom it is lawful to beguile for our honest Recreations or needful use; and for all rage and fury it must be so great a stranger to this civil pastime, that if it come but within view or speculation thereof, it is no more to be esteemed a pleasure: For every proper good thereof in the very instant faileth, shewing unto all men that will undergo any delight therein, that it was first invented, taught, and shall for ever be maintained by Patience only. And yet I may not say, only Patience; for her other three Sisters have likewise a commanding in this exercise, for Justice directeth and appointeth out those places where men may with liberty use their sport, and neither do injury to their Neighbours, nor incur the censure of incivility. Temperance layeth down the measure of the action, and moderateth desire in such good proportion that no Excess is found in the over-flow of their affections. Lastly, Fortitude enableth the Mind to undergo the travail and exchange of Weathers with a healthful ease, and not to despair with a little expence of time, but to persevere with a constant imagination in the end to obtain pleasure and satisfaction.

Now for the Antiquity thereof (for all pleasures, like Gentry, are held to be most excellent, which is most ancient) it is by some Writers said to be found out by Deucalion and Pyrrha his Wife after the general Flood. Others write, It was the invention of Saturn, after the Peace concluded betwixt him and his Brother Titan: And others, That it came from Belus the Son of Nimrod who first invented all holy and vertuous Recreations. And all these though they savour of fiction, yet they differ not from truth, for it is most certain, that both Deucalion, Saturn, and Belus are taken for figures of Noah and his family, and the invention of the Art of Angling is truly said to come from the sons of Seth, of which Noah was most principal. Thus you see it is good, as having no coherence with evil: worthy of use, in as much as it is mixt with a delightful profit: and most antient, as being the Recreation of the first Patriarchs; Wherefore now I will proceed to the Art it self, and the means to attain it. . . .

Now for your Lines, you shall understand that they are to be made of the strongest, longest, and best grown Horse-haire that can be got; not that which groweth on his Main, nor upon the upper part or setting on of his tayl, but that which groweth from the middle and inmost part of his dock, and so extendeth it self down to the ground, being the biggest and strongest hairs about the Horse: neither are these hairs to be gathered from poor, lean and diseased Jades of little price or value, but from the fattest, soundest, and proudest Horse you can find, for the best Horse hath ever the best hair; neither would your hairs be gathered from Nags, Mares, or Geldings, but from ston'd Horses only, of which the black hair is the worst, the white or gray best, and other colours indifferent. Those Lines which you make for small fish, as Gudgeon, Whiting or Menew, would be composed of three hairs: those which you make for Pearch or Trout would be of five hairs, and those for the Chub or Barbel would be of seven: To those of three hairs, you shall add one thread of silk; To those of five, two threads of silk; and to those of seven, three threads of silk. You shall twist your hairs neither too hard nor too slack, but even so as they may twind and couch close one within another, and no more, without either snarling or gaping one from another; the end you shall fasten together with a fishers knot, which is your ordinary fast knots, foulded four times about, both under and above, for this will not loose in the water, but being drawn close together, will continue, when all other knots will fail; for a hair being smooth and stiff, will yield and go back, if it be not artificially drawn together. Your ordinary line would be between three and four fadom in length; yet for as much as there are diversities in the length of rods, in the depth of waters, and in the places of standing to angle in, it shall be good to have lines of divers lengths, and to take those which shall be fittest for your purpose.

Arber reprinted (1871) the Revenge; Grosart edited (1871) the poems on St John and Mary Magdalene; Dr Lyon, in A Study of 'The Nereus Metamorphosis' (1919), ascribed to him that lengthy collection of stories in verse (MSS. in British Museum).

Thomas Storer (1571-1604), a Londoner, studied at Christ Church, became notable as a poet, and wrote a long poem in seven-line decasyllabic stanzas on the Life and Death of Thomas Wolsey, Cardinall (1599). Malone thought that this work might, as well as Cavendish's Life, have helped to mould the conception and wording of the drama of Henry VIII. But even without that it is inevitable that the drama, which obviously follows Cavendish's words at times, should also present reflections in some measure parallel to such as these from Storer:

Perchance the tenor of thy mourning verse
May leade some pilgrim to my toomblesse grave,
Where neither marble monument nor hearse
The passenger's attentive view may crave,
Which honors now the meanest persons have;
But well is me where e'er my ashes lie,
If one teare drop from some religious eie.

Seek'st thou for fame? hee's best that least is knowne.
Or prince's favours? that's no common grant.
Serv'st thou for wealth? a courtier knows his owne.
Or for degree? preferment waxeth scant.
Want'st thou to live? no hell to courtiers want.
O rather yet embrace thy private lot
With honest fame and riches purely got.

Looke how the God of Wisdom marbled stands
Bestowing laurel-wreaths of dignitie
In Delphos Isle, at whose unpartial hands
Hang antique scrolles of gentle herauldrie,
And at his feete ensignes and trophies lie:
Such was my state, whom every man did follow
As living statue of the great Apollo.

If once we fall, we fall Colossus like,
We fall at once like pillars of the sunne;
They that betweene our stride their sailes did strike,
Making us sea-markes where their shippe did runne,
Even they that had by us their treasure wonne,
Rise as we may by moderate degrees,
If once we stoope, they'll bring us on our knees.

Richard Barnfield (1574-1627) studied at Oxford, and while he was yet a young man settled on his estate in Staffordshire. His works are three small volumes of poetry, The Affectionate Shepherd (1594); Cynthia, with Certain Sonnets, and the Legend of Cassandra (1595); and a collection, The Encomion of Lady Pecunia, &c. (1598). He has a large measure of the melodiousness and sonority so strangely common to the Elizabethans; but he is best known from the two pieces believed to be his, printed as by Shakespeare, in the miscellany called The Passionate Pilgrim (see page 257). These pieces—both from his last volume—are the ode, 'As it fell upon a day,' and the sonnet, 'If Musique and sweet Poetrie agree;' and Professor Saintsbury still hints that 'As it fell' is much above Barnfield's usual level and really very like Shakespeare. Grosart (1876) and Arber (1882) in their editions of Barnfield denounce Collier's view that it is really two odes and is by Shakespeare.

As it fell upon a day,
 In the merrie month of May,
 Sitting in a pleasant shade,
 Which a grove of myrtles made;
 Beastes did leape, and birds did sing,
 Trees did grow, and plants did spring;
 Everything did banish mone,
 Save the Nightingale alone;
 She, poor bird, as all forlorne,
 Lean'd her breast up till a thorne,
 And there sung the doleful'st ditty,
 That to heare it was great pitty.
 'Fie, fie, fie,' now would she cry;
 'Teru, teru,' by and by;
 That, to hear her so complaine,
 Scarce I could from teares refraine;
 For her griefes so lively showne
 Made me thinke upon mine owne.
 Ah! (thought I) thou mourn'st in vaine;
 None takes pitty on thy paine:
 Senselesse trees, they cannot heare thee;
 Ruthlesse beares, they will not cheer thee.
 King Pandion, hee is dead;
 All thy friends are lapt in lead;
 All thy fellow-birds doe singe,
 Carelesse of thy sorrowing!

Whilst as fickle Fortune smiled,
 Thou and I were both beguiled.
 Everie one that flatters thee
 Is no friend in miserie.
 Words are easie, like the winde;
 Faithfull friends are hard to finde.
 Everie man will bee thy friend
 Whilst thou hast wherewith to spend;
 But if store of crownes be scant,
 No man will supply thy want.
 If that one be prodigall,
 Bountifull they will him call;
 And with such-like flattering,
 'Pitty but hee were a king.'
 If he be addict to vice,
 Quickly him they will intice;
 If to women hee be bent,
 They have at commaundement;
 But if fortune once doe frowne,
 Then farewell his great renowne!
 They that fawn'd on him before
 Use his company no more.
 Hee that is thy friend indeed,
 Hee will helpe thee in thy neede;
 If thou sorrowe, hee will weepe;
 If thou wake, hee cannot sleepe:
 Thus of everie grieve in heart
 He with thee doth beare a part.
 These are certaine signes to knowe
 Faithfull friend from flatt'ring foe.

Sonnet to R. L.

If Musique and sweet Poetrie agree
 As they must needs (the Sister and the Brother),
 Then must the love be great twixt thee and mee,
 Because thou lov'st the one and I the other.
 Dowland to thee is deare, whose heavenly touch
 Upon the lute doth ravish humane sense.
 Spenser to mee; whose deepe conceit is such
 As passing all conceit, needs no defence.

Thou lov'st to heare the sweete melodious sound
 That Phœbus lute, the Queene of Musique, makes;
 And I in deepe delight am chiefly drownd
 Whenas himselfe to singing he betakes.
 One god is god of both, as poets faigne;
 One knight loves both, and both in thee remaine.

It should be noted that the reference in the ode to Pandion, father of Philomela and Procne, brings in a very unmistakable echo of Spenser. For in the Shepherd's Calendar Cuddy lamented:

And great Augustus long agoe is dead,
 And all the worthies liggens wrapt in lead
 That matter made for poets on to play.

Thomas Campion (1567-1620), physician, musician, and poet, was born at Witham, in Essex, studied at Cambridge and abroad, left Gray's Inn and the law for medicine, and practised as M.D. in London for the rest of his life, but found time to compose much good music and to write four masques and a large number of admirable lyrics. His first publication was a book of Latin epigrams (1595; enlarged, 1619); another was Observations on the Art of Poesie (1602), in which he, a born lyricist, advocated unrhymed verse; and a third was a small treatise on counterpoint. But it is as a writer of masques, and especially of lyrics, that he is best known. Some of his best songs are in his masques; others in a series of song-books or 'Bookes of Ayres,' the first edited by Rosseter in 1601, the third about 1617. The greater number of the best were actually written to music, usually his own, and are admirably singable. He was the contemporary of both Sidney and of Ben Jonson, and, like Jonson, is a connecting-link between Elizabethans and Jacobeans. Noteworthy is it, as Sir E. Gosse pointed out, that he sang before Donne had exercised his masterful and disturbing influence on English poetry. His note is all his own, but in its peculiar combination of gracefulness and unstudied art has been compared with Fletcher's, Carew's, and Herrick's. Herrick evidently knew Campion's verse, and showed this in his own working out of suggestions from Campion's 'Cherry Ripe.'

Now Winter Nights Enlarge.

Now winter nights enlarge
 The number of their houres;
 And clouds their stormes discharge
 Upon the ayrie towres.
 Let now the chimneys blaze
 And cups o'erflow with wine,
 Let well-tun'd words amaze
 With harmonie divine!
 Now yellow waxen lights
 Shall waite on hunny love,
 While youthfull Revels, Masks, and Courtly sights,
 Sleepe's leaden spels remove.

This time doth well dispence
 With lovers' long discourse;
 Much speech hath some defence,
 Though beauty no remorse.
 All doe not all things well;
 Some measures comely tread,

Some knotted Riddles tell,
Some Poems smoothly read.
The Summer hath his joyes,
And Winter his delights;
Though Love and all his pleasures are but toys,
They shorten tedious nights.

Cherry Ripe.

There is a Garden in her face,
Where Roses and white Lillies grow;
A heav'nly paradise is that place,
Wherein all pleasant fruits doe flow.
There Cherries grow which none may buy
Till Cherry ripe themselves do cry.

Those Cherries fayrely doe enclose
Of Orient Pearle a double row;
Which when her lovely laughter showes,
They look like Rose-buds fill'd with snow.
Yet them nor Peere nor Prince can buy
Till Cherry ripe themselves doe cry.

Her Eyes like Angels watch them still;
Her Browes like bended bowes doe stand
Threatning with piercing frownes to kill
All that attempt, with eye or hand,
Those sacred Cherries to come nigh,
Till Cherry ripe themselves do cry.

To Lesbia.

My sweetest Lesbia, let us live and love;
And though the sager sort our deedes reprove,
Let us not way them: heaven's great lampes doe dive
Into their west, and strait again revive;
But soone as once set is our little light,
Then must we sleepe one ever-during night.

If all would lead their lives in love like mee,
Then bloudie swords and armour should not be;
No drum nor trumpet peaceful sleepes should move,
Unles alarme came from the campe of love:
But fooles do live, and wast their little light,
And seeke with paine their ever-during night.

When timely death my life and fortune ends,
Let not my hearse be vext with mourning friends;
But let all lovers, rich in triumph, come
And with sweet pastimes grace my happie tombe:
And, Lesbia, close up thou my little light,
And crown with love my ever-during night.

This poem, like Jonson's 'Come, my Celia' (page 409), is suggested by, rather than imitated from, the Vivamus, mea Lesbia, et Amemus of Catullus. Campion wrote songs of mourning on the death of Prince Henry in 1612, like so many of his contemporaries, but was happier in his Divine and Moral Songs.

The first verse of 'When the god of merrie love' presents a very notable parallel to Burns's autobiographical 'Rantin' Rovin' Robin':

When the god of merrie love
As yet in his cradle lay,
Thus his wither'd nurse did say:
'Thou a wanton boy wilt prove
To deceive the powers above;

For by thy continuall smiling
I see thy power of beguiling.'

In Burns's song it is the 'gossip' who 'keeks in the lufe' of the new-born Robin and foretells his character, especially his devotion to women and his fascination over them.

The best of his masques, performed at Whitehall on Twelfth Night 1606-7 in honour of the marriage of Sir James Hay, is usually called 'The Lord Hayes Masque.' 'The Lord's Masque' celebrated in 1613 the more notable marriage of the Elector Palatine and the Princess Elizabeth. A third (1613) was performed before the queen at Caversham House on a progress to Bath; the fourth had for its occasion the ill-omened wedding of Somerset and his paramour, the divorced and infamous Countess of Essex (also 1613).

Bullen's edition (1889) renewed interest in Campion, long neglected. P. Vivian edited the Complete Works (1909); E. H. Fellowes edited Songs from Rosseter's Book of Airs (1922). See T. Macdonagh's Campion and the Art of English Poetry (1913).

Ben Jonson.

Ben Jonson, the most conspicuous and accomplished dramatist after Shakespeare, was rarely called Benjamin in his own days, and never has been since. Thomas Heywood said in 1635:

And Jonson, though his learned pen
Was dipt in Castaly, is still but Ben.

And of the sixty Johnsons in the Dictionary of National Biography he is, with the doubtful exception of a sixteenth-century Latin poet, the only one who preferred the contracted form of the family name. He was, according to his own account, the grandson of a gentleman from Carlisle—originally, he believed, from Annandale—whose son (Ben's father) lost his estate and became a minister in Westminster. Ben, whose early years were full of hardship and vicissitude, was born some nine years after Shakespeare—in 1572-73. His father died a month before Ben's birth, and his mother marrying again, Ben was brought from Westminster School and put to the bricklayer's craft of his stepfather. Disliking the trade, he enlisted as a soldier and served in the Low Countries. He challenged and killed one of the enemy in single combat, in the view of both armies, and ever after reverted with pride to his conduct as a soldier. Fuller says he entered St John's College, Cambridge; but there is no evidence that either before or after his military escapade he was enrolled of the university—for, about the age of twenty, he is found married, and an actor in London. He made his début at a low theatre near Clerkenwell, and, as his opponents afterwards reminded him, failed completely as an actor. His wife was 'virtuous, but a shrew,' and they lived apart for a number of years. None of the children survived their father. As early as 1595 he was engaged in writing for the stage, either by himself or conjointly with others. He quarrelled with another performer, killed his antagonist in some kind of fight or duel, and being imprisoned, pled guilty, and was released through benefit of clergy. At this time he became a Roman Catholic, and did not return to the Anglican communion for twelve years. His Every Man in his Humour was brought out at the Globe Theatre in 1598, apparently just before his duel, which took place on 22nd September. Shakespeare, who was one of the performers, had produced some of his finest comedies by this time, but Jonson was no imitator of his great rival. Jonson opened a new line in the drama: he felt his strength, and the public cheered him on with its plaudits. Queen Elizabeth patronised the new poet, and ever afterwards he was 'a man of mark and likelihood.' In 1599 appeared Every Man out of his Humour, less notable than its predecessor. Cynthia's Revels and the Poetaster followed, and the fierce rivalry and contention which clouded Jonson's after-life was fairly begun. He had attacked Marston and Dekker, two of his brother-dramatists, in these plays (see page 423). Dekker replied with spirit in his Satiromastix, and Ben was silent for two years, 'living upon one Townsend, and scorning the world,' as is recorded in the diary of a contemporary. In 1603 he tried 'if tragedy had a more kind aspect,' and produced his classical drama Sejanus. Shortly after the accession of King James, a comedy called Eastward Hoe was written conjointly by Jonson, Chapman, and Marston. Some passages in this piece reflected on the Scottish nation; and the matter was represented to the king by one of his courtiers—Sir James Murray—in so strong a light that the authors were thrown into prison, and threatened with the loss of their ears and noses. They were not tried; and when Ben was set at liberty he gave an entertainment to his friends—Selden and Camden being of the number. His mother was present on this joyous occasion, and was reported to have produced a paper of poison which she intended to give her son in his liquor, rather than that he should submit to personal mutilation and disgrace, and another dose which she meant afterwards to have taken herself. Jonson's own conduct in this affair was spirited. He had no considerable share in the composition of the piece, and was, besides, in such favour that he would not have been molested; 'but this did not satisfy him,' says Gifford; 'and he, therefore, with a high sense of honour, voluntarily accompanied his two friends to prison, determined to share their fate.' We cannot now be certain what precisely was the deadly satire that moved the patriotic indignation of James; it was doubtless softened before publication; but in some copies of Eastward Hoe (1605) there is a passage in which the Scots are said to be 'dispersed over the face of the whole earth;' and the dramatist sarcastically adds: 'But as for them, there are no greater friends to Englishmen and England, when they are out on't, in the world, than they are; and, for my part, I would a hundred thousand of them were there [i.e. had been transported to Virginia], for we are all one countrymen now, you know, and we should find ten times more comfort of them there than we do here.' The offended nationality of James must have been laid to rest by subsequent adulation in court-masques, in which Jonson eulogised the conceited monarch as destined to raise the glory of England higher than Elizabeth! Jonson's three great comedies, Volpone, or the Fox; Epicæne, or the Silent Woman; and The Alchemist, were his next serious labours; his second classical tragedy, Catiline, appeared in 1611. His fame had now reached its zenith; but he produced several other comedies and a vast number of masques, learned pageants, and court entertainments ere his star began visibly to decline. In 1618 he made a journey on foot to Scotland, where he had many friends. He was well received by the Scottish gentry, wrote a poem on Edinburgh (now lost), and meditated a pastoral or fisher play with its scene laid on Loch Lomond—which he did not visit but had described to him. The last of his visits was made to Drummond of Hawthornden, with whom he lived three weeks; and Drummond kept notes of his conversation, which were long after communicated to the world. Drummond entered in his journal the following very candid friend's character of Ben himself:

'He is a great lover and praiser of himself; a contemner and scorner of others; given rather to lose a friend than a jest; jealous of every word and action of those about him, especially after drink, which is one of the elements in which he liveth; a dissembler of ill parts which reign in him; a bragger of some good that he wanteth; thinketh nothing well but what either he himself or some of his friends and countrymen hath said or done; he is passionately kind and angry; careless either to gain or keep; vindictive, but if well answered, at himself; for any religion, as being versed in both; interpreteth best sayings and deeds often to the worst; oppressed with fantasy, which hath ever mastered his reason, a general disease in many poets.'

This character is far from flattering, and though doubtless unconsciously surcharged (owing to the reclusive habits and staid demeanour of Drummond), is probably substantially correct. Inured to hardships and to a free, boisterous life in his early days, Jonson contracted a marked roughness of manner and habits of intemperance. Priding himself immoderately on his classical acquirements, he was apt to slight and condemn his less learned associates; he was, and shows himself in his works, somewhat provokingly self-complacent; while the conflict between his limited means and his love of social pleasures rendered him severe and saturnine in temper. Whatever he did was done with labour, and hence was highly appraised by himself. His contemporaries seemed fond of mortifying his pride, and he was often at war with actors and authors. With the celebrated architect, Inigo Jones, who was joined with him in the management of the court-masques, Jonson waged a long and bitter feud. The old story that he was so jealous of Shakespeare as to be 'malignant' towards him it is impossible to reconcile with his own words; but it had been constantly reaffirmed, with the support of proofs from words and allusions in the plays perverted to that sense, until Gifford annihilated the contention by an examination of the so-called 'proofs.' When his better nature prevailed, Jonson was capable of a generous warmth of friendship, and of just discrimination of genius and character.

By James I. Jonson was appointed court-poet or laureate, and a little later he seems to have refused the honour of knighthood. His literary reputation, his love of conviviality, and his colloquial powers now made his society much courted, and he became the centre of a band of wits. Sir Walter Raleigh had founded a club, known to all posterity as the Mermaid Club, at which Jonson, Shakespeare, Beaumont and Fletcher, and other poets had exercised themselves with 'wit-combats' more sparkling than their wine. Fuller says: 'Many were the wit-combats betwixt Shakespeare and Ben Jonson, which two I behold like a Spanish great galleon and an English man-of-war: Master Jonson, like the former, was built far higher in learning; solid, but slow in his performances. Shakespeare, with the English man-of-war, lesser in bulk, but lighter in sailing, could turn with all tides, tack about and take advantage of all winds, by the quickness of his wit and invention.' Another of their haunts was the Falcon Tavern, near the theatre in Bankside, Southwark. This society was now disbanded, but in a circle of younger contemporaries Jonson was a kind of venerated chief, a literary dictator, a Great Cham of the world of wits. The younger poets were mostly his 'sons,' or were 'sealed of the tribe of Ben'—Carew, Shackerley Marmion, Brome, Herrick, Cleveland, Suckling, and many others. The later days of Jonson were dark and painful. Attacks of palsy confined him to his house, and his necessities compelled him to write for the stage when his pen had lost its vigour and his work lacked the charm of novelty. In 1629 he produced his comedy the New Inn, which was damned by the audience. The king sent him a present of £100, and raised his laureate pension to the same sum per annum, adding a yearly tierce of Canary. Next year, however, we find Jonson, in an Epistle Mendicant, soliciting assistance from the Lord-Treasurer. He continued writing to the last. Dryden styled the later works of Jonson his dotages; some are certainly unworthy of him, but the Sad Shepherd, which he left unfinished, exhibits the poetical spontaneity of a youthful creation. He died on the 6th of August 1637, and was buried in the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey. The political confusions that followed prevented the erection of a sumptuous monument; but on the slab which covers his remains a visitor subsequently caused to be engraved the memorable epitaph, 'O RARE BEN JONSON!'

Jonson founded a style of regular English comedy, massive, of permanent interest, yet not very attractive in its materials. His works consist of about fifty dramatic pieces, but by far the greater part are masques and interludes. His principal comedies are four in number—Every Man in his Humour, Volpone, the Silent Woman, and the Alchemist. After them come Bartholomew Fair, The Devil is an Ass, and The Staple of News. Jonson came forward with a conscious and deliberate intention—fully indicated in the

Prologue to Every Man in his Humour—to revolutionise English dramatic art. His work towards the effectual carrying out of his scheme is conscious, aggressive, unmistakable. Unlike Shakespeare, a more conspicuously original genius, he did not, could not, sympathetically enter into other men's labours. He had formed a definite theory of his art, and to that he resolutely adhered, deleting as soon as might be the contributions by others to Sejanus and any other of his plays. He disapproves the rhetoric of the Senecan plays; he disapproves even more the crudeness of the popular tragedy and the popular comedy. Strong—too strong—delineation of character is the most striking feature in Jonson's comedies, many of which might be called 'psychological dramas.' The voluptuous Volpone is drawn with great breadth and freedom; and generally his portraits of eccentric characters—men in whom some peculiarity or humour, as he called it, has grown to an egregious excess—are impressive as well as ludicrous. His scenes and characters show the labour of the artist, of the artist with rich resources; an acute and vigorous intellect; great knowledge of life, down to its lowest haunts; wit, a wealth of lofty declamation, and a power of dramatising his knowledge and observation with singular skill and effect. He was one of the most learned men of his time: Sejanus and Catiline show conscientious and scholarly research, as well as dramatic power and skilful characterisation; but his pedantry is often misplaced and even ridiculous. He frequently denounces the devices of some contemporaries as bad taste and base pandering to love of popularity. Cynthia's Revels, at once allegorical and satirical, amorphous and tedious, is an appeal against prevailing bad taste to the principles of taste and criticism. His comic theatre is a gallery of strange, clever, original portraits, powerfully drawn and skilfully disposed, but many of them repulsive in expression or so exaggerated as to look like caricatures or libels on humanity. We have little deep passion or winning tenderness to link the beings of his drama with those we love or admire, or to make us sympathise with them as actual men and women. Alike in his satire and his comedy Ben Jonson deals too often with figures who are neither flesh and blood nor men of like passions with ourselves, but with personified abstractions, single ideas half-incarnated, visualised conceptions illustrating but one exaggerated eccentricity; who are accordingly not even types or conventional characters. There is the mouthing braggadocio who does nothing but mouth; the silly toady who is naught else in the world; the doting husband who is for ever doting on a senseless, exacting wife, and dotes to an extent that is wholly incredible. Then again and again we have the courtier who is a mere abject hanger-on, the fop who is little but the framework for fine clothes, and the foolisher fop who can only imitate the other fops. It should be added, however, that braggadocios, dotards, fops, and toadies can all talk—talk copiously, eloquently, learnedly, forcibly, and wittily, though in the end they become tiresome, inasmuch as there is too often next to no intelligible plot. Amidst the flood of clever talk, the play does not seem to advance; and one is irritated to find in a new play the old characters repeating themselves under other names: Bobadill of Every Man reappears with little qualification as Tucca in the Poetaster, and Albius is Deliro reproduced rather to the general confusion. But when the great artist escapes entirely from his elaborate wit and personified humours into the region of fancy—as in the lyrical passages of Cynthia and the whole pastoral of the Sad Shepherd—we are struck with the contrast it exhibits to his ordinary manner. He thus presents two natures: one hard, rugged, gross, and sarcastic—'a mountain belly and a rocky face,' as he described his own person; the other airy, fanciful, and graceful, as if its possessor had never combated with the world and its wild passions, but nursed his intellect and fancy in poetical seclusion and contemplation.

Every Man in his Humour has a place of its own in dramatic literature; Sir A. W. Ward regards it as 'the first important comedy of character produced on the English stage,' in which, with a too slight plot, Jonson gives us a curiously interesting group of personages marked out by their eccentricities, peculiarities, or 'humours.' Every Man out of his Humour, an over-elaborate sequel, works out the theory that every humour is curable by its own excess. 'Humour' he thus defines for himself:

In every human body
The choler, melancholy, phlegm and blood,
By reason that they flow continually
In some one part and are not continent,
Receive the name of humours. Now thus far
It may by metaphor apply itself
Unto the general disposition:
As when some one peculiar quality
Doth so possess a man that it doth draw
All his effects, his spirits, and his powers.
In their confluxions all to run one way,
This may be truly said to be a humour.

Volpone is a fierce satire against toadies, parasites, and false friends, as also against the magnificent but senseless extravagance of such characters as Sir Epicure Mammon. The Alchemist exposes gross imposture encouraged by superstition and credulity. Coleridge calls Epicæne, or the Silent Woman, 'the most entertaining of Jonson's comedies;' Dryden discussed it at length as the best of English comedies. As Sir A. W. Ward says, it is rather a farce on the incredible plot that a peace-loving misogynist marries, for a very silent woman, an intolerably talkative person (who finally turns out a boy). Bartholomew Fair is a unique picture, full of gusto and rich dramatic humour, of coarse but characteristic contemporary manners—a picture that may well have been known to Bunyan and have given him hints for his Vanity Fair; this, though the most notable thing in the extraordinary panorama of the historic London festival, is a mirth-provoking caricature of a canting Puritan. Some account Every Man in his Humour Jonson's masterpiece, some the Alchemist. The New Inn, though it failed on the stage, contains some of its author's most eloquent writing.

The Fall of Catiline.

Petrus. The straits and needs of Catiline being such
As he must fight with one of the two armies
That then had near inclosed him, it pleased Fate
To make us the object of his desperate choice,
Wherein the danger almost poised the honour:
And as he rose, the day grew black with him,
And Fate descended nearer to the earth,
As if she meant to hide the name of things
Under her wings, and make the world her quarry.
At this we roused, lest one small minute's stay
Had left it to be inquired what Rome was;
And (as we ought) armed in the confidence
Of our great cause, in form of battle stood,
Whilst Catiline came on, not with the face
Of any man, but of a public ruin:
His countenance was a civil war itself;
And all his host had, standing in their looks,
The paleness of the death that was to come;
Yet cried they out like vultures, and urged on,
As if they would precipitate our fates.
Nor stayed we longer for them, but himself
Struck the first stroke, and with it fled a life,
Which cut, it seemed a narrow neck of land
Had broke between two mighty seas, and either
Flowed into other; for so did the slaughter;
And whirled about, as when two violent tides
Meet and not yield. The Furies stood on hills,
Circling the place, and trembling to see men
Do more than they; whilst Piety left the field,
Grieved for that side, that in so bad a cause
They knew not what a crime their valour was.
The Sun stood still, and was, behind the cloud
The battle made, seen sweating, to drive up
His frightened horse, whom still the noise drove backward:
And now had fierce Enyo, like a flame, goddess of war
Consumed all it could reach, and then itself,
Had not the fortune of the commonwealth
Come, Pallas-like, to every Roman thought;
Which Catiline seeing, and that now his troops
Covered the earth they'd fought on with their trunks,
Ambitious of great fame, to crown his ill,
Collected all his fury, and ran in—
Armed with a glory high as his despair—
Into our battle, like a Libyan lion
Upon his hunters, scornful of our weapons,
Careless of wounds, plucking down lives about him,
Till he had circled in himself with Death:
Then fell he too, t' embrace it where it lay.
And as in that rebellion 'gainst the gods,
Minerva holding forth Medusa's head,
One of the giant brethren felt himself
Grow marble at the killing sight; and now,
Almost made stone, began to inquire what flint,

What rock it was that crept through all his limbs;
And, ere he could think more, was that he feared:
So Catiline, at the sight of Rome in us,
Became his tomb; yet did his look retain
Some of his fierceness, and his hands still moved,
As if he laboured yet to grasp the state
With those rebellious parts.

Cato. A brave bad death!
Had this been honest now, and for his country,
As 'twas against it, who had e'er fall'n greater?

(Catiline, Act v. sc. vi.)

On Love—from the 'New Inn.'

LOVEL and HOST of the New Inn.

Lovel. There is no life on earth but being in love!
There are no studies, no delights, no business,
No intercourse, or trade of sense, or soul,
But what is love! I was the laziest creature
The most unprofitable sign of nothing,
The veriest drone, and slept away my life
Beyond the dormouse, till I was in love!
And now I can outwake the nightingale,
Outwatch an usurer, and outwalk him too,
Stalk like a ghost that haunted 'bout a treasure;
And all that phant'sied treasure, it is love!

Host. But is your name Love-ill, sir, or Love-well?
I would know that.

Lov. I do not know 't myself
Whether it is. But it is love hath been
The hereditary passion of our house,
My gentle host, and, as I guess, my friend;
The truth is, I have loved this lady long,
And impotently, with desire enough,
But no success: for I have still forborne
To express it in my person to her.

Host. How then?

Lov. I have sent her toys, verses, and anagrams,
Trials of wit, mere trifles she has commended,
But knew not whence they came, nor could she guess.

Host. This was a pretty riddling way of wooing!

Lov. I oft have been too in her company,
And looked upon her a whole day, admired her,
Loved her, and did not tell her so; loved still, [sighed;
Looked still, and loved; and loved, and looked, and
But, as a man neglected, I came off,
And unregarded.

Host. Could you blame her, sir,
When you were silent, and not said a word?

Lov. Oh, but I loved the more; and she might read it Best in my silence, had she been—

Host. As melancholic

As you are! Pray you, why would you stand mute, sir?

Lov. O thereon hangs a history, mine host.
Did you e'er know or hear of the Lord Beaufort,
Who served so bravely in France? I was his page,
And, ere he died, his friend: I followed him
First in the wars, and in the times of peace
I waited on his studies; which were right.
He had no Arthurs, nor no Rosicleers,
No Knights of the Sun, nor Amadis de Gauls,
Primallions, Pantagruels, public nothings;
Abortives of the fabulous dark cloister,
Sent out to poison courts, and infest manners:
But great Achilles', Agamemnon's acts,
Sage Nestor's counsels, and Ulysses' sleights,
Tydides' fortitude, as Homer wrought them

In his immortal phant'sy, for examples
Of the heroic virtue. Or as Virgil,
That master of the Epic poem, limned
Pious Æneas, his religious prince,
Bearing his aged parent on his shoulders,
Rapt from the flames of Troy, with his young son :
And these he brought to practice and to use.
He gave me first my breeding, I acknowledge,
Then showered his bounties on me, like the Hours,
That open-handed sit upon the clouds,
And press the liberality of Heaven
Down to the laps of thankful men ! But then,
The trust committed to me at his death
Was above all, and left so strong a tie
On all my powers, as Time shall not dissolve,
Till it dissolve itself, and bury all !
The care of his brave heir and only son :
Who, being a virtuous, sweet, young, hopeful lord,
Hath cast his first affections on this lady.
And though I know, and may presume her such,
As out of humour, will return no love,
And therefore might indifferently be made
The courting stock for all to practise on,
As she doth practise on us all to scorn :
Yet out of a religion to my charge,
And debt professed, I have made a self-decree,
Ne'er to express my person, though my passion
Burn me to cinders. (From Act I. sc. i.)

From 'Every Man in his Humour.'—A Fencing Lesson from Bobadill.

[The shabby but vainglorious Bobadill is visited in his mean lodging by the simpleton Matthew.]

Matthew. Save you, sir ; save you, captain.

Bobadill. Gentle Master Matthew ! Is it you, sir ? Please you to sit down.

Mat. Thank you, good captain ; you may see I am somewhat audacious.

Bob. Not so, sir. I was requested to supper last night by a sort of gallants, where you were wished for, and drunk to, I assure you.

Mat. Vouchsafe me, by whom, good captain ?

Bob. Marry, by young Wellbred and others.—Why, hostess, a stool here for this gentleman.

Mat. No haste, sir ; 'tis very well.

Bob. Body o' me !—it was so late ere we parted last night, I can scarce open my eyes yet ; I was but new risen, as you came. How passes the day abroad, sir ?—you can tell.

Mat. Faith, some half hour to seven. Now, trust me, you have an exceeding fine lodging here, very neat and private !

Bob. Ay, sir. Sit down, I pray you. Master Matthew, in any case, possess no gentleman of our acquaintance with notice of my lodging.

Mat. Who ! I, sir ?—no.

Bob. Not that I need to care who know it, for the cabin is convenient, but in regard I would not be too popular, and generally visited as some are.

Mat. True, captain ; I conceive you.

Bob. For, do you see, sir, by the heart of valour in me, except it be to some peculiar and choice spirits, to whom I am extraordinarily engaged, as yourself, or so, I could not extend thus far.

Mat. O Lord, sir ! I resolve so.

Bob. I confess I love a cleanly and quiet privacy, above all the tumult and roar of fortune. What new book ha' you there ? What ! 'Go by, Hieronymo !'

Mat. Ay ; did you ever see it acted ? Is't not well penned ?

Bob. Well penned ! I would fain see all the poets of these times pen such another play as that was !—they'll prate and swagger, and keep a stir of art and devices, when (as I am a gentleman), read 'em, they are the most shallow, pitiful, barren fellows that live upon the face of the earth again. [While MATTHEW reads, BOBADILL makes himself ready.]

Mat. Indeed ; here are a number of fine speeches in this book. 'O eyes, no eyes, but fountains fraught with tears !' There's a conceit !—fountains fraught with tears ! 'O life, no life, but lively form of death !' another. 'O world, no world, but mass of public wrongs !' a third. 'Confused and filled with murder and misdeeds !' a fourth. O the Muses ! Is't not excellent ? Is't not simply the best that ever you heard, captain ? Ha ! how do you like it ?

Bob. 'Tis good.

Mat. 'To thee, the purest object to my sense,
The most refined essence heaven covers,
Send I these lines, wherein I do commence
The happy state of turtle-billing lovers.
If they prove rough, unpolished, harsh, and rude,
Haste made the waste. Thus mildly I conclude.'

Bob. Nay, proceed, proceed. Where's this ?

Mat. This, sir ? a toy o' mine own, in my nonage ; the infancy of my Muses. But when will you come and see my study ? Good faith, I can shew you some very good things I have done of late.—That boot becomes your leg passing well, captain, methinks.

Bob. So, so ; it's the fashion gentlemen now use.

Mat. Troth, captain, and now you speak o' the fashion, Master Wellbred's elder brother and I are fallen out exceedingly. This other day, I happened to enter into some discourse of a hanger, which, I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship, was most peremptory beautiful and gentleman-like ; yet he condemned and cried it down for the most pied and ridiculous that ever he saw.

Bob. Squire Downright, the half-brother, was't not ?

Mat. Ay, sir, he.

Bob. Hang him, rook ! he ! why, he has no more judgment than a malt-horse. By St George, I wonder you'd lose a thought upon such an animal ; the most peremptory absurd clown of Christendom, this day, he is holden. I protest to you, as I am a gentleman and a soldier, I ne'er changed words with his like. By his discourse, he should eat nothing but hay : he was born for the manger, pannier, or pack-saddle ! He has not so much as a good phrase in his belly, but all old iron and rusty proverbs !—a good commodity for some smith to make hobnails of.

Mat. Ay, and he thinks to carry it away with his manhood still, where he comes : he brags he will gi' me the bastinado, as I hear.

Bob. How ? he the bastinado ? How came he by that word, trow ?

Mat. Nay, indeed, he said cudgel me ; I termed it so for my more grace.

Bob. That may be, for I was sure it was none of his word. But when ? when said he so ?

Mat. Faith, yesterday, they say ; a young gallant, a friend of mine, told me so.

Bob. By the foot of Pharaoh, an 'twere my case now, I should send him a chartel presently. The bastinado! A most proper and sufficient dependence, warranted by the great Caranza. Come hither; you shall chartel him; I'll shew you a trick or two, you shall kill him with at pleasure; the first stoccata, if you will, by this air.

Mat. Indeed; you have absolute knowledge i' the mystery, I have heard, sir.

Bob. Of whom?—of whom ha' you heard it, I beseech you?

Mat. Troth, I have heard it spoken of divers, that you have very rare, and un-in-one-breath-utter-able skill, sir.

Bob. By Heaven! no, not I; no skill i' the earth; some small rudiments i' the science, as to know my time, distance, or so: I have profest it more for noblemen and gentlemen's use than mine own practice, I assure you.—Hostess, accommodate us with another bed-staff here quickly: lend us another bed-staff: the woman does not understand the words of action.—Look you, sir, exalt not your point above this state, at any hand, and let your poniard maintain your defence, thus (Give it the gentleman, and leave us); so, sir. Come on. O twine your body more about, that you may fall to a more sweet, comely, gentleman-like guard; so, indifferent: hollow your body more, sir, thus; now, stand fast o' your left leg, note your distance, keep your due proportion of time. Oh, you disorder your point most irregularly!

Mat. How is the bearing of it now, sir?

Bob. Oh, out of measure ill: a well-experienced hand would pass upon you at pleasure.

Mat. How mean you, sir, pass upon me?

Bob. Why, thus, sir (make a thrust at me)—[MASTER MATTHEW pushes at BOBADILL.]; come in upon the answer, control your point, and make a full career at the body; the best practised gallants of the time name it the passado; a most desperate thrust, believe it!

Mat. Well, come, sir.

Bob. Why, you do not manage your weapon with any facility or grace to invite me! I have no spirit to play with you; your dearth of judgment renders you tedious.

Mat. But one venue, sir.

Bob. Venue! fie; most gross denomination as ever I heard. Oh, the 'stoccata,' while you live, sir, note that. Come, put on your cloak, and we'll go to some private place where you are acquainted—some tavern or so—and have a bit. I'll send for one of these fencers, and he shall breathe you, by my direction, and then I will teach you your trick; you shall kill him with it at the first, if you please. Why, I will learn you by the true judgment of the eye, hand, and foot, to control any enemy's point i' the world. Should your adversary confront you with a pistol, 'twere nothing, by this hand; you should, by the same rule, control his bullet, in a line, except it were hail-shot, and spread.—What money ha' you about you, Master Matthew?

Mat. Faith, I ha' not past a two shillings, or so.

Bob. 'Tis somewhat with the least; but come; we will have a bunch of radish, and salt to taste our wine, and a pipe of tobacco, to close the orifice of the stomach; and then we'll call upon young Wellbred: perhaps we shall meet the Corydon his brother there, and put him to the question.

(From Act I. sc. iv.)

'Go by, Hieronymo' is one of Jonson's many hits at Kyd's Spanish Tragedy (see page 319). Caranza was a sixteenth-century writer on the duel. During Bobadill's speech Tib enters, goes out, re-enters, and retires again.

Bobadill on Disarmament.

Bobadill. I will tell you, sir, by the way of private, and under seal, I am a gentleman, and live here obscure, and to myself; but were I known to her Majesty and the Lords (observe me), I would undertake, upon this poor head and life, for the public benefit of the state, not only to spare the entire lives of her subjects in general, but to save the one-half, nay, three parts of her yearly charge in holding war, and against what enemy soever. And how would I do it, think you?

Knowell. Nay, I know not, nor can I conceive.

Bob. Why, thus, sir. I would select nineteen more, to myself, throughout the land; gentlemen they should be of good spirit, strong and able constitution; I would choose them by an instinct, a character that I have: and I would teach these nineteen the special rules, as your punto, your reverso, your stoccata, your imbroggato, your passado, your montanto; till they could all play very near, or altogether as well as myself. This done, say the enemy were forty thousand strong, we twenty would come into the field the tenth of March, or thereabouts; and we would challenge twenty of the enemy; they could not in their honour refuse us; well, we would kill them: challenge twenty more, kill them; twenty more, kill them; twenty more, kill them too; and thus would we kill every man his twenty a day, that's twenty score; twenty score, that's two hundred; two hundred a day, five days a thousand; forty thousand; forty times five, five times forty, two hundred days kills them all up by computation. And this will I venture my poor gentleman-like carcass to perform, provided there be no treason practised upon us, by fair and discreet manhood; that is, civilly by the sword.

(From Act IV. sc. v.)

Advice to a Reckless Youth.

What would I have you do? I'll tell you, kinsman:
Learn to be wise, and practise how to thrive;
That would I have you do; and not to spend
Your coin on every bauble that you fancy,
Or every foolish brain that humours you.
I would not have you to invade each place,
Nor thrust yourself on all societies,
Till men's affections, or your own desert,
Should worthily invite you to your rank.
He that is so respectless in his courses,
Oft sells his reputation at cheap market.
Nor would I you should melt away yourself
In flashing bravery, lest, while you affect
To make a blaze of gentry to the world,
A little puff of scorn extinguish it,
And you be left like an unsavoury snuff,
Whose property is only to offend.
I'd ha' you sober, and contain yourself;
Not that your sail be bigger than your boat;
But moderate your expenses now (at first)
As you may keep the same proportion still.
Nor stand so much on your gentility,
Which is an airy and mere borrowed thing,
From dead men's dust and bones; and none of yours,
Except you make or hold it.

(From Act I. sc. i.)

From 'The Alchemist.'

Sir Epicure Mammon. Come on, sir. Now you set your foot on shore

In Novo Orbe. Here's the rich Peru:

And there within, sir, are the golden mines,
Great Solomon's Ophir! He was sailing to 't
Three years, but we have reached it in ten months.
This is the day wherein to all my friends
I will pronounce the happy word, Be rich.
This day you shall be spectatissimi.
You shall no more deal with the hollow die
Or the frail card. No more be at charge of keeping
The livery punk for the young heir, that must Seal at all hours in his shirt. No more,
If he deny, ha' him beaten to 't, as he is
That brings him the commodity. No more
Shall thirst of satin, or the covetous hunger
Of velvet entrails for a rude-spun cloak
To be displayed at Madam Augusta's, make
The sons of Sword and Hazard fall before
The golden calf, and on their knees whole nights
Commit idolatry with wine and trumpets;
Or go a-feasting after drum and ensign.
No more of this. You shall start up young viceroys,
And have your punks and punketees, my Surly:
And unto thee I speak it first, Be rich.—
Where is my Subtle there? within, ho!

Face (from within). Sir, he'll come to you by and by.

Mam. That's his fire-drake,
His Lungs, his Zephyrus, he that puffs his coals
Till he firke Nature up in her own centre.
You are not faithful, sir. This night I'll change
All that is metal in thy house to gold:
And early in the morning will I send
To all the plumbers and the pewterers,
And buy their tin and lead up; and to Lothbury,
For all the copper.

Surly. What, and turn that too?

Mam. Yes, and I'll purchase Devonshire and Cornwall,
And make them perfect Indies! You admire now?

Sur. No, faith. [medicine—

Mam. But when you see the effects of the great
Of which one part projected on a hundred
Of Mercury, or Venus, or the Moon,
Shall turn it to as many of the Sun,
Nay, to a thousand, so ad infinitum—
You will believe me.

Sur. Yes, when I see't, I will. . . .

Mam. Ha! why,
Do you think I fable with you? I assure you,
He that has once the flower of the Sun,
The perfect Ruby, which we call Elixir,
Not only can do that, but by its virtue
Can confer honour, love, respect, long life,
Give safety, valour, yea, and victory,
To whom he will. In eight-and-twenty days
I'll make an old man of fourscore a child.

Sur. No doubt; he's that already.

Mam. Nay, I mean,
Restore his years, renew him like an eagle,
To the fifth age; make him get sons and daughters,
Young giants, as our philosophers have done—
The ancient patriarchs afore the flood—
By taking, once a week, on a knife's point,
The quantity of a grain of mustard of it,
Become stout Marses, and beget young Cupids. [you,

Sur. The decayed vestals of Pickt-hatch would thank
That keep the fire alive there.

Mam. 'Tis the secret
Of nature naturized 'gainst all infections,

Cures all diseases, coming of all causes;
A month's grief in a day; a year's in twelve;
And of what age soever, in a month:
Past all the doses of your drugging doctors.
I'll undertake withal to fright the plague
Out o' the kingdom in three months.

Sur. And I'll
Be bound the players shall sing your praises, then,
Without their poets.

Mam. Sir, I'll do 't. Meantime,
I'll give away so much unto my man,
Shall serve the whole city with preservative
Weekly; each house his dose, and at the rate—

Sur. As he that built the Water-work does with water!

Mam. You are incredulous.

Sur. Faith, I have a humour,
I would not willingly be gulled. Your Stone
Cannot transmute me.

Mam. Pertinax [my] Surly,
Will you believe antiquity? records?
I'll shew you a book, where Moses, and his sister,
And Solomon, have written of the art;
Ay, and a treatise penned by Adam.

Sur. How?

Mam. Of the Philosopher's Stone, and in High Dutch.

Sur. Did Adam write, sir, in High Dutch?

Mam. He did;
Which proves it was the primitive tongue.

Sur. What paper?

Mam. On cedar-board.

Sur. O that, indeed, they say,
Will last 'gainst worms.

Mam. 'Tis like your Irish wood
'Gainst cobwebs. I have a piece of Jason's fleece too,

Which was no other than a book of Alchemy,
Writ in large sheepskin, a good fat rain-vellum.
Such was Pythagoras' thigh, Pandora's tub,
And all that fable of Medea's charms,
The manner of our work: the bulls, our furnace,
Still breathing fire: our argent-vive, the Dragon:
The Dragon's teeth, Mercury sublimate,
That keeps the whiteness, hardness, and the biting:
And they are gathered into Jason's helm
(Th' alembic), and then sowed in Mars his field,
And thence sublimed so often, till they are fixed.
Both this, the Hesperian garden, Cadmus' story,
Jove's shower, the boon of Midas, Argus' eyes,
Boccace his Demogorgon, thousands more,
All abstract riddles of our Stone. (From Act II. sc. i.)

The Demogorgon, a primordial deity, is described in Boccaccio's Genealogia Deorum.

In 1616 Ben Jonson collected the plays he had then written, adding at the same time a book of epigrams and a number of poems, which he entitled The Forest and Underwoods. The whole were comprised in one folio volume, which Jonson dignified with the title of his Works, a circumstance which exposed him to the ridicule of some of his contemporaries. He wrote many elegies, epistles, love poems, epigrams, and epitaphs; as a song writer he had few equals. He grafted a classic grace and musical expression on parts of his masques and interludes which could hardly have been expected from his massive and ponderous hand. In some of his songs he equals Carew and Herrick in picturesque images, and in portraying the fascinations of love. A taste for nature is strongly displayed in his fine lines on Penshurst, that ancient seat of the Sidneys. His prose, especially the Discoveries, is distinguished by admirable judgment, critical insight, and force and purity of diction.

To Celia—from 'The Forest.'

Drink to me only with thine eyes,
And I will pledge with mine ;
Or leave a kiss but in the cup,
And I'll not look for wine.
The thirst that from the soul doth rise,
Doth ask a drink divine ;
But might I of Jove's nectar sup,
I would not change for thine.

I sent thee late a rosy wreath,
Not so much honouring thee,
As giving it a hope that there
It could not withered be.
But thou thereon didst only breathe,
And sent'st it back to me ;
Since when, it grows, and smells, I swear,
Not of itself, but thee.

Richard Cumberland was surprised to find that Jonson's famous song was based on the Greek of Philostratus ; and Gifford was surprised at his surprise. But the fact is seldom sufficiently remembered ; and nobody who does not look up the Greek will believe how close the noble English lyric is to the florid prose of the Greek sophist, Philostratus of Lemnos, who lived about 170-250 A.D. He is probably best known in England by his Life of Apollonius of Tyana, part of which was translated and annotated by Charles Blount, the freethinker, in 1680, and issued as a freethinking attack on Christianity. Other works were Lives of the Sophists, sixty-four Imagines, a Heroicus, and twenty-four epistles, mostly amatory and full of ingenious but strained conceits. These letters, mostly quite short, are variously arranged ; but in three of the epistles (Nos. 24, 30, and 31 in some old editions ; in Kayser's ed., Teubner, 1870-71, Nos. 33, 2, and 46) occur the following sentences, providing the ideas of the first half of the first verse, and of both halves of verse 2 (there is no close parallel for the second part of verse 1) :

Ἐμοὶ δὲ μόνους πρόσωπε τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς, ὃν καὶ ὁ Ζεὺς γινώσκωνος οἶνοχόον παραστήσεται. εἰ δὲ βούλει, τὸν μὲν οἶνον μὴ παραπόλλαι, μόνου δὲ ἱμβαλοῦσα ὕδατος καὶ τοῖς χεῖλεσι προσφέρουσα πλῆρου φιλημάτων τὸ ἔκπωμα καὶ οὕτως δίδου τοῖς δισμῖνοις.

Πίσσωμφά σοι στίφανον βόθων, οὐ δὲ τιμῶν, καὶ τοῦτο μὲν γὰρ, ἀλλ' αὐτοῖς τι χαριζόμενος τοῖς βόθοις, ἵνα μὴ μαρνήσῃ.

εἰ δὲ βούλει τι φίλον χαριῶσθαι, τὰ λείψαντα αὐτῶν ἀντίπικνον μνηστί, πνέοντα βόθων μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ σοῦ.

The Sweet Neglect—from 'Epiccene, or The Silent Woman.'

[From the Latin of Jean Bonnefons, French erotic poet, 1554-1614.]

Still to be neat, still to be drest,
As you were going to a feast ;
Still to be powdered, still perfumed :
Lady, it is to be presumed,
Though art's hid causes are not found,
All is not sweet, all is not sound.

Give me a look, give me a face,
That makes simplicity a grace ;
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free ;
Such sweet neglect more taketh me
Than all th' adulteries of art :
They strike mine eyes, but not my heart.

To Celia—from 'Volpone.'

[Suggested by Catullus : see page 401.]

Come, my Celia, let us prove
While we can the sports of love ;
Time will not be ours for ever,
He at length our good will sever :
Spend not then his gifts in vain,
Suns that set may rise again ;
But if once we lose this light,
'Tis with us perpetual night.
Why should we defer our joys ?
Fame and rumour are but toys.
Cannot we delude the eyes
Of a few poor household spies ?
Or his easier ears beguile,
So removed by our wile ?
'Tis no sin love's fruit to steal,
But the sweet theft to reveal :
To be taken, to be seen,
These have crimes accounted been.

Hymn to Diana—from 'Cynthia's Revels.'

Queen and huntress, chaste and fair,
Now the sun is laid to sleep,
Seated in thy silver chair,
State in wonted manner keep :
Hesperus entreats thy light,
Goddess excellently bright.
Earth, let not thy envious shade
Dare itself to interpose ;
Cynthia's shining orb was made
Heaven to clear when day did close ;
Bless us then with wished sight,
Goddess excellently bright.
Lay thy bow of pearl apart,
And thy crystal shining quiver :
Give unto the flying hart
Space to breathe, how short soever ;
Thou that mak'st a day of night,
Goddess excellently bright.

To Night—from 'The Vision of Delight.'

Break, Phant'sie, from thy cave of cloud,
And spread thy purple wings ;
Now all thy figures are allow'd,
And various shapes of things ;
Create of airy forms a stream ;
It must have blood, and nought of phlegm ;
And though it be a waking dream,

Yet let it like an odour rise
To all the senses here,
And fall like sleep upon their eyes,
Or music in their ear.

Song—from 'Underwoods.'

Oh, do not wanton with those eyes,
Lest I be sick with seeing;
Nor cast them down, but let them rise,
Lest shame destroy their being.

Oh, be not angry with those fires,
For then their threats will kill me;
Nor look too kind on my desires,
For then my hopes will spill me.

Oh, do not steep them in thy tears,
For so will sorrow slay me;
Nor spread them as distraught with fears;
Mine own enough betray me.

An Epitaph on Salathiel Pavy, a Child of Queen Elizabeth's Chapel.

Weep with me, all you that read
This little story:
And know, for whom a tear you shed
Death's self is sorry.
'Twas a child that so did thrive
In grace and feature,
As heaven and nature seem'd to strive
Which own'd the creature.
Years he number'd scarce thirteen
When fates turn'd cruel,
Yet three fill'd zodiacs had he been
The stage's jewel;
And did act, what now we moan,
Old men so duly,
As, sooth, the Parcæ thought him one,
He play'd so truly.
So by error to his fate
They all consented;
But viewing him since, alas too late!
They have repented;
And have sought, to give new birth,
In baths to steep him;
But being so much too good for earth
Heaven vows to keep him.

The Triumph of Charis.

See the chariot at hand here of Love,
Wherein my Lady rideth!
Each that draws is a swan or a dove,
And well the car Love guideth.
As she goes, all hearts do duty
Unto her beauty;
And enamour'd do wish, so they might
But enjoy such a sight,
That they still were to run by her side,
Through swords, through seas, whither she would ride.

Do but look on her eyes, they do light
All that Love's world compriseth!
Do but look on her hair, it is bright
As Love's star when it riseth!
Do but mark, her forehead's smother
Than words that soothe her:
And from her arched brows such a grace
Sheds itself through the face,

As alone there triumphs to the life
All the gain, all the good of the elements' strife.

Have you seen but a bright lily grow,
Before rude hands have touch'd it?
Have you mark'd but the fall o' the snow
Before the soil hath smutch'd it?
Have you felt the wool of the bever?
Or swan's down ever?
Or have smelt o' the bud of the briar?
Or the nard in the fire?
Or have tasted the bag of the bee?
O so white! O so soft! O so sweet is she!

Epigram.—To my Bookseller.

Thou that mak'st gain thy end, and wisely well,
Call'st a book good or bad as it doth sell,
Use mine so too; I give thee leave: but crave,
For the luck's sake, it thus much favour have,
To lie upon thy stall, till it be sought;
Not offer'd, as it made suit to be bought;
Nor have my title-leaf on posts or walls,
Or in cleft-sticks, advanced to make calls
For termers, or some clerk-like serving-man,
Who scarce can spell th'hard names; whose knight less can.
If without these vile arts it will not sell,
Send it to Bucklers-bury, there 'twill well.

Epigram.—To Dr Donne.

Donne, the delight of Phœbus and each Muse,
Who to thy one all other brains refuse;
Whose every work of thy most early wit
Came forth example, and remains so yet:
Longer a knowing than most wits do live,
And which no affection praise enough can give!
To it, thy language, letters, arts, best life,
Which might with half mankind maintain a strife;
All which I meant to praise, and yet I would;
But leave, because I cannot as I should!

My Picture, left in Scotland.

I now think, Love is rather deaf than blind,
For else it could not be,
That she,
Whom I adore so much, should so slight me,
And cast my suit behind:
I'm sure my language to her was as sweet.
And every close did meet
In sentence of as subtle feet,
As hath the youngest he,
That sits in shadow of Apollo's tree.
Oh! but my conscious fears,
That fly my thoughts between,
Tell me that she hath seen
My hundreds of gray hairs,
Told seven and forty years,
Read so much waste, as she cannot embrace
My mountain belly and my rocky face,
And all these through her eyes have stopt her ears.

From 'The Poet to the Painter.'

Why, though I seem of a prodigious waist,
I am not so voluminous and vast,
But there are lines, wherewith I might be embrac'd.
'Tis true, as my womb swells, so my back stoops,
And the whole lump grows round, deform'd, and droops;
But yet the Tun at Heidelberg had hoops.

You were not tied by any painter's law
To square my circle, I confess, but draw
My superficies : that was all you saw.

Which if in compass of no art it came
To be described by a monogram,
With one great blot you had form'd me as I am.

Good Life, Long Life.

It is not growing like a tree
In bulk, doth make man better be,
Or standing long an oak, three hundred year,
To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sear.

A lily of a day
Is fairer far in May,
Although it fall and die that night,
It was the plant and flower of light !
In small proportions we just beauties see :
And in short measures life may perfect be.

Epitaph on the Countess of Pembroke.

Underneath this sable herse
Lies the subject of all verse,
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother.
Death ! ere thou hast slain another,
Learn'd and fair, and good as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee.

This epitaph on Sidney's noble and accomplished sister, the Countess of Pembroke, for whose delectation the Arcadia was written, was first printed as Jonson's by Whalley in his edition of 1756. 'This delicate epitaph is universally attributed to our author, though it hath never yet been printed with his works ; it is, therefore, with some pleasure that I have given it a place here.' But about a hundred years before Aubrey had expressly said that the epitaph was by William Browne of Tavistock (see page 490). Critics differ ; but it is ascribed to Browne by Bullen and by Herford and Simpson, among others.

Epitaph on Elizabeth L. H.

Wouldst thou hear what man can say
In a little ?—reader, stay.

Underneath this stone doth lie
As much beauty as could die ;
Which in life did harbour give
To more virtue than doth live.

If at all she had a fault,
Leave it buried in this vault.
One name was Elizabeth ;
The other, let it sleep with death ;
Fitter where it died to tell,
Than that it lived at all. Farewell.

On My First Daughter.

Here lies, to each her parents' ruth,
Mary, the daughter of their youth :
Yet all heaven's gifts being heaven's due,
It makes the father less to rue.
At six months' end she parted hence
With safety of her innocence ;
Whose soul Heaven's queen, whose name she bears,
In comfort of her mother's tears,

Hath placed among her virgin train :
Where, while that severed doth remain,
This grave partakes the fleshly birth,
Which cover lightly, gentle earth !

To Penshurst (the home of the Sidneys).

Thou art not, Penshurst, built to envious show
Of touch or marble ; nor canst boast a row
Of polished pillars or a roof of gold :
Thou hast no lantern, whereof tales are told ;
Or stair, or courts ; but stand'st an ancient pile,
And these grudging at are revered the while.
Thou joy'st in better marks of soil, of air,
Of wood, of water ; therein thou art fair.
Thou hast thy walks for health as well as sport ;
Thy mount to which the Dryads do resort,
Where Pan and Bacchus their high feasts have made
Beneath the broad beech, and the chestnut shade ;
That taller tree which of a nut was set
At his great birth where all the Muses met.
There, in the writhed bark, are cut the names
Of many a sylvan, taken with his flames.
And thence the ruddy satyrs oft provoke
The lighter fauns to reach thy Lady's Oak.
Thy copse, too, named of Gamage, thou hast here,
That never fails, to serve thee, seasoned deer,
When thou wouldst feast or exercise thy friends.
The lower land that to the river bends,
Thy sheep, thy bullocks, kine, and calves do feed :
The middle ground thy mares and horses breed.
Each bank doth yield thee conies, and the tops
Fertile of wood, Ashore and Sydney's copse,
To crown thy open table, doth provide
The purpled pheasant with the speckled side :
The painted partridge lies in every field,
And for thy mess is willing to be killed.
And if the high-swoln Medway fail thy dish,
Thou hast thy ponds that pay thee tribute fish,
Fat aged carps that run into thy net,
And pikes, now weary their own kind to eat,
As loth the second draught or cast to stay,
Officiously at first themselves betray.
Bright eels that emulate them, and leap on land
Before the fisher, or into his hand.
Thou hast thy orchard fruit, thy garden flowers,
Fresh as the air, and new as are the hours.
The early cherry with the later plum,
Fig, grape, and quince, each in his time doth come :
The blushing apricot and woolly peach
Hang on thy walls that every child may reach.
And though thy walls be of the country stone,
They're reared with no man's ruin, no man's groan ;
There's none that dwell about them wish them down ;
But all come in, the farmer and the clown,
And no one empty-handed, to salute
Thy lord and lady, though they have no suit.
Some bring a capon, some a rural cake,
Some nuts, some apples ; some that think they make
The better cheeses, bring them, or else send
By their ripe daughters, whom they would commend
This way to husbands ; and whose baskets bear
An emblem of themselves, in plum or pear.
But what can this (more than express their love)
Add to thy free provisions, far above
The need of such ? whose liberal board doth flow
With all that hospitality doth know ! . . .

Now, Penshurst, they that will proportion thee
With other edifices, when they see
Those proud ambitious heaps, and nothing else,
May say their lords have built, but thy lord dwells.

Touch or touch-stone is black basalt; it was Sir Philip Sidney
'at whose birth all the Muses met;' Barbara Gamage was the wife of Sir Robert Sidney (Philip's brother), Earl of Leicester.

To the Memory of my beloved Master William Shakespeare, and what he hath left us.

[Originally in the First Folio of Shakespeare, 1623.]

To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name,
Am I thus ample to thy book and fame;
While I confess thy writings to be such
As neither man nor Muse can praise too much.
'Tis true, and all men's suffrage. But these ways
Were not the paths I meant unto thy praise;
For seeliest ignorance on these may light,
Which, when it sounds at best, but echoes right:
Or blind affection, which doth ne'er advance
The truth, but gropes, and urges all by chance;
Or crafty malice might pretend this praise,
And think to ruin, where it seemed to raise.
These are as some infamous bawd or whore
Should praise a matron; what could hurt her more?
But thou art proof against them, and, indeed,
Above the ill fortune of them, or the need.
I therefore will begin: Soul of the age!
The applause, delight, the wonder of our stage!
My Shakespeare, rise! I will not lodge thee by Chaucer, or Spenser, or bid Beaumont lie
A little further off, to make thee room:
Thou art a monument without a tomb,
And art alive still, while thy book doth live,
And we have wits to read and praise to give.
That I not mix thee so, my brain excuses,
I mean with great but disproportioned Muses:
For if I thought my judgment were of years,
I should commit thee surely with thy peers,
And tell how far thou didst our Lyly outshine,
Or sporting Kyd, or Marlowe's mighty line.
And though thou hadst small Latin and less Greek,
From thence to honour thee I will not seek
For names; but call forth thund'ring Æschylus,
Euripides, and Sophocles to us,
Pacuvius, Accius, him of Cordova dead, Seneca
To live again, to hear thy bodkin tread,
And shake a stage: or when thy socks were on,
Leave thee alone for the comparison
Of all that insolent Greece or haughty Rome
Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come.
Triumph, my Britain, thou hast one to shew,
To whom all scenes of Europe homage owe.
He was not of an age, but for all time!
And all the Muses still were in their prime,
When like Apollo he came forth to warm
Our ears, or like a Mercury to charm!
Nature herself was proud of his designs,
And joyed to wear the dressing of his lines!
Which were so richly spun, and woven so fit,
As since she will vouchsafe no other wit.
The merry Greek, tart Aristophanes,
Neat Terence, witty Plautus, now not please;
But antiquated and deserted lie,
As they were not of nature's family.
Yet must I not give nature all; thy art,
My gentle Shakespeare, must enjoy a part.

For though the poet's matter nature be,
His art doth give the fashion; and that he
Who casts to write a living line must sweat
(Such as thine are) and strike the second heat
Upon the Muses' anvil; turn the same,
And himself with it, that he thinks to frame;
Or for the laurel he may gain a scorn;
For a good poet's made as well as born.
And such wert thou! Look how the father's face
Lives in his issue, even so the race
Of Shakespeare's mind and manners brightly shines
In his well-turned and true-filed lines:
In each of which he seems to shake a lance,
As brandished at the eyes of ignorance.
Sweet Swan of Avon! what a sight it were
To see thee in our waters yet appear,
And make those flights upon the banks of Thames
That so did take Eliza and our James!
But stay; I see thee in the hemisphere
Advanced, and made a constellation there!
Shine forth, thou Star of Poets, and with rage
Or influence chide or cheer the drooping stage,
Which since thy flight from hence hath mourned like
night,
And despairs day but for thy volume's light!

On the Portrait of Shakespeare.

[Under the Portrait by Droeshout in the First Folio.]

This figure that thou here seest put,
It was for gentle Shakespeare cut,
Wherein the graver had a strife
With nature, to outdo the life:
O could he but have drawn his wit,
As well in brass, as he hath hit
His face, the print would then surpass
All that was ever writ in brass:
But since he cannot, reader, look
Not on his picture, but his book.

Jonson's prose other than in drama may be illustrated by three paragraphs containing his judgment on Lord Bacon, taken from his Discoveries, which are in part a commonplace book of suggestions, in part a series of short essays on very various subjects, somewhat on the Baconian model:

From 'Discoveries.'

Dominus Verulamius.—One, though he be excellent, and the chief, is not to be imitated alone: for no imitator ever grew up to his author; likeness is always on this side truth. Yet there happened in my time one noble speaker, who was full of gravity in his speaking. His language (where he could spare or pass by a jest) was nobly censorious. No man ever spake more neatly, more pressly, more weightily, or suffered less emptiness, less idleness in what he uttered. No member of his speech but consisted of his own graces. His hearers could not cough or look aside from him without loss. He commanded where he spoke, and had his judges angry and pleased at his devotion. No man had their affections more in his power. The fear of every man that heard him was, lest he should make an end.

Scriptorum Catalogus.—Cicero is said to be the only wit that the people of Rome had equalled to their empire. Ingenium par imperio. We have had many, and in their several ages (to take in but the former seculum) sir

Thomas Moore, the elder Wiat, Henry earl of Surrey, Chaloner, Smith, Eliot, B. Gardiner, were for their times admirable; and the more, because they began eloquence with us. Sir Nicholas Bacon was singular and almost alone in the beginning of queen Elizabeth's time. Sir Philip Sidney and Mr Hooker (in different matter) grew great masters of wit and language, and in whom all vigour of invention and strength of judgment met. The earl of Essex, noble and high; and sir Walter Raleigh, not to be contemned either for judgment or style. Sir Henry Savile, grave, and truly lettered; sir Edwin Sandys, excellent in both; lord Egerton, the chancellor, a grave and great orator, and best when he was provoked. But his learned and able (though unfortunate) successor is he who hath filled up all numbers, and performed that in our tongue, which may be compared or preferred either to insolent Greece or haughty Rome. In short, within his view and about his times were all the wits born that could honour a language or help study. Now things daily fall, wits grow downward, and eloquence grows backward: so that he may be named, and stand as the mark and ἀκμή of our language.

De Augmentis Scientiarum.—Julius Cæsar.—Lord St Alban.—I have ever observed it to have been the office of a wise patriot, among the greatest affairs of the state, to take care of the commonwealth of learning. For schools, they are the seminaries of state; and nothing is worthier the study of a statesman than that part of the republic which we call the advancement of letters. Witness the care of Julius Cæsar, who in the heat of the civil war writ his books of Analogy and dedicated them to Tully. This made the late lord St Alban entitle his work Novum Organum: which though by the most of superficial men, who cannot get beyond the title of nominals, it is not penetrated nor understood, it really openeth all defects of learning whatsoever, and is a book

Qui longum nolo scriptori proroget ævum.

My conceit of his person was never increased toward him by his place or honours: but I have and do reverence him for the greatness that was only proper to himself, in that he seemed to me ever, by his work, one of the greatest men and most worthy of admiration that had been in many ages. In his adversity I ever prayed that God would give him strength; for greatness he could not want. Neither could I condole in a word or syllable for him, as knowing no accident could do harm to virtue, but rather help to make it manifest.

It was Ben who said—what is better applicable to another court than he knew—‘A virtuous court a world to virtue draws;’ ‘Contempt of fame begets contempt of virtue;’ ‘Apes are apes though clothed in scarlet;’ ‘Posterity pays every man his honour;’ and who spoke of one ‘plagued with an itching leprosy of wit.’ ‘Spread yourself on his bosom publicly whose heart you would eat in private’ is one of his most cynical phrases; only less caustic is ‘Tis the common disease of all your musicians that they know no mean to be entreated either to begin or end.’

Gifford's edition is far from perfect (9 vols. 1816; new ed. 1875); Percy Simpson's recension of Every Man in His Humour (1919) inaugurated a complete edition of the works under his and C. H. Herford's care; Herford selected plays for the ‘Mermaid Series’ (3 vols. 1893-95); there are selections of plays and poems by Morley (1884) and J. A. Symonds (1886); H. H. Carter edited Every Man in His Humour (‘Yale Studies’; 1922). See the Life by Herford and Simpson (1925), monographs by Gregory Smith (‘Men of Letters’; 1919), Symonds (1886), Palmer (1934), Swinburne's Study (1890), M. Castelain's Ben Jonson, l'Homme et l'Œuvre (1907), and Shakespeare and Ben Jonson (1907).

John Donne, gallant and courtier, wit and poet, lived to be one of the greatest preachers of the English Church, and died the saintly Dean of St Paul's. He was born in London in 1573, his father, a prosperous ironmonger, being possibly of Welsh descent. His mother, daughter of John Heywood, epigrammatist and writer of interludes (supra, page 153), was descended from Sir Thomas More's sister; the family on both sides were devout Catholics, and several of them suffered danger and exile for the Catholic cause. John Donne, whose father died in 1576, leaving his widow with six children, was sent to Hart Hall, Oxford, but graduated at Cambridge, and was entered at Lincoln's Inn in 1592. He read much law and controversial theology, was bookish but sprightly and even wild, and allowed his exuberant vitality to carry him into unbecoming dissipations. His early poems, many of them outspokenly sensual and at times cruelly cynical, are supposed by Gosse to contain a sincere autobiographical record of a scandalous liaison with a married woman, besides other lesser irregularities. He travelled abroad, took part in Essex's Cadiz expedition, and on his return was appointed secretary to the Lord-Keeper, Sir Thomas Egerton, afterwards Lord Ellesmere and Chancellor. He now came to know many of the most eminent men of the day, and wrote, without printing it, great part of his poetry. A characteristic poem of this time, The Progress of the Soul (1601), or Metempsychosis, pursues a deathless soul through its transmigrations into many bodies, including those of a sparrow, a fish eaten by a pike, which is swallowed by a bird, and that by a whale. He fell violently in love with a niece of the Lord-Keeper's wife, and the pair were clandestinely married at the end of 1601; in consequence Donne was dismissed, and even for a time imprisoned. In the trying years of poverty that followed he showed an unseemly amount of servility to unworthy courtiers; but it was another Donne who did much of Somerset's dirty work in securing the divorce of his paramour, the afterwards so infamous Countess of Essex, whose part in the Overbury murder was unknown when Donne wrote a gushing epithalamium for their remarriage. Having become an Anglican, Donne helped Dean (afterwards Bishop) Morton in his controversial writings against the Catholics, and himself indited a volume on the Catholics and the oaths of allegiance (The Pseudo-Martyr) and against the Jesuits (Ignatius his Conclave). Biathanatos, also a prose work, proved suicide to be no very heinous sin. Donne's Divine Poems mostly belong to this period, and include Holy Sonnets and A Litany. The first poem he printed was an elegy (1611) on Sir Robert Drury's daughter, a child of fifteen, whom he had never seen; this he followed next year by another (The Anatomy of the World), and yet a third, all containing beautiful and even splendid passages, but marred by overmultiplied and overstrained conceits and utterly preposterous hyperbole—'enormous and disgusting hyperboles' is a phrase of Dr Johnson's. Thus Donne declares death now

Can find nothing after her to kill,
Except the world itself, so great as she:

the world could better have spared the sun, and by reason of this damsel's death is now a mere cripple and the ghost of its former self! But the elegies so commended the elegist that Drury gave him and his wife free quarters in his house, and took the poet abroad with him. It was at Paris that Donne saw the vision of his wife with a dead child in her arms, afterwards proved a veritable fact. Donne had ere this offered to go into the Church if he could thus secure patronage; and now in 1615 he did so, after mysterious delays and hesitations, credited by Walton to his remorse for youthful sins, but open—partly at least—to a less gracious reference to worldly calculations and ambitious hopes. The king encouraged him to take English orders. Either now, as one would hope, or, as Gosse believed, after his wife's death (1617), his deeper nature was stirred to true religious zeal, and theology was no longer a hobby or a professional exercise. Walton's story that Donne had fourteen livings offered him in his first year of clerical life has been shown by Gosse to be quite incredible; but seasonable preferments came fairly soon. In 1616 he received the livings of Keyston in Huntingdon and Sevenoaks in Kent, but he never lived in either parish. Various preacherships he also held, and in 1621 became Dean of St Paul's. Charles I. had resolved to make him a bishop, but Donne died on the 31st of March 1631, before this purpose was carried out. He was buried in St Paul's, and by-and-by that eccentric monument was erected from the painting made in the last month of the Dean's life—the invalid solemnly posing to the artist sheeted in a shroud and standing on an urn in a specially warmed room. From his ordination till near his end Donne wrote few poems; his trenchant thought, his brilliant fancy, his profound insight, and his command of the English tongue finding outlet in his sermons.

Donne's poems—songs and quatorzains, satires, elegies, religious poems, complimentary epistles in verse, epithalamiums, epigrams, and miscellaneous meditations in metre—were many of them diligently handed about in manuscript from the beginning, but were not collected and published till 1633. In virtue of his early poems, whose erotic sensualism he in later days regretted—

though he preserved the MSS., as Beza, another Churchman, republished his erotic verse—Donne ranks in a sense with earlier and contemporary Elizabethans, but seems to have consciously revolted against their mellifluous monotones, their pseudo-classical nomenclature, their pastoral and other conventions. His hard and crabbed style is to some extent deliberately adopted; we may even congratulate ourselves that so much perfect and melodious verse took that shape as it were in spite of him. He stands curiously apart from the master influences in poetry at home. As Gosse has pointed out, he took no interest in Shakespeare, in Bacon, in Daniel, or in Drayton, and had relations with Ben Jonson alone of the notable English poets of his day. He was markedly influenced by Spanish literature, but was original to a fault. In virtue of his studied carelessness, his avoidance of smoothness or form, his pedantry, his infectious harshness, this 'foremost of the metaphysical poets' opens a new era, if he does not found a school. Even as handed about in his early manhood, Donne's privately circulated MS. poems had a great vogue, and a powerful—evidently too powerful—influence on the next generation, who could more easily imitate his eccentricities and extravagances than rival his soaring flights and exquisite beauties. Ben Jonson told Drummond that he held Donne 'the first poet in the world in some things,' yet added that 'for not keeping accent he deserved to be hanged,' and that he would perish from not being understood. It must be accounted a glory to Donne that George Herbert and his brother of Cherbury were, for good or evil, his pupils, and the mystic Crashaw, too; Carew was another enthusiastic admirer. In Dryden's judgment Donne was 'the greatest wit though not the best poet of our nation,' for of course Dryden sympathised with the contrary influences represented by Waller, Denham, and Cowley. Donne was discredited in the later seventeenth century and all the eighteenth. But Gosse traced Donne's influence in Pope (who 'versified' Donne's Satires), and thought modern appreciation of the 'metaphysical poet' began with Browning, who put the Mandrake Song to music. Now it is agreed that, amidst roughness and obscurity, far-fetched allusion, contorted imagery and allegory, and unrhythmical wit, Donne often presents us with poetry of a high order, in expression as well as in thought.

With Hall, Donne was one of the first English satirists on the regular Latin model: Buchanan's satires were in Latin, and Skelton and Lyndsay belong to a different category. Dryden, Pope, and Young adopted the rhyming couplet from Donne, but smoothed it; and Pope, acting on Dryden's hint, modernised some of Donne's satires. His swift transitions from voluptuous ecstasies to meditation on the mystery of life and death, and his profound but at times not a little fantastic speculations, no doubt contributed to securing for Donne the epithet—seldom precisely used—of 'metaphysical.' His intellect was active and keen, his fancy vivid and picturesque, his wit playful and yet caustic. His too great terseness and prodigality of ideas breeds obscurity; the uneven and crabbed versification, with superfluous syllables to be slurred over, and accents that must be thrown on the wrong syllables—however much a part of his conscious design—is puzzling; you have to understand the poem before you can scan his verse. The conceits are often not merely striking but suggestive and beautiful, lightly and gracefully handled. Gosse praises especially:

Doth not a Teneriffe or higher hill
Rise so high like a rock that one might think
The floating moon would shipwreck there and sink.

On the other hand, Donne constantly piles up Ossas upon Pelions of metaphors, prefers such as are puerile or grotesque—defying the good taste of his own time as well as ours—and over-elaborates them to wearisomeness. Thus, treating of a broken heart, he runs off into a play on the expression 'broken heart.' He entered a room, he says, where his mistress was present, and

Love, alas,
At one first blow did shyver yt [his heart] as glasse.

Then, insisting on the idea of a heart broken to pieces, he goes on to exhaust the conceit and make it tedious:

Yet nothing can to nothing fall,
Nor any place be emptye quyte;
Therefore I think my brest hath all
Those peeces still, though they do not unyte:
And now as broken glasses shoue
A thousand lesser faces, soe
My raggs of hart can like, wish, and adore;
But after one such love can love no more.

Address to Bishop Valentine, on the Day of the Marriage of the Elector Palatine to the Princess Elizabeth.

Hail, Bishop Valentine, whose day this is,
All the air is thy diocis,
And all the chirping choristers
And other birds are thy parishioners:
Thou marryest every year
The lyrique larke, and the grave whispering dove,
The sparrow, that neglects his life for love,
The household bird with the red stomacher;
Thou mak'st the blackbird speed as soon
As doth the goldfinch or the halcion; . . .
This day more cheerfully than ever shine,
This day, which might inflame thyself, old Valentine.

Valediction forbidding Mourning.

As virtuous men pass mildly away,
And whisper to their sowles to goe,
Whilst some of their sad freinds doe say,
Now his breath goes, and some say, noe;

Soe let us melt, and make no noise,
No tear-floods nor sigh-tempests move;
'Twere prophanation of our joyes
To tell the laetie our love.

Movinge of th' earth brings harms and feares,
Men reckon what it did, and meant;
But trepidations of the sphæres,
Though greater farr, are innocent.

Dull sublunary Lovers' love,
Whose sowle is sence, cannot admytt
Absence; for that it doth remove
Those things which elemented it.

But we, by a love so far refynde
That ourselves know not what it is,
Inter-assured of the mynde,
Care less eyes, lipps, and hands to miss.

Our two sowles therefore, which are one,
Though I must go, indure not yet
A breach, but an expansion,
Like gould to aery thinness beat.

If they be two, they are two soe
As styff twynn compasses are two;
Thy sowle, the fixt foote, makes no shoue
To move, but doth if th' other doe:

And though it in the center sytt,
Yet when the other farr doth come,
It leans and hearkens after it,
And growes erect, as that comes home

Such wilt thou be to me, who must,
Like th' other foote, obliquely runn;
Thy fyrmness makes my circles just,
And makes me end where I begunn.

The Will.

Before I sigh my last gaspe, let me breath,
Great Love, some legacies. I heere bequeath
Myne eyes to Argus, if myne eyes can see ;
If they be blynd, then, Love, I give them thee ;
My tongue to Fame ; to 'embassadors myne eares ;
 To women, or the sea, my tears.
 Thou, Love, hast taught me heretofore
By making me love her who 'had twentie more,
That I should give to none but such as had too much before.

My constancie I to the plannets give ;
My truth to them who at the Court doe live ;
Mine ingenuitie and opennesse
To Jesuits ; to buffoones my pensivenes ;
My sylence to any who abroad have been ;
 My money to a Capuchin.
 Thou, Love, taught'st mee, by appointing mee
To love her where no love receiv'd can bee,
Only to give to such as have an incapacity.

My faith I give to Romane Catholiques ;
All my good woorkes unto the schismatiques
Of Amsterdam ; my best civillitie
And courtshipp to an Universitie ;
My modestie I give to souldiers bare ;
 My patience lett gamesters share.
 Thou, Love, taught'st me, by making mee
Love her, that houlds my love disparitie,
Only to give to those that count my guifts indignitie.

My reputacion I give to those
Which were my friends ; mine industry to foes ;
To Schoolmen I bequeath my doubtfulnes ;
My sicknes to phisicians, or excess ;
To Nature all that I in rithme have writt ;
 And to my company my witt.
 Thou, Love, by making me adore
Her who begot this love in me before,
Taught'st me to make as though I gave, when I do but restore.

To him for whom the passing-bell next toles
I give my phisik-books ; my wrytten roles
Of morrall counsells I to Bedlam give ;
My brazen meddalls unto them which live
In want of bread ; to them which passe amonge
 All foranners, myne English tongue.
 Thou, Love, by making me love one
Who thynks her friendship a fitt portion
For younger lovers, dost my guift thus disproportion.

Therefore I'll give noe more ; but I'll undoe
The world by dyinge ; because Love dyes too.
Then all your bewties wilbe no more worth
Then gold in mynes, when none doe draw it forth ;
And all your graces no more use will have
 Then a sun-dyall in a grave.
 Thou, Love, taught'st me, by appointing mee
To love her who doth neglect both mee and thee,
T' invent and practize that one way t' annihilate all three.

Character of a Bore—from Donne's
Fourth Satire.

Towards me did runne
A thing more strange than on Nile's slime the sunne
E'er bred, or all which into Noahs arke came ;
A thing which would have pos'd Adam to name.

Stranger than seven Antiquaries studies,
Than Africks monsters, Guiana's rarities,
Stranger than strangers. One who for a Dane
In the Danes massacre had sure bene slaine,
If he had liv'd then ; and without helpe dies
When next the Prentises 'gainst Strangers rise.
One whom the watch at noone scarce lets goe by ;
One to whom th' examining justice sure would cry :
'Sir, by your priesthood, tell me what you are ?'
His clothes were strange though coarse, and black though bare ;

Sleevelesse his jerkin was, and it had bin
Velvet, but 'twas now (so much ground was seene)
Become Tuff-taffaty ; and our children shall
See it plain rashe awhile, then nought at all.
The thing hath travail'd, and saith, speaks all tongues ;
And onely knoweth what to all States belongs.
Made of th' Accents and best phrase of all these,
He speakes one language. If strange meats displease,
Art can deceive, or hunger force my taste ;
But Pedants motley tongue, souldiers bumbast,
Mountebanks drug tongue, nor the termes of law,
Are strong enough preparatives to draw
Me to beare this. Yet I must be content
With his tongue, in his tongue call'd compliment. . . .
He names me, and comes to me. I whisper, 'God !
How have I sinn'd, that thy wraths furious rod,
This fellow, chooseth me ?' He saith : 'Sir,
I love your judgment—whom do you prefer
For the best Linguist ?' And I seelily
Said that I thought Calepines Dictionarye.
'Nay, but of men, most sweet sir ?'—Beza then,
Some Jesuits, and two reverend men
Of our two academies, I named. Here
He stopt me, and said : 'Nay, your Apostles were Pretty good linguists, and so Panurge was ;
Yet a poor gentleman all these may pass
By travel.' Then, as if he would have sold
His tongue, he praised it, and such wonders told,
That I was faine to say : 'If you had lived, sir,
Time enough to have been Interpreter
To Babels bricklayers, sure the Tower had stood.'
He adds : 'If of court-life you knew the good,
You would leave lonenesse.' I said : 'Not alone
My lonenesse is, but Spartans fashion.
To teach by painting drunkards doth not taste
Now ; Aretine's pictures have made few chaste ;
No more can princes' courts—though there be few
Better pictures of vice—teach me vertue.'
He, like to a high-stretcht lute-string, squeakt : 'O sir,
'Tis sweet to talke of kings !' 'At Westminster,'
Said I, 'the man that keeps the Abbey-tombes,
And for his price doth, with whomever comes,
Of all our Harries, and our Edwards talke,
From King to King, and all their kin can walke :
Your eares shall heare nought but Kings ; your eyes meet

Kings onely ; The way to it is King's-street.'
He smack'd, and cryd, 'He's base, mechanique, coarse ;
So are all your English men in their discourse.'
'Are not your French men neat ?' 'Mine ? as you see,
I have but one, Sir ; looke, he followes me.
Certes, they are neatly cloath'd.' 'I, of this minde am,
Your onely wearing is your Grogaram.'
'Not so, Sir, I have more.' Under this pitch
He would not flie. I chaff'd him ; But as itch

Scratch'd into smart, and as blunt Iron grownd
 Into an edge, hurts worse ; so I (foole !) found
 Crossing hurt me. To fit my sullenness,
 He to another key his stile doth dresse ;
 And askes, what newes ? I tell him of new playes :
 He takes my hand, and, as a Still which stayes
 A semibriefe 'twixt each drop, he niggardly,
 As loath to enrich me, so tels many a ly,
 More than ten Hollensheads, or Halls, or Stowes,
 Of triviall household trash, He knowes : he knowes
 When the queen frown'd or smil'd ; and he knows what
 A subtle Statesman may gather of that :
 He knowes who loves ; whom and who by poyson
 Hasts to an Offices reversion :
 He knows who 'hath sold his land, and now doth beg
 A license, old iron, bootes, shooes, and egge-
 Shells to transport ; Shortly boyes shall not play
 At span-counter or blow-point, but shall pay
 Toll to some Courtier ; and wiser than all us,
 He knows what Lady is not painted. Thus
 He with home-meats cloyes me.

An early poetic allusion to the Copernican system occurs in Donne :

As new phylosophy arrests the sun,
 And bids the passive earth about it run.

This simile was often repeated by later poets :

When goodly, like a shipp in her full trimme,
 A swann so white, that you may unto him
 Compare all whitenes, but himselfe to none,
 Glided along, and, as hee glided, watched,
 And with his arch'd neck this poore fish catch't :
 It mooved with state, as if to looke upon
 Low things it scorn'd.

The second of Donne's five 'Prebend Sermons,' preached at St Paul's in 1625, 'a long poem of victory over death,' is, as Gosse has said, 'one of the most magnificent pieces of religious writing in English literature, and closes with a majestic sentence of incomparable pomp and melody' :

As my soule shall not goe towards Heaven, but goe by Heaven to Heaven, to the Heaven of Heavens, so the true joy of a good soule in this world is the very joy of Heaven ; and we goe thither not that being without joy we might have joy infused into us, but that, as Christ sayes,
Our joy might be full, perfected, sealed with an everlastingnesse : for as he promises That no man shall take our joy from us, so neither shall Death itselfe take it away, nor so much as interrupt it or discontinue it, but as in the face of Death, when he layes hold upon me, and in the face of the Devill when he attempts me, I shall see the face of God (for everything shall be a glasse, to reflect God upon me) ; so in the agonies of Death, in the anguish of that dissolution, in the sorrowes of that valedic-tion, in the irreversibleness of that transmigration, I shall have a joy which shall no more evaporate than my soule shall evaporate, a joy that shall passe up and put on a more glorious garment above, and be joy superinvested in glory. Amen.

Donne's poems were posthumously collected and published in a one-volume quarto in 1633 ; his son issued a fuller edition in 1649. The son published also successive collections of sermons, prose works, and letters. Alford's edition of the poems (1839) is unsatisfactory ; so is Grosart's (1873, 'Fuller Worthies') ; that by Sir E. K. Chambers (1896), with introduction by Saintsbury, was super-seeded by the critical edition from the MSS. by Grierson (2 vols. 1912). Izaak Walton's Life, a remarkable masterpiece of biography, was originally prefixed to some of the sermons published in 1640, and was afterwards enlarged ; but Walton had insufficient information on some parts of Donne's life. Dr Jessopp's monograph (1897) dwells mainly on the theological side of the man. When Gosse undertook his Life and Letters (2 vols. 1899) he could justly say that it was 'perhaps the most imposing task left to the student of Elizabethan and Jacobean literature.' Gosse arranged the letters for the first time, and shed much light on Donne's career. There is a Bibliography by Keynes (1914). See also Mrs Simpson's Study of the Prose Works of John Donne (1924) ; studies by Dr Mary Ramsay (French ; 1917), Praz (1925), and P. Legouis (1928) ; Smith's (1920) and Keynes's (1923) selections from the Sermons ; and Sparrow's edition of Donne's Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (1923).

Joseph Hall (1574-1656), born at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, in Leicestershire, studied at Cambridge, and rose through various church preferments to be Bishop of Exeter (1627) and then of Norwich (1641). In 1617 he went with James to Scotland in the design of establishing Episcopacy, and next year was a deputy to the Synod of Dort. He was accused of Puritanism, was at enmity with Laud, and in 1641, as a prelate claiming his rights in the House of Lords, was imprisoned in the Tower for seven months. His revenues were sequestrated and his property pillaged ; and in 1647 he retired to a small farm near Norwich, where he lived till his death. His principal works were theological and devotional—Christian Meditations, The Contemplations on the New Testament and On the Holy Story, and a Paraphrase of Hard Texts. His sermons have a rapid, vehement eloquence well fitted to arouse and impress. He wrote against Papists and Brownists with equal fervour. In 1608 he published a remarkable series of Characters of Vertues and Vices, similar to the famous Characters of Overbury (1614). Hall's Epistles are also numerous. Fuller, who says that 'for his pure, full, plain style' Hall was 'called the English Seneca, judges him 'not ill at controversies, more happy at comments, very good in his characters, better in his sermons, best of all in his meditations.' He is, however, best remembered in literature for his satires, published under the title of Virgide-miarum, Sixe Bookes, in 1597-98, before he was in holy orders. In them he followed Latin models, but is rather vigorous, witty, and even scurrilous than polished. Archbishop Whitgift condemned them to be burned as licentious with works by Marlowe and Marston, but the judgment was withdrawn. Pope thought them the best poetry and the truest satire in the English language ; while Hallam pronounces them rugged, obscure, and ungrammatical. Hall boldly claims to be the first English satirist :

I first adventure, follow me who list
 And be the second English satirist.

He means probably the first regular satirist, following Latin models ; and even then Marston was enraged by Hall's claim. Donne and Marston seem to have written about the same time ; Lodge's Fig for Momus was some years earlier. Wyatt and Gascoigne, too, might claim to be reckoned, and Nash, whether or no he was Greene's 'Young Juvenal, that biting satirist,' even though Skelton were regarded as too irregular and ribald; and Piers Plowman was, of course, very far removed from classical models. In Scotland, Dunbar and Lyndsay were persistent satirists in vernacular verse, and Buchanan both in Latin verse and Scottish prose.

The Chaplain.

A gentle squire would gladly entertain
 Into his house some trencher-chaplain :
 Some willing man that might instruct his sons,
 And that would stand to good conditions.
 First, that he lie upon the truckle-bed,
 While his young master lieth o'er his head.
 Second, that he do, on no default,
 Ever presume to sit above the salt.
 Third, that he never change his trencher twice.
 Fourth, that he use all common courtesies ;
 Sit bare at meals, and one half rise and wait.
 Last, that he never his young master beat,
 But he must ask his mother to define
 How many jerks he would his breech should line.
 All these observed, he could contented be
 To give five marks and winter livery.

The Famished Gallant.

Seest thou how gaily my young master goes,
 Vaunting himself upon his rising toes ;
 And pranks his hand upon his dagger's side ;
 And picks his gluttied teeth since late noon-tide ?
 'Tis Ruffio : Trow'st thou where he dined to-day ?
 In sooth I saw him sit with Duke Humphrey.
 Many good welcomes, and much gratis cheer,
 Keeps he for every straggling cavalier ;
 An open house, haunted with great resort ;
 Long service mixt with musical disport.
 Many fair younker with a feathered crest,
 Chooses much rather be his shot-free guest,
 To fare so freely with so little cost,
 Than stake his twelvepence to a meaner host.
 Hadst thou not told me, I should surely say
 He touched no meat of all this livelong day ;
 For sure methought, yet that was but a guess,
 His eyes seemed sunk for very hollowness,
 But could he have—as I did it mistake—
 So little in his purse, so much upon his back ?
 So nothing in his maw ? yet seemeth by his belt
 That his gaunt gut no too much stuffing felt.
 Seest thou how side it hangs beneath his hip ? long, low
 Hunger and heavy iron makes girdles slip.
 Yet for all that, how stiffly struts he by,
 All trapped in the new-found bravery.
 The nuns of new-won Calais his bonnet lent,
 In lieu of their so kind a conquerment.
 What needed he fetch that from farthest Spain,
 His grandame could have lent with lesser pain ?
 Though he perhaps ne'er passed the English shore,
 Yet fain would counted be a conqueror.
 His hair, French-like, stares on his frightened head,
 One lock Amazon-like dishevelled,
 As if he meant to wear a native cord,
 If chance his fates should him that bane afford.
 All British bare upon the bristled skin,
 Close notched is his beard, both lip and chin ;

His linen collar labyrinthian set,
 Whose thousand-double turnings never met :
 His sleeves half hid with elbow pinionings,
 As if he meant to fly with linen wings.
 But when I look, and cast mine eyes below,
 What monster meets mine eyes in human show ?
 So slender waist with such an abbot's loin,
 Did never sober nature sure conjoin.
 Lik'st a strawn scarecrow in the new-sown field,
 Reared on some stick, the tender corn to shield,
 Or, if that semblance suit not every deal,
 Like a broad shake-fork with a slender steel. handle

A part of old St Paul's Cathedral was called Duke Humphrey's Walk, from a tomb erroneously supposed to be that of the famous Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester ; it was the resort of beggars, bankrupts, and dinnerless poor gentlemen, who were playfully said to dine with Duke Humphrey.

Upon the Sight of a Tree Full-blossomed.

Here is a tree overlaid with blossoms. It is not possible that all these should prosper ; one of them must needs rob the other of moisture and growth. I do not love to see an infancy over-hopeful ; in these pregnant beginnings one faculty starves another, and at last leaves the mind sapless and barren. As, therefore, we are wont to pull off some of the too frequent blossoms, that the rest may thrive ; so it is good wisdom to moderate the early excess of the parts, or progress of over-forward childhood. Neither is it otherwise in our Christian profession ; a sudden and lavish ostentation of grace may fill the eye with wonder, and the mouth with talk, but will not at the last fill the lap with fruit. Let me not promise too much, nor raise too high expectations of my undertakings ; I had rather men should complain of my small hopes than of my short performances.

Upon a Redbreast coming into his Chamber.

Pretty bird, how cheerfully dost thou sit and sing ; and yet knowest not where thou art, nor where thou shalt make thy next meal, and at night must shroud thyself in a bush for lodging ! What a shame is it for me, that see before me so liberal provisions of my God, and find myself set warm under my own roof, yet am ready to droop under a distrustful and unthankful dulness ! Had I so little certainty of my harbour and purveyance, how heartless should I be, how careful ! how little list [inclination] should I have to make music to thee or myself ! Surely thou comest not hither without a Providence. God sent thee not so much to delight as to shame me, but all in a conviction of my sullen unbelief, who, under more apparent means, am less cheerful and confident. Reason and faith have not done so much in me, as in thee mere instinct of nature ; want of foresight makes thee more merry, if not more happy here, than the foresight of better things maketh me. O God ! thy providence is not impaired by those powers thou hast given me above these brute things ; let not my greater helps hinder me from a holy security, and comfortable reliance on thee.

Upon hearing of Music by Night.

How sweetly doth this music sound in this dead season ! In the daytime it would not, it could not so much affect the ear. All harmonious sounds are advanced by a silent darkness. Thus it is with the glad tidings of salvation ; the gospel never sounds so sweet as in the night of preservation, or of our own private affliction. It is ever the same ; the difference is in our disposition to receive it. O God! whose praise it is to 'give songs in the night,' make my prosperity conscionable, and my crosses cheerful.

Upon the Sight of an Owl in the Twilight.

What a strange melancholic life doth this creature lead; to hide her head all the day long in an ivy bush, and at night, when all other birds are at rest, to fly abroad, and vent her harsh notes. I know not why the ancients have sacred this bird to wisdom, except it be for her safe closeness and singular perspicacity; that when other domestical and airy creatures are blind, she only hath inward light to discern the least objects for her own advantage. Surely thus much wit they have taught us in her: That he is the wisest man that would have least to do with the multitude; That no life is so safe as the obscure; That retiredness, if it have less comfort, yet less danger and vexation; lastly, That he is truly wise who sees by a light of his own, when the rest of the world sit in an ignorant and confused darkness, unable to apprehend any truth save by the helps of an outward illumination. Had this fowl come forth in the daytime, how had all the little birds flocked wondering about her, to see her uncouth visage, to hear her untuned notes! She likes her estate never the worse, but pleaseth herself in her own quiet reservedness. It is not for a wise man to be much affected with the censures of the rude and unskilful vulgar, but to hold fast unto his own well-chosen and well-fixed resolutions. Every fool knows what is wont to be done; but what is best to be done, is known only to the wise.

Upon the Sight of a Great Library.

What a world of wit is here packed up together! I know not whether this sight doth more dismay or comfort me: it dismays me to think that here is so much that I cannot know; it comforts me to think that this variety yields so good helps to know what I should. There is no truer word than that of Solomon—there is no end of making many books: this sight verifies. There is no end; indeed, it were pity there should: God hath given to man a busy soul, the agitation whereof cannot but through time and experience work out many hidden truths; to suppress these would be no other than injurious to mankind, whose minds, like unto so many candles, should be kindled by each other. The thoughts of our deliberations are most accurate; these we vent into our papers. What a happiness is it that without all offence of necromancy, I may here call up any of the ancient Worthies of Learning, whether human or divine, and confer with them of all my doubts!—that I can at pleasure summon whole synods of reverend fathers and acute doctors from all the coasts of the earth, to give their well-studied judgments in all points of question which I propose! Neither can I cast my eye casually upon any of these silent masters but I must learn somewhat. It is a wantonness to complain of choice. No law binds me to read all; but the more we can take in and digest, the better-liking must the mind needs be: blessed be God that hath set up so many clear lamps in his Church; now none but the wilfully blind can plead darkness; and blessed be the memory of those his faithful servants, that have left their blood, their spirits, their lives, in these precious papers, and have willingly wasted themselves into these during monuments, to give light unto others!

[Paradise—The Gospel of Labour.]

Every earth was not fit for Adam, but a garden; a paradise. What excellent pleasures, and rare varieties, have men found in gardens planted by the hands of men! And yet all the world of men cannot make one twig, or leaf, or spire of grass. When he that made the matter undertakes the fashion, how must it needs be, beyond our capacity, excellent! No herb, no flower, no tree, was wanting there, that might be for ornament or use; whether for sight, or for scent, or for taste. The bounty of God wrought further than to necessity, even to comfort and recreation. Why are we niggardly to ourselves, when God is liberal? But for all this, if God had not there conversed with man, no abundance could have made him blessed. Yet, behold! that which was man's storehouse was also his workhouse; his pleasure was his task: paradise served not only to feed his senses, but to exercise his hands. If happiness had consisted in doing nothing, man had not been employed; all his delights could not have made him happy in an idle life. Man, therefore, is no sooner made than he is set to work: neither greatness nor perfection can privilege a folded hand; he must labour, because he was happy; how much more we, that we may be! This first labour of his was, as without necessity, so without pains, without weariness; how much more cheerfully we go about our businesses, so much nearer we come to our paradise.

The Hypocrite.

A hypocrite is the worst kind of player, by so much as he acts the better part: which hath always two faces, oftentimes two hearts: that can compose his forehead to sadness and gravity, while he bids his heart be wanton and careless within; and, in the mean time, laughs within himself, to think how smoothly he hath cozened the beholder: in whose silent face are written the characters of religion, which his tongue and gestures pronounce, but his hands recant: that hath a clean face and garment, with a foul soul: whose mouth belies his heart, and his fingers belie his mouth. Walking early up into the city, he turns into the great church, and salutes one of the pillars on one knee; worshipping that God which at home he cares not for: while his eye is fixed on some window, on some passenger; and his heart knows not whither his lips go: he rises and, looking about with admiration, complains of our frozen charity; commends the ancient. At church he will ever sit where he may be seen best; and in the midst of the sermon pulls out his tables in haste, as if he feared to lose that note; when he writes either his forgotten errand or nothing: then he turns his Bible with a noise, to seek an omitted quotation; and folds the leaf, as if he had found it; and asks aloud the name of the preacher, and repeats it; whom he publicly salutes, thanks, praises, invites, entertains with tedious good counsel, with good discourse, if it had come from an honest mouth. He can command tears, when he speaks of his youth; indeed because it is past, not because it was sinful: himself is now better, but the times are worse. All other sins he reckons up with detestation, while he loves and hides his darling in his bosom. All his speech returns to himself, and every occurrent draws in a story to his own praise. When he should give, he looks about him, and says, 'Who sees me?' No alms, no prayers fall from him, without a witness; belike, lest God should deny, that he hath received them : and, when he hath done, lest the world should not know it, his own mouth is his trumpet to proclaim it. . . . In brief, he is the stranger's saint ; the neighbour's disease ; the blot of goodness ; a rotten stick in a dark night ; a poppy in a corn field ; an ill tempered candle with a great snuff, that in going out smells ill ; an angel abroad, a devil at home ; and worse when an angel than when a devil.

The Busy-body.

His estate is too narrow for his mind ; and therefore he is fain to make himself room in others' affairs ; yet ever in pretence of love. No news can stir but by his door : neither can he know that which he must not tell. What every man ventures in Guiana voyage, and what they gained, he knows to a hair. Whether Holland will have peace, he knows ; and on what conditions, and with what success, is familiar to him ere it be concluded. No post can pass him without a question ; and rather than he will lose the news, he rides back with him to appose [question] him of tidings : and then to the next man he meets, he supplies the wants of his hasty intelligence, and makes up a perfect tale ; wherewith he so haunteth the patient auditor that after many excuses he is fain to endure rather the censure of his manners in running away, than the tediousness of an impertinent discourse. His speech is oft broken off with a succession of long parentheses ; which he ever vows to fill up ere the conclusion ; and perhaps would effect it, if the others' ear were as unweariable as his tongue. If he see but two men talk and read a letter in the street, he runs to them, and asks if he may not be partner of that secret relation ; and if they deny it, he offers to tell, since he may not hear, wonders : and then falls upon the report of the Scottish Mine, or of the great fish taken up at Lynn, or of the freezing of the Thames ; and, after many thanks and dismissions, is hardly entreated silence. He undertakes as much as he performs little. This man will thrust himself forward, to be the guide of the way he knows not ; and calls at his neighbour's window, and asks why his servants are not at work. The market hath no commodity which he prizeth not, and which the next table shall not hear recited. His tongue, like the tail of Sampson's foxes, carries firebrands ; and is enough to set the whole field of the world on a flame. Himself begins table-talk of his neighbour at another's board ; to whom he bears the first news, and adjures him to conceal the reporter : whose choleric answer he returns to his first host, enlarged with a second edition : so, as it uses to be done in the fight of unwilling mastiffs, he claps each on the side apart, and provokes them to an eager conflict. There can no Act pass without his Comment ; which is ever far-fetched, rash, suspicious, delatory. His ears are long, and his eyes quick ; but most of all to imperfections ; which as he easily sees, so he increases with intermeddling. . . . He labours without thanks ; talks without credit ; lives without love ; dies without tears, without pity ; save that some say, 'It was pity he died no sooner.'

Hall's works, including also a Latin satirical romance of an unknown country in Terra Australis, called Mundus Alter et Idem, were edited by Pratt (10 vols. 1808), Peter Hall (12 vols. 1837-39), and Wynter (10 vols., Oxford, 1863). The satires have been republished by Warton, Grosart (1879), and others, and the Meditations by Sayle (1902). There is a Life by the Rev. George Lewis (1886).

John Day, dramatist, has since 1897 been identified with John Dey, who, according to college records, was the son of a yeoman at Cawston in Norfolk, born 1574, and entered Caius College, Cambridge, as a sizar in 1592. Of his work practically nothing was known till 1881, save that with Chettle he produced the extant play, The Blind Beggar of Bednal Green, which owes but little to the well-known ballad in Percy's Reliques. He had a share in over a score of plays, often in collaboration with Chettle, Dekker, Haughton, and others. But little of his handiwork was accessible till in 1881 Mr Bullen reprinted five plays by him ; an allegorical masque, The Parliament of Bees, in which the Humble Bee, the Hornet, the Drone, &c., are arraigned ; and an allegorical tract called Peregrinatio Scholastica. The Ile of Guls is a mixture of romance, allegory, and fun, without much dramatic consistency. Humour out of Breath is an Arcadian play, slight in texture, dealing with the adventures of the daughters of a banished Duke of Mantua and of the sons of his enemy, the Duke of Venice. Day shows everywhere more grace and fancy than constructive power or consistency. The academic trilogy The Pilgrimage to Parnassus and the Returne (quoted below) have also been attributed, on no sufficient grounds, to Day.

See Bullen's Introduction to Day's Plays (1881), Ward's Dramatic Literature, and Swinburne's essay in Contemporaries of Shakespeare (1919).

The Pilgrimage to Parnassus.—A play of this name was acted at St John's College, Cambridge, at Christmas of 1598 ; a sequel, called the Returne from Parnassus, in 1599 ; and a second part of the Returne in 1601. This second part of the Returne has often been reprinted ; the two earlier plays of this academic series were only known by name till, found in Hearne's collection by Mr Macray, they and their sequel were published by him in 1886, a complete Parnassian trilogy. They may be taken as the most notable specimen of the academic plays which were a conspicuous feature of the time. Sometimes the classical plays merely were acted by the students ; gradually new Latin plays on classical models became common ; and by-and-by, in spite of academic and court prohibitions, the new plays came to be wholly or partly in English. These especially shed a strange and vivid light on contemporary university life, and give a melancholy picture of the misery and humiliation of those who then sought to make a precarious livelihood by learning or letters.

In the Pilgrimage to Parnassus we have the travels to the Mountain of the Muses of Philomusus and Studioso through Logic Land and Rhetoric Land and Philosophy Land in spite of the seductions of Madido and his wine-cup, Stupido, and Amoretto. The Returne from Parnassus, in two parts, shows the struggles of the same pilgrims to find, after their sojourn in the heights of poetry, a footing in this workaday world—as tutor, physician, fiddler, or shepherd. The plays are most frequently quoted for their references (not always complimentary) to dramatists of the period—to Shakespeare, Jonson, Daniel, Lodge, Drayton, Marston, Marlowe, Nash; to the poets Spenser and Constable; and to the actors Kemp and Burbage.

Thus Gallio effusively praises Shakespeare as author of Venus and Adonis and Romeo and Juliet; but Gallio is a vulgar, purse-proud upstart, an ignorant pretender to culture. It is Kemp the actor who says to Burbage, 'Why, here's our fellow Shakespeare puts them all down; ay, and Ben Jonson too.' And other allusions to Shakespeare suggest that Shakespeare was 'the favourite of the rude half-educated strolling players as distinguished from the refined geniuses of the university.' The construction is singular and irregular: the Pilgrimage is only half the length of the first part of the Returne, and the second part is more than twice the length of the first. There is abundant wit and humour throughout, and not a little coarseness; the carrier (Hobson, celebrated by Milton), tapster, and churchwarden are as entertaining character sketches as those of the principal characters. The following is from the second and the third 'Actus' of the Pilgrimage:

Enter MADIDO alone, reading Horace Epistles.

Madi. O poeet Horace! if thou were alive I would bestowe a cupp of sacke on thee for theise liquid verses; theise are not drie rimes like Cato's, Si deus est animus, but the true moist issue of a poetical soule. O if the tapsters and drawers knewe what thou sayest in the commendacion of takinge of liquoure, they would score up thy prayes upon everie but and barrell; and, in faith, I care not if I doe for the benefite of the unlearned bestowe some of my English poetrie uppon thy Latin rimes, that this Romane tonge maye noe longer outface our poore Englishe skinkers. Ile onlie rouse up my muse out of her den with this liquid sacrifice, and then, have amongst ye, poets and rimers! The common people will now thinke I did drinke, and did nothinge but conferr with the ghostes of Homer, Ennius, Virgill, and they rest that dwell in this watterie region. Marke, marke! here springs a poetical partridge! Zouns! I want a worde miserably! I must looke for another worde in my dictionarie; I shall noe sooner open this pinte pott but the worde like a knave tapster will crie, Anon, Anon, Sir! Ey marye Sir! nowe I am fitt to write a book! Woulde anie leaden Mydas, anie mossie patron, have his asses ears deified, let him but come and give mee some prettie sprinkling to maintaine the expences of my throate, and Ile dropp out suche an encomium on him that shall immortalize him as long as there is ever a booke-binder in Englande. But I had forgotten my frind Horace. Take not in snuffe (my prettie verses!) if I turne you out of youre Romane coate into an Englishe gaberdine.

[Enter PHILOMUSUS and STUDIOSO.]

Philom. In faith, Madido, thy poetrie is good; Some gallant Genius doth possess thy corps.

Stud. I think a furie ravisheth thy braine, Thou art in such a sweet phantasticke vaine.

But tell mee, shall wee have thy companie Through this craggie ile, this harsh rough waye? Wilt thou be pilgrime to Parnassus' hill?

Madi. I had rather be a horse to grinde in mill. Zouns! I travell to Parnassus? I tell thee its not a pilgrimage for good wits. Let slowe-brainde Athenians travell thither, those drie sober youths which can away to reede dull lives, fustie philosophers, dustie logicians. Ile turne home, and write that that others shall reade; posteritie shall make them large note books out of my writings. Naye, there is another thing that makes mee out of love with this jorney; there is scarce a good taverne or alehouse betwixt this and Parnassus; why, a poetical spirit muste needs starve!

Philom. Naye, when thou comes to high Parnassus' hill

Of Hellicons pure stream drinke thou thy fill.

Stud. There Madido may quaff the poets boule, And satisfie his thirstie dried soule.

Madi. Nay, if I drinke of that pudled water of Hellicon in the companie of leane Lenten shadowes, let mee for a punishment converse with single beare soe long as I live! This Parnassus and Hellicon are but the fables of the poets: there is noe true Parnassus but the third loft in a wine taverne, noe true Hellicon but a cup of browne bastard. Will youe travell quicklie to Parnassus? doe but carie youre drie feet into some drie taverne, and straight the drawer will bid youe to goe into the Halfe Moone or the Rose, that is into Parnassus; then call for a cup of pure Hellicon, and he will bringe youe a cup of pure hypocrisie, that will make youe speake leaping lines and dauncing periods. Why, give mee but a quart of burnt sacke by mee, and if I doe not with a pennie worth of candles make a better poeme than Kinsaders Satyrs, Lodge's Fig for Momus, Bastard's Epigrams, Leichfield's Trimming of Nash, Ile give my heade to anie good felowe to make a memento mori of! O the genius of xij^d! A quart will indite manie livelie lines in an houre, while an ould drousie Academicke, an old Stigmaticke, an ould sober Dromeder, toiles a whole month and often scratcheth his witts' head for the bringinge of one miserable period into the worlde! If therefore you be good felowes or wise felowes, travell noe farther in the craggie way to the fained Parnassus; returne whome with mee, and wee will hire our studies in a taverne, and ere longe not a poste in Paul's churchyarde but shall be acquainted with our writings.

Philom. Nay then, I see thy wit in drinke is drounde; Wine doth the beste parte of thy soule confounde.

Stud. Let Parnass be a fond phantasticke place, Yet to Parnassus Ile hould on my pace.

But tell mee, Madido, how camest thou to this ile?

Madi. Well, Ile tell youe; and then see if the phisicke of good counsel will worke upon youre bodies. I tooke shippinge at Qui mihi discipulus, and sailed to Propria quae maribus; then came to As in praesenti, but with great danger, for there are certaine people in this cuntrie caled schoolmaisters, that take passingers and sit all day whippinge pence out of there tayls; these men tooke mee prisoner, and put to death at leaste three hundred rodes upon my backe. Henc traveled I into the land of Sintaxis, a land full of joyners, and from thenc came I to Prosodia, a litell iland, where are men of 6 feete longe, which were never mentioned in Sir John Mandefilde's cronicle. Hence did I set up my unluckie feete in this ile

Dialectica, where I can see nothing but idees and phantasmes; as soone as I came hither I began to reade Ramus his mapp, Dialectica est, &c.; then the slovenlie knave presented mee with such an unsavorie worde that I dare not name it unless I had some frankensence readie to perfume youre noses with after. Upon this I threw away the mapp in a chafe, and came home, cursing my witless head that woulde suffer my headless feete to take such a tedious journey.

Philom. The harder and the craggier is the waye The joy will be more full another day.
Oste pleasure got with paine wee dearlie deeme;
Things dearlie boughte are had in great esteeme.

Madi. Come on, Come on, Tullie's sentences! Leave youre pulinge of prouerbs, and hearken to him that knowes whats good for youe. If you have anie care of youre eyes, blinde them not with goinge to Parnassus; if you love youre feete, blister them not in this craggie waye. Staie with mee, and one pinte of wine shall inspire youe with more witt than all they nine muses. Come on! Ile lead you to a merie companie!

Stud. Fie, Philomus! 'gin thy loitring feet
To faint and tire in this so faire a waie?
Each marchant for a base inglorious prize
Fears not with ship to plowe the ocean;
And shall not wee for learnings glorious meede
To Parnass hast with swallowe-winged speede?

Philom. I'fai the, Studioso, I was almost wonne
To cleave unto yonder wett phantasticke crewe!
I see the pinte pott is an oratoure!
The burnt sacke made a sweet oration
Against Appollo and his followers;
Discourste howe schollers unregarded walke,
Like threedbare impecunious animals,
Whiles servinge men doe swagger it in silks,
And each earth-creeping peasant russet-coate
Is in requeste for his well-lined pouche:
Tolde us howe this laborious pilgrimage
Is wonte to eate mens marrowes, drye there bloude,
And make them seem leane shadowles pale ghostes.
This counsell made mee have a staggering minde,
Untill I sawe there beastlie bezolinge,
There drowned soules, there idle meriment,
Voyde of sounde solace and true hartes content:
And now I love my pilgrimage the more,
I love the Muses better than before.
But tell mee, what lande do wee travell in?
Mee thinks it is a pleasante fertile soil.

In the second part of the Returne Ingenioso and Judicio discuss Spenser, and Ingenioso gives his 'censure' in these lines:

A sweeter swan than ever sung in Poe,
A shriller nightingale than ever blest
The prouder groves of selfe-adoring Rome.
Blithe was each vally, and each shepherd proud
While he did chaunt his rurale minstralsie.
Attentive was full many a dainty eare:
Nay, hearers hung upon his melting tong,
While sweetly of the Faery Queene he sung;
While to the waters fall he tuned her fame,
And in each barke engraved Elizae's name.

They continue to call the roll of poets and dramatists, and after dealing summarily with Constable, Daniel, Lodge, Drayton, Watson, and others, proceed:

Ingenioso [reads:] Christopher Marlowe.

Judicio. Marlowe was happy in his buskined muse;
Alas, unhappy in his life and end.

Pitty it is that wit so ill should well,
Wit lent from heaven, but vices sent from hell.

Ing. Our theater hath lost, Pluto hath got,
A tragick penman for a dreary plot.—

[Reads:] Benjamin Jonson.

Jud. The wittiest fellow of a bricklayer in England.

Ing. A meere empyrick, one that getts what he hath by observation, and makes onely nature privy to what he indites; so slow an inventor, that he were better betake himselfe to his old trade of bricklaying; a bould whorson, as confident now in making of a book, as he was in times past in laying of a brick.—

[Reads:] William Shakspeare.

Jud. Who loves not Adons love or Lucrece rape?
His sweeter verse contaynes h[e]art throbbing line,
Could but a graver subject him content,
Without loves lazy foolish languishment.

Two of these lines are also read:

Who loves Adoni's love or Lucrece rape;
His sweeter verse contaynes hart robbing life.

Philomusus above gives another parallel (see page 233) to Burns's—

O were I on Parnassus hill
Or had of Helicon my fill.

Mossie is apparently stupid; single beare is small beer; bastard was a sweet Spanish wine; hypocrise is hippocras; 'W. Kinsayder' was a nom de guerre of Marston's; Thomas Bastard published epigrams in 1598, and Richard Lichfield wrote against Nash in 1597; stigmaticke, a branded criminal, may be playfully used here for a graduate; dromeder, a laborious pedant; Propria quae maribus, &c., are scraps from the Latin grammar; Mandefilde, Mandeville; the 'mapp' to this land of Petrus Ramus is his Dialectical Partitiones (1543), formulating a complete revolt against Aristotelianism and Scholasticism; Tullie is Cicero; bezolinge or bezeling is carousing, guzzling, from the same root as embezzle.

Thomas Dekker, born in London about 1570, was a most prolific dramatic author, but only a few of his plays were printed. His life was irregular, and he spent some years in the King's Bench and other prisons as a prisoner for debt. He is last heard of in 1637. In 1600 he published The Shoemaker's Holiday, or the Gentle Craft, and The Pleasant Comedy of Old Fortunatus. The first of these pieces is one of the most entertaining of the old comedies, though it is based on the incredible assumption that a soldier, nobly born, has deserted an important military command in the French war and become a Dutch-speaking journeyman to a London shoemaker on the very slender chance that, being thus in London, he may prosecute his suit to the Lord Mayor's daughter. But the racy, somewhat Falstaffian, talk of Simon Eyre and his journeymen is the feature of the play, sometimes inconsequent rattle, sometimes pithy sense. Thus, when the Lord Mayor says to Simon, 'Ha, ha, ha! I had rather than a thousand pounds I had an heart but half so light as yours,' the shoemaker replies, 'Why, what should I do, my Lord? A pound of care pays not a dram of debt. Hum, let's be merry whiles we are young: old age, sack and sugar will steal upon us ere we be aware.' Fortunatus, the second comedy, abounds in poetry of rare beauty. Dekker's next play was Satiromastix (1602), which held up to ridicule Ben Jonson, with whom he had collaborated and quarrelled. In 1603 Dekker published a pamphlet, The Wonderful Year, which gives a heart-rending account of the plague. In the very amusing tract, The Bachelor's Banquet, he describes the ills of henpecked husbands. His most powerful writing is in The Honest Whore (1604; Part ii. 1630), an uncompromising picture of contemporary manners which at times becomes painfully realistic. Middleton seems to have assisted Dekker in the first part. With Webster he wrote the Famous History of Sir Thomas Wyatt, Westward Ho, and Northward Ho. The Bellman of London (1608) pamphlet gives a lively account of London vagabonds; and the subject is pursued in Lanthorn and Candlelight (1608). In both of these works Dekker made a free use of A Caveat or Warening for Common Cursetors Vulgarly called Vagabones, published in 1566 or 1567 by Thomas Harman, a Kentish squire, and accordingly did not escape the charge of plagiarism. In The Gull's Hornbook (1609) the life of a town-gallant is racily depicted after a German model. The brisk comedy, The Roaring Girl (1611), is partly by Dekker, but chiefly by Middleton. With Massinger he wrote the Virgin Martyr; Lamb was doubtless right in ascribing to Dekker the most beautiful scene (II. i.). The Sun's Darling is partly by Ford. The Whore of Babylon (1607) is a coarsely vehement exhibition of Protestantism by way of allegory on the Spanish Armada. A powerful tragedy, The Witch of Edmonton (posthumously published in 1658), was written by Dekker, Ford, and (probably) Rowley (see below at page 478). Charles Lamb says Dekker has poetry enough for anything; Mr A. H. Bullen thinks 'his best plays rank with the masterpieces of the Elizabethan drama'; Swinburne found the 'wild wood-notes of passion and fancy and pathos in Dekker's best moments' reminded him of Shakespeare; while Sir A. W. Ward holds that, spite of his lyrical gift, his humour, and his pathos, he lacks distinction, and is limited in inventive imagination, rude in form, and coarse in thought. In the Poetaster Jonson, in the character of Horace, very pointedly satirised Dekker and Marston, charging Dekker with arrogancy, impudence, and other faults. In Dekker's reply there is naturally more raillery and abuse than wit or poetry, but it was well received by the play-going public.

Horace is thus amusingly introduced as in the act of concocting an ode:

To thee whose forehead swells with roses,
Whose most haunted bower
Gives life and scent to every flower,
Whose most adored name encloses
Things abstruse, deep and divine;
Whose yellow tresses shine

Bright as Eoan fire.

Oh, me thy priest inspire!

For I to thee and thine immortal name,

In—in—in golden tunes,

For I to thee and thine immortal name—

In—sacred raptures flowing, flowing, swimming, swimming:

In sacred raptures swimming,

Immortal name, game, dame, tame, lame, lame, lame,
[Foh,] hath, shame, proclaim, oh—

In sacred raptures flowing, will proclaim [no!].

Oh, me thy priest inspire!

For I to thee and thine immortal name,

In flowing numbers filled with spright and flame (Good, good!)

In flowing numbers filled with spright and flame.

Horace by-and-by complains that his lines were often maliciously misconstrued and misapplied, complacently remarking:

The error is not mine, but in their eye
That cannot take proportions.

Dekker, happily enough, makes his Crispinus reply:

Horace, Horace,

To stand within the shot of galling tongues

Proves not your guilt; for could we write on paper

Made of those turning leaves of heaven, the clouds,

Or speak with angels' tongues, yet wise men know

That some would shake the head; though saints should sing,

Some snakes must hiss, because they're born with sting. . . .

Do we not see fools laugh at heaven and mock

The Maker's workmanship? Be not you grieved

If that which you mould fair, upright, and smooth,

Be screwed awry, made crooked, lame, and vile,

By racking comments and calumnious tongues.

So to be bit it rankles not, for Innocence

May with a feather brush off the foul wrong.

But when your dastard wit will strike at men

In corners, and in riddles fold the vices

Of your best friends, you must not take to heart

If they take off all gilding from their pills,

And only offer you the bitter core.

Dekker's Honest Whore was enthusiastically praised by Hazlitt, as combining 'the simplicity of prose with the graces of poetry'; 'simplicity and extravagance, homeliness and quaintness, tragedy and comedy.' Passages like the following, spoken by a long-suffering husband whose patience has been sore taxed by a capricious wife, are memorable:

Duke. What comfort do you find in being so calm?

Candido. That which green wounds receive from sovereign balm.

Patience, my lord! why, 'tis the soul of peace:

Of all the virtues, 'tis nearest kin to heaven:

It makes men look like gods. The best of men

That e'er wore earth about him was a sufferer,

A soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit;

The first true gentleman that ever breathed.

The stock of patience cannot then be poor;

All it desires it has; what monarch more?

It is the greatest enemy to law
That can be ; for it doth embrace all wrongs,
And so chains up lawyer's and women's tongues.
'Tis the perpetual prisoner's liberty,
His walks and orchards ; 'tis the bond slave's freedom,
And makes him seem proud of each iron chain,
As though he wore it more for state than pain :
It is the beggar's music and thus sings,
Although their bodies beg, their souls are kings.

(From Part I. Act v. sc. ii.)

The Magdalene pathetically contrasts female honour and shame :

Nothing did make me, when I loved them best,
To loathe them more than this : when in the street
A fair, young, modest damsel I did meet ;
She seemed to all a dove when I passed by,
And I to all a raven : every eye
That followed her went with a bashful glance :
At me each bold and jeering countenance
Darted forth scorn : to her, as if she had been Some tower unvanquished, would they vail :
'Gainst me swoln Rumour hoisted every sail ;
She, crowned with reverend praises, passed by them ;
I, though with face masked, could not 'scape the hem ;
For, as if heaven had set strange marks on them,
Because they should be pointing-stocks to man,
Drest up in civilest shape, a courtesan,
Let her walk saint-like, noteless, and unknown,
Yet she's betrayed by some trick of her own.

(From Part II. Act iv. sc. i.)

Thus Hippolito laments, gazing on the portrait of his love, believed to be dead :

My Infelice's face, her brow, her eye,
The dimple on her cheek : and such sweet skill
Hath from the cunning workman's pencil flown,
These lips look fresh and lively as her own ;
Seeming to move and speak. Alas ! now I see
The reason why fond women love to buy
Adulterate complexion : here 'tis read ;
False colours last after the true be dead.
Of all the roses grafted on her cheeks,
Of all the graces dancing in her eyes,
Of all the music set upon her tongue,
Of all that was past woman's excellence
In her white bosom—look, a painted board
Circumscribes all ! Earth can no bliss afford ;
Nothing of her but this ! This cannot speak ;
It has no lap for me to rest upon ;
No lip worth tasting. Here the worms will feed,
As in her coffin. Hence, then, idle art,
True love's best pictured in a true love's heart.
Here art thou drawn, sweet maid, till this be dead,
So that thou livest twice, twice art buried.
Thou figure of my friend, lie there !

(From Part I. Act iv. sc. i.)

In Old Fortunatus the old hero describes court life, from painful experience, to his (oddly-named) sons Ampedo and Andelocia :

For still in all the regions I have seen,
I scorned to crowd among the muddy throng
Of the rank multitude, whose thickened breath,
Like to condensed fogs, do choke that beauty,
Which else would dwell in every kingdom's cheek.

No ; I still boldly stept into their courts :
For there to live 'tis rare, O 'tis divine !
There shall you see faces angelical ;
There shall you see troops of chaste goddesses,
Whose starlike eyes have power, might they still shine.
To make night day, and day more crystalline.
Near these you shall behold great heroes,
White-headed counsellors, and jovial spirits,
Standing like fiery cherubims to guard
The monarch, who in godlike glory sits
In midst of these, as if this deity
Had with a look created a new world,
The standers-by being the fair workmanship.

And. Oh, how my soul is rapt to a third heaven !
I'll travel sure, and live with none but kings. . . .

Amp. But tell me, father, have you in all courts
Beheld such glory, so majestic,
In all perfection, no way blemished ?

Fort. In some courts shall you see Ambition
Sit piecing Dedalus's old waxen wings ;
But being clapt on, and they about to fly,
Even when their hopes are busied in the clouds,
They melt against the sun of Majesty,
And down they tumble to destruction.
For since the Heaven's strong arms teach kings to stand,
Angels are placed about their glorious throne
To guard it from the strokes of traitorous hands.
By travel, boys, I have seen all these things.
Fantastic Compliment stalks up and down,
Trickt in outlandish feathers ; all his words,
His looks, his oaths, are all ridiculous,
All apish, childish, and Italianate.

(From Act II. sc. ii.)

Orleans, distracted by his love, defends himself :

Galloway. O call this madness in ; see from the windows
Of every eye derision thrusts out her cheeks
Wrinkled with idiot laughter ; every finger
Is like a dart shot from the hand of scorn
By which thy name is hurt, thine honour torn.

Orleans. Laugh they at me, sweet Galloway ?

Gall. Even at thee.

Orl. Ha, ha, I laugh at them, are they not mad
That let my true true sorrow make them glad ?
I dance and sing only to anger grief
That in that anger he might smite life down
With his iron fist. Good heart, it seemeth then,
They laugh to see grief kill me : O fond men,
You laugh at others tears ; when others smile
You tear yourselves in pieces : vile, vile, vile !
Ha, ha, when I behold a swarm of fools
Crowding together to be counted wise,
I laugh because sweet Agripyne's not there,
But weep because she is not anywhere,
And weep because, whether she be or not,
My love was ever and is still forgot ;
Forgot, forgot, forgot, forgot !

(From Act III. sc. I.)

There is something like Marlowe in much of Dekker's blank verse, something Shakespearean in some turns of his thought ; and single phrases linger in the memory—'O what a heaven is love ! O what a hell !' 'Honest labour bears a lovely face.'

Of Dekker's prose tracts and works, as various in subject as descriptions of the plague in London (see The Plague Pamphlets of Dekker, edited by F. P. Wilson in 1926) or of the rogueries of horse-dealers, and highly devotional exercises, the best known is The Gull's Hornbook (1609). The work is largely indebted to Dedekind's Grobianus (Frankfort, 1549), a Latin satire on drunkenness and the debaucheries of the time, translated into German rhyming couplets and expanded by Scheidt in 1557. Dekker had translated part of the Latin version into English verse, but, on reflection, not liking the subject, he says, he 'altered the shape, and of a Dutchman fashioned a mere Englishman,' assuming the character of a guide to the fashionable follies of the town, but only on purpose to ridicule them :

The Old World and the New weighed together.

Good clothes are the embroidered trappings of pride, and good cheer the very eryngo-root¹ of gluttony, so that fine backe and ful bellies are coach horses to two of the seven deadly sins ; in the boots of which coach Lechery and Sloth sit like the waiting-maid. In a most desperate state therefore do tailors and cooks stand by means of their offices ; for both these trades are apple-squires² to that couple of sins. The one invents more fantastic fashions than France hath worn since her first stone was laid ; the other more lickishish epicurean dishes than were ever served up to Gallonius's³ table. Did man, think you, come wrangling into the world about no better matters, than all his lifetime to make privy searches in Birchlin Lane for whalebone doublets, or for pies of nightingales' tongues in Heliogabalus's kitchen ? No, no ; the first suit of apparel that ever mortal man put on came neither from the mercer's shop nor the merchant's warehouse : Adam's bill would have been taken then, sooner than a knight's bond now ; yet was he great in nobody's books for satin and velvets. The silkworms had something else to do in those days than to set up looms, and be free of the weavers ; his breeches were not so much worth as King Stephen's, that cost but a poor noble ; for Adam's holyday hose and doublet were of no better stuff than plain fig-leaves, and Eve's best gown of the same piece : there went but a pair of shears between them. An antiquary in this town has yet some of the powder of those leaves dried to shew. Tailors then were none of the twelve companies : their hall, that now is larger than some dorpes⁴ among the Netherlands, was then no bigger than a Dutch butcher's shop : they durst not strike down their customers with large bills : Adam cared not an apple-paring for all their lousy hems. There was then neither the Spanish slop, nor the skipper's galligaskin, the Danish sleeve sagging down like a Welsh wallet, the Italian's close strosser,⁵ nor the French standing collar : your treble-quadruple dædalian ruffs, nor your stiff-necked rabatos,⁶ that have more arches⁷ for pride to row under than can stand under five London bridges, durst not then set themselves out in print ; for the patent for starch could by no means be signed. Fashions then was counted a disease, and horses died of it : but now, thanks to folly, it is held the only rare physic ; and the purest golden asses live upon it.

As for the diet of that Saturnian age, it was like their attire, homely. A salad and a mess of leek-porridge was a dinner for a far greater man than ~~ever~~ the Turk was. Potato-pies and custards stood like the sinful suburbs of cookery, and had not a wall so much as a handful high built round about them. There were no daggers⁸ then, nor no chairs. Crookes's ordinary, in those parsimonious days, had not a capon's leg to throw at a dog. O golden world ! The suspicious Venetian carved not his meat with a silver pitchfork,⁹ neither did the sweet-toothed Englishman shift a dozen of trenchers at one meal ; Piers Ploughman laid the cloth, and Simplicity brought in the voider.¹⁰ How wonderfully is the world altered ! And no marvel, for it has lain sick almost five thousand years ; so that it is no more like the old theatre du monde than old Paris Garden¹¹ is like the king's garden at Paris.

¹ As a provocative medicine. ² Pimps. ³ Gallonius, town-crier at Rome about 150 B.C., was proverbial for wealth and gluttony. ⁴ Thorpes, villages. ⁵ Trosser, trouser. ⁶ Ruffs. ⁷ The fluting or puckering. ⁸ Instruments to fix the meat while cutting. ⁹ Forks were introduced from Italy about 1600. ¹⁰ The basket in which broken meat was carried from the table. ¹¹ The Bear Garden at Bankside.

How a Gallant should behave himself in Paul's Walks.¹

Being weary with sailing up and down amongst these shores of Barbaria, here let us cast our anchor ; and nimbly leap to land in our coasts, whose fresh air shall be so much the more pleasing to us, if the ninnyhammer, whose perfection we labour to set forth, have so much foolish wit left him as to choose the place where to suck in ; for that true humorous gallant that desires to pour himself into all fashions, if his ambition be such to excel even compliment itself, must as well practise to diminish his walks as to be various in his salads, curious in his tobacco, or ingenious in the trussing up of a new Scotch hose ; all which virtues are excellent, and able to maintain him ; especially if the old worm-eaten farmer, his father, be dead, and left him five hundred a year : only to keep an Irish hobby,² an Irish horseboy, and himself like a gentleman. He therefore that would strive to fashion his legs to his silk stockings, and his proud gait to his broad garters, let him whiff down these observations. . . .

Your mediterranean isle³ is then the only gallery wherein the pictures of all your true fashionate and complemental gulls are and ought to be hung up. Into that gallery carry your neat body ; but take heed you pick out such an hour when the main shoal of islanders are swimming up and down. And first observe your doors of entrance, and your exit ; not much unlike the players at the theatres : keeping your decorums, even in phantasticality. As for example : if you prove to be a northern gentleman, I would wish you to pass through the north door, more often especially than any of the other ; and so, according to your countries, take note of your entrances.

Now for your venturing into the walk. Be circumspect and wary what pillar you come in at ; and take heed in any case, as you love the reputation of your honour, that you avoid the serving-man's log,⁴ and approach not within five fathom of that pillar ; but bend your course directly in the middle line, that the whole body of the church may appear to be yours ; where, in view of all, you may publish your suit in what manner you affect most, either with the slide of your cloak from the one shoulder ; and then you must, as 'twere in anger, suddenly snatch at the middle of the inside, if it be taffeta at the least; and so by that means your costly lining is bewrayed, or else by the pretty advantage of compliment. But one note by the way do I especially woo you to, the neglect of which makes many of our gallants cheap and ordinary, that by no means you be seen above four turns; but in the fifth make yourself away, either in some of the seamsters' shops, the new tobacco-office, or amongst the booksellers, where, if you cannot read, exercise your smoke, and inquire who has writ against this divine weed, &c.⁵ For this withdrawing yourself a little will much benefit your suit, which else, by too long walking, would be stale to the whole spectators; but howsoever, if Paul's jacks⁶ be once up with their elbows, and quarrelling to strike eleven, as soon as ever the clock has parted them, and ended the fray with his hammer, let not the Duke's gallery contain you any longer, but pass away apace in open view; in which departure, if by chance you either encounter, or aloof off throw your inquisitive eye upon any knight or squire, being your familiar, salute him not by his name of Sir such a one, or so; but call him Ned, or Jack, &c. This will set off your estimation with great men; and if, though there be a dozen companies between you, 'tis the better he call aloud to you, for that is most genteel, to know where he shall find you at two o'clock; tell him at such an ordinary, or such; and be sure to name those that are dearest, and whither none but your gallants resort. After dinner you may appear again, having translated yourself out of your English cloth cloak into a light Turkey grogam, if you have that happiness of shifting; and then be seen, for a turn or two, to correct your teeth with some quill or silver instrument, and to cleanse your gums with a wrought handkerchief; it skills not whether you dined or no: that is best known to your stomach; or in what place you dined; though it were with cheese, of your own mother's making, in your chamber, or study.

Now if you chance to be a gallant not much crossed among citizens; that is, a gallant in the mercer's books, exalted for satins and velvets; if you be not so much blessed to be crossed (as I hold it the greatest blessing in the world to be great in no man's books), your Paul's walk is your only refuge: the Duke's tomb⁷ is a sanctuary, and will keep you alive from worms and land-rats that long to be feeding on your carcass: there you may spend your legs in winter a whole afternoon; converse, plot, laugh, and talk anything; jest at your creditor, even to his face; and in the evening, even by lamp-light, steal out; and so cozen a whole covey of abominable catchpoles.

¹ Old St Paul's Church was a common promenade. ² Pacing horse. ³ The middle aisle of St Paul's. ⁴ A portion set apart for gentlemen's servants. ⁵ Tobacco is satirised not merely here and in King James's Counterblast (1604), but in Ben Jonson's plays and innumerable pamphlets and satires. ⁶ Automaton striking apparatus of the clock. ⁷ The tomb of Sir John Beauchamp, son of Guy, Earl of Warwick, was unaccountably called 'Duke Humphrey's Tomb,' and the dinnerless persons who lounged here were said to have 'dined with Duke Humphrey.'

Sleep.

For do but consider what an excellent thing sleep is: it is so inestimable a jewel, that, if a tyrant would give his crown for an hour's slumber, it cannot be bought: of so beautiful a shape is it, that, though a man live with an empress, his heart cannot be at quiet till he leaves her embracements to be at rest with the other: yea, so greatly are we indebted to this kinsman of death, that we owe the better tributary half of our life to him; and there is good cause why we should do so; for sleep is that golden chain that ties health and our bodies together. Who complains of want, of wounds, of cares, of great men's oppressions, of captivity, whilst he sleepeth? Beggars in their beds take as much pleasure as kings. Can we therefore surfeit on this delicate ambrosia? Can we drink too much of that, whereof to taste too little, tumbles us into a churchyard; and to use it but indifferently throws us into Bedlam? No, no. Look upon Endymion, the moon's minion, who slept threescore and fifteen years, and was not a hair the worse for it!

Dekker's plays were collected by R. H. Shepherd (1873), his pamphlets by Dr Grosart (1884-86). Rhys edited five plays ('Mermaid Series,' 1887). See Mary L. Hunt's Thomas Dekker (1912), Tucker Brooke's Tudor Drama (1912), and Swinburne's Essay (1887).

John Webster.—The name of John Webster is the type of the obscurity which broods over so many of the poets of the Elizabethan and Jacobean periods. There is no one, of equal eminence, in the range of English literature of whom so little is known. Not a positive fact, not a reminiscence, not an anecdote, brings this shadowy figure before us for a moment, and we have to construct our impression of him entirely from his works. He was 'one born free of the Merchant-Tailors' Company;' according to Gildon, who wrote nearly a century later, he was clerk of St Andrew's parish in Holborn. It is thought that he began to write for the stage in 1602; the first examples of his work which we know that we possess are the 'additions' he made to Marston's Malcontent in 1604; of these the fine 'induction' is the most notable. It has been supposed that he joined Dekker in writing Westward Ho in 1603 and Northward Ho in 1605, but these comedies were not printed until 1607. In the first of these Dekker's genius is predominant; the second, which is written in harsh prose, offers nothing characteristic of either poet. Webster was associated with Dekker in 1607 in the tragical history of Sir Thomas Wyatt. Caesar's Fall and The Two Harpies, still earlier collaborations, have disappeared altogether.

It is conjectured that The White Devil, or the Life and Death of Vittoria Corombona, was acted in 1608, but it was not printed until 1612. It was followed on the boards by Appius and Virginia (published in 1654), by The Devil's Law-case (published in 1623), and The Duchess of Malfi (probably acted in 1612, although not printed until 1623). These four are the plays upon which Webster's reputation is supported, and they belong to the period immediately succeeding upon the retirement of Shakespeare to the country. By the time of Shakespeare's death Webster had in all probability ceased to produce dramatic work of importance. The City pageant of 1624 was 'invented and written by John Webster, merchant-tailor,' and he is supposed to be the cloth-worker of that name who died in 1625. It will be seen that this brief account is full of contestable matter, yet it contains all that can even be safely guessed as to the life of Webster. (For his debt to Sidney's Arcadia, see Notes and Queries, Sept.-Oct. 1904.)

Webster achieved little success in his own age, and was the object of no curiosity to the next. He was unknown until the beginning of the nineteenth century, when Lamb and Hazlitt called attention to his merit. Since that time the fame of Webster has been more and more assured, and he holds a place below none of Shakespeare's satellites except Ben Jonson and Marlowe. Indeed, in the elements of pure tragedy he comes nearest to the master himself, and the Duchess of Malfi is unquestionably the most elevated tragic poem in the language not written by the pen of Shakespeare. 'No poet,' declares Swinburne, ascending to a still higher flight of praise, 'has ever so long and so successfully sustained at their utmost height and intensity the expressed emotions and the united effects of terror and pity.' This is, indeed, the main quality of Webster, its subtlety of pathetic horror. It is hardly critical, however, in any comparative consideration of this poet, to omit to acknowledge his dramatic shortcomings. His plays are exceedingly ill-constructed; most of them are mere clusters of scenes, violently put together, and eked out with dumb-show, in a manner so primitive that we seem to have gone back a generation, and to be listening to a poet ignorant of what Shakespeare, and even Jonson and Fletcher, had added to the capacities of stage-effect.

A bewildering inequality of execution is characteristic of every play of Webster's; this is less marked in Appius and Virginia, and perhaps in the Duchess of Malfi, than in the others. We are told that he was an extremely slow and painstaking writer, so that this apparent want of skill is not the result of heedlessness. But it invades even his versification, which is by turns among the best and among the worst which has come down to us from the early seventeenth century. The subjects which attracted Webster were all of an Italian source and character; he was attracted by the vehement types and issues provoked by a condition of society at once highly civilised and insolently lawless. He found exactly what he wanted in several contemporary stories of intrigue and murder in the courts of Italy. He was perhaps a poet who by force of circumstances was forced on to the stage, rather than a born dramatist; for he seems to crowd too many incidents into each scene, too much variety of psychological passion into each character, for the simplicity of dramatic action. It will be felt by most unprejudiced readers that the scenes of horror which close his two great tragedies have been too readily applauded by Lamb and those who have succeeded him. It is, surely, not in the somersaults of these scuffling and yelling mario-nettes that Webster does real justice to his noble genius as a tragic poet. He is often a sort of exalted Mrs Radcliffe in his unrestrained affection for all the nightmares of romance, but it is not for his poisoned daggers and clanking chains that we follow him spell-bound.

Webster owes the exalted station which has at length been successfully claimed for him by his admirers to his penetration into the troubled sources of human emotion. In the White Devil and the Duchess of Malfi, his two great tragical poems, this quality is seen displayed with least reserve. It saves Webster from the mere blood-and-thunder rhetoric of some of his contemporaries because it displays to him those tender and pitiful incidents which spring up like flowers along the road of crime, and not merely lighten its horror, but add to it an exquisite pathos. The fourth act of the Duchess of Malfi, where the fortitude of the Duchess is put to so many awful and unprecedented tests, and the terror and pity of the audience is augmented at every change of scene, is one of the most amazing passages of fantastic tragedy ever composed in any language. It reaches its climax in the dark colloquy between Bosola, disguised as an old man, and the hunted woman who is 'Duchess of Malfi still.' The same effects, in cruder form, are to be met with in the White Devil, where the demons drag Vittoria downward, with her last cry, ringing in our ears. This penetration and inventive power concentrated on violent emotion give Webster a unique place among poets. He would be still more amazing than he is were it possible for us to believe that he was not influenced by the tragedies of Shakespeare. But although he owes much to this overwhelming predecessor, Webster has a character among English poets entirely his own; he is the highest expression that we possess of the sinister pursuit of moral beauty in the literature of crime and horror.

'I am lost forever!'

From 'The White Devil.'

Francisco de Medicis. Your reverend mother
Is grown a very old woman in two hours.
I found them winding of Marcello's corse;
And there is such a solemn melody,
'Tween doleful songs, tears, and sad elegies;
Such as old grandams, watching by the dead,
Were wont t' outwear the nights with—that, believe me,
I had no eyes to guide me forth the room,
They were so o'ercharg'd with water.

Flamino. I will see them.

Fran. 'Twere much uncharity in you; for your sight
Will add unto their tears.

Flam. I will see them:

They are behind the traverse; I'll discover curtain
Their superstitious howling.

CORNELIA, ZANCHE, and three other ladies discovered
winding MARCELLO'S corse.

Cornelia. This rosemary is wither'd; pray, get fresh.
I would have these herbs grow up in his grave,
When I am dead and rotten. Reach the bays,
I'll tie a garland here about his head;
'Twill keep my boy from lightning. This sheet
I have kept this twenty year, and every day

Hallow'd it with my prayers ; I did not think
He should have wore it.

Zanche. Look you, who are yonder ?

Cor. O, reach me the flowers !

Zanche. Her ladyship's foolish.

Woman. Alas, her grief

Hath turn'd her child again !

Cor. You're very welcome :

There's rosemary for you, and rue for you, [To Flamineo.
Heart's-ease for you ; I pray make much of it,
I have left more for myself.

Fram. Lady, who's this ?

Cor. You are, I take it, the grave-maker.

Flam. So.

Zanche. 'Tis Flamineo. [hand :

Cor. Will you make me such a fool ? here's a white
Can blood so soon be wash'd out ? let me see ;
When screech-owls croak upon the chimney-tops,
And the strange cricket i' th' oven sings and hops,
When yellow spots do on your hands appear,
Be certain then you of a corse shall hear.
Out upon 't, how 'tis speckled ! h'as handled a toad sure.
Cowslip water is good for the memory :
Pray, buy me three ounces of 't.

Flam. I would I were from hence.

Cor. Do you hear, sir ?

I'll give you a saying which my grandmother
Was wont, when she heard the bell toll, to sing o'er Unto her lute.

Flam. Do, an you will, do.

Cornelia sings.

Call for the robin-red breast, and the wren,
Since o'er shady groves they hover,
And with leaves and flowers do cover
The friendless bodies of unburied men.
Call unto his funeral dole
The ant, the field-mouse, and the mole,
To rear him hillocks that shall keep him warm,
And (when gay tombs are robb'd) sustain no harm ;
But keep the wolf far thence, that 's foe to men,
For with his nails he'll dig them up again.

(From Act v.)

From 'The Duchess of Malfi.'

Ferdinand. Where are you ?

Duchess. Here, sir.

Ferd. This darkness suits you well.

Duch. I would ask you pardon.

Ferd. You have it ;

For I account it the honourablest revenge,
Where I may kill, to pardon. Where are your cubs ?

Duch. Whom ?

Ferd. Call them your children,

For though our national law distinguish bastards
From true legitimate issue, compassionate nature
Makes them all equal.

Duch. Do you visit me for this ?

You violate a sacrament o' the church,
Shall make you howl in hell for 't.

Ferd. It had been well

Could you have lived thus always : for, indeed,
You were too much i' th' light—but no more ;
I come to seal my peace with you. Here's a hand [Gives her a dead man's hand.

To which you have vowed much love ; the ring upon 't
You gave.

Duch. I affectionately kiss it.

Ferd. Pray, do, and bury the print of it in your heart.
I will leave this ring with you for a love-token ;
And the hand as sure as the ring ; and do not doubt
But you shall have the heart too : when you need a friend.
Send it to him that owned it ; you shall see
Whether he can aid you.

Duch. You are very cold :
I fear you are not well after your travel.
Ha ! lights ! O horrible !

Ferd. Let her have lights enough. [Exit.

Duch. What witchcraft doth he practise, that he hath left
A dead man's hand here ?

[Here is discovered, behind a traverse, the artificial figures of Antonio and his children, appearing as if they were dead.]

Bosola. Look you, here's the piece from which 'twasta'en.
He doth present you this sad spectacle,
That, now you know directly they are dead,
Hereafter you may wisely cease to grieve
For that which cannot be recovered.

Duch. There is not between heaven and earth one wish
I stay for after this.

(From Act iv. sc. i.)

Afterwards, in aggravation of his cruelty, the brother sends a troop of madmen from the hospital to make a concert round the duchess in prison.
After they have danced and sung Bosola enters,
disguised as an old man :

Duch. Is he mad too ? . . .

Bos. I am come to make thy tomb.

Duch. Ha ! my tomb ?

Thou speak'st as if I lay upon my death-bed,
Gasping for breath : Dost thou perceive me sick ?

Bos. Yes, and the more dangerously, since thy sickness is insensible.

Duch. Thou art not mad sure : dost know me ?

Bos. Yes.

Duch. Who am I ?

Bos. Thou art a box of worm-seed ; at best but a salvatory of green mummy. What's this flesh ? a little crudged milk, fantastical puff-paste. Our bodies are weaker than those paper-prisons boys use to keep flies in ; more contemptible, since ours is to preserve earthworms. Didst thou ever see a lark in a cage ? Such is the soul in the body : this world is like her little turf of grass ; and the heaven o'er our heads, like her looking-glass, only gives us a miserable knowledge of the small compass of our prison.

Duch. Am not I thy duchess ?

Bos. Thou art some great woman, sure, for riot begins to sit on thy forehead, clad in gray hairs, twenty years sooner than on a merry milkmaid's. Thou sleepest worse than if a mouse should be forced to take up her lodging in a cat's ear : a little infant that breeds its teeth should it lie with thee, would cry out as if thou wert the more unquiet bedfellow.

Duch. I am Duchess of Malfi still.

Bos. That makes thy sleeps so broken.
Glories, like glow-worms, afar off shine bright ;
But, looked to near, have neither heat nor light.

Duch. Thou art very plain.

Bos. My trade is to flatter the dead, not the living.
I am a tomb-maker.

Duch. And thou comest to make my tomb ?

Bos. Yes.

Duch. Let me be a little merry—
Of what stuff wilt thou make it?

Bos. Nay, resolve me first; of what fashion?

Duch. Why, do we grow fantastical in our death-bed?
Do we affect fashion in the grave?

Bos. Most ambitiously. Princes' images on their tombs do not lie as they were wont, seeming to pray up to heaven; but with their hands under their cheeks, as if they died of the toothache: they are not carved with their eyes fixed upon the stars; but as their minds were wholly bent upon the world, the selfsame way they seem to turn their faces.

Duch. Let me know fully, therefore, the effect
Of this thy dismal preparation,
This talk fit for a charnel.

Bos. Now I shall.

[Executioners with coffin, cords, and bell.]

Here is a present from your princely brothers;
And may it arrive welcome, for it brings
Last benefit, last sorrow.

Duch. Let me see it.

I have so much obedience in my blood,
I wish it in their veins to do them good.

Bos. This is your last presence-chamber.

Cariola. O my sweet lady.

Duch. Peace! it affrights not me.

Bos. I am the common bellman,
That usually is sent to condemned persons
The night before they suffer.

Duch. Even now thou saidst

Thou wast a tomb-maker.

Bos. 'Twas to bring you
By degrees to mortification: Listen.

Dirge.

Hark! now every thing is still;
The screech-owl and the whistler shrill
Call upon our dame aloud,
And bid her quickly don her shroud.
Much you had of land and rent;
Your length in clay's now competent.
A long war disturbed your mind;
Here your perfect peace is signed.
Of what is't fools make such vain keeping?
Sin their conception, their birth weeping:
Their life a general mist of error;
Their death a hideous storm of terror.
Strew your hair with powder sweet,
Don clean linen, bathe your feet,
And, the foul fiend more to check,
A crucifix let bless your neck.
'Tis now full tide 'tween night and day:
End your groan, and come away.

Car. Hence, villains, tyrants, murderers! Alas!
What will you do with my lady? Call for help.

Duch. To whom; to our next neighbours? They are mad folks.

Bos. Remove that noise,

Duch. Farewell, Cariola.

In my last will I have not much to give;
A many hungry guests have fed upon me;
Thine will be but a poor reversion.

Car. I will die with her.

Duch. I pray thee look thou giv'st my little boy
Some syrup for his cold; and let the girl
Say her prayers ere she sleep. [Cariola is forced out.]

Now what you please.

What death?

Bos. Strangling. Here are your executioners.

Duch. I forgive them.

The apoplexy, catarrh, or cough o' the lungs,
Would do as much as they do.

Bos. Doth not death fright you?

Duch. Who would be afraid on 't,
Knowing to meet such excellent company
In the other world.

Bos. Yet methinks

The manner of your death should much afflict you;
This cord should terrify you.

Duch. Not a whit.

What would it pleasure me to have my throat cut
With diamonds? or to be smothered

With cassia? or to be shot to death with pearls?

I know death hath ten thousand several doors

For men to take their exits: and 'tis found

They go on such strange geometrical hinges,

You may open them both ways: any way, for Heaven sake,

So I were out of your whispering. Tell my brothers

That I perceive death, now I am well awake,

Best gift is they can give or I can take.

I would fain put off my last woman's fault,

I'd not be tedious to you.

1st Executioner. We are ready.

Duch. Dispose my breath how please you; but my body
Bestow upon my women, will you?

1st Execut. Yes.

Duch. Pull, and pull strongly, for your able strength
Must pull down heaven upon me.

Yet stay; heaven-gates are not so highly arched

As princes' palaces; they that enter there

Must go upon their knees. [Kneels.] Come, violent death,

Serve for mandragora to make me sleep.

Go, tell my brothers, when I am laid out,

They then may feed in quiet. . . . [They strangle her.]

Enter FERDINAND.

Ferd. Is she dead?

Bos. She is what you would have her.

But here begin your pity. [Shows children strangled.]

Alas, how have these offended?

Ferd. The death

Of young wolves is never to be pitied.

Bos. Fix your eye here.

Ferd. Constantly.

Bos. Do you not weep?

Other sins only speak; murder shrieks out.

The element of water moistens the earth,

But blood flies upwards, and bedews the heavens.

Ferd. Cover her face: mine eyes dazzle: she died young.

Bos. I think not so: her infelicity
Seemed to have years too many.

Ferd. She and I were twins:

And should I die this instant, I had lived
Her time to a minute.

* Webster's works were edited by Dyce (1830), Hazlitt (1857-58), and Lucas (1927). See also E. E. Stoll's John Webster, the Periods of his Work (1903), and Rupert Brooke's dissertation (1916).

EDMUND GOSSE.

Cyril Tournour, or TURNER (1575?-1626), dramatist, was possibly the son of Richard Turnor, Lieutenant of the Brill (the Dutch having in 1585 agreed to a temporary English occupation of Briel and Flushing), served in the Low Countries, was secretary to Cecil in the Cadiz expedition, was put ashore sick at Kinsale on his return, and died in Ireland, February 28, 1626, leaving his widow destitute. In 1600 he published his Transformed Metamorphosis (discovered in 1872), a satirical poem, marred by pedantic affectations; in 1609 a Funeral Poem on the English governor of the Brill; in 1613 an Elegy on Prince Henry. His fame rests on two plays, the Revenger's Tragedy, printed in 1607, and the (earlier and poorer) Atheist's Tragedy, printed in 1611. The Revenger's Tragedy, an appalling tale of all the unholy passions, shows tragic intensity, condensed passion, fiery strength of phrase, cynical and bitter mockery. Hazlitt compared it to Webster's work; Fleay (without due reason) thought it was Webster's; and Swinburne, who eulogises this as Tourneur's own masterpiece, says the only other dramatist's work it resembles is Shakespeare's. Charles Lamb could never read it but his ears tingled. Ward, while admitting the tragic power of the play, says, almost with Swinburne's vehemence, that its plot 'is in its sewer-like windings one of the blackest and most polluting devised by the perverted imagination of an age prone to feed on the worst scandals of the Italian decadence,' and that it is 'pruriency steeped in horrors.' John Addington Symonds is equally decided, and calls it 'an entangled web of lust, incest, fratricide, rape, adultery, mutual suspicion, hate, and bloodshed.' The Atheist's Tragedy is less revolting, but has enough and to spare of unnatural wickedness, besides being crude and ill-constructed. The wicked uncle helps his nephew off to the wars in order that he may murder his brother, the good lord, at leisure, and secure the rich heiress, his nephew's betrothed, for his contemptible son. He hires an assassin to murder the excellent and unsuspicious brother, and apparently simply to torment the father's heart before his murder, suborns the murderer as a disguised soldier to bring the perfectly false intelligence that the son is dead. In mere superfluity of naughtiness the women seek their own dishonour, and a stage 'Puritan' eagerly agrees to carry out every villainy proposed to him. To one of his victims the worst villain of the piece, the uncle, says (explaining the title beforehand):

No? Then invoke

Your great supposed protector. I will do't.

To which the victim rather inconsequently replies:

Supposed protector! Are ye an atheist? then

I know my prayers and tears are spent in vain.

It is significant that the passage which seems to contain the only really true and tender touch in the Atheist's Tragedy is the speech of the assassin, disguised as a soldier from the wars, telling the noble Montferrers the base lie about his son's death:

Borachio. The enemy, defeated of a fair
Advantage by a flatt'ring stratagem,
Plants all the artillery against the town;

Whose thunder and lightning made our bulwarks shake,
And threatened in that terrible report
The storm wherewith they meant to second it,
The assault was general. But, for the place
That promised most advantage to be forced,
The pride of all their army was drawn forth
And equally divided into front
And rear. They marched, and coming to a stand,
Ready to pass our channel at an ebb,
We advised it for our safest course, to draw
Our sluices up and mak't impassable.
Our governor opposed and suffered them
To charge us home e'en to the rampier's foot.
But when their front was forcing up our breach
At push o' pike, then did his policy
Let go the sluices, and tripped up the heels
Of the whole body of their troop that stood
Within the violent current of the stream.
Their front, beleaguered 'twixt the water and
The town, seeing the flood was grown too deep
To promise them a safe retreat, exposed
The force of all their spirits (like the last Expiring gasp of a strong-hearted man)
Upon the hazard of one charge, but were Oppressed, and fell. The rest that could not swim
Were only drowned; but those that thought to 'scape
By swimming were by murderers that flanked
The level of the flood, both drowned and slain. . . .
Walking next day upon the fatal shore,
Among the slaughtered bodies of their men,
Which the full stomach sea had cast upon
The sands, it was my unhappy chance to light
Upon a face whose favour, when it lived, appearance
My astonished mind informed me I had seen.
He lay in his armour, as if that had been
His coffin; and the weeping sea, like one
Whose milder temper doth lament the death
Of him whom in his rage he slew, runs up
The shore, embraces him, kisses his cheek;
Goes back again, and forces up the sands
To bury him; and every time it parts,
Sheds tears upon him; till at last, as if
It could no longer endure to see the man
Whom it had slain, yet loath to leave him—with
A kind of unresolved unwilling pace,
Winding her waves one in another like
A man that folds his arms, or wrings his hands,
For grief—ebbed from the body, and descends;
As if it would sink down into the earth,
And hide itself for shame of such a deed.

From the same play comes the quaintly anti-theatrical but pleasing 'Epitaph of Charlemont,' quite unlike Tourneur's usual thought or diction:

His body lies interr'd within this mould
Who died a young man yet departed old,
And all that strength of youth that man can have
Was ready still to drop into his grave;
Far ag'd in Virtue, with a youthful eye,
He welcom'd it, being still prepared to die;
And living so, though young depriv'd of breath,
He did not suffer an untimely death;
But we may say of his brave bless'd decease,
He died in war and yet he died in peace.

There are editions of Cyril Tourneur's works by Churton Collins (1878) and Allardyce Nicoll (1930); and of the two plays, with two of Webster's, by J. A. Symonds ('Mermaid Series,' 1888).

Thomas Heywood, himself an actor, was the most indefatigable of dramatic writers. He had, as he informs his readers, 'an entire hand, or at least a maine finger,' in two hundred and twenty plays. He wrote also a long series of other works in prose or verse, or in both, including translations from Lucian and other classics, defences of the stage, books of biography and theology, epitaphs and elegies. Most of the few facts we know about Heywood's life and history have been gleaned from his own writings and the dates of his plays. He seems to have been born about 1572; he was a native of Lincolnshire, and is said to have been a fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge; he was married; he was writing plays by 1596, and he continued to exercise his ready pen till 1641, when, as proved by Dr Katharine Bates, he died. In one of his prologues he adverts to the various sources of his multifarious labours:

To give content to this most curious age,
The gods themselves we've brought down to the stage
And figur'd them in planets; made even hell
Deliver up the Furies, by no spell
Saving the Muses' rapture: further, we
Have traffick'd by their help; no history
We have left unrifled; our pens have been dipt,
As well in opening each hid manuscript,
As tracts more vulgar, whether read or sung
In our domestic or more foreign tongue.
Of fairy elves, nymphs of the sea and land,
The lawns and groves, no number can be scann'd
Which we've not given feet to.

Charles Lamb's startling epithet for Heywood, 'a sort of prose Shakespeare,' is, even when qualified by Lamb's rather serious deduction—'but we miss the poet'—usually treated as one of his least happy appreciations, as a misleading paradox bred of the kindly critic's enthusiasm for his old dramatists, emphatic almost in proportion as they were neglected by the world. Lamb further says of Heywood: 'He possessed not the imagination of Shakespeare, but in all those qualities which gained for Shakespeare the attribute of gentle he was not inferior to him—generosity, courtesy, temperance in the depths of his passion; sweetness, in a word, and gentleness; Christianity, and true hearty Anglicism of feelings shaping that Christianity, shine throughout his beautiful writings in a manner more conspicuous than in those of Shakespeare.' This is high praise; but John Addington Symonds declares 'the verdict is in many points a just one. Heywood, while he lacks the poetry, philosophy, deep insight into nature, and consummate art of Shakespeare—those qualities, in a word, which render Shakespeare supreme among dramatic poets—has a sincerity, a tenderness of pathos, and an instinctive perception of nobility that distinguish him among the playwrights of the seventeenth century. Like Dekker, he wins our confidence and love. We keep a place in our affection for his favourite characters.' And J. A. Symonds calls Heywood's masterpiece, A Woman Killed with Kindness, 'the finest bourgeois tragedy of our Elizabethan literature.' Yet it is admitted that his first play, The Four Prentices of London, is absurd, and justly open to the caricature of it in Fletcher's Knight of the Burning Pestle; that his historical plays are mere chronicles hastily and perfunctorily dramatised to supply the immediate wants of the stage; that some of his plays are feeble and in bad taste; that he lacks the highest artistic instinct; and that in all his work—including his domestic, his romantic, and his classical or pseudo-classical plays—he is almost everywhere careless, and never produced one play reasonably perfect in dramatic form or any character self-consistent throughout. He resembled Shakespeare, certainly, in writing his plays to be acted rather than read, and in being strangely careless as to what became of them in the long-run. With Greene he was one of the earliest of English professional writers for the press, and he was not seldom a mere hack-writer; he wrote too freely, too constantly, and too much: it is recorded of him that, somewhat like Anthony Trollope, 'he obliged himself to write a sheet every day for several years together.' Ready invention, a certain lightness of touch, and directness were his gifts rather than creative power or the art of breathing into his characters the breath of life. His best things are single scenes, passages, or fragments. But he is very strong in his pictures of English home life, of the ways of English country gentlemen, and of English sailors. His pathos is sometimes forced sentiment, but is sometimes marvellously simple, true, and effective. He usually mixed prose and verse; and his English style is generally free and natural, though, like many contemporaries, he liked to set out his story with pedantic phrases and fantastic coinages. There is genuine poetry here and there in most of his pieces. His songs are many of them fresh, flowing, and musical, and linger in the memory.

Of Heywood's huge dramatic library, only twenty-four plays have come down to us, the best of which perhaps are A Woman Killed with Kindness (1603), The Rape of Lucrece (1608), The Fair Maid of the Exchange (1607), The English Traveller (1633), A Challenge for Beauty (1636), Love's Mistress (1636), and The Wise Woman of Hogsdon (1638). Edward IV. follows pretty closely the old ballads, of the 'Tanner of Tamworth' and of 'Jane Shore.' The Rape of Lucrece, spite of its subject, is so little classical in tone that one of the songs, for which it is chiefly noteworthy, begins:

Shall I woo the lovely Molly,
She's so fair, so fat, so jolly?

and another, in imitation-Dutch gibberish, has the eminently unclassical refrain:

Skerry merry vip,
Skerry merry vap!

In The Fair Maid of the West (printed in 1631), and in Fortune by Land and Sea (1655), partly written by William Rowley, he gives spirited descriptions of sea-fights. Love's Mistress (1636), the tale of Cupid and Psyche, is a sort of masque. In The Royall King and Loyall Subject (1637) the doctrine of passive obedience to kingly authority is carried to extreme lengths. The Captives, discovered by Mr Bullen, was printed by him in 1885. The Late Lancashire Witches, partly by Richard Brome, is farcical and rather vulgar. Heywood was also the author of an historical poem, Troja Britannica (1609); an Apology for Actors (1612); Nine Bookes of Various History concerning Women (1624); a poem in folio, The Hierarchie of the Blessed Angells (1635); a volume of rhymed translations from Lucian, Erasmus, Ovid, &c.; various pageants, tracts, and treatises; and The Life of Ambrosius Merlin (1641). In virtue of his General History of Women, 'containing the Lives of the most Holy and Profane, the most Famous and Infamous in all Ages' (1624; 2nd ed. 1657), and his Exemplary Lives of Nine the most Worthy Women of the World (1640), Heywood may be regarded as the father of all those who compile 'Lives of Twelve Bad Men' and 'Lives of Twelve Good Women'—sometimes thought a very modern enterprise.

The following extracts will show Heywood at his best in tragedy, and will explain the title of his masterpiece, A Woman Killed with Kindness. Frankford, discovering that he has been wronged by his wife and his friend, instead of slaying them both as they expected, makes an unusually gentle return (note the kindly 'O Nan!' to which he by-and-by recurs):

Mrs Frankford. O, by what words, what title, or what Shall I entreat your pardon? Pardon! Oh! [name I am as far from hoping such sweet grace, As Lucifer from heaven. To call you husband—O me most wretched! I have lost that name: I am no more your wife. [thee;

Frankford. Spare thou thy tears, for I will weep for And keep thy countenance, for I'll blush for thee. Now, I protest, I think 'tis I am tainted, For I am most ashamed; and 'tis more hard For me to look upon thy guilty face

Than on the sun's clear brow: what wouldst thou speak?

Mrs Fran. I would I had no tongue, no ears, no eyes, No apprehension, no capacity.

When do you spurn me like a dog? when tread me Under feet? when drag me by the hair?

Though I deserve a thousand thousand fold More than you can inflict: yet, once my husband, For womanhood, to which I am a shame, Though once an ornament; even for his sake, That hath redeem'd our souls, mark not my face, Nor hack me with your sword: but let me go Perfect and undeformed to my tomb.

I am not worthy that I should prevail

In the least suit; no, not to speak to you,

Nor look on you, nor to be in your presence:

Yet as an abject this one suit I crave;

This granted, I am ready for my grave.

[Kneels.

Fran. My God, with patience arm me! rise, nay, rise, And I'll debate with thee. Was it for want Thou play'dst the strumpet? Wast thou not supplied With every pleasure, fashion, and new toy; Nay, even beyond my calling?

Mrs Fran. I was.

Fran. Was it then disability in me? Or in thine eye seem'd he a properer man?

Mrs Fran. O no.

Fran. Did not I lodge thee in my bosom? Wear thee in my heart?

Mrs Fran. You did.

Fran. I did indeed, witness my tears I did. Go bring my infants hither. O Nan, O Nan; If neither fear of shame, regard of honour, The blemish of my house, nor my dear love, Could have withheld thee from so lewd a fact, Yet for these infants, these young harmless souls, On whose white brows thy shame is character'd, And grows in greatness as they wax in years—Look but on them, and melt away in tears. Away with them! lest as her spotted body Hath stain'd their names with stripe of bastardy, So her adulterous breath may blast their spirits With her infectious thoughts. Away with them!

Mrs Fran. In this one life I die ten thousand deaths.

Fran. Stand up, stand up, I will do nothing rashly. I will retire awhile into my study, And thou shalt hear thy sentence presently. [Exit.

He returns with CRANWELL. She falls on her knees.

Fran. My words are register'd in heaven already. With patience hear me. I'll not martyr thee, Nor mark thee for a strumpet; but with usage Of more humility torment thy soul. And kill thee even with kindness.

Cranwell. Mr Frankford.

Fran. Good Mr Cranwell.—Woman, hear thy judgment;

Go make thee ready in thy best attire; Take with thee all thy gowns, all thy apparel: Leave nothing that did ever call thee mistress, Or by whose sight, being left here in the house, I may remember such a woman was.

Choose thee a bed and hangings for thy chamber; Take with thee everything which hath thy mark, And get thee to my manor seven miles off; Where live; 'tis thine, I freely give it thee: My tenants by shall furnish thee with wains To carry all thy stuff within two hours; No longer will I limit thee my sight. Choose which of all my servants thou likest best, And they are thine to attend thee.

Mrs Fran. A mild sentence.

Fran. But as thou hopest for heaven, as thou believest Thy name's recorded in the book of life, I charge thee never after this sad day To see me or to meet me; or to send By word, or writing, gift, or otherwise, To move me, by thyself, or by thy friends; Nor challenge any part in my two children. So farewell, Nan! for we will henceforth be As we had never seen, ne'er more shall see.

Mrs Fran. How full my heart is, in mine eyes appears: What wants in words, I will supply in tears.

Fran. Come, take your coach, your stuff; all must along:

Servants and all make ready, all be gone.
It was thy hand cut two hearts out of one.

(From Act IV. sc. vi.)

Ultimately the unhappy woman dies of revived tenderness and remorse, with the forgiving kiss of her husband on her lips.

The following description of Psyche, from Love's Mistress, is in his more elaborate manner :

Admetus. Welcome to both in one ! Oh, can you tell
What fate your sister hath ?

Astioche and Petrea. Psyche is well.

Adm. So among mortals it is often said,
Children and friends are well when they are dead.

Astioche. But Psyche lives, and on her breath attend
Delights that far surmount all earthly joy ;
Music, sweet voices, and ambrosian fare ;
Winds, and the light-winged creatures of the air ;
Clear channelled rivers, springs, and flowery meads
Are proud when Psyche wantons on their streams,
When Psyche on their rich embroidery treads,
When Psyche gilds their crystal with her beams.
We have but seen our sister, and, behold !
She sends us with our laps full brimmed with gold.

Morning Ditty from 'Lucrece.'

Pack, clouds, away, and welcome day ;
With night we banish sorrow :
Sweet air, blow soft ; mount, lark, aloft,
To give my love good-morrow :
Wings from the wind to please her mind,
Notes from the lark I'll borrow :
Bird, prune thy wing ; nightingale, sing,
To give my love good-morrow.
To give my love good-morrow,
Notes from them all I'll borrow.

Wake from thy nest, robin-redbreast ;
Sing, birds, in every furrow ;
And from each bill let music shrill
Give my fair love good-morrow.
Blackbird and thrush in every bush—
Stare, linnet, and cock-sparrow—
You pretty elves, amongst yourselves,
Sing my fair love good-morrow.
To give my love good-morrow,
Sing, birds, in every furrow.

Song from the 'Fair Maid of the Exchange.'

Ye little birds that sit and sing
Amidst the shady valleys,
And see how Phillis sweetly walks
Within her garden alleys ;
Go, pretty birds, about her bower,
Sing, pretty birds, she may not lower.
Ah me, methinks I see her frown !
Ye pretty wantons, warble.

Go tell her through your chirping bills
As you by me are bidden,
To her is only known my love,
Which from the world is hidden ;
Go, pretty birds, and tell her so,
See that your notes strain not too low,
For still methinks I see her frown !
Ye pretty wantons, warble.

Go tune your voices' harmony,
And sing I am her lover ;
Strain loud and sweet, that every note
With sweet content may move her ;
And she that hath the sweetest voice,
Tell her I will not change my choice.
Yet still methinks I see her frown !
Ye pretty wantons, warble.

O fly, make haste, see, see, she falls
Into a pretty slumber ;
Sing round about her rosy bed
That waking she may wonder ;
Say to her 'tis her lover true
That sendeth love to you, to you ;
And when you hear her kind reply,
Return with pleasant warblings.

Vivid similes, not always in the happiest taste,
often occur, as in :

My friend and I
Like two chain-bullets side by side will fly
Through the jaws of death ;

and in :

Astonishment,
Fear, and amazement beat upon my heart,
Even as a madman beats upon a drum.

Mr Symonds has pointed out that Love's Mistress contains early specimens of classical burlesque.

The boy by chance upon her fan had spilled
A cup of nectar : oh, how Juno swore !
I told my aunt I'd give her a new fan
To let Jove's page be Cupid's serving man—

hardly sounds like the style of 1636. It is rather startling to find in The Fair Maid of the Exchange—though Heywood is in no wise responsible for our surprise—that the 'amorous gallant,' who is far from careful of delicacy either in speech or deed, is called Bowdler—an odd example of the irony of history before the event !

A curious specimen of Heywood's miscellaneous work—interesting in various ways, though really a very poor specimen of metrical bookmaking—is The Hierarchie of the Blessed Angells (1635). Spite of its name, this odd folio is much more detailed in its account of the unblessed angels, of diabolic possession, of enchantments, necromancy, astrology, white magic, black magic, levitation, unholy pacts with the devil, witchcraft, incubi and succubæ, and the stories of 'magitions' such as Faust and Cornelius Agrippa. Satan's invisible kingdom is indeed displayed at greater length than the kingdom of grace. The work, usually called a poem, is really a disquisition in nine books, half of each book being in very wooden verse, followed by a 'theologicall, philosophicall, poetical, historical, apothegmaticall, hieroglyphicall, and emblematicall' commentary, continuation, or expansion in excellent prose. The books are named after nine orders of celestial beings—Seraphim, Cherubim, Thrones, Dominations, Vertues, Powers, Principates, Arch-angels, and Angels proper, following exactly the arrangement in Dionysius the Areopagite, De Cælesti Hierarchia (compare Milton's favourite 'Thrones, dominations, principedoms, virtues, powers'). Heywood's 'Lucifer charg'd with insolence and spleene' inevitably suggests Milton's sons of 'Belial flown with insolence and wine,' and makes it likely that Milton knew Heywood's book, the plan of which is extraordinarily elastic. The first book, for example, treats the arguments for the being of God, refutes at great length the 'tenents of Atheisme and Saducisme,' deals with false gods, idolatry in general, and the 'malice of the divell.' The second book discusses the nature of God, the Trinity, and the deity of Christ in such verses as the following :

The sacred Scriptures are sufficient warrant
By many texts to make the Trine apparant,
As from the first creation we may prove—
God did create, God said, the Spirit did move.
Create imports the Father ; said the Sonne ;
The Spirit that mov'd, the Holy Ghost. This done,
Come to the Gospell, to Saint Paul repaire ;
Of him, through him, and for him all things are ;
To whom be everlasting praise. Amen !
In which it is observed by Origen,
Of, through, and for three Persons to imply,
And the word him the Godhead's Unity.

Room is found, in prose or verse, for discussing the creation of sun, moon, and stars, and their motions ; the constellations, and the myths involved ; astrology ; the creation of man and the fall of the angels, the fall of man, the redemption, and Scripture story ; together with the torments of hell, sketches of the ancient philosophical systems, mediæval theology, Mahomet and his 'Alcaron,' the hideous superstition of the Ethnicks, Finlanders, Laplanders, and 'Bothnienses.' Heywood's own views are supported by copious citations and translations from Homer, Lucian, Virgil, Mahomet, Avicenna, Abenzoar, the Jewish Rabbis, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, Hermes Trismegistus, Dionysius the Areopagite, Olaus Magnus, Dante, and hundreds of less-known authors ('Hear Faustus Andrelinus, an excellent poet' ! he says, meaning Andrelini, an Italian writer of Latin verse who died in 1518). His (Italian) quotations from Dante prove him to have been one of the earliest English students of Dante. And there is room not merely for innumerable blood-curdling witch-stories, but for apparently any pleasing anecdote or sound observation that occurs to him, often utterly irrelevant to the argument in hand. Thus, apropos of a meditation on death, comes a singular glimpse of contemporary treatment of English poets :

Mans life's a Goale and Death end of the race,
And thousand sundry wayes point to the place. . . .
For now the conqueror with the captive's spread
On one bare earth as on the common bed. . . .
The servant with the master, and the maid
Stretcht by her mistresse : both their heads are laid
Upon a common pillow. . . .
Blinde Homer in the grave lies doubly darke,
Against him now base Zoylus dares not barke.

From this he suddenly goes off to complain that, though Homer's fame is undisputed, in modern England 'impudent sycophants and ballading knaves' overbear 'meriting men.' Further, whereas 'past ages did the antient poets grace' by giving them their full style, often adding to their name the place of their birth or the nature of their work, so that with their worth encrease their stiles, the most grac'd with three names at least, in England it is quite otherwise. Then he seems inconsequently to justify the usage. And after quoting George Buchanan on the poverty of poets, he grumbles that now 'the puny assumes the name of poet,' and shamelessly

Tasks such artists as have took degree
Before he was a fresh man ; and because,
No good practitioner in the stage lawes,
He miss'd the applause he aim'd at, hee 'l devise
Another course his name to immortalise ;
Imploring divers pens, failing in 's owne,
To support that which others have cried down.

Incapable poets and dramatists in his time, in fact, were not merely insolent to their seniors who had been moderately successful, but having failed themselves, had recourse to log-rolling, no less. This is the principal part of the excursus :

Our moderne Poets to that passe are driven,
Those names are curtal'd which they first had given ;
And, as we wisht to have their memories drown'd,
We scarcely can afford them halfe their sound.

Greene, who had in both Academies ta'ne
Degree of Master, yet could never gaine
To be call'd more than Robin : who had he Profest ought save the Muse, Serv'd, and been Free
After a seven yeares Prentiseship ; might have (With credit too) gone Robert to his grave.
Marlo, renown'd for his rare art and wit,
Could ne're attaine beyond the name of Kit ;
Although his Hero and Leander did
Merit addition rather. Famous Kid
Was call'd but Tom. Tom. Watson, though ne wrote
Able to make Apollo's selfe to dote
Upon his Muse ; for all that he could strive,
Yet never could to his full name arrive.
Tom. Nash (in his time of no small esteeme)
Could not a second syllable redeeme.
Excellent Bewmont, in the formost ranke
Of the rar'st Wits, was never more than Franck.
Mellifluous Shake-speare, whose enchanting Quill Commanded Mirth or Passion, was but Will.
And famous Johnson, though his learned Pen
Be dipt in Castaly, is still but Ben.
Fletcher and Webster, of that learned packe
None of the mean'st, yet neither was but Jacke.
Deckers but Tom ; nor May, nor Middleton.
And hee's now but Jacke Foord, that once were John.

Nor speake I this, that any here exprest,
Should thinke themselves lesse worthy than the rest,
Whose names have their full syllable and sound ;
Or that Franck, Kit, or Jacke are the least wound
Unto their fame and merit. I for my part (Thinke others what they please) accept that heart
Which courts my love in most familiar phrase ;
And that it takes not from my paines or praise.

If any one to me so bluntly com,
I hold he loves me best that calls me Tom.
Heare but the learned Buchanan complaine,
In a most passionate Elegiacke straine;
And what emphaticall phrases he doth use
To waile the wants that wait upon the Muse.
The Povertie (saith he) adde unto these,
Which still attends on the Aönides, &c.

Dodsley included only two of Heywood's plays (1744). The old Shakespeare Society printed a dozen (1842-51). In 1874 an edition of all the plays then known—twenty-three—was prepared by Pearson; The Captives was edited by Bullen in 1885, by A. C. Judson in 1921. Prof. Katharine Bates edited A Woman Killed with Kindness and The Fair Maid of the West (Boston, 1919). See A. M. Clark's study (1931) and bibliography (1924).

Robert Burton.

Robert Burton, the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy, was born at Lindley, in Leicestershire, 8th February 1577; entered Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1593; and in 1599 was elected student of Christ Church. In 1614 he took his B.D., and two years later was presented by his college to the vicarage of St Thomas at Oxford, and about 1630 by Lord Berkeley to the rectory of Segrave in his native county. Both livings he kept 'with much ado to his dying day,' and appears to have continued all his life at Christ Church, where he died 25th January 1639, and was buried in Christ Church Cathedral. His death took place very near the time he had long since foretold by the calculation of his own nativity—for he believed in and practised the art of judicial astrology: hence arose, as we learn from Anthony Wood, a false report that he had 'sent up his soul to heaven thro' a slip about his neck.' Burton is thus described by Wood: 'He was an exact mathematician, a curious calculator of nativities, a general read scholar, a thro' paced philologist, and one that understood the surveying of lands well. As he was by many accounted a severe student, a devourer of authors, a melancholy and humorous [i.e. subject to 'the humours'] person; so by others, who knew him well, a person of great honesty, plain dealing, and charity. I have heard some of the antients of Christ Church often say that his company was very merry, facete, and juvenile, and no man in his time did surpass him for his ready and dextrous interlarding his common discourses among them with verses from the poets or sentences from classical authors, which being then all the fashion in the university made his company more acceptable.' Little is known of his life, but according to Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle (1728), 'In an interval of Vapours he would be extreemely pleasant, and raise Laughter in any Company. Yet I have heard that nothing at last could make him laugh, but going down to the Bridge-foot in Oxford, and hearing the Barge-men scold and storm and swear at one another, at which he would set his Hands to his Sides, and laugh most profusely.' There is, however, a strong presumption that the anecdote is a mythical trans-ference to Burton of the idiosyncratic relaxation he says his prototype permitted himself (page 437).

The first edition of the Anatomy of Melancholy, by 'Democritus Junior' (1621), was in quarto; and four more editions in folio were published within the author's lifetime, each with successive alterations and additions. The final form of the book was the sixth edition (1651-52), printed from the author's annotated copy. It is divided into three divisions, each subdivided into sections, members, and subsections. Part I. treats of the causes and symptoms of melancholy, Part II. of the cure of melancholy, and Part III. of love melancholy and religious melancholy. In the long and interesting preface, 'Democritus to the Reader,' Burton gives an account of himself and his studies, and is his own best critic: 'I have laboriously collected this Cento out of divers Writers, and that sine injuria, I have wronged no authors, but given every man his own.' Of his style he says: 'I neglect phrases, and labor wholly to inform my reader's understanding, and not to please his ear; 'tis not my study or intent to compose neatly, which an Orator requires, but to express myself readily and plainly as it happens. So that as a River runs sometimes precipitate and swift, then dul and slow; now direct, then per ambages; now deep, then shallow; now muddy, then clear; now broad, then narrow; doth my stile flow: now serious, then light; now comical, then satyirical; now more elaborate, then remisse, as the present subject required, or as at that time I was affected.'

This strange book is far more systematic than the superficial reader is apt to imagine. It is indeed a farrago from all, even the most out-of-the-way classical and mediæval writers, yet not one quotation out of all his ponderous learning but lends strength or illustration to his argument. Every page is marked by keen irony, profound and often gloomy humour, and by strong and excellent sense; while throughout the book there runs a deep undertone of earnestness that fits well with its concluding sentences, and at times rises into a grave eloquence of quite singular charm. The 'fantastic old great man' is certain of immortality as one of the greatest English writers. Johnson said Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy was the only book that ever took him out of bed two hours sooner than he wished to rise; and Charles Lamb shows plainly its influence on his own style as well as in his direct imitation, the 'curious Fragments,' professedly extracted from Burton's Common-Place Book. Milton's L'Allegro and Il Penseroso owed much to 'The Author's Abstract of Melancholy' prefixed (in verse) to his book, and Ferriar in 1798 pointed out to the world the indebtedness of Sterne. Byron speaks of its great value as materials 'for literary conversation,' but Wood had long before pointed out this merit: 'Tis a book so full of variety of reading, that gentlemen who have lost their time and are put to a push for invention, may furnish themselves with matter for common or scholastical discourse and writing.'

But in spite of Burton's prophylactic apology, Democritus has some right to complain of the use made of his name: the learned recluse of Christ Church did not follow the best authorities on Democritus, and would hardly have called himself 'Democritus Junior' had he fully realised how wide and deep was the gulf between himself and the philosopher of Abdera. All he meant by calling himself Democritus was that he laughed at the follies of mankind. Now, it so happens that this tradition about the original Democritus is late and unauthentic; so is the cognate one that opposes him, as 'the laughing philosopher,' to Heraclitus, 'the weeping philosopher.' Democritus (senior) seems to have been a man of a healthy, happy disposition, who habitually looked at the cheerful side of things: the false proverb is but a perversion of this fact. Democritus laughed, not because he was caustic, bitter, satirical, but because he was good-humoured. Democritus, the predecessor of Epicurus, was a thorough-going atomist—his gods were but aggregations of atoms a degree or two more powerful than men, and there is no design in nature—whereas Burton was an orthodox, if not perfervid, Christian and Churchman. Democritus was the greatest traveller of his time; Burton spent all his life in his college. Democritus learnt from living men, not from books; Burton was the very king of bookworms. But both were exceptionally gifted, learned, good men; and Burton may be excused for following the multitude in taking Democritus as characteristically 'a laughter at human follies.'

Burton is quite wrongly regarded as a pessimist

to be ranked with the Ecclesiast, with Buddhist sages, with Schopenhauer, and with Hartmann. He did not regard life as essentially and unredeemably evil: the scholar who wrote to relieve his own depression, who devoted one great division of his work to the cure of melancholy, obviously regarded the miseries that do accompany and flow from love, hypochondriasis, superstition, madness, jealousy, and solitude as separable accidents of human nature, or aberrations that ought to be, and can be, guarded against. He was a man subject to 'the vapours,' in short, and though between whiles cheerful enough, had the moody temperament which led him to dwell on the darker side of life, especially after he had constituted the Anatomy of Melancholy his life-work. And he set himself calmly, not unsympathetically, but candidly, learnedly, even facetiously, to anatomise human folly and perversity. To a man of his ingenuity it was possible to bring almost everything to bear on his pet subject; and hence in his great work we have the most marvellous olla podrida that exists in book form, yet a book with a very definite plan and an unmistakable purpose. The multitudinous quotations, that look at times as if discharged at random from a series of commonplace books, are never wholly irrelevant any more than the frequent and amazing digressions, which are a feature of the book. And though the piles of citations make many of the sentences inordinately long, formless, and almost structureless, Burton when he is writing 'out of his own head' writes tersely, smoothly, and melodiously beyond many of his contemporaries. He is profoundly humorous in another sense than Wood's; his grave and profound humour is, like Sir Thomas Browne's, a marked characteristic.

In the copious preface, 'Democritus to the Reader,' Burton explains his choice of a pseudonym or nom de guerre, and incidentally gives an interesting account of himself and his studies (we follow the text and spelling of the fifth edition of 1638):

Democritus, as he is described by Hippocrates and Laërtius, was a little wearish [withered] old man, very melancholy by nature, averse from company in his latter daies, and much given to solitarinesse, a famous philosopher in his age, coævus with Socrates, wholly addicted to his studies at the last, and to a private life; writ many excellent works, a great divine, according to the divinitie of those times, an expert physician, a politician, an excellent mathematician, as Diacosmus and the rest of his works do witness. He was much delighted with the studies of husbandrie, saith Columella; and often I find him cited by Constantinus and others treating of that subject. He knew the natures, differences of all beasts, plants, fishes, birds; and, as some say, could understand the tunes and voyces of them. In a word, he was omnifariam doctus, a general scholar, a great student; and, to the intent he might better contemplate, I find it related by some that he put out his eyes, and was in his old age voluntarily blinde, yet saw more than all Greece besides, and writ of everie subject: Nihil in toto opificio natura de quo non scripsit: a man of an excellent wit, profound conceit; and to attain knowledge the better, in his younger years he travelled to Egypt and Athens, to conferre with learned men, admired of some, despised of others. After a wandering life, he settled at Abdera, a town in Thrace, and was sent for thither to be their law-maker, recorder, or town-clerke, as some will; or as others, he was there bred and born. Howsoever it was, there he lived at last in a garden in the suburbs, wholly betaking himself to his studies and a private life, saving that sometimes he would walk down to the haven, and laugh heartily at such varietie of ridiculous objects, which there he saw. Such a one was Democritus.

But, in the mean time, how doth this concerne me, or upon what reference doe I usurpe his habit? I confesse, indeed, that to compare my self unto him for ought I have yet said, were both impudencie and arrogancie. I do not presume to make any parallel. Antistat mihi millibus trecentis: parvus sum; nullus sum; altum nec spiro, nec spero. Yet thus much I will say of my self, and that I hope without all suspicion of pride or self-conceit: I have lived a silent, sedentary, solitary, private life, mihi et Musis, in the university, as long almost as Xenocrates in Athens, ad senectam fere, to learne wisdom as he did, penned up most part in my studie: for I have been brought up a student in the most flourishing colledge of Europe, augustissimo collegio, and can bragge with Jovius, almost, in ed luce domicilii Vaticani, totius orbis celeberrimi, per 37 annos multa opportunaque didici; for thirty years I have continued (having the use of as good libraries as ever he had) a scholar, and would be therefore loth either, by living as a drone, to be an unprofitable or unworthie member of so learned and noble a societie, or to write that which should be any way dishonourable to such a royall and ample foundation. Something I have done: though by my profession a divine, yet turbine raptus ingentii, as he said, out of a running wit, an unconstant, unsettled mind, I had a great desire (not able to attain to a superficial skill in any) to have some smattering in all, to be aliquis in omnibus, nullus in singulis; which Plato commends, out of him Lipsius approves and furthers, as fit to be imprinted in all curious wits, not to be a slave of one science, or dwell altogether in one subject, as most do, but to rove abroad, centum puer artium, to have an oare in every mans boat, to taste of every dish, and to sip of every cup; which, saith Montaigne, was well performed by Aristotle, and his learned cuntry-man Adrian Turnebus. This roving humor (though not with like successe) I have ever had, and, like a ranging spaniell that barks at every bird he sees, leaving his game, I have followed all, saving that which I should, and may justly complain and truly, qui ubique est, nusquam est, which Gesner did in modesty; that I have read many books, but to little purpose, for want of good method, I have confusedly tumbled over divers authors in our libraries with small profit, for want of art, order, memorie, judgement. I never travelled but in map or card, in which my unconfined thoughts have freely expatiated, as having ever been especially delighted with the study of cosmography. Saturn was lord of my geniture, culminating, &c., and Mars principal significator of manners, in partile conjunction with mine ascendent; both fortunate in their houses, &c. I am not poore, I am not rich; nihil est, nihil deest; I have little, I want nothing: all my treasure is in Minerva's tower. Greater preferment as I could never get, so am I not in debt for it. I have a competency (laus Deo) from my noble and munificent patrons. Though I live still a collegiat student, as Democritus in his garden, and lead a monastique life, ipse mihi theatrum, sequestred from those tumults and troubles of the world, et tamquam in speculo positus (as he said), in some high place above you all, I hear and see what is done abroad, how others run, ride, turmoile, and macerate themselves in court and cuntry, far from those wrangling law-suits, aule vanitatem, fori ambitionem, ridere mecum soleo: I laugh at all, only secure, lest my suit go amisse, my ships perish, corn and cattle miscarry, trade decay, I have no wife nor children, good or bad, to provide for; a meere spectator of other mens fortunes and adventures, and how they act their parts, which me thinks are diversely presented unto me, as from a common theatre or scene. I hear new news every day: and those ordinary rumours of war, plagues, fires, inundations, thefts, murders, massacres, meteors, comets, spectrums, prodigies, apparitions, of towns taken, cities besieged in France, Germany, Turkey, Persia, Poland, &c., daily musters and preparations, and such like, which these tempestuous times afford, battles fought, so many men slain, monomachies, shipwracks, piracies, and sea-fights, peace, leagues, stratagems, and fresh alarums. A vast confusion of vows, wishes, actions, edicts, petitions, law-suits, pleas, laws, proclamations, complaints, grievances are daily brought to our ears. New books everie day, pamphlets, currantoes [gazettes], stories, whole catalogues of volumes of all sorts, new paradoxes, opinions, schismes, heresies, controversies in philosophie, religion, &c. Now come tidings of weddings, maskings, mummeries, entertainments, jubilies, embassies, tilts, and tournaments, trophies, triumphs, revels, sports, playes: then again, as in a new shifted scene, treasons, cheating tricks, robberies, enormous villanies in all kinds, funerals, burials, death of princes, new discoveries, expeditions; now comicall, then tragicall matters. To day we hear of new lords and officers created, to morrow of some great men deposed, and then again of fresh honors conferred: one is let loose, another imprisoned: one purchaseth, another breaketh: he thrives, his neighbour turns bankrupt; now plentie, then againe dearth and famine; one runs, another rides, wrangles, laughs, weeps, &c. Thus I daily hear, and such like, both private and publike news. Amidst the gallantrie and miserie of the world, jollitie, pride, perplexities and cares, simplicitie and villanie, subtletie, knaverie, candor and integritie, mutually mixt and offering themselves, I rub on privus privatus: as I have still lived, so I now continue statu quo prius, left to a solitary life, and mine own domestick discontents; saving that sometimes, ne quid mentiar, as Diogenes went into the citie and Democritus to the haven, to see fashions, I did for my recreation now and then walk abroad, look into the world, and could not choose but make some little observation, non tam sagax observator, ac simplex recitator, not, as they did, to scoffe or laugh at all, but with a mixt passion:

Bilem, sæpe jocum vestri movere tumultus.

I did sometime laugh and scoffe with Lucian, and satyrically taxe with Menippus, lament with Heraclitus, sometimes again I was petulanti splene cachinno, and then again, urere bilis jacur, I was much moved to see that abuse which I could not amend: in which passion howsoever I may sympathize with him or them, 'tis for no such respect I shroud my self under his name, but either in an unknown habit to assume a little more libertie and freedome of speech, or if you will needs know, for that reason and only respect which Hippocrates relates at large in his epistle to Damegetus, wherein he doth expresse how, comming to visit him one day, he found Democritus in his garden at Abdera, in the suburbs, under a shadie bower, with a book on his knees, busie at his studie, sometime writing, sometime walking. The subject of his book was melancholy and madnes: about him lay the carcasses of many several beasts, newly by him cut up and anatomized; not that he did contemn God's creatures, as he told Hippocrates, but to find out the seat of this atra bilis, or melancholy, whence it proceeds, and how it was engendred in mens bodies, to the intent he might better cure it in himself, by his writings and observations teach others how to prevent and avoid it. Which good intent of his Hippocrates highly commended, Democritus Junior is therefore bold to imitate, and, because he left it imperfect, and it is now lost, quasi succenturiator Democriti, to revive again, prosecute, and finish in this treatise. . . .

If any man except against the matter or manner of treating of this my subject, and will demand a reason of it, I can allege more than one. I write of melancholy, by being busie to avoid melancholy. There is no greater cause of melancholy than idlenesse, no better cure than businesse, as Rhasis holds: and howbeit stultus labor est ineptiarum, to be busied in toyes is to small purpose, yet hear that divine Seneca, better aliud agere quam nihil, better doe to no end than nothing. I writ therefore and busied myself in this playing labour, otiosâque diligentid, ut vitarem torporem feriandi, with Vectius in Macrobius, atque otium in utile verterem negotium;

—Simul et jucunda et idonea dicere vitæ,
Lectorem delectando simul atque monendo.

To this end I write, like them, saith Lucian, that recite to trees and declaim to pillars, for want of auditors; as Paulus Aegineta ingenuously confesseth, not that any thing was unknown or omitted, but to exercise my self (which course if some took, I think it would be good for their bodies, and much better for their souls); or per-adventure as others do, for fame to shew myself (Scire tuum nihil est, nisi te scire hoc sciat alter). I might be of Thucydides opinion, to know a thing and not to expresse it, is all one as if he knew it not. When I first took this task in hand, et, quod ait ille, impellente genio negotium suscepi, this I ayimed at, vel ut lenirem animum scribendo, to ease my minde by writing, for I had gravidum cor, fatum caput, a kind of impostume in my head, which I was very desirous to be unladen of, and could imagine no fitter evacuation than this. Besides I might not well refrain; for, ubi dolor, ibi digitus, one must needs scratch where it itches. I was not a little offended with this maladie, shall I say my mistris melancholy, my Ægeria, or my malus genius; and for that cause, as he that is stung with a scorpion, I would expel clavum clavo, comfort one sorrow with another, idlenes with idlenes, ut ex viperâ theriacum, make an antidote out of that which was the prime cause of my disease. Or as he did, of whom Felix Plater speaks, that thought he had some of Aristophanes frogs in his belly, still crying Bracehex, coax, coax, oop, oop, and for that cause studied physick seven years, and travelled over most part of Europe, to ease himself; To do my self good, I turned over such physicians as our libraries would afford, or my private friends impart, and have taken this pains.

Symptomes of Love.

Bocace hath a pleasant tale to this purpose, which he borrowed from the Greekes, and which Beroaldus hath turned into Latine, Bebelius in verse, of Cymon and Iphigenia. This Cymon was a foole, a proper man of person, and the governour of Cyprus' sonne, but a very asse; insomuch that his father being ashamed of him, sent him to a farne house he had in the country, to bee brought up; where by chance, as his manner was, walking alone, hee espied a gallant young gentlewoman named Iphigenia. a burgomaster's daughter of Cyprus, with her maid, by a brooke side, in a little thicket, fast asleepe in her smock, where she had newly bathed her selfe. When Cymon saw her, he stood leaning on his staffe, gaping on her immoveable, and in a maze: at last he fell so farre in love with the glorious object, that he began to rouze himselfe up; to bethinke what he was; would needs follow her to the citty, and for her sake began to be civill, to learne to sing and dance, to play on instruments, and got all those gentleman-like qualities and complements, in a short space, which his friends were most glad of. In brieft, hee became from an idiot and a clowne, to bee one of the most compleat gentlemen in Cyprus; did many valorous exploits, and all for the love of Mistris Iphigenia. In a word, I may say this much of them all, let them be never so clownish, rude and horrid, Grobians and sluts, if once they be in love, they will be most neat and spruce; for, Omnibus rebus, et nitidis nitoribus antevenit amor; they will follow the fashion, beginne to tricke up, and to have a good opinion of themselves; venustatum enim mater Venus; a ship is not so long a rigging, as a young gentlewoman a trimming up her selfe against her sweet-heart comes. A painter's shop, a flowry meadow, no so gracious aspect in Nature's storehouse as a young maid, nubilis puella, a Novitsa [novizza is a Venetian word for a new-married bride] or Venetian bride, that looks for an husband; or a young man that is her suiter; composed looks, composed gate, cloathes, gestures, actions, all composed; all the graces, elegances, in the world, are in her face. Their best robes, ribbines, chaines, iewels, lawnes, linnens, laces, spangles, must come on, præter quam res patitur student elegantie, they are beyond all measure coy, nice, and too curious on a sudden. 'Tis all their study, all their busines, how to wear their cloathes neat, to be polite and terse, and to set out themselves. No sooner doth a young man see his sweet-heart comming, but he smugges up himselfe, pulls up his cloake, now false about his shoulders, ties his garters, points, sets his band, cuffs, slicks his hair, twires his beard, &c.

Study a Cure for Melancholy.

Amongst exercises or recreations of the minde within doors, there is none so generall, so aptly to be applyed to all sorts of men, so fit & proper to expell idlenesse and melancholy, as that of study: studia senectutem oblectant, adolescentiam agunt, secundas res ornant, adversis perfugium et solatium præbent, domi delectant, &c. finde the rest in Tully pro Archid Poeth. What so full of content as to read, walke, and see mappes, pictures, statues, jewels, marbles, which some so much magnifie as those that Phidias made of old, so exquisite and pleasing to be beheld, that, as Chrysostome thinketh, 'if any man be sickly, troubled in minde, or that cannot sleep for griefe, and shall but stand over against one of Phidias' images, he will forget all care, or whatsoever else may molest him, in an instant?' There bee those as much taken with Michael Angelo's, Raphael de Urbino's, Francesco Francia's pieces, and many of those Italian and Dutch painters which were excellent in their ages; and esteeme of it as a most pleasing sight to view those neat architectures, devices, scutchions, coats of armes, read such bookes, to peruse old coynes of severall sorts in a faire gallery, artificiall workes, perspective glasses, old reliques, Roman antiquities, variety of colours. A good picture is falsa veritas, et muta poesis, and though (as Vives saith), artificialia delectant, sed mox fastidimus, artificiall toyes please but for a time; yet who is he that will not be moved with them for the present? When Achilles was tormented and sad for the losse of his dear friend Patroclus, his mother Thetis brought him a most elaborate and curious buckler made by Vulcan, in which were engraven sunne, moone, starres, planets, sea, land, men fighting, running, riding, women scolding, hills, dales, towns, castles, brooks, rivers, trees, &c.; with many pretty landskips and perspective peeces: with sight of which he was infinitely delighted. . . .

King James (1605), when he came to see our university of Oxford, and amongst other ædifices, now went to view that famous library, renued by S. Thomas Bodley, in imitation of Alexander, at his departure, brake out into that noble speech: 'If I were not a king, I would be an university man; and if it were so that I must be a prisoner, if I might have my wish, I would desire to have no other prison then that library, and to be chained together with so many good authors.' So sweet is the delight of study, the more learning they have—as hee that hath a dropsie, the more he drinks, the thirstier hee is—the more they covet to learne, and the last day is prioris discipulus; harsh at first, learning is radices amara, but fructus dulces, according to that of Isocrates, pleasant at last; the longer they live, the more they are enamoured with the Muses. Heinsius, the keeper of the library at Leiden in Holland, was mewed up in it all the year long; and that which, to thy thinking, should have bred a loathing, caused in him a greater liking. 'I no sooner,' saith he, 'come into the library, but I bolt the doore to mee, excluding Lust, Ambition, Avarice, and all such vices, whose nurse is Idlenesse, the mother of Ignorance, and Melancholy her selfe; and in the very lap of eternity, amongst so many divine souls, I take my seat, with so lofty a spirit and sweet content, that I pity all our great ones and rich men, that know not this happiness.' I am not ignorant in the meanetime, notwithstanding this which I have said, how barbarously and basely for the most part our ruder gentry esteeme of libraries and books, how they neglect and contemne so great a treasure, so inestimable a benefit, as Æsop's cocke did the jewell hee found in the dunghill; and all through error, ignorance, and want of education. And 'tis a wonder withall to observe how much they will vainely cast away in unnecessary expences, quot modis perierant (saith Erasmus) magnatibus pecunia, quantum absumant alea, scorta, compotationes, prosectiones non necessaria, pompa, bella quasita, ambitio, colax, morio, ludio, &c., what in hawkes, hounds, law-suites, vaine building, gurmundizing, drinking, sports, playes, pastimes, &c.

(From Part II. sect. II.)

Love of Gaming and Pleasures Immoderate.

It is a wonder to see how many poore, distressed, miserable wretches one shall meet almost in every path and street, begging for an almes, that have been well descended, and sometimes in flourishing estate; now ragged, tattered, and ready to be starved, lingering out a painfull life in discontent and griefe of body and minde, and all through immoderate lust, gaming, pleasure, and riot. 'Tis the common end of all sensuall epicures and brutish prodigals, that are stupified and carried away headlong with their severall pleasures and lusts. Cebes, in his Table, S. Ambrose in his second booke of Abel and Cain, and amongst the rest, Lucian, in his tract, De Mercede Conductis, hath excellent well deciphered such men's proceedings, in his picture of Opulentia, whom he faines to dwell on the top of a high mount, much sought after by many suitors. At their first comming, they are generally entertained by Pleasure and Dalliance, and have all the content that possibly may be given, so long as their money lasts; but when their means faile, they are contemptibly thrust out at a backe doore headlong, and there left to Shame, Reproach, Despaire. And hee at first that had so many attendants, parasites, and followers, young and lusty, richly arrayed, and all the dainty fare that might be had, with all kinde of welcome and good respect, is now upon a sudden stript of all, pale, naked, old, diseased, and forsaken, cursing his starres, and ready to strangle himself, having no other company but Repentance, Sorrow, Griefe, Dirision, Beggery, and Contempt, which are his daily attendants to his lives end. As the prodigall sonne had exquisite musicke, merry company, dainty fare at first, but a sorrowfull reckoning in the end; so have all such vaine delights and their followers.

(From Part I. sect. II.)

This is the peroration of Burton's unique work:

Last of all: If the party affected shall certainly know this malady to have proceeded from too much fasting, meditation, precise life, contemplation of Gods judgments, (for the diel deceives many by such meanes) in that other extream he circumvents melancholy it selfe, reading some books, treatises, hearing rigid preachers, &c. If he shall perceive that it hath begun first from some great loss, grievous accident, disaster, seeing others in like case, or any such terrible object, let him speedily remove the cause, which to the cure of this disease Navarrus so much commends, avertat cogitationem a re scrupulosâ, by all opposite meanes, art, and industry, let him, laxare animum, by all honest recreations, refresh and recreate his distressed soule; let him divert his thoughts, by himselfe and other of his friends. Let him reade no more such tracts or subjects, hear no more such fearful tones, avoid such companies, and by all meanes open himselfe, submit himselfe to the advice of good physicians and divines, which is contraventio scrupulorum, as he calls it; hear them speake to whom the Lord hath given the tongue of the learned, to be able to minister a word to him that is weary, whose words are as flagons of wine. Let him not be obstinate, head-strong, peevish, wilful, self-conceited (as in this malady they are), but give care to good advice, be ruled and perswaded; and no doubt but such good counsell may prove as prosperous to his soule, as the angel was to Peter, that opened the iron gates, loosed his bands, brought him out prison, and delivered him from bodily thraldome; they may ease his afflicted minde, relieve his wounded soule, and take him out of the jawes of hell it selfe. I can say no more, or give better advice to such as are any way distressed in this kinde, then what I have given and said. Only take this for a corollary and conclusion, as thou tenderest thine owne welfare in this, and all other melancholy, thy good health of body and minde, observe this short precept, give not way to solitariness and idleness. Be not solitary, be not idle.

SPERATE MISERI,
CAVETE FELICES.

Vis a dubio liberari? vis quod incertum est evadere? Age pœnitentiam dum sanus es; sic agens, dico tibi quod securus es, quod pœnitentiam egisti eo tempore quo peccare potuisti (Austin).

Among shorter sayings invented or quoted by Burton are: 'He that goes to law (as the proverb is) holds a wolf by the ears;' 'Industry is a load-stone to draw all good things;' 'No cord or cable can so forcibly draw or hold so fast as love can do with a twined thread;' 'Poverty is the muse's patrimony;' 'The greatest enemy to man is man;' and he characterises his freedom of expression in the familiar words, 'I call a spade a spade.' 'Where God hath a temple, the Divell will have a chappel; where God hath sacrifices, the Divell will have his oblations; where God hath ceremonies, the Divell will have his traditions; where there is any religion, the Divell will plant superstition,' is part of a memorable passage, the first clauses of which are given in a slightly different form by George Herbert in his Jacula Prudentum, first published in 1657, thus: 'No sooner is a temple built to God, but the Devil builds a chapel hard by;' and the same winged word was versified as we usually hear it by Defoe:

Wherever God erects a house of prayer,
The Devil always builds a chapel there.

Most of Burton's verse, original or translation, is mere doggerel. But The Author's Abstract of Melancholy, prefixed (not in all the editions) to the work, takes rather higher rank, and had the honour, as Warton pointed out, of giving Milton some suggestions both for L'Allegro and for Il Penseroso:

The Author's Abstract of Melancholy.

When I go musing all alone,
Thinking of divers things foreknown,
When I build castles in the air,
Void of sorrow, void of feare,
Pleasing myself with phantasms sweet,
Methinks the time runs very fleet.
All my joyes to this are folly;
Naught so sweet as melancholy.

When I go walking all alone,
Recounting what I have ill done,
My thoughts on me then tyrannize,
Feare and sorrow me surprise;
Whether I tarry still, or go,
Methinks the time moves very slow.
All my griefs to this are jolly;
Naught so sad as melancholy.

When to myself I act and smile,
With pleasing thoughts the time beguile,
By a brook-side or wood so green,
Unheard, unsought for, or unseen,
A thousand pleasures do me bless,
And crown my soule with happiness.
All my joyes besides are folly;
None so sweet as melancholy.

When I lie, sit, or walk alone,
I sigh, I grieve, making great mone;
In a dark grove or irksome den,
With discontents and Furies then,
A thousand miseries at once
Mine heavy heart and soule ensconce.
All my griefs to this are jolly;
None so sour as melancholy.

Methinks I hear, methinks I see
Sweet musick, wondrous melodie,
Towns, palaces, and cities fine;
Here now, then there; the world is mine,
Rare beauties, gallant ladies shine,
Whate'er is lovely is divine.
All other joyes to this are folly;
None so sweet as melancholy.

Methinks I hear, methinks I see
Ghosts, goblins, fiends: my phantasie
Presents a thousand ugly shapes:
Headless bears, black men, and apes;
Doleful outcries and fearful sights
My sad and dismal soule affrights.
All my griefs to this are jolly;
None so damned as melancholy.

More than most men, Burton is identified with the one book which was the work of his life. But he wrote also a Latin comedy, Philosophaster, acted at Cambridge in 1617, and printed for the Roxburghe Club in 1862; and he contributed Latin verses to various collections.

In the Rev. A. Shilleto's edition (with introduction by Mr Bullen, 3 vols. 1903) most of the quotations are identified and verified. The reprint at Cambridge, U.S.A., in 1905 is far from perfect. See Whibley's Literary Portraits (1904).

James Ussher, or USHER, the celebrated Archbishop of Armagh, was born in Dublin, 4th January 1581, son of a clerk in Chancery. He succeeded to his father's estate, but, wishing to devote himself uninterruptedly to study, gave it up to his brother and sisters, reserving for himself only a sufficiency for his maintenance at Trinity College and for the purchase of books. In 1606 he visited England, and became intimate with Camden and Sir Robert Cotton. For thirteen years (from 1607) he filled the chair of Divinity in the University of Dublin, dwelling largely on the controversies between the Protestants and Catholics. At the convocation of the Irish clergy in 1615, when they determined to assert their independence as a national Church, the articles were drawn up mainly by Ussher; and by asserting in them the Calvinistic doctrines of election and reprobation, by his advocacy of the rigorous observance of the Sabbath, and by his known opinion that bishops were not a distinct order in the Church, but only superior in degree to presbyters, he exposed himself to the charge of being a favourer of Puritanism. Having been accused as such to the king, he went over to England in 1619, and, in a conference with His Majesty, so fully cleared himself that he was ere long appointed to the see of Meath, and in 1625 to the archbishopric of Armagh. He aimed at a much-needed reform in the Irish Church, and proposed in vain a modification of Episcopacy to meet the objections of Presbyterians. His well-known visit to Samuel Rutherford at Anwoth, in Kirkcudbrightshire, may be assigned perhaps to 1638. During the political agitation of Charles's reign Ussher maintained the absolute unlawfulness of taking up arms against the king. The Irish rebellion in 1641 drove him to England, where he settled at Oxford, then the residence of Charles. Subsequently the civil war caused him repeatedly to change his abode, which was finally the Countess of Peterborough's seat at Reigate, where he died on 21st March 1656, at the age of seventy-five. He was buried with great pomp in Westminster Abbey. He refused to sit in the Westminster Assembly, and was for eight years preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He was a man of boundless humility, charity, and tolerance; was always loyal to the crown, but was treated with indulgence by Cromwell. He attended Strafford to the scaffold, and fainted when from Lady Peterborough's London house he saw the 'villains in vizards' put up Charles I.'s hair. Most of his writings relate to ecclesiastical history and antiquities, and were mainly intended to furnish arguments against the Catholics; but the book for which he is chiefly celebrated is a great chronological work in Latin, the Annales, the first part of which was published in 1650, and the second in 1654. In this chronological digest of universal history from the creation of the world to the dispersion of the Jews in Vespasian's reign, received with great applause by the learned throughout Europe, and several times reprinted on the Continent, the author, by fixing the three epochs of the deluge, the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, and their return from Babylon, was held to have reconciled the chronologies of sacred and profane history. His chronological system, putting the creation of the world in 4004 B.C., was long that generally received. Ussher conformed strictly to the Hebrew chronology in Scriptural dates; the Septuagint version and the Samaritan Pentateuch differ greatly from it. Modern Egyptologists of course wholly disregard his limitations; recent Babylonian research has uncovered tablets held to date from six thousand to seven thousand years before Christ; geologists calmly assume that the Tertiary epoch began ninety-three million years ago. But Ussher still has the glory of having done the best he could, and of having provided what was for centuries a practicable scheme for working purposes. Fuller was said to have supervised the translation of the Annales in 1658. Ussher wrote also on the ancient religion of the Irish and British, on the ecclesiastical antiquities of Britain, and on the Septuagint; the Calvinistic Body of Divinity (1645) is only partly his. The unfinished and posthumously published Chronologia Sacra (1660) was meant as a guide to the study of sacred history, and as showing the grounds and calculations of the principal epochs of the Annales. The opening of the opus magnum (as in the translation of 1658) shows the precision with which Ussher saw his way to fix the date of the Creation:

Julian Period 710	Before Christ 4004	In the beginning God created heaven and earth, Gen. i. v. 1. Which beginning of time, according to our chronologie, fell upon the entrance of the night preceding the twenty third day of Octob. in the year of the Julian Calendar, 710.
-------------------------	--------------------------	---

Upon the first day therefore of the world, or Octob. 23. being our sunday, God, together with the highest heaven, created the angels. Then having finished, as it were, the rooof of this building, he fell in hand with the foundation of this wonderfull fabrick of the world, he fashioned this lowermost globe, consisting of the deep, and of the earth; all the quire of angels singing together, and magnifying his name therefore. [Job. 38. v. 7.] And when the earth was void and without forme, and darknesse covered the face of the deepe, on the very middle of the first day, the light was created; which God severing from the darknesse, called the one day, and the other night.

On the second day [October 24. being Monday] the firmament being finished, which was called heaven, a separation was made of the waters above and the waters here beneath enclosing the earth.

Upon the third day [Octob. 25. Tuesday] these waters beneath running together into one place, the dry land appeared. This confluence of the waters God made a sea, sending out from thence the rivers, which were thither to return again [Eccl. 1. vers. 7.], and he caused the earth to bud, and bring forth all kinds of herbs and plants, with seeds and fruits: But above all, he enriched the garden of Eden with plants; for among them grew the tree of Life and the tree of Knowledge of good and evil. [Gen. 2. vers. 8, 9.]

On the fourth day [Octob. 26. which is our Wednesday] the sun, the moon, and the rest of the stars were created.

The work of the other days is recorded with the same particularity. The method on which the archbishop proceeded in his calculation of the dates is explained in the 'Epistle to the Reader' thus:

But for as much as our Christian epoch falls many ages after the beginning of the world, and the number of years before that backward is not onely more troublesome, but (unlesse greater care be taken) more lyable to error; also it hath pleased our modern chronologers, to adde to that generally received hypothesis (which asserted the Julian years, with their three cycles by a certain mathematical prolepsis, to have run down to the very beginning of the world) an artificial epoch, framed out of three cycles multiplied in themselves; for the Solar Cicle being multiplied by the Lunar, or the number of 28 by 19, produces the great Paschal Cycle of 532 years, and that again multiplied by fifteen, the number of the indiction, there arises the period of 7980 years, which was first (if I mistake not) observed by Robert Lotharing, Bishop of Hereford, in our island of Brittain, and 500 years after by Joseph Scaliger fitted for chronological uses, and called by the name of the Julian Period, because it contained a cycle of so many Julian years. Now if the series of the three minor cicles be from this present year extended backward unto precedent times, the 4713 years before the beginning of our Christian account will be found to be that year into which the first year of the indiction, the first of the Lunar Cicle, and the first of the Solar will fall. Having placed therefore the heads of this period in the kalends of January in that proleptick year, the first of our Christian vulgar account must be reckoned the 4714 of the Julian Period, which, being divided by 15. 19. 28. will present us with the 4 Roman indiction, the 2 Lunar Cycle, and the 10 Solar, which are the principal characters of that year.

We find moreover that the year of our fore-fathers, and the years of the ancient Egyptians and Hebrews were of the same quantity with the Julian, consisting of twelve equal moneths, every of them containing 30 dayes, (for it cannot be proved that the Hebrews did use lunary moneths before the Babylonian Captivity) adjoyning to the end of the twelfth moneth, the addition of five dayes, and every fourth year six. And I have observed by the continued succession of these years, as they are delivered in holy writ, that the end of the great Nebuchadnezzars and the beginning of Evilmerodachs (his sons) reign, fell out in the 3442 year of the world, but by collation of Chaldean history and the astronomical cannon, it fell out in the 186 year of Nabonasar, and, as by certain connexion, it must follow in the 562 year before the Christian account, and of the Julian Period, the 4152. and from thence I gathered the creation of the world did fall out upon the 710 year of the Julian Period, by placing its beginning in autumn: but for as much as the first day of the world began with the evening of the first day of the week, I have observed that the Sunday, which in the year 710 aforesaid came nearest the Autumnal Æquinox, by astronomical tables (notwithstanding the stay of the sun in the dayes of Joshua, and the going back of it in the dayes of Ezekiah) happened upon the 23 day of the Julian October; from thence concluded that from the evening preceding that first day of the Julian year, both the first day of the creation and the first motion of time are to be deduced.

His complete writings were edited by Elrington and Todd (17 vols. 1847-64). See Life by Dr J. A. Carr (1895), and the Ussher Memoirs by W. Ball Wright (1889).

Sir Thomas Overbury was famous as a witty and ingenious describer of 'characters.' He was for years an intimate of Robert Carr, the minion of James I.; but having opposed the favourite's marriage with the infamous Countess of Essex, he incurred the hatred of the pair, and through their influence was confined in the Tower, and poisoned there on the 15th of September 1613—being then in the thirty-second year of his age. Three months later Carr, now Earl of Somerset, was married to Lady Essex. The way in which, though humbler instruments were executed, the principals in this murder were screened from justice leaves a foul blot on the memory of the king. Overbury wrote one very popular didactic poem, The Wife (published in 1614), on choosing a partner for life, which was imitated in The Husband, A Wife Beshpoken, &c. The prose Characters (1614), among the first of that kind of witty descriptions of types (Hall having been in the field in 1608), were often reprinted and frequently imitated. They abound in strained conceits, but are full of epigrammatic point. It is, however, doubtful how many of them are by Overbury himself. The number of characters was increased in successive editions; the fourth contained thirty. The Tinker (here quoted) and two others first appeared in the sixth (1616), and are by 'J. Cocke'—possibly 'Jo. Cooke, Gent.,' whose clever drama, Greene's Tu Quoque, appeared in 1614. Still more doubtful is it whether the Crumms fall'n from King James's Table, professedly that king's table-talk, was to any extent Overbury's work. The first verse of The Wife is as follows (the spelling in this and all the extracts being that of the edition of 1638):

Each woman is a briefe of Womankind,
And doth in little even as much containe
As in one Day and Night all life we find.
Of either more is but the same againe:
God fram'd Her so that to her Husband She
As Eve should all the World of Woman be.

A faire and happy Milk-maid

Is a Countrey Wench that is so farre from making her selfe beautifull by Art, that one looke of hers is able to put all face-physicke out of countenance. She knows a faire looke is but a Dumbe Orator to commend vertue, therefore minds it not. All her excellencies stand in her so silently, as if they had stolne upon her without her knowledge. The lining of her apparell, which is her selfe, is farre better than outsides of Tissew; for though she be not arrayed in the spoil of the Silke-worme shee is deckt in innocency, a far better wearing. She doth not, with lying long abed, spoile both her complexion and conditions: nature hath taught her, too, immoderate sleepe is rust to the Soule: she rises, therefore, with Chaunticleare, her dame's Cock, and at night makes the lamb her Corfew. In milking a Cow, and straining the teats through her fingers, it seemes that so sweet a Milk-presse makes the Milk the whiter or sweeter; for never came Almond-Glove or Aromaticke oyntment of her palme to taint it. The golded eares of corne fall and kisse her feet when shee reapes them, as if they wisht to be bound and led prisoners by the same hand that fell'd them. Her breath is her own, which sents all the yeare long of June, like a new-made Haycock. She makes her hand hard with labour, and her heart soft with pittie; and when winters evenings fall early (sitting at her mery wheele) she sings a defiance to the giddy wheele of Fortune. She doth all things with so sweet a grace, it seems ignorance will not suffer her to doe ill, being her mind is to doe well. Shee bestowes her yeares wages at next faire, and in chusing her garments counts no bravery i' th' world like decency. The garden and bee-hive are all her Physick and chirurgery, and she lives the longer for't. She dares goe alone and unfold sheepe i' th' night, and feares no manner of ill, because she meanes none; yet to say truth, she is never alone, for she is still accompanied with old songs, honest thoughts, and prayers, but short ones; yet they have their efficacy, in that they are not palled [palled, weakened] with insuing idle cogitations. Lastly, her dreames are so chaste, that shee dare tell them; only a Fridaies dream is all her superstition; that she conceales for feare of anger. Thus lives she, and all her care is, she may die in the Spring-time, to have store of flowers stucke upon her winding-sheet.

A Franklin.

His outside is an ancient Yeoman of England, though his inside may give armes with the best Gentlemen, and ne're see the Herauld. There is no truer servant in the House than himselfe. Though he be Master, he says not to his servants, 'Goe to field,' but, 'Let us goe,' and with his owne eye doth both fatten his flock and set forward all manner of husbandrie. Hee is taught by nature to bee contented with a little; his owne fold yeelds him both food and rayment; he is pleas'd with any nourishment God sends, whilst curious gluttony ransacks, as it were, Noahs Arke for food, onely to feed the riot of one meale. He is ne'r knowne to goe to Law; understanding to bee Law-bound among men, is like to bee hide-bound among his beasts; they thrive not under it; and that such men sleepe as unquietly as if their pillows were stufft with lawyers penknives. When he builds, no poore tenant's cottage hinders his prospect; they are, indeed, his Almes-houses, though there be painted on them no such superscription. He never sits up late but when he hunts the Badger, the vow'd foe of his Lambs; nor uses hee any cruelty but when hee hunts the Hare; nor subtilty but when he setteth snares for the Snipe, or pitfalls for the Black bird; nor oppression but when, in the moneth of July, he goes to the next River and sheares his sheepe. He allowes of honest pastime, and thinkes not the bones of the dead anything bruised, or the worse for it, though the country Lasses dance in the Church-yard after Evensong. Rock-Munday [or St Distaff's Day, the Monday after Twelfth Day, when, after the Christmas celebrations, spinning was resumed by the women], and the Wake in Summer, shrotings, the wakeful ketches [catches or carols sung in the night] on Christmas Eve, the Hoky [Hocktide, a fortnight after Easter] or Seed Cake—these he yearly keepes yet holds them no reliques of popery. He is not so inquisitive after newes derived from the privy-clozet, when the finding an eiery of Hawkes in his owne ground, or the foaling of a colt come of a good straine are tydings more pleasant and more profitable. Hee is Lord paramount within himselfe, though hee hold by never so mean a Tenure; and dyes the more contentedly (though he leave his heire young) in regard he leaves him not liable to a covetous Guardian. Lastly, to end him, hee cares not when his end comes; hee needs not feare his audit, for his Quietus is in heaven.

The Tinker.

By J. COCKE.

A tinker is a moveable, for hee hath no abiding place; by his motion he gathers heat, thence his cholericke nature. He seemes to be very devout, for his life is a continuall pilgrimage; and sometimes in humility goes barefoot, therein making necessity a vertue. His house is as ancient as Tubal Cain's, and so is a runnagate by antiquity; yet he proves himselfe a Gallant, for he carries all his wealth upon his back; or a Philosopher, for he bears all his substance about him. From his Art was Musick first invented, and therefore is he alwaies furnisht with a song, to which his hammer, keeping tune, proves that he was the first founder for the kettle-drum. Note that where the best Ale is, there stands his music most upon crotchets. The companion of his travels is some foule, sunne-burnt Queane that since the terrible Statute recanted Gipsisme, and is turned Pedleresse. So marches he all over England with his bag and baggage; his conversation is unreprouvable, for hee is ever mending. Hee observes truly the Statutes, and therefore he can rather steale than begge, in which hee is unremoveably constant, in spite of whip or imprisonment; and so a strong enemy to idleness that, in mending one hole, hee had rather make three than want worke; and when hee hath done, hee throws the wallet of his faults behind him. He embraceth naturally ancient custome, conversing in open fields and lowly Cottages: if he visit Cities or Townes, tis but to deale upon the imperfections of our weaker vessels. His tongue is very voluble, which, with Canting, proves him a Linguist. He is entertain'd in every place, but enters no further than the doore, to avoid suspition. Some would take him to be a Coward, but, beleieve it, he is a Lad of mettle; his valour is commonly three or foure yards long, fastned to a pike in the end, for flying off. He is provident, for he will fight with but one at once, and then also hee had rather submit than be counted obstinate. To conclude, if he scape Tyburn and Banbury, he dies a begger.

John Chalkhill.—A poem described as 'a pastoral history,' Thealma and Clearchus, was published by Izaak Walton in 1683, with a title-page stating it to have been 'written long since by JOHN CHALKHILL, Esq., an acquaintance and friend of Edmund Spencer.' Walton, who had known the author, says 'he was in his time a man generally known, and as well beloved; for he was humble and obliging in his behaviour, a gentleman, a scholar, very innocent and prudent; and, indeed, his whole life was useful, quiet, and virtuous.' Thealma and Clearchus was reprinted by the Rev. Samuel Weller Singer (Chiswick, 1820), who expressed an opinion that, as Walton had been silent upon the life of Chalkhill, he might be altogether a fictitious personage, and the poem be actually the composition of Walton himself; and a writer, probably Sir Egerton Brydges, in vol. iv. of the Retrospective Review, after investigating the circumstances, came to the same conclusion. But Mr F. S. Merryweather, in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1860, showed that towards the close of Elizabeth's reign an Ivon or Ion Chalkhill, Gent., was one of the coroners for the county of Middlesex, and suggested that this may have been the poet. The poetry soars above the level of Izaak's muse, who dwelt by the side of trout streams and among quiet meadows. The Compleat Angler, published thirty years before Thealma, had already inserted in it two songs, signed 'Io. Chalkhill.' Whoever was the author, Thealma is, according to Professor Saintsbury (who prints it in Minor Poets of the Caroline Period, vol. ii. 1906), a Caroline poem of the regular type; it is utterly unlike the work of Spenser or his contemporaries. The scene of this highly artificial 'pastoral' is laid in Arcadia, and the author describes the Golden Age and all its charms, succeeded by an Age of Iron, with its ambition, avarice, and tyranny. The plot is complicated and obscure, and the characters lack individuality; the interest depends on the romantic descriptions and occasional felicity of language. The versification is that of the heroic couplet, varied, like Milton's Lycidas, by breaks and pauses in the middle of the line:

The Priestess of Diana.

Within a little silent grove hard by,
Upon a small ascent he might espy
A stately chapel, richly gilt without,
Beset with shady sycamores about:
And ever and anon he might well hear
A sound of music steal in at his ear
As the wind gave it being: so sweet an air
Would strike a syren mute. . . .
A hundred virgins there he might espy
Prostrate before a marble deity,
Which, by its portraiture, appeared to be
The image of Diana: on their knee
They tendered their devotions; with sweet airs,
Offering the incense of their praise and prayers.
Their garments all alike; beneath their paps,
Buckled together with a silver clasp,
And cross their snowy silken robes, they wore
An azure scarf, with stars embroidered o'er.
Their hair in curious tresses was knit up,
Crowned with a silver crescent on the top.
A silver bow their left hand held; their right,
For their defence, held a sharp-headed flight,
Drawn from their 'broidered quiver, neatly tied
In silken cords, and fastened to their side.
Under their vestments, something short before,
White buskins, laced with ribanding, they wore.
It was a catching sight for a young eye,
That love had fired before: he might espy
One whom the rest had sphere-like circled round,
Whose head was with a golden chaplet crowned.
He could not see her face, only his ear
Was blest with the sweet words that came from her.

The Witch's Cave.

Her cell was hewn out of the marble rock,
By more than human art; she need not knock;
The door stood always open, large and wide,
Grown o'er with woolly moss on either side,
And interwove with ivy's flattering twines,
Through which the carbuncle and diamond shines,
Not set by Art, but there by Nature sown
At the world's birth, so star-like bright they shone.
They served instead of tapers, to give light
To the dark entry, where perpetual Night,
Friend to black deeds, and sire of Ignorance,
Shuts out all knowledge, lest her eye by chance

Might bring to light her follies: in they went.
The ground was strewed with flowers, whose sweet scent,
Mixed with the choice perfumes from India brought,
Intoxicates his brain, and quickly caught
His credulous sense; the walls were gilt, and set
With precious stones, and all the roof was fret
With a gold vine, whose straggling branches spread
All o'er the arch; the swelling grapes were red;
This Art had made of rubies clustered so,
To the quick'st eye they more than seemed to grow;
About the walls lascivious pictures hung,
Such as were of loose Ovid sometimes sung.
On either side a crew of dwarfish elves
Held waxen tapers, taller than themselves:
Yet so well shaped unto their little stature,
So angel-like in face, so sweet in feature;
Their rich attire so differing; yet so well
Becoming her that wore it, none could tell
Which was the fairest, which the handsomest decked,
Or which of them Desire would soon'st affect.
After a low salute, they all 'gan sing,
And circle in the stranger in a ring.
Orandra to her charms was stepped aside,
Leaving her guest half won and wanton-eyed.
He had forgot his herb: cunning delight
Had so bewitched his ears, and bleared his sight,
And captivated all his senses so,
That he was not himself: nor did he know
What place he was in, or how he came there,
But greedily he feeds his eye and ear
With what would ruin him. . . .

Next unto his view

She represents a banquet, ushered in
By such a shape as she was sure would win
His appetite to taste; so like she was
To his Clarinda, both in shape and face;
So voiced, so habited, of the same gait
And comely gesture; on her brow in state
Sat such a princely majesty as he Had noted in Clarinda; save that she
Had a more wanton eye, that here and there
Rolled up and down, not settling anywhere.
Down on the ground she falls his hand to kiss,
And with her tears bedews it; cold as ice
He felt her lips, that yet inflamed him so,
That he was all on fire the truth to know,
Whether she was the same she did appear,
Or whether some fantastic form it were,
Fashioned in his imagination
By his still working thoughts; so fixed upon
His loved Clarinda, that his fancy strove,
Even with her shadow, to express his love.

Edward Fairfax (c.1580-1635), translator of Tasso's Jerusalem, a son—probably illegitimate—of Sir Thomas Fairfax of Denton, in Yorkshire, was born near Leeds, and spent his life mainly in literary work at Newhall, in Fewston parish, near Otley, Yorkshire. He dedicated his Godfrey of Bulloigne: or the Recoverie of Jerusalem, to Queen Elizabeth (1st ed. 1600; 2nd ed. 1624). The poetical beauty and freedom of this version of Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata have been the theme of almost universal praise. Dryden ranked Fairfax with Spenser as a master of our language, and Waller said he derived from him the harmony of his numbers, though Ben Jonson said 'it was not well done.' It charmed James I. and solaced the imprisonment of Charles I. Hallam, admitting that it shows spirit and freedom, decides not unreasonably that it lacks the grace of the original. It was not the first translation (Richard Carew translated the first five cantos; see above at page 353), and there have been over half-a-dozen since; but it may still claim to be the English rendering, and an essential part of English literature. In 1621 Fairfax wrote a Discourse of Witchcraft (first printed in the Philobiblon Miscellanies, 1859), and in the preface to it he states that in religion he was 'neither a fantastic Puritan nor a superstitious Papist,' but describes in full the bewitching of two of his own daughters. He also wrote a series of Eclogues, one of which—a poor thing—was published in 1741.

If the opening of the first book of the Godfrey (or Jerusalem) recalls Homer and Virgil on the one hand, the English version suggests Spenser and Milton on the other :

The sacred Armies and the godly Knight
That the great Sepulcher of Christ did free
I sing; much wrought his valour and foresight
And in that glorious warre much suffred he:
In vaine gainst him did hell oppose her might,
In vaine the Turkes and Morians armed be:
His soldiers wilde, to braules and mutines prest,
Reduced he to peace, so heaven him blest.

O heavenly Muse that not with fading baies
Deckest thy brow by th' Heliconian spring,
But sittest crowned with starres immortall raies,
In heaven where legions of bright Angels sing;
Inspire life in my wit, my thoughts upraise,
My verse ennoble and forgive the thing,
If fictions light I mix with truth divine,
And fill these lines with other praise than thine.

In Tasso's great epic Armida is a beautiful sorceress, employed to seduce Rinaldo and other Crusaders as they approach the Holy City. Rinaldo after a struggle triumphs over her witcheries, confesses his love to her, and persuades her to become a Christian.

Armida and her Enchanted Girdle.

And with that word she smiled, and nerthelesse
Her love-toyes still she used, and pleasures bold:
Her haire, that done, she twisted up in tresse,
And looser locks in silken laces rolled;
Her curles garland-wise she did up-dresse,
Wherein, like rich ennamell laid on gold,
The twisted flowrets smiled, and her white brest
The Lillies there that spring with Roses drest.

The jolly Peacocke spreads not halfe so faire
The eyed feathers of his pompous traine;
Nor golden Iris so bends in the aire
Her twentie-coloured bow, through clouds of raine:
Yet all her ornaments, strange, rich, and rare,
Her girdle did in price and beauty staine;
Not that, with scorn, which Tuscan Guilla lost,
Nor Venus Ceston could match this for cost. cestus

Of milde denaies, of tender scornes, of sweet
Repulses, war, peace, hope, despaire, joy, feare.
Of smiles, jests, mirth, woe, grief, and sad regreet;
Sighs, sorrowes, teares, embracements, kisses deare,
That mixed first by weight and measure meet,
Then at an easy fire attempted were;
This wondrous girdle did Armida frame,
And when she would be loved, wore the same.

Rinaldo at the Enchanted Wood.

It was the time when gainst the breaking day
Rebellious night yet strove, and still repined,
For in the east appeared the morning gray,
And yet some lampes in Joves high palace shined,
When to Mount Olivet he took his way,
And saw, as round about his eies he twined,
Nights shadows hence, from thence the mornings shine,
This bright, that darke; that earthly, this divine.

Phineas and Giles Fletcher

were sons of Giles Fletcher, LL.D. (c.1549-1611), himself something of a poet, who was sent in 1588 as ambassador to Russia, and wrote Of the Russe Common Wealth (1591) and Licia or Poemes of Love. Both were clergymen; Phineas educated, like his father, at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, and Giles at Westminster and Trinity. Phineas (1582-1650) in 1621 became rector of Hilgay, in Norfolk; Giles (c.1588-1623) from about 1618 was rector of Alderton, Suffolk. The elder Giles was the brother of the Bishop of London, father of John Fletcher the dramatist—who was accordingly cousin of the two poet-brothers.

The works of Phineas consist of the Purple Island or the Isle of Man, Piscatory Eclogues, and miscellaneous poems. The Purple Island was published in 1633, but written much earlier, as appears from allusions in it to the Earl of Essex. The name of the poem conjures up images of poetical and romantic beauty such as we may suppose a youthful admirer and follower of Spenser to have drawn—unless, indeed, it suggests the misapprehension that led to its being entered in a bookseller's topographical catalogue under 'Man, Isle of.' A perusal of the work dispels illusions. The Purple Island of Fletcher is no sunny spot 'amid the melancholy main;' it is an elaborate and anatomical description of the body and mind of man, involving a portentous allegory which inevitably repels the average reader. Beginning with the veins, arteries, bones, and muscles of the human frame, the poet pictures them as hills, dales, streams, and rivers, and describes with great minuteness their different meanderings, elevations, and appearances; one is reminded of Harvey's recent great discovery of the circulation of the blood. But that Fletcher's physiology differed pretty widely from our current doctrines will be plain from the kindly view he takes of the liver and its normal functions:

So 'tween the Splenion's frost and th' angry Gall
The joviall Hepar sits; with great expence
Cheering the Isle by his great influence (!); and he does not reject the view that 'within (viz. the liver) love hath his habitation.' Having in five cantos exhausted man's physical phenomena, he proceeds to describe the complex nature and operations of the mind. Intellect is the prince of the Isle of Man, and he is furnished with eight counsellors—Fancy, Memory, the Common Sense, and five external senses. The human fortress thus garrisoned is assailed by the Vices, and a fierce contest ensues for the possession of the human soul. At length an angel interposes, and ensures victory to the Virtues—the angel being King James I., on whom is heaped much fulsome adulation. From the above sketch of this odd poem, it will be apparent that its worth must rest, not upon the attractions of its plot, but upon the beauty of isolated passages and particular descriptions. Some of Phineas's seven-line stanzas have the flow and sweetness of Spenser's Faerie Queene, a few of them Spenser's charm; multitudes are marred by affectation, perversities, and the tedium of long-protracted allegory.

Giles Fletcher published only one poem of any length—Christ's Victorie and Triumph. It appeared at Cambridge in 1610, and met with such indifferent success that a second edition was not called for till twenty years afterwards. There is a massive grandeur and earnestness about Christ's Victorie which strikes the imagination. The materials of the poem are better fused together and more harmoniously linked than those of the Purple Island; the unusual eight-line stanza contrasts with interspersed lyrics. 'Both of these brothers,' said Hallam, 'are deserving of much praise; they were endowed with minds eminently poetical, and not inferior in imagination to any of their contemporaries. But an injudicious taste, and an excessive fondness for a style which the public was rapidly abandoning, that of allegorical personification, prevented their powers from being effectively displayed.' Campbell's criticism is not antiquated: 'They were both the disciples of Spenser, and, with his diction gently modernised, retained much of his melody and luxuriant expression. Giles, inferior as he is to Spenser and Milton, might be figured, in his happiest moments, as a link of connection in our poetry between these congenial spirits, for he reminds us of both, and evidently gave hints to the latter in a poem on the same subject with Paradise Regained.' These hints are indeed very plain and obvious. The appearance of Satan as an aged sire 'slowly footing' in the silent wilderness, the temptation of our Saviour in the 'goodly garden' and in the Bower of Vain Delight, are outlines which Milton adopted and filled up in his second epic, with a grace and power unknown to the Fletchers—for whom may be claimed ingenuity of invention, copiousness of fancy, melodious numbers, and language at times rich, ornate, and highly poetical. If Spenser had not previously written his Bower of Bliss, Giles Fletcher's Bower of Vain Delight would have been unequalled in the poetry of that day; probably, like his master, Spenser, he drew from Tasso. The poems of both brothers are included in Dr Grosart's 'Fuller Worthies Library' (1868-69). The best edition of their poetical works is by F. S. Boas (2 vols. 1908-9).

Decay of Human Greatness.

From the Purple Island. By Phineas Fletcher.

Fond man, that looks on earth for happinesse,
And here long seeks what here is never found !
For all our good we hold from heav'n by lease,
With many forfeits and conditions bound ;

Nor can we pay the fine and rentage due :
Though now but writ, and seal'd, and giv'n anew,
Yet daily we it break, yet daily must renew.

Why should'st thou here look for perpetuall good,
At every losse against heav'ns face repining ?
Do but behold where glorious Cities stood,
With gilded tops and silver turrets shining ;
There now the hart fearlesse of greyhound feeds,
And loving pelican in safety breeds ;
There schrieking Satyres fill the people's emptie steads.

Where is th' Assyrian Lion's golden hide,
That all the East once graspt in lordly paw ?
Where that great Persian Beare, whose swelling pride
The Lion's self tore out with ravenous jaw ?
Or he which 'twixt a Lion and a Pard,
Through all the world with nimble pineons far'd,
And to his greedy whelps his conquer'd kingdoms shar'd ?

Hardly the place of such antiquitie,
Or note of those great Monarchies we finde .
Onely a fading verball memorie,
And empty name in writ is left behinde :
But when this second life and glory fades,
And sinks at length in Time's obscurer shades,
A second fall succeeds, and double death invades.

That monstrous Beast, which nurst in Tiber's fenne
Did all the world with hideous shape affray ;
That fill'd with costly spoil his gaping denne,
And trode down all the rest to dust and clay :
His batt'ring horns pull'd out by civil hands,
And iron teeth lie scatter'd on the sands ;
Backt, bridled by a monk, with sev'n heads yokèd stands.

And that black Vulture, which with deathfull wing
O're-shadows half the earth, whose dismall sight
Frighted the Muses from their native spring,
Already stoops, and flagges with weary flight.
Who then shall look for happines beneath ; [death,
Where each new day proclaims chance, change, and
And life it self's as flit as is the air we breathe ? fleeting
(From Canto vii.)

The symbolical Leopard is Alexander the Great ; the monstrous Beast is of course the Papacy ; the black Vulture is the Turk.

Parthenia.

From the Purple Island.

With her her sister went, a warlike maid,
Parthenia, all in steel and gilded arms ;
In needle's stead a mighty spear she sway'd,
With which in bloudy fields and fierce alarms
The boldest champion she down would bear,
And like a thunderbolt wide passage tear,
Flinging all to the earth with her enchanted spear.

Her goodly armour seem'd a garden green,
Where thousand spotlesse lilies freshly blew ;
And on her shield the 'lone bird might be seen,
Th' Arabian bird, shining in colours new :
It self unto it self was onely mate ;
Ever the same, but new in newer date :
And underneath was writ, 'Such is chaste single state.'

Thus hid in arms, she seem'd a goodly knight,
And fit for any warlike exercise :
And when she list lay down her armour bright,
And back resume her peacefull maiden's guise ;
The fairest maid she was, that ever yet
Prison'd her locks within a golden net,
Or let them waving hang, with roses fair beset.

Choice nymph, the crown of chaste Diana's train,
Thou Beautie's lillie, set in heav'nly earth ;
Thy fairs, unpattern'd, all perfections stain :
Sure heav'n with curious pencil at thy birth
In thy rare face her own full picture drew :
It is a strong verse here to write but true :
Hyperboles in others are but half thy due.

Upon her forehead Love his trophies fits,
A thousand spoils in silver arch displaying ;
And in the midst himself full proudly sits,
Himself in awfull majestic araying :
Upon her brows lies his bent ebon bow,
And ready shafts : deadly those weapons show ;
Yet sweet that death appear'd, lovely that deadly blow. . . .

A bed of lilies flower upon her cheek,
And in the midst was set a circling rose ;
Whose sweet aspect would force Narcissus seek
New liveries, and fresher colours choose
To deck his beauteous head in snowie tire ;
But all in vain : for who can hope t' aspire
To such a fair, which none attain, but all admire ?

Her rubie lips lock up from gazing sight
A troop of pearls, which march in goodly row :
But when she deignes those precious bones undight,
Soon heav'nly notes from those divisions flow,
And with rare musick charm the ravisht eares,
Danting bold thoughts, but cheering modest fears :
The spheres so onely sing, so onely charm the spheres. . . .

Yet all the starres which deck this beauteous skie,
By force of th' inward sunne both shine and move :
Thron'd in his heart sits Love's high majestie ;
In highest majestie the highest Love.
As when a taper shines in glassie frame,
The sparkling crystall burns in glitt'ring flame :
So does that brightest Love brighten this lovely dame.

(From Canto x.)

Parthenia is defined by the poet as 'chastitie in the single,' as Aguia is 'chastitie in the married.' The Arabian bird, the phoenix, was of course a virgin bird.

The Soroeress of Vain Delight.

From Christ's Victorie and Triumph. By Giles Fletcher.

The garden like a ladie faire was cut,
That lay as if shee slumber'd in delight,
And to the open skies her eyes did shut ;
The azure fields of heav'n wear ^{sembl'd} right
In a large round, set with the flow'rs of light :

The flow'r's-de-luce, and the round sparks of dew, dew
That hung upon the azure leaves, did shew
Like twinkling starrs, that sparkle in th' eav'ning blew.

Upon a hillie banke her head shee cast,
On which the bowre of Vaine-delight was built ;
White and red roses for her face wear plac't,
And for her tresses marigolds wear spilt :
Them broadly shee displaid, like flaming guilt,
Till in the ocean the glad day wear drown'd ;
Then up againe her yellow locks she wound,
And with greene fillets in their prettie calls them bound.

What should I here depeint her lillie hand,
Her veines of violets, her ermine brest,
Which thear in orient colours living stand ;
Or how her gowne with silken leaves is drest ;
Or how her watchmen, arm'd with boughie crest,
A wall of prim hid in his bushes bears,
Shaking at every winde their leavie spears,
While she supinely sleeps, ne to be wakèd fears !

Over the hedge depends the graping elme,
Whose greener head empurpled in wine,
Seem'd to wonder at his bloodie helme,
And halfe suspect the bunches of the vine ;
Least they, perhaps, his wit should undermine.
For well he knewe such fruit he never bore :
But her weake armes embraced him the more,
And with her ruby grapes laught at her paramour. . . .

The rooffe thicke cloudes did paint, from which three boyes
Three gaping mermaides with their eawrs did feed, ^{ewers, vases}
Whose breasts let fall the streame, with sleepeie noise,
To lions mouths, from whence it leapt with speede,
And in the rosie laver seem'd to bleed.
The naked boyes unto the water's fall,
Their stonie nightingales had taught to call,
When Zephyr breath'd into their watry interall.

And all about, embayed in soft sleepe,
A heard of charmed beasts aground were spread,
Which the faire witch in goulden chaines did keepe,
And them in willing bondage fettered ;
Once men they li'd, but now the men were dead
And turn'd to beasts ; so fabled Homer old,
That Circe with her potion, charm'd in gold,
Us'd manly soules in beastly bodies to immould.

Through this false Eden, to his leman's bowre,
(Whome thousand soules devoutly idolize)
Our first destroyer led our Saviour :
Thear in the lower roome, in solemne wise,
They daunc't around, and pow'd their sacrifice
To plumpe Lyæus, and among the rest,
The jolly priest, in yvie garlands drest,
Chaunted wild orgialls, in honour of the feast. . . .

High over all Panglorie's blazing throne,
In her bright turret, all of christal wrought,
Like Phoebus lampe, in midst of heaven, shone ;
Whose starry top with pride infernall fraught,
Selfe-arching columns to uphold wear taught :
In which her image still reflected was
By the smooth christall that, most like her glasse,
In beauty and in frailtie did all others passe.

A silver wande the sorceresse did sway,
 And for a crowne of gold her haire she wore ;
 Onely a garland of rose-buds did play
 About her locks ; and in her hand she bore
 A hollowe globe of glasse, that long before
 She full of emptinesse had bladdered,
 And all the world therein depictured :
 Whose colours, like the rainbowe, ever vanished.

Such watry orbicles young boyes do blowe
 Out of their sopy shels, and much admire
 The swimming world, which tenderly they rowe
 With easie breath, till it be waved higher :
 But if they chauce but roughly once aspire,
 The painted bubble instantly doth fall.
 Here when she came, she 'gan for musique call,
 And sung this wooing song, to welcome Him withall :—

Love is the blossome whear thear blowes
 Every thing that lives or growes :
 Love doth make the heav'ns to move,
 And the sun doth burne in love :
 Love the strong and weake doth yoke,
 And makes the yvie climbe the oke ;
 Under whose shadowes lions wilde,
 Soft'ned by love, grow tame and mild ;
 Love no med'cine can appease,
 He burnes the fishes in the seas ;
 Not all the skill his wounds can stench, stanch
 Not all the sea his fire can quench :
 Love did make the bloody spear
 Once a levie coat to wear, leavy, leafy
 While in his leaves thear shrouded lay
 Sweete birds for love that sing and play :
 And of all love's joyfull flame
 I the bud and blossome am :
 Onely bend Thy knee to mee,
 Thy wooing shall Thy winning bee.

See, see the flowers that belowe
 Now as fresh as morning blowe ;
 And of all, the virgin rose,
 That as bright Aurora shewes :
 How they all unleaved die,
 Loosing their virginite ;
 Like unto a summer-shade,
 But now borne, and now they fade.
 Every thing doth passe away,
 Thear is danger in delay :
 Come, come gather then the rose,
 Gather it, or it you lose :
 All the sand of Tagus' shore
 Into my bosome casts his ore :
 All the valleys' swimming corne
 To my house is yeerely borne ;
 Every grape of every vine
 Is gladly bruis'd to make me wine,
 While ten thousand kings, as proud
 To carry up my train, have bow'd,
 And a world of ladies send me
 In my chambers to attend me :
 All the starres in heav'n that shine,
 And ten thousand more, are mine.
 Onely bend Thy knee to mee,
 Thy wooing shall Thy winning bee.

Thus sought the dire Enchauntress in His minde
 Her guilefull bayt to have embosomed ;

But He her charmes dispersed into winde,
 And her of insolence admonished ;
 And all her optique glasses shattered.
 So with her sire to Hell shee took her flight,
 (The starting ayre flew from the damned spright,)
 Whear deeply both aggriev'd plunged themselves in night.

But to their Lord, now musing in His thought,
 A heavenly volie of light angels flew,
 And from His Father Him a banquet brought,
 Through the fine element ; for well they knew,
 After His Lenten fast He hungrie grew ;
 And, as He fed, the holy quires combine
 To sing a hymne of the celestially Trine ;
 All thought to passe, and each was past all thought divine.

The birds' sweet notes, to sonnet out their joyes,
 Attemper'd to the layes angelicall ;
 And to the birds the winds attune their noyse,
 And to the winds the waters hoarcely call,
 And Eccho back againe revoyced all ;
 That the whole valley rung with victorie.
 But now our Lord to rest doth homeward flie :
 See how the Night comes stealing from the mountains high

Sir John Beaumont (1582–1628) was the elder brother of the celebrated dramatist. Enjoying the family estate of Gracedieu, in Leicestershire, Sir John dedicated part of his leisure hours to the service of the Muses. He wrote, in neat enough heroic couplets, a somewhat unimpassioned poem on Bosworth Field. This is how he gives Richard's address to his troops on the eve of the decisive battle :

My fellow-souldiers, though your swords
 Are sharpe, and need not whetting by my words ;
 Yet call to minde those many glorious dayes
 In which we treasur'd up immortall prayse ;
 If when I serv'd, I ever fled from foe,
 Fly ye from mine, let me be punisht so :
 But if my father, when at first he try'd
 How all his sonnes could shining blades abide,
 Found me an eagle, whose undazled eyes
 Affront the beames which from the steele arise,
 And if I now in action teach the same,
 Know then, ye have but chang'd your gen'rall's name ;
 Be still your selves, ye fight against the drosse
 Of those that oft have runne from you with losse :
 How many Somersets,—Dissention's brands !—
 Have felt the force of our revengefull hands !
 From whome this youth, as from a princely fload,
 Derives his best, yet not untainted blood ;
 Have our assaults made Lancaster to droupe ?
 And shall this Welshman with his ragged troupe
 Subdue the Norman and the Saxon line,
 That onely Merlin may be thought divine ?
 See what a guide these fugitives have chose !
 Who bred among the French, our ancient foes,
 Forgets the English language and the ground,
 And knowes not what our drums and trumpets sound.

In a poem to the memory of a friend are these excellent observations in verse :

Why should vaine sorrow follow him with teares,
Who shakes off burdens of declining yeeres?
Whose thread exceeds the usuall bounds of life,
And feelles no stroke of any fatall knife?
The Destinies enjoyne their wheeles to run,
Untill the length of his whole course be spun.
No envious cloud obscures his struggling light,
Which sets contented at the point of night;
Yet this large time no greater profit brings,
Then ev'ry little moment whence it springs,
Unlesse imploy'd in workes deserving praise;
Most weare out many yeeres, and live few dayes.
Time flowes from instants, and of these each one
Should be esteem'd as if it were alone:
The shortest space, which we so lightly prize
When it is comming and before our eyes,
Let it but slide into th' eternall maine,
No realmes, no world can purchase it againe:
Remembrance onely makes the footsteps last,
When winged Time, which fixt the prints, is past.

Samuel Purchas (1577-1626), born at Thaxted, in Essex; studied at St John's, Cambridge; held successively two livings in Essex; and from 1614 till his death was rector of St Martin's in Ludgate. In 1613 he published a volume called Purchas his Pilgrimage; or Relations of the World, and the Religions observed in all Ages and Places discovered from the Creation unto this Present. A second work was Purchas his Pilgrim, Microcosmus or the History of Man, Relating the Wonders of his Generation, Vanities in his Degeneration, Necessity of his Regeneration (1619). Hakluyt's papers having fallen into his hands, he issued in 1625 his best-known work, Hakluytus Posthumus, or Purchas his Pilgrimes: containing a History of the World, in Sea Voyages and Land Travels by Englishmen and others (4 vols. folio, 1625; reprinted in 20 vols. 1905). The fourth edition of the Pilgrimage usually accompanies the Pilgrimes as if a fifth volume. Purchas himself thus describes the two books: 'These brethren holding much resemblance in name, nature, and feature, yet differ in both the object and the subject. This [the Pilgrimage] being mine own in matter, though borrowed, and in form of words and method; whereas my Pilgrimes are the authors themselves, acting their own parts in their own words, only furnished by me with such necessities as that stage further required, and ordered according to my rules.' If we may judge by a comparison of his work with such of the 'relations' as have not perished, Purchas was neither painstaking nor conscientious as an editor; many of his stories seem to be meagre abstracts of his originals; and his tales are notable rather for a certain old-world quaintness than for any exceptional literary gift. The theological disquisitions with which he interlards his narratives are at times rather amusing than edifying. Vol. i. of the Pilgrimes contains voyages and travels of ancient kings, patriarchs, apostles, and philosophers; voyages of circumnavigators of the globe; and voyages along the coasts of Africa to the East Indies, Japan, China, the Philippine Islands, and the Persian and Arabian Gulfs; Vol. ii., voyages and relations of Africa, Ethiopia, Palestine, Arabia, Persia, and other parts of Asia; Vol. iii., Tartary, China, Russia, North-west America, and the Polar Regions; Vol. iv., America and the West Indies; Vol. v. contains the Pilgrimage, which is substantially a theological and geographical history of Asia, Africa, and America. The editor of Churchill's Collection (supposed to have been John Locke) says of Purchas, that 'he has imitated Hakluyt too much, swelling his work into five volumes in folio;' yet, he adds, 'the whole collection is very valuable, as having preserved many considerable voyages that might otherwise have perished. But, like Hakluyt, he has thrown in all that came to hand, to fill up so many volumes, and is excessive full of his own notions, and of mean quibbling and playing upon words; yet for such as can make choice of the best, the collection is very valuable.'

The Pilgrimage is also in large measure a cento from the stories of travellers and older authors, sometimes boiled down and restated in Purchas's own words. Thus the thirteenth chapter of Book IV. is expressly based on the travellers Plano Carpini, Rubruquis, and (especially) Marco Polo, as well as on less satisfactory authorities—the thirteenth-century chronicler Matthew Paris, the thirteenth-century encyclopædist Vincentius Belvacensis, and Sir John Mandeville! The famous paragraph in it which dominated Coleridge's day-dream, and took visionary shape in his Kubla Khan, is shortened from Marco Polo's account (Book I. chap. lxi.) of the great Khan's summer palace at Kai-ping-fu, north of Pekin, which the Chinese called Shang-tu (i.e. 'upper court'). Marco makes the word Chandu, Odoric Sandu, Ramusio Xandu, and Purchas Xamdu. What follows about the Tebet and Kasimur, the Bacsí and Sensin, is merely abstracted from Marco. Coleridge's 'Alph' is not in Purchas or his authorities, and may be the classical Alpheus which disappears in caverns of limestone and comes to light again more than once. The Abora of the poem is no doubt the 'admirable hill Amara' on which Purchas waxes eloquent in his seventh book—the name still seen in Amhara, the central province of Abyssinia, and in Amharic, the name of the modern Abyssinian language. Purchas was republished in 1905. In the following extract he is speaking of the manners and customs of the Tartars:

Their wives are exceeding chaste and observant: and though they bee many, yet can Rachel and Leah, yea ten or twentie of them, agree with a marvellous union, intent unto their household and other businesse, whereby they are gainefull and not chargeable to their Husbands. When they marry, the Husband covenanteth with the Father of the Maide, who having given him power to take her wheresoever hee shall finde her, hee seeketh her among some of her friends, where shee hath then of purpose hidden her selfe, and by a kinde of force carrieth her away. They marry with any except their owne Mother and Sister. Their Widdowes seldome marry, because of their service to their former Husbands in another world, except the sonne marrie his fathers wives, or the brother his brothers, because they can there in the next world bee content to resigne them to their former Husbands againe. The women buy, sell, and provide all necessities into the house, the men intending nothing but their Armes, Hunting, and Hawking. If one hath buried a Male-child, and another a Female, the Parents contract a marriage betwixt those two, and painting in papers, Servants, Horses, Clothes, and Houshold, and making writings for the confirmation of the Dower, burne these things in the fire, by the smoake whereof they (in their smokie conceits) imagine all these things to be carried and confirmed to their children in the other world: and the Parents of the two dead parties claime kindred each of other: as if they indeed had married their children while they lived.

In Xamdu did Cublai Can build a stately Palace, encompassing sixteene miles of plaine ground with a wall, wherein are fertile Meddowes, pleasant Springs, delighfull Streames, and all sorts of beasts of chase and game, and in the midst thereof a sumptuous house of pleasure, which may be removed from place to place. Here hee doth abide in the moneths of Iune, Iuly, and August, on the eight and twentieth day whereof, hee departeth thence to another place to doe sacrifice on this manner: He hath a Heard or Drove of Horses and Mares, about ten thousand, as white as snow; of the milke whereof none may taste, except hee bee of the bloud of Cingis Can. Yea, the Tartars doe these beasts great reverence, nor dare any crosse their way, or goe before them. According to the direction of his Astrologers or Magicians, he on the eight and twentieth of August aforesaid, spendeth and poureth forth with his owne hands the milke of these Mares in the ayre and on the earth, to give drinke to the Spirits and Idols which they worship, that they may preserve the men, women, beasts, birds, corne, and other things growing on the earth.

These Astrologers, or Necromancers, are in their Art marvellous. When the skie is cloudy and threatneth raine, they will ascend the roofe of the Palace of the Grand Can, and cause the raine and tempests to fall round about, without touching the said Palace. These which thus doe are called Tebeth and Chesmir, two sorts of Idolaters, which delude the people with opinion of their sanctitie, imputing these workes to their dissembled holinesse: and for this cause they goe in filthy and beastly manner, not caring who seeth them, with dirt on their faces, never washing nor combing themselves. And if any bee condemned to death, they take, dresse, and eate him: which they doe not if any die naturally. They are also called Bachsi, that is, of such a Religion or Order; as if one should say a Frier-Preacher, or Minor, and are exceedingly expert in their divellish Art. They cause that the Bottles in the Hall of the Great Can doe fill the Bowles of their owne accord, which also without mans helpe passe ten paces through the ayre, into the hands of the said Can; and when he hath drunke, in like sort returne to their place. These Baschi sometimes resort unto the Officers, and threaten plagues or other misfortune from their Idols, which to prevent they desire so many Muttons with black heads, and so many pounds of Incense and Lignum Aloes, to performe their due sacrifices. Which they accordingly receive and offer on their Feast-day, sprinkling Broth before their Idols. There be of these, great Monasteries, which seeme like a small Citie, in some whereof are two thousand Monkes, which shave their heads and beards, and weare a religious habite, and hallow their Idols Feasts with great solemnitie of Hymnes and Lights. Some of these may bee married. Other there are, called Sensim, an Order which observeth great abstinence and strictnesse of life, in all their life eating nothing but Bran, which they put in hot water, and let it stand till all the white of the meale bee taken away, and then eate it being thus washed. These worship the Fire, and are condemned of the other fore Heretikes, because they worship not their Idols, and will not marry in any case. They are shaven, and weare hempen-garments of black or bright yellow, and although they were Silke, yet would they not alter the colour. They sleepe on great Mats, and live the austere life in the world.

Purchas in praise of the sea is more eloquent than his wont:

Concerning the commodities of the Sea, as the world generally, so the little models of the world, the Ilands (whereof this of Great Britaine is iustly acknowledged the most excellent of the world, sometime accounted another world) have great cause to celebrate and acknowledge the same. It is a Wall of Defence about our shoares; Great Purveyour of the Worlds commodities to our use; Conveyour of the surquedry and excesses of Rivers; Uniter (by traffique) of Nations which it selfe severeth; an Open Field for pastimes of peace; a Pitched Field in time of warre, disdainng single personall Combates, and onley receiving whole Cities and Castles, encompassed with walls of Wood; which it setteth together with deadly hatred and dreadfulest force of the Elements, the Fierie thunders, Airie blasts, Watrie billowes, rockes, shelves and bottomes of the Earth, all conspiring to build heere a house for Death, which by fight or flight on land is more easily avoyded (and how did it scorne the Invincible title of the Spanish Fleet in 88. and effect thus much on our behalfe against them?) The Sea yeeldeth Fish for dyet, Pearles and other Iewels for ornament, Varietie of creatures for use and admiration, Refuge to the distressed, compendious Way to the Passengers, and Portage to the Merchant, Customes to the Prince, Springs to the Earth, Clouds to the Skie, matter of Contemplation to the minde, of Action to the bodie: Once, it yeeldeth all parts of the World to each part, and maketh the World (as this Treatise in part sheweth) knowne to it selfe. Superstition hath had her Sea-prophets which have found out other Sea-profits, as for the purging of sinnes: and the Roman Divines caused Hermaphrodites to be carried to the Sea for expiation, the Persian Magi thought it pollution to spit or doe other naturall necessities therein. But of these in divers places.

George Sandys (1578-1644), the seventh son of the Archbishop of York, was born at Bishopthorpe, and studied at St Mary Hall, Oxford. He undertook a long journey, of which he published an account in 1615, entitled A Relation of a Journey begun an. Dom. 1610: Foure Bookes, containing a Description of the Turkish Empire, of Egypt, of the Holy Land, of the Remote Parts of Italy, and Ilands adjoyning. He settled in Virginia in 1621-31, and there completed his translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses (1621-26); after his return he lived chiefly at Boxley Abbey, near Maidstone. He also translated the Psalms, and paraphrased other passages of Scripture. Dryden is more in the right about Sandys than about Chapman when, after condemning Chapman's Homer, he says: 'And no better than thus has Ovid been served by the so-much-admired Sandys.' His book of travels reached a seventh edition in 1673, a success not undeserved by the author's varied experiences, his acute observation, and his shrewd and pointed comments. Most modern readers could dispense with the very exhaustive citations and translations from all the classical writers about any place he came to or even passed in his journey from Venice by the Ionian Islands and the Archipelago to Constantinople, by sea to Egypt, across the desert with a caravan to Palestine, and so back by Malta to Naples. Constantinople and its buildings, the government and manners of the Turks, are expounded with as much fullness as the history and peculiarities of Egypt. He explored the Great Pyramid and described his experiences within, and took elaborate measurements of the sacred buildings at Jerusalem, especially of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The account of the experiments with the dog in the Grotto del Cane, of the cave of the Cumæan sibyl, and of the Lacus Avernus would still serve for a guide to the environs of Naples. And the numerous copperplate engravings seem to be from drawings specially made on the spot. Thus he describes his passage from Sicily by the Lipari Islands to the Calabrian coasts, with an account of tarantula spiders and other Calabrian specialties:

Of these there were seven (but now are eleven) almost of an equal magnitude. Yet Liparia is the greatest (being ten miles in circuite) as also the most famous; to which the other were subject: fruitful, and abounding with bitumen, sulphur, and allume, having also hot baths, much frequented by the diseased. In the yeere 1544 it was depopulated by the Turk: but Charles the fifth replanted it with Spaniards, and fortified the place. The fire here went out about an age ago, having (as is to be supposed) consumed the matter that fed it. Vulcano and Strombolo (of which we will onely speak) do now onely burne. Vulcano receiveth that name from his nature, consecrated formerly to Vulcan, and called his mansion. It is said but first to have appeared above water about the time that Scipio Africanus died. A barren Iland, stony, and uninhabited. It had three tunnels whereat it evaporated fire, but now hath but one: out of which it smoketh continually, and casts out stones with a horrible roaring. In the yeere of our Lord 1444 on the fifth of February, it flamed so abundantly, and flung forth fire and stones with such an hideous noyse, that not only the rest of the Ilands, but all Sicilia trembled thereat. Perhaps the last blaze; for now flame it doth not, but retaineth the rest of his terrors. Now Strombolo, called formerly Strongyle, of the rotundity thereof (for all is no other then a high round mountaine) doth burne almost continually at the top like a Beacon, and exceeding cleerely: so that by night it is to be discerned a wonderfull way. These places (and such like) are commonly affirmed by the Romane Catholickes to be the jawes of hell: & that within the damned soules are tormented. It was told me at Naples by a countreyman of ours and an old pentioner of the Popes, who was a youth in the dayes of King Henry, that it was then generally bruited thorowout England, that master Gresham, a merchant, setting saile from Palermo (where there then dwelt one Anthonio called the Rich, who at one time had 2 kingdomes morgaged unto him by the King of Spaine), being crossed by contrary winds, was constrained to anchor under the lee of this Iland. Now about mid-day, when for certaine houres it accustomedly forbearth to flame, he ascended the mountaine with eight of the sailers: and approaching as neere the vent as they durst, amongst other noises they heard a voice crie aloud, Dispatch, dispatch, the rich Antonio is a comming. Terrified herewith they descended: and anon the mountaine againe evaporated fire. But from so dismall a place they made all the haste that they could: when the winds still thwarting their course, and desiring much to know more of this matter, they returned to Palermo. And forthwith enquiring of Antonio, it was told them that he was dead; and computing the time, did finde it to agree with the very instant that the voice was heard by them. Gresham reported this at his returne to the King: and the mariners being called before him confirmed by oath the narration. In Gresham himselfe, as this Gentleman said (for I no otherwise report it), it wrought so deepe an impression that he gave over all traffique: distributing his goods, a part to his kinsfolke & the rest to good uses, retaining onely a competency for himselfe: and so spent the rest of his life in a solitary devotion.

All the day following we staid at Scylla, the winds not favouring us. My Spanish comrads were very harsh to me (for in these parts they detest the English, & think us not Christian), but when upon their demand I told them that I was no Lutheran, they exceeded on the other side in their courtesy. One of them had bin in the voiage of eighty eight; and would say that it was not we but the windes that overthrew them. On the third of July we departed, and landed that night at Aupage. Hereabout (as throughout this part of Calabria) are great store of Tarantulas: a serpent peculiar to this countrey, and taking that name from the Citie of Tarentum. Some hold them to be of the kind of spiders, others of effts; but they are greater then the one, and lesse then the other, and (if that were a Tarantula which I have seene) not greatly resembling either. For the head of this was smal, the legs slender and knottie, the bodie light, the taile spiny, and the colour dun, intermixed with spots of a sullied white. They lurke in sinkes, and privies, and abroad in the slimy filth betweene furrowes; for which cause the country people doe reape in bootes. The sting is deadly, and the contrary operations thereof most miraculous. For some so stung, are still oppressed with a leaden sleepe: others are vexed with continued waking, some fling up and downe, and others are extremely lazy. He sweats, a second vomits, a third runnes mad. Some weepe continually, and some laugh continually, and that is the most usuall. Insomuch that it is an ordinary saying to a man that is extraordinarily merrie, that he hath bene stung by a Tarantula. Hereupon not a few have thought, that there are as many kindes of Tarantulas, as severall affections in the infected. But as overliberall cups doe not worke with all in one manner, but according to each mans nature and constitution: some weepe, some laugh, some are tongue-tide, some all tongue, some sleepe, some leape over tables, some kisse, and some quarrell: even so it fallies out with those that are bitten. The merry, the mad, and otherwise actively disposed, are cured by musicke; at least it is the cause, in that it incites them to dance indefatigably: for by labour and sweate the poyson is expelled. And musicke also by a certaine high excellency hath bene found by experience to stirre in the sad and drowsie so strange an alacritie, that they have wearied the spectators with continued dancing. In the meane time the paine hath asswaged, the infection being driven from the heart, and the mind released of her sufferance. If the musicke intermit the maladie renewes, but againe continued and it vaniseth. And objects of wonder have wrought the same effects in the franticke. A Bishop of this cuntry passing in the high way, and clothed in red: one bit by a Tarantula, hooting thereat, fell a dancing about him. The offended Bishop commanded that he should be kept backe, and made haste away. But the people did instantly intreate him to have compassion of the poore distressed wretch; who would forthwith die, unlesse he stood still and suffered him to continue in that exercise. So shame or importunity enforced him to stay, untill by dancing certaine houres together the afflicted person became perfectly cured.

The fourth of July we rowed against the wind, and could reach no further then Castilion: where the high-wrought seas detained us the day following. Our churlish Oast, because we sent for such things to the towne whereof he had none, made us also fetch our water from thence, it being a mile off: though he had in his house a plentifull fountaine. And I thinke there are not that professe Christ a more uncivil people then the vulgar Calabrians. Over land there is no travelling without assured pillage, and hardly to be avoided murder; although all that you have about you (and that they know it) be not worth a Dollar. Wherefore the common passage is by sea, in this manner as we passed now. Along the shore there are many of these Ostarias: but most of the townes are a good way removed, and mounted on hills with not easie accesses. Divers small forts adjoyne to the sea, and watch-towers thorowout. For the Turkes not seldome made incursions by night: lurking in the day time about those uninhabited Ilands. Under these forts we nightly haled up our boate, and slept in our clothes on the sand. And our fare was little better then our lodging: Tunny, onions, cucumbers and melons being our ordinary viands. Not but that we might have had better: but the souldiers were thristie, and I was loth to exceed them. For there being but onely one house at a place, they sold every thing, not according to the worth, but to the necessitie of the buyer. But Mulberries we might gather, & eate of free cost: dangerously unwholesome if not pulled from the trees before Sunne rise. Of them there are here every where an infinite number: in so much that more silke is made in Calabria then besides in all Italie. And from the leaves of those that grow higher on the mountaines (for the Appenine stretcheth along the midst of this cuntry) they gather plenty of Manna, the best of all other: which falls thereon like a dew in the night time. Here a certaine Calabrian hearing that I was an English man, came to me, and would needs perswade me that I had insight in magicke: for that Earle Bothel was my countryman, who lives at Naples, and is in those parts famous for suspected negromancie. He told me that he had treasure hidden in his house; the quantitie and qualitie shewne him by a boy, upon the conjuration of a Knight of Malta: and offered to share it betweene us, if I could helpe him unto it. But I answered, that in England we were at defiance with the divell; and that he would do nothing for us.

The voiage of eighty eight is the Spanish Armada of that year; the tarantula is really a large and venomous spider, the effects of whose bite have been grossly exaggerated—tarantism, or the dancing mania, was apparently a hysterical affection; ostaria (sic) is a hostelry; the fifth Earl of Bothwell, the nephew of Queen Mary's Bothwell, died at Naples in great poverty in 1624, after a life of hare-brained adventure.

Thomas Coryate (1577?–1617) was born at Odombe, Somersetshire; entered Gloucester Hall, Oxford, in 1596, but left without a degree; and after James I.'s accession lived by his wits about court. In 1608 he set out on a rambling journey on the Continent, passing through Paris, Lyons, Turin, Venice, Zurich, Strasburg, Worms, Speier, Cologne, &c., and returning five months later with a record of 1975 miles, mostly on foot. His entertaining journal was at last published in 1611, with a collection of commendatory verses, as Coryat's Crudities: Hastily gobbled up in Five Moneths Travells in France, Savoy, Italy, Rhetia, Helvetia, High Germanie, and the Netherlands (republished in 1905). Next year, having hung up his shoes in church, he started again on his travels, visited Constantinople, Greece, Smyrna, Alexandria, and the Holy Land, and found his way by caravan to Mesopotamia, thence through Persia and Afghanistan to Agra, where he arrived in October 1616. In the December of the following year he died at Surat. The name Crudities does injustice to his record of his Continental tour; for though Coryate was scatter-brained, conceited, and pragmatical, he was a shrewd observer and something of a scholar; and in 'meteing' churches, describing monuments, and copying inscriptions of all kinds verbatim, he took vastly more trouble than the average modern globe-trotter, and his book, though lop-sided enough, contains much quaint and interesting information. He notes his first sight of storks and ostriches, of table-forks and umbrellas; his first experience of frogs as a dainty, and his modified approval of German beds. He is careful to tell all the famous men any place has given birth to or sheltered, and digests the substance of its mediæval history from Sebastian Münster or other learned writer. The story of William Tell and the Swiss rising against the Austrians he gives partly from Münster, partly from the oral communications of Switzers. At Strasburg he describes at great length the towers and spire of the cathedral, and the famous clock inside. Like contemporary Englishmen, he had a great abhorrence of popery, but seems to have got on pleasantly with all kinds of 'papists' but Spaniards, whom he carefully avoided as collectively agents of the Inquisition thirsting for the blood of a Protestant; and he is generally careful and conscientious in distinguishing what he saw from what he heard about. He at times shows a reasonable scepticism about what he is told, yet confidently accepts as proved and authentic the tale of a cruel lady near Leyden, in the fourteenth century, who, in consequence of a curse she brought on herself by insolence and hard-heartedness, brought forth 365 children at one birth, all of whom incontinently died the day they came into the world. The best of Catholics could hardly tell with more particularity or apparent faith the tale of the three kings of Colen (Cologne; the Magi of the New Testament), or of St Ursula and her eleven thousand martyred British virgins, 'because she was my country woman.' Of the earlier travels of this entertaining wanderer we have only incomplete record, part of his journal only having been preserved. Some of it is given in Purchas his Pilgrimes—such as a visit to the ruins of Troy (with the assistance of a 'druggerman'), the method of performing circumcision, and the exercitation of the howling and dancing dervishes in Constantinople. He learnt Turkish, Persian, and Arabic, and on occasion made speeches in Persic to 'Shah Jehan-jir, the Mogoll,' son of Akbar the Great. Oddly, though he praises Germany hyperbolically, he did not acquire High Dutch enough to speak with the vulgar. He seems to have got on as comfortably with Mohammedans as with Jesuits; he 'spent in his ten moneths travels betwixt Aleppo and the Moguls Court but three pounds sterling, yet fared reasonable well every daie; victuals being so cheape in some countries where I travelled that I sometimes lived competently for a pennie a daie; yet of that three pound I was cousened of no lesse than ten shillings sterling by certaine lewde christians of the Armenian Nation.'

Forks.

Here I wil mention a thing that might have been spoken of before in discourse of the first Italian town. I observed a custome in all those Italian cities and townes through the which I passed, that is not used in any other country that I saw in my travels, neither doe I thinke that any other nation of Christendome doth use it, but only Italy. The Italian and also most strangers that are commorant in Italy doe alwaies at their meales use a little forke when they cut their meate. For while with their knife which they hold in one hand they cut the meate out of the dish, they fasten their forke which they hold in their other hand upon the same dish, so that whatsoever he be that, sitting in the company of any others at meale, should unadvisedly touch the dish of meate with his fingers from which all at the table doe cut, he will give occasion of offence unto the company, as having transgressed the lawes of good manners, in so much that for his error he shall be at the least brow-beaten, if not reprehended in wordes. This forme of feeding I understand is generally used in all places of Italy, their forkes being for the most part made of yron or steele, and some of silver, but those are used only by gentlemen. The reason of this their curiosity is, because the Italian cannot by any means endure to have his dish touched with fingers, seing all mens fingers are not alike cleane. Hereupon I my self thought good to imitate the Italian fashion by this forked cutting of meate, not only while I was in Italy, but also in Germany, and oftentimes in England since I came home: being once quipped for that frequent using of my forke by a certain learned gentleman, a familiar friend of mine, one M. Laurence Whitaker, who in his merry humour doubted not to call me at table furcifer, only for using a forke at feeding, but for no other cause [the furcifer being, in Roman usage, a criminal condemned to bear on his shoulders a furca, a heavy fork or cross of wood].

Fried Frogs.

In this citie [Cremona] are made passing good swords as in most places of Italy. The Augustinian monkes have the stateliest library for workmanship (as the aforesaid Sartorius told me) that is in all Italy; therefore I went thither to see it, but because I came so late, even about nine of the clocke at night, I had not the opportunity to view it. I did eate fried frogges in this citie, which is a dish much used in many cities of Italy: they were so curiously dressed, that they did exceedingly delight my palat, the head and the forepart being cut off.

Theatres.

I was at one of their play-houses [in Venice], where I saw a comedie acted. The house is very beggarly and base in comparison of our stately play-houses in England: neyther can their actors compare with us for apparell, shewes and musick. Here I observed certaine things that I never saw before. For I saw women acte, a thing that I never saw before, though I have heard that it hath beene sometimes used in London, and they performed it with as good a grace, action, gesture, and whatsoever convenient for a player, as ever I saw any masculine actor. Also their noble and famous cortezans came to this comedy, but so disguised, that a man cannot perceive them. . . . They were so graced that they sate on high alone by themselves in the best roome of all the play-house.

German Beds.

The beds of the innes of this city [Zürich] and of all the other Helvetian and German cities are very strange, such as I never saw before; the like being in the private houses of every particular citizen as I heard. For evere man hath a light downe, or very soft feather bedde laid upon him, which keepeth him very warme, and is nothing offensive for the burden. For it is exceeding light, and serveth for the coverled of the bedde. In the refectory of that inne where I lay (which was at the signe of the two Storkes), there is a stove, such a one as I have before mentioned in my observations of Padua, which is so common a thing in all the houses of Switzerland and Germany (as I have before said) that no house is without it. I found them first in Rhetia, even in the city of Curia [Chur or Coire].

Bishop Hatto.

But the third thing that is reported of this towne [Bing, i.e. Bingen] is a thing passing memorable and very worthy the observation; such a wondrous and rare accident as I never read or heard of the like before. Therefore I will relate it in this place out of Munster, for one of the most notable examples of Gods justice that ever was extant in the whole world since the first creation thereof. It hapned in the yeare 914 that there was an exceeding famine in Germany, at what time Otho, surnamed the Great, was emperor, and one Hatto, once Abbot of Fulda, was Archbishop of Mentz, of the bishops after Crescens or Crescentius the two and thirtieth, of the archbishops after St Bonifacius the thirteenth. This Hatto, in the time of this great famine before mentioned, when he saw the poore people of the country exceedingly oppressed with famine, assembled a great company of them together into a barne, and like a most accursed & mercilesse caitiffe burnt up those poore innocent soules, that were so farre from doubting any such matter, that they rather hoped to have received some comfort and relief at his hands. The reason that moved the prelate to commit that execrable impiety was because he thought that the famine would the sooner cease, if those unprofitable beggars that consumed more bread then they were worthy to eate were dispatched out of the world. For he said that these poore folkes were like to mice, that were good for nothing but to devour corne. But Almighty God, the just revenger of the poore folks quarrel, did not long suffer this hainous tyrannny, this most detestable fact unpunished. For he mustered up an army of mice against the archbishop, and sent them to persecute him as his furious Alastors, so that they afflicted him both day and night, and would not suffer him to take his rest in any place. Whereupon the prelate thinking that he should be secure from the injury of mice if he were in a certaine tower that standeth in the Rhene neere to the towne, betooke himself unto the said tower as to a safe refuge and sanctuary from his enemies, and locked himselfe in. But the innumerable troupes of mice continually chaced him very eagerly, and swumme unto him upon the top of the water to execute the just judgement of God, and so at last he was most miserably devoured by those silly creatures; who pursued him with such bitter hostility, that it is recorded they scraped and gnawed off his very name from the walls and tapestry wherein it was written, after they had so cruelly devoured his bodie. Wherefore the tower in which he was eaten up by the mice is shewed to this day for a perpetuall monument to al succeeding ages of the barbarous and inhuman tyrannny of that impious prelate, being situate in a little greene island in the midst of the Rheene, neere to this towne of Bing, and is commonly called in the Germane tongue the Mouse turn [Ger. Mäuse-thurm, 'mouse-tower'; probably a corruption of Mauth-thurm, 'tax-tower'].

Pronunciation of Latin.

I observed another thing also in the Italians pronouncing of the Latin tongue, which though I might have mentioned before in the description of some of the other Italian cities; yet seeing I have hitherto omitted it, I will here make mention thereof rather then not at al, because this is the last city [Bergamo] of Italy that I shall describe in this journey. The Italian when he uttereth any Latin word wherein this letter i is to be pronounced long, doth alwaies pronounce it as a double e, viz. as ee. As for example: he pronounceth feedes for fides: veeta for vita: ameecus for amicus, &c.; but where the i is not to be pronounced long he uttereth it as we doe in England, as in these wordes, impius, aquila, patria, Ecclesia: not aqueela, patreea, Eccleseea. And this pronunciation is so generall in all Italy that every man which speaketh Latin soundeth a double e for an i. Neither is it proper to Italy only, but to all other nations whatsoever in Christendome saving to England. For whereas in my travels I discoursed in Latin with Frenchmen, Germans, Spaniards, Danes, Polonians, Suecians, and divers others, I observed that every one with whom I had any conference, pronounced the i after the same manner that the Italians use. Neither would some of them (amongst whom I was not a little inquisitive for the reason of this their pronunciation) sticke to affirme that Plautus, Terence, Cicero, Hortensius, Cæsar, and those other selected flowers of eloquence amongst the auncient Romans, pronounced the i in that sort as they themselves doe. Whereupon having observed such a generall consent amongst them in the pronunciation of this letter, I have thought good to imitate these nations herein, and to abandon my old English pronunciation of vita, fides, and amicus, as being utterly dissonant from the sound of all other nations; and have determined (God willing) to retayne the same till my dying day.

John Taylor (1580-1653), a London waterman, who styled himself 'The King's Majesty's Water Poet,' was one of the most voluminous of city rhymesters. A native of Gloucester, he became a waterman in London, but was impressed into the navy and served at the siege of Cadiz. He resumed plying on the Thames, then kept a public-house at Oxford, and latterly an inn in London. The most memorable incident in his career was travelling in 1618 on foot from London to Edinburgh, 'not carrying any money to or fro, neither begging, borrowing, or asking meat, drink, or lodging.' He took with him, however, a servant on horseback, and contrived to get an extraordinary amount of hospitality, good-will, and good cheer. From Ben Jonson, whom he met at Leith, he received a present of 'a piece of gold of two and twenty shillings to drink his health in England.' He made also a considerable excursion into the north of Scotland, as the Earl of Mar's guest in Braemar. Of this journey Taylor wrote an account, entitled The Penniless Pilgrimage, or the Moneyless Perambulation of John Taylor, alias the King's Majesty's Water Poet, &c. 1618. This tract is partly in prose and partly in verse. Of the latter, the following is a favourable specimen:

In the Borders.

Eight miles from Carlisle runs a little river,
Which England's bounds from Scotland's grounds doth sever.

Without horse, bridge, or boat I o'er did get;
On foot I went, yet scarce my shoes did wet.

I being come to this long-looked-for land,
 Did mark, re-mark, note, re-note, viewed and scanned ;
 And I saw nothing that could change my will,
 But that I thought myself in England still.
 The kingdoms are so nearly joined and fixed,
 There scarcely went a pair of shears betwixt ;
 There I saw sky above, and earth below,
 And as in England there the sun did shew ;
 The hills with sheep replete, with corn the dale,
 And many a cottage yielded good Scottish ale.
 This county, Annandale, in former times,
 Was the cursed climate of rebellious crimes :
 For Cumberland and it, both kingdoms' borders,
 Were ever ordered by their own disorders,
 Some sharking, shifting, cutting throats, and thieving,
 Each taking pleasure in the other's grieving ;
 And many times he that had wealth to-night,
 Was by the morrow morning beggared quite.
 Too many years this pell-mell fury lasted,
 That all these Borders were quite spoiled and wasted ;
 Confusion, hurly-burly, reigned and revelled ;
 The churches with the lowly ground were levelled ;
 All memorable monuments defaced,
 All places of defence o'erthrown and razed ;
 That whoso then did in the Borders dwell,
 Lived little happier than those in hell.
 But since the all-disposing God of heaven
 Hath these two kingdoms to one monarch given,
 Blest peace and plenty on them both have showered ;
 Exile and hanging hath the thieves devoured,
 That now each subject may securely sleep,
 His sheep and neat, the black, the white, doth keep.
 For now these crowns are both in one combined,
 Those former Borders that each one confined,
 Appears to me, as I do understand,
 To be almost the centre of the land ;
 This was a blessed Heaven-expounded riddle,
 To thrust great kingdoms' skirts into the middle.
 Long may the instrumental cause survive !
 From him and his succession still derive
 True heirs unto his virtues and his throne,
 That these two kingdoms ever may be one !

Of Taylor's prose narrative, perhaps the most interesting portion now is an account of a great deer-hunt which he witnessed at the 'Brae of Mar,' at which were present the Earls of Mar, Moray, Buchan, Enzie, with their countesses ; Lord Erskine, Sir William Murray of Abercairney, 'and hundreds of others, knights, esquires, and their followers' :

A Deer-hunt in Braemar.

Once in the year, which is the whole month of August, and sometimes part of September, many of the nobility and gentry of the kingdom, for their pleasure, do come into these Highland countries to hunt, when they do conform themselves to the habit of the Highlandmen, who for the most part speak nothing but Irish, and in former times were those people which were called the Red-shanks. Their habit is shoes with but one sole apiece, stockings (which they call short hose) made of a warm stuff of divers colours, which they call tartan. As for breeches, many of them, nor their forefathers, never wore any, but a jerkin of the same stuff that their hose is of, their garters being bands or wreaths of hay or straw, with a plaid about their shoulders, which is a mantle of divers colours, of much finer and lighter stuff than their hose, with blue flat caps on their head, a handkerchief knit with two knots about their neck, and thus are they attired. Now, their weapons are long bows and forked arrows, swords and targets, harquebusses, muskets, dirks, and Lochaber axes.

My good lord of Mar having put me into that shape [costume], I rode with him from his house, where I saw the ruins of an old castle, called the castle of Kindroghit [Castleton]. It was built by king Malcolm Canmore for a hunting-house : it was the last house I saw in those parts ; for I was the space of twelve days after before I saw either house, corn-field, or habitation for any creature but deer, wild horses, wolves, and such-like creatures, which made me doubt that I should ever have seen a house again.

Thus the first day we travelled eight miles, where there were small cottages built on purpose to lodge in, which they call louchards. I thank my good Lord Erskine, he commanded that I should always be lodged in his lodging, the kitchen being always on the side of a bank, many kettles and pots boiling, and many spits turning and winding, with a great variety of cheer—as venison ; baked, sodden, roast, and stewed beef ; mutton, goats, kid, hares, fresh salmon, pigeons, hens, capons, chickens, partridge, moor-coots, heath-cocks, capercaillies, and termagants [ptarmigans] ; good ale, sack, white and claret, tent [Alicante], with most potent Aquavite.

All these and more than these we had continually in superfluous abundance, caught by Falconers, Fowlers, Fishers, and brought by my Lord's tenants and purveyors to victual our Camp, which consisted of fourteen or fifteen hundred men and horses. The manner of the hunting is this : five or six hundred men do rise early in the morning, and do disperse themselves divers ways, and seven or eight miles' compass ; they do bring or chase in the deer in many herds (two, three, or four hundred in a herd) to such or such a place as the Nobleman shall appoint them ; then when day is come, the Lords and gentlemen of their companies do ride or go to the said places, sometimes wading up to their middles through bournes and rivers ; and then, they being come to the place, do lie down on the ground, till those fore-said scouts, which are called the Tinchel, do bring down the deer. . . . Then, after we had stayed three hours or thereabouts, we might perceive the deer appear on the hills round about us (their heads making a show like a wood), which, being followed close by the Tinchel, are chased down into the valley where we lay. Then all the valley on each side being waylaid with a hundred couple of strong Irish greyhounds, they are let loose as the occasion serves upon the herd of deer, so that, with dogs, guns, arrows, dirks, and daggers, in the space of two hours, fourscore fat deer were slain, which after are disposed of some one way and some another, twenty and thirty miles, and more than enough left for us to make merry withal at our rendezvous.

Various journeys and voyages were made by Taylor, and duly described by him in short occasional tracts such as Travell in Germanie (1617), Travels to Prague in Bohemia (1620), and The Praise of Hempseed (1620), the story of a ridiculous voyage from London to Queenborough, in Kent, by a Mr Roger Bird and himself in a preposterous boat made of brown paper. In 1630 he made a collection of these pieces: All the Workes of John Taylor, the Water Poet; being Sixty and Three in Number. He continued, however, to write during more than twenty years after this period, and ultimately his works consisted of not less than one hundred and thirty-eight separate publications. Taylor was a staunch royalist and orthodox Churchman, abjuring all sectaries and schismatics. There is nothing in his works, as Southey remarks, which deserves preservation for its intrinsic merit alone, but there is some natural humour, much small jingling wit, and a great deal to illustrate the manners of his age. A complete reprint of his works was issued by the Spenser Society in 1868-78.

Richard Corbet (1582-1635) was the son of a Ewell gardener who is commended in Ben Jonson's Underwoods. Educated at Westminster School and Broadgates Hall (Pembroke College), Oxford, he took orders, and became Dean of Christ Church (1620), Bishop of Oxford (1624), and Bishop of Norwich (1632). The social qualities of witty Bishop Corbet and his never-failing vivacity, joined to a moderate share of dislike to the Puritans, recommended him to the patronage of King James, to whom he owed his mitre. Ben Jonson loved him well, as also his father, 'my dear Vincent Corbet,' whom he commemorated. The Bishop's habits were rather too convivial for the dignity of his office, if we may credit some of the anecdotes which have been told of him. One market-day at Abingdon, meeting a ballad-singer who complained he could get no custom, the jolly Doctor put off his gown and arrayed himself in the leathern jacket of the itinerant vocalist, and being a handsome man, with a clear, full voice, he presently vended the whole stock of ballads. Once at a confirmation, the country people pressing in to see the ceremony, Corbet exclaimed, 'Bear off there, or I'll confirm ye with my staff.' And sometimes, by Aubrey's telling, he 'would take the key of the wine-cellar, and he and his chaplain, Dr Lushington, would go and lock themselves in and be merry. Then first he layes down his episcopal hat—"There lyes the Dr." Then he putts off his gowne—"There lyes the bishop." Then 'twas "Here's to thee, Corbet," and "Here's to thee, Lushington." Jivialities such as these seem more like the feats of the jolly Friar of Copmanhurst than the acts of a Protestant bishop; but Corbet had higher qualities; his toleration, solid sense, and lively talents procured him esteem. His poems, many of which are little better than rollicking doggerel, were first collected and published in 1647 (4th ed. by Octavius Gilchrist, 1807). They are of a miscellaneous character, the best known being a Journey to France, the Iter Boreale (the tour of four students in the Midlands to the north of Oxford), and the Farewell to the Fairies.

To Vincent Corbet, his Son.

What I shall leave thee, none can tell,
But all shall say I wish thee well:
I wish thee, Vin, before all wealth,
Both bodily and ghostly health;
Nor too much wealth nor wit come to thee,
So much of either may undo thee.
I wish thee learning, not for show,
Enough for to instruct and know;
Not such as gentlemen require
To prate at table or at fire.
I wish thee all thy mother's graces,
Thy father's fortunes and his places.
I wish thee friends, and one at court,
Not to build on, but support;
To keep thee not in doing many Oppressions, but from suffering any.
I wish thee peace in all thy ways,
Nor lazy nor contentious days;
And, when thy soul and body part,
As innocent as now thou art.

From the 'Journey to France.'

I went from England into France,
Nor yet to learn to cringe nor dance,
Nor yet to ride or fence:
Nor did I go like one of those
That do return with half a nose
They carried from hence.

But I to Paris rode along,
Much like John Dory in the song,
Upon a holy tide.
I on an ambling nag did get—
I trust he is not paid for yet—
And spurred him on each side.

And to Saint Dennis fast we came,
To see the sights of Nostre Dame—
The man that shews them snuffles—
Where who is apt for to beleave,
May see our Lady's right-arm sleeve,
And eke her old pantofles;

Her breast, her milk, her very gown
That she did wear in Bethlehem town,
When in the inn she lay:
Yet all the world knows that 's a fable,
For so good clothes ne'er lay in stable,
Upon a lock of hay. . . .

There is one of the cross's nails,
Which whoso sees his bonnet vails,
And, if he will, may kneel.
Some say 'twas false, 'twas never so;
Yet, feeling it, thus much I know,
It is as true as steel.

There is a lanthorn which the Jews,
When Judas led them forth, did use;
It weighs my weight downright:
But, to believe it, you must think
The Jews did put a candle in 't,
And then 'twas very light.

There 's one saint there hath lost his nose:
Another 's head, but not his toes,
His elbow and his thumb.

But when that we had seen the rags,
We went to th' inn and took our nags,
And so away did come.

We came to Paris on the Seine ;
'Tis wondrous fair, 'tis nothing clean,
'Tis Europe's greatest town.

How strong it is, I need not tell it,
For all the world may easily smell it,
That walk it up and down.

There many strange things are to see,
The Palace and great Gallery,
The Place Royal doth excel :
The New Bridge, and the statues there,
At Nostre Dame, Saint Q. Pater,
The steeple bears the bell.

For learning, th' Universitie ;
And, for old clothes, the Frippery,
The House the Queen did build.
Saint Innocents, whose earth devours
Dead corpse in four-and-twenty hours,
And there the King was killed. . . .

'John Dory' was the hero of a rather pointless ballad, still popular in Dryden's days, beginning :

'As it fell upon a holy-day,
And upon a holy-tide-a,
John Dory bought him an ambling nag,
To Paris for to ride-a.'

Corbet's visit to Paris was in 1618: the curiosities he describes, including, for example, the milk and the lanthorn at St Denis, the unfinished palace of the queen-dowager, and the sights of Paris generally, are described at more length by Peter Heylin in France painted to the Life, the outcome of a visit to France in 1625. The king slain (in 1610) at the Church of the Holy Innocents was Henry IV.; the extraordinarily absorptive virtue of the earth in that churchyard was an article of faith, and is referred to by Sir Thomas Browne in Urn-burial (see below). The mysterious 'Saint Q. Pater' of Notre Dame, unexplained in the editions, must be a misreading of the contracted MS. 'St Xtofer' for 'St Christopher,' the colossal figure which for hundreds of years was a chief curiosity of Notre Dame, and as such was duly described by Heylin, Coryate, and other English travellers. The bell, the 'great bourdon of Notre Dame,' was, and still is, another.

Farewell to the Fairies.

Farewell rewards and fairies,
Good housewives now may say,
For now foul sluts in dairies
Do fare as well as they.
And though they sweep their hearths no less
Than maids were wont to do,
Yet who of late for cleanliness
Finds sixpence in her shoe?

Lament, lament, old abbeys,
The fairies lost command ;
They did but change priests' babies,
But some have changed your land ;
And all your children sprung from thence
Are now grown Puritans ;
Who live as changelings ever since,
For love of your domains.

At morning and at evening both,
You merry were and glad,
So little care of sleep or sloth
These pretty ladies had ;
When Tom came home from labour,
Or Cis to milking rose,
Then merrily went their tabour,
And nimbly went their toes.

Witness those rings and roundelays
Of theirs, which yet remain,
Were footed in Queen Mary's days
On many a grassy plain ;
But since of late Elizabeth,
And later, James came in,
They never danced on any heath
As when the time hath been.

By which we note the fairies
Were of the old profession,
Their songs were Ave-Maries,
Their dances were procession :
But now, alas ! they all are dead,
Or gone beyond the seas ;
Or farther for religion fled,
Or else they take their ease.

A tell-tale in their company
They never could endure,
And whoso kept not secretly
Their mirth was punished sure ;
It was a just and Christian deed,
To pinch such black and blue :
Oh, how the commonwealth doth need
Such justices as you ! . . .

Sir Robert Naunton (1563-1635), born at Alderton, Woodbridge, became public orator at Cambridge in 1594, travelled four or more years on the Continent, went with an embassy to Denmark in 1603, entered Parliament in 1606, and was Secretary of State 1618-23. He died at his Suffolk seat, Letheringham Priory. His Fragmenta Regalia (1641) is sketches of Elizabeth's courtiers. See his Memoirs (1814).

Queen Elizabeth.

Under Edward [VI.] she was his, and one of the darlings of fortune: for besides the consideration of blood, there was between these two princes a concurrency and sympathy in their natures and affections, together with the celestiall (conformity in religion) which made them one, and friends; for the king ever called her his sweetest and dearest sister, and was scarce his own man, she being absent, which was not so between him and the Lady Mary. Under his sister she found her condition much altered: for it was resolved, and her destiny had decreed to set her an apprentice in the school of affliction, and to draw her through the ordeall fire of tryall, the better to mould and fashion her to rule and sovereignty; which finished, and fortune calling to mind that the time of her servitude was expired, gave up her indentures, and therewith delivered up into her custody a scepter as a reward for her patience, which was about the twenty sixth year of her age; a time in which (as for externals) she was full blown, so was she for her internals grown ripe, and seasoned with adversity, and in the exercise of her virtue; for it seems fortune meant no more than to shew her a piece of her variety and changeableness of her nature, and so to conduct her to her destined felicity. She was of personage tall, of hair and complexion fair, and therewith well favoured, but high nosed, of limbs and feature neat, and which added to the lustre of those exteriour graces, of stately and majestick comportment; participating in this more of her father than mother, who was of inferiour allay, plausible, or as the French hath it, more debonaire and affable, vertues which might well suit with majesty; and which descending as hereditary to the daughter, did render of a more sweeter temper, and endeared her more to the love and liking of the people; who gave her the name and fame of a most gracious and popular prince; the atrocity of her fathers nature being rebated in hers by the mothers sweeter inclinations. For to take, and that no more than, the character out of his own mouth; he never spared man in his anger, nor woman in his lust.

Sir Walter Raleigh.

He had in the outward man a good presence, in a handsome and well compacted person, a strong naturall wit, and a better judgement, with a bold and plausible tongue, whereby he could set out his parts to the best advantage; and to these he had the adjuncts of some generall learning, which by diligence he enforced to a great augmentation and perfection; for he was an indefatigable reader, whether by sea or land, and none of the least observers both of men and the times; and I am confident, that among the second causes of his growth, that variance between him and my Lord Grey in his descent into Ireland was a principall; for it drew them both over the councill table, there to plead their cause, where (what advantage he had in the cause, I know not) but he had much better in the telling of his tale; and so much, that the Queen and the lords took no slight mark of the man, and his parts; for from thence he came to be known, and to have accesse to the Queen and the lords; and then we are not to doubt how such a man would comply and learn the way of progression. And whether Leicester had then cast in a good word for him to the Queen, which would have done no harm, I doe not determine: but true it is, he had gotten the Queens eare at a trice, and she began to be taken with his elocution, and loved to hear his reasons to her demands: and the truth is, she took him for a kind of oracle, which nettled them all; yea, those that he relyed on began to take his suddain favour as an allarum, and to be sensible of their own supplantation, and to project his, which made him shortly after sing, Fortune my foe, &c. So that finding his favour declining, and falling into a recess, he undertook a new peregrination, to leave that terra infirma of the court for that of the warres, and by declining himself and by absence to expell his and the passion of his enemies, which in court was a strange device of recovery, but that he knew there was some ill office done him, that he durst not attempt to mind any other wayes than by going aside; thereby to teach envy a new way of forgetfulness, and not so much as to think of him; howsoever, he had it alwayes in mind never to forget himself; and his device took so well that at his return he came in (as rammes doe, by going backward) with the greater strength, and so continued to her last, great in her grace, and Captain of the Guard, where I must leave him; but with this observation, that though he gained much at the court, yet he took it not out of the Exchequer or meerly out of the Queens purse, but by his wit and the help of the prerogative; for the Queen was never profuse in the delivering out of her treasure, but payed many, and most of her servants, part in money and the rest with grace, which as the case stood was taken for good payment, leaving the arrear of recompence due to their merit to her great successor, who payed them all with advantage.

Thomas Middleton (1580?–1627), a prolific but extraordinarily unequal dramatist, was a Londoner; as city chronologer (from 1620) wrote a chronicle of the city, now lost, and some civic pageants; and left over twenty plays, a score of pageants and masques, a paraphrase of the Wisdom of Solomon, six satires, and a number of prose pieces. Blurt, Master Constable (1602), a comedy, may not be his. Father Hubbard's Tales and The Black Book are tracts exposing London rogues. The Honest Whore was mainly written by Dekker. The Phoenix and Michaelmas Term (1607) are lively comedies; A Trick to catch the Old One (1608) and A Mad World, my Masters (from which Aphra Behn pilfered), are perhaps more amusing. The Roaring Girl (1611; with Dekker) describes the exploits of a noted cut-purse and virago. A Chaste Maid in Cheapside was probably produced in 1613, as was No Wit, No Help like a Woman's. A Fair Quarrel (1617) and The World Tost at Tennis (1620) were written in conjunction with Rowley, as were perhaps More Dissemblers besides Women (1622?) and The Mayor of Quinborough. The Old Law is mainly the work of Rowley, supplemented by Middleton, and revised by Massinger. The fact that The Witch (published by Reed in 1778 from the author's MS.) contains in full two songs of which only the first lines are given in Macbeth (see below at page 461) has been explained by the theory that they were originally by Middleton and were introduced into later acting editions of Macbeth. (They are given in full in D'Avenant's altered version of Macbeth.) Mr Bullen and Professor Herford hold it almost certain that Middleton here imitated and expanded Shakespeare, or the song Shakespeare referred to in his stage directions. The date of the Witch is unknown, and it may have preceded Macbeth; but it is vastly more probable that the lesser author was the imitator. In The Changeling, The Spanish Gipsy, and Women beware Women (in the first two of which at least Rowley had a share) Middleton's genius is seen at its best. The Widow was mainly by Middleton. Anything for a Quiet Life (c. 1619) may have been revised by Shirley. Middleton contributed to some of the plays included in the works of Beaumont and Fletcher.

The Game at Chess (1624) provoked enormous interest, but gave great offence at court by bringing on the stage the king of Spain and his ambassador, Gondomar, as well as James himself and English politicians. Gondomar's successor complained to King James of the insult, and Middleton—who at first 'shifted out of the way'—and the players were brought before the Privy Council and sharply reprimanded for their audacity in 'bringing modern Christian kings upon the stage.' The Induction was spoken by Loyola and his intimate acquaintance Error. James was the White King, the Black King was Philip IV., Gondomar the Black Knight, the White Queen's Pawn is the Church of England, and so forth.

The Black Knight uses great freedom of speech, and not obscurely indicates that he has wheedled and duped the White King for his own ends.

Middleton is great in single scenes, and is a versatile and ingenious writer, a keen observer and satirist of London life and London types. But he repeats the same character under different names, interests rather than charms or fascinates, and is sometimes distinctly tedious. Women beware Women is a tale of love and jealousy from the Italian. The 'rage and madness of women crossed,' 'hell-bred malice and strife,' constitute the principal material of a somewhat cynical representation; but the following sketch of married happiness is admirably realised:

How near am I now to a happiness
That earth exceeds not! not another like it:
The treasures of the deep are not so precious
As are the conceal'd comforts of a man
Lock'd up in woman's love. I scent the air
Of blessings when I come but near the house:
What a delicious breath marriage sends forth!
The violet-bed's not sweeter. Honest wedlock
Is like a banqueting-house built in a garden,
On which the spring's chaste flowers take delight
To cast their modest odours; when base lust,
With all her powders, paintings, and best pride,
Is but a fair house built by a ditch-side. . . .

Now for a welcome

Able to draw men's envies upon man;
A kiss now, that will hang upon my lip
As sweet as morning-dew upon a rose,
And full as long.

The blank verse is some of it very unrhythmical and irregular; it is difficult sometimes to know whether the lines are meant for verse or prose.

Yet Mr Bullen agrees with an anonymous critic that, 'in daring and happy concentration of imagery and a certain imperial confidence in the use of words, he of all the dramatists of that time is the disciple that comes nearest the master.' And he holds that the colloquy between Beatrice and De Flores in the Changeling 'testifies beyond dispute that in dealing with a situation of sheer passion none of Shakespeare's followers trod so closely in the master's steps.' 'Neither Webster nor Cyril Tourneur nor Ford has given us any scene so profoundly impressive, so absolutely ineffaceable, so Shakespearean,' though 'as an artistic whole the Changeling cannot challenge comparison with The Maid's Tragedy, The Broken Heart, or The Duchess of Malfi.' But 'if the Changeling, Women beware Women, the Spanish Gipsy, and A Fair Quarrel do not justify Middleton's claims to be considered a great artist,' Mr Bullen 'knows not which of Shakespeare's followers is worthy of the title.' In the Changeling, Beatrice, daughter of Vermadero, is betrothed to Alonzo de Piracquo ere she sees and loves Alsemero, a new-comer to her father's castle. She regards Alonzo with loathing, and reveals her hatred to De Flores, a poor gentleman in her father's service, who passionately loves her. Zealous to do her a service, De Flores assassinates Alonzo, and hopes not for gold or jewels, but for Beatrice's love.

From 'The Changeling.'

De Flores. My thoughts are at a banquet; for the deed, I feel no weight in 't; 'tis but light and cheap

For the sweet recompense that I set down for 't. [Aside.

Beatrice. De Flores!

De F. Lady?

Beat. Thy looks promise cheerfully.

De F. All things are answerable, time, circumstance, Your wishes, and my service.

Beat. Is it done, then?

De F. Piracquo is no more.

Beat. My joys start at mine eyes; our sweet'st delights Are evermore born weeping.

De F. I've a token for you.

Beat. For me?

De F. But it was sent somewhat unwillingly; I could not get the ring without the finger.

[Holding out Alonzo's finger with the ring on it.

Beat. Bless me, what hast thou done?

De F. Why, is that more

Than killing the whole man? I cut his heart-strings:

A greedy hand thrust in a dish at court,

In a mistake hath had as much as this.

Beat. 'Tis the first token my father made me send him.

De F. And I have made him send it back again

For his last token; I was loath to leave it,

And I'm sure dead men have no use of jewels;

He was as loath to part with 't, for it stuck

As if the flesh and it were both one substance.

Beat. At the stag's fall, the keeper has his fees; 'Tis soon applied, all dead men's fees are yours, sir:

I pray, bury the finger, but the stone

You may make use on shortly; the true value,

Take 't of my truth, is near three hundred ducats.

De F. 'Twill hardly buy a capcase for one's conscience

To keep it from the worm, as fine as 'tis: [though,

Well, being my fees, I'll take it;

Great men have taught me that, or else my merit

Would scorn the way on 't.

Beat. It might justly, sir;

Why, thou mistak'st, De Flores, 'tis not given

In state of recompense.

De F. No, I hope so, lady;

You should soon witness my contempt to 't then.

Beat. Prithee—thou look'st as if thou wert offended.

De F. That were strange, lady; 'tis not possible

My service should draw such a cause from you:

Offended! could you think so? that were much

For one of my performance, and so warm

Yet in my service.

Beat. 'Twere misery in me to give you cause, sir.

De F. I know so much, it were so; misery

In her most sharp condition.

Beat. 'Tis resolv'd then;

Look you, sir, here's three thousand golden florens;

I have not meanly thought upon thy merit.

De F. What! salary? now you move me.

Beat.

How, De Flores?

De F. Do you place me in the rank of verminous fellows,

To destroy things for wages? offer gold

For the life-blood of man? is any thing

Valued too precious for my recompense?

Beat. I understand thee not.

De F. I could ha' hir'd
A journeyman in murder at this rate,
And mine own conscience might have slept at ease,
And have had the work brought home.

Beat. I'm in a labyrinth;
What will content him? I'd fain be rid of him. [Aside.
I'll double the sum, sir.

De F. You take a course
To double my vexation, that's the good you do.

Beat. Bless me, I'm now in worse plight than I was;
I know not what will please him. [Aside.—For my fear's sake,

I prithee, make away with all speed possible;
And if thou be'st so modest not to name
The sum that will content thee, paper blushes not,
Send thy demand in writing, it shall follow thee;
But, prithee, take thy flight.

De F. You must fly too then.

Beat. I?

De F. I'll not stir a foot else.

Beat. What's your meaning?

De F. Why, are not you as guilty? in, I'm sure,
As deep as I; and we should stick together:
Come, your fears counsel you but ill; my absence
Would draw suspect upon you instantly,
There were no rescue for you.

Beat. He speaks home! [Aside.

De F. Nor is it fit we two, engag'd so jointly,
Should part and live asunder.

Beat. How now, sir?

This shews not well.

De F. What makes your lip so strange?
This must not be betwixt us.

Beat. The man talks wildly!

De F. Come, kiss me with a zeal now.

Beat. Heaven, I doubt him! [Aside.

De F. I will not stand so long to beg 'em shortly.

Beat. Take heed, De Flores, of forgetfulness,
'Twill soon betray us.

De F. Take you heed first;
Faith, you're grown much forgetful, you're to blame in't.

Beat. He's bold, and I am blam'd for't. [Aside.

De F. I have eas'd you
Of your trouble, think on it; I am in pain,
And must be eas'd of you; 'tis a charity,
Justice invites your blood to understand me.

Beat. I dare not.

De F. Quickly!

Beat. O, I never shall!
Speak it yet further off, that I may lose
What has been spoken, and no sound remain on't;
I would not hear so much offence again
For such another deed.

De F. Soft, lady, soft!
The last is not yet paid for: O, this act
Has put me into spirit; I was as greedy on't
As the parch'd earth of moisture, when the clouds weep:
Did you not mark, I wrought myself into't,
Nay, sued and kneel'd for't? why was all that pains took?
You see I've thrown contempt upon your gold;
Not that I want it not, for I do piteously,
In order I'll come unto't, and make use on't,
But 'twas not held so precious to begin with,
For I place wealth after the heels of pleasure;

And were I not resolv'd in my belief
That thy virginity were perfect in thee,
I should but take my recompense with grudging,
As if I had but half my hopes I agreed for.

Beat. Why, 'tis impossible thou canst be so wicked,
Or shelter such a cunning cruelty,
To make his death the murderer of my honour!
Thy language is so bold and vicious,
I cannot see which way I can forgive it
With any modesty.

De F. Push! you forget yourself;
A woman dipp'd in blood, and talk of modesty!

Beat. O misery of sin! would I'd been bound
Perpetually unto my living hate
In that Piracquo, than to hear these words!
Think but upon the distance that creation
Set 'twixt thy blood and mine, and keep thee there.

De F. Look but into your conscience, read me there;
'Tis a true book, you'll find me there your equal:
Push! fly not to your birth, but settle you
In what the act has made you, you're no more now;
You must forget your parentage to me;
You are the deed's creature; by that name
You lost your first condition, and I challenge you,
As peace and innocency have turn'd you out,
And made you one with me.

Beat. With thee, foul villain!

De F. Yes, my fair murderess; do you urge me?
Though thou writ'st maid, thou whore in thy affection!
'Twas chang'd from thy first love, and that's a kind
Of whoredom in the heart; and he's chang'd now
To bring thy second on, thy Alsemero,
Whom, by all sweets that ever darkness tasted,
If I enjoy thee not, thou ne'er enjoyest!
I'll blast the hopes and joys of marriage,
I'll confess all; my life I rate at nothing.

Beat. De Flores!

De F. I shall rest from all love's plagues then;
I live in pain now; that shooting eye
Will burn my heart to cinders.

Beat. O sir, hear me!

De F. She that in life and love refuses me,
In death and shame my partner she shall be. [master

Beat. [kneeling] Stay, hear me once for all; I make thee
Of all the wealth I have in gold and jewels;
Let me go poor unto my bed with honour,
And I am rich in all things!

De F. Let this silence thee;
The wealth of all Valencia shall not buy
My pleasure from me;
Can you weep Fate from its determin'd purpose?
So soon may you weep me.

Beat. Vengeance begins;
Murder, I see, is follow'd by more sins:
Was my creation in the womb so curst,
It must engender with a viper first?

De F. [raising her] Come, rise and shroud your blushes in my bosom;
Silence is one of pleasure's best receipts:
Thy peace is wrought for ever in this yielding.
'Las, how the turtle pants! thou'lt love anon
What thou so fear'st and faint'st to venture on.

Captcase, hand-box; push, push! Your parentage to me, your [high] birth as compared with mine. For 'that shooting eye,' Dyce, followed by Bullen, thinks the author must have written
'that love-shooting eye.'

The Witch, an ill-constructed play which raises the problems above referred to, has also an Italian plot, apparently from Machiavelli's 'Florentine Histories' through the French. Middleton is more at home in describing criminals and ruffians than supernatural beings; and his witches are rather the vulgar hags of popular superstition than the unearthly beings that accost Macbeth on the blasted heath, as Lamb pointed out in an admirable paragraph. Shakespeare in Macbeth gives the stage direction, 'Music and a song': "Black spirits," &c.' The 'Charm-song' of the witches going about the cauldron is thus given by Middleton:

Hecate. Black spirits and white, red spirits and gray,
Mingle, mingle, mingle, you that mingle may!
Titty, Tiffin,
Keep it stiff in;
Firedrake, Puckey,
Make it lucky;
Liard Robin,
You must bob in;

Round, around, around, about, about!
All ill come running in, all good keep out!

First Witch. Here's the blood of a bat.

Hec. Put in that, O, put in that!

Second Witch. Here's libbard's-bane.

Hec. Put in again!

First Witch. The juice of toad, the oil of adder.

Sec. Witch. Those will make the younker madder.

Hec. Put in—there's all—and rid the stench.

Firestone. Nay, here's three ounces of the red-hair'd wench.

All the Witches. Round, around, around, &c.

The flight of the witches by moonlight is described with vigour and gusto; if the scene was written before Macbeth, Middleton deserves the credit of true poetical imagination:

Hecate. The moon's a gallant; see how brisk she rides!

Stadlin. Here's a rich evening, Hecate.

Hec. Ay, is't not, wenches,

To take a journey of five thousand mile?

Hoppo. Ours will be more to-night.

Hec. O 'twill be precious!

Heard you the owl yet?

Stad. Briefly in the copse,

As we came through now.

Hec. 'Tis high time for us then.

Stad. There was a bat hung at my lips three times

As we came through the woods, and drank her fill:

Old Puckle saw her.

Hec. You are fortunate still;

The very screech-owl lights upon your shoulder

And woos you, like a pigeon. Are you furnish'd?

Have you your ointments?

Stad. All.

Hec. Prepare to flight then;

I'll overtake you swiftly.

Stad. Hie thee, Hecate;

We shall be up betimes.

Hec. I'll reach you quickly.

[Exeunt all the Witches except HECATE.]

Firestone. They are all going a-birding to-night: they talk of fowls i' th' air that fly by day; I am sure they'll be a company of foul sluts there to-night: if we have not mortality after't, I'll be hanged, for they are able to putrefy it, to infect a whole region. She spies me now.

Hec. What, Firestone, our sweet son?

Fire. A little sweeter than some of you, or a dung-hill were too good for me. [Aside.]

Hec. How much hast there?

Fire. Nineteen, and all brave plump ones,
Besides six lizards and three serpentine eggs.

Hec. Dear and sweet boy! what herbs hast thou?

Fire. I have some marmartin and mandragon.

Hec. Marmartin and mandragora, thou wouldst say.

Fire. Here's panax too—I thank thee—my pan aches, I'm sure,
With kneeling down to cut 'em.

Hec. And selago,

Hedge-hyssop too: how near he goes my cuttings!
Were they all cropt by moonlight?

Fire. Every blade of 'em,
Or I'm a moon-calf, mother.

Hec. Hie thee home with 'em:

Look well to the house to-night; I'm for aloft.

Fire. Aloft, quoth you? I would you would break your neck once, that I might have all quickly! [Aside.]
—Hark, hark, mother! they are above the steeple already, flying over your head with a noise of musicians.

Hec. They're they indeed. Help, help me; I'm too late else.

Song above.

Come away, come away,
Hecate, Hecate, come away!

Hec. I come, I come, I come, I come,
With all the speed I may,
With all the speed I may.

Where's Stadlin?

[Voice above.] Here.

Hec. Where's Puckle?

[Voice above.] Here;

And Hoppo too, and Hellwain too;
We lack but you, we lack but you;
Come away, make up the count.

Hec. I will but 'noint, and then I mount.

[A Spirit like a cat descends.]

[Voice above.] There's one comes down to fetch his dues,

A kiss, a coll, a sip of blood; hug

And why thou stay'st so long,

I muse, I muse,

Since the air's so sweet and good.

Hec. O, art thou come?

What news, what news?

Spirit. All goes still to our delight:

Either come or else

Refuse, refuse.

Hec. Now, I'm furnish'd for the flight.

Fire. Hark, hark, the cat sings a brave treble in her own language!

Hec. [going up.] Now I go, now I fly,

Malkin my sweet spirit and I.

O what dainty pleasure 'tis

To ride in the air

When the moon shines fair,

And sing and dance, and toy and kiss!

Over woods, high rocks, and mountains,

Over seas, our mistress' fountains,

Over steep towers and turrets,

We fly by night, 'mongst troops of spirits :
No ring of bells to our ears sounds,
No howls of wolves, no yelps of hounds ;
No, not the noise of water's breach,
Or cannon's throat our height can reach.

[Voices above.] No ring of bells, &c.

Leopard's-bane, mandragora or mandrake, panax (ginseng), selago (lycopodium), and other herbs named have magical or medicinal properties; and serpents' eggs or snake-stones (often ammonites, supposed to be petrified snakes or in some mysterious way derived from serpents) were sovereign charms from the days of the Druids on.

Shakespeare in Macbeth gives merely the direction, 'Song within': "Come away, come away," &c.'

Middleton was edited by Dyce (5 vols. 1840), Bullen (8 vols. 1885-86), Ellis ('Mermaid,' 1890, 1925; with intro. by Swinburne).

John Marston (1575?-1634), a rough and vigorous satirist and dramatic writer, seems to have been born at Coventry, and studied at Brasenose College, Oxford. He must have written all his plays between 1599 and 1607, when he gave up play-writing. Taking orders, in 1616 he accepted the living at Christchurch in Hampshire. The Metamorphosis of Pygmalion's Image (1598), a somewhat licentious poem, was condemned to the flames by Whitgift. The Scourge of Villany (repr. 1925) is mainly uncouth, obscure satire. The gloomy, ill-constructed tragedies, Antonio and Mellida and Antonio's Revenge (pub. 1602; repr. 1921), contain passages of striking power with much fustian. The Malcontent (1604), more skilfully constructed, was dedicated to Ben Jonson, with whom Marston had many quarrels and reconciliations. The Dutch Courtesan (1605) is full of life; Eastward Hoe (1605; written with Chapman and Jonson) is far more genial than any of Marston's own comedies. For uncomplimentary allusions to the Scots the authors were imprisoned (see page 402). Parasitaster, or the Fawn (1606), spite of occasional tediousness, is an attractive comedy; Sophonisba (1606) appals with its horrors. What You Will (1607) has many flings at Ben Jonson. The rich and graceful poetry scattered through The Insatiate Countesse (1613) is unlike anything in Marston's undoubted works, and was probably added by another hand.

Even in the least admirable passages one stumbles on pregnant thoughts pithily worded; thus in the Dutch Courtesan, on the difference between the lovely courtesan and a wife, an old knight says:

Hell and the prodigies of angrie Jove
Are not so fearefull to a thinking minde
As a man without affection. Why, frend,
Philosophie and nature are all one;
Love is the center in which all lines close
The common bonde of being.

Some of the phrasing is wonderfully modern, in spite of antique environment: thus 'the fatt's in the fire' alongside of pre-Elizabethan archaism; 'Mr Mulligrub' does not sound Elizabethan; and the courtesan's broken English is not unlike Pennsylv-vania Dutch. In the Insatiate Countesse, a good wish at a wedding is thus worded:

O may this knot you knit,
This individual Gordian grasp of hands,
In sight of God soe fairly intermixt,
Never be severed, as Heaven smiles at it,
By all the darts shot by infernall Jove!

Coarseness was rather characteristic of Marston: his comedies contain strong, biting satire; Hazlitt thought his forte was impatient scorn and bitter indignation against the vices and follies of men, vented either in comic irony or in lofty invective. In What You Will Quadratus introduces a lyrical exposition of his hyper-epicurean philosophy of life:

My fashions knowne: out rime: take't as you list:

A fico for the sower brow'd Zoilist:

Musicke, tobacco, sack, and sleepe
The tide of sorrow backward keepe.

If thou art sad at others fate,
Rivo, drinke deepe, give care the mate. checkmate
On us the end of time is come,
Fond feare of that we cannot shun;
While quickest sence doth freshly last
Clip time aboute, hug pleasure fast.
The sisters revell out our twine,
He that knows little's most devine.

Rivo, a drinking challenge of doubtful origin, is also used by Shakespeare's Prince Hal.

The following humorous autobiographical sketch of a scholar and his dog, also from What You Will, in points suggests Goethe's Faust and Browning as well as Shakespeare:

I was a scholler: seaven usefull springs
Did I defloure in quotations
Of cross'd oppinions bout the soule of man;
The more I learnt, the more I learnt to doubt.
Knowledge and wit, faithes foes, turne fayth about. . . .
Delight, my spaniell, slept whilst I bausd leaves, 1
Tossed ore the dunces, por'd on the old print
Of titled wordes: and stil my spaniell slept.
Whilst I wasted lamp-oile, bated my flesh,
Shrunk up my veins: and still my spaniel slept.
And still I held converse with Zabarell, 2
Aquinas, Scotus, and the musty sawe
Of antick Donate: still my spaniell slept.
Still on went I; first, an sit anima; 3
Then, an it were mortall. O hold, hold!
At that they're at brain buffets, fell by the eares
A maine pell-mell together—still my spaniell slept.
Then, whether twere corporeal, local, fixt,
Ex traduce, but whether 't had free-will 4
Or no, hot philosophers
Stood banding factions, all so strongly propt;
I staggerd, knew not which was firmer part,
But thought, quoted, reade, observ'd, and pried,
Stufft noting-books: and still my spaniell slept.
At length he wakt, and yawned; and, by yon sky,
For aught I know, he knew as much as I.

1 Bause is a rare and doubtful word, probably meaning to kiss (from Low Latin basiare). 2 Zabarella was a (now forgotten) sixteenth-century Italian philosopher; Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus were the heads of the two great schools of Catholic theology; Donatus was a fourth-century grammarian. 3 Whether there is a soul. 4 'Creationism' taught that the soul was created for each human body, 'Traducianism' that it was derived ex traduce from the parents.

From 'Antonio and Mellida.'

[Of the prologue to Antonio's Revenge, the second of the two plays forming The Historie of Antonio and Mellida, Charles Lamb says: 'This prologue, for its passionate earnestness, and for the tragic note of preparation which it sounds, might have preceded one of those old tales of Thebes or Pelops' line which Milton has so highly commended, as free from the common error of the poets in his days, "of intermixing comic stuff with tragic sadness and gravity, brought in without discretion corruptly to gratify the people"—it is as solemn a preparative as the "warning voice which he who saw th' Apocalypse heard cry."']

The rawish danke of clumzie winter ramps
The fluent summers vaine; and drizzling sleete
Chilleth the wan bleak cheek of the numd earth,
Whilst snarling gusts nibble the juyceles leaves,
From the nak't shuddring branch; and pils the skinne
From off the soft and delicate aspectes.
O now, me thinks, a sullen tragick sceane
Would suite the time, with pleasing congruence.
May we be happie in our weake devoyer,
And all parte pleased in most wisht content;
But sweate of Hercules can nere beget
So blest an issue. Therefore, we proclaime,
If any spirit breathes within this round,
Uncapable of waightie passion
(As from his birth, being hugged in the armes,
And nuzzled twixt the breastes of happinesse),
Who winkes, and shuts his apprehension up
From common sense of what men were, and are,
Who would not knowe what men must be—let such
Hurrie amaine from our black visag'd shoves:
We shall affright their eyes. But if a breast
Nail'd to the earth with griefe, if any heart
Pierc't through with anguish pant within this ring,
If there be any blood whose heate is choakt
And stifled with true sense of misery,
If ought of these straines fill this consort up—
Th' arrive most welcome. O that our power
Could lackie or keepe wing with our desires,
That with unused paize of stile and sense,
We might waigh massy in judicious scale.
Yet heere's the prop that doth support our hopes,
When our sceanes falter, or invention halts,
Your favour will give crutches to our faults.

[Antonio, son to Andrugio, Duke of Genoa, whom Piero, Venetian prince and father-in-law of Antonio, has murdered, slays Piero's little son, Julio, as a sacrifice to the spirit of Andrugio.—The scene is in a Churchyard and the time is Midnight.]

Julio. Brother Antonio, are you here, i' faith?
Why doe you frowne? Indeed my sister said
That I should call you brother; that she did,
When you were married to her. Busse me: good truth,
I love you better then my father, 'deede.

Antonio. Thy father? Gracious, O bounteous Heaven!
I doe adore thy justice: *Venit in nostras manus
Tandem vindicta, venit et tota quidem.*

Jul. Truth, since my mother dyed, I lov'd you best.
Something hath angered you; pray you, look merily.

Ant. I will laugh, and dimple my thinnie cheek
With cap'ring joy; chuck, my heart doth leape
To graspe thy bosome. Time, place, and blood,
How fit you close together! Heavens tones
Strike not such musick to immortall soules
As your accordance sweetes my breast withall.
Methinks I pace upon the front of Jove,
And kick corruption with a scornfull heele;
Gripping this flesh, disdaine mortalitie.

O that I knewe which joynt, which side, which lim,
Were father all, and had no mother in't,
That I might rip it vaine by vaine, and carve revenge
In bleeding races; but since 'tis mixt together,
Have at adventure, pel mell, no reverse.

Come hither, boy. This is Andrugio's hearse.

Jul. O God, youle hurt me. For my sisters sake,
Pray you doe not hurt me. An you kill me, 'deede,
Ile tell my father.

Ant. O, for thy sisters sake, I flagge revenge.

Andrugio's Ghost. Revenge!

Ant. Stay, stay, deare father, fright mine eyes no more.
Revenge as swift as lightning bursteth forth,
And cleares his heart. Come, prettie tender childe,
It is not thee I hate, not thee I kill.
Thy fathers blood that flowes within thy veines
Is it I loath; is that revenge must sucke.
I love thy soule: and were thy heart lapt up
In any flesh but in Piero's bloode,
I would thus kisse it; but being his, thus, thus,
And thus Ile punch it. Abandon feares.
Whil'st thy wounds bleede, my browes shall gush out teares.

Jul. So you will love me, doe even what you will.

Ant. Now barks the wolfe against the fulle cheekt moon;

Now lyons half-clamd entrals roare for food;
Now croakes the toad, and night crowes screech aloud,
Fluttering 'bout casements of departed soules;
Now gapes the graves, and through their yawnes let loose
Imprison'd spirits to revisit earth;
And now swarte night, to swell thy hower out,
Behold I spurt warme bloode in thy blacke eyes.

[Stabs Julio. From under the stage a groane.]

Howle not, thou putry mould; groan not, ye graves.
Be dumbe, all breath. Here stands Andrugio's sonne, Worthie his father. So: I feele no breath.
His jawes are falne, his dislodg'd soule is fled:
And now there's nothing but Piero left.
He is all Piero, father all. This blood,
This breast, this heart, Piero all:
Whome thus I mangle. Spirit of Julio,
Forget this was thy trunk. I live thy friend.
Mayst thou be twined with the softest imbrace
Of clere eternitie: but thy fathers blood
I thus make incense of, to vengeance.
Ghost of my poysoned sire, sucke this fume,
To sweet revenge perfume thy circling ayre
With smoake of bloode. I sprinkle round his goare,
And dewe thy hearse with these fresh reeking drops.
Loe thus I heave my blood-died handes to heaven,
Even like insatiate hell, still crying More!
My heart hath thirsting dropsies after goare.
Sound peace and rest to church, night ghosts, and graves,
Blood cries for bloode, and murder murder craves.

(From Part II. Act III.)

Antonio's Latin quotation is an adaptation of two lines from Seneca's Thyestes; flagge is 'let drop'; half-clamd is 'half-clemmed,' 'half-starved'; for 'cleares his heart' Mr Bullen reads 'cleaves'; putry (in the old editions, putry) is 'putrid.'

Night is thus prayed for:

And now, yee sootie coursers of the night,
Hurrie your chariot into hels black wombe.

Nightfall is described:

The gloomie wing of Night begins to stretch
His lasie pinion over all the ayre.

And daybreak :

For see, the dapple gray coursers of the morne
Beat up the light with their bright silver hooves,
And chase it through the skye.

In the Insatiate Countesse Night is personified :

Night like a solemne mourner frownes on earth,
Envyng that day should force her doff her robes,
Or Phœbus chase away her melancholly.
Heavens eyes looke faintly through her sable masque,
And silver Cynthia hyes her in her sphære,
Scorning to grace black Nights solemnity.

Marston has paraphrased Shakespeare in

Feare is my vassal ; when I frowne he flies ;
A hundred times in life a coward dyes.

A storm at sea is recorded with superfluous conceits and overstrained imagery, carrying lack of dignity over the verge of the ridiculous :

We gan discourse ; when loe ! the sea grewe mad,
His bowels rumbling with winde passion ;
Straight swarthy darknesse popt out Phœbus eye,
And blur'd the jocund face of bright-cheekt day,
Whilst crud'led fogges masked even the darknesse browe ;
Heaven bade 's good night, and the rocks gron'd
At the intestine upore of the maine.
Nowe gustie flaws shook up the very heeles
Of our maine mast, whilst the keene lightning shot
Through the black bowels of the quaking ayre.

There are editions of Marston by Halliwell-Phillipps (1856), from which the above extracts are, with a few minor alterations, transcribed, by Bullen (1887) and by Harvey Wood (1934 et seq.).

Philip Massinger (1583–1640), one of the most accomplished and eloquent dramatists of his time, lived the precarious life of a writer for the stage, died in poverty, and was buried at St Saviour's, Southwark, in the grave of his colleague, Fletcher, with no other memorial than the note in the parish register, 'Philip Massinger, a stranger'—meaning he did not belong to the parish. His father, as appears from the dedication of one of his plays, was in the service of the Earl of Pembroke, was entrusted with letters to Queen Elizabeth, and was otherwise employed in confidential negotiations. Whether Philip, who was born at Salisbury, as a page ever 'wandered in the marble halls and pictured galleries of Wilton, that princely seat of old magnificence, where Sir Philip Sidney composed his Arcadia,' is not certainly known ; in 1602 he was entered of St Alban Hall, Oxford. He seems to have quitted the university abruptly in 1606, and to have commenced writing for the stage. The first notice of him is in Henslowe's diary, about 1613, where he makes a joint application, with N. Field and R. Daborne, two other playwrights, for a loan of £5, without which, they say, they could not be bailed. The sequel of Massinger's history is but an enumeration of his plays. He was found dead in his bed in his house on the Bankside one March morning in 1639–40. He wrote a great number of pieces, of which fifteen written by him unaided have been preserved. The manuscripts of eight others of his plays were in existence in the middle of the eighteenth century, but they fell into the hands of John Warburton, Somerset herald, who had collected no less than fifty-five English dramas of the golden period, many of them rare, some of them unique, but all of them, through his carelessness, burnt for kitchen uses by his ignorant domestic. Much of Massinger's best work is inextricably mixed up with that of Fletcher and others. It is difficult to say how far he was concerned in the authorship of plays that pass under the name of 'Beaumont and Fletcher.' Probably the earliest of his extant plays is the unpleasant Unnatural Combat, printed in 1639. The first published is The Virgin Martyr (1622), partly by Dekker. In 1623 was published The Duke of Milan, a fine but rhetorical tragedy. The Bondman, The Renegado, and The Parliament of Love were licensed in 1623–24. The Roman Actor (1626) abounds in eloquent declamation. The Great Duke of Florence, produced in 1627, has a delightful love-story, whereas Massinger's female characters are usually unattractive and sometimes odious. The Maid of Honour (1628) is, like the Bondman, full of political allusions. The Picture, licensed in 1629, has an improbable plot. The Emperor of the East (1631) has the same merits and faults as the Duke of Milan. Field joined Massinger in writing The Fatal Dowry (1632). The City Madam (licensed in 1632) and A New Way to Pay Old Debts (which, printed in 1633, kept the stage till well into the nineteenth century) are Massinger's most masterly comedies—brilliant satirical studies, though without warmth or geniality. A Very Woman (1634) is Fletcher's Woman's Plot revised by Massinger. The Guardian dates from 1633, The Bashful Lover from 1636. Believe as you List (1631) was first printed from MS. in 1844. The powerful and stately Tragedy of Sir John Van Olden Barnavelt (1619), by Massinger and Fletcher, was first printed in vol. ii. of Bullen's Old Plays (First Series), and was edited from the MS. with introduction and notes by Miss Frijlinck (Amsterdam, 1922).

Some of Massinger's plays are (as Coleridge said) as interesting as a novel ; others are as solid as a treatise on political philosophy. No writer repeats himself more frequently. His comedy resembles Jonson's in its eccentric strength, exhibitions of wayward human nature, and use of rather typical and conventional characters. The greediness of avarice, the tyranny of unjust laws, and the miseries of poverty are drawn with a powerful hand. The luxuries and vices of a city life afford scope for indignant and forcible invective. Genuine humour or sprightliness Massinger had none. His dialogue is often coarse and indecorous, and his low characters are too depraved. His genius was rather descriptive and rhetorical than impassioned or dramatic ; yet there is a certain serious dignity that impresses. The versification is smooth and mellifluous ; in his early plays rhyme and prose are freely used ; in the later, mainly blank verse.

Charles Lamb said that his English style is purer and freer from violent metaphors and harsh constructions than that of any contemporary dramatist. The influence of Spanish and Italian models is conspicuous; he was skilled in his management of the plot, and showed mastery of stage mechanism.

Pregnant lines or short passages in the plays are: 'Better the devil's than a woman's slave;' 'Death hath a thousand doors to let out life;' 'Gold can do much, but beauty more;' 'Ambition, in a private man a vice, is in a prince the virtue;' 'Virtue not in action is a vice;' and 'When we go not forward, we go backward.' Massinger's best woman character is Camiola in the Maid of Honour. It is in her mouth (speaking to the King of Sicily) that Massinger puts a very frank impeachment, controversial rather than poetic, of the sacrosanct doctrine of the divine right of kings:

With your leave I must not kneel, sir,
While I reply to this: but thus rise up
In my defence, and tell you, as a man,
(Since, when you are unjust, the deity
Which you may challenge as a king, parts from you,)
'Twas never read in holy writ or moral,
That subjects on their loyalty were obliged
To love their sovereign's vices.

Camiola, too, it is who, when she hears that her lover is imprisoned by his enemy and abandoned by his king, says—her loyalty all but forgotten—

Pray you stand off!
If I do not mutter treason to myself
My heart will break; and yet I will not curse him;
He is my king.

Sir Giles Overreach. To my wish: we are private.
I come not to make offer with my daughter
A certain portion; that were poor and trivial:
In one word, I pronounce all that is mine,
In lands or leases, ready coin or goods,
With her, my lord, comes to you; nor shall you have
One motive to induce you to believe
I live too long, since every year I'll add
Something unto the heap, which shall be yours too.

Lord Lovell. You are a right kind father.

Over. You shall have reason
To think me such. How do you like this seat?
It is well wooded and well watered, the acres
Fertile and rich: would it not serve for change,
To entertain your friends in a summer progress?
What thinks my noble lord?

Lov. 'Tis a wholesome air,
And well built pile; and she that's mistress of it,
Worthy the large revenue.

Over. She the mistress!
It may be so for a time; but let my lord
Say only that he but like it, and would have it;
I say, ere long 'tis his.

Lov. Impossible.
Over. You do conclude too fast; not knowing me,
Nor the engines that I work by. 'Tis not alone
The Lady Allworth's lands, for those once Wellborn's

(As by her dotage on him I know they will be)
Shall soon be mine; but point out any man's
In all the shire, and say they lie convenient
And useful for your lordship, and once more,
I say aloud, they are yours.

Lov. I dare not own
What's by unjust and cruel means extorted:
My fame and credit are more dear to me
Than so to expose them to be censured by
The public voice.

Over. You run, my lord, no hazard:
Your reputation shall stand as fair
In all good men's opinions as now:
Nor can my actions, though condemned for ill,
Cast any foul aspersion upon yours.
For though I do condemn report myself

PHILIP MASSINGER.

After an Engraving by T. Cross, A.D. 1655.

As a mere sound, I still will be so tender
Of what concerns you in all points of honour,
That the immaculate whiteness of your fame,
Nor your unquestioned integrity,
Shall e'er be sullied with one taint or spot
That may take from your innocence and candour.
All my ambition is to have my daughter
Right honourable; which my lord can make her:
And might I live to dance upon my knee
A young Lord Lovell, born by her unto you,
I write nil ultra to my proudest hopes.
As for possessions and annual rents,
Equivalent to maintain you in the port
Your noble birth and present state requires,
I do remove that burden from your shoulders,
And take it on mine own; for though I ruin
The country to supply your riotous waste,
The scourge of prodigals (want) shall never find you.
Lov. Are you not frightened with the imprecations
And curses of whole families, made wretched
By your sinister practices?

Over. Yes, as rocks are
When foamy billows split themselves against Their flinty ribs ; or as the moon is moved
When wolves, with hunger pined, howl at her brightness,
I am of a solid temper, and, like these,
Steer on a constant course : with mine own sword,
If called into the field, I can make that right
Which fearful enemies murmured at as wrong.
Now, for these other piddling complaints,
Breathed out in bitterness ; as, when they call me
Extortioner, tyrant, cormorant, or intruder
On my poor neighbour's right, or grand incloser
Of what was common to my private use ;
Nay, when my ears are pierced with widows' cries,
And undone orphans wash with tears my threshold,
I only think what 'tis to have my daughter
Right honourable ; and 'tis a powerful charm,
Makes me insensible of remorse or pity,
Or the least sting of conscience.

Lov. I admire
The toughness of your nature.

Over. 'Tis for you,
My lord, and for my daughter, I am marble ;
Nay more, if you will have my character
In little, I enjoy more true delight
In my arrival to my wealth these dark
And crooked ways, than you shall e'er take pleasure
In spending what my industry hath compassed.
My haste commands me hence. In one word therefore,
Is it a match ?

From 'The City Madam.'

Luke Frugal. No word, sir,
I hope, shall give offence : nor let it relish
Of flattery, though I proclaim aloud,
I glory in the bravery of your mind,
To which your wealth 's a servant. Not that riches
Is, or should be, contemned, it being a blessing
Derived from heaven, and by your industry
Pulled down upon you ; but in this, dear sir,
You have many equals : such a man's possessions
Extend as far as yours ; a second hath
His bags as full ; a third in credit flies
As high in the popular voice : but the distinction
And noble difference by which you are Divided from them is, that you are styled
Gentle in your abundance, good in plenty ;
And that you feel compassion in your bowels
Of other's miseries (I have found it, sir ;
Heaven keep me thankful for 't !) while they are cursed
As rigid and inexorable.

Sir John Frugal. I delight not
To hear this spoke to my face.

Luke. That shall not grieve you.
Your affability and mildness, clothed
In the garments of your thankful debtors' breath,
Shall everywhere, though you strive to conceal it,
Be seen and wondered at, and in the act
With a prodigal hand rewarded. Whereas, such
As are born only for themselves, and live so,
Though prosperous in worldly understandings,
Are but like beasts of rapine, that by odds
Of strength usurp and tyrannise o'er others
Brought under their subjection. . . .
Can you think, sir,
In your unquestioned wisdom, I beseech you,

The goods of this poor man sold at an outcry, auCTION
His wife turned out of doors, his children forced
To beg their bread ; this gentleman's estate
By wrong extorted, can advantage you ? . . .
Or that the ruin of this once brave merchant,
For such he was esteemed, though now decayed,
Will raise your reputation with good men ?
But you may urge (pray you, pardon me, my zeal Makes me thus bold and vehement) in this
You satisfy your anger, and revenge
For being defeated. Suppose this, it will not Repair your loss, and there was never yet
But shame and scandal in a victory,
When the rebels unto reason, passions, fought it.
Then for revenge, by great souls it was ever
Contemned, though offered ; entertained by none
But cowards, base and abject spirits, strangers
To moral honesty, and never yet
Acquainted with religion.

Lord Lacy. Our divines
Cannot speak more effectually.

Sir John. Shall I be Talked out of my money ?

Luke. No, sir, but entreated
To do yourself a benefit, and preserve
What you possess entire.

Sir John. How, my good brother ?

Luke. By making these your beadsmen. When they eat,
Their thanks, next heaven, will be paid to your mercy ;
When your ships are at sea, their prayers will swell
The sails with prosperous winds, and guard them from Tempests and pirates ; keep your warehouses
From fire, or quench them with their tears.

Sir John. No more.

Luke. Write you a good man in the people's hearts,
Follow you everywhere.

Sir John. If this could be—

Luke. It must, or our devotions are but words.
I see a gentle promise in your eye,
Make it a blessed act, and poor me rich
In being the instrument.

Sir John. You shall prevail ;
Give them longer day : but, do you hear ? no talk of 't.
Should this arrive at twelve on the Exchange,
I shall be laughed at for my foolish pity,
Which money-men hate deadly. Take your own time,
But see you break not.

From 'The Great Duke of Florence.'

[GIOVANNI, the Grand-duke's nephew, takes leave of LIDIA, his tutor's daughter.]

Lidia. Must you go, then,
So suddenly ?

Giovanni. There 's no evasion, Lidia,
To gain the least delay, though I would buy it
At any rate. Greatness, with private men
Esteemed a blessing, is to me a curse ;
And we, whom, for our high births, they conclude
The only freemen, are the only slaves :
Happy the golden mean ! Had I been born
In a poor sordid cottage, not nursed up
With expectation to command a court,
I might, like such of your condition, sweetest,
Have ta'en a safe and middle course, and not,
As I am now, against my choice, compelled

Or to lie grovelling on the earth, or raised
So high upon the pinnacles of state,
That I must either keep my height with danger,
Or fall with certain ruin.

Lidia. Your own goodness
Will be your faithful guard.

Giov. O Lidia ! For had I been your equal,
I might have seen and liked with mine own eyes,
And not, as now, with others. I might still,
And without observation or envy,
As I have done, continued my delights
With you, that are alone, in my esteem,
The abstract of society : we might walk
In solitary groves, or in choice gardens ;
From the variety of curious flowers
Contemplate nature's workmanship and wonders :
And then, for change, near to the murmur of
Some bubbling fountain, I might hear you sing,
And, from the well-tuned accents of your tongue,
In my imagination conceive
With what melodious harmony a quire
Of angels sing above their Maker's praises.
And then, with chaste discourse, as we returned,
Imp feathers to the broken wings of Time :
And all this I must part from.

Contarini. You forget
The haste imposed upon us.

Giov. One word more,
And then I come. And after this, when, with
Continued innocence of love and service,
I had grown ripe for hymeneal joys,
Embracing you, but with a lawful flame,
I might have been your husband.

Lidia. Sir, I was,
And ever am, your servant ; but it was
And 'tis far from me in a thought to cherish
Such saucy hopes. If I had been the heir
Of all the globes and sceptres mankind bows to
At my best you had deserved me ; as I am,
Howe'er unworthy, in my virgin zeal,
I wish you, as a partner of your bed,
A princess equal to you ; such a one
That may make it the study of her life,
With all the obedience of a wife, to please you ;
May you have happy issue, and I live
To be their humblest handmaid !

Giov. I am dumb, and can make no reply.

Lidia. Your excellence will be benighted.

Giov. This kiss, bathed in tears,
May learn you what I should say.

Song from 'The Emperor of the East.'

Why art thou slow, thou rest of trouble, Death,
To stop a wretch's breath,
That calls on thee, and offers her sad heart
A prey unto thy dart ?
I am nor young nor fair ; be, therefore, bold :
Sorrow hath made me old,
Deformed, and wrinkled ; all that I can crave
Is quiet in my grave.
Such as live happy, hold long life a jewel ;
But to me thou art cruel,
If thou end not my tedious misery.
And I soon cease to be.
Strike, and strike home, then ! Pity unto me,
In one short hour's delay, is tyranny.

The following passage from the Virgin Martyr has by all critics from Charles Lamb onward been attributed not to Massinger but to his collaborator Dekker. It was in speaking of this fine scene that Lamb was moved to say that Dekker 'had poetry enough for anything' (see page 423) ; but the drama as a whole is, in Mr Bullen's words, 'more orderly and artistic than any of the plays that Dekker wrote alone' :

From 'The Virgin Martyr.'

[ANGELO, a good spirit, attends DOROTHEA as a Page.]

Dorothea. My book and taper.

Angelo. Here, most holy mistress.

Dor. Thy voice sends forth such music, that I never
Was ravished with a more celestial sound.
Were every servant in the world like thee,
So full of goodness, angels would come down
To dwell with us : thy name is Angelo,
And like that name thou art. Get thee to rest ;
Thy youth with too much watching is oppress.

Ang. No, my dear lady, I could weary stars,
And force the wakeful moon to lose her eyes,
By my late watching, but to wait on you.
When at your prayers you kneel before the altar,
Methinks I'm singing with some quire in heaven,
So blest I hold me in your company.
Therefore, my most loved mistress, do not bid
Your boy, so serviceable, to get hence ;
For then you break his heart.

Dor. Be nigh me still, then.
In golden letters down I'll set that day
Which gave thee to me. Little did I hope
To meet such worlds of comfort in thyself,
This little, pretty body ; when I, coming
Forth of the temple, heard my beggar-boy,
My sweet-faced, godly beggar-boy, crave an alms,
Which with glad hand I gave, with lucky hand !—
And when I took thee home, my most chaste bosom,
Methought, was filled with no hot wanton fire,
But with a holy flame, mounting since higher,
On wings of cherubins, than it did before.

Ang. Proud am I that my lady's modest eye
So likes so poor a servant.

Dor. I have offered
Handfuls of gold but to behold thy parents.
I would leave kingdoms, were I queen of some,
To dwell with thy good father ; for, the son
Bewitching me so deeply with his presence,
He that begot him must do't ten times more.
I pray thee, my sweet boy, shew me thy parents ;
Be not ashamed.

Ang. I am not : I did never Know who my mother was ; but, by yon palace,
Filled with bright heavenly courtiers, I dare assure you,
And pawn these eyes upon it, and this hand,
My father is in heaven : and, pretty mistress,
If your illustrious hour-glass spend his sand
No worse, than yet it does, upon my life,
You and I both shall meet my father there,
And he shall bid you welcome.

Dor. A blessed day !
We all long to be there, but lose the way.

Beaumont and Fletcher,

two of the greatest Elizabethan dramatists, left in their joint work the most memorable outcome of a literary partnership, of a 'mysterious double personality.' Heretofore dramatic collaboration had been generally brief and incidental, confined to a few scenes or a single play. But Beaumont and Fletcher lived together for ten years, and wrote a series of dramas, passionate, romantic, and comic, with such perfect co-operation that their names, their genius, and their fame have been inseparably conjoined or indissolubly blended. Shakespeare inspired these kindred souls. They appeared when his dramatic supremacy was undisputed, and, especially in the comedies, they could not but be touched by such a master-spirit. But Beaumont rendered enthusiastic homage to Ben Jonson, and several of his plays show abundant traces of Jonson's influence. Francis Beaumont was the younger by several years, and died nine years before his colleague. The son of a judge, a member of an ancient family settled at Grace-dieu, in Leicestershire, he was born in 1585, and educated at Oxford. He became a student of the Inner Temple, probably to gratify his father, but does not seem to have prosecuted the study of the law. In 1602 he published a poetical expansion of a tale from Ovid, and became an intimate of Ben Jonson and the circle of wits who met at the Mermaid Tavern. He was buried on 9th March 1616, at the entrance to St Benedict's Chapel, Westminster Abbey.—John Fletcher was the son of that Dean of Peterborough who obtruded unwelcome ministrations on Marv Queen of Scots at the scaffold and died Bishop of London. He was born at Rye in 1579; was bred at Benet (Corpus), Cambridge; was left in poverty at his father's death; took early to play-writing; and, dying of the plague in 1625, was buried in St Saviour's, Southwark.

Hazlitt said of these premature deaths: 'One of these writers makes Bellario, the page, say to Philaster, who threatens to take his life: "'Tis not a life, 'tis but a piece of childhood thrown away.'" But here was youth, genius, aspiring hope, growing reputation, cut off like a flower in its summer pride, or like "the lily on its stalk green," which makes us repine at fortune, and almost at nature, that seem to set so little store by their greatest favourites.'

Till well on in the 19th century critics failed to distinguish differences of style between the two dramatists; but, applying metrical and other tests, modern scholarship confidently—and often convincingly—awards to each his share in the joint works. Of over fifty tragedies and comedies indiscriminately attributed to Beaumont and Fletcher, about a third are now generally assigned to Fletcher alone; another third to Fletcher and Massinger (after Beaumont's death); one sixth to Beaumont and Fletcher, and the rest to Fletcher with other collaborators (Shakespeare, Jonson, Field, &c.).

The Woman Hater (1607) and a Masque (1613) are by Beaumont alone. Besides The Knight of the Burning Pestle (mostly Beaumont's), The Scornful Lady, The Coxcomb, Philaster, The Maid's Tragedy, A King and No King, Cupid's Revenge, and Four Plays in One are by Beaumont and Fletcher—all seemingly acted between 1609 and 1612. Of Fletcher's unaided works (sixteen or seventeen) most noteworthy are: The Faithful Shepherdess, a pastoral drama of high poetic beauty, though a stage failure (? 1609); Valentinian and—perhaps with Field—Bonduca, tragedies (by 1614); The Loyal Subject (1618) and Humorous Lieutenant (1619), tragi-comedies; Monsieur Thomas, The Pilgrim, (1621), The Wildgoose Chase, Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, The Chances (acted 1625 or 1626), comedies. Massinger has belatedly been credited with a hand in the framing and writing of over a dozen plays, including The Bloody Brother (or Rollo, Duke of Normandy), Thierry and Theodoret (1617), Sir John Van Olden Barnavelt (1619), The False One, historical tragedies; Little French Lawyer (c. 1619), Beggar's Bush, Spanish Curate, and Elder Brother (staged after Fletcher's death), comedies.

Beaumont's verses are more severe and regular in form than those of Fletcher, whose versification has many peculiar features which make his lines distinguishable from those of his contemporary dramatists. Chief of these is the frequency of double or feminine endings, in which he exceeds any other writer of our old drama. A marked metrical peculiarity was his fondness for ending a verse with an emphatic extra monosyllable—e.g.:

And, love, I charge thee, never charm mine eyes more.

(A single line from The Humorous Lieutenant, Act iv. sc. 2.)

And unfrequented deserts where the snow dwells.

(A single line from Bonduca.)

Another characteristic is the monotonous pause at the end of the line. In more colloquial passages the verse is so irregular—through the introduction of redundant syllables (in all parts of the line)—as to be barely distinguishable from prose. The metrical arrangement in the seventeenth-century editions is very faulty; and Fletcher has only himself to blame if modern editors cannot determine whether certain scenes should be printed as verse or prose. His easy, go-as-you-please freedom was obtained by the sacrifice of rhythm.

Fletcher undoubtedly had a share in Shakespeare's Henry VIII. (see page 372). The touch of Shakespeare is felt with considerable certainty in the Two Noble Kinsmen (see page 372). There is a tone of music and a tread of thunder in some of the passages to which no parallel can be found in any of the companion dramas. Only three plays were, during Fletcher's lifetime, published as joint productions. Two of these—Philaster and the Maid's Tragedy—are (not to reckon the great passages in the Two Noble Kinsmen) the glory of the collection. It seems odd that these plays are called by the name of Beaumont and Fletcher, thus giving precedence to the younger and less voluminous writer. Dyce's opinion was that of these three plays Beaumont had the greater share, or that through natural courtesy Fletcher placed the name of his deceased associate before his own, and that future editors naturally followed Fletcher's arrangement. It would appear that on the whole Beaumont possessed the deeper and more thoughtful genius, Fletcher the gayer and more idyllic. There is a glad, exuberant music and a May-morning light and freshness in the Faithful Shepherdess, which Milton did not disdain to accept as a model in the lyrical portions of Comus, and of which the Endymion of Keats is an echo. Beaumont and Fletcher never sound the deep sea of passion; they are poets first and dramatists after; they display but little power of serious and consistent characterisation, while they are much too fond of unnatural and violent situations. And there is an unpleasantly licentious element in many of the plays; even that most delightful pastoral the Faithful Shepherdess is marred by deformities of this kind. 'A spot,' says Charles Lamb, 'is on the face of this Diana.'

Dryden reports that Philaster was the first play that brought the collaborators into esteem with the public, though they had produced several plays before it appeared. It is somewhat improbable in plot, but interesting in character and situations. The hero, heir to the King of Sicily, who had been unjustly deposed by the King of Calabria, claims his rights. The king's daughter Arethusa falls in love with him:

Philaster.

Madam, your messenger

Made me believe you wished to speak with me.

Arethusa. 'Tis true, Philaster; but the words are such I have to say, and do so ill beseech
The mouth of woman, that I wish them said,
And yet am loath to speak them. Have you known
That I have aught detracted from your worth?
Have I in person wronged you? or have set
My baser instruments to throw disgrace
Upon your virtues?

Phi.

Never, madam, you.

Are. Why, then, should you, in such a public place,
Injure a princess, and a scandal lay
Upon my fortunes, famed to be so great,
Calling a great part of my dowry in question?

JOHN FLETCHER.

From the Portrait (painter unknown) in National Portrait Gallery.

Phi. Madam, this truth which I shall speak will be Foolish: but for your fair and virtuous self,
I could afford myself to have no right
To any thing you wished.

Are.

Philaster, know,

I must enjoy these kingdoms.

Phi.

Madam, both?

Are. Both, or I die: By fate, I die, Philaster,
If I not calmly may enjoy them both.

Phi. I would do much to save that noble life:
Yet would be loath to have posterity
Find in our stories, that Philaster gave
His right unto a sceptre and a crown
To save a lady's longing.

Are.

Nay, then, hear:

I must and will have them, and more—

Phi.

What more?

Are. Or lose that little life the gods prepared
To trouble this poor piece of earth withal.

Phi. Madam, what more?

Are.

Turn, then, away thy face.

Phi. No.

Are. Do.

Phi. I can endure it. Turn away my face?
I never yet saw enemy that looked
So dreadfully, but that I thought myself
As great a basilisk as he; or spake
So horribly, but that I thought my tongue
Bore thunder underneath, as much as his;
Nor beast that I could turn from: shall I then
Begin to fear sweet sounds? a lady's voice,
Whom I do love? Say, you would have my life;
Why, I will give it you; for 'tis to me
A thing so loathed, and unto you that ask
Of so poor use, that I shall make no price:
If you entreat, I will unmovedly hear.

Are. Yet for my sake, a little bend thy looks.

Phi. I do.

Are. Then know, I must have them and thee.

Phi. And me?

Are. Thy love; without which, all the land
Discovered yet will serve me for no use
But to be buried in.

Phi. Is't possible?

Are. With it, it were too little to bestow
On thee: Now, though thy breath do strike me dead,
(Which, know, it may) I have unript my breast.

Phi. Madam, you are too full of noble thoughts,
To lay a train for this contemn'd life,
Which you may have for asking: to suspect
Were base, where I deserve no ill: Love you!
By all my hopes, I do, above my life!
But how this passion should proceed from you
So violently, would amaze a man
That would be jealous.

Are. Another soul into my body shot
Could not have filled me with more strength and spirit
Than this thy breath. But spend not hasty time
In seeking how I came thus: 'tis the gods,
The gods, that make me so; and, sure, our love
Will be the nobler and the better blest,
In that the secret justice of the gods
Is mingled with it. Let us leave, and kiss;
Lest some unwelcome guest should fall betwixt us,
And we should part without it.

Phi. 'Twill be ill
I should abide here long.

Are. 'Tis true; and worse
You should come often. How shall we devise
To hold intelligence, that our true loves,
On any new occasion, may agree
What path is best to tread?

Phi. I have a boy,
Sent by the gods, I hope, to this intent,
Not yet seen in the court. Hunting the buck,
I found him sitting by a fountain's side,
Of which he borrowed some to quench his thirst,
And paid the nymph again as much in tears.
A garland lay him by, made by himself
Of many several flowers bred in the vale,
Stuck in that mystic order that the rareness
Delighted me: but ever when he turned
His tender eyes upon 'em, he would weep,
As if he meant to make 'em grow again.
Seeing such pretty helpless innocence
Dwell in his face, I asked him all his story:
He told me that his parents gentle died,
Leaving him to the mercy of the fields,

Which gave him roots; and of the crystal springs,
Which did not stop their courses; and the sun,
Which still, he thanked him, yielded him his light.
Then took he up his garland, and did show
What every flower, as country-people hold,
Did signify, and how all, ordered thus,
Exprest his grief; and, to my thoughts, did read
The prettiest lecture of his country-art
That could be wished: so that methought I could Have studied it. I gladly entertained
Him, who was as glad to follow; and have got
The truest, loving'st, and the gentlest boy
That ever master kept. Him will I send
To wait on you, and bear our hidden love.

(From Act I. sc. ii.)

The jealousy of Philaster is unnatural; Euphrasia, disguised as Bellario the page, is imitated from Viola, yet her hopeless attachment to Philaster is touching:

My father oft would speak
Your worth and virtue; and, as I did grow
More and more apprehensive, I did thirst
To see the man so praised. But yet all this
Was but a maiden longing, to be lost
As soon as found; till, sitting in my window,
Printing my thoughts in lawn, I saw a god,
I thought (but it was you) enter our gates.
My blood flew out, and back again as fast
As I had puffed it forth and sucked it in Like breath: then was I called away in haste
To entertain you. Never was a man
Heaved from a sheep-cote to a sceptre raised
So high in thoughts as I: you left a kiss
Upon these lips then, which I mean to keep
From you for ever: I did hear you talk,
Far above singing. After you were gone,
I grew acquainted with my heart, and searched
What stirred it so: alas! I found it love!
Yet far from lust; for could I but have lived
In presence of you, I had had my end.
For this I did delude my noble father
With a feigned pilgrimage, and dressed myself
In habit of a boy; and for I knew
My birth no match for you, I was past hope
Of having you; and, understanding well
That when I made discovery of my sex,
I could not stay with you, I made a vow,
By all the most religious things a maid
Could call together, never to be known,
Whilst there was hope to hide me from men's eyes,
For other than I seemed, that I might ever
Abide with you: then sat I by the fount
Where first you took me up.

(Act V. sc. v.)

The Maid's Tragedy, supposed to be written about the same time, is a powerful but unpleasing drama. Aspatia's purity is well contrasted with the guilty boldness of Evadne; and the rough, soldier-like bearing and manly feeling of Melantius render the selfish sensuality of the king more hateful and disgusting. Unhappily whole scenes and dialogues are disfigured by the master-vice of the theatre of Beaumont and Fletcher. Coleridge said, somewhat unkindly, that both poets were 'servile jure divino Royalists,' and that all their women are represented with the minds of strumpets, 'except a few irrational humourists'—a judgment several critics have jealously rebutted. As Mr St Loe Strachey says, for dramatic interest, sustained and heightened by every resource of stagecraft, Beaumont and Fletcher have no peers after Shakespeare. Nobler poetry, deeper thoughts and sentiments, may be found in the other dramatists; but judged as plays, the Maid's Tragedy and Philaster stand above all else that is not Shakespeare's.

The later works of Fletcher are chiefly comic. His plots are sometimes inartificial and loosely connected, but he is always lively and entertaining, and the dialogue is witty, elegant, and amusing. Yet with all their excellences, nobody remembers the plots of Beaumont and Fletcher's dramas. Shakespeare's are ineffaceably stamped on the memory, but those of Beaumont and Fletcher seem 'writ in water.' Dryden held that they understood and imitated the conversation of gentlemen much better than Shakespeare; and he tells us that their plays were, in his day, the most pleasant and frequent entertainments of the stage—'two of theirs being acted through the year for one of Shakespeare's or Jonson's.' It was different some forty years earlier. In 1627 the King's Company bribed the Master of the Revels with £5 to prevent the players of the theatre called the Red Bull from performing the dramas of Shakespeare. One cause of the preference for Beaumont and Fletcher may have been the license of their dramas (suited to the perverted taste of the court of Charles II.), and the spirit of intrigue which they adopted from the Spanish stage and naturalised on the English. 'We cannot deny,' said Hallam, 'that the depths of Shakespeare's mind were often unfathomable by an audience; the bow was drawn by a matchless hand, but the shaft went out of sight. All might listen to Fletcher's pleasing though not profound or vigorous language; his thoughts are noble, and tinged with the ideality of romance; his metaphors vivid, though sometimes too forced; he possesses the idiom of English without much pedantry, though in many passages he strains it beyond common use; his versification, though studiously irregular, is often rhythmical and sweet; yet we are seldom arrested by striking beauties. Good lines occur in every page, fine ones but rarely. We lay down the volume with a sense of admiration of what we have read, but little of it remains distinctly in the memory. Fletcher is not much quoted, and has not even afforded copious materials to those who cull the beauties of ancient lore.' His comic gift was much greater than his tragic power. Massinger impresses the reader more deeply, and has a moral beauty not possessed by Beaumont and Fletcher; in comedy he falls infinitely below them. Though their characters are deficient in variety, their knowledge of stage effect and contrivance, their fertility of invention, and the airy liveliness of their dialogue provide the charm of novelty and interest. The Knight of the Burning Pestle, mainly Beaumont's, is an admirable burlesque of the taste of the citizens of London for false chivalry and pseudo-romantic adventures, not without a specific reference to Heywood's Four Prentices of London; but it lacks the rich and genial humanity of Shakespeare's comedies. The vast variety and luxuriance of Beaumont and Fletcher's work lift it above Jonson's, though neither of them had his regularity and solidity, and brings them to the borders of the 'magic circle' of Shakespeare. The confidence and buoyancy of youth are visible in their plays—they had not tasted of adversity, like Jonson or Massinger; and they had not the profoundly meditative spirit of their great master.

Bonduca is a version of the story of the British warrior-queen, Boadicea, Bonduca, or (better) Boudicca. Caratach is the patriot now familiar to us under the Romanised name of Caractacus (Welsh, Caradawg). The play opens with a scene in which Caratach enters from behind, while Bonduca is speaking exultantly to Nennius and other British warriors:

Bonduca. The hardy Romans!—oh, ye gods of Britain!
The rust of arms, the blushing shame of soldiers!
Are these the men that conquer by inheritance?
The fortune-makers? these the Julians,
That with the sun measure the end of nature,
Making the world but one Rome and one Cæsar?
Shame, how they flee! Cæsar's soft soul dwells in 'em,
Their mothers got 'em sleeping, Pleasure nursed 'em;
Their bodies sweat with sweet oils, love's allurements,
Not lusty arms. Dare they send these to seek us,
These Roman girls? Is Britain grown so wanton?
Twice we have beat 'em, Nennius, scattered 'em:
And through their big-boned Germans, on whose pikes
The honour of their actions sits in triumph,
Made themes for songs to shame 'em: and a woman,
A woman beat 'em, Nennius; a weak woman,
A woman beat these Romans!

Caratach [coming forward]. So it seems
A man would shame to talk so.

Bond. Who's that?

Car. I.

Bond. Cousin, do you grieve my fortunes?

Car. No, Bonduca;

If I grieve, 'tis the bearing of your fortunes:
You put too much wind to your sail: discretion
And hardy valour are the twins of honour,
And, nursed together, make a conqueror;
Divided, but a talker. 'Tis a truth,
That Rome has fled before us twice, and routed;
A truth we ought to crown the gods for, lady,
And not our tongues; a truth is none of ours,
Nor in our ends, more than the noble bearing;
For then it leaves to be a virtue, lady,
And we, that have been victors, beat ourselves,
When we insult upon our honour's subject.

Bond. My valiant cousin, is it foul to say
What liberty and honour bid us do,

And what the gods allow us?

Car. No, Bonduca ;
So what we say exceed not what we do.
You call the Romans—fearful, fleeing Romans,
And Roman girls, the lees of tainted pleasures :
Does this become a doer? are they such?

Bond. They are no more.

Car. Where is your conquest, then?
Why are your altars crowned with wreaths of flowers?
The beasts with gilt horns waiting for the fire?
The holy Druids composing songs
Of everlasting life to victory?
Why are these triumphs, lady? for a May-game?
For hunting a poor herd of wretched Romans?
Is it no more? Shut up your temples, Britons,
And let the husbandman redeem his heifers ;
Put out your holy fires, no timbrel ring ;
Let's home and sleep ; for such great overthrows
A candle burns too bright a sacrifice,
A glow-worm's tail too full a flame.—Oh, Nennius,
Thou hadst a noble uncle knew a Roman,
And how to speak him, how to give him weight
In both his fortunes !

Bond. By the gods, I think
You dote upon these Romans, Caratach.

Car. Witness these wounds, I do ; they were fairly given :

I love an enemy ; I was born a soldier ;
And he that in the head on's troop defies me,
Bending my manly body with his sword,
I make a mistress. Yellow-tressed Hymen
Ne'er tied a longing virgin with more joy,
Than I am married to that man that wounds me :
And are not all these Roman? Ten struck battles
I sucked these honoured scars from, and all Roman ;
Ten years of bitter nights and heavy marches
(When many a frozen storm sung through my cuirass,
And made it doubtful whether that or I
Were the more stubborn metal) have I wrought through,
And all to try these Romans. Ten times a-night
I have swam the rivers, when the stars of Rome
Shot at me as I floated, and the billows
Tumbled their watry ruins on my shoulders,
Charging my battered sides with troops of agues ;
And still to try these Romans, whom I found
(And, if I lie, my wounds be henceforth backward,
And be you witness, gods, and all my dangers!)
As ready, and as full of that I brought,
(Which was not fear, nor flight) as valiant,
As vigilant, as wise to do and suffer,
Ever advanced as forward as the Britons,
Their sleeps as short, their hopes as high as ours,
Ay, and as subtle, lady. 'Tis dishonour,
And, followed, will be impudence, Bonduca,
And grow to no belief, to taunt these Romans.
Have not I seen the Britons——

Bond. What?

Car. Disheartened,
Run, run, Bonduca ; not the quick rack swifter,
The virgin from the hated ravisher
Not half so fearful ; not a flight drawn home,
A round stone from a sling, a lover's wish,
E'er made that haste that they have. By the gods,
I have seen these Britons, that you magnify,
Run as they would have out-run time, and roaring,
Basely for mercy roaring ; the light shadows,

That in a thought scur o'er the fields of corn,
Halted on crutches to 'em.

Bond. Oh, ye powers,
What scandals do I suffer !

Car. Yes, Bonduca,
I have seen thee run too ; and thee, Nennius ;
Yea, run apace, both ; then when Pœnius a Roman captain
(The Roman girl!) cut thorough your armed carts,
And drove 'em headlong on ye, down the hill ;
Then when he hunted ye, like Britain foxes,
More by the scent than sight ; then did I see
These valiant and approved men of Britain,
Like boding owls, creep into tods of ivy,
And hoot their fears to one another nightly.

Nennius. And what did you then, Caratach?

Car. I fled too
But not so fast,—your jewel had been lost then,
Young Hengo there ; he trashed me, Nennius :
For, when your fears out-run him, then stept I,
And in the head of all the Roman fury
Took him, and with my tough belt to my back
I buckled him ; behind him my sure shield ;
And then I followed. If I say I fought
Five times in bringing off this bud of Britain,
I lie not, Nennius. Neither had you heard
Me speak this, or ever seen the child more,
But that the son of virtue, Pœnius,
Seeing me steer through all these storms of danger,
My helm still in my hand (my sword), my prow
Turned to my foe (my face), he cried out nobly,
'Go, Briton, bear thy lion's whelp off safely ;
Thy manly sword has ransomed thee ; grow strong,
And let me meet thee once again in arms ;
Then, if thou stand'st, thou art mine.' I took his offer,
And here I am to honour him.

Bond. Oh, cousin,
From what a flight of honour hast thou checked me !
What wouldst thou make me, Caratach?

Car. See, lady,
The noble use of others in our losses.
Does this afflict you? Had the Romans cried this,
And, as we have done theirs, sung out these fortunes,
Railed on our base condition, hooted at us,
Made marks as far as the earth was ours, to show us
Nothing but sea could stop our flights, despised us,
And held it equal whether banqueting
Or beating of the Britons were more business,
It would have galled you.

Bond. Let me think we conquered.

Car. Do ; but so think as we may be conquered ;
And where we have found virtue, though in those
That came to make us slaves, let's cherish it.
There's not a blow we gave since Julius landed,
That was of strength and worth, but, like records,
They file to after ages. Our registers
The Romans are, for noble deeds of honour ;
And shall we burn their mentions with upbraidings?

Bond. No more ; I see myself. Thou hast made me cousin,

More than my fortunes durst, for they abused me,
And wound me up so high, I swelled with glory :
Thy temperance has cured that tympany,
And given me health again, nay more, discretion.
Shall we have peace? for now I love these Romans.

Car. Thy love and hate are both unwise ones, lady.

From 'The Maid's Tragedy.'

Evadne. I thank thee, Dula. Would thou couldst instil
Some of thy mirth into Aspatia!

Nothing but sad thoughts in her breast do dwell;
Methinks a mean between you would do well.

Dula. She is in love: hang me, if I were so,
But I could run my country. I love too
To do those things that people in love do.

Aspatia. It were a timeless smile should prove my cheek;

It were a fitter hour for me to laugh,
When at the altar the religious priest
Were pacifying the offended powers
With sacrifice, than now. This should have been
My night, and all your hands have been employed
In giving me a spotless offering
To young Amintor's bed, as we are now
For you: pardon, Evadne; would my worth
Were great as yours, or that the King, or he,
Or both thought so! Perhaps he found me worthless;
But till he did so, in these ears of mine—
These credulous ears—he poured the sweetest words
That art or love could frame. And if I did want
Virtue, you safely may forgive that too,
For I have lost none that I had from you.

Evad. Nay, leave this sad talk, madam.

Asp. Would I could!
Then should I leave the cause.

Evad. See if you have not spoiled all Dula's mirth! . . .

Asp. [sings] Lay a garland on my hearse
Of the dismal yew—

Evad. That's one of your sad songs, madam.

Asp. Believe me, 'tis a very pretty one.

Evad. How is it, madam?

Asp. [sings] Lay a garland on my hearse
Of the dismal yew;
Maidens, willow branches bear;
Say I died true.
My love was false, but I was firm,
From my hour of birth;
Upon my buried body, lie
Lightly, gentle earth! . . .

Madam, good-night; may no discontent
Grow 'twixt your love and you; but if there do,
Inquire of me, and I will guide your moan;
Teach you an artificial way to grieve,
To keep your sorrow waking. Love your lord
No worse than I; but if you love so well,
Alas! you may displease him; so did I.
This is the last time you shall look on me.—
Ladies, farewell; as soon as I am dead,
Come all, and watch one night about my hearse;
Bring each a mournful story and a tear
To offer at it when I go to earth:
With flattering ivy clasp my coffin round,
Write on my brow my fortune, let my bier
Be borne by virgins that shall sing by course
The truth of maids and perjuries of men.

Evad. Alas! I pity thee. [Enter Amintor.]

Asp. Go, and be happy in your lady's love.
May all the wrongs that you have done to me
Be utterly forgotten in my death!
I'll trouble you no more, yet I will take
A parting kiss, and will not be denied. [Kisses Amintor.]
You'll come, my lord, and see the virgins weep

When I am laid in earth, though you yourself
Can know no pity. Thus I wind myself
Into this willow garland, and am prouder
That I was once your love—though now refused—
Than to have had another true to me.
So with my prayers I leave you, and must try
Some yet unpractised way to grieve and die.

(Act II. sc. i.)

The opening song from the Two Noble Kinsmen has been given above (page 373) as having 'the true Shakespearean ring.' The following scene (Act II. sc. ii.) is one of those in which Coleridge detected Shakespeare's hand, and other critics have supported this view. Sir Sidney Lee and most recent authorities assign it to Fletcher's own pen. The Kinsmen are the heroes (to be pronounced Pal'amon and Ar-sight) of Chaucer's
'Knights Tale' (see above at page 70); and of the story it is said in the Prologue:

It had a noble breeder and a pure,
A learned; and a poet never went
More famous yet 'twixt Po and Silver Trent:
Chaucer, of all admired, the story gives,
There constant to eternity it lives.

The dialogue cited below takes place when the cousins are prisoners in Greece:

Palamon. How do you, noble cousin?

Arcite. How do you, sir?

Pal. Why, strong enough to laugh at misery,
And bear the chance of war yet; we are prisoners,
I fear for ever, cousin.

Arc. I believe it,
And to that destiny have patiently
Laid up my hour to come.

Pal. Oh, cousin Arcite,
Where is Thebes now? where is our noble country?
Where are our friends and kindreds? Never more
Must we behold those comforts, never see
The hardy youths strive for the games of honour,
Hung with the painted favours of their ladies,
Like tall ships under sail; then start amongst them,
And as an east wind leave them all behind us
Like lazy clouds, whilst Palamon and Arcite,
Even in the wagging of a wanton leg,
Outstript the people's praises, won the garlands
Ere they have time to wish them ours. Oh, never Shall we two exercise, like twins of Honour,
Our arms again, and feel our fiery horses
Like proud seas under us! our good swords now (Better the red-eyed god of war ne'er ware)
Ravished our sides, like age, must run to rust,
And deck the temples of those gods that hate us;
These hands shall never draw them out like lightning
To blast whole armies more!

Arc. No, Palamon,
Those hopes are prisoners with us; here we are,
And here the graces of our youths must wither
Like a too timely spring; here age must find us,
And, which is heaviest, Palamon, unmarried;
The sweet embraces of a loving wife
Loaden with kisses, armed with thousand Cupids,
Shall never clasp our necks; no issue know us,
No figures of ourselves shall we e'er see,

To glad our age, and like young eagles teach them
 Boldly to gaze against bright arms, and say,
 'Remember what your fathers were, and conquer!'
 The fair-eyed maids shall weep our banishments,
 And in their songs curse ever-blinded Fortune,
 Till she for shame see what a wrong she has done
 To youth and nature. This is all our world :
 We shall know nothing here but one another ;
 Hear nothing but the clock that tells our woes.
 The vine shall grow, but we shall never see it :
 Summer shall come, and with her all delights,
 But dead-cold Winter must inhabit here still.

Pal. 'Tis too true, Arcite. To our Theban hounds,
 That shook the aged forest with their echoes,
 No more now must we halloo ; no more shake
 Our pointed javelins, whilst the angry swine
 Flies like a Parthian quiver from our rages,
 Struck with our well-steeled darts ! All valiant uses
 (The food and nourishment of noble minds)
 In us two here shall perish : we shall die
 (Which is the curse of honour) lastly,
 Children of Grief and Ignorance.

Arc. Yet, cousin,
 Even from the bottom of these miseries,
 From all that fortune can inflict upon us,
 I see two comforts rising, two mere blessings,
 If the gods please to hold here : a brave patience,
 And the enjoying of our griefs together.
 Whilst Palamon is with me, let me perish
 If I think this our prison !

Pal. Certainly
 'Tis a main goodness, cousin, that our fortunes
 Were twined together ; 'tis most true, two souls
 Put in two noble bodies, let them suffer
 The gall of hazard, so they grow together,
 Will never sink ; they must not ; say they could,
 A willing man dies sleeping, and all's done.

Arc. Shall we make worthy uses of this place
 That all men hate so much ?

Pal. How, gentle cousin ?

Arc. Let's think this prison a holy sanctuary,
 To keep us from corruption of worse men !
 We are young, and yet desire the ways of honour,
 That liberty and common conversation,
 The poison of pure spirits, might, like women,
 Woo us to wander from. What worthy blessing
 Can be, but our imaginations
 May make it ours ? And here being thus together,
 We are an endless mine to one another ;
 We are one another's wife, ever begetting
 New births of love ; we are father, friends, acquaintance ;
 We are, in one another, families ;
 I am your heir, and you are mine ; this place
 Is our inheritance ; no hard oppressor
 Dare take this from us : here, with a little patience,
 We shall live long, and loving ; no surfeits seek us ;
 The hand of War hurts none here, nor the seas
 Swallow their youth. Were we at liberty,
 A wife might part us lawfully, or business ;
 Quarrels consume us ; envy of ill men
 Crave¹ our acquaintance ; I might sicken, cousin,
 Where you should never know it, and so perish
 Without your noble hand to close mine eyes,
 Or prayers to the gods : a thousand chances,
 Were we from hence, would sever us.

Pal. You have made me—

I thank you, cousin Arcite !—almost wanton
 With my captivity : what a misery
 It is to live abroad, and everywhere !
 'Tis like a beast, methinks ! I find the court here,
 I am sure, a more content ; and all those pleasures,
 That woo the wills of men to vanity,
 I see through now ; and am sufficient
 To tell the world, 'tis but a gaudy shadow,
 That old Time, as he passes by, takes with him.
 What had we been, old in the court of Creon,
 Where sin is justice, lust and ignorance
 The virtues of the great ones ? Cousin Arcite,
 Had not the loving gods found this place for us,
 We had died, as they do, ill old men, unwept,
 And had their epitaphs, the people's curses.
 Shall I say more ?

Arc. I would hear you still.

Pal. You shall.

Is there record of any two that loved
 Better than we do, Arcite ?

Arc. Sure there cannot.

Pal. I do not think it possible our friendship
 Should ever leave us.

Arc. Till our deaths it cannot ;
 And after death our spirits shall be led
 To those that love eternally.

From 'The Faithful Shepherdess.'

To CLORIN in the wood, enter a SATYR with fruit.

Satyr. Through yon same bending plain
 That flings his arms down to the main,
 And through these thick woods, have I run,
 Whose bottom never kissed the sun,
 Since the lusty spring began.
 All to please my master Pan,
 Have I trotted without rest,
 To get him fruit ; for at a feast
 He entertains, this coming night,
 His paramour the Syrinx bright :
 But behold a fairer sight !
 By that heavenly form of thine,
 Brightest fair, thou art divine,
 Sprung from great immortal race
 Of the gods ; for in thy face
 Shines more awful majesty
 Than dull weak mortality
 Dare with misty eyes behold,
 And live : therefore, on this mould
 Lowly do I bend my knee,
 In worship of thy deity.

[Seeing Clorin.]

Deign it, goddess, from my hand
 To receive whate'er this land
 From her fertile womb doth send
 Of her choice fruits ; and but lend Belief to that the Satyr tells—
 Fairer by the famous wells,
 To this present day ne'er grew.
 Never better, nor more true.
 Here be grapes whose lusty blood
 Is the learned poets' good,
 Sweeter yet did never crown
 The head of Bacchus ; nuts more brown

Than the squirrel's teeth that crack them ;
 Deign, O fairest fair, to take them !
 For these, black-eyed Dryope
 Hath oftentimes commanded me
 With my clasped knee to climb :
 See how well the lusty time
 Hath decked their rising cheeks in red,
 Such as on your lips is spread !
 Here be berries for a queen,
 Some be red, some be green ;
 These are of that luscious meat
 The great god Pan himself doth eat :
 All these, and what the woods can yield,
 The hanging mountain or the field,
 I freely offer, and ere long
 Will bring you more, more sweet and strong ;
 Till when, humbly leave I take,
 Lest the great Pan do awake,
 That sleeping lies in a deep glade,
 Under a broad beech's shade.
 I must go, I must run,
 Swifter than the fiery sun.

[Exit.]

Clorin. And all my fears go with thee !
 What greatness, or what private hidden power,
 Is there in me to draw submission
 From this rude man and beast ? Sure I am mortal,
 The daughter of a shepherd ; he was mortal,
 And she that bore me mortal ; prick my hand
 And it will bleed ; a fever shakes me, and
 The self-same wind that makes the young lambs

shrink,
 Makes me a-cold : my fear says I am mortal.
 Yet I have heard (my mother told it me)
 And now I do believe it, if I keep
 My virgin flower uncropt, pure, chaste, and fair,
 No goblin, wood-god, fairy, elf, or fiend,
 Satyr, or other power that haunts the groves,
 Shall hurt my body, or by vain illusion
 Draw me to wander after idle fires ;
 Or voices calling me in dead of night
 To make me follow, and so tole me on Through mire and standing pools, to find my ruin.
 Else why should this rough thing, who never knew
 Manners nor smooth humanity, whose heats
 Are rougher than himself and more misshapen,
 Thus mildly kneel to me ? Sure there's a power
 In that great name of virgin that binds fast
 All rude uncivil bloods, all appetites
 That break their strong confines. Then, strong Chastity,
 Be thou my strongest guard ; for here I'll dwell
 In opposition against fate and hell !

(From Act I. sc. i.)

PERIGOT and AMORET.

Perigot. Stay, gentle Amoret, thou fair-browed maid.
 Thy shepherd prays thee stay that holds thee dear,
 Equal with his soul's good.

Amoret. Speak, I give
 Thee freedom, shepherd, and thy tongue be still
 The same it ever was, as free from ill
 As he whose conversation never knew
 The court or city : be thou ever true !

Peri. When I fall off from my affection,
 Or mingle my clean thoughts with ill desires,
 First let our great God cease to keep my flocks,
 That being left alone without a guard,

The wolf, or winter's rage, summer's great heat,
 And want of water, rots, or what to us
 Of ill is yet unknown, fall speedily,
 And in their general ruin let me go !

Amo. I pray thee, gentle shepherd, wish not so :
 I do believe thee ; 'tis as hard for me
 To think thee false, and harder than for thee
 To hold me foul.

Peri. Oh, you are fairer far
 Than the chaste blushing morn, or that fair star
 That guides the wandering seaman through the deep,
 Straighter than straightest pine upon the steep
 Head of an aged mountain ; and more white
 Than the new milk we strip before daylight
 From the full-freighted bags of our fair flocks.
 Your hair more beauteous than those hanging locks
 Of young Apollo !

Amo. Shepherd, be not lost,
 You are sailed too far already from the coast
 Of our discourse.

Peri. Did you not tell me once
 I should not love alone, I should not lose
 Those many passions, vows, and holy oaths
 I've sent to heaven ? Did you not give your hand,
 Even that fair hand, in hostage ? Do not then
 Give back again those sweets to other men
 You yourself vowed were mine.

Amo. Shepherd, so far as maiden's modesty
 May give assurance, I am once more thine.
 Once more I give my hand ; be ever free
 From that great foe to faith, foul jealousy.

Peri. I take it as my best good ; and desire,
 For stronger confirmation of our love,
 To meet this happy night in that fair grove,
 Where all true shepherds have rewarded been
 For their long service : say, sweet, shall it hold ?

Amo. Dear friend, you must not blame me if I make
 A doubt of what the silent night may do. . . .
 Maids must be fearful. . . .

Peri. Oh, do not wrong my honest simple truth ;
 Myself and my affections are as pure
 As those chaste flames that burn before the shrine
 Of the great Dian : only my intent
 To draw you thither was to plight our troths,
 With interchange of mutual chaste embraces,
 And ceremonious tying of our souls.
 For to that holy wood is consecrate
 A virtuous well, about whose flowery banks
 The nimble-footed fairies dance their rounds
 By the pale moonshine, dipping oftentimes
 Their stolen children, so to make them free
 From dying flesh and dull mortality.
 By this fair fount hath many a shepherd sworn
 And given away his freedom, many a troth
 Been plight, which neither Envy nor old Time
 Could ever break, with many a chaste kiss given
 In hope of coming happiness : by this
 Fresh fountain many a blushing maid
 Hath crowned the head of her long-loved shepherd
 With gaudy flowers, whilst he happy sung
 Lays of his love and dear captivity.

(From Act I. sc. ii.)

The lyrical pieces scattered throughout Beaumont and Fletcher's plays are generally in the graceful style of the Faithful Shepherdess :

Melancholy—from 'Nice Valour.'

Hence, all you vain delights,
As short as are the nights
Wherein you spend your folly !
There's nought in this life sweet,
If man were wise to see 't,
But only melancholy ;
O sweetest melancholy !

Welcome, folded arms, and fixed eyes,
A sigh that piercing mortifies,
A look that's fastened to the ground,
A tongue chained up, without a sound !

Fountain heads, and pathless groves,
Places which pale passion loves !
Moonlight walks, when all the fowls
Are warmly housed, save bats and owls !
A midnight bell, a parting groan !
These are the sounds we feed upon ;
Then stretch your bones in a still gloomy valley :
Nothing's so dainty-sweet as lovely melancholy.

There are obvious resemblances between this lyric (which Bertram Dobell inclines to ascribe to Wm. Strode) and Milton's Penseroso.

Song—from 'The False One.'

Look out, bright eyes, and bless the air :
Even in shadows you are fair.
Shut-up beauty is like fire,
That breaks out clearer still and higher.
Though your beauty be confined,
And soft Love a prisoner bound,
Yet the beauty of your mind
Neither check nor chain hath found.
Look out nobly, then, and dare
Even the fetters that you wear.

The Power of Love—from 'Valentinian.'

Hear ye, ladies that despise
What the mighty Love has done ;
Fear examples, and be wise :
Fair Calisto was a nun :
Leda, sailing on the stream,
To deceive the hopes of man,
Love accounting but a dream,
Doted on a silver swan :
Danaë in a brazen tower,
Where no love was, loved a shower.

Hear ye, ladies that are coy,
What the mighty Love can do ;
Fear the fierceness of the boy ;
The chaste moon he makes to woo ;
Vesta, kindling holy fires,
Circled round about with spies,
Never dreaming loose desires,
Doting at the altar dies ;
Ilion, in a short hour, higher
He can build, and once more fire.

To Sleep—from the Same.

Care-charming Sleep, thou easer of all woes,
Brother to Death, sweetly thyself dispose
On this afflicted prince : fall like a cloud
In gentle showers ; give nothing that is loud

Or painful to his slumbers ; easy, light,
And as a purling stream, thou son of Night,
Pass by his troubled senses, sing his pain
Like hollow murmuring wind, or silver rain ;
Into this prince gently, oh gently slide,
And kiss him into slumbers like a bride !

Song to Pan.

All ye woods, and trees, and bowers,
All ye virtues and ye powers
That inhabit in the lakes,
In the pleasant springs or brakes,
Move your feet
To our sound,
Whilst we greet
All this ground,
With his honour and his name
That defends our flocks from blame.

He is great and he is just,
He is ever good, and must
Thus be honoured. Daffadillies,
Roses, pinks, and loved lilies,
Let us fling,
Whilst we sing,
Ever holy,
Ever holy,
Ever honoured, ever young !
Thus great Pan is ever sung.

From 'The Bloody Brother.'

Take, O take those lips away,
That so sweetly were forsworn ;
And those eyes, the break of day,
Lights that do mislead the morn ;
But my kisses bring again,
Seals of love, though sealed in vain.

Hide, O hide those hills of snow,
Which thy frozen bosom bears,
On whose tops the pinks that grow
Are yet of those that April wears ;
But first set my poor heart free,
Bound in those icy chains by thee.

The first stanza of the above is, of course, from Measure for Measure ; the second was added by Fletcher.

A Drinking-Song—from the Same.

Drink to-day and drown all sorrow,
You shall perhaps not do it to-morrow,
But while you have it use your breath ;
There is no drinking after death.

Wine works the heart up, wakes the wit,
There is no cure 'gainst age but it ;
It helps the headache, cough, and tistic,
And is for all diseases physick.

Then let us swill, boys, for our health,
Who drinks well loves the commonwealth ;
And he that will to bed go sober
Falls with the leaf still in October.

Echoes of the last are found in many later drinking-songs—
'Down among the Dead Men,' for example, and 'Landlord, fill the Flowing Bowl.' Tistic is a form from phthisis, consumption.

Francis Beaumont wrote also a number of miscellaneous pieces, collected and published after his death. But some of the poems attributed to him were by Donne, Jonson, Shirley, Carew, Waller, or other less-known writers. Beaumont's love-poem on the Ovidian story of Salmacis and Hermaphroditus was written when he was seventeen. He wrote verses to Jonson 'Upon his Fox,' 'Upon the Silent Woman,' and 'Upon his Catiline;' but his most celebrated non-dramatic work is the letter to Ben Jonson, which was originally published at the end of the play Nice Valour in the 1647 folio, with the following title: 'Mr Francis Beaumont's Letter to Ben Jonson, written before he and Master Fletcher came to London, with two of the precedent Comedies then not finished, which deferred their merry-meetings at the Mermaid.'

From the Letter to Ben Jonson.

The sun (which doth the greatest comfort bring
To absent friends, because the self-same thing
They know! they see, however absent) is Here our best haymaker (forgive me this;
It is our country's style): in this warm shine
I lie, and dream of your full Mermaid wine.
Oh, we have water mixed with claret lees,
Drink apt to bring in drier heresies
Than beer, good only for the sonnet's strain,
With fustian metaphors to stuff the brain,
So mixed that, given to the thirstiest one,
'Twill not prove alms unless he have the stone.
I think with one draught man's invention fades:
Two cups had quite spoiled Homer's Iliads.
'Tis liquor that will find out Sutcliffe's wit,
Lie where he will, and make him write worse yet;
Filled with such moisture in most grievous qualms,
Did Robert Wisdom write his singing psalms;
And so must I do this: And yet I think
It is a potion sent us down to drink
By special Providence, keeps us from fights,
Makes us not laugh when we make legs to knights. bows
'Tis this that keeps our minds fit for our states,
A medicine to obey our magistrates:
For we do live more free than you; no hate,
No envy at one another's happy state
Moves us; we are all equal every whit:
Of land that God gives men here is their wit,
If we consider fully; for our best
And gravest men will with their main house-jest
Scarce please you; we want subtilty to do
The city tricks, lie, hate, and flatter too.
Here are none that can bear a painted show,
Strike when you wink, and then lament the blow;
Who, like mills set the right way for to grind,
Can make their gains alike with every wind;
Only some fellows with the subtlest pate
Amongst us may perchance equivocate
At selling of a horse, and that's the most.
Methinks the little wit I had is lost
Since I saw you; for wit is like a rest
Held up at tennis, which men do the best
With the best gamesters. What things have we seen Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been
So nimble, and so full of subtle flame,
As if that every one from whence they came

Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest,
And had resolved to live a fool the rest
Of his dull life; then when there hath been thrown
Wit able enough to justify the town
For three days past; wit that might warrant be
For the whole city to talk foolishly
Till that were cancelled; and when that was gone,
We left an air behind us, which alone
Was able to make the two next companies
Right witty—though but downright fools, more wise.

Matthew Sutcliffe (1550?-1629), Dean of Exeter and long a court favourite, wrote over a score of books in controversial theology; and Robert Wisdom, who died Archdeacon of Ely in 1568, contributed one psalm-translation to Sternhold and Hopkins's version, and wrote a few other hymns and elegiac verses, but was neither revered for his wisdom nor praised for his poetry. Of land, &c., there men's wit depends on their estates. Main house-jest, standing family joke, handed down from father to son. 'My rest is up', at tennis, bowls, and various games of cards and chance, was a phrase used to mean, 'My stake is laid: I take the chance.'

On the Tombs in Westminster.

Mortality, behold and fear;
What a change of flesh is here!
Think how many royal bones
Sleep within this heap of stones!
Here they lie had realms and lands,
Who now want strength to stir their hands;
Where, from their pulpits sealed with dust,
They preach, 'In greatness is no trust.'
Here's an acre sown indeed
With the richest, royalest seed,
That the earth did e'er suck in
Since the first man died for sin.
Here the bones of birth have cried,
'Though gods they were, as men they died.'
Here are wands, ignoble things,
Dropt from the ruined sides of kings.
Here's a world of pomp and state
Buried in dust, once dead by fate.

The following poem, credited to Beaumont, and not unlike his other work, was rejected by Dyce as being by a later hand:

An Epitaph.

Here she lies whose spotless fame
Invites a stone to learn her name:
The rigid Spartan that denied
An epitaph to all that died,
Unless for war, in charity
Would here vouchsafe an elegy.
She died a wife, but yet her mind,
Beyond virginity refined,
From lawless fire remained as free
As now from heat her ashes be.
Keep well this pawn, thou marble chest;
Till it be called for, let it rest;
For while this jewel here is set,
The grave is like a cabinet.

Bullen's edition (in 12 vols. 1904 et seq.) and Glover and Waller's edition (10 vols. 1905-18) superseded Dyce's (11 vols. 1843-46). Ten plays were edited by St. Loe Strachey ('Mermaid Series,' 1887). See C. M. Gayley's Francis Beaumont (1914), and G. C. Macaulay's (1883); Miss O. L. Hatcher's Fletcher (Chicago, 1905); A. H. Thorndike's Influence of Beaumont and Fletcher on Shakespeare (1901); Rhys's edition of the Lyric Poems of the two poets (1897); Swinburne's Contemporaries of Shakespeare (1919); and Macaulay's study in Cambridge History of English Literature (vol. vi. 1910).

William Rowley (c.1585–c.1642), actor and playwright, is known as having collaborated with Middleton, Dekker, Heywood, Webster, Massinger, and Ford. He seems to have been indifferent to dramatic fame: of the score of plays in which he had some share we know not what his share was. A New Wonder, a Woman Never Vext; All's Lost by Lust; A Match at Midnight; A Shoemaker a Gentleman—all written between 1632 and 1638—are the only plays which bear his name as sole author, but they are partly adaptations of older plays. His versification was harsh; but his fellow-dramatists valued his vigour and versatility both in tragedy and comedy. He rarely attained to pathos; his fund of humour was conspicuous—humour sometimes rich and true, sometimes passing into mere buffoonery. Of The Witch of Edmonton, published as 'a tragic-comedy by divers well esteemed poets, William Rowley, Thomas Dekker, John Ford, etc.', the farcical element was probably Rowley's. The Birth of Merlin, on whose title-page (1662) Shakespeare's name was unfortunately associated with Rowley's, is probably an old play remodelled, with an expansion of the comic element, by Rowley and others. The underplot of Middleton's Change-lings, and its opening and closing scenes, have been assigned to Rowley (see page 458). In The Old Law, by Massinger, Middleton, and Rowley, Bullen regarded Act III. sc. i. as a characteristic specimen of Rowley's humour. 'This dread law was 'that every man living to fourscore years, and women to threescore, shall then be cut off as fruitless to the republic;' and Gnotho, anxious to be rid of his wife and marry a new one, bribes the parish clerk to falsify a date in the register in order to hasten the happy despatch:

Gnotho. You have searched o'er the parish-chronicle, sir?

Clerk. Yes, sir; I have found out the true age and date of the party you wot on.

Gnoth. Pray you, be covered, sir.

Clerk. When you have shewed me the way, sir.

Gnoth. O sir, remember yourself, you are a clerk.

Clerk. A small clerk, sir.

Gnoth. Likely to be the wiser man, sir; for your greatest clerks are not always so, as 'tis reported.

Clerk. You are a great man in the parish, sir.

Gnoth. I understand myself so much the better, sir; for all the best in the parish pay duties to the clerk, and I would owe you none, sir.

Clerk. Since you'll have it so, I'll be the first to hide my head.

Gnoth. Mine is a capcase: now to our business in hand. Good luck, I hope; I long to be resolved.

Clerk. Look you, sir, this is that cannot deceive you: This is the dial that goes ever true; You may say ipse dixit upon this witness, And it is good in law too.

Gnoth. Pray you, let's hear what it speaks.

Clerk. Mark, sir.—Asutha, the daughter of Pollux, (this is your wife's name, and the name of her father,) born—

Gnoth. Whose daughter, say you?

Clerk. The daughter of Pollux.

Gnoth. I take it his name was Bollux.

Clerk. Pollux the orthography I assure you, sir; the word is corrupted else.

Gnoth. Well, on, sir,—of Pollux; now come on, Castor.

Clerk. Born in an. 1540, and now 'tis 99. By this infallible record, sir, (let me see,) she is now just fifty-nine, and wants but one.

Gnoth. I am sorry she wants so much.

Clerk. Why, sir? alas, 'tis nothing; 'tis but so many months, so many weeks, so many—

Gnoth. Do not deduct it to days, 'twill be the more tedious; and to measure it by hour-glasses were intolerable.

Clerk. Do not think on it, sir; half the time goes away in sleep, 'tis half the year in nights.

Gnoth. O, you mistake me, neighbour, I am loath to leave the good old woman; if she were gone now it would not grieve me; for what is a year, alas, but a lingering torment? and were it not better she were out of her pain? 'T must needs be a grief to us both.

Clerk. I would I knew how to ease you, neighbour!

Gnoth. You speak kindly, truly, and if you say but Amen to it, (which is a word that I know you are perfect in,) it might be done. Clerks are the most indifferent honest men,—for to the marriage of your enemy, or the burial of your friend, the curses or the blessings to you are all one; you say Amen to all.

Clerk. With a better will to the one than the other, neighbour: but I shall be glad to say Amen to any thing might do you a pleasure.

Gnoth. There is, first, something above your duty: [Gives him money] now I would have you set forward the clock a little, to help the old woman out of her pain.

Clerk. I will speak to the sexton; but the day will go ne'er the faster for that.

Gnoth. O, neighbour, you do not conceit me; not the jack of the clock-house; the hand of the dial, I mean.—Come, I know you, being a great clerk, cannot choose but have the art to cast a figure.

Clerk. Never, indeed, neighbour; I never had the judgment to cast a figure.

Gnoth. I'll shew you on the back side of your book, look you,—what figure's this?

Clerk. Four with a cipher, that's forty.

Gnoth. So! forty; what's this now?

Clerk. The cipher is turned into 9 by adding the tail, which makes forty-nine.

Gnoth. Very well understood; what is't now?

Clerk. The 4 is turned into 3; 'tis now thirty-nine.

Gnoth. Very well understood; and can you do this again?

Clerk. O, easily, sir.

Gnoth. A wager of that! let me see the place of my wife's age again.

Clerk. Look you, sir, 'tis here, 1540.

Gnoth. Forty drachmas you do not turn that forty into thirty-nine!

Clerk. A match with you!

Gnoth. Done! and you shall keep stakes yourself: there they are.

Clerk. A firm match—but stay, sir, now I consider it, I shall add a year to your wife's age; let me see—Scirophorion the 17,—and now 'tis Hecatombaion the 11. If I alter this, your wife will have but a month to live by the law.

Gnoth. That's all one, sir; either do it, or pay me my wager.

Clerk. Will you lose your wife before you lose your wager?

Gnoth. A man may get two wives before half so much money by 'em; will you do 't?

Clerk. I hope you will conceal me, for 'tis flat corruption.

Gnoth. Nay, sir, I would have you keep counsel; for I lose my money by 't, and should be laughed at for my labour, if it should be known.

Clerk. Well, sir, there!—'tis done; as perfect a 39 as can be found in black and white: but mum, sir,—there's danger in this figure-casting.

Gnoth. Ay, sir, I know that: better men than you have been thrown over the bar for as little; the best is, you can be but thrown out of the belfry.

Enter the COOK, TAILOR, BAILIFF, and BUTLER.

Clerk. Lock close, here comes company; asses have ears as well as pitchers.

Cook. O Gnotho, how is 't? here's a trick of discarded cards of us! we were ranked with coats, as long as our old master lived.

Gnoth. And is this then the end of serving-men?

Cook. Yes, 'faith, this is the end of serving-men: a wise man were better serve one God than all the men in the world.

Gnoth. 'Twas well spoke of a cook. And are all fallen into fasting-days and Ember-weeks, that cooks are out of use?

Tailor. And all tailors will be cut into lists and shreds; if this world hold, we shall grow both out of request.

Butler. And why not butlers as well as tailors? if they can go naked, let 'em neither eat nor drink.

Clerk. That's strange, methinks, a lord should turn away his tailor, of all men:—and how dost thou, tailor?

Tail. I do so so; but, indeed, all our wants are long of this publican, my lord's bailiff; for had he been rent-gatherer still, our places had held together still, that are now seam-rent, nay cracked in the whole piece.

Bailiff. Sir, if my lord had not sold his lands that claim his rents, I should still have been the rent-gatherer.

Cook. The truth is, except the coachman and the foot-man, all serving-men are out of request.

Gnoth. Nay, say not so, for you were never in more request than now, for requesting is but a kind of a begging; for when you say, I beseech your worship's charity, 'tis all one as if you say, I request it; and in that kind of requesting, I am sure serving-men were never in more request.

Cook. Troth, he says true: well, let that pass, we are upon a better adventure. I see, Gnotho, you have been before us; we came to deal with this merchant for some commodities.

Clerk. With me, sir? any thing that I can.

But. Nay, we have looked out our wives already: marry, to you we come to know the prices, that is, to know their ages; for so much reverence we bear to age, that the more aged, they shall be the more dear to us.

Tail. The truth is, every man has laid by his widow; so they be lame enough, blind enough, and old enough, 'tis good enough.

Clerk. I keep the town-stock; if you can but name 'em, I can tell their ages to a day.

All. We can tell their fortunes to an hour, then.

Clerk. Only you must pay for turning of the leaves.

Cook. O, bountifully.—Come, mine first.

But. The butler before the cook, while you live; there's few that eat before they drink in a morning.

Tail. Nay, then the tailor puts in his needle of priority, for men do clothe themselves before they either drink or eat.

Bail. I will strive for no place; the longer ere I marry my wife, the older she will be, and nearer her end and my ends.

Clerk. I will serve you all, gentlemen, if you will have patience.

Gnoth. I commend your modesty, sir; you are a bailiff, whose place is to come behind other men, as it were in the bum of all the rest.

Bail. So, sir! and you were about this business too, seeking out for a widow?

Gnoth. Alack! no, sir; I am a married man, and have those cares upon me that you would fain run into.

Bail. What, an old rich wife! any man in this age desires such a care.

Gnoth. 'Troth, sir, I'll put a venture with you, if you will; I have a lusty old quean to my wife, sound of wind and limb, yet I'll give out to take three for one at the marriage of my second wife.

Bail. Ay, sir, but how near is she to the law?

Gnoth. Take that at hazard, sir; there must be time, you know, to get a new. Unsight, unseen, I take three to one.

Bail. Two to one I'll give, if she have but two teeth in her head.

Gnoth. A match; there's five drachmas for ten at my next wife.

Bail. A match.

Cook. I shall be fitted bravely; fifty-eight, and upwards; 'tis but a year and a half, and I may chance make friends, and beg a year of the duke.

But. Hey, boys! I am made sir butler; my wife that shall be wants but two months of her time; it shall be one ere I marry her, and then the next will be a honeymoon.

Tail. I outstrip you all; I shall have but six weeks of Lent, if I get my widow, and then comes eating-tide, plump and gorgeous.

Gnoth. This tailor will be a man, if ever there were any.

Bail. Now comes my turn, I hope, goodman Finis, you that are still at the end of all, with a so be it. Well now, sirs, do you venture there as I have done; and I'll venture here after you. Good luck, I beseech thee!

Clerk. Amen, sir.

Bail. That deserves a fee already—there 'tis; please me, and have a better.

Clerk. Amen, sir.

Cook. How, two for one at your next wife! is the old one living?

Gnoth. You have a fair match, I offer you no foul one; if death make not haste to call her, she'll make none to go to him.

But. I know her, she's a lusty woman; I'll take the venture.

Gnoth. There's five drachmas for ten at my next wife.

But. A bargain.

Cook. Nay, then we'll be all merchants: give me.

Tail. And me.

But. What has the bailiff sped?

Bail. I am content; but none of you shall know my happiness.

Clerk. As well as any of you all, believe it, sir.

Bail. O, clerk, you are to speak last always.

Clerk. I'll remember 't hereafter, sir. You have done with me, gentlemen?

Enter AGATHA.

All. For this time, honest register.

Clerk. Fare you well then; if you do, I'll cry Amen to 't. [Exit.]

Cook. Look you, sir, is not this your wife?

Gnoth. My first wife, sir.

But. Nay, then we have made a good match on 't; if she have no froward disease, the woman may live this dozen years by her age.

Tail. I'm afraid she's broken-winded, she holds silence so long.

Cook. We'll now leave our venture to the event; I must a wooing.

But. I'll but buy me a new dagger, and overtake you.

Bail. So we must all; for he that goes a wooing to a widow without a weapon, will never get her.

[Exeunt all but Gnotho and Agatha.]

Gnoth. O wife, wife!

Agatha. What ail you, man, you speak so passionately?

Gnoth. 'Tis for thy sake, sweet wife: who would think so lusty an old woman, with reasonable good teeth, and her tongue in as perfect use as ever it was, should be so near her time?—but the Fates will have it so.

Aga. What's the matter, man? you do amaze me.

Gnoth. Thou art not sick neither, I warrant thee.

Aga. Not that I know of, sure.

Gnoth. What pity 'tis a woman should be so near her end, and yet not sick!

Aga. Near her end, man! tush, I can guess at that; I have years good yet of life in the remainder: I want two yet at least of the full number; Then the law, I know, craves impotent and useless, And not the able women.

Gnoth. Ay, alas! I see thou hast been repairing time as well as thou couldst; the old wrinkles are well filled up, but the vermilion is seen too thick, too thick—and I read what's written in thy forehead; it agrees with the church-book.

Aga. Have you sought my age, man? and, I prithee, how is it?

Gnoth. I shall but discomfort thee.

Aga. Not at all, man; when there's no remedy, I will go, though unwillingly.

Gnoth. 1539. Just; it agrees with the book: you have about a year to prepare yourself.

Aga. Out, alas! I hope there's more than so. But do you not think a reprieve might be gotten for half a score—and 'twere but five years, I would not care? an able woman, methinks, were to be pitied.

Gnoth. Ay, to be pitied, but not helped; no hope of that: for, indeed, women have so blemished their own reputations now-a-days, that it is thought the law will meet them at fifty very shortly.

Aga. Marry, the heavens forbid!

Gnoth. There's so many of you, that, when you are old, become witches; some profess physic, and kill good subjects faster than a burning fever . . . ; for these and such causes 'tis thought they shall not live above fifty.

Aga. Ay, man, but this hurts not the good old women.

Gnoth. I' faith, you are so like one another, that a man cannot distinguish 'em: now, were I an old woman, I would desire to go before my time, and offer myself willingly, two or three years before. O, those are brave women, and worthy to be commended of all men in the world, that, when their husbands die, they run to be burnt to death with 'em: there's honour and credit! give me half a dozen such wives.

Aga. Ay, if her husband were dead before, 'twere a reasonable request; if you were dead, I could be content to be so.

Gnoth. Fie! that's not likely, for thou hadst two husbands before me.

Aga. Thou wouldst not have me die, wouldst thou, husband?

Gnoth. No, I do not speak to that purpose; but I say what credit it were for me and thee, if thou wouldst; then thou shouldst never be suspected for a witch, a physician, a bawd, or any of those things: and then how daintily should I mourn for thee, how bravely should I see thee buried! when, alas, if he goes before, it cannot choose but be a great grief to him to think he has not seen his wife well buried. There be such virtuous women in the world, but too few, too few, who desire to die seven years before their time, with all their hearts.

Aga. I have not the heart to be of that mind; but, indeed, husband, I think you would have me gone.

Gnoth. No, alas! I speak but for your good and your credit; for when a woman may die quickly, why should she go to law for her death? Alack, I need not wish thee gone, for thou hast but a short time to stay with me: you do not know how near 'tis,—it must out; you have but a month to live by the law.

Aga. Out, alas!

Gnoth. Nay, scarce so much.

Aga. O, O, O, my heart!

[Swoons.]

Gnoth. Ay, so! if thou wouldst go away quietly, 'twere sweetly done, and like a kind wife; lie but a little longer, and the bell shall toll for thee.

Aga. O my heart, but a month to live!

Gnoth. Alas, why wouldst thou come back again for a month?—I'll throw her down again—O, woman, 'tis not three weeks; I think a fortnight is the most.

Aga. Nay, then I am gone already.

[Swoons.]

Gnoth. I would make haste to the sexton now, but I'm afraid the tolling of the bell will wake her again. If she be so wise as to go now—she stirs again; there's two lives of the nine gone.

Aga. O, wouldst thou not help to recover me, husband?

Gnoth. Alas, I could not find in my heart to hold thee by thy nose, or box thy cheeks; it goes against my conscience.

Aga. I will not be thus frightened to my death; I'll search the church-records: a fortnight! 'tis Too little of conscience, I cannot be so near; O time, if thou be'st kind, lend me but a year! [Exit.]

Gnoth. What a spite's this, that a man cannot persuade his wife to die in any time with her good will! I have another bespoke already; though a piece of old beef will serve to breakfast, yet a man would be glad of a chicken to supper. The clerk, I hope, understands no Hebrew, and cannot write backward what he hath writ forward already, and then I am well enough.

'Tis but a month at most; if that were gone,

My venture comes in with her two for one:

'Tis use enough a' conscience for a broker—if he had a conscience. [Exit.]

Jack of the clock-house, the figure that struck the clock-bell; Scirophorion and Hecatombaion are Greek names of the months, pedantically and absurdly introduced by the clerk; coats are court cards; The End of Serving Men is the title of an old ballad; passionately is sorrowfully; bravely here is finely.

John Ford.

The last great romantic tragedy of the seventeenth century is The Broken Heart. This is the masterpiece of John Ford, a poet born twenty-two years later than Shakespeare, and detained, by some condition, the nature of which escapes us, from devoting himself to the stage until after that playwright's death. In another dramatist, Shirley, we shall presently see the splendour of Elizabethan poetry descend into weakness and incoherency; but this is not what we are called upon to witness in Ford. He, in his finest plays, and pre-eminently in the Broken Heart, reminds us less of the more glowing characteristics of the English school than of other dramatic literatures—that of Greece in the past, that of France in the immediate future. We must emphasise that severity, we might almost say that rigidity, which distinguishes Ford from all other English dramatists, and draws him nearer to Corneille and Rotrou in their devotion to dramatic discipline.

John Ford was baptised at Ilsington, near Ashburton, in South Devon, on the 17th of April 1586. He was admitted to the Middle Temple in 1602, and he was probably the John Ford who had matriculated at Exeter College, Oxford, early in 1601. In 1606, being twenty years of age, Ford published a collection of elegies on the Earl of Devonshire, which he entitled Fame's Memorial; in the same year appeared a masque, Honor Triumphant. These unimportant tracts are all that we possess of the youth of Ford; and his long subsequent silence has never been explained. It has been suggested that some of his lost plays, particularly A Murder of the Son upon the Mother (in which he assisted Webster) and The Fairy Knight (with Dekker), may have been earlier than 1620, the date of his philosophical treatise, A Line of Life; but there is no proof of this. Ford reappears in 1624, when The Sun's Darling, a masque he had written with Dekker, was acted at the Cockpit. Soon after this date, it is probable, he took up the profession of a playwright in earnest. The Witch of Edmonton, a play by many hands, and his among the rest, belongs to this period, but was not printed until 1658.

We cannot be sure that we trace the hand of Ford in any independent work of importance until he is between forty and fifty years of age. His tragic comedy of The Lover's Melancholy was acted in 1628 and published in 1629. These three great tragedies, 'Tis Pity, the Broken Heart, and Love's Sacrifice, belong to 1633, and Perkin Warbeck to 1634. The Fancies Chaste and Noble was printed in 1638, and The Lady's Trial in 1639. Ford's later works, a tragedy called Beauty in a Trance (1653), and three comedies were in existence until the eighteenth century, when they were burned, with so much else of irreparable value, by Warburton's infamous housekeeper. Ford took the anagram 'Fide Honor' as a sort of armorial symbol, and these words generally appear on his title-pages. Very little else is known of this poet, who appears to have led a retired life.

Deep in a dump John Ford was alone got,
With folded arms and melancholy hat.

When Jonson died, in 1637, Ford contributed a poem of the Jonsonus Virbius, and he wrote commendatory verses for Shirley's Wedding. These trifles exhaust what is known of the personal history of Ford, who may have died at any time between 1640 and 1660; the probable date is 1656. He would then be seventy years of age.

Charles Lamb, who was the earliest critic to perceive the value of Ford, boldly said that he 'was of the first order of poets.' But this generous praise may easily produce disappointment in those who pass from it to the writings of Ford. He is austere, dry, monotonous; weighty with sustained intellectual and moral passion; deprived of the music and fancy and changing play of graceful ornament which are the gala-robes of the great, popular poets. Ford is a curiously isolated figure, not supple, not various, but always furiously bent, like a stern charioteer, in one unaltered attitude, as he streams along upon the storm of violent emotion. Hence to those who seek for beauty in poetry, Ford has it to offer only in its most sombre and lurid varieties; and even the precision of his thought and the purity of his style are not to every taste. His highest performance in direct poetry is, doubtless, the episode of the nightingale and the lutanist, in the romantic comedy of the Lover's Melancholy, which should be compared with Crashaw's study on the same theme (page 678).

The play which deals with the ardours and agonies of Giovanni and Annabella is one of the most characteristic, if least pleasing, productions of the age. Here the suppressed horror which is so dear to the Elizabethan dramatists lights up the hollows of the human spirit in a way that is matchless for subtlety and intensity. The last scene in which the brother and sister appear is of the highest magnificence as tragedy, and has been justly praised by Swinburne as the finest in Ford. Their subject, however, was so repulsive that neither to this great play nor to the less skilful Love's Sacrifice can full justice ever be done. It is natural to turn to more normal scenes in the correct but rather cold chronicle-play of Perkin Warbeck, or even to Ford's three graceful but somewhat ineffective comedies. But the real field for the unbiassed study of Ford's qualities is the incomparable tragedy of the Broken Heart, which remains to us as one of the purest monuments of seventeenth-century poetry. It is this play on which the attention of the general reader may with most safety be concentrated.

There is no play, then, in the English language which gives the impression of a fine French tragedy so completely as the Broken Heart, with its exact preservation of the unities, its serried action, its observance of the point of honour, its rapid and ingenious evolution of exalted intrigue. Were it not for the dates, we could hardly account this accidental, but the latest possible year of composition for Ford's play is 1633, when Corneille had not finished composing Clitandre, the earliest of his tragedies. Yet the reader should none the less be prepared for a performance more in the French than in the English taste, and for a piece perhaps the most 'classic' in our repertory. Individual beauties, gushes of exquisite lyrical extravagance, are not in Ford's way. The construction with him is not less solid than it is subtle, and it is the concentrated subtilty on which the solidity is built. Racine might have envied the skill with which, from the very first, the fate of Ithocles and Calantha, apparently so secure and so fortunate, flutters in the closed hand of Orgilus. His revenge has a quiet resolution which is absolutely demoniac, and it moves, as a stage-passion should, in full sight of the audience, though unsuspected by the other characters.

The extreme consistency of Ithocles and Orgilus, as creations, throws into a certain disadvantage the more dimly-outlined Penthea and Calantha. When Ithocles dies there is a crisis in the plot so violent that we recover from it with difficulty. Penthea is dead and Orgilus assuaged; all the burden of the fifth act falls upon Calantha, whose part has hitherto been a vaguely passive one. The revelation of her ardent love for Ithocles, hitherto so modestly repressed, reawakens our sympathy, and the extraordinary merit of the fifth act consists in its revival, through the multiform passion of Calantha, of our interest in the dead Ithocles and Penthea, so that to the very last our emotions are centred on the beautiful, remorseful figure of Ithocles, for whom the play was certainly composed, and whose one error, followed though it be by a thousand excellent resolves, shatters the whole complicated structure of hope and happiness.

From 'The Broken Heart.'

Calantha. Being alone, Penthea, you have granted
The opportunity you sought, and might
At all times have commanded.

Penthea. 'Tis a benefit
Which I shall owe your goodness even in death for :
My glass of life, sweet princess, hath few minutes
Remaining to run down ; the sands are spent ;
For by an inward messenger I feel
The summons of departure short and certain.

Cal. You feed too much your melancholy.

Pen. Glories
Of human greatness are but pleasing dreams
And shadows soon decaying : on the stage
Of my mortality my youth hath acted
Some scenes of vanity, drawn out at length
By varied pleasures, sweetened in the mixture,
But tragical in issue : beauty, pomp,
With every sensuality our giddiness
Doth frame an idol, are unconstant friends,
When any troubled passion makes assault

On the unguarded castle of the mind.

Cal. Contemn not your condition for the proof
Of bare opinion only : to what end
Reach all these moral texts ?

Pen. To place before ye
A perfect mirror, wherein you may see
How weary I am of a lingering life,
Who count the best a misery.

Cal. Indeed
You have no little cause ; yet none so great
As to distrust a remedy.

Pen. That remedy
Must be a winding-sheet, a fold of lead,
And some untrod-on corner in the earth.—
Not to detain your expectation, princess,
I have an humble suit.

Cal. Speak ; I enjoy it.

Pen. Vouchsafe, then, to be my executrix,
And take that trouble on ye to dispose
Such legacies as I bequeath impartially ;
I have not much to give, the pains are easy ;
Heaven will reward your piety, and thank it
When I am dead ; for sure I must not live ;
I hope I cannot.

Cal. Now, beshrew thy sadness,
Thou turn'st me too much woman.

Pen. [aside] Her fair eyes
Melt into passion.—Then I have assurance Encouraging my boldness. In this paper
My will was characterized ; which you, with pardon,
Shall now know from mine own mouth.

Cal. Talk on, prithee ;
It is a pretty earnest.

Pen. I have left me
But three poor jewels to bequeath. The first is My youth ; for though I am much old in griefs,
In years I am a child.

Cal. To whom that jewel ?

Pen. To virgin-wives, such as abuse not wedlock
By freedom of desires, but covet chiefly
The pledges of chaste beds for ties of love,
Rather than ranging of their blood ; and next
To married maids, such as prefer the number
Of honourable issue in their virtues
Before the flattery of delights by marriage :
May those be ever young !

Cal. A second jewel
You mean to part with ?

Pen. 'Tis my fame, I trust
By scandal yet untouched : this I bequeath
To Memory, and Time's old daughter, Truth.
If ever my unhappy name find mention
When I am fallen to dust, may it deserve
Beseeeming charity without dishonour !

Cal. How handsomely thou play'st with harmless sport
Of mere imagination ! speak the last.
I strangely like thy will.

Pen. This jewel, madam,
Is dearly precious to me ; you must use
The best of your discretion to employ
This gift as I intend it.

Cal. Do not doubt me.

Pen. 'Tis long ago since first I lost my heart :
Long I have lived without it, else for certain
I should have given that too ; but instead
Of it, to great Calantha, Sparta's heir,

By service bound and by affection vow'd,
I do bequeath, in holiest rites of love,
Mine only brother, Ithocles.

Cal. What saidst thou?

Pen. Impute not, heaven-blest lady, to ambition
A faith as humbly perfect as the prayers
Of a devoted suppliant can endow it :
Look on him, princess, with an eye of pity ;
How like the ghost of what he late appeared
He moves before you.

Cal. Shall I answer here,
Or lend my ear too grossly?

Pen. First his heart
Shall fall in cinders, scorched by your disdain,
Ere he will dare, poor man, to ope an eye
On these divine looks, but with low-bent thoughts
Accusing such presumption ; as for words,
He dares not utter any but of service :
Yet this lost creature loves ye.—Be a princess
In sweetness as in blood ; give him his doom,
Or raise him up to comfort.

Cal. What new change
Appears in my behaviour that thou dar'st
Tempt my displeasure?

Pen. I must leave the world,
To revel in Elysium, and 'tis just
To wish my brother some advantage here ;
Yet by my best hopes, Ithocles is ignorant
Of this pursuit : but if you please to kill him,
Lend him one angry look or one harsh word,
And you shall soon conclude how strong a power
Your absolute authority holds over
His life and end.

Cal. You have forgot, Penthea,
How still I have a father.

Pen. But remember
I am a sister, though to me this brother
Hath been, you know, unkind, O, most unkind !

Cal. Christalla, Philema, where are ye?—Lady,
Your check lies in my silence.

(From Act III. sc. v.)

Song from 'The Broken Heart.'

Glories, pleasures, pomps, delights and ease,
Can but please
Outward senses, when the mind
Is untroubled, or by peace refin'd.
Crowns may flourish and decay,
Beauties shine, but fade away.
Youth may revel, yet it must
Lie down in a bed of dust.
Earthly honours flow and waste,
Time alone doth change and last.
Sorrows mingled with contents prepare
Rest for care.
Love only reigns in death ; though art
Can find no comfort for a Broken Heart.

From 'The Lover's Melancholy.'

Menaphon. Passing from Italy to Greece, the tales
Which poets of an elder time have feigned
To glorify their Tempe, bred in me
Desire of visiting that paradise.
To Thessaly I came ; and living private,
Without acquaintance of more sweet companions
Than the old inmates to my love, my thoughts,
I day by day frequented silent groves
And solitary walks. One morning early

This accident encountered me : I heard
The sweetest and most ravishing contention
That art and nature ever were at strife in.

Amethus. I cannot yet conceive what you infer
By art and nature.

Men. I shall soon resolve ye.
A sound of music touched mine ears, or rather Indeed entranced my soul. As I stole nearer,
Invited by the melody, I saw
This youth, this fair-faced youth, upon his lute,
With strains of strange variety and harmony,
Proclaiming, as it seemed, so bold a challenge
To the clear quiristers of the woods, the birds,
That, as they flocked about him, all stood silent,
Wondering at what they heard. I wondered too.

Amet. And so do I ; good, on !

Men. A nightingale,
Nature's best-skilled musician, undertakes
The challenge, and for every several strain
The well-shaped youth could touch, she sung her own ;
He could not run division with more art
Upon his quaking instrument than she,
The nightingale, did with her various notes
Reply to : for a voice and for a sound,
Amethus, 'tis much easier to believe
That such they were than hope to hear again.

Amet. How did the rivals part?

Men. You term them rightly ;
For they were rivals, and their mistress, harmony.—
Some time thus spent, the young man grew at last
Into a pretty anger, that a bird
Whom art had never taught cliffs, moods, or notes,
Should vie with him for mastery, whose study
Had busied many hours to perfect practice :
To end the controversy, in a rapture
Upon his instrument he plays so swiftly,
So many voluntaries and so quick,
That there was curiosity and cunning,
Concord in discord, lines of differing method
Meeting in one full centre of delight.

Amet. Now for the bird.

Men. The bird, ordained to be Music's first martyr, strove to imitate
These several sounds ; which when her warbling throat
Failed in, for grief down dropped she on his lute,
And brake her heart. It was the quaintest sadness,
To see the conqueror upon her hearse
To weep a funeral elegy of tears ;
That, trust me, my Amethus, I could chide
Mine own unmanly weakness, that made me
A fellow-mourner with him.

Amet. I believe thee.

Men. He looked upon the trophies of his art,
Then sighed, then wiped his eyes, then sighed and cried,
'Alas, poor creature ! I will soon revenge
This cruelty upon the author of it ;
Henceforth this lute, guilty of innocent blood,
Shall never more betray a harmless peace
To an untimely end : ' and in that sorrow,
As he was pashing it against a tree,
I suddenly stepped in.

Amet. Thou hast discoursed
A truth of mirth and pity.

EDMUND GOSSE.

James Shirley.

It has long been one of the commonplaces of literary history that the great series of Elizabethan and Jacobean dramatists, which began with Marlowe, closed with Shirley. He was the youngest of them all, having been born on the 18th of September 1596—after the death, that is, of almost all the members of the pre-Shakespearean generation. It is thought that Shirley's birthplace was the parish of St Mary Woolchurch, in the city of London. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and at St John's College, Oxford, where he attracted the attention of Laud, who was then Master. Laud was very kind to Shirley, but dissuaded him from taking holy orders on account of a large wen which disfigured his left cheek. This affliction, greatly softened down, is yet perceptible in the Bodleian portrait. As early as 1618 Shirley published a poem, Echo, or the Unfortunate Lovers, of which no copy is now known to exist. It was probably, however, identical with the Narcissus printed in 1646, and if so, was one of the sensuous and philosophical narratives fashionable at that time, of which Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis is the most celebrated example. In this graceful exercise Shirley displays the influence of Marlowe and of Beaumont.

As was not unusual in the seventeenth century, Shirley transferred himself from one university to the other; 'he did spend some precious years at Catherine Hall,' Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1617. In 1618 he was promised the mastership of the Grammar-school at St Albans, where he spent his first years of married life, but apparently (see 'Some New Facts about Shirley,' by A. C. Baugh, in the Modern Language Review, July 1922) he held the post only from 1620 to 1624. Tradition has it he had to abandon his scholastic career through turning Roman Catholic. By 1625 he was settled in London, soon taking a prominent part in the literary life of the capital.

In his twenty-ninth year Shirley took seriously to the stage, doubtless as the only mode of making a livelihood open to him. His first play, Love Tricks, was licensed in February 1625, but was not printed until 1631, when it passed through the press as The School of Compliment. It was very popular, although, to a modern judgment, it seems weak both from a literary and a theatrical point of view. It imitates Shakespeare and Fletcher in the pastoral scenes, and has no particular individuality. Yet the style, fluent, urbane, and correct, is that which was to characterise Shirley throughout his long career. The first of Shirley's published plays, his comedy of The Wedding, 1629, has more merit of construction, and The Grateful Servant, 1630, placed the poet high among the dwindling band of dramatists who still kept up something of the great Elizabethan tradition. Of these survivors, Marston, Heywood, Chapman, and Dekker had long been silent, and the only serious rivals whom the new poet had to encounter were Ben Jonson, Massinger, and Ford.

Gracious and gentle, Shirley counted among his friends Ford, Massinger, Randolph, Stanley, and Thomas May. He now took to the composition of tragedies and masques. (The Triumph of Peace, 1633, was especially successful. Another masque, Cupid and Death, 1653, was revived with contemporary music at Glastonbury Festival in 1919.) The earliest tragedy may have been The Traitor (1631; published in 1635). He then turned back to the romantic comedies which best suited his talent. From 1631 to 1635 Shirley produced twelve consecutive comedies, closing with what is his finest work in this class, the admirable Lady of Pleasure. Shirley had by this time gained a high reputation for the modesty of his writings, and in July 1633, when registering The Young Admiral, the Master of the Revels volunteered a testimonial to that effect, in which Shirley was encouraged 'to pursue this beneficial and cleanly way of poetry.' Charles I. said that The Gamester, which was acted in 1633, was 'the best play he had seen for seven years.'

It is believed that Shirley went over to Dublin in the early part of 1636 to help Ogilby in working the new theatre which had been built in Werburgh Street. He seems to have remained in Ireland until 1639 or the beginning of 1640. Among the plays which he produced in Dublin, St Patrick for Ireland is the most original, or at least the most eccentric; the extremely self-contained dramatist appears on this one occasion to kick over the traces of a studied sobriety. Among the Irish plays, The Royal Master and The Humorous Courtier deserve special mention. Between Shirley's return from Dublin to London and the first ordinance for the suppression of stage plays, he was the foremost playwright in England, and is believed in this short time to have produced ten dramas. Of these last plays, The Cardinal is the best. Shirley, who was a pronounced Royalist, and had been valet of the chamber to Queen Henrietta Maria, lost all at the Rebellion. After the battle of Marston Moor he accompanied to France the Duke of Newcastle, whom he had aided in poetical composition; but he presently crept back to England, where Thomas Stanley protected him. He went back to his old trade of education, and started a successful school in Whitefriars. In 1646 he issued a collection of his poems. It would seem that he did not benefit from the Restoration. In the Great Fire of London, Shirley and his second wife fled from their house near Fleet Street, and, dying of terror and exposure on the same day, were buried in St Giles-in-the-Fields, in one grave, on the 29th of October 1666. We gather that Shirley had suffered from fire before, since his The Grammar War (1635), a didactic production, contains 'A lamentation upon the conflagration of the Muses' habitation.'

In the plays of Shirley, which are curiously uniform in manner, we find grace, melody, and fancy. The violent elements of the great Elizabethan age seem to have been entirely absorbed, and only the gentle and playful ones left. Shirley wrote with pertinacious industry, and, although a great part of his work is probably lost, between forty and fifty of his tragedies, comedies, tragicomedies, pastorals, and masques have come down to us. In this mass of writing—produced between 1625 and 1655, while English poetry was being subjected to a rapid and surprising transformation—there are no signs of change. From The Wedding to The Sisters, Shirley remains exactly the same suave, sweet-tongued, and florid poet, although the England of Shakespeare was shortly to become the England of Dryden. The plays of Shirley seem to have been popular on the stage, at all events in the early part of his career, and if we are inclined to consider them loosely constructed and thinly conceived in comparison with those of the great playwrights of the preceding generation, we have only to turn from them to those of his immediate contemporaries—such as Cartwright, Brome, and Jasper Mayne—to see that Shirley preserved far more than any other Commonwealth man the practical tradition of the stage. Of his comedies, the Witty Fair One and the Lady of Pleasure display his ornate and profuse fancy to the greatest advantage. In the Traitor he comes nearest to being a fine tragedian.

From 'The Traitor.'

Amidea. I have done ; pray be not angry,
That still I wish you well : may heaven divert
All harms that threaten you ; full blessings crown
Your marriage ! I hope there is no sin in this ;
Indeed I cannot choose but pray for you.
This might have been my wedding-day—

Oriana. Good heaven,

I would it were ! my heart can tell, I take
No joy in being his bride, none in your prayers ;
You shall have my consent to have him still :
I will resign my place, and wait on you,
If you will marry him.

Ami. Pray do not mock me,
But if you do, I can forgive you too.

Ori. Dear Amidea, do not think I mock
Your sorrow ; by these tears, that are not worn
By every virgin on her wedding-day,
I am compell'd to give away myself :
Your hearts were promis'd, but he ne'er had mine.
Am not I wretched too ?

Ami. Alas, poor maid !
We too keep sorrow alive then ; but I prithee,
When thou art married, love him, prithee love him,
For he esteems thee well ; and once a day
Give him a kiss for me ; but do not tell him
'Twas my desire : perhaps 'twill fetch a sigh
From him, and I had rather break my heart.
But one word more, and heaven be with you all.—
Since you have led the way, I hope, my lord,
That I am free to marry too ?

Pisano. Thou art.

Ami. Let me beseech you then, to be so kind,

After your own solemnities are done,
To grace my wedding ; I shall be married shortly.

Pis. To whom ?

Ami. To one whom you have all heard talk of,
Your fathers knew him well : one who will never Give cause I should suspect him to forsake me ;
A constant lover, one whose lips, though cold,
Distil chaste kisses : though our bridal bed
Be not adorn'd with roses, 'twill be green ;
We shall have virgin laurel, cypress, yew,
To make us garlands ; though no pine do burn,
Our nuptial shall have torches, and our chamber
Shall be cut out of marble, where we 'll sleep,
Free from all care for ever : Death, my lord,
I hope, shall be my husband. Now, farewell ;
Although no kiss, accept my parting tear,
And give me leave to wear my willow here.

(From Act IV. sc. ii.)

Song from 'The Imposture.'

You virgins, that did late despair
To keep your wealth from cruel men,
Tie up in silk your careless hair,
Soft peace is come agen.

Now lovers' eyes may gently shoot
A flame that will not kill ;
The drum was angry, but the lute
Shall whisper what you will.

Sing Io, Io ! for his sake,
Who hath restor'd your drooping heads ;
With choice of sweetest flowers, make
A garden where he treads :

Whilst we whole groves of laurel bring,
A petty triumph to his brow,
Who is the master of our spring,
And all the bloom we owe.

(From Act I. sc. ii.)

From 'The Lady of Pleasure.'

Steward. Be patient, madam ; you may have your pleasure.

Lady Bornwell. 'Tis that I came to town for. I would not Endure again the country conversation,
To be the lady of six shires ! The men,
So near the primitive making, they retain
A sense of nothing but the earth ; their brains,
And barren heads standing as much in want
Of ploughing as their ground. To hear a fellow
Make himself merry and his horse, with whistling
Sellinger's Round ! To observe with what solemnity
They keep their wakes, and throw for pewter candlesticks !

How they become the Morris, with whose bells
They ring all in to Whitsun-ales ; and sweat,
Through twenty scarfs and napkins, till the Hobbyhorse
Tire, and the Maid Marian, dissolv'd to a jelly,
Be kept for spoon meat !

Stew. These, with your pardon, are no argument
To make the country life appear so hateful ;
At least to your particular, who enjoy'd
A blessing in that calm, would you be pleas'd
To think so, and the pleasure of a kingdom ;
While your own will commanded what should move
Delights, your husband's love and power join'd

To give your life more harmony. You liv'd there
Secure, and innocent, beloved of all ;
Prais'd for your hospitality, and pray'd for :
You might be envied ; but malice knew
Not where you dwelt. I would not prophesy,
But leave to your own apprehension,
What may succeed your change.

Lady B. You do imagine,
No doubt, you have talk'd wisely, and confuted
London past all defence. Your master should
Do well to send you back into the country,
With title of superintendent-bailiff.

[Enter Sir Thomas Bornwell.]

Bornwell. How now? What's the matter?

Stew. Nothing, sir.

Born. Angry, sweetheart?

Lady B. I am angry with myself,
To be so miserably restrain'd in things,
Wherein it doth concern your love and honour
To see me satisfied.

Born. In what, Aretina,
Dost thou accuse me? Have I not obey'd
All thy desires? against mine own opinion
Quitted the country, and removed the hope
Of our return, by sale of that fair lordship
We lived in? changed a calm and retired life
For this wild town, compos'd of noise and charge?

Lady B. What charge, more than is necessary for
A lady of my birth and education?

Born. I am not ignorant how much nobility
Flows in your blood ; your kinsmen great and powerful
I' the state ; but with this, lose not you [the] memory
Of being my wife. I shall be studious,
Madam, to give the dignity of your birth
All the best ornaments which become my fortune ;
But would not flatter it, to ruin both,
And be the fable of the town, to teach
Other men loss of wit by mine, employ'd
To serve your vast expenses.

Lady B. Am I then
Brought in the balance? So, sir!

Born. Though you weigh
Me in a partial scale, my heart is honest,
And must take liberty to think you have Obey'd no modest counsel, to affect,
Nay, study ways of pride and costly ceremony :
Your change of gaudy furniture, and pictures
Of this Italian master, and that Dutchman ;
Your mighty looking-glasses, like artillery,
Brought home on engines ; the superfluous plate,
Antique and novel ; vanities of tires ;
Fourscore-pound suppers for my lord, your kinsman,
Banquets for t' other lady aunt, and cousins,
And perfumes that exceed all : train of servants,
To stifle us at home, and shew abroad
More motley than the French or the Venetian,
About your coach, whose rude postillion
Must pester every narrow lane, till passengers
And tradesmen curse your choking up their stalls ;
And common cries pursue your ladyship,
For hindering of their market.

Lady B. Have you done, sir?

Born. I could accuse the gaiety of your wardrobe,
And prodigal embroideries, under which Rich satins, plushes, cloth of silver, dare
Not shew their own complexions ; your jewels,

Able to burn out the spectators' eyes,
And shew like bonfires on you by the tapers :
Something might here be spar'd, with safety of
Your birth and honour, since the truest wealth
Shines from the soul, and draws up just admirers.—
I could urge something more.

Lady B. Pray do, I like
Your homily of thrift.

Born. I could wish, madam,
You would not game so much.

Lady B. A gamester too!

Born. But are not come to that acquaintance yet,
Should teach you skill enough to raise your profit.
You look not through the subtilty of cards,
And mysteries of dice ; nor can you save
Charge with the box, buy petticoats and pearls,
And keep your family by the precious income ;
Nor do I wish you should : my poorest servant
Shall not upbraid my tables, nor his hire,
Purchas'd beneath my honour. You make play
Not a pastime but a tyranny, and vex
Yourself and my estate by it.

Lady B. Good! proceed.

Born. Another game you have, which consumes more
Your fame than purse ; your revels in the night,
Your meetings call'd THE BALL, to which repair,
As to the court of pleasure, all your gallants,
And ladies, thither bound by a subpoena
Of Venus, and small Cupid's high displeasure ;
'Tis but the Family of Love translated
Into more costly sin! There was a PLAY on 't,
And had the poet not been bribed to a modest
Expression of your antic gambols in 't,
Some darks had been discover'd, and the deeds too :
In time he may repent, and make some blush,
To see the second part danced on the stage.
My thoughts acquit you for dishonouring me
By any foul act ; but the virtuous know
'Tis not enough to clear ourselves, but the Suspensions of our shame.

Lady B. Have you concluded
Your lecture?

Born. I have done ; and howsoever
My language may appear to you, it carries
No other than my fair and just intent
To your delights, without curb to their modest
And noble freedom.

Sellinger's Round was a dance called after an actor named St Leger. To throw is here said of cock-throwing, an old Shrovetide pastime—the prize in this case being candlesticks. Robin Hood, Maid Marian, the hobby-horse, and the fool, all in more or less fantastic costumes, were the principal performers in the Old English May-day Morris-dances.

In The Ball, a comedy partly by Chapman, but chiefly by Shirley, a coxcomb (Bostock), crazed on the point of family, is admirably shown up. Sir Marmaduke Travers, by way of fooling him, tells him that he is rivalled in his suit of a particular lady by Sir Ambrose Lamount :

Bostock. Does she love any body else?

Travers. I know not,
But she has half a score, upon my knowledge,
Are suitors for her favour.

Bos. Name but one,
And if he cannot shew as many coats—

Trav. He thinks he has good cards for her, and likes His game well.

Bos. Be an understanding knight,
And take my meaning ; if he cannot shew
As much in heraldry—

Trav. I do not know how rich he is in fields,
But he is a gentleman.

Bos. Is he a branch of the nobility?
How many lords can he call cousin? else
He must be taught to know he has presumed,
To stand in competition with me.

Trav. You will not kill him?

Bos. You shall pardon me,
I have that within me must not be provok'd ;
There be some living now, that have been kill'd
For lesser matters.

Trav. Some living that have been kill'd !

Bos. I mean, some living that have been examples,
Not to confront nobility ; and I
Am sensible of my honour.

Trav. His name is
Sir Ambrose—

Bos. Lamount, a knight of yesterday !
And he shall die to-morrow ; name another.

Trav. Not so fast, sir, you must take some breath.

Bos. I care no more for killing half a dozen
Knights of the lower house, I mean that are not Descended from nobility, than I do
To kick my footman : an Sir Ambrose were
Knight of the sun, king Oberon should not save him,
Nor his queen Mab. [Enter Sir Ambrose Lamount.]

Trav. Unluckily he's here, sir.

Bos. Sir Ambrose,
How does thy knighthood, ha?

Lamount. My imp of honour ! well ; I joy to see thee.

Bos. Sir Marmaduke tells me thou art suitor to Lady Lucina.

Lam. I have ambition
To be her servant.

Bos. Hast?
Thou'rt a brave knight, and I commend thy judgment.

Lam. Sir Marmaduke himself leans that way too.

Bos. Why did'st conceal it? come, the more the merrier ;
But I could never see you there.

Trav. I hope,
Sir, we may live?

Bos. I'll tell you, gentlemen,
Cupid has given us all one livery ;
I serve that lady too, you understand me,
But who shall carry her, the Fates determine ;
I could be knighted too.

Lam. That would be no addition to your blood.

Bos. I think it would not ; so my lord told me.
Thou know'st my lord, not the earl, my t'other
Cousin? there's a spark!—his predecessors
Have match'd into the blood ; you understand :
He put me upon this lady, I proclaim
No hopes ; pray let's together, gentlemen ;—
If she be wise,—I say no more ; she shall not Cost me a sigh, nor shall her love engage me
To draw a sword, I have vow'd that.

Trav. You did
But jest before.

Lam. 'Twere pity that one drop
Of your heroic blood should fall to the ground :

Who knows but all your cousin lords may die?

Bos. As I believe them not immortal, sir.

Lam. Then you are gulf of honour, swallow all ;—
May marry some queen yourself, and get princes,
To furnish the barren parts of christendom.

The following lyric is found in Shirley's masque,
The Contention of Ajax and Ulysses (1659).

Death's Final Conquest.

The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things ;
There is no armour against fate ;
Death lays his icy hand on kings :
Scepter and crown
Must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field,
And plant fresh laurels where they kill ;
But their strong nerves at last must yield ;
They tame but one another still :

Early or late
They stoop to fate,
And must give up their murmuring breath,
When they, pale captives, creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow,
Then boast no more your mighty deeds ;
Upon Death's purple altar now,
See, where the victor-victim bleeds
Your heads must come
To the cold tomb,
Only the actions of the just
Smell sweet, and blossom in their dust.

Gifford and Dyce edited his plays (6 vols. 1833) ; Gosse edited a selection ('Mermaid,' 1888). See Swinburne's Contemporaries of Shakespeare (1919), and studies by R. S. Forsythe (1915), A. H. Nason (1915), Nissen (Hamburg, 1901), Gärtner (Halle, 1904), Schipper (Vienna, 1911).

EDMUND GOSSE.

Minor Dramatists.—Thomas Nabbes (died about 1645) wrote poor tragedies, tolerable comedies, and rather good masques. Microcosmus and Spring's Glory are the best-known masques. Some of his miscellaneous poems are good. A. H. Bullen published his works (except his prose continuation of Knolles's Historie of the Turkes) in his Old English Plays (1887).—Nathaniel Field (1587–1633) was a well-known actor who began to write for the stage about 1610, and produced A Woman is a Weathercock, Amends for Ladies, &c. He had the honour of being associated with Massinger in the composition of the Fatal Dowry.—Henry Glapthorne, at one time reputed 'one of the chiefest dramatic poets of the reign of Charles I.,' is but a minor dramatist though he is fluent and eloquent in style. Five of his plays are printed—Albertus Wallenstein, The Hollander, Argalus and Parthenia (his best effort, being part of the Arcadia dramatised), Wit in a Constable, The Ladies Priviledge (1640). These and his poems were reprinted in two volumes in 1874.—Richard Brome (died about 1652) produced twenty-four popular plays, The Northern Lass, The Jovial Crew, The Antipodes, The City Wit, The Court Beggar, &c., fifteen of which, believed to be written by himself independently, were reprinted in three vols. 1873. He had a share with Dekker in The Lancashire Witches. He was at one time servant to Ben Jonson. A skilful, successful craftsman, he lacked original power, poetic genius, and literary culture. See Swinburne's Contemporaries of Shakespeare.

Richard Brathwaite, minor poet, was probably born near Kendal in 1588; entered Oriel College, Oxford, in 1604; passed afterwards to Cambridge, and thence to London. In 1611 he published The Golden Fleece, a collection of poems; in 1614 three works, one of them a book of pastorals entitled The Poet's Willow, another The Scholler's Medley; and in 1615 the collection of satires, A Strappado for the Devil, in imitation of The Abuses Whipt and Stript of George Wither, his 'bonnie brother.' Other works are Nature's Embassie, A Solemne Joviall Disputation, The Smoaking Age, The English Gentleman (1630), The English Gentlewoman (1631), Art asleepe, Husband? (a collection of 'bolster lectures,' a seventeenth-century Mrs Caudle). After his first marriage Brathwaite lived the life of a country gentleman in Westmorland, and after his second in Yorkshire. He died near Richmond, 4th May 1673. See M. W. Black's book (1928). Of his thirty books, the Barnabæ Itinerarium, or Barnabee's Journal, published in 1638 under the pseudonym 'Corymbæus,' has been often reprinted as 'Drunken Barnaby's Four Journeys'—a facetious but rather tedious book in rhymed Latin and corresponding doggerel English verse. The best-known verse is:

In my progress travelling northward
Taking farewel of the southward,
To Banbury came I, O profane one!
Where I saw a puritane one
Hanging of his cat on Monday
For killing of a mouse on Sunday.

The Latin being:

In progressu boreali
Ut processi ab australi,
Veni Banbury, O profanum!
Ubi vidi Puritanum
Felem facientem furem,
Quod Sabbatho stravit murem.

The next verse is:

To Oxford came I, whose companion
Is Minerva, well Platonian:
From whose seat do stream most seemly
Aganippe, Hippocrene:
Each thing there's the muse's minion,
The horn at Queen's speaks pure Athenian.

The frequent allusions to strong ale, and to deep drinking and its joys and inconveniences, quite explain the epithet added in the reprints. In the seventh edition (by Haslewood, 1818) its authorship was first made known. See the life prefixed to the ninth edition (1820), and the edition by Thomas (1933).

Brathwaite's work was not all in the same vein. Of 'Drunken Barnaby' there is no trace in The English Gentleman and English Gentlewoman, collectively making a folio of three hundred pages, which is edifying, decorous, and 'high-toned' to a degree, and emulates Burton's Anatomy in the multitude and variety of its citations from Eusebius, Tully, Diogenes Laertius, Plutarch, Augustine, Seneca, St Basil, St Gregory of Nazianzus, Pius de Miranda, and other authorities ancient or comparatively recent. Vanity, foppery, idleness, hot-headedness, and intemperance of any and every kind are wisely and wittily denounced. The corresponding defects in women are deprecated with equal warmth, and an even higher standard of perfect grace, courtesy, and purity established. And so careful is the author for happiness in wedded life that he warns the husband not to busy himself too much in dairying lest the wife be aggrieved at this encroachment on her province. Amorous poetry—including Venus and Adonis, though without giving Shakespeare's name—is sternly denounced. In the chapter called 'A select choice and recommendation of sundry bookes of instruction to the perusal of our English gentlewomen,' the authors recommended are SS. Hierom, Augustine, Ambrose, Hilary, Gregory (on the virtues of women), also Plato, Seneca, Cicero, 'etc.'; with the following postscript, which most unhappily omits to specify the works without which the library of no contemporary English lady was complete:

But for as much as it is not given to most of you to bee Linguists, albeit many of their workes bee translated in your mother tongue, you may converse with sundry English Authors, whose excellent instructions will sufficiently store you in all points, and if usefully applied conferre no small benefit to your understanding. I shall not need particularly to name them to you, because I doubt not but you have made choice of such faithfull Retainers and vertuous Bosome-friends constantly to accompany you.

Hear 'Drunken Barnaby' on the dangers and disgraces of drinking:

Neither onely is restraint to be used in the choice and change of meats, but in the excessive use of drinckes. The reasons are two; the one is, it is an enemy to the knowledge of God; the other is this, it is held to be an enfeeblor or impairer of the memorative parts; for you shall ever note that deepe drinkers have but shallow memories. Their common saying is, Let us drowne care in healths: which drowning of care makes them so forgetfull of themselves, as carried away with a brutish appetite, they onely intend their present delight, without reflexion to what is past, or due preparation to what may succeed. O restraints then this mighty assailant of Temperance! Bee ever your selves; but principally stand upon your guard, when occasion of company shall induce you; being the last we are to speake of.

This Company-keeping, how much it hath depraved the hopefulllest and towardliest wits, daily experience can witnesse. For many wee see civilly affected and temperately disposed, of themselves not subject to those violent or brain-sicke passions which the fumes of drinke beget; till out of a too pliable disposition they enter the lists of Good-fellowship (as they commonly terme it) and so become estranged from their owne nature, to partake with Zanies in their distempered humour. So as in time by consorting with evill men they become exposed to all immoderate affections; such is the strength of custome. Whence it is that Saint Basil saith, Passions rise up in a drunken man (note the violence of this distemper) like a swarme of Bees buzzing on every side. Now you shall see him compassionately passionate, resolving his humour into teares; anon like a phrenticke man, exercising himselfe in blowes; presently, as if a calmer or more peaceable humour had seized on him, he expresseth his loving nature in congies and kisses. So different are the affections which this valiant Mault-worme is subject to; yet howsoever out of a desperate Bravado he binde it with oathes that he will stand on his tackling, he is scarce to be credited, for he can stand on no ground.

William Browne (1591–c.1643) was a pastoral and descriptive poet, who, like Phineas and Giles Fletcher, adopted Spenser for his model, but less exclusively—for he loved Chaucer and Hoccleve, and was influenced by several of his own contemporaries. He was a native of Tavistock, and the beautiful scenery of Devonshire inspired his early strains. From Exeter College, Oxford, Browne passed to the Inner Temple, and then was tutor to Robert Dormer, the future Earl of Carnarvon. According to Anthony Wood, he was taken into the household of the Herberts at Wilton, and ‘there got wealth and purchased an estate.’ He was living at Dorking towards the close of 1643, and later than this we hear nothing of him. A William Browne died at Tavistock in 1643, and another in 1645, but it is not known for certain that either of them was the poet. Browne’s works comprise Britannia’s Pastorals (two books, 1613–16; third book in MS., first printed 1852) and a pastoral poem of inferior merit, The Shepherds Pipe (1614). In 1615 his work, The Inner Temple Masque, was produced in the hall of the Temple; but it was not printed till 1772, from a manuscript in Emmanuel College, Cambridge. As all Browne’s poems were produced before he was thirty years of age, and the best when he was little more than twenty, we need not be surprised at their showing marks of juvenility and frequent echoes of previous poets, especially of Spenser. His pastorals obtained the approbation of Selden, Drayton, Wither, and Ben Jonson. Britannia’s Pastorals are written in flowing heroic couplets, and contain much fine descriptive poetry. Browne had great facility of expression, studied nature closely, and knew by heart all the features of the Devon landscape. That he has failed in maintaining his ground must be attributed to his too great expansiveness, the desultory plan of his longer poems, and the lack of human interest. His shepherds and shepherdesses have nearly as little character as the ‘silly sheep’ they tend; the allegory is tedious; whilst pure description, that ‘takes the place of sense,’ even when inspired by a real love of nature, seldom permanently interests the larger number of readers. So completely had some of the poems of Browne vanished from memory that, but for a single copy of them possessed by Thomas Warton, and lent by him to be transcribed, little would have remained of those works which their author fondly hoped would

Keep his name enroll’d past his that shines
In gilded marble, or in brazen leaves.

Warton cites the following lines of Browne as containing a group of the same images as the morning picture in L’Allegro of Milton:

By this had chanticleer, the village clock,
Bidden the goodwife for her maids to knock;
And the swart ploughman for his breakfast stay’d,
That he might till those lands were fallow laid:
The hills and valleys here and there resound
With the re-echoes of the deep-mouth’d hound.
Each shepherd’s daughter, with her cleanly peal,
Was come afield to milk the morning’s meal,
And ere the sun had climb’d the eastern hills,
To gild the mutt’ring bourns and pretty rills,
Before the lab’ring bee had left the hive,
And nimble fishes which in rivers dive
Began to leap, and catch the drowned fly,
I rose from rest, not in felicity.

Browne celebrated the death of a friend under the name of Philarete in a pastoral poem. Milton took thence suggestions for Lycidas; there is an obvious—perhaps inevitable—similarity in some of the thoughts and images. On the other hand, Browne has been compared with Keats amongst the moderns; and Keats is known to have admired his Elizabethan prototype.

A Descriptive Sketch.

O what a rapture have I gotten now!
That age of gold, this of the lovely brow
Have drawn me from my song! I onward run
Clean from the end to which I first begun.
But ye, the heavenly creatures of the West,
In whom the virtues and the graces rest,
Pardon! that I have run astray so long,
And grow so tedious in so rude a song,
If you yourselves should come to add one grace
Unto a pleasant grove or such like place,
Where here the curious cutting of a hedge:
There, by a pond, the trimming of the sedge:
Here the fine setting of well-shading trees:
The walks there mounting up by small degrees,
The gravel and the green so equal lie,
It, with the rest, draws on your ling’ring eye:
Here the sweet smells that do perfume the air,
Arising from the infinite repair
Of odoriferous buds and herbs of price,
(As if it were another Paradise)
So please the smelling sense, that you are fain
Where last you walk’d to turn and walk again.
There the small birds with their harmonious notes
Sing to a spring that smileth as she floats:
For in her face a many dimples show,
And often skips as it did dancing go:
Here further down an over-arched alley,
That from a hill goes winding in a valley,

You spy at end thereof a standing lake,
 Where some ingenious artist strives to make
 The water (brought in turning pipes of lead
 Through birds of earth most lively fashioned)
 To counterfeit and mock the sylvans all,
 In singing well their own set madrigal.
 This with no small delight retains your ear,
 And makes you think none blest but who live there.
 Then in another place the fruits that be
 In gallant clusters decking each good tree,
 Invite your hand to crop some from the stem,
 And liking one, taste every sort of them :
 Then to the arbours walk, then to the bowers,
 Thence to the walks again, thence to the flowers,
 Then to the birds, and to the clear spring thence,
 Now pleasing one, and then another sense.
 Here one walks oft, and yet anew begin'th,
 As if it were some hidden labyrinth.

Evening.

As in an evening when the gentle air
 Breathes to the sullen night a soft repair,
 I oft have sat on Thames' sweet bank to hear
 My friend with his sweet touch to charm mine ear,
 When he hath play'd, as well he can, some strain
 That likes me, straight I ask the same again ;
 And he as gladly granting, strikes it o'er
 With some sweet relish was forgot before,
 I would have been content if he would play
 In that one strain to pass the night away ;
 But fearing much to do his patience wrong,
 Unwillingly have ask'd some other song :
 So in this diff'ring key, though I could well
 A many hours but as few minutes tell,
 Yet lest mine own delight might injure you,
 Though loath so soon, I take my song anew.

Night.

The sable mantle of the silent night
 Shut from the world the ever-joyesome light ;
 Care fled away, and softest slumbers please
 To leave the court for lowly cottages ;
 Wild beasts forsook their dens on woody hills,
 And sleightful otters left the purling rills ;
 Rooks to their nests in high woods now were flung,
 And with their spread wings shield their naked young ;
 When thieves from thickets to the cross-ways stir,
 And terror frights the lonely passenger ;
 When nought was heard but now and then the howl
 Of some vild cur, or whooping of the owl. vile

The Sirens' Song.

(From The Inner Temple Masque.)

Steer hither, steer, your winged pines,
 All beaten mariners,
 Here lie Love's undiscover'd mines,
 A prey to passengers ;
 Perfumes far sweeter than the best
 Which make the Phoenix' urn and nest.
 Fear not your ships,
 Nor any to oppose you save our lips,
 But come on shore,
 Where no joy dies till love hath gotten more.
 For swelling waves our panting breasts,
 Where never storms arise,
 Exchange ; and be awhile our guests :
 For stars gaze on our eyes.

The compass love shall hourly sing,
 And as he goes about the ring,
 We will not miss
 To tell each point he nameth with a kiss.

Browne thus ingeniously draws illustrations from a rose :

Look as a sweet rose fairly budding forth
 Bewrays her beauties to th' enamour'd morn,
 Until some keen blast from the envious North
 Kills the sweet bud that was but newly born ;
 Or else her rarest smells delighting
 Make her herself betray,
 Some white and curious hand inviting
 To pluck her thence away.

So recently as 1852 a third part of Britannia's Pastorals was first printed, from the original manuscript in the library of Salisbury Cathedral. Though imperfect, this continuation is in some passages fully equal to the earlier portions. The following is part of a description of Psyche :

Her cheekes the wonder of what eye beheld
 Begott betwixt a lilly and a rose,
 In gentle rising plaines devinely swelled,
 Where all the graces and the loves repose.
 Nature in this peece all her workes excelled,
 Yet shewd her selfe imperfect in the close,
 For she forgott (when she soe faire did rayse her)
 To give the world a witt might duely prayse her.

When that she spoake, as at a voice from heaven
 On her sweet words all eares and hearts attended ;
 When that she sung, they thought the planetts seaven
 By her sweet voice might well their tunes have mended ;

When she did sighe, all were of joye bereaven ;
 And when she smyl'd, heaven had them all befriended.
 If that her voice, sighes, smiles, soe many thrilled,
 O had she kissed, how many had she killed !

Her slender fingers (neate and worthy made
 To be the servants to soe much perfection)
 Joyned to a palme whose touch woulde streight invade
 And bring a sturdy heart to lowe subjection.
 Her slender wrists two diamond braceletts lade,
 Made richer by soe sweet a soules election.
 O happy braceletts ! but more happy he
 To whom those armes shall as a bracelett be !

Aubrey said Browne was the author of the famous epitaph, 'Underneath this sable herse,' usually attributed to Ben Jonson (see above at page 411) ; and Bullen, Herford and Simpson, and other critics think it is really Browne's.

Browne's works were edited by T. Davies (1772), W. C. Hazlitt (1868), G. Goodwin (1894) ; and see Prof. Moorman's William Browne and Pastoral Poetry (1897).

Lady Elizabeth Carey, or CAREW, the daughter of a patroness of Spenser, Nash, and other poets, is believed to be the author of a long-winded poem, The Tragedie of Marian the faire Queene of Jewry (1613). She married Sir Thomas Berkeley, and died in 1635. But the poem is sometimes attributed to her mother, known by the same names, a daughter of Sir John Spencer of Althorpe, and wife of the heir of the first Lord Hunsdon. The following chorus on revenge, from Act IV., is not without a certain noble dignity :

The fairest action of our human life
Is scorning to revenge an injury ;
For who forgives without a further strife,
His adversary's heart to him doth tie.
And 'tis a firmer conquest truly said,
To win the heart than overthrow the head.

If we a worthy enemy do find,
To yield to worth it must be nobly done ;
But if of baser metal be his mind,
In base revenge there is no honour won.
Who would a worthy courage overthrow,
And who would wrestle with a worthless foe ?

We say our hearts are great, and cannot yield ;
Because they cannot yield, it proves them poor :
Great hearts are tasked beyond their power, but sold
The weakest lion will the loudest roar.
Truth's school for certain doth this same allow,
High-heartedness doth sometimes teach to bow.

A noble heart doth teach a virtuous scorn.
To scorn to owe a duty over-long ;
To scorn to be for benefits forborne ;
To scorn to lie ; to scorn to do a wrong ;
To scorn to bear an injury in mind ;
To scorn a free-born heart slave-like to bind.

But if for wrongs we needs revenge must have,
Then be our vengeance of the noblest kind ;
Do we his body from our fury save,
And let our hate prevail against our mind ?
What can 'gainst him a greater vengeance be,
Than make his foe more worthy far than he ?

Had Marian scorned to leave a due unpaid,
She would to Herod then have paid her love,
And not have been by sullen passion swayed.
To fix her thoughts all injury above
Is virtuous pride. Had Marian thus been proud,
Long famous life to her had been allowed.

Lord Herbert of Cherbury combined in a curious way the fame of soldier, statesman, poet, and philosopher ; and though the brother of the saintly George Herbert, became notorious (after his death) as the father of deism. Edward was born 3rd March 1583 at Eyton, in Shropshire. In 1599, before he had finally quitted his studies at University College, Oxford, he married an heiress four years older than himself. At James I.'s coronation he was made a Knight of the Bath ; in 1608 he visited France, and in 1610 was at the recapture of Jülich. In 1614 he was with Maurice of Orange, travelled through Germany and Italy, and got into trouble attempting to recruit Protestant soldiers in Languedoc for the Duke of Savoy. Made a member of the Privy Council, he was sent to France as ambassador (1619), and tried negotiation between Louis XIII. and his Protestant subjects in vain, was dismissed, and was sore embarrassed by debts and law-suits. He was in 1624 made a peer of Ireland, and in 1629 of England with the title of Baron Herbert of Cherbury. When the civil war broke out he at first sided very half-heartedly with the royalists, but in 1644 surrendered to the parliamentarians. He died in London, 20th August 1648. His De Veritate (1624) is an anti-empirical theory of knowledge of four principal faculties or groups of faculties. One is the internal sense or conscience ; another the external sense or perception ; the third, reason ; and the fourth, natural instinct, the source of divinely implanted primary truths, much resembles the common-sense of the Scottish philosophy. Truth is distinguished from revelation, from the probable, from the possible, and from the false. His De Religione Gentilium (not published till 1663), destined to be regarded as the 'charter of the deists,' and copied by Blount and others, proves that all religions recognise five main articles—that there is a supreme God, that He ought to be worshipped, that virtue and purity are the main part of that worship, that sins should be repented of, and that there are rewards and punishments in a future state. The Expediatio Buckinghami Ducis (1656) is a vindication of the ill-fated Rochelle expedition. The ill-proportioned Life and Raigne of King Henry VIII. (1649), digested into annals, glorifies Henry absurdly, and is on the whole prolix, though tales of sieges and ceremonials, such as the author's soul delighted in, are rendered with much graphic detail. In giving verbatim reports of speeches whose tenor he could only guess, Herbert allowed himself an ultra-Thucydidean freedom. How little modern historical canons appealed to this sincere and honest man is evident from the fact that he puts into the mouth of one of Henry's bishops, at a council held half a century ere he himself was born, a succinct and orderly statement and defence of those identical 'five articles' which it was Herbert's own especial glory to have formulated ! His Autobiography, a brilliant picture of the man and of contemporary manners, is a masterpiece in its kind, but is disfigured by overweening self-glory. Oddly enough, it is on his exceptionally handsome person, his Quixotic exploits of bravery in the field, his valiant duels, and the admiration accordingly bestowed on him by fair ladies that he chiefly prides himself ; there is little in the record about his philosophy or his theological views, though he really attached great importance to them. He was the friend of Donne, Selden, Ben Jonson, Grotius, and Gassendi. The Poems, Latin and English, reveal a representative of the 'metaphysical' school. Donne was his master, and the disciple is the more rugged and obscure. But some of the lyrics suggest Herrick ; and resemblances to Browning and Tennyson have been pointed out. He has, according to Mr Churton Collins, the credit of having been the first to recognise (though he did not invent the measure ; see Vol. III. p. 120) the possibilities of the stanza of In Memoriam ; he brought out its harmony and 'passed it almost perfect into Tennyson's hands.' The enthusiasm as well as sincerity of his nature is exemplified in the following reference to his philosophy in the Autobiography, and suggests rather one who believes overmuch than the unbeliever—an inconsistency often pointed out by those who assailed his deism as an inadequate system of belief. Herbert's devout deism was of course very different from the profane and spiteful deism of Blount, who put much that was in Herbert to a use he never dreamt of:

Being thus doubtful in my chamber one fine day in the summer, my casement being open towards the south, the sun shining clear, and no wind stirring, I took my book De Veritate in my hands, and kneeling on my knees, devoutly said these words: 'O thou eternal God, author of this light which now shines upon me, and giver of all inward illuminations, I do beseech thee of thy infinite goodness to pardon a greater request than a sinner ought to make. I am not satisfied enough whether I shall publish this book De Veritate; if it be for thy glory, I beseech thee give me some sign from heaven; if not, I shall suppress it!' I had no sooner spoke these words, but a loud, though yet gentle noise came forth from the heavens (for it was like nothing on earth), which did so cheer and comfort me, that I took my petition as granted, and that I had the sign I demanded; whereupon also I resolved to print my book. This, how strange soever it may seem, I protest before the Eternal God is true; neither am I any way superstitiously deceived herein, since I did not only clearly hear the noise, but in the serenest sky I ever saw, being without all cloud, did, to my thinking, see the place from whence it came.

In his Autobiography he tells of the close relations established between himself and the Constable of France, the Duke de Montmorency, and of his hunting in the ducal forests:

That brave constable in France testifying now more than formerly his regard of me, at his departure from Merlou to his fair house at Chantilly, five or six miles distant, said, he left that castle to be commanded by me, as also his forests and chases, which were well stored with wild boar and stag, and that I might hunt them when I pleased. He told me also, that if I would learn to ride the great horse, he had a stable there of some fifty, the best and choicest as was thought in France; and that his escuyer, called Monsieur de Disancour, nor inferior to Pluvenel or Labrove, should teach me. I did with great thankfulness accept his offer, as being very much addicted to the exercise of riding great horses; and as for hunting in his forests, I told him I should use it sparingly, as being desirous to preserve his game. He commanded also his escuyer to keep a table for me, and his pages to attend me, the chief of whom was Monsieur de Mennon, who, proving to be one of the best horsemen in France, keeps now an academy in Paris; and here I shall recount a little passage betwixt him and his master, that the inclination of the French at that time may appear; there being scarce any man thought worth the looking on, that had not killed some other in duel.

Mennon desiring to marry a niece of Monsieur Disancour, who it was thought should be his heir, was thus answered by him: 'Friend, it is not time yet to marry; I will tell you what you must do: if you will be a brave man, you must first kill in single combat two or three men, then afterwards marry and engender two or three children, or the world will neither have got nor lost by you;' of which strange counsel, Disancour was no otherwise the author than as he had been an example, at least of the former part; it being his fortune to have fought three or four brave duels in his time.

And now, as every morning I mounted the great horse, so in the afternoons I many times went a hunting, the manner of which was this: The Duke of Montmorency having given orders to the tenants of the town of Merlou, and some villages adjoining, to attend me when I went a hunting, they, upon my summons, usually repaired to those woods where I intended to find my game, with drums and muskets, to the number of sixty or eighty, and sometimes one hundred or more persons; they entering the wood on that side with that noise, discharging their pieces and beating their said drums, we on the other side of the said wood having placed mastiffs and greyhounds, to the number of twenty or thirty, which Monsieur de Montmorency kept near his castle, expected those beasts they should force out of the wood: if stags or wild boars came forth, we commonly spared them, pursuing only the wolves, which were there in great number, of which are found two sorts; the mastiff wolf, thick and short, though he could not indeed run fast, yet would fight with our dogs; the greyhound wolf, long and swift, who many times escaped our best dogs, though when he were overtaken, easily killed by us, without making much resistance. Of both these sorts I killed divers with my sword while I stayed there.

One time also it was my fortune to kill a wild boar in this manner: the boar being roused from his den, fled before our dogs for a good space; but finding them press him hard, turned his head against our dogs, and hurt three or four of them very dangerously; I came on horseback up to him, and with my sword thrust him twice or thrice without entering his skin, the blade being not so stiff as it should be: the boar hereupon turned upon me, and much endangered my horse, which I perceiving, rid a little out of the way, and leaving my horse with my lackey, returned with my sword against the boar, who by this time had hurt more dogs; and here happened a pretty kind of fight, for when I thrust at the boar sometimes with my sword, which in some places I made enter, the boar would run at me, whose tusks yet by stepping a little out of the way I avoided, but he then turning upon me, the dogs came in, and drew him off, so that he fell upon them, which I perceiving, ran at the boar with my sword again, which made him turn upon me, but then the dogs pulled him from me again, while so relieving one another by turns, we killed the boar. At this chase Monsieur Disancour and Mennon were present, as also Mr Townsend, yet so as they did endeavour rather to withdraw me from, than assist me in the danger. Of which boar, some part being well seasoned and larded, I presented to my uncle Sir Francis Newport, in Shropshire, and found most excellent meat.

Herbert was a great stickler on the point of honour:

There happened during this siege [of Juliers by the allies against the Emperor in 1610] a particular quarrel betwixt me and the Lord of Walden, eldest son to the Earl of Suffolk, lord treasurer of England at that time, which I do but unwillingly relate, in regard of the great esteem I have of that noble family; howbeit, to avoid misreports, I have thought fit to set it down truly: that lord having been invited to a feast in Sir Horace Vere's quarters, where (after the Low Country manner) there was liberal drinking, returned not long after to Sir

Edward Cecil's quarters, at which time, I speaking merrily to him, upon some slight occasion, he took that offence at me, which he would not have done at another time, insomuch that he came towards me in a violent manner, which I perceiving, did more than half way meet him; but the company were so vigilant upon us that before any blow past we were separated; howbeit, because he made towards me, I thought fit the next day to send him a challenge, telling him, that if he had any thing to say to me, I would meet him in such a place as no man should interrupt us. Shortly after this Sir Thomas Payton came to me on his part, and told me my lord would fight with me on horseback with single sword; and, said he, I will be his second; where is yours? I replied that neither his lordship nor myself brought over any great horses with us; that I knew he might much better borrow one than myself; howbeit, as soon as he shewed me the place, he should find me there on horseback or on foot; whereupon both of us riding together upon two geldings to the side of a wood, Payton said he chose that place, and the time break of day the next morning: I told him I would fail neither place nor time, though I knew not where to get a better horse than the nag I rid on; and as for a second, I shall trust to your nobleness, who, I know, will see fair play betwixt us, though you come on his side: but he urging me again to provide a second, I told him I could promise for none but myself, and that if I spoke to any of my friends in the army to this purpose, I doubted least the business might be discovered and prevented.

He was no sooner gone from me, but night drew on, myself resolving in the mean time to rest under a fair oak all night; after this, tying my horse by the bridle unto another tree, I had not now rested two hours, when I found some fires nearer to me than I thought was possible in so solitary a place, whereupon also having the curiosity to see the reason hereof, I got on horseback again, and had not rode very far, when by the talk of the soldiers there, I found I was in the Scotch quarter, where finding in a stable a very fair horse of service, I desired to know whether he might be bought for any reasonable sum of money, but a soldier replying it was their captain's, Sir James Areskin's chief horse, I demanded for Sir James, but the soldier answering he was not within the quarter, I demanded then for his lieutenant, whereupon the soldier courteously desired him to come to me; this lieutenant was called Montgomery, and had the reputation of a gallant man; I told him that I would very fain buy a horse, and if it were possible, the horse I saw but a little before; but he telling me none was to be sold there, I offered to leave in his hands one hundred pieces, if he would lend me a good horse for a day or two, he to restore me the money again when I delivered him the horse in good plight, and did besides bring him some present as a gratuity.

The lieutenant, though he did not know me, suspected I had some private quarrel, and that I desired this horse to fight on, and thereupon told me, Sir, whosoever you are, you seem to be a person of worth, and you shall have the best horse in the stable; and if you have a quarrel and want a second, I offer myself to serve you upon another horse, and if you will let me go along with you upon these terms, I will ask no pawn of you for the horse. I told him I would use no second, and I desired him to accept one hundred pieces, which I had there about me, in pawn for the horse, and he should hear from me shortly again; and that though I did not take his noble offer of coming along with me, I should evermore rest much obliged to him; whereupon giving him my purse with the money in it, I got upon his horse, and left my nag besides with him.

Riding thus away about twelve o'clock at night to the wood from whence I came, I alighted from my horse and rested there till morning; the day now breaking I got on horseback, and attended the Lord of Walden with his second. The first person that appeared was a footman, who I heard afterwards was sent by the Lady of Walden, who as soon as he saw me, ran back again with all speed; I meant once to pursue him, but that I thought it better at last to keep my place. About two hours after Sir William St Leiger, now lord president of Munster, came to me, and told me he knew the cause of my being there, and that the business was discovered by the Lord Walden's rising so early that morning, and the suspicion that he meant to fight with me, and had Sir Thomas Payton with him, and that he would ride to him, and that there were thirty or forty sent after us, to hinder us from meeting; shortly after many more came to the place where I was, and told me I must not fight, and that they were sent for the same purpose, and that it was to no purpose to stay there, and thence rode to seek the Lord of Walden; I stayed yet two hours longer, but finding still more company came in, rode back again to the Scotch quarters, and delivered the horse back again, and received my money and nag from Lieutenant Montgomery, and so withdrew myself to the French quarters, till I did find some convenient time to send again to the Lord Walden.

Being among the French, I remembered myself of the bravado of Monsieur Balagny, and coming to him told him I knew how brave a man he was, and that as he had put me to one trial of daring, when I was last with him in his trenches, I would put him to another; saying, I heard he had a fair mistress, and that the scarf he wore was her gift, and that I would maintain I had a worthier mistress than he, and that I would do as much for her sake as he, or any else, durst do for his. Balagny hereupon looking merrily upon me, said . . . that for his part, he had no mind to fight on that quarrel: I looking hereupon somewhat disdainfully on him, said he spoke more like a paillard than a cavalier; to which he answering nothing, I rode my ways, and afterwards went to Monsieur Terant, a French gentleman that belonged to the Duke of Montmorency, formerly mentioned; who telling me he had a quarrel with another gentleman, I offered to be his second, but he saying he was provided already, I rode thence to the English quarters, attending some fit occasion to send again to the Lord Walden: I came no sooner thither, but I found Sir Thomas Somerset with eleven or twelve more in the head of the English, who were then drawing forth in a body or squadron, who seeing me on horseback, with a footman only that attended me, gave me some affronting words, for my quarrelling with the Lord of Walden; whereupon I alighted, and giving my horse to my lackey, drew my sword, which he no sooner saw but he drew his, as also all the company with him; I running hereupon amongst them, put by some of their thrusts, and making towards him in particular, put by a thrust of his, and had certainly run him through, but that one Lieutenant Prichard, at that instant taking me by the shoulder, turned me aside; but I recovering myself again, ran at him a second time, which he perceiving, retired himself with the company to the tents which were near, though not so fast but I hurt one Proger, and some others also that were with him; but they being all at last got within the tents, I finding now nothing else to be done, got to my horse again, having received only a slight hurt on the outside of my ribs, and two thrusts, the one through the skirts of my doublet, and the other through my breeches, and about eighteen nicks upon my sword and hilt, and so rode to the trenches before Juliers, where our soldiers were.

Not long after this, the town being now surrendered, and every body preparing to go their ways, I sent again a gentleman to the Lord of Walden to offer him the meeting with my sword, but this was avoided not very handsomely by him (contrary to what Sir Henry Rich, now earl of Holland, persuaded him).

After having taken leave of his excellency Sir Edward Cecil, I thought fit to return on my way homewards as far as Dusseldorp. I had been scarce two hours in my lodgings when one Lieutenant Hamilton brought a letter from Sir James Areskin (who was then in town likewise) unto me, the effect wherof was, that in regard his Lieutenant Montgomery had told him that I had the said James Areskin's consent for borrowing his horse, he did desire me to do one of two things, which was, either to disavow the said words, which he thought in his conscience I never spake; or, if I would justify them, then to appoint time and place to fight with him. Having considered a while what I was to do in this case, I told Lieutenant Hamilton that I thought myself bound in honour to accept the more noble part of his proposition, which was to fight with him, when yet perchance it might be easy enough for me to say that I had his horse upon other terms than was affirmed; whereupon also giving Lieutenant Hamilton the length of my sword, I told him that as soon as ever he had matched it, I would fight with him, wishing further to make haste, since I desired to end the business as speedily as could be. Lieutenant Hamilton hereupon returning back, met in a cross street (I know not by what miraculous adventure) Lieutenant Montgomery, conveying divers of the hurt and maimed soldiers at the siege of St Juliers unto that town, to be lodged and dressed by the surgeons there; Hamilton hereupon calling to Montgomery, told him the effects of his captain's letter, together with my answer, which Montgomery no sooner heard, but he replied (as Hamilton told me afterwards), I see that noble gentleman chooseth rather to fight than to contradict me; but my telling a lie must not be an occasion why either my captain or he should hazard their lives: I will alight from my horse, and tell my captain presently how all that matter past; whereupon also he relating the business about borrowing the horse, in that manner I formerly set down, which as soon as Sir James Areskin heard, he sent Lieutenant Hamilton to me presently again, to tell me he was satisfied how the business past, and that he had nothing to say to me, but that he was my most humble servant, and was sorry he ever questioned me in that manner.

Lord Herbert's most famous poem is 'an Ode upon a question moved whether love should continue for ever,' and begins thus:

Having interr'd her Infant-birth,
The wat'ry ground, that late did mourn,
Was strew'd with flow'rs, for the return
Of the wish'd Bridegroom of the Earth.

The well-accorded Birds did sing
Their hymns unto the pleasant time.
And in a sweet consorted chime
Did welcome in the cheerful Spring.

To which, soft whistles of the Wind,
And warbling murmurs of a Brook,
And varied notes of leaves that shook
An harmony of parts did bind.

While doubling joy unto each other
All in so rare consent was shown,
No happiness that came alone,
Nor pleasure that was not another.

When with a love none can express
That mutually happy pair,
Melander and Celinda fair,
The season with their loves did bless.

The two discuss the matter at some length, and this is the conclusion of Melander's argument :

Nor here on earth then, or above,
Our good affection can impair,
For where God doth admit the fair
Think you that he excludeth Love?

These eyes again then eyes shall see,
And hands again these hands enfold,
And all chaste pleasures can be told
Shall with us everlasting be.

For if no use of sense remain,
When bodies once this life forsake,
Or they could no delight partake,
Why should they ever rise again?

And if every imperfect mind
Make love the end of knowledge here,
How perfect will our love be, where
All imperfection is refined!

Let then no doubt, Celinda, touch,
Much less your fairest mind invade:
Were not our souls immortal made
Our equal loves can make them such. . . .

So when from hence we shall be gone,
And be no more, nor you, nor I,
As one another's mystery,
Each shall be both, yet both but one.

This said, in her uplifted face,
Her eyes, which did that beauty crown,
Were like two stars, that having fall'n down,
Look up again to find their place.

While such a moveless silent peace
Did cease on their becalmed sense,
One would have thought some Influence
Their ravish'd spirits did possess.

See Rémusat's monograph on Herbert (Paris, 1874), Moore Smith's edition of the Poems (1923), Sir Sidney Lee's of the Autobiography (1886), and Dr C. Güttler's Herbert von Cherbury (1897), a criticism of his psychological and religious philosophy. The De Veritate was translated into French in 1639. The only one of his philosophical or religious works that was translated into English was the De Religione Gentilium (translated in 1709). De Causis Errorum and De Religione Laici were shorter tracts, also pointing in a deistical direction.

George Herbert (1593-1633) was of noble birth, but lives in history as a pious country clergyman—'holy George Herbert,' who

The lowliest duties on himself did lay.

His father was descended from the Earls of Pembroke, and the poet was born at Montgomery Castle in Wales. His elder brother was the famous and unorthodox Lord Herbert of Cherbury. George passed from Westminster in 1609 to Trinity College, Cambridge; in 1614 was elected a fellow; and was public orator 1619-27. He was the intimate friend of Sir Henry Wotton and Dr Donne; and Lord Bacon is said to have entertained such a high regard for his learning and judgment that he submitted his works to him before publication. The poet was also in favour with King James, who gave him a sinecure office worth £120 per annum, which Queen Elizabeth had formerly given to Sir Philip Sidney. 'With this,' says Izaak Walton, 'and his annuity, and the advantages of his college, and of his oratorship, he enjoyed his genteel humour for clothes and court-like company, and seldom looked towards Cambridge unless the king were there; but then, he never failed.' The death of the king and of two powerful friends, the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hamilton, destroyed Herbert's court hopes, and, induced thereto by Nicholas Ferrar and Laud, he took priest's orders in 1630, and was made rector of Bemerton, in Wiltshire, where he passed the remainder of his life. After describing his marriage on the third day after his first interview with the lady, Izaak relates, with characteristic simplicity and minuteness, a quaint episode in the new incumbent's preparation for Bemerton: 'The third day after he was made rector of Bemerton, and had changed his sword and silk clothes into a canonical habit, he returned so habited with his friend Mr Woodnot to Bemerton; and immediately after he had seen and saluted his wife, he said to her: "You are now a minister's wife, and must now so far forget your father's house as not to claim a precedence of any of your parishioners; for you are to know that a priest's wife can challenge no precedence or place but that which she purchases by her obliging humility; and I am sure places so purchased do best become them. And let me tell you, I am so good a herald as to assure you that this is truth." And she was so meek a wife as to assure him it was no vexing news to her, and that he should see her observe it with a cheerful willingness.'

Herbert discharged his pastoral duties with saintly zeal and purity, but his strength was not equal to his self-imposed tasks, and he died in February 1633. Love and devotion to the mother-Church of England shines through all his poems. His principal work is The Temple, or Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations. It was not printed till the year after his death, but was so well received that Walton says twenty thousand copies were sold in a few years. The poem on Virtue is one of his gems; but even there we find, as in all Herbert's poetry, disturbing conceits and oddities. Elsewhere we even have:

God gave thy soul brave wings; put not those feathers
Into a bed to sleep out all ill weathers.

Less audacious than his friend Donne, he yet permitted himself a kind of imagery that attracts some and repels others. James Montgomery said his Temple was 'devotion turned into masquerade.' Dr George Macdonald, on the other hand, held that his use of homeliest imagery for highest thought ranks him with the highest kind of poets. His originality, his imaginative gift, his quaint humour, are undisputed. He is less sweet, less exquisite, has less of the ecstatic temper than Crashaw, but is terser, more English, more genuine. In his own way he was very fastidious : his workmanship is elaborate, his rhythms are often intricate. He was a musician, and sang his own hymns to the lute or viol ; one catches echoes of his music in the harmonious cadence of his verses. Crashaw and Vaughan, Charles the Martyr and Baxter the Puritan, Cowper and Coleridge, were amongst the warmest admirers of the Temple—more, perhaps, for the pregnancy and devoutness of his spiritual thoughts than for the purely poetic worth of his verse. His poetry alone would not have secured him so many loving readers had it not been for his single-minded and lovable character, enshrined in the pages of good old Walton ;

his prose work, the Country Parson; and the warm and fervent piety which gave a charm to his life and breathes through all his writings.

Vertue.

Sweet day ! so cool, so calm, so bright—
The bridall of the earth and skie ;
The dewes shall weep thy fall to-night ;
For thou must die.

Sweet rose, whose hue, angrie and brave,
Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye,
Thy root is ever in its grave,
And thou must die.

Sweet spring, full of sweet days and roses,
A box where sweets compacted lie,
Thy music shews ye have your closes,
And all must die.

Onely a sweet and vertuous soul,
Like seasoned timber, never gives ;
But though the whole world turn to coal,
Then chiefly lives.

The Pulley.

When God at first made man,
Having a glasse of blessings standing by,
'Let us,' said He, 'poure on him all we can :
Let the world's riches, which dispersed lie,
Contract into a span.'

So strength first made a way ;
Then beautie flowed, then wisdom, honour, pleasure ;
When almost all was out, God made a stay ;
Perceiving that, alone of all His treasure,
Rest in the bottome lay.

'For if I should,' said He,
'Bestow this jewell also on my creature,
He would adore my gifts instead of me,
And rest in Nature, not the God of Nature :
So both should losers be.

'Yet let him keep the rest,
But keep them, with repining restlessness ;
Let him be rich and wearie that at least,
If goodnesse lead him not, yet wearinesse
May tosse him to my breast.'

Matins.

I cannot ope mine eyes
But Thou art ready there to catch
My mourning soul and sacrifice,
Then we must needs for that day make a match.

My God, what is a heart ?
Silver, or gold, or precious stone,
Or starre, or rainbow, or a part
Of all these things, or all of them in one

My God, what is a heart,
That Thou shouldst it so eye and wooe,
Pouring upon it all Thy art,
As if that Thou hadst nothing els to do

Indeed, man's whole estate
Amounts, and richly, to serve Thee ;
He did not heaven and earth create,
Yet studies them, not Him by whom they be.

Teach me Thy love to know ;
That this new light which now I see
May both the work and workman shew ;
Then by a sunne-beam I will climb to Thee.

Sunday.

O day most calm, most bright,
The fruit of this, the next world's bud,
The indorsement of supreme delight,
Writ by a Friend, and with His bloud ;
The couch of Time, Care's balm and bay :
The week were dark but for thy light ;
Thy torch doth shew the way.

The other dayes and thou
Make up one man, whose face thou art,
Knocking at heaven with thy brow :
The worky-daies are the back-part ;
The burden of the week lies there,
Making the whole to stoop and bow,
Till thy release appeare.

Man had straight forward gone
To endlesse death : but thou dost pull
And turn us round, to look on One,
Whom, if we were not very dull,

We could not choose but look on still;
Since there is no place so alone,
The which he doth not fill.

Sundaies the pillars are
On which heaven's palace archèd lies:
The other days fill up the spare
And hollow room with vanities.
They are the fruitfull beds and borders
In God's rich garden: that is bare
Which parts their ranks and orders.

The Sundaies of man's life
Thredded together on Time's string,
Make bracelets to adorn the wife
Of the eternall glorious King:
On Sunday, heaven's gate stands ope;
Blessings are plentiful and rife,
More plentiful than hope.

This day my Saviour rose,
And did inclose this light for his;
That, as each beast his manger knows,
Man might not of his fodder misse:
Christ hath took in this piece of ground,
And made a garden there for those
Who want herbs for their wound.

The rest of our creation
Our great Redeemer did remove
With the same shake, which at His passion
Did the earth and all things with it move.
As Samson bore the doores away,
Christ's hands, though nailed, wrought our salvation,
And did unhinge that day.

The brightness of that day
We sullied by our foul offence:
Wherefore that robe we cast away,
Having a new at His expense,
Whose drops of blood paid the full price,
That was required to make us gay,
And fit for paradise.

Thou art a day of mirth:
And where the week-daies trail on ground,
Thy flight is higher, as thy birth:
O let me take thee at the bound,
Leaping with thee from seven to seven,
Till that we both, being tossed from earth,
Flie hand in hand to heaven!

The Quip.

The merrie World did on a day
With his train-bands and mates agree
To meet together where I lay,
And all in sport to geere at me.

First Beautie crept into a rose,
Which when I pluckt not, 'Sir,' said she,
'Tell me, I pray, whose hands are those?
But Thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.

Then Money came, and chinking still,
'What tune is this, poore man?' said he;
'I heard in Musick you had skill.'
But Thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.

Then came brave Glorie puffing by
In silks that whistled, who but he!
He scarce allowed me half an eie:
But Thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.

Then came quick Wit and Conversation,
And he would needs a comfort be,
And, to be short, make an oration:
But Thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.

Yet when the houre of Thy designe
To answer these fine things shall come,
Speak not at large, say, I am Thine,
And then they have their answer home.

The Collar.

I struck the board, and cry'd, 'No more;
I will abroad.'

What, shall I ever sigh and pine?
My lines and life are free; free as the road,
Loose as the winde, as large as store.

Shall I be still in suit?
Have I no harvest but a thorn
To let me bloud, and not restore
What I have lost with cordiall fruit?

Sure there was wine
Before my sighs did drie it; there was corn
Before my tears did drown it;
Is the yeare onely lost to me?

Have I no bayes to crown it,
No flowers, no garlands gay? all blasted,
All wasted?

Not so, my heart; but there is fruit,
And thou hast hands.

Recover all thy sigh-blown age
On double pleasures; leave thy cold dispute
Of what is fit and not; forsake thy cage,

Thy rope of sands
Which petty thoughts have made; and made to thee
Good cable, to enforce and draw,

And be thy law,
While thou didst wink and wouldst not see.
Away! take heed;

I will abroad.
Call in thy death's-head there, tie up thy fears;
He that forbears

To suit and serve his need
Deserves his load.
But as I rav'd and grew more fierce and wilde

At every word,
Methought I heard one calling, 'Childe;'
And I reply'd, 'My Lord.'

Herbert was decidedly High Church in sympathies, attached importance to the things Puritans made light of, and though he does not insist on asceticism for all, gives in the Parson quite painful prescriptions as to the extent to which fasting should be carried at the specified days and seasons. His native sagacity and insight are well shown in the chapter of the Country Parson suggestively called 'The Parson's Eye,' in which it will be noted that he assumes Gerson, chancellor of the University of Paris, to be the author of the Imitatio Christi:

The cōuntry parson, at spare times from action, standing on a hill and considering his flock, discovers two sorts of vices, and two sorts of vicious persons. There are some vices whose natures are alwayes clear and evident; as adultery, murder, hatred, lying, &c. There are other vices, whose natures, at least in the beginning, are dark and obscure ; as covetousnesse and gluttony. So likewise, there are some persons who abstain not even from known sins : there are others, who when they know a sin evidently, they commit it not. It is true, indeed, they are long a-knowing it, being partiall to themselves, and witty to others who shall reprove them from it. A man may be both covetous and intemperate, and yet hear sermons against both, and himselfe condemn both in good earnest. And the reason hereof is, because the natures of these vices being not evidently discussed or known commonly, the beginnings of them are not easily observabled ; and the beginnings of them are not observed, because of the suddain passing from that which was just now lawfull, to that which is presently unlawfull, even in one continued action. So, a man dining eats at first lawfully : but proceeding on, comes to do unlawfully, even before he is aware ; not knowing the bounds of the action, nor when his eating begins to be unlawfull. So a man storing up mony for his necessary provisions, both in present for his family and in future for his children, hardly perceives when his storing becomes unlawfull : yet is there a period for his storing, and a point or center when his storing, which was even now good, passeth from good to bad.—Wherefore the parson, being true to his businesse, hath exactly sifted the definitions of all vertues and vices ; especially canvassing those whose natures are most stealing, and beginnings uncertain. Particularly, concerning these two vices : not because they are all that are of this dark and creeping disposition, but for example sake, and because they are most common ; he thus thinks :—

First, for covetousnes he lays this ground. Whosoever, when a just occasion calls, either spends not at all, or not in some proportion to God's blessing upon him, is covetous. The reason of the ground is manifest ; because wealth is given to that end, to supply our occasions. Now, if I do not give every thing its end, I abuse the creature ; I am false to my reason, which should guide me ; I offend the supreme Judge, in perverting that order which He hath set both to things and to reason. The application of the ground would be infinite. But in brief, a poor man is an occasion ; my countrey is an occasion ; my friend is an occasion ; my table is an occasion ; my apparell is an occasion. If in all these and those more which concerne me, I either do nothing, or pinch, and scrape, and squeeze blood, indecently to the station wherein God hath placed me, I am covetous. More particularly, and to give one instance for all ; If God have given me servants, and I either provide too little for them or that which is unwholsome, being sometimes baned [diseased] meat, sometimes too salt, and so not competent nourishment, I am covetous. I bring this example because men usually think that servants for their mony are as other things that they buy ; even as a piece of wood which they may cut, or hack, or throw into the fire ; and, so they pay them their wages, all is well.—Nay to descend yet more particularly ; if a man hath wherewithall to buy a spade, and yet hee chuseth rather to use his neighbour's and wear out that, he is covetous. Nevertheless, few bring covetousness thus low, or consider it so narrowly ; which yet ought to be done, since there is a justice in the least things, and for the least there shall be a judgment. Countrey people are full of these petty injustices, being cunning to make use of another, and spare themselves. And scholars ought to be diligent in the observation of these, and driving of their generall school-rules even to the smallest actions of life : which while they dwell in their bookes, they will never finde ; but being seated in the countrey, and doing their duty faithfully, they will soon discover ; especially if they carry their eyes ever open, and fix them on their charge, and not on their preferment.

Secondly, for gluttony, the parson lays this ground. He that either for quantity eats more than his health or employments will bear, or for quality is licorous after dainties, is a glutton ;—as he that eats more then his estate will bear, is a prodigall ; and hee that eats offensively to the company, either in his order or length of eating, is scandalous and uncharitable. These three rules generally comprehend the faults of eating ; and the truth of them needs no proof. So that men must eat, neither to the disturbance of their health, nor of their affairs, (which, being over-burdened or studying dainties too much, they cannot wel dispatch,) nor of their estate, nor of their brethren. One act in these things is bad, but it is the custom and habit that names a glutton. Many think they are at more liberty then they are, as if they were masters of their health ; and so they will stand to the pain, all is well. But to eat to one's hurt comprehends, besides the hurt, an act against reason, because it is unnaturall to hurt oneself ; and this they are not masters of. Yet of hurtfull things I am more bound to abstain from those which by my own experience I have found hurtfull, then from those which by a common tradition and vulgar knowledge are reputed to be so.—That which is said of hurtfull meats, extends to hurtfull drinks also. As for the quantity, touching our employments, none must eat so as to disable themselves from a fit discharging either of divine duties, or duties of their calling. So that if after dinner they are not fit (or unweeldy) either to pray or work, they are gluttons. Not that all must presently work after dinner. For they rather must not work, especially students, and those that are weakly. But that they must rise so as that it is not meate or drink that hinders them from working. To guide them in this there are three rules. First, the custome and knowledge of their own body, and what it can well digest. The second, the feeling of themselves in time of eating ; which because it is deceitfull (for one thinks in eating that he can eat more then afterwards he finds true). The third is the observation with what appetite they sit down. This last rule joyned with the first never fails. For knowing what one usually can digest, and feeling when I go to meat in what disposition I am, either hungry or not ; according as I feele myself, either I take my wonted proportion or diminish of it. Yet phisicians bid those that would live in health, not keep an uniform diet, but to feed variously ; now more, now lesse. And Gerson, a spirituall man, wisheth all to incline rather to too much, then to too little ; his reason is, because diseases of exinanition are more dangerous then diseases of repletion. But the parson distinguisheth according to his double aime ; either of abstinence a morall vertue, or mortification a divine. When he deals with any that is heavy and carnall, he gives him those freer rules. But when he meets with a refined and heavenly disposition, he carries them higher, even sometimes to a forgetting of themselves ; knowing there is One Who, when they forget, remembers for them. As when the people hungered and thirsted after our Saviour's doctrine, and tarried so long at it that they would have fainted had they returned empty, He suffered it not, but rather made food miraculously then suffered so good desires to miscarry.

Jacula Prudentum is a collection of about a thousand short sayings and proverbs from various quarters, many of them, as Herbert says, 'outlandish,' but some of them no doubt his own. Thus there are some from Burton (see page 440).

See Herbert's Works, with the Life by Izaak Walton and notes by Coleridge (1835-36); other editions by Grosart (1874), Palmer (1920), Waugh (1908); monographs by J. J. Daniell (new ed. 1898), A. G. Hyde (1906); and Bibliography by Palmer (1911).

George Wither (1588-1667) was a voluminous author, in the midst of disasters that would have damped the spirit of any but an enthusiast. Some of his happiest strains were composed in prison; spite of stone walls and iron bars, his fancy was among the hills and plains, with shepherds hunting, or loitering with Poesy by rustling boughs and murmuring springs. There is a delightful freshness and natural vivacity in Wither's early poetry; though he became harsh, obscure, and affected when the brightness of youth passed from him. At his best he had great diversity of style and subject, and a gift of true poetical feeling and expression. Wither, born on the 11th of June 1588, at Bentworth, near Alton, in Hampshire, studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, and was entered at Lincoln's Inn. For his satire Abuses Stript and Whipt (1613) he was thrown into the Marshalsea, where he composed several of his best poems, and in particular his pastoral, The Shepherds' Hunting. In the civil war Wither took the popular side, and sold his paternal estate to raise a troop of horse for the Parliament. He rose to the rank of major, and in 1642 was made governor of Farnham Castle. During the struggles of that period the poet was made prisoner by the royalists and stood in danger of capital punishment, when Denham interfered for his brother-bard, alleging that as long as Wither lived he (Denham) would not be considered the worst poet in England. The joke was a good one if it saved Wither's life. He was afterwards Cromwell's major-general in Surrey, and Master of the Statute Office. From the sequestered estates of the royalists Wither obtained a considerable fortune; but the Restoration came, and he was stripped of all his possessions. He remonstrated loudly and angrily; his remonstrances were voted libels, and for a satire on the Parliament of 1661 the unlucky poet was again thrown into prison. He was released, under bond for good behaviour, in 1663, and died in London on the 2nd of May 1667.

Wither's fame is derived chiefly from his early poems, written before he had come under Puritan influences or been embroiled in the war. The Shepherds' Hunting (in which Willy is his friend the poet William Browne, and Philarete is himself) was issued in 1615, as was also Fidelia. His Motto, a confession in two thousand lines of verse, appeared in 1621; his Juvenilia, a reprint of all his best work, in 1622. Faire Virtue or the Mistresse of Philarete (1622) displays Wither's genius in its transitional state. Certain portions of this collection of lyrics have extraordinary beauty, such as the opening lines descriptive of the poet's home in Hampshire, but the beauties are interspersed with long passages of the dullest and commonest kind, showing how rapidly Wither was losing his charm. Much of Wither's religious poetry is sweet, tender, and devout (though as he advanced in life much of it, like his version of the Lord's Prayer and the Creed, became little better than doggerel). The Hymns and Songs of the Church (1623) were set to music by Orlando Gibbons. The Psalms of David translated appeared in 1632, the Emblems Ancient and Modern in 1635. Among the two hundred and thirty hymns in Hallelujah, another collection—designed for persons and purposes as various as members of Parliament, jailers, poets, tailors, for sheep-shearings, for house-warmings—there are two or three still found in modern hymn-books, such as 'Behold the Sun that seemed but now,' 'The Lord is King and heareth.' Wither's satirical and controversial works were numerous but without merit.

Long before his death his poetry had fallen into oblivion. Pope in the Dunciad stigmatised him as 'wretched Withers'—'Withers' is a recognised spelling of the family name—and spoke of him as sleeping among the dull of ancient days, safe where no critics damn. Bishop Percy was kindlier, holding him 'not altogether devoid of genius.' But George Ellis, in his Specimens of Early English Poets (1790), was the first to call to mind 'that playful fancy, pure taste, and artless delicacy of sentiment, which distinguish the poetry of his early youth.' Sir Egerton Brydges, Southey, Hallam, and especially Charles Lamb (in the Essay of 1818) restored him to his place in the Temple of Fame. Wither's poem on Christmas affords a lively picture of the manners of the times. His Address to Poetry, the one cheering companion of his prison solitude, recounts the various charms and the 'divine skill' of his Muse, that had derived nourishment and delight from the 'meanest objects' of external nature—a daisy, a bush, or a tree; and, when these picturesque and beloved scenes of the country were denied him, could gladden even the vaults and shades of a prison.

From 'The Shepherds' Hunting.'

Philarete. Cheere thee, honest Willy, then,
And begin thy song agen.

Willy. Faine I would, but I doe feare
When againe my lines they heare,
If they yeeld they are my crimes,
They will faine some other crimes;
And 'tis no safe ventring-by
Where we see Detraction ly.
For doe what I can, I doubt,
She will picke some quarrell out,
And I oft have heard defended,
Little said, is soone amended.

Phil. See'st thou not in clearest dayes,
Oft thicke fogs cloud heav'ns rayes,

And that vapours which doe breath
 From the earths grosse wombe beneath,
 Seeme not to us with black steames,
 To pollute the sunnes bright beames,
 And yet vanish into ayre,
 Leaving it unblemisht faire?
 So (my Willy) shall it bee
 With Detractions breath on thee.
 It shall never rise so hie,
 As to staine thy poesie.
 As that sunne doth oft exhale
 Vapours from each rotten vale;
 Poesie so sometime draines
 Grosse conceits from muddy braines;
 Mists of envy, fogs of spight,
 Twixt mens judgements and her light:
 But so much her power may do,
 That shee can dissolve them to.
 If thy verse doe bravely tower,
 As shee makes wing, she gets power:
 Yet the higher she doth sore,
 Shee's affronted still the more:
 Till shee to the high'st hath past,
 Then she rests with fame at last,
 Let nought therefore thee affright:
 But make forward in thy flight:
 For if I could match thy rime,
 To the very starres I'de clime.
 There begin again and flye
 Till I reach'd Æternity.
 But (alasse) my Muse is slow:
 For thy place shee flags too low:
 Yea, the more's her haplesse fate,
 Her short wings were clipt of late.
 And poore I, her fortune ruing,
 Am my selfe put up a muing.
 But if I my cage can rid,
 I'le flye where I never did.
 And though for her sake I'me crost,
 Though my best hopes I have lost,
 And knew she would make my trouble
 Ten times more then ten times double:
 I should love and keepe her to,
 Spight of all the world could doe.
 For though banish't from my flockes,
 And confin'd within these rockes,
 Here I waste away the light,
 And consume the sullen night,
 She doth for my comfort stay,
 And keepe many cares away.
 Though I misse the flowry fields,
 With those sweets the spring-tyde yeelds,
 Though I may not see those groves
 Where the shepherds chant their loves,
 (And the lasses more excell,
 Then the sweet voyc'd Philomel,)
 Though of all those pleasures past
 Nothing now remaines at last
 But Remembrance (poore reliefe)
 That more makes then mends my grieve:
 Shee's my mindes companion still,
 Maugre envies evill will.
 (Whence she should be driven to,
 Wer't in mortals power to do.)
 She doth tell me where to borrow
 Comfort in the midst of sorrow;

Makes the desolate place
 To her presence be a grace;
 And the blackest discontents
 To be pleasing ornaments.
 In my former dayes of blisse,
 Her divine skill taught me this,
 That from every thing I saw,
 I could some invention draw:
 And raise pleasure to her height,
 Through the meanest objects sight.
 By the murmure of a spring,
 Or the least boughes rusteling;
 By a dazie whose leaves spred,
 Shut when Tytan goes to bed;
 Or a shady bush or tree,
 She could more infuse in mee
 Then all Natures beauties can
 In some other wiser man.
 By her helpe I also now
 Make this churlish place allow
 Some things that may sweeten gladnes,
 In the very gall of sadnes.
 The dull loanesse, the blacke shade,
 That these hanging vaults have made;
 The strange musicke of the waves,
 Beating on these hollow caves;
 This blacke den which rocks embosse
 Over-growne with eldest mosse;
 The rude portals that give light,
 More to Terror then Delight;
 This my chamber of Neglect,
 Wall'd about with Disrespect;
 From all these and this dull ayre,
 A fit object for Despaire,
 She hath taught me by her might
 To draw comfort and delight.
 Therefore thou best earthly blisse,
 I will cherish thee for this,
Poesie; thou sweet'st content
 That e're heav'n to mortals lent:
 Though they as a trifle leave thee
 Whose dull thoughts cannot conceive thee,
 Though thou be to them a scorne,
 That to nought but earth are borne:
 Let my life no longer be
 Then I am in love with thee.
 Though our wise ones call thee madnesse
 Let me never taste of gladnesse
 If I love not thy madd'st fits,
 More then all their greatest wits.
 And though some too seeming holy
 Doe account thy raptures folly,
 Thou dost teach me to contemne
 What make Knaves and Fooles of them.

Than

The Steadfast Shepherd.

Hence away, you Syrens, leave me,
 And unclasp your wanton armes;
 Sugred words shall ne're deceive me,
 (Though thou prove a thousand charmes.)
 Fie, fie, forbear;
 No common snare
 Could ever my affection chaine:
 Your painted baits,
 And poore deceits,
 Are all bestowed on me in vaine.

I'me no slave to such as you be ;
 Neither shall a snowy brest,
 Wanton eye, or lip of ruby,
 Ever robb me of my rest.
 Goe, goe, display
 Your beauties ray
 To some ore-soone enamour'd swaine.
 Those common wiles
 Of sighs and smiles
 Are all bestowed on me in vaine.
 I have elsewhere vowed a dutie ;
 Turne away thy tempting eyes.
 Shew not me a naked beautie,
 Those impostures I despise.
 My spirit lothes,
 Where gawdy clothes
 And fained othes may love obtaine.
 I love her so
 Whose looke swears No ;
 That all your labours will be vaine.
 Can he prize the tainted posies
 Which on every brest are worne ;
 That may plucke the spotlesse roses
 From their never-touched thorne ?
 I can goe rest
 On her sweet brest
 That is the pride of Cynthia's traine.
 Then hold your tongues ;
 Your mermaid songs
 Are all bestow'd on me in vaine.
 Hee's a foole that basely dallies
 Where each peasant mates with him.
 Shall I haunt the thronged vallies,
 Whilst ther's noble hils to climbe ?
 No, no ; though clownes
 Are skar'd with frownes,
 I know the best can but disdaine :
 And those Ile prove ;
 So shall your love
 Be all bestowed on me in vaine.
 Yet I would not daigne embraces
 With the greatest-fairest shee,
 If another shar'd those graces,
 Which had bene bestowed on me.
 I gave that one,
 My love, where none
 Shall come to robb me of my gaine.
 Your fickle hearts
 Makes teares, and arts,
 And all, bestowed on me in vaine.
 I doe scorne to vow a dutie
 Where each lustfull lad may wooe.
 Give me her whose sun-like beautie
 Buzzards dare not soare unto.
 Shee, shee it is
 Affords that blisse ;
 For which I would refuse no paine.
 But such as you,
 Fond fooles, adue ;
 You seeke to captive me in vaine.
 Prowd she seem'd in the beginning,
 And disdaind my looking on :
 But that coy one in the winning,
 Proves a true one being wonne.

What ere betide,
 Shee'l nere divide
 The favour shee to me shall daigne.
 But your fond love
 Will fickle prove :
 And all that trust in you are vaine.
 Therefore know, when I enjoy one,
 (And for love employ my breath),
 Shee I court shall be a coy one,
 Though I winne her with my death.
 A favour there
 Few ayme at dare.
 And if perhaps some lover plaine,
 Shee is not wonne,
 Nor I undone,
 By placing of my love in vaine.
 Leave me then, you Syrens, leave me ;
 Seeke no more to worke my harmes :
 Craftie wiles cannot deceive me
 Who am prooffe against your charmes.
 You labour may
 To lead astray
 The heart that constant shall remaine :
 And I the while
 Will sit and smile,
 To see you spend your time in vaine.

(From The Mistresse of Philareta.)

Christmas.

So now is come our joyfult feast ;
 Let every man be jolly.
 Each roome with yvie leaves is drest,
 And every post with holly.
 Though some churles at our mirth repine,
 Round your forheads garlands twine,
 Drowne sorrow in a cup of wine.
 And let us all be merry.
 Now all our neighbours chimneys smoke,
 And Christmas blocks are burning ;
 Their ovens they with bak't-meats choke,
 And all their spits are turning.
 Without the doore let sorrow lie :
 And if for cold it hap to die,
 Weele bury't in a Christmas pye,
 And evermore be merry.
 Now every lad is wondrous trimm,
 And no man minds his labour.
 Our lasses have provided them
 A bag-pipe and a tabor.
 Young men and mayds, and girles and boyes,
 Give life to one anothers joyes :
 And you anon shall by their noyse
 Perceive that they are merry.
 Ranke misers now doe sparing shun :
 Their hall of musicke soundeth :
 And dogs thence with whole shoulders run,
 So all things there aboundeth.
 The country-folke themselves advance ;
 For crowdy-mutton's come out of France :
 And Jack shall pipe, and Jyll shall daunce,
 And all the towne be merry.
 Ned Swash hath fetcht his bands from pawne,
 And all his best apparell.
 Brisk Nell hath bought a ruffe of lawne,
 With droppings of the barrell.

And those that hardly all the yeare
Had bread to eat or raggs to weare,
Will have both clothes and daintie fare :
And all the day be merry.

Now poore men to the justices
With capons make their arrants, errands
And if they hap to faile of these,
They plague them with their warrants.
But now they feed them with good cheere,
And what they want, they take in beere :
For Christmas comes but once a yeare,
And then they shall be merry.

Good farmours in the countrey nurse
The poore, that else were undone.
Some land lords spend their money worse
On lust and pride at London.

There the roysters they doe play ;
Drabb and dice their lands away,
Which may be ours another day :
And therefore lets be merry.

The clyent now his suit forbearcs,
The prisoners heart is eased,
The debtor drinks away his cares,
And for the time is pleased.
Though others purses be more fat,
Why should we pine or grieve at that ?
Hang sorrow, care will kill a cat,
And therefore lets be merry.

Harke how the waggcs abroadc doe call
Each other forth to rambling.
Anon youle see them in the hall,
For nutts and apples scrambling.
Harke how the roofes with laughers sound !
Annon they 'l thinke the house goes round :
For they the sellars depth have found.
And there they will be merry.

The wenches with their wassell-bowles,
About the streets are singing :
The boyes are come to catch the owles,
The wild-mare in is bringing.
Our kitchin-boy hath broke his boxe,
And to the dealing of the oxe,
Our honest neighbours come by flocks,
And here they will be merry.

Now kings and queenes poore sheep-cotes have,
And mate with every body :
The honest now may play the knave,
And wise men play at noddie.
Some youths will now a mumming goe
Some others play at Rowland-hoe,
And twenty other gameboyes moe :
Because they will be merry.

Then wherefore in these merry daies,
Should we, I pray, be duller ?
No ; let us sing some roundelayes,
To make our mirth the fuller.
And whilst thus inspir'd we sing,
Let all the streets with ecchoes ring :
Woods and hills and every thing,
Beare witnesse we are merry.

(From the Miscellany appended to The Mistresse of Philarete.)

In Hampshire crowdy is a kind of pie ; the wild-mare, a see-saw in Shakespeare, is here the Yule-log ; gameboyes is gambols.

A Sonnet upon a Stolne Kisse.

Now gentle sleepe hath closed up those eyes,
Which waking kept my boldest thoughts in awe :
And free accesse unto that sweet lip lies,
From whence I long the rosie breath to draw.
Me thinkes no wrong it were, if I should steale
From those two melting rubies one poore kisse :
None sees the theft, that would the thiefe reveale,
Nor rob I her of ought which she can misse :
Nay, should I twenty kisses take away,
There would be little signe I had done so :
Why then should I this robbery delay ?
Oh ! she may wake, and therewith angry grow.
Well, if she do, Ile back restore that one,
And twenty hundred thousand more for lone.

(From the Miscellany appended to The Mistresse of Philarete.)

The Author's Resolution in a Sonnet.

Shall I, wasting in despaire
Dye because a woman's fair ?
Or make pale my cheeks with care,
Cause anothers Rosie are ?
Be she fairer than the Day
Or the flowry Meads in May,
If she thinke not well of me,
What care I how faire she be ?

Shall my seely heart be pin'd
Cause I see a woman kind ?
Or a well disposed Nature
Joyned with a lovely feature ?
Be she meeker, kinder than
Turtle-dove or Pellican :
If she be not so to me,
What care I how kind she be ?

Shall a woman's Vertues move
Me to perish for her Love ?
Or her wel deservings knowne
Make me quite forget mine own ?
Be she with that Goodness blest
Which may merit name of best :
If she be not such to me,
What care I how good she be ?

Cause her Fortune seems too high
Shall I play the fool and die ?
She that beares a Noble mind,
If not outward helps she find,
Thinks what with them he wold do,
That without them dares her wooe.
And unlesse that Minde I see
What care I how great she be ?

Great, or good, or kind, or faire
I will ne're the more despaire :
If she love me (this beleewe)
I will die ere she shall grieve.
If she slight me when I wooe,
I can scorne and let her goe,
For if she be not for me
What care I for whom she be ?

(From Fidelia.)

The principal editions of Wither's works are the Spenser Society's reprints (1871-83) and that edited by Mr Frank Sidgwick (2 vols. 1903). Mr Arber issued Philarete and Fidelia in his 'English Garner,' and Henry Morley published a selection in 1891.

Francis Rous (1579–1659), who divides with King David the honour of being the sweet psalmist of the Scottish people, was a Cornishman, born at his father's house of Halton, near Saltash. At Oxford he was already known as a sonneteer, and before he was twenty he had published Thule or Virtues History, a poem in imitation of Spenser. He graduated at Leyden too, and entered the Temple; but, settling in the country, produced between 1616 and 1627 a series of theological and devotional works—Meditations of Instruction, The Arte of Happines, The Oyl of Scorpions, &c. He was sent up to the House of Commons by Truro in 1625, was conspicuous in Parliament, and in 1643 was made provost of Eton College. He withdrew from the Presbyterian party, became a strong Independent, was a member of Cromwell's Council of State, and a month or two before his death was by Cromwell created a Lord of Parliament. He was a strenuous opponent both of popery and of Arminianism, and continued to write theological and political pamphlets and treatises—on the Mystical Marriage of the Soul to the Saviour, the Heavenlie Academie, &c.; and a number of his most important speeches have been preserved. His translation of the Psalms (1643) was not sanctioned by the English Parliament, but after being revised by himself (1646) and altered in a good many places by a Scottish committee, was adopted both by the General Assembly and the Scottish Parliament. Like the Westminster Assembly's Shorter Catechism, also an English production, the metrical translation of the Psalms became not merely part of the most cherished spiritual inheritance of the Scottish nation, but an important element in its intellectual education for more than two centuries. It served even as a kind of model for verse-writing to those who had access to few more poetical standards, and was only gradually extruded from its supremacy as the vehicle of praise in the public worship of the chief Presbyterian communions after the middle of the nineteenth century. It is mostly in 'common' ballad metre, with some 'long' metre psalms and a few 'peculiar' metres; is literal to (often over) the verge of unintelligibility, utterly lacking the dignity of the original; and as verse is harsh, uncouth, and generally hardly better than doggerel. But it is terse, simple, sincere; has won favourable comment from critics with no predilection for things Presbyterian or Scottish; was regarded as an adequate rendering of the psalter by a nation far from illiterate; and was interwoven with the most sacred associations of many generations of earnest Christian people.

Rous's version of the Psalms was printed in 1643, revised in 1646, and approved by the Long Parliament, but never came into use in England. The first metrical version used in Scotland from the Reformation till 1650 was the English 'Old Version' by Sternhold, Hopkins, and others. There was a version by King James and the Earl of Stirling (printed 1631), one by Mure of Rowallan (circulated in MS.), and one by Zachary Boyd (1646); but none of these was ever adopted for public worship. The General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, having Rous's version sent to them by the English Parliament, appointed a committee (including Zachary Boyd) to revise Rous's version for use in Scotland, taking advantage of Mure's and Boyd's versions; and in 1650 sanctioned the result of the committee's labours, still the standard version in Scotland. We give the last three verses of the Twenty-third Psalm in Rous's two versions, and that finally adopted by the Kirk of Scotland in 1650. Boyd's is given at page 515. A comparison will show how completely the so-called 'Scottish' version may still be regarded as the handiwork of the old English Roundhead.

Rous's Original Version, 1643.

And though I were even at death's doore,
yet would I feare none ill;
Thy rod, thy staffe do comfort me,
and thou art with me still.

Thou hast my table richly spread in presence of my foe;
My head with oile thou dost anoint,
my cup doth overflow.

Thy grace and mercy all my daies
shall surely follow me;
And ever in the house of God
my dwelling place shall be.

Rous's own Revised Version, 1646.

Yea though I walk in death's dark vale
I'll feare no evil thing;
Thou art with me, thy rod, thy staffe
to me do comfort bring.

Before me thou a table fitt'st
in presence of my foes:
My head thou dost with oile anoint,
my cup it overflowes.

Goodnesse and mercy all my life
shall surely follow me;
And in God's house for evermore
my dwelling place shall be.

Rous revised by the Scottish Committee, 1650.

Yea, though I walk in death's dark vale,
yet will I feare none ill:
For thou art with me; and thy rod and staff me comfort still.

My table thou hast furnished
in presence of my foes;
My head thou dost with oil anoint,
and my cup overflows.

Goodness and mercy all my life
shall surely follow me:
And in God's house for evermore
my dwelling-place shall be.

SCOTTISH LITERATURE.

James VI. to the Civil War.

WHEN the various racial and tribal elements in North Britain had been hammered into one monarchy, it was the Anglic stock of the Lowlands and not the Scotie of the West Highlands that obtained the upper hand under the Celtic line of kings; and it was their language—the Anglian, Northumbrian, or Northern English—spoken in the same form from the Forth to the Humber, that became the national language, and assisted in the process, not yet quite completed, of welding the several peoples of the north (Celtic, Anglic, Norse, and other) into one nation. The Highlander is yet very unlike the Lowlander in many points of temperament and character; but the national type is the essentially Anglo-Saxon, utterly un-Celtic Lowlander, hyper-English in his caution, ‘dourness,’ and undemonstrativeness. In Bede’s mouth Scotta-land meant the land of the Irish settlers in Argyll, of the Scoti; but by-and-by the Southrons naturally came to regard as Scots all the subjects of the sovereign officially styled King of Scots, and called his whole country Scotland. Inevitable, too, it was that the Lowlanders, though Anglic to the bone, should, in contradistinction to the Southern English with whom they were so often at war, at length speak of themselves as Scots. But apparently they carefully avoided speaking of their language as Scottish. Till the sixteenth century the Scottish tongue in Lowland usage meant the Scotie Erse or Irish Gaelic of Argyll. It was not till a time of special embitterment in the long wars between the northern and southern kingdoms, when north of Tweed resentment against the Southrons had reached its highest pitch, that, as we have seen, a Lowlander was moved to speak of the Lowland vernacular as Scottis (see page 164). And long before this the influence of Southern English on this Lowland tongue was quite marked.

The charm and power of the poetry of Chaucer contributed very largely to make the English of the southern Midlands the literary language for the whole of the great southern kingdom, reducing alike the tongue of the northerners in Northumbria and of the southerners in Sussex and Hampshire to the rank of provincial dialects. Chaucer’s power is seen in the fact that his combination of the native Midland English with the Norman-French, which for three hundred years had been the literary language of England, was henceforth, though to a very great extent French in vocabulary, to be regarded as the ‘well of English undefiled.’ In Scotland French never was the literary tongue, and though some Scots writers at times affected a pedantic Gallicism, the vernacular of the Lowlands never admitted anything like the same proportion of French words as did literary English; the words for which, in reading Lowland Scots, an Englishman requires a glossary are in the vast majority of cases words of pure English stock, fallen in England into desuetude. But on the vernacular benorth the Tweed Chaucer’s influence was also powerful, and southern forms became more and more frequent in Scots prose and verse. The Reformation (see page 166) gave a prodigious impulse to the Anglicising process; and the period from the first Reformation to what in Scotland is called the Second Reformation may be regarded as the last age during which the northern vernacular, the Lowland Scots, was the national tongue of the country beyond the Tweed. Of Scottish national literature in the national tongue it might at the accession of James to the crown of England have been said—as a century later at the union of the kingdoms was said by the Scottish chancellor of the Scottish parliament and polity—‘Now there’s ane end of ane old song.’ For from the union of the crowns it became the ambition of educated Scotsmen to write, and to be able to speak, the literary English of the court and of the south. And when in the beginning of the eighteenth century there was a revival of Lowland Scots it was not as a national tongue but as a provincial vernacular, admitted to literary use only for certain specific purposes. For the general purposes of literature English remained the vehicle; nobody now wrote books in Scots. Even Burns wrote many poems in English; and his letters are invariably in English, and rather florid English (save on the two or three occasions when he wrote a facetious and extravagant jargon). Scott made admirable use of an eclectic and partially Anglicised Lowland Scots for dialogue in his novels and in some of his songs; but even in writing the history of Scotland for a Scottish boy, he would have regarded as absurd any attempt to indite the work in the Lowland vernacular he knew and loved so well. If not in James’s reign, then during the commotions begun under his successor the Lowland Scots ceases to be the normal literary instrument of Scotsmen. The vernacular was reserved for increasingly restricted purposes and for secondary literary uses; in conversation even the educated went on speaking at home a mixed dialect quite as much Scottish as English. But the language of the pulpit and the bar, as well as of books, approximate very closely to English, with northern words and frequent Scotticisms it might be; the transitional compounds of Scottish-English or English-Scottish are many, curious, and variously proportioned. By the middle of the seventeenth century many Scotsmen wrote passable English, though when they essayed to speak it their tongue bewrayed them—the Scottish ‘accent’ remained indefeasible; even to this day a perfectly English tongue in a Scottish mouth is sufficiently rare. But with the educated it is a matter of intonation and utterance, hardly at all of vocabulary or dialect.

The outstanding fact in the history of Scottish literature (see pages 167, 168) is that, from the later part of the sixteenth century and throughout the next, notable names are—in contrast with earlier profusion—sadly few in number. Against scores of famous English writers, including Spenser and Shakespeare, Sidney and Raleigh, Hooker and Bacon, it is difficult to choose a dozen Scotsmen as worth naming at all, even if one includes Montgomery and Ayton, the Earls of Stirling and Ancrum. Who but specialists read even Drummond now? Napier was a genius, but he does not belong to literature; Rutherford and Leighton are prized for their spiritual and devotional power. We set to the national credit all the Scottish authors who—like Drummond and most of the others in verse; like the amazing Sir Thomas Urquhart, the ‘Bluidy Mackenzie,’ and Fletcher of Saltoun in prose—wrote no longer Scots, but as good English as they could compass. But even so, Scotland has little or nothing to set alongside the works of Hobbes, Milton, Jeremy Taylor, Bunyan, Dryden; nothing at all to give promise of a coming renaissance—of Hume and Adam Smith, of Dugald Stewart, Smollett, Boswell, Henry Mackenzie, Burns, in the eighteenth century; or of Scott and Jeffrey, of Chalmers, Christopher North, Carlyle, in the nineteenth.

As Professor Masson testifies, he is but a poor Scotsman who, noting the literary insignificance of Scotland in the seventeenth century, forgets that it was then precisely that Scotland exerted its most decisive influence on the general history of the British islands, or doubts that the result was largely ‘traceable to Scotland’s obstinate perseverance so long in her own peculiar politico-ecclesiastical controversy, and to what had been argued or done in the course of it, on one side or the other, by such men as Andrew Melville, Alexander Henderson, Argyle, Montrose, Claverhouse, and Carstares.’ The century may be roughly divided into two halves; and the barrenness of this most barren period is mitigated by the first appearance—or by the redaction in something like their present shape—of many of the Scottish ballads.

King James VI. and I. (1566–1625), the Scottish Solomon, would have been untrue to himself had he not even in boyhood cherished the ambition of gaining fame as an author. ‘The wisest fool in Christendom’ was exceptionally well educated, and had some literary aptitude: Macaulay, exaggerating antitheses as usual, affirmed that he was made up of two men—‘a nervous drivelling fool, who acted,’ and ‘a witty well-read scholar, who wrote, disputed, and harangued.’ But his writing, like his disputing and haranguing, was mostly tedious and to little purpose.

He began to publish when a boy of eighteen, and in the Scottish vernacular. Ane Schort Treatise of Scottis Poesie (1584) contained ‘reulis and cautelis to be observit and eschewit,’ absurd and arbitrary many of them; but all early literary criticism has historic value. The Treatise was followed by his Essayes of a Prentise in the Divine Art of Poesie, in which he doubtless illustrated as far as he could his rules and cautions, without too great success: the experiments comprised sonnets in Scottish; Ane Schort Poeme of Tyme, also in Scottish; The Phoenix, inspired by Pliny, in seven-line stanzas; and a close and fairly spirited translation of L’Uranie of Du Bartas, who, as ambassador from the King of Navarre, flattered the King of Scots to the top of his bent. A later volume of Poeticall Exercises contains more translations from Du Bartas, the king’s extraordinary doggerel glorification of the battle of Lepanto in ballad metre, and a translation of the same into French by the admiring diplomat, as the work of ‘the Apollo of our time’! This longest of James’s poems (nearly a thousand lines) runs like this:

The Turkish Host in manner like
Themselves they did array,
The which two Bashaas did command
And order everie way.
For Portan Basha had in charge
To governe all by land,
And Ali-Basha had by sea
The only cheife command.

The Schort Poeme of Tyme belongs to a decidedly higher category:

As I was pansing in a morning aire, pensing, meditating
And could not sleip nor nawayis take me rest,
Furth for to walk, the morning was sa faire,
Athort the fields, it seemed to me the best.
The East was cleare, whereby belyve I gest guessed
That fyrie Titan cumming was in sight,
Obscuring chast Diana by his light.

Who by his rysing in the azure skyes,
Did dewlie helse all thame on earth do dwell. greet
The balmie dew through birning drouth he drys,
Which made the soile to savour sweet and smell,
By dew that on the night before downe fell,
Which then was soukit up by the Delphienns heit
Up in the aire: it was so light and weit.

Whose hie ascending in his purpoure Sphere
 Provoked all from Morpheus to flee :
 As beasts to feid, and birds to sing with beir, birr, noise
 Men to their labour, bissie as the Bee :
 Yet ydle men devysing did I see
 How for to dryve the tyme that did them irk,
 By sindrie pastymes, quhill that it grew mirk.

Then woundred I to see them seik a wyle
 So willingly the precious tyme to tyne : lose
 And how they did them selfis so farr begyle,
 To fashe of tyme, which of itself is fyne. trouble at
 Fra tyme be past to call it bakwart syne brief
 Is bot in vaine : therefore men sould be warr ware
 To sleuth the tyme that flees fra them so farr. pursue

For what hath man bot tyme into this lyfe,
 Which gives him dayis his God aright to know ?
 Wherefore then sould we be at sic a stryfe,
 So spedelie our selfis for to withdraw
 Evin from the tyme, which is on nowayes slaw
 To flie from us, suppose we fled it noght ?
 More wyse we were, if we the tyme had soght.

But sen that tyme is sic a precious thing,
 I wald we sould bestow it into that
 Which were most pleasour to our heavenly King.
 Flee ydilteth, which is the greatest lat ; idleness
 Bot, sen that death to all is destinat,
 Let us employ that tyme that God hath send us,
 In doing weill, that good men may commend us.

James's metrical version of the Psalms (said to be mainly the Earl of Stirling's work) was not published till 1631. In Lusus Regius (1901) Professor Rait, who had (in The Royal Rhetorician, 1900) reprinted the Treatise, the Essays, and the Counterblast, printed (in folio) nineteen unprinted poems and prose pieces from a volume of James's MSS. found in the Bodleian in 1900. [See also New Poems by James I. of England (1911), by A. F. Westcott.]

James's most noted prose publications, in English as he understood it, are the Dæmonology (1597), the Basilicon Doron (1599), and A Counterblast against Tobacco (1604); but he issued four Meditations on Scripture and a tractate on the Oath of Allegiance. The Doron was written for the instruction of his son Prince Henry a short time before the union of the crowns. Allowance being made for James's 'high' view of the royal prerogative, it is a shrewd, sensible, and well-worded treatise on the duties and responsibilities of kings. He instances the evil example of James V., 'who by his adulterie bred the wracke of his lawfull daughter and heire, in begetting that bastard, who unnaturally rebelled, and procured the ruine of his owne Soverane and sister;' and he denounces 'such famous invectives as Buchanans or Knoxes Chronicles, and if any of these infamous libels remaine untill your daies, use the law upon the keepers thereof.' C. H. M'Ilwain edited his Political Works (1919). In the preface to the Dæmonology the king displays his learning in maintaining the existence of witches :

Sorcery and Witchcraft.

The fearefull abounding at this time in this Countrey of these detestable slaues of the Diuel, the Witches or enchaunters, hath mooued mee (beloued Reader) to dispatch in post, this following Treatise of mine, not in any wise (as I protest) to serue for a shew of my learning and ingine, but onely (moued of conscience) to preasse thereby, so farre as I can, to resolute the doubting hearts of many; both that such assaults of Satan are most certainly practised, and that the instruments thereof merits most seuerely to be punished: against the damnable opinions of two principally in our aage, whereof the one called Scot, an Englishman, is not ashamed in publike Print to deny, that there can be such a thing as Witch-craft: and so maintaines the old error of the Sadduces in denying of spirits; The other called Wierus, a German Physition, sets out a publike Apologie for all these crafts-folkes, whereby, procuring for their impunitie, he plainly bewrayes himselfe to haue bene one of that profession. And for to make this Treatise the more pleasant and facill, I haue put it in forme of a Dialogue, which I haue diuided into three Bookes: The first speaking of Magie in generall, and Necromancie in speciall: The second, of Sorcerie and Witch-craft: and the third contains a discourse of all these kinds of spirits, and Spectres that appeares and troubles persons, together with a conclusion of the whole worke. My intention in this labour is onely to prooue two things, as I haue already said: The one, that such diuelish artes haue bene and are: The other, what exact triall and seuer punishment they merit: and therefore reason I, What kinde of things are possible to be performed in these Arts, and by what naturall causes they may be, not that I touch euery particular thing of the Diuels power, for that were infinite: but onely to speake scholastickely, (since this cannot be spoken in our language) I reason vpon genus, leauing species and differentia to bee comprehended therein: As for example, speaking of the power of Magiciens, in the first booke and sixt Chapter, I say, that they can suddenly cause be brought vnto them all kinds of daintie dishes by their familiar spirit; since as a thiefe he delights to steale, and as a spirit he can subtilly and suddenly ynough transport the same. Now vnder this genus may be comprehended all particulars depending thereupon; such as the bringing Wine out of a wall (as wee haue heard oft to haue bene practised) and such others; which particulars are sufficiently prooued by the reasons of the generall.

How Witches Travel.

Philomathes. Bvt by what way say they, or thinke yee it possible they can come to these vnlawfull conuentions?

Epistemon. There is the thing which I esteeme their senses to be deluded in, and though they lie not in confessing of it, because they thinke it to be trew, yet not to be so in substance or effect: for they say that by diuers means they may conueene either to the adoring of their Master, or to the putting in practise any seruice of his, committed vnto their charge: one way is naturall, which is naturall riding, going, or sailing, at what houre their master comes and aduertises them: and this way may be easily beleueed: another way is some-what more strange, and yet it is possible to bee trew: which is, by being caried by the force of the spirit which is their conductor, either aboue the earth, or aboue the Sea swiftly, to the place where they are to meete: which I am perswaded to bee likewise possible, in respect that as Habakkuk was carried by the Angel in that forme, to the den where Daniel lay; so thinke I, the diuell will be readie to imitate God, as well in that as in other things: which is much more possible to him to doe, being a Spirit, then to a mighty wind, being but a naturall Meteore, to transport from one place to another, a solide body, as is commonly and daily seene in practise: But in this violent forme they cannot be caried but a short bounds, agreeing with the space that they may retaine their breath: for if it were longer, their breath could not remaine vnextinguished, their body being caried in such a violent and forcible maner; as by example: If one fall off a small height, his life is but in perill, according to the hard or soft lighting: but if one fall from an high and stay [steep] rocke, his breath will be forcibly banished from the body, before he can win to the earth, as is oft seene by experience: And in this transporting they say themselues, that they are inuisible to any other, except amongst themselues, which may also be possible in my opinion: For if the deuill may forme what kinde of impressions he pleases in the aire, (as I haue said before, speaking of Magic) why may hee not farre easilier thicken and obscure so the aire that is next about them, by contracting it straite together, that the beames of any other mans eyes cannot pierce thorow the same, to see them? But the third way of their comming to their conuentions, is that wherein I thinke them deluded: for some of them say, that being transformed in the likenesse of a little beast or foule, they will come and pierce through whatsoever house or church, though all ordinarie passages be closed, by whatsoever open the aire may enter in at: And some say that their bodies lying still, as in an extasie, their spirits will be rauished out of their bodies, and caried to such places; and for verifying thereof, will giue euident tokens, as well by witnesses that haue seene their body lying sencelesse in the meane time, as by naming persons whom-with they met, and giuing tokens what purpose was amongst them, whom otherwise they could not haue knowen: for this forme of iourneying, they affirme to vse most, when they are transported from one countrey to another.

In his Counterblast James declares that many of the nobles and gentry spent three and four hundred pounds [Scots, it is to be hoped] a year on tobacco. The man, he says, who introduced it was 'generally hated,' meaning Raleigh. He seems to have done Raleigh an injustice (small compared with his other sins against him!) in making him the introducer of tobacco. It was almost certainly Drake or Hawkins who brought tobacco hither; but Raleigh had doubtless much to do with promoting its popularity by encouraging the growth of it. James concludes his Counterblast with these emphatic words: 'Smoking is a custome loathsome to the eye, hatefull to the nose, harmefull to the braine, dangerous to the lungs, and in the blacke stinking fume thereof, nearest resembling the horrible Stigian smoake of the pit that is bottomlesse.'

Alexander Hume (1560?-1609), a son of Patrick Hume, Baron Polwarth, studied at St Andrews and Paris for the Scottish bar, held some court appointments, but in 1598 forsook the world to enter the Church, and died the sternly Puritan minister of Logie in 1609. He published a volume of Hymns or Sacred Songs in the year 1599. The most finished poem is a description of a summer's day, which he calls the Day Estiuall. The natural aspects of Scottish landscape are painted with truth and clearness, and the poem is instinct with devout feeling. It opens as follows:

O perfit light, which shaid away shed, divided
The darkenes from the light,
And set a ruler ou'r the day, over
Ane uther ou'r the night;

Thy glorie, when the day foorth flies,
Mair vively dois appeare, lively
Nor at mid-day unto our eyes
The shining Sun is cleare.

The shaddow of the earth anon
Remoooves and drawes by,
Sine in the East, when it is gon, then
Appeares a clearer sky;

Quhilk Sunne perceaves the little larks,
The lapwing and the snyp;
And tunes their sangs like nature's clarks,
O'er midow, mure, and stryp.

The summer day of the poet is one of unclouded splendour:

The time sa tranquill is and still,
That na where sall ye find,
Saif on ane high and barren hill,
An air of peeping wind.

All trees and simples, great and small,
That balmy leif do beir;
Nor thay were painted on a wall,
Nae mair they move or steir.

The rivers fresh, the callor streames cool
Ou'r rocks can softlie rin, do
The water cleare like chrystall seames,
And makes a pleasant din.

The condition of the Scottish labourer would seem to have been then more comfortable than at present, and the climate of the country warmer, for Hume describes those working in the fields as stopping at midday, 'noon meat and sleep to take,' and refreshing themselves with 'caller wine' in a cave, and 'sallads steeped in oil.' As the poet lived four years in France, he was doubtless drawing on his Continental recollections for some of the features in this picture. At length 'the gloaming comes, the day is spent,' and the poet concludes in a strain of pious gratitude and joy:

What pleasour were to walke and see
Endlang a river cleare, Along
The perfit forme of everie tree
Within the deepe appeare.

The salmon out of cruifs and creils,
Uphailed into skowts,
The bels and circles on the weills
Through lowppping of the trouts. leaping

O then it were a seemely thing,
While all is still and calme,
The praise of God to play and sing,
With cornet and with shalme.

Throw all the land great is the gild
Of rustik folks that crie;
Of bleiting sheep fra they be fild,
Of calves and rowting ky. lowing kine

All labourers drawes hame at even,
And can till uther say,
Thanks to the gracious God of heauen,
Quhilk send this summer day.

Cruifs and creels, cruives and baskets, are frames of wooden spars and wickerwork contrivances in rivers for catching fish; skowts are boats; and weills are patches of deep dead-water at the bend of a stream.

The Triumph of the Lord is his account of the 'defait of the Spanish Navie.' He prefixes to his poem an exhortation to the Scottish youth to forswear profane sonnets, vain ballads, and fabulous romances (which we must think were not very much in demand); denounced popery; and published some sermons and a treatise on conscience. The Poems were edited for the Scottish Text Society by A. Lawson (1902); and there is the Rev. Menzies Fergusson's Alexander Hume, an early Poet-Pastor of Logie (Paisley, 1899).

Sir Robert Ayton (1570-1638), Scottish courtier and poet, was the son of Ayton of Kinaldie, near St Andrews, graduated at St Andrews, studied law at Paris, and was ambassador to the Emperor. James I. appointed him one of the gentlemen of the bed-chamber, and private secretary to his queen, besides conferring upon him the honour of knighthood. Ben Jonson told Drummond that Sir Robert loved him (Jonson) dearly. Aubrey says he was acquainted with all the wits in England, specially naming Hobbes of Malmesbury. He was a man of culture; wrote verses in French, Latin, and Greek; and was one of the first Scotsmen to write English, prose and verse, with tolerable purity. He was, indeed, one of the very earliest of the Cavalier poets; and Dryden accounted some of his verses as amongst the best of that age. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Diophantus and Charidora is not a great poem, though better than his stilted and awkward Latin verses. The best known of his shorter poems—some of them wonderfully felicitous—is Inconstancy Upbraided (sometimes called To an Inconstant Mistress):

I loved thee once, I'll love no more;
Thine be the grief as is the blame;
Thou art not what thou wast before,
What reason I should be the same?
He that can love unloved again,
Hath better store of love than brain:
God send me love my debts to pay,
While unthrifts fool their love away.

Nothing could have my love o'erthrown,
If thou hadst still continued mine;
Yea, if thou hadst remained thine own,
I might perchance have yet been thine.
But thou thy freedom did recall,
That it thou mightst elsewhere enthral;
And then, how could I but disdain
A captive's captive to remain?

When new desires had conquered thee,
And changed the object of thy will,
It had been lethargy in me,
Not constancy, to love thee still.
Yea, it had been a sin to go
And prostitute affection so,
Since we are taught no prayers to say
To such as must to others pray.

Yet do thou glory in thy choice,
Thy choice of his good-fortune boast;
I'll neither grieve nor yet rejoice,
To see him gain what I have lost;
The height of my disdain shall be,
To laugh at him, to blush for thee;
To love thee still, but go no more
A begging at a beggar's door.

On rather slender authority another famous poem (of which Burns made a rather poor Scottish version) has been credited to him, as has also the prototype of Burns's Auld Lang Syne. Probably the poem An Inconstant Mistress, given below, was confounded with Inconstancy Upbraided, given above:

I do confess thou'rt smooth and fair,
And I might have gone near to love thee;
Had I not found the slightest prayer
That lips could speak had power to move thee:
But I can let thee now alone,
As worthy to be loved by none.

I do confess thou'rt sweet, yet find
Thee such an unthrift of thy sweets,
Thy favours are but like the wind,
Which kisses everything it meets,
And since thou canst love more than one,
Thou'rt worthy to be kissed by none.

The morning rose that untouched stands,
Armed with her briers, how sweet she smells!
But plucked and strained through ruder hands,
Her sweets no longer with her dwells;
But scent and beauty both are gone,
And leaves fall from her one by one.

Such fate ere long will thee betide,
When thou hast handled been a while,
Like fair flowers to be thrown aside;
And thou shalt sigh, when I shall smile,
To see thy love to every one
Hath brought thee to be loved by none.

The first verse (first of six) of Old Long Syne is as follows:

Should old acquaintance be forgot,
And never thought upon?
The flames of love extinguished,
And freely past and gone?

Is thy kind heart now grown so cold,
In that loving breast of thine,
That thou canst never once reflect
On old long-syne ?

The Earl of Stirling—William Alexander of Menstrie (1567?–1640), made an earl by Charles I. in 1633—was a conspicuous Scottish courtier and public functionary as well as a fairly prolific poet. Born at Menstrie, in the house which afterwards gave birth to Sir Ralph Abercromby, he studied at Glasgow and Leyden; travelled in France, Spain, and Italy; and published Aurora (1604) and a series of four Monarchicke Tragedies—Darius (1603), Cræsus (1604), The Alexandraean Tragedy (1605), and Julius Cæsar (1607). The theme in all four plays is the fall of ambition; they copy Seneca, after the manner of his French followers; dignified in style, they contain some fine lyrics, but are utterly wearisome. He was knighted by 1609; in 1613 was attached to the household of Prince Charles; in 1614 was made Master of Requests for Scotland, and published Part I. of his huge poem Doomesday (not completed till 1637). He received in 1621 the grant of 'Nova Scotia,' a vast tract in Canada and what now is the United States; in 1631 he was made sole printer of King James's version of the Psalms. From 1626 till his death he was the Secretary of State for Scotland; and in 1627–31 he was also made Keeper of the Signet, a Commissioner of Exchequer, and a Judge of the Court of Session. The French pushed their conquests in America, and Alexander's grant of lands became valueless. Long unpopular as too self-seeking and avaricious, he was now suspected and hated. In 1630 he was created Viscount and in 1633 Earl of Stirling, in 1639 also Earl of Dovan (Burns's 'crystal Devon'), but he died insolvent in London next year. His tragedies are not dramatic, but their quatrains are graceful. The songs, sonnets, elegies, and madrigals forming the Aurora are marred by conceits, yet show fancy and ingenuity; his friendly rival, Drummond, said he was a better poet than Tasso. His amatory poems Stirling did not include in his collected Recreations with the Muses (1637). The Julius Cæsar play contains some passages rather noticeably resembling Shakespeare's; but as the greater drama was almost certainly written some years before, there is no ground for holding—as used to be held—that Shakespeare borrowed from Stirling. A famous passage in the Tempest was supposed—somewhat hypercritically (though in this case the date of the Tempest, 1611 or thereabouts, would permit the derivation)—to be also derived from the Earl of Stirling. In his play of Darius the reflection,

Of glassie scepters let fraile greatnesse vaunt,
Not scepters, no, but reeds, which (rais'd up) break,
And let eye-flatt'ring shows our wits enchant,
All perish'd are, ere of their pomp men speak;

Those golden palaces, those gorgeous halls,
With furniture superfluously faire,
Those stately courts, those skie-encountering walls,
Do vanish all like vapours in the ayre.
O! what affliction jealous greatnesse beares,
Which still must travell to hold others downe,
Whil'st all our guards not guard us from our feares;
Such toile attends the glory of a crowne!

inevitably recalls Shakespeare's lines:

And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind!

The following is one of the Earl of Stirling's best sonnets:

I sweare, Aurora, by thy starrie eyes,
And by those golden lockes whose locke none slips,
And by the corall of thy rosie lippes,
And by the naked snowes which beauteie dies,
I sweare by all the jewels of thy mind,
Whose like yet never worldly treasure bought,
Thy solide judgement and thy generous thought,
Which in this darkened age have clearly shin'd:
I sweare by those, and by my spotlesse love,
And by my secret yet most fervent fires,
That I have never nurs'd but chaste desires,
And such as modestie might well approve.
Then since I love those vertuous parts in thee,
Shouldst thou not love this vertuous mind in me?

The Glasgow edition of the Earl of Stirling's works (1870) was superseded by that of Kastner and Charlton (2 vols. 1927–29). See also the Memorials by Charles Rogers (1877).

Robert Earl of Ancrum (1578–1654), son of Ker of Ancrum and grandson of Ker of Ferniehirst, enjoyed the favour of James and of Charles I., by whom he was promoted to various court appointments and made Earl of Ancrum. On Charles's execution he retired to Amsterdam, where he died in debt. He translated the Psalms, like others of his contemporaries; and the following sonnet, addressed to Drummond of Hawthornden in 1624 (as reproduced in Ker's Correspondence, 1875), shows how since the unions of the crowns the Scottish vernacular was being supplanted by English:

Sweet solitary life: lonely, dumb joy,
That need'st no warnings how to grow more wise
By other men's mishaps, nor the annoy
Which from sore wrongs done to one's self doth rise.
The morning's second mansion, Truth's first friend,
Never acquainted with the world's vain broils,
When the whole day to our own use we spend,
And our dear time no fierce ambition spoils.
Most happy state, that never tak'st revenge
For injuries received, nor dost fear
The Court's great earthquake, the griev'd truth of change,
Nor none of falsehood's savoury lyes dost hear;
Nor know'st Hope's sweet disease that charms our sense,
Nor it's sad cure, dear-bought Experience.

To the sonnet he appended this note: 'The date of this starved rhyme and the place was the very Bedchamber where I could not sleep.' See his Correspondence with his son, the third Earl of Lothian (1875).

William Drummond of Hawthornden (1585-1649) rose as a poet above mere provincial fame, and was associated in friendship and genius with his great English contemporaries. His father, Sir John Drummond, was gentleman-usher to King James, and the poet seems to have inherited his reverence for royalty—few authors have been more outspoken in their loyalty. Having graduated at Edinburgh and studied civil law in France (1607-8), he succeeded his father in 1610 as second laird of Hawthornden—a perfect home for a poet. In all Scotland there are few more beautiful glens than the cliffs, caves, and wooded banks of the Esk at Hawthornden, hereafter to be known for Drummond's sake as 'classic Hawthornden;' and 'close by is the ornately sculptured Roslin Chapel, besung by Scott. Drummond was a most accomplished man, well read not merely in Greek and Latin literature, but in French, Italian, Spanish, and Hebrew. In 1613 he published Tears on the Death of Mæliades, or Henry, Prince of Wales. In 1616 appeared a volume of Poems: Amorous, Funerall, Divine, Pastorall, in Sonnets, Songs, Sextains, Madrigals, chiefly of love and sorrow. He was on the point of marrying, when the lady died (1614 or 1615); many years later (1632) he married Elizabeth Logan. Forth Feasting, a Panegyric to the King's Most Excellent Majesty (1617), congratulates James effusively and lengthily on his revisiting his native country of Scotland. Drummond spent his life mainly between poetry and mechanical experiments—the poet patented a new kind of pistol, a pike, a battering-ram, a telescope, a burning glass, an anemometer, and a condenser. He abhorred the Covenant, but was constrained to subscribe it, relieving his feelings by bitterly sarcastic verses. His affection for the royal cause and the king's person was so keen that grief for the royal martyr's death hastened his own. Flowers of Zion appeared in 1623: his prose works include a History of the Five Jameses, some royalist and polemical tracts, and The Cypress Grove, a prose meditation on death, which Professor Masson pronounces 'superlatively excellent,' insomuch that there is, he thinks, nothing of the same length superior, if anything quite equal to it, in all Sir Thomas Browne or Jeremy Taylor—though the style is in places laboured. Drummond was intimate with Drayton; and his friendship with Ben Jonson was cemented by a memorable visit paid to him by Jonson at Hawthornden in the winter of 1618. During Jonson's stay at Hawthornden, the Scottish poet kept notes of the opinions expressed by the great dramatist, and chronicled some of his foibles and failings (see page 403). It should be remembered that his notes were private memoranda, never published by himself; but their truth has been partly confirmed from other sources. Printed in 1711 (abridged) and in 1842, the Conversations were first reproduced in full from the original MS. by R. F. Patterson in 1923. In Jonson and Drummond (1925) C. L. Stainer tries to prove the Conversations a forgery. Drummond's poetry is sweet rather than strong; many of his sonnets are admirable and exquisite, and, as compared with his other poems, have fewer conceits and more natural feeling, elevation of sentiment, and grace of expression. He wrote a number of madrigals, epigrams, and other short pieces, some of which are rather coarse. The purity of his language, the harmony of his verse, and the play of fancy, musical sweetness, and melancholy mysticism are conspicuous features, but his range was manifestly limited. With more energy and force of mind he would have been a greater favourite with Ben Jonson—and with posterity. He shows pronounced traces of Italian influence; but he was more sensitive to natural scenery than any of his contemporaries, and he was one of the first to see and record the beauty of a snow-clad hill.

From 'Forth Feasting.'

What blustering Noise now interrupts my Sleep?
What echoing Shouts thus cleave my chrystal Deep,
And seem to call me from my wat'ry Court?
What Melody? What Sounds of Joy and Sport,
Are convey'd hither from each neighbouring Spring?
With what loud Rumours do the Mountains ring?
Which in unusual Pomp on Tip-toes stand,
And (full of Wonder) overlook the Land? [bright,
Whence comes these glitt'ring Throgs, these Meteors
This golden People glancing in my Sight?
Whence doth this Praise, Applause and Love, arise?
What Load-star East-ward draweth thus all Eyes?
Am I awake? Or have some Dreams conspir'd
To mock my Sense with what I most desir'd?
View I that living Face, see I those Looks,
Which with Delight were wont t' amaze my Brooks?

Do I behold that Worth, that Man divine,
 This Age's Glory, by these Banks of mine?
 Then find I true what long I wish'd in vain;
 My much beloved Prince is come again;
 So unto them whose Zenith is the Pole,
 When Six black Months are past, the Sun doth roll:
 So after Tempest to Sea-tossed Wights
 Faire Helen's Brothers show their chearing Lights:
 So comes Arabia's Wonder from her Woods,
 And far far off is seen by Memphis Floods,
 The feather'd Sylvans cloud-like by her fly,
 And with triumphing Plaudits beat the Sky,
Nyle marvels, Serap's Priests (entranced) rave,
 And in Mygdonian Stone her Shape ingrave;
 In lasting Cedars they do mark the Time
 In which Apollo's Bird came to their Clime.

Let Mother Earth now deckt with Flow'rs be seen:
 And sweet breath'd Zephyres curl the Meadows green,
 Let Heaven weep Rubies in a Crimson Show'r,
 Such as on Indies Shoars they use to pour:
 Or with that golden Storm the Fields adorn,
 Which Jove rain'd when his Blew-ey'd Maid was born.
 May never Hours the Web of Day out-weave,
 May never Night rise from her sable Cave.
 Swell proud my Billows, faint not to declare
 Your Joys as ample as their Causes are:
 For Murmurs hoarse, sound like Arion's Harp,
 Now delicately flat, now sweetly sharp;
 And you my Nymphs, rise from your moist Repair;
 Strow all your Springs and Grotts with Lillies fair;
 Some swiftest-footed, get them hence, and pray
 Our Floods and Lakes come keep this Holy-day;
 What e're beneath Albania's Hills do run,
 Which see the rising or the setting Sun,
 Which drink stern Grampius' mists, or Ochel's Snows:
 Stone-rolling Tay, Tine Tortoise-like that flows,
 The pearly Don, the Dees, the fertile Spey.
 Wild Neverne, which doth see our longest Day;
Ness smoaking Sulphur, Leave with Mountains crown'd
 Strange Loamond for his floating Isles renown'd:
 The Irish Rian, Ken, the Silver Air,
 The snaky Dun, the Ore with rushy Hair,
 The Christal-streaming Nid, loud bellowing Clyde,
Tweed which no more our Kingdoms shall divide:
 Rank-swelling Annan, Lid with curled Streams,
 The Eskes, the Solway where they lose their Names,
 To ev'ry one proclaim our Joys and Feasts,
 Our Triumphs; bid all come and be our Guests:
 And as they meet in Neptune's azure Hall,
 Bid them bid Sea-Gods keep this Festival;
 This Day shall by our Currants be renown'd,
 Our Hills about shall still this Day resound:
 Nay, that our Love more to this Day appear,
 Let us with it henceforth begin our Year.

To Virgins, Flow'rs; to Sun-burnt Earth, the Rain;
 To Mariners fair Winds amidst the Main,
 Cool Shades to Pilgrims, which hot glances burn,
 Are not so pleasing as thy blest Return.
 That Day (dear Prince).

Epitaph on Prince Henry.

Stay, Passenger, see where enclosed lies
 The Paragon of Princes, fairest Frame,
 Time, Nature, Place, could show to mortal Eyes,
 In Worth, Wit, Virtue, Miracle of Fame:
 At least that Part the Earth of him could claim
 This Marble holds (hard like the Destinies)

For as to his brave Sp'rit, and glorious Name,
 The one the World, the other fills the Skies.
 Th' immortal Amaranthus, princely Rose,
 Sad Violet, and that sweet Flow'r that bears
 In Sanguine Spots the Tenor of our Woes,
 Spread on this Stone, and wash it with your Tears.

Then go and tell from Gades unto Inde,
 You saw where Earth's Perfections were confin'd.

Milton in his Lycidas introduced in the same way the fabled origin of the hyacinth:

Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge
 Like to that sanguine flower, inscribed with woe.

To his Lute.

My Lute, be as thou wert when thou did grow
 With thy green Mother in some shady Grove,
 When immelodious Winds but made thee move,
 And Birds their Ramage did on thee bestow. warbling
 Since that dear Voice which did thy sounds approve,
 Which wont in such harmonious Strains to flow,
 Is reft from Earth to tune those Spheres above,
 What are thou but a Harbinger of Woe?
 Thy pleasing Notes be pleasing Notes no more,
 But Orphans Wailings to their fainting Ear,
 Each Stroke a Sigh, each Sound draws forth a Tear,
 For which be silent as in Woods before:
 Or if that any Hand to touch thee daign,
 Like widow'd Turtle still her Loss complain.

The Praise of a Solitary Life.

Thrice happy he who by some shady Grove,
 Far from the clam'rous World, doth live his own.
 Though solitary, who is not alone,
 But doth converse with that eternal Love:
 O how more sweet is Birds harmonious Moan,
 Or the hoarse Sobblings of the Widow'd Dove,
 Than those smooth Whisperings near a Prince's Throne,
 Which Good make doubtful, do the Evil approve!
 O how more sweet is Zephyr's wholesome Breath,
 And Sighs embalm'd, which new-born Flow'rs unfold,
 Than that Applause vain Honour doth bequeath!
 How sweet are Streams to poysen drunk in Gold!
 The World is full of Horrors, Troubles, Sights,
 Woods harmless Shades have only true Delights.

To a Nightingale.

Sweet Bird that sing'st away the early Hours,
 Of Winters past or coming void of Care,
 Well pleased with Delights which present are,
 Fair seasons, budding Sprays, sweet-smelling Flow'rs:
 To Rocks, to Springs, to Rills, from leavy Bow'rs,
 Thou thy Creator's Goodness dost declare,
 And what dear Gifts on thee he did not spare,
 A Stain to humane Sense in Sin that low'rs.
 What Soul can be so sick, which by thy Songs
 (Attir'd in sweetness) sweetly is not driven
 Quite to forget Earth's Turmoils, Spites and Wrongs,
 And lift a reverent Eye and Thought to Heaven?
 Sweet artless Songster, thou my Mind doest raise,
 To Ayres of Spheres, yea and to Angels layes.

Sonnets.

In Mind's pure Glass when I my self behold,
 And lively see how my best Days are spent,
 What Clouds of Care above my Head are rol'd,
 What coming Ill, which I cannot prevent:

My course begun I wearied do repent,
 And would embrace what Reason oft hath told,
 But scarce thus think I, when Love hath control'd
 All the best Reasons Reason could invent.
 Tho sure I know my Labour's End is Grief,
 The more I strive that I the more shall pine,
 That only Death shall be my last Relief:
 Yet when I think upon that Face divine,
 Like one with Arrow shot, in Laughter's place,
 Mauge my Heart, I joy in my Disgrace.

I know that all beneath the Moon decays,
 And what by Mortals in this World is brought,
 In Time's great Periods shall return to nought;
 That fairest States have fatal Nights and Days.
 I know that all the Muses heavenly Lays,
 With toil of Sp'rit, which are so dearly bought,
 As idle Sounds of few or none are sought,
 That there is nothing lighter than vain Praise.
 I know frail Beauty like the purple Flower,
 To which one Morn oft Birth and Death affords,
 That Love a jarring is of Minds Accords,
 Where Sense and Will bring under Reason's Power:
 Know what I list, all this cannot me move,
 But that (alas) I both must Write, and Love.

There is no ground, happily, for attributing to Drummond, as was done till quite lately, the coarse, clever, farcical macaronic, Polemo-Middinia, published anonymously in 1683, and probably written by an obscure pamphleteer and rhymester, Samuel Colvill, who was publishing his things between 1670 and 1690.

In this passage from the Cypress Grove we see Drummond dealing with one of the great problems of urn burial somewhat in the spirit and after the manner of Browne:

For to easy censure it would appear that the soul, if it can fore-see that divorcement which it is to have from the body, should not without great reason be thus over-grieved, and plunged in inconsolable and unaccustom'd sorrow: considering their near union, long familiarity and love, with the great change, pain, and ugliness, which are apprehended to be the inseparable attendants of death.

They had their being together, parts they are of one reasonable creature, the harming of the one is the weakning of the working of the other. What sweet contentments doth the soul enjoy by the senses? They are the gates and windows of its knowledge, the organs of its delight. If it be tedious to an excellent player on the lute to abide but a few months the want of one, how much more the being without such noble tools and engines be painful to the soul? And if two pilgrims which have wandred some few miles together, have a hearts-grief when they are near to part, what must the sorrow be at parting of two so loving friends and never-loathing lovers as are the body and soul?

Death is the violent stranger of acquaintance, the eternal divorcer of marriage, the ravisher of the children from the parents, the stealer of parents from their children, the interrer of fame, the sole cause of forgetfulness, by which the living talk of those gone away as of so many shadows or age-worn stories: all strength by it is enfeebled, beauty turned into deformity and rottenness, honour into contempt, glory into baseness. It is the reasonless breaker off of all actions, by which we enjoy no more the sweet pleasures of earth, nor contemplate the stately revolutions of the heavens. The sun perpetually setteth, stars never rise unto us: it in one moment robbeth us of what with so great toil and care in many years we have heaped together: by this are successions of linages cut short, kingdoms left heirless, and greatest states orphaned: it is not overcome by pride, soothed by flattery, tain'd by intreaties, brib'd by benefits, softned by lamentations, nor diverted by time. Wisdom, save this, can prevent and help every thing. By death we are exiled from this fair city of the world, it is no more a world unto us, nor we any more a people unto it. The ruins of phanes, palaces, and other magnificent frames, yield a sad prospect to the soul, and how should it without horror view the wrack of such a wonderful masterpiece as is the body?

Drummond's poems have been edited for the Maitland Club (1832), by Peter Cunningham (1833), W. D. Turnbull (1857), W. C. Ward (1894), Professor L. E. Kastner (2 vols. 1913). See the Life by Professor Masson (1873), H. Walker's Three Centuries of Scottish Literature (1893), and Whibley's Literary Portraits (1904).

John Spottiswoode, successively Archbishop of Glasgow (consecrated 1610) and of St Andrews (1615) in the reign of James VI., was born in 1565. The son of the Superintendent (practically bishop) of Lothian, he was educated at the University of Glasgow, and became a parish minister in 1583. He went to London as King James's chaplain in 1603. A strenuous and active promoter of the king's scheme for the establishment of Episcopacy in Scotland, he stood high in the favour of James, as well as of Charles I., by whom he was made Lord Chancellor of Scotland in 1635. He reluctantly entered into the king's unwise measures for introducing a liturgy into Scotland, and became hateful to the Covenanting party. He was present in St Giles's Church in Edinburgh during the fateful Jenny Geddes riot. The Glasgow Assembly of 1638 deposed and excommunicated the archbishop, who retired to London and died there in 1639. He wrote, at the command of James, a History of the Church of Scotland, from 203 to 1625 A.D. When the king was told that some passages in such a work might possibly bear too hard upon the memory of his mother, he desired Spottiswoode to 'write and spare not;' and yet, says Bishop Nicolson, 'the historian ventured not so far with a commission as Buchanan did without one.' The history was published in London in 1655, and is fair on the whole, though not always impartial.

Destruction of Monasteries.

Whilst these things thus passed, John Knox returned from Geneva unto Scotland [1559], and joining with the Congregation, did preach to them at Perth. In his sermon he took occasion to speak against the adoration of images, shewing that the same tended to God's dishonour, and that such idols and monuments of superstition as were erected in churches ought to be pulled down, as being offensive to good and godly people. The sermon ended and the better sort gone to dinner, a priest, rather to try men's affections than out of any devotion, prepared to say Mass, opening a great case wherein was the history of divers saints exquisitely carved. A young boy that stood by saying that such boldness was insufferable, the priest gave him a blow. The boy in an anger casting a stone at the priest, happened to break one of the pictures: whereupon a stir was presently raised, some of the common sort falling upon the priest, others running to the altar and breaking the images, so as in a moment all was pulled down in the church that carried any mark of idolatry. The people upon the noise thereof assembled in great numbers, and invading the cloisters, made spoil of all they found therein. The Franciscans had store of provision, both of victuals and household-stuff: amongst the Dominicans the like wealth was not found; yet so much there was as might shew the profession they made of poverty to be feigned and counterfeit. The Carthusians, who passed both those in wealth, were used in like manner; yet was the prior permitted to take with him what he might carry of gold and silver plate. All the spoil was given to the poor, the rich sort forbearing to meddle with any part thereof. But that which was most admired was the speed they made in demolishing those edifices. For the Charter-house (a building of exceeding cost and largeness) was not only ruined, but the stones and timber so quickly taken away, as in less than two days space a vestige thereof was scarce remaining to be seen. They of Couper in Fife hearing what was done at Perth, went in like manner to their church, and defaced all the images, altars, and other instruments of idolatry; which the curate took so heavily, as the night following he put violent hands on himself. . . .

The noblemen remained at that time in St Andrews; and because they foresaw this their answer would not be well accepted, and feared some sudden attempt (for the queen with her Frenchmen lay then at Falkland), they sent to the lairds of Dun and Pittarrow, and others that favoured religion in the countries of Angus and Mearns, and requested them to meet at St Andrews the fourth day of June. Meanwhile they themselves went to the town of Crail, whither all that had warning came, shewing great forwardness and resolution; and were not a little encouraged by John Knox, who, in a sermon made unto them at the same time, put them in mind of that he had foretold at Perth, how there was no sincerity in the queen-regent's dealing, and that conditions would not be kept as they had found. Therefore did he exhort them not to be any longer deluded with fair promises, seeing there was no peace to be hoped for at their hands, who took no regard of contracts and covenants solemnly sworn. And because there would be no quietness till one of the parties were masters, and strangers expelled out of the kingdom, he wished them to prepare themselves either to die as men, or to live victorious.

By this exhortation the hearers were so moved, as they fell immediately to the pulling down of altars and images, and destroyed all the monuments which were abused to idolatry in that town. The like they did the next day in Anstruther, and from thence came directly to St Andrews. The bishop hearing what they had done in the coast towns, and suspecting they would attempt the same reformation in the city, came to it well accompanied, of purpose to withstand them; but after he had tried the affections of the townsmen, and found them all inclining to the Congregation, he went away early the next morning towards Falkland to the queen.

That day being Sunday, John Knox preached in the parish church, taking for his theme the history of the Gospel touching our Saviour's purging of the Temple;

and applying the corruption which was at that time in Jerusalem to the present estate of the Church, and declaring what was the duty of those to whom God had given authority and power, he did so incite the auditors, as, the sermon being ended, they went all and made spoil of the churches, razing the monasteries of the Black and Grey friars to the ground.

James VI. and a Refractory Preacher.

The king perceiving by all these letters that the death of his mother was determined, called back his ambassadors, and at home gave order to the ministers to remember her in their public prayers, which they denied to do, though the form prescribed was most christian and lawful; which was, that it might please God to illuminate her with the light of his truth, and save her from the apparent danger wherein she was cast. Upon their denial, charges were directed to command all bishops, ministers, and other office-bearers in the Church to make mention of her distress in their public prayers, and commend her to God in the form appointed. But of all the number only Mr David Lindsay at Leith and the king's own ministers gave obedience. At Edinburgh, where the disobedience was most public, the king, purposing to have their fault amended, did appoint the third of February for solemn prayers to be made in her behalf, commanding the bishop of St Andrews to prepare himself for that day; which when the ministers understood, they stirred up Mr John Cowper, a young man not entered as yet in the function, to take the pulpit before the time and exclude the bishop. The king coming at the hour appointed, and seeing him in the place, called to him from his seat, and said, 'Mr John, that place is destined for another; yet since you are there, if you will obey the charge that is given, and remember my mother in your prayers, you shall go on.' He replying, 'that he would do as the Spirit of God should direct him,' was commanded to leave the place: and making as though he would stay, the captain of the guard went to pull him out; whereupon he burst forth in these speeches: 'This day shall be a witness against the king in the great day of the Lord:' and then denouncing a wo to the inhabitants of Edinburgh, he went down, and the bishop of St Andrews entering the pulpit did perform the duty required. The noise was great for a while amongst the people; but after they were quieted, and had heard the bishop (as he was a most powerful preacher) out of that text to Timothy discourse of the duty of Christians in praying for all men, they grieved sore to see their teachers so far overtaken, and condemned their obstinacy in that point. In the afternoon Cowper was called before the council, where Mr Walter Balcanquhal and Mr William Watson, ministers of the town, accompanying him, for some idle speeches that escaped them at this time were both discharged from preaching in Edinburgh during his majesty's pleasure, and Cowper sent prisoner to Blackness.

See the edition of the history (modernised), with prefixed Life, published by the Spottiswoode Society, in three volumes, in 1847.

David Calderwood (1575-1650), a minister of the Kirk of Scotland at Crailing, in Roxburghshire, was in 1617 imprisoned and banished for protesting against royal encroachments on the Church's rights. In Holland he wrote in Latin Altare Damascenum, an impeachment of the Anglican Church-polity, in virtue of which he was quoted by Dutch divines as 'Eminentissimus Calderwood.' On his return to Scotland, now minister at Pencaitland, he compiled an elaborate History of the Kirk. An abridgment, entitled The True History of the Church of Scotland, was printed in 1646; and the complete work, printed from the manuscript in the British Museum, was issued in eight volumes, Edinburgh, 1841-49, published by the Wodrow Society. Calderwood, an unyielding Presbyterian, does not err on the side of tenderness to Episcopalians or Erastians. This is his account of the various functions at the reception in Edinburgh of James VI.'s queen, Anne of Denmark, in 1590:

Upon Tuisday, the 19th of May, the queene made her entrie in Edinburgh. She came by the south side of the toun, by the West Port, in a coche. A young boy descending in a globe, which opened, delivered certane keyes, with a Bible and a Psalme Booke. Mr Johne Russell made an harangue in Latine, and the cannons of the castell were discharged. The nobles of Scotland and the Danish road before, and a traine of ladeis behind. The queene herself road in a coche drawin with eight hors, accompanied with the citicens in their gownes, and some of them careing a pale of purple velvet above the coche. At the strait of the Bow, Mr Hercules Rollocke, Maister of the Grammar Schoole, made an oratioun. At the Butter Trone, there were some young weomen coastlie apparrelled, standing upon a scaffold, playing upon organs, and singing of musicians. Mr Johne Craig's sonne, a young boy, had a short oratioun to her. At the Tolbuith were five youths, clothed in gentlewomen's apparell, one having a sword, another a ballance, the thrid a booke, the fourth a target, and other two with their signes, all representing Peace, Plentie, Policie, Justice, Liberalitie, and Temperance. Everie one expounded the signification of their owne signes. Therafter, the queene went into the kirk, and satt in the east end, in the loft, under a faire cannabie of velvet. Mr Robert Bruce made the sermoun, which being ended within halfe an houre, the queene is brought furth. Comming by the Croce, they see there Bacchus drinking, and casting glasses, violers playing, and musicians singing. At the Salt Trone was represented the king's genealogie; and at the root of the tree a young boy made an oratioun in Latine. At the port of the Nether Bow were represented the seven planets, and the weird givin in Latine; and a faire jewell, of a great price, called the A, was givin to the queene. All the way there went, before the honest men of the toun, twentie-foure youths clothed, some with cloth of silver, others with white taffetie, and golden chaines about their neckes, legges, and armes, and visoures on their faces, making them seeme Mores. The fore staires were covered with tapestrie or faire coverings. Mr Andrew Melvill made an oratioun to the ambassadors, to their great admiratioun. The king acknowledged that he had honoured him and his countrie that day, promised never to forgett it, and commanded to print it with all diligence. The day following it was delivered to the printer, with an epigramme of dedication to the king, and entituled Στεφανίσκιον. Josephus Scaliger, after the sight of it, wrote to Mr Andrew and said, 'Profecto nos talia non possumus.' Lipsius reading it, said, 'Re vera Andreas Melvinus est serio doctus.'

Upon Saturday, the 23d, the Danish ambassadors were banketted by the toun of Edinburgh in the Coine House.

The weird was a forecast of the future as indicated by the positions of the stars; the Coine or Cunzie House was the Mint of Scotland, in a close or lane off the Cowgate.

John Row (1568-1646), minister of Carnock, in Fife, wrote a Historie of the Kirk of Scotland from 1588 to August 1637, which, with a continuation to July 1639, by his son, of the same name, was edited in 1842 by David Laing for the Maitland and the Wodrow Societies.

Zachary Boyd (1585?-1653), a pious and learned divine of the Scottish Church, has had the unhappy fate to be handed down by tradition as the translator of Scripture into doggerel rhyme. One of the Boyds of Penkill, in Ayrshire, he studied at Glasgow, St Andrews, and Saumur (where his cousin, Boyd of Trochrig, afterwards Principal of Glasgow University, was then professor). He spent sixteen years in France, declined a chair at Saumur, and in 1623 became minister of the Barony Church in Glasgow; he was also rector and vice-chancellor of the university there, and to it left his books and a sum of money. He was a staunch Covenanter, disapproved Cromwell's supremacy, and, preaching before the victorious general in Glasgow Cathedral, 'railed at him to his face.' He wrote incessantly, and published The Last Battell of the Soul in Death (1629; republished 1831), prose meditations for the sick; a poem on Leslie's victory at Newburn (1640), the preliminary of the great civil war; numerous sermons and pamphlets; The Garden of Zion (2 vols. 1644), verse paraphrases of large parts of Scripture—the first volume mainly the kings of Judah, the second volume containing 'the bookes of Job, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs, all in English verse;' and The Psalmes of David in Meeter (1646). Among his manuscripts are, besides sermons, miscellaneous poems more or less sacred in substance, versions of The Foure Evangelis, and Zion's Flowers, containing in 26,080 lines of verse the fall of Adam, Abel murdered, the Tower of Babel, Abraham and Isaac, Joseph and his brethren, and other ten scriptural stories or episodes, down to John the Baptist and the New Jerusalem in the Revelation, together with two edifying but not quite scriptural stories of the Gunpowder Plot and the world's vanities. Four of them were printed from the manuscript in 1855. The stories—belated miracle-plays or scriptural 'interludes'—are paraphrased into an imperfectly dramatic form, and are each detailed by some six or eight speakers. Thus in 'Jonah' 'the speakers' are: '1. The Lord. 2. Jonah. 3. The Shipmaster. 4. The Sailors. 5. The King of Ninive. 6. The men of Ninive.' And in 'John the Baptist' Herod, Herodias, and 'the hangman' take their respective parts as well as the Lord, Elizabeth, Gabriel, and John and his disciples. Common rumour credited him with having translated the whole of the Scriptures into verse, and his versions are alluded to as 'Zachary Boyd's Bible.' He was one of the committee appointed in 1648 to revise the version of the Psalms by the English Cromwellian, Francis Rous, for use in the Church of Scotland; in some points this version, sung in Scotland from that date till the present day, more closely follows Boyd's and Sir William Mure's than Rous's translation. How very similar Boyd's is to Rous's and the use-and-wont 'Scottish version' may be seen by comparing the renderings given at page 503 with Boyd's of the same three verses of Psalm xxxiii.:

Yea though through valley of death's shade
I walk; I 'le fear no ill,
For thou art with me, thy rod and thy staffe me comfort still.

Thou set'st in presence of my foes
a table me before;
Mine head with oyl thou dost anoint,
my cup it runneth o're.

Goodnesse and mercy all the dayes of my life surely shall
Me follow, and in the Lord's house for ever I will dwell.

The version, though rude, had the merit of being a pretty close translation, and is at least not grotesque. The same cannot be said for the translations in which Zachary permits himself more freedom—though even here there are scenes vividly conceived and lines not lacking in undeniable vigour and uncouth lucidity. The following part of the history of Jonah may be given as perhaps the ne plus ultra of unpoetic verse, a good man's efforts to make sacred story impressive becoming, for lack of humour on his part, a caricature far from solemnising in its effects:

The Sailors. Now over boord hee throwne is by and by,
Where in the waters he doth sprawling ly:
There Jonah is, God's wrath for to appease,
Ev'n head and eares downe soused in the seas.

But what is this that near him wee doe see,
Like to a tower wambling on the sea; wallowing
A monster great, the Leviathan strong,
With beame like jawes which followes him along:
A little space the whale did round him play,
To waite his time, but in a short delay
He wheel'd about, and in a trice wee sawe
The living man he burid in his mawe.

Waves rest content, the surges no more beate,
The sea's growne kind, the billowes no more threate,
All is made quiet, clouds no more doe frowne,
Heav'ns pleased well, doe with their smiles look downe,
Waves swell'd before lye levell in their place,
Without a wrinkle, smooth as is the glasse:
No wamblings now, the sea it is tranquill,
Heav'ns lowre no more, all is both calme and still.

Jonah. I did rebell; heere is my day of Doome,
Feasts dainty seeme untill the reck'ning come:
Alas! too late, it now repenteth me,
That I refus'd to goe to Ninive;
I thought to lurk, but now my miseries
Me clearely tell, God hath unvail'd eyes,

And that hee will ov'take them by and by,
Who ev'r they bee that from his face doe fly:
I understood that God was good and kind,
But mongrell thoughts with foly pierc'd my mind,
Heere apprehended, I in prison ly,
What goods will ransome my captivity?
What house is this, where's neither fire nor candle,
Where I no thing but guts of fishes handle?
I and my table are both heere within,
Where day ne'er dawn'd, where sun did never shine.
The like of this on earth man never saw,
A living man within a monster's mawe;
Buried under mountains which are high and steep,
Plung'd under water hundreth fathomes deep.
Not so was Noah in his house of tree,
For through a window hee the light did see:
Hee sail'd above the highest waves, a wonder,
I and my boat are all the waters under.
Hee in his ark might goe and also come,
But I sit still in such a strait'ned roome,
As is most uncouth, head and feet together,
Among such grease as would a thousand smother:
I find no way now for my shrinking hence,
But heere to lye and die for mine offence.
Eight persons were in Noah's hulk together,
Comfortable they were each one to other,
In all the earth like unto mee is none,
Farre from all living I heere lye alone,
Where I entomb'd in melancholy sink,
Choak't, suffocat, with excremental stink:
This grieves mee most, that I for grievous sinne,
Incarc'rd lye within this floating inn.

Within this cave with greefe my heart is gall'd,
Lord heare the sighs from my heart's centre hal'd;
Thou know'st how long I have been in this womb,
A living man within a living tomb;
O what a lodging! wilt thou in those vaults,
As in a Hell most dark, correct my faults?
I neither kno when day doth shine, or night
Comes for my rest, I'm so depriv'd of sight;
Though that the judgement's uncouth sure I share,
I of God's goodnesse never will despaire.

I 'le turne to him, and in those words will pray
Within this whale; what God indites I 'le say.

By reason of my trouble, I to God who heard me cry'd,
Out of hell's belly did I cry,
Thou heard'st my voice, I cry'd.

For thou hast cast me in the deepe,
in midst ev'n of the sea,
Floods compast me, thy billowes all,
and waves past over me.

[Here follow, in the same common measure, seven verses more of pretty literal translation from Jonah ii. 1-9.]

Above all Gods O Lord thou dost excell,
I hope thou'lt free me from this paunch of Hell,
And that thou wilt this monster now command,
That it disgorge me out upon the land.
O draw me out of this my moving cave,
And bring thy Jonah from this living grave,
O heare my prayers from this darksome place,
I with my teares flee to thy throne of grace.

It was inevitable that such poor doggerel should be parodied by still worse, especially on the part of writers desiring, like Samuel Colvill in The Whigg's Supplication (1681), to throw ridicule on the Presbyterian clergy. And it is by the parodies falsely credited to him that poor Zachary is commonly remembered in Scotland to this day. Thus Colvill made Boyd deliberately put on record :

There was a man called Job
Dwelt in the land of Uz,
He had a good gift of the gob ;
The same case happen us !

Another part of Job's story was declared to be :

Job's wife said to Job,
Curse God and die.
O no, you wicked scold,
No, not I.

Of Jacob, they put into Boyd's mouth this version :

And Jacob made for his wee Josie,
A tartan coat to keep him cosie ;
And what for no ? there was nae harm
To keep the lad baith saft and warm.

Boyd's manuscripts are in the library of Glasgow University. See the biographical notice prefixed to Neil's reprint of four of the poems from Zion's Flowers (1855).

Robert Baillie was born at Glasgow in 1599, and educated at the university of that city. In 1622 he received Episcopal ordination, and was shortly after presented to the parish of Kilwinning. In 1637 he refused to preach in favour of Laud's service-book, in 1638 sat in the famous General Assembly of Glasgow, in 1639 served as chaplain in the Covenanting army at Duns Law, and in 1640 was selected to go to London, with other commissioners, and draw up charges against Archbishop Laud. On his return to Scotland in 1642 he was appointed joint-professor of Divinity at Glasgow. In 1643 he was again sent to London as a delegate to the Westminster Assembly, and in 1649 was chosen by the Church to proceed to Holland and invite Charles II. to accept the Covenant and crown of Scotland. He performed his mission skilfully, and after the Restoration was made Principal of Glasgow University. A competent scholar, he corresponded (in Latin) with Voetius and other Continental scholars, and was master of thirteen languages, including Arabic and Ethiopic. His affectionate letters to Sharp showed that, even till after the 'great renunciation' had actually been accomplished, he refused to believe in the future archbishop's treachery to the Presbyterian cause. A representative of all that was best and most temperate in the Covenanting Church of his age, he died July 1662. His Letters and Journals, edited by David Laing (3 vols. Bannatyne Club, 1841-42), give a vivid picture of Scotland—political, ecclesiastical, academical, domestic—in a most confused and distracting time of feud, faction, and civil war ; and his record of the Westminster Assembly and its proceedings is very valuable. He wrote in a Scots which was very nearly provincial English, with many Scotticisms and not a few Scots words. His first letter from London in 1640 to his wife at Kilwinning describes Strafford's first appearance before the Long Parliament :

I know thow does now long to hear from me. I wrote to thee on Saturday was eight days from Durham. That day we went to Darntoun, where Mr Alexander Henderson and Mr Robert Blair did preach to us on Sunday. At supper, on Sunday, the post with the Great Seall of England for our safe conduct, came to us, with the Earle Bristol's letter to Lowdoun, intreating us to make haste. On Monday we came, before we lighted, to Boroubrig, twentie-fyve myles. On Tuesday we rode three short posts, Ferribrig, Toxford, and Duncaster. There I was content to buy a bobin wastcoat. On Wednesday we came ane other good journey to Newark on Trent, where we caused Dr Moyslie sup with us. On Thursday we came to Stamford ; on Fryday to Huntingtown ; on Saturday to Ware, where we rested the Sabbath, and heard the minister, after we were warned of the ending of the service, preach two good sermons. On Monday morning we came that tuintie myle to London before sun-ryseing ; all weell, horse and men, as we could wish ; diverse merchands and their servants with us, on little naigs ; the way extreamlie foule and deep, the journies long and continued, sundrie of us unaccustomed with travell, we took it for God's singular goodness that all of us were so preserved ; none in the companie held better out than I and my man, and our little noble naigs. From Killwinning to London I did not so much as stumble : this is the fruit of your prayers. I was also all the way full of courage, and comforted with the sense of God's presence with my spirit. We were by the way great expences ; their inns are all like palaces ; no marvel they extors their guests : for three mealls, course enough, we would pay, together with our horses, sixteen or seventeen pound Sterling. Some three dish of creevishes, like little partans, two and forty shillings Sterling. Our lodgeings here were taken in the common garden : Rothes, Mr Archbald Johnstoun in one ; Dumfermling, Mr Alexander Hendersoun in one ; the three Barrouns in one ; the three Burgesses in one ; Lowdoun, whom we expect this night, in a fifth, where Mr Blair hes a chamber, I another, our men a third : our house maills everie week above eleven pound Sterling. The Citie is desyreous we should lodge with them ; so, to-morrow I think we must flitt.

All things here goes as our heart could wish. The Lieutenant of Ireland came bot on Monday to toun late ; on Tuesday rested ; on Wednesday came to Parliament ; bot ere night, he was caged. Intollerable pryde and oppression cryes to Heaven for a vengeance. The Lower House closed their doores ; the Speaker kepted the keyes till his accusation was concluded. Thereafter, Mr Pym went up, with a number at his back, to the Higher House, and, in a prettie short speech, did, in name of the Lower House, and in name of the Commons of all England, accuse Thomas Earle of Strafford, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, of high treason, and required his person to be arreisted till probation might be heard. So Pym and his back were removed ; the Lords began to consult on that strange and unexpected motion. The word goes in haste to the Lord Lieutenant, where he was with the King : with speed he comes to the House ; he calls rudelie at the doore ; James Maxwell, keeper of the Black-Rod, opens ; his Lordship, with a proud glouming countenance, makes towards his place at the board-head : bot at once manie bids him void the House ; so he is forced in confusion to goe to doore till he was called. After consultation, being called in, he stands, bot is commanded to kneell, and, on his knees, to hear the sentence. Being on his knees, he is delyvered to the keeper of the Black-Rod, to be prisoner till he was cleared of these crymes the House of Commons did charge him with. He offered to speak, bot was commanded to be gone without a word. In the outer roome James Maxwell required him, as prisoner, to deliver his sword; when he had gotten it, he cryes, with a loud voyce, for his man to carrie my Lord Lieutenant's sword. This done, he makes through a number of people towards his coach, all gazeing, no man capping to him, before whom that morning the greatest of England would have stood discovered: all crying, What is the matter? He said, A small matter I warrand yow! They replied, Yes indeed, high treason is a small matter! Coming to the place where he expected his coach, it was not there; so he behooved to returne that same way through a world of gazeing people. When at last he had found his coach, and was entering, James Maxwell told him, Your Lordship is my prisoner, and must goe in my coach; so he behooved to doe. For some dayes too manie went to visit him, bot since, the Parliament hes commanded his keeping to be straiter. Pursevants were dispatched to Ireland, to open all the ports, and to proclaime that all who had grievances might come over; also to fetch over Sir George Ratcliffe, who will be caused to depone manie things. The chief is, his intention with the Irish armie, and so manie as the King could make, to fall on the English lords, who are the countrie way; his cruell monopolies, whereby he sucked up, for his own use, the whole substance of Ireland. My Lord Montnoris, Sir John Clatworthie, the Chancellor, hes been chief informers. The King was much commoved; the Marquis, by the deliverie of Pym his speech, did somewhat calme him. The Parliament of Ireland is sitting: a remonstrance from them, without anie knowledge of things done here, came this day to the King, which, they say, hes calmed him much, and turned his minde somewhat from the Deputie.

We were extreamlie welcome here. The Parliament hes granted ane hundred thousand pound Sterling, whereof we shall have near fourtie in present money, to pay our armie six weekes, without prejudice to exact what, according to our bargain, is more due to us from the four shyres. Burton, I hear, is come to toun; Bastwick and Prin are coming, as they were sent for; Lightoun hes been twyce heard, and on Fryday, is hoped, sall be absolved. Lincolne, on Saturday, did sitt in Parliament; and his petition, to have his cause discussed in Parliament, received. The King, in his first speech, did call us rebels; bot much murmuring being at that style, he thought good, two dayes thereafter, to make a speech to excuse that phrase, and to acknowledge us his subjects, to whom he had sent his Great Seall, and with whom he was in treatie, to settle a perfect agreement, with their consent and approbation.

On Tuysday last was here a fast: Mr Blair and I preached to our commissioners at home; for we had no cloathes for outgoing. Manie ministers used greater freedom than ever here was heard of. Episcopacie it self beginning to be cryed down, and a Covenant cried up, and the Liturgie to be scorned. The Toun of London, and a world of men, minds to present a petition, which I have seen, for the abolition of Bishops, Deanes, and all their aperteanances. It is thought good to delay it till the Parliament have pulled down Canterburie and some prime Bishops, which they minde to doe so soon as the King hes a little digested the bitterness of his Lieutenant's censure. Hudge things are here in working: The mighty hand of God be about this great work! We hope this shall be the joyfull harvest of the teares that thir manie yeares hes been sawin in thir kingdomes. All here are wearie of Bishops. This day a committee of ten noblemen, and three of the most innocent Bishops, Carlile, Salisbury, Winchester, are appointed to cognosce by what meanes our pacification was broken, and who advysed the King, when he had no money, to enter in warre without consent of his State. We hope all shall goe weell above our hopes. I hope they will not neglect me; prayer is our best help: for albeit all things goes on here above our expectation; yet how soone, if God would but wink, might the devill, and his manifold instruments here watching, turn our hopes in fear! When we are most humble, and dependant on God, whose hand alone has brought this great work to the present passe, we are then most safe. This day I have heard that Canterburie hes ane Apologie at the presse; if it be so, at once I will have more to doe.

R. BAYLIE.

London, November 18th [1640].

Darnton, Derntoun, &c., are contracted forms of Darlington; creevishes is one of many former English spellings of crayfish, all derived from the old French word now spelt écrevisses; partans is Scotch for crabs; the Marquis is the Marquis of Hamilton; Lightoun, Archbishop Leighton; and Canterburie, Archbishop Laud.

William Lithgow, born at Lanark in 1582, had already visited the Shetlands, Bohemia, Switzerland, &c., when, in 1610, he set out on foot from Paris to Palestine and Egypt. His second tramp (1614-16) led him through North Africa from Tunis to Fez, and home by way of Hungary and Poland. In his last journey (1619-21) to Spain via Ireland he was seized as a spy at Malaga and tortured. At London, Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, promised him reparation, but contented himself with promising. So Lithgow assaulted, or by another account was assaulted by, him in the king's anteroom, for which he was clapped into the Marshalsea. He died at Lanark, perhaps in 1645. He claimed to have walked more than 36,000 miles, and was as Protestant as he was greedy of money. His interesting but euphuistic Rare Adventures and Paineiful Peregrinations was published in a complete form in 1632 (new ed. 1906), incompletely in 1614. Besides he wrote The Siege of Breda (1637), Siege of Newcastle (1645), Poems (ed. by Maidment, 1863), &c. Lithgow, like the Earls of Ancrum and Stirling and Drummond of Hawthornden, belonged to the first generation of Scotsmen who wrote, or aimed to write, English rather than the contemporary form of Scots.

Sicilian Duellists.

And now having followed the Italian saying Si meglio a star solo come mala accompagnato [sic!], It is better for a man to be alone than in ill company, I traversed the kingdome to Trapundie [Trapani], seeking transportation for Africke, but could get none; and returning thence overthwart the iland, I call to memory being lodged in the bourge of Saramutza belonging to a young baron, and being bound the way of Castello Francko, eight miles distant and appertaining to another young noble youth, I rose and marched by the breach of day, where it was my lucke, half way from either towne, to find both these beardless barons lying dead and new killed in the fields, and their horses standing tyed to a bush beside them; whereat being greatly moved, I approached them, and perceiving the bodies to be richly cled with silken stufes, facily [facilely, easily] conjectured what they might be, my host having told me the former night that these two barones were at great discord about the love of a young noble woman; and so it was: for they had fought the combat for her sake, and for their own pride lay slaine here. For as fire is to gunpowder, so is ambition to the heart of man, which, if it be but touched with self-love, mounteth aloft and never bendeth downward till it be turned into ashes. And here it proved, for that ladies sake, that troppo amore turned to presto dolore. Upon which sight, to speake the truth, I searched both their pockets, and found their two silken purses full loaden with Spanish pistolls; whereat my heart sprung for joy; and taking five rings off their foure hands, I hid them and the two purses in the ground, half a mile beyond this place; and returning againe, leaped to one of their horses, and came galloping back to Saramutza; where, calling up my host, I told him the accident, who, when he saw the horse, gave a shout for sorrow, and running to the castle, told the lady the Baron's mother; where, in a moment, she, her children, and the whole town, runne all with me to the place; some cled, some naked, some on footte, and some on horse; where when come, grievous was it to behold their woful and sad lamentations. I, thus seeing them all mad and distracted of their wits with sorrow, left them without good night; and coming to my treasure, made speedy way to Castello Francko, where bearing them the like news, brought them all to the like distraction and flight of feet.

Ireland in 1619.

I remember I saw in Irelands North-parts two remarkable sights: The one was their manner of tillage, ploughs drawne by horse-tayls, wanting garnishing; they are only fastened with straw or wooden ropes to their bare rumps, marching all side for side, three or foure in a ranke, and as many men hanging by the ends of that untoward labour. It is as bad a husbandry, I say, as ever I found among the wildest savages alive; for the Caramins, who understand not the civill form of agriculture, yet they delve, hollow, and turn over the ground with manuall and wooden instruments: but they the Irish have thousands of both kingdoms daily labouring beside them, yet they can not learne, because they will not learne, to use garnishing, so obstinate they are in their barbarous consuetude, unless punishment and penalties were inflicted; and yet most of them are content to pay twenty shillings a yeare, before they wil change their custome.

The other as goodly sight I saw was women travayling or toying at home, carry their infants about their necks and laying their dugges over their shoulders, would give sucke to the babes behinde their backs, without taking them in their armes. Such kind of breasts, me thinketh, were very fit to be made money-bags for East or West-

Indian merchants, being more than halfe a yard long, and as well wrought as any tanner, in the like charge, could ever mollifie such leather.

As for any other customes they have, to avoyd prolixitie I spare, onely before my pen flee over seas I would gladly shake hands with some of our churchmen there; for better are the wounds of a friend, than the sweet smile of a flatterer; for love and trueth cannot dissemble. Many dissembling impudents intrude themselves in this high calling of God, who are not truely neither worthily thereunto called; the ground here arising either from a carnall or carelesse presumption, otherwise from needy, greedy, and lacke of bodily maintenance. Such is now the corruption of time, that I know here even mechanick men admitted in the place of pastors; yea, and rude-bred souldiers, whose education was at the musket-mouth, are become there both Lybian, grave, and unlearned church-men. Nay, besides them [un]professed, indeed professed schollers whose warbling mouthes, ingorged with spoonefuls of bruised Latine, seldome or never expressed, unless the force of quaffing spew it forth from their empty sculles; such, I say, interclude their doctrine between the thatch and the church-walls tops; and yet their smallest stipends shall amount to one, two, three, or foure hundred pounds a-year.

Whereupon you may demand mee, how spend they, or how deserve they this? I answer, Their deserts are nought, and the fruite thereof as naughtily spent; for sermons and prayers they never have any; neither never preached any, nor can preach. And although some could, as perhaps they seeming would, they shall have no auditour (as they say) but bare walls, the plants of their parishes being the rootes of mere Irish. As concerning their cariage in spending such sacrilegious fees, the course is thus.

The alehouse is their church, the Irish priests their consorts; their auditors be, Fill and fetch more; their text Spanish sack, their prayers carrousing, their singing of psalmes the whiffing of tobacco, their last blessing aqua vita, and all their doctrine sound drunkenness. And whensoever these parties meete, their parting is Dane-like, from a Dutch pot, and the minister still purse-bearer, defrayeth all charges for the priest. Arguments of religion, like Podolian Polonians, they succumbe; their conference only pleading mutuall forbearance; the minister affrayed of the priests' wood-carnes, and the priests as fearfull of the minister's apprehending or denoting them; contracting thereby a Gibeonized covenant; yea, and for more submission's sake, hee will give way to the priest to numble masse in his church, where in all his life he never made prayer nor sermon.

Loe there are some of the abuses of our late weak and stragling ecclesiasticks there, and the soule-sunke sorrow of godless epicures and hypocrites. To all which, and much more, have I been an ocular testator, and sometimes a constrained consociat to their companeonry; yet not so much inforced, as desirous to know the behaviour and conversation of such mercenary Jebusites. Great God amend it, for it is a great pity to behold it; and if it continue so still, as when I saw them last, O farre better it were, that these ill-bestowed tythes, and church-wall rents, were distributed to the poore and needy, than to suffocate the swine-fed bellies of such idle and prophane parasites.

And here another general abuse I observed, that whensoever any Irish dye, the friend of the defunct (besides other fees) paying twenty shillings to the English curate, shall get the corpse of the deceased to be buried within the church, yea often even under the pulpit-foot; and for lucre interred in God's sanctuary when dead, who, when alive, would never approach nor enter the gates of Sion, to worships the Lord, nor conforme themselves to true religion. Truly such, and the like abuses, and evill examples of lewd lives, have bene the greatest hinderance of that land's conversion; for such, like wolves, have been from time to time but stumbling-blocks before them; regarding more their own sensuall and licentious ends, than the glory of God, in converting of one soul unto his church.

Now as concerning the unconscionable carriage of the Hybernian clergy, ask mee, and there my reply. As many of them (for the most part) as are Protestant ministers have their wives, children, and servants invested Papists; and many of these church-men at the houre of their death, like dogges return back to their former vomit. Witness the late Viccar of Calin (belonging to the late and last Richard Earl of Desmond, who being on his deathbed, and having two hundred pounds a-year; finding him selfe to forsake both life and stipend, sent straight for a Romish priest, and received the Papall sacrament: confessing freely in my audience that he had been a Romane Catholick all his life, dissembling onely with his religion for the better maintaining of his wife and children. And being brought to his buriall place, he was interred in the church, with which he had played the ruffian all his life; being openly carried at mid-day with Jesuits, priests, and friers of his own nation, and after a contemptible manner, in derision of our profession and lawes of the kingdom.

Elsewhere in his travels he has described the Caramins as a tribe of savage Lybians in the north of Africa; hence Lybian applied to the Irish clergy is uncomplimentary. And in his sojourn in Poland, he has explained what the inhabitants of the province of Podolia had suffered from their next neighbours, the heathen Tartars. Wood-carves, wild Irish kernes.

John Barclay, author of the Argenis, was born in 1582, at Pont-à-Mousson, in Lorraine, where his father, a Scotsman, was professor of Law. Owing, it is said, to persecution on the part of the Jesuits, he came with his father to England about 1603, and either in that year or two years later he published his Euphormionis Satyricon, a politico-satirical romance, chiefly directed against the Jesuits, supplements to which were the second part (1607), the Apologia (1611), and the Icon Animorum (1614). In 1616 he left England and went to Rome, where he died, a good Catholic, in 1621. In the same year appeared his Argenis, according to Cowper 'the best romance that ever was written.' It was written in Latin, and was translated into French, Spanish, Italian, Dutch, Polish, &c. There are three English versions, besides one entered at Stationers' Hall by Ben Jonson in 1623, but never published. The first published was by Le Grys and May in 1628; the last was by Clara Reeve in 1772. It resembles the Arcadia in its romantic adventures, the Utopia in its discussion of political problems, and, a seventeenth-century roman à clef, under disguised names and circumstances reviews the events and personages of European history during the later half of the sixteenth century. The story of the loves of Polyarchus and Argenis is really a political allegory, containing clever allusions to the state of Europe, more particularly of France during the time of the League; to Queen Elizabeth, Henri IV., and Philip II. It influenced Fénelon's Télémaque, may be said to have led the way to Calprenède, Scudéry, and Madame de la Fayette, and has merited the admiration of readers as dissimilar as Richelieu, Leibnitz, and Coleridge. See Dupond, L'Argenis de Barclai (1875).

Arthur Johnston (or JONSTON, Latinised Jonstonus; c. 1587–1641), remarkable among Scotsmen, along with George Buchanan, as a writer of Latin poetry who attained to European reputation. Born at Caskieben, near Aberdeen, he studied at Aberdeen, graduated in medicine at Padua (1610), and resided for about twenty years in France. On his return to Britain he obtained the patronage of Archbishop Laud, was appointed physician to Charles I., and became rector of King's College, Aberdeen. He wrote Latin elegies and epigrams, a paraphrase of the Song of Solomon, a collection of short poems (published in 1637) entitled Musa Aulica, and (his greatest work) a complete version of the Psalms. He also edited and contributed to the Deliciae Poetarum Scotorum, Latin poems by various Scottish authors. In Hallam's opinion: 'The Scots certainly wrote Latin with a good ear and considerable elegance of phrase. . . . I am inclined to think that Johnston's Psalms, all of which are in elegiac metre, do not fall short of those of Buchanan, either in elegance of style or correctness of Latinity.' Sir William Geddes is content to rank Johnston after, but close to, his great countryman. Editing a collection of the writers of Latin verse in Aberdeen, especially during the reigns of James I. and Charles I.—'the period when such verse was in Scotland the normal and recognised vehicle of poetic expression'—Sir William accounts Johnston as foremost 'of a cultured group of scholars such as no other city in Scotland, or even in the British Isles, could match at the period when they appeared.'

Principal Sir William Geddes edited a magnificent edition of the works of Johnston for the New Spalding Club (2 vols. 4to, 1892–95, in the Musa Latina Aberdonensis).

THE BALLADS: SCOTTISH AND ENGLISH.

BALLAD is, in ordinary use, a term for any narrative poem, usually in the simple measure of which a notable example is :

Lord William was buried in St Mary's kirk,
Lady Margret in Mary's quire ;
Out o' the lady's grave grew a bonny red rose,
And out o' the knight's a briar.

Such poems may be written in the most civilised ages, by the most cultivated authors—by Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, or Sir Charles Hanbury Williams. But these and similar compositions are mere mimicries of what is more technically styled the ballad—the narrative Volks-lied, or popular tale in verse. Every Volks-lied, of course, or traditional poem is not a narrative ballad ; it may be a personal lyric, or a begging song (quête), as in our songs of the Hogmanay season, the ancient Rhodian swallow song, and many French examples. The word 'ballad,' then, is here used for a traditional and popular narrative poem, usually of unknown authorship.

The sources whence we derive the Scottish and English ballads may be either printed books, or broadsheets, or manuscripts, or oral tradition. Very old printed sources of certain ballads exist. 'A Gest of Robyn Hode' may be 'anywhere from 1492 to 1534, the year of the death of Wynkyn de Worde,' the printer. Even after the renovations of printers and reciters, 'a considerable number of Middle English forms remain,' and Professor Child conceived that 'the little epic' may have been 'put together' (out of ballads) 'as early as 1400, or before. There are no firm grounds on which to base an opinion.' Nothing is certainly known as to the date of Robin Hood himself, if he was a real character. In Piers Plowman (c. 1377) Sloth says that he knows rhymes of Robin Hood better than his paternoster. It is not, then, perhaps, too arbitrary to regard Robin Hood ballads as a popular genre, and of considerable antiquity, in the middle of the fourteenth century, though the ballads as extant are later. Printed as early as the end of the fifteenth century, ballads continued to be published and hawked about, as by Shakespeare's Autolycus, to clowns who 'loved ballads but even too well.' Many of these would be modern, things written on public events and prodigies by persons of the lowest literary standing. Others would be really ancient traditional ballads, of unknown date and authorship. Collections of the broadsheets were made by amateurs, as by Mr Pepys ; and there were manuscript collections, such as the famous folio edited with elegance by Bishop Percy, and with accuracy by Mr Furnivall. The eighteenth century saw the collections of Allan

Ramsay, Herd, Pinkerton, and others (the editors often altering at will, except Ritson and, probably, Herd) ; while the nineteenth century opened with Scott's Border Minstrelsy, followed by Motherwell, Buchan, Jamieson, Kinloch, and others. Foreign savants have also made vast collections in almost every European land, and to these have been added gatherings out of Asiatic and savage regions.

The authorship of the traditional ballads has been matter of controversy. The present writer's contribution on ballads to the Encyclopædia Britannica was written in 1875, and has been criticised by Mr T. F. Henderson in Scottish Vernacular Literature (1898). Space does not afford room for a reply, nor is it necessary to specify the modifications which are here made in the older statement. We must begin by discriminating between at least three classes : (1) The historical ballads of relatively modern date, such as 'The Bonny Earl o' Moray' and 'The Queen's Marie,' which cannot be earlier than the reigns of James VI. and Mary Stuart respectively. (2) Such ballads as 'The Boy and the Mantle,' 'King Arthur and King Cornwall,' and 'The Marriage of Sir Gawain.' Concerning these, Professor Child says that they 'are clearly not of the same rise, and not meant for the same ears, as' the ballads in his first volume. 'They would come down by professional rather than domestic tradition, through minstrels rather than knitters and weavers.' Thus Professor Child distinguishes between ballads chanted by professional minstrels and ballads chanted by the populace for the populace. As to the authorship of the ballads of professional minstrels, it was more or less literary. 'The Boy and the Mantle' implies knowledge of a romance extant in three MSS. of the thirteenth century, a piece translated into Norse prose in 1217-63. The data occur in 'Perceval le Gallois' of the second half of the twelfth century, and also in the Welsh Triads. These data, briefly, are magical tests of chastity ; and one of them is as old as an Egyptian popular tale recounted by Herodotus (ii. 111). Such magical tests are, of course, in origin purely popular, or even savage, but the setting and circumstances of this ballad are literary, being directly derived from the early mediæval Arthurian romances. From the same sources, and with adaptations from a chanson de geste of Charlemagne's voyage to Jerusalem, come 'Sir Gawain's Marriage' and 'King Arthur and King Cornwall.' There are in these pieces popular data of world-wide diffusion, such as impossible feats to be performed under peril of death, but the source of the ballads, as they stand, is literary : they are based on romances widely circulated in manuscript. Some lowly professional minstrel was doubtless the author of ballads in this category.

The third class is more puzzling: it is the large class of traditional ballad narrative poems, such as 'The Elfin Knight,' 'Riddles,' 'Willie's Lady,' 'Young Tamlane,' and very many others. Professor Child does not attribute the diffusion of these to professional minstrels; and their data are popular, and undervalued (as in the second class) from known romances. What marks them as popular is their wonderfully wide diffusion, their close resemblance to prose Märchen (which are found all over the world, and are certainly not of literary authorship), with their folklore incidents, based on universal superstitions and customs. Despite their general uniformity and common character, these ballads occur in numerous variants, fragments of one being embedded in another, after the manner of Märchen, so that it is not possible to discover any one absolutely original form and type. This is the natural result of centuries of oral tradition; reciters had omitted, altered, transposed, modified, and modernised the language; introduced modern details of weapons, costume, and the like. Consequently, though there must have been an original author—literary or popular, amateur or professional—of each ballad, his date and name and condition remain unknown: these ballads as they exist are popular patchwork. As they exist they are the work of this, that, and the other maker and reciter: things fashioned by men of the people for the people, and by the people altered into scores of variants. In some cases a prose tale has been versified; in others, fragments of prose alternating with verse leave dubious the original shape, whether verse or prose, or a medley of both, as in 'Aucassin and Nicolette,' and in many East African ballad-stories (see Motherwell; 'Young Beichan and Susy Pie,' Minstrelsy, 1827, p. 15; and Steere's Swahili Tales, 1870, p. 7). It is in this sense that the so-called 'communitistic' source of certain ballads is to be understood; in this sense they were made 'by the people, for the people.' They stand on much the same footing as the Märchen or popular tales of the world; to which no one dreams of assigning a professional or literary origin, for they are found in countries where there is no literature and no class of professional narrators or poets. From these tales the ballads only vary by the vehicle of verse. The date when they were first circulated in one kind of verse or another is not to be ascertained, though the familiar ballad measure is not certainly known to be older than the early fifteenth century.

The objection that the people does not versify applies only to the modern populace of civilised Europe. Mr Henderson says that 'the heart of the people . . . is now, and probably ever was, wholly untrained in the art of poetical expression.' This opinion is based on neglect of popular and savage literature. That the people does compose in poetry, from the Australian, African, and American tribes to the Gypsies of Spain and the Finns, is matter of indisputable certainty. The sagas prove the same fact for the Scandinavian race; and very old French writers speak of purely popular ditties on Roland. That the peasantry of early mediæval Scotland and England were incapable of what the peasants of modern Greece can do, or could do at the time of the War of Independence, it is hard to believe. They certainly preserved, recited, altered, mingled, and modernised ballads which are full of universal popular ideas and situations—ballads which are merely popular Märchen in rhyme. These processes of popular alteration and combination lasted, historically, at least till the end of the seventeenth century, as is proved by the numerous variants of the 'Queen's Marie,' based, with great departure from fact, on an historical incident of 1563. It is true that Professor Child regarded this as one of the latest of all ballads, and based, not on a tragedy of the court of Mary Stuart, but on an event of 1719 at the court of Peter the Great. The present writer, by arguments published in Blackwood's Magazine (vol. clviii.), was fortunate enough to alter Professor Child's theory, as he was so kind as to state in a private letter. Mr Henderson also accepts (as regards the date and place of the events out of which this ballad arose) the arguments which thus influenced Professor Child.

The theory of the large popular share in the origin and development of many ballads has its adversary in the hypothesis that most ballads are degraded adaptations, by professional minstrels, of literary chansons de geste (heroic early mediæval French epics) and of literary lays and romances. Scott himself wrote, as regards 'Lord Thomas and Fair Annie,' that, in his opinion, 'the further our researches are extended, the more we shall see ground to believe that the romantic ballads of later times are, for the most part, abridgments of the ancient metrical romances, narrated in a smoother stanza and a more modern language.' This corresponds with Scott's theory that Märchen are the residuum of higher and more literary myths, whereas many myths are Märchen organised and decorated by literary art, as in the Odyssey and the Argonautica.

Akin to Scott's is the view of Professor Courthope, who writes, in his History of English Poetry (i. 445): 'A vague idea prevails that, as the ballad is before all things popular in its character, it was evolved in some mysterious way out of the genius and traditions of the people themselves. But this was by no means the case. What the people contributed to the making of the ballads was no more than the taste and sentiment which characterise them.' And that is conceding a great deal. Mr Henderson says: 'In many ways the ballads bring us into immediate contact with the antique, pagan, savage, superstitious, elemental characteristics of our race.' If these characteristics are not 'popular,' not 'primitive,' what can be called primitive and popular? But Mr Henderson seems to regard these characteristics as merely carried on from 'old forgotten romances,' which (though certainly composed by men of letters in full mediæval Christianity) somehow 'embalm the sentiments, passions, beliefs, forms of thought, and imaginative wonder and dread of our pagan ancestors.' What romances do all this? To do this is the function of the Folk, not of mediæval romancers. Mr Courthope goes on: 'They preserved them, it is true, in their memories, after they had been composed, but the matter not less than the form of the poem was, as a rule, furnished exclusively by the minstrel, who adapted the ancient traditions of the art, originally intended to please the tribal chieftain, or the feudal lord, to the temper of a popular audience. . . . The English ballads that have come down to us fall naturally into three classes: those which reflect the characteristics of the ancient chanson de geste; those which combine the features of the chanson de geste and the literary romance; and those which have a purely literary origin in the romance, lay, or fabliau.' Mr Courthope chooses 'The Battle of Otterburn' as an example of his first class; the Robin Hood ballads of the second; and in the third set he places 'Sir Aldingar,' 'Sir Cauline,' 'Earl Brand,' 'Child Waters,' and the like. In all these classes are 'plain traces of decline from a more ancient and nobler model.' 'As an almost invariable rule, the ballad, when composed in the first place for the purposes of amusement, reproduces, in a mould peculiar to itself, the subject-matter of the older gests, romances, or lays. The tales on which it is founded are rarely, if ever, the legacy of long oral tradition. . . .' Again: 'The ballad was usually a précis of a romance. . . .' Mr Gregory Smith also 'must consider the ballad as part of the literary débris of the Middle Ages' (The Transition Period, p. 186).

We have already remarked on a few samples of that class of ballads which may be regarded as précis of literary romances or chansons de geste. But the matter even of these is 'the legacy of oral tradition,' as Professor Child shows, contrary to the opinion of Mr Courthope, whose chapter on ballads does not display any special acquaintance with the comparative study of the world's ancient, traditional, and popular narratives in verse and prose. The fictitious literature, in prose or verse, of the Middle Ages is, we maintain, like the epics of Homer, really based throughout on popular tales, much older, and much more widely diffused, than written manuscripts. Often the professional and literary poet borrows, like Homer and the authors of the chansons de geste and the romances, from popular tales peculiar to no race of mankind. Occasionally the authors of ballads for the people have 'taken back their own' (as Molière said) from the hands of the professional literary class.

In perhaps more numerous cases the popular ballad does not 'reproduce, in a mould peculiar to itself, the subject-matter of the older gests, romances, or lays.' The ballad-maker works on the original data of world-wide popular tradition. Thus Professor Child writes (i. 98): 'The idea of the love-animated plants has been thought to be derived from the romance of Tristan, where it also occurs; agreeably to a general principle, somewhat hastily assumed, that when romances and popular ballads have anything in common, priority belongs to the romances.' This is Mr Courthope's principle; but too often it contains the reverse of the truth. The popular Märchen on which the Odyssey is based are found all over the world, and cannot have been derived by savages and peasants from the Odyssey, which Homer wove, as Fénelon remarks, out of old wives' fables. Thus, while old literature has borrowed from popular fancy, popular fancy now reclaims its own from literature, now works on original data that literature has neglected. There is not, as Mr Courthope holds, anything 'mysterious' in this theory, beyond the unsolved mystery of the remote origin and evolution of popular tales, and their wide diffusion. Given the regular stock of the incidents of Märchen, and given the primitive ideas and customs on which they rest, any member of the people, illiterate but poetical, could turn these data into rhyme. No professed literary man was needed. Once composed and chanted, the ballad became the property of the people, and was altered to taste by reciters, and broken into a crowd of variants. Nothing, of course, prevented a professed minstrel, or the author of the legend of a saint, from making prize either of the original data or of the ballad; and if the minstrel did so, his poem, in turn, might be corrupted and altered by popular reciters.

There has, in fact, been a come and go of popular data, of literary handling, and of degradation, especially notable in Cruikshank's 'Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman,' a cockney variant of a ballad really ancient, and of a still older legend (see Child's variants under 'Young Beichan'). The two schools of opinion—the popular, as represented here, and the literary, as represented by Mr Courthope—have both right on their side. The process favoured by Mr Courthope—namely, the popularisation of literary romances and chansons de geste—did exist. But these literary works were themselves elaborations of popular traditions, and in many cases the popular ballad author seems to have worked on popular materials, unhelped by any literary handling of them. A good example of the process is afforded by the familiar contes or popular tales of Charles Perrault, 'Cinderella,' and the rest. They were gathered by Perrault, under Louis XIV., from oral tradition, and were recast by him into literary shape. But his literary handling has hardly affected the surviving oral and popular forms of the same tales, as current either in France or other countries, European,

African, or Asiatic. On the other hand, French popular tales have been adapted to their own habits and manners by Red Indians, just as some ballad-makers adapted literary romances to popular taste.

One or two examples of ballads apparently quite popular in origin may be given. Thus we have Professor Child's first ballad, 'Riddles Wisely Expounded.' A girl lies with a knight, and then asks him to marry her. He will do so if she can answer certain riddles, and she succeeds. The idea is as old, and as popular, as the story of Samson or of (Edipus, and the riddles (devinettes) are of the kind familiar to Basutos and Fijians. They can be made the pivot of any sort of Märchen, and the Märchen may, anywhere, be turned into verse—as it is among Celts, Russians, Germans, and Scots. No literary intervention is required. A similar donnée (in 'The Elfin Knight') occurs in the Irish saga of 'Graidhne and Diarmaid,' but not thence did it find its way into the Gesta Romanorum, a literary work which, again, can hardly be the source of the Turkish variant, the Magyar, the Sanskrit, or the Tibetan. The Gesta may, conceivably, be the source of our ballad, but the data of the Gesta were contributed by popular fancy. 'Lady Isabel,' again, is of wonderfully wide distribution, and exists in mingled prose and verse. As a woman saves her own life by ingeniously slaying her would-be murderer, who has already slain several women, there is an element of the 'Blue-beard' Märchen. But Professor Bugge derives the main idea from the tale of 'Judith and Holofernes' in the Apocrypha. That tale may conceivably have contributed, but is itself probably only a literary adaptation of a Märchen. Holofernes is human; the villain of the ballads is an elf. At most there is the usual come and go of literary and popular handling and data. 'Willie's Lady' turns on a piece of popular magic as old in literature as Theocritus in Idyll ii., or as Ovid (Metam. ix. 281-315). If the idea is found in a romance (and we do not know that it is) the ballad-maker need not have borrowed from the romance a notion still familiar in everyday folklore magic. The donnée of the 'Fairy Queen' and 'Tamlane' does occur in romance, but it is also an article of world-wide popular belief. The retrieval of a lover lost in Fairyland appears in the literary romance of 'Orfeo,' where the lady, not the knight as in 'Tamlane,' is won back. But the notion still persisting in Ireland, as it recently did in Scotland, there is no reason for holding that the romance of 'Orfeo' suggested the ballad of 'Tamlane.' On the other side, the analogous adventure of Thomas the Rhymer, in the ballad of that name, is clearly based, in part, on the literary romance of 'Ogier le Danois,' which itself, again, has a popular foundation. We might illustrate, at any length, this va-et-vient of the literary and popular elements in ballads. In 'Tamlane' some local poet or reciter has added local touches. The scene is Carterhaugh, where Ettrick and Yarrow meet;

and in one version the Earls of Moray (Randolph) and of March are parents of the lovers. But such localisations (which are common) are not usually original parts of the story. Nor do they fix a date. Randolph and the Cospatricks were well-known historical figures, and, at almost any time, might be accommodated to any romantic legend.

By a similar early accommodation does William of Malmesbury (ob. 1143) tell a story of Gunhild, daughter of King Cnut, which recurs in the ballad of 'Sir Aldingar.' William's version is adapted in a French metrical life of Edward the Confessor. But we are not to infer that the source of the ballad is necessarily literary, for, as Professor Child remarks, 'we cannot well doubt that William of Malmesbury is citing a ballad. . . . A ballad is known to have been made on a similar and equally fabulous adventure which is alleged in chronicle to have occurred to Gunhild's mother.' Mr Courthope (vol. i. p. 450) is apparently following Professor Child's historical account of the ballad of 'Sir Aldingar;' but in place of saying with Professor Child that William is 'citing a ballad,' he writes, 'William of Malmesbury perhaps derived his account from a Latin poem on the subject.' He gives no reason for preferring the hypothesis of 'a Latin poem' to Professor Child's theory of a ballad as William's source. Professor Child next gives analogous Märchen about illustrious ladies, running back as far as the middle of the seventh century; and suggests that this very ancient popular tale, intruded into history, 'is the root of the Scandinavian-English story.' Thus 'Sir Aldingar' does not, as Mr Courthope thinks, support his theory of the literary origin of ballads and of the absence of popular data. It does precisely the reverse; it is an example of the process by which a popular fable is attached to a series of historical characters, and is finally adopted by so respectable an historian as William of Malmesbury. Meanwhile the authority of Professor Child confirms our theory that, far from the literary history being the source of our ballad, a ballad is the source of the literary history in William of Malmesbury. The author of our 'Sir Aldingar' may have known and used the French 'Life of St Edward,' but the whole fable is popular and ancient. 'There is little or nothing in all these tales that can be historically authenticated, and much that is in plain contradiction with history. Putting history out of the question, there is no footing firmer than air for him who would essay to trace the order of the development.' Given the institution of trial by battle—a woman being represented by her champion—and given the world-wide delight in the success of weakness over strength (David and Goliath), then the data of 'Sir Aldingar' exist, and the legend is applied to many historical queens long before Gunhild. Whether our 'Sir Aldingar' has borrowed literary elements or not is unimportant.

There remain the historical ballads. Of these, such things as 'Kinmont Willie,' 'The Fire o'

Freudraught,' 'Edom o' Gordon,' 'The Queen's Marie,' 'The Bonny Earl o' Moray,' 'Jamie Telfer,' 'Johnnie Armstrong,' and many others cannot be earlier than the events which they celebrate, between the reign of James V. and George II., when we have a ballad on Robin Oig Macgregor, a son of Rob Roy. They rest on recent history, handled with fair accuracy in 'Kinmont Willie,' with romantic distortion in 'The Queen's Marie,' 'The Bonny Earl o' Moray,' 'Edom o' Gordon,' and the lost ballad on the death of the Black Knight of Liddesdale (under David II.), cited by Hume of Godscroft. As to 'Johnnie Armstrong,' with its tale of royal treachery, it is probably the source of the account offered by Pitscottie and other Scottish historians. The tendency of the ballad-maker is to give apocryphal but romantic motives—jealousy and treachery, or revenge, as of Claverhouse for his kinsman at Drumclog—for real actions, and to exaggerate the rank of the characters. One of the Queen's Maries is substituted for an historical waiting-maid; Darnley takes the part actually played by a French apothecary. Tags and formulæ are introduced from older ballads. In the famous case of 'Sir Patrick Spens,' it is impossible to say certainly what historical event, of what date, is the basis of the poem, or whether Spens or Vans is the name of the hero, if hero there was (see Mr Henderson's Scottish Vernacular Literature, pp. 350-355). 'The actual name of the hero of a ballad affords hardly a presumption as to who was originally the hero' (Child), and therefore is of little or no value, in itself, as to date. This is only another proof of the popular and mythopœic nature of the ballads as they have reached us, commonly in shapes later than the original, and altered, adapted, and interpolated by reciters. Whoever made them, the populace, by scores of touches, remade them, and made them its own, as the number of variations attests.

As to the literary merits of the best ballads, praise is superfluous: they charm all ranks in all ages. The vast superiority of the Scottish over the English ballads in vigour, poetic touch, and the moving of supernatural awe is the more remarkable as in literary poetry England proved no less superior to Scotland. There is but one exception: England has no rival of Burns, who represents the peasant element in song—to be sure, with the advantage of education and of familiarity with educated society. But, curiously, Burns had little appreciation of the ballads as distinct from the old lyrics of his countrymen. It was left for Scott, a man of gentle birth, to feel as his fathers had felt during the long centuries of war, and to recover the magnificent poetry of the men who kept the marches in old times.

It is unnecessary to indicate more than one authority on the subject of ballads. Professor Child, of Harvard, in his English and Scottish Popular Ballads (Houghton, Mifflin, & Co.,

Boston, 1883-98), has collected all known ballads, with all accessible variants, and has illustrated them with an extraordinary wealth of knowledge of many literatures. It might be suggested that he had rather less than his usual knowledge in the matter of savage poetry and Märchen; and that, in criticising the historical ballads, he made insufficient use of the MS. sources, and printed State papers of Scotland and England. In such matters, and in minute local topography, he welcomed such crumbs of knowledge as fell from poor men's tables, and industriously added notes and rectifications. Alas! he did not live to compose an essay on the general problems of ballad and Märchen. From casual remarks, of which many have been cited, we gather that he was a moderate and judicious friend of the popular rather than of the literary theory of the origins of the ballad, while fully recognising the many cases in which the ballad, as it stands, is a popularisation of literary chansons de geste and literary romances. Professor Child accumulated at Harvard a rich library of popular literature. He has erected his own enduring memorial, but to this one of his learned countrymen might add a volume on the problems of the ballad. These could not be solved, nor even perceived in their proper light, till the popular literature of all ages and of all mankind, civilised, barbaric, and savage, had been collected and compared by the industry of European, Oriental, and American men of learning. Literary origins can only be studied, like all other origins, in the light of a wide knowledge of the popular literature of the world, peasant, barbaric, and savage. The fallacy of supposing that a rite, or myth, or custom, or belief, or romantic incident is necessarily derived from its civilised or literary counterpart, and that popular examples of the same ideas are necessarily later, borrowed, and degenerate, has long been abandoned by anthropologists, and ought not to be accepted by literary students.

Several ballads which follow are taken from Scott's Border Minstrelsy. They are confessedly composed out of many variants, and patched, but they are the versions most familiarly known; and, again, all versions are patched and composite. We have no traditional ballad in its original shape. Meanwhile Scott's versions are arranged by a poet, as the rest are arranged by reciters. The first is one of the longer of fifteen (more or less complete) variants given by Professor Child.

Young Beichan.

In London was young Beichan born,
He longed strange countries for to see;
But he was taen by a savage Moor,
Who handled him right cruellie;

For he viewed the fashions of that land;
Their way of worship viewed he;
But to Mahound, or Termagant,
Would Beichan never bend a knee.

So in every shoulder they've putten a bore ; fastening
In every bore they've putten a tree ; wooden shackle
And they have made him trail the wine
And spices on his fair bodie.

They've casten him in a dungeon deep,
Where he could neither hear nor see ;
For seven years they kept him there,
Till he for hunger's like to die.

This Moor he had but ae daughter,
Her name was called Susie Pye ;
And every day as she took the air,
Near Beichan's prison she passed by.

O so it fell, upon a day
She heard young Beichan sadly sing ;
'My hounds they all go masterless ;
My hawks they flee from tree to tree ;
My younger brother will heir my land ;
Fair England again I'll never see !'

All night long no rest she got,
Young Beichan's song for thinking on ;
She's stown the keys from her father's head,
And to the prison strong is gone.

And she has open'd the prison doors,
I wot she open'd two or three,
Ere she could come young Beichan at,
He was locked up so curioslie.

But when she came young Beichan before,
Sore wonder'd he that may to see ;
He took her for some fair captive ;—
'Fair Lady, I pray, of what countrie ?'

'O have ye any lands,' she said,
'Or castles in your own countrie,
That ye could give to a lady fair,
From prison strong to set you free ?'

'Near London town I have a hall,
With other castles two or three ;
I'll give them all to the lady fair
That out of prison will set me free.'

'Give me the truth of your right hand,
The truth of it give unto me,
That for seven years ye'll no lady wed,
Unless it be along with me.'

'I'll give thee the truth of my right hand,
The truth of it I'll freely gie,
That for seven years I'll stay unwed,
For the kindness thou dost show to me.'

And she has brib'd the proud warder
Wi' mickle gold and white monie ;
She's gotten the keys of the prison strong,
And she has set young Beichan free.

She's gi'en him to eat the good spice-cake,
She's gi'en him to drink the blood-red wine ;
She's bidden him sometimes think on her,
That sae kindly freed him out of pine.

She's broken a ring from her finger,
And to Beichan half of it gave she :
Keep it, to mind you of that love
The lady bore that set you free.

'And set your foot on good ship-board,
And haste ye back to your own countrie ;
And before that seven years have an end,
Come back again, love, and marry me.'

But long ere seven years had an end,
She long'd full sore her love to see ;
For ever a voice within her breast
Said, 'Beichan has broke his vow to thee.'
So she's set her foot on good ship-board,
And turn'd her back on her own countrie.

She sailed east, she sailed west,
Till to fair England's shore she came ;
Where a bonny shepherd she espied,
Feeding his sheep upon the plain.

'What news, what news, thou bonny shepherd ?
What news hast thou to tell to me ?'
'Such news I hear, ladie,' he says,
'The like was never in this countrie.'

'There is a wedding in yonder hall,
Has lasted these thirty days and three ;
Young Beichan will not bed with his bride,
For love of one that's yond the sea.'

She's put her hand in her pocket,
Gi'en him the gold and white monie ;
'Hae, take ye that, my bonny boy,
For the good news thou tell'st to me.'

When she came to young Beichan's gate,
She tirl'd softly at the pin ;
So ready was the proud porter
To open and let this lady in.

'Is this young Beichan's hall,' she said,
'Or is that noble lord within ?'
'Yea, he's in the hall among them all,
And this is the day o' his weddin.'

'And has he wed anither love ?
And has he clean forgotten me ?'
And, sighin', said that gay ladie,
'I wish I were in my own countrie.'

And she has taen her gay gold ring,
That with her love she brake so free ;
Says, 'Gie him that, ye proud porter,
And bid the bridegroom speak to me.'

When the porter came his lord before,
He kneeled down low on his knee—
'What aileth thee, my proud porter,
Thou art so full of courtesie ?'

'I've been porter at your gates,
It's thirty long years now and three ;
But there stands a lady at them now,
The like o' her did I never see ;

'For on every finger she has a ring,
And on her mid finger she has three ;
And as mickle gold aboon her brow
As would buy an earldom to me.'

Its out then spak the bride's mother,
Aye and an angry woman was shee ;
'Ye might have excepted our bonny bride,
And twa or three of our companie.'

maid

'O hold your tongue, thou bride's mother ;
Of all your folly let me be ;
She's ten times fairer nor the bride,
And all that's in your companie.

'She begs one sheave of your white bread, shive, slice
But and a cup of your red wine ;
And to remember the lady's love,
'That last reliev'd you out of pine.'

'O well-a-day !' said Beichan then,
'That I so soon have married thee !
For it can be none but Susie Pye,
'That sailed the sea for love of me.'

And quickly hied he down the stair ;
Of fifteen steps he made but three ;
He's ta'en his bonny love in his arms,
And kist, and kist her tenderlie.

'O hae ye ta'en anither bride ?
And hae ye quite forgotten me ?
And hae ye quite forgotten her,
'That gave you life and libertie ?'

She looked o'er her left shoulder,
To hide the tears stood in her e'e :
'Now fare thee well, young Beichan,' she says,
'I'll try to think no more on thee.'

'O never, never, Susie Pye,
For surely this can never be ;
Nor ever shall I wed but her
'That's done and dree'd so much for me. borne

Then out and spak the forenoon bride,—
'My lord, your love it changeth soon ;
This morning I was made your bride,
And another chose ere it be noon.' chosen

'O hold thy tongue, thou forenoon bride :
Ye're ne'er a whit the worse for me ;
And when ye return to your own countrie,
A double dower I'll send with thee.'

He's ta'en Susie Pye by the white hand,
And gently led her up and down ;
And ay as he kist her red rosy lips,
'Ye're welcome, jewel, to your own.'

He's taen her by the milk-white hand,
And led her to yon fountain stane ;
He's changed her name from Susie Pye,
And he's called her his bonny love, Lady Jane.

This ballad is not selected for its poetical merit, but for its curious and instructive history. A little controversy has long existed as to the authorship of a cockney ditty, 'The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman,' published for and illustrated by George Cruikshank. The ballad or parts of it have been claimed for Dickens or Thackeray, while the same doubt exists as to the authorship of the prose notes. Happily Thackeray left, in manuscript, a version of 'Lord Bateman' which is almost verbally the same as a version lent by Lady Rosalind Northcote, taken from the recitation of a blind old woman in Devonshire. Again, the verses regarded as peculiarly Thackerayan exist in a Scots version, preserved by Child (vol. i. p. 476). Thus the 'Loving Ballad' is purely popular, with cockney pronunciation indicated, and with one or two slight changes.

'The ballad story has beautiful repetitions in the ballads of other nations,' Norse, Spanish, and Italian. All turn on the forgetfulness of a lover who has loved in a far country, and the return of his lady just as he is about wedding a new love at home. Now, this is the donnée of the world-wide Märchen which, in Scotland, is 'The Black Bull o' Norroway,' and the idea may even be detected in the story of Jason and Medea (see 'A Far-travelled Tale' in the author's Custom and Myth). The donnée, then, is of unknown age and is purely popular. Now, this donnée intruded itself (c. 1300) into a late poetical legend of St Thomas of Canterbury, and was applied to his father, Gilbert Becket. Professor Child concludes that our ballad has probably been 'affected' by the Becket form of the legend, 'but the ballad, for all that, is not derived from the legend. . . . The legend lacks some of the main points of the stories, and the ballad, in one version or other, has them.' Thus 'Young Beichan' illustrates the come and go of popular motive and literary handling, while the many variants show how generations of the people made the ballad their own. The literary school of critics would, if consistent, derive the ballad forms of 'Young Beichan' from the late and literary legend of Gilbert Becket.

Jamie Telfer of the Fair Dodhead.

It fell about the Martinmas tyde,
When our Border steeds get corn and hay,
The Captain of Bewcastle hath bound him to ryde,
And he's ower to Tividale to drive a prey.

The first ae guide that they met wi',
It was high up in Hardhaughswire !
The second guide that they met wi',
It was laigh down in Borthwick Water.

'What tidings, what tidings, my trusty guide ?' —
'Nae tidings, nae tidings, I hae to thee ;
But gin ye'll gae to the fair Dodhead,
Mony a cow's cauf I'll let thee see.'

And when they cam to the fair Dodhead,
Right hastily they clam the peel ; climbed into
They loosed the kye out, ane and a', the tower
And ranshacked the house right weel. ransacked

Now Jamie Telfer's heart was sair,
The tear aye rowing in his ee ;
He pled wi' the Captain to hae his gear,
Or else revenged he wad be.

The Captain turned him round and leugh;
Said—'Man, there's naething in thy house,
But ae auld sword without a sheath,
That hardly now would fell a mouse.'—

The sun wasna up, but the moon was down,
It was the gryming of a new-fa'n snaw, sprinkling
Jamie Telfer has run ten myles a-foot,
Between the Dodhead and the Stobs's Ha'.

And when he cam to the fair tower yate,
He shouted loud, and cried weel hie,
Till out bespak auld Gibby Elliot—
'Whae's this that brings the fray to me?'—

'It's I, Jamie Telfer, o' the fair Dodhead,
And a harried man I think I be!
There's naething left at the fair Dodhead,
But a waefu' wife and bairnies three.'

'Gae seek your succour at Branksome Ha',
For succour ye'se get nane frae me!
Gae seek your succour where ye paid black-mail,
For, man, ye ne'er paid money to me.'—

Jamie has turned him round about,
I wat the tear blinded his ee—
'I'll ne'er pay mail to Elliot again,
And the fair Dodhead I'll never see!

'My hounds may a' rin masterless,
My hawks may fly frae tree to tree,
My lord may grip my vassal lands,
For there again maun I never be!'

He has turn'd him to the Tiviot side,
E'en as fast as he could drie,
Till he cam to the Coultart Cleugh,
And there he shouted baith loud and hie.

Then up bespak him auld Jock Grieve—
'Whae's this that brings the fray to me!'
'It's I, Jamie Telfer o' the fair Dodhead;
A harried man I trow I be.

'There's naething left in the fair Dodhead,
But a greeting wife and bairnies three,
And sax poor ca's stand in the sta', ^{calves—stall}
A' routing loud for their minnie.'— ^{lowing—mother}

'Alack a wae!' quo' auld Jock Grieve,
'Alack! my heart is sair for thee!
For I was married on the elder sister,
And you on the youngest of a' the three.'

Then he has ta'en out a bonny black,
Was right weel fed with corn and hay,
And he's set Jamie Telfer on his back,
To the Catslockhill to tak the fray.

And when he cam to the Catslockhill,
He shouted loud, and cried weel hie,
Till out and spak him William's Wat—
'O whae's this brings the fray to me?'—

'It's I, Jamie Telfer of the fair Dodhead,
A harried man I think I be!
The captain of Bewcastle has driven my gear;
For God's sake rise, and succour me!'

'Alas for wae!' quoth William's Wat,
'Alack, for thee my heart is sair!
I never cam by the fair Dodhead,
That ever I fand thy basket bare.'—

He's set his twa sons on coal-black steeds,
Himsell upon a freckled gray,
And they are on wi' Jamie Telfer,
To Branksome Ha' to tak the fray.

And when they cam to Branksome Ha',
They shouted a' baith loud and hie,
Till up and spak him auld Buccleuch,
Said—'Whae's this brings the fray to me?'—

'It's I, Jamie Telfer of the fair Dodhead,
And a harried man I think I be!
There's naught left in the fair Dodhead,
But a greeting wife and bairnies three.'—

'Alack for wae!' quoth the gude auld lord,
'And ever my heart is wae for thee!
But fye gar cry on Willie, my son,
And see that he come to me speedilie!

'Gar warn the water, braid and wide,
Gar warn it sune and hastilie!
They that winna ride for Telfer's kye,
Let them never look in the face o' me!

'Warn Wat o' Harden and his sons,
Wi' them will Borthwick Water ride;
Warn Gaudilands, and Allanhaugh,
And Gilmanscleugh, and Commonsides.

'Ride by the gate of Priesthaughswire,
And warn the Currors o' the Lea;
As ye cum down the Hermitage Slack,
Warn doughty Willie o' Gorrinberry.'—

The Scotts they rade, the Scotts they ran,
Sae starkly and sae steadilie!
And aye the ower-word o' the thrang
Was—'Rise for Branksome readilie!'

The gear was driven the Frostylee up,
Frae the Frostylee unto the plain,
Whan Willie has look'd his men before,
And saw the kye right fast drivand.

'Whae drives thir kye?' 'gan Willie say,
'To make an outspeckle o' me?' ^{laughing-stock}
'It's I, the captain o' Bewcastle, Willie;
I wanna layne my name for thee.'— ^{deny, hide}

'O will ye let Telfer's kye gae back?
Or will ye do aught for regard o' me?
Or by the faith of my body, quo' Willie Scott, ^{spend my}
'I'se ware my dame's cauf skin on thee!' ^{wife's shoe-leather}

'I winna let the kye gae back,
Neither for thy love, nor yet thy fear;
But I will drive Jamie Telfer's kye,
In spite of every Scott that's here.'—

'Set on them, lads!' quo' Willie than;
'Fye, lads, set on them cruellie!
For ere they win to the Ritterford,
Mony a toom saddle there sall be!'

empty

[Then til 't they gaed, wi' heart and hand,
The blows fell fast as bickering hail ; thrashing
And mony a horse ran masterless,
And mony a comely cheek was pale.]

But Willie was stricken ower the head,
And thro' the knapsack the sword has gane ; head-
And Harden grat for very rage, piece
Whan Willie on the grund lay slane. wept

[But he's ta'en aff his gude steel cap,
And thrice he's waved it in the air—
The Dinlay snaw was ne'er mair white
Nor the lyart locks of Harden's hair.] bleached

'Revenge ! revenge !' auld Wat 'gan cry ;
'Fye, lads, lay on them cruellie !
We'll ne'er see Teviotside again,
Or Willie's death revenged sall be.'

O mony a horse ran masterless,
The splinter'd lance flew on hie ;
But or they wan to the Kershope ford,
The Scotts had gotten the victory.

John o' Brigham there was slane,
And John o' Barlow, as I heard say ;
And thirty mae o' the Captain's men more
Lay bleeding on the grund that day.

The Captain was run through the thick of the thigh,
And broken was his right leg bane ;
If he had lived this hundred years,
He had never been loved by woman again.

'Hae back the kye !' the Captain said ;
'Dear kye, I trow, to some they be !
For gin I suld live a hundred years,
There will ne'er fair lady smile on me.'—

Then word is gone to the Captain's bride,
Even in the bower where that she lay,
That her lord was prisoner in enemy's land,
Since into Tividale he had led the way.

'I wad lour'd have had a winding-sheet, rather
And helped to put it ower his head,
Ere he had been disgraced by the Border Scott
Whan he ower Liddel his men did lead !'—

There was a wild gallant amang us a',
His name was Watty wi' the Wudspurs, Mad-spurs
Cried—'On for his house in Stanegirthside,
If ony man will ride with us !'

When they cam to the Stanegirthside,
They dang wi' trees, and burst the door ; banged
They loosed out a' the Captain's kye, —logs
And set them forth our lads before.

There was an auld wife ayont the fire,
A wee bit o' the Captain's kin—
'Whae dare loose out the Captain's kye,
Or answer to him and his men ?'—

'It's I, Watty Wudspurs, loose the kye,
I winna layne my name frae thee ! hide, deny
And I will loose out the Captain's kye,
In scorn of a' his men and he.'—

Whan they cam to the fair Dodhead,
They were a wellcum sight to see !
For instead of his ain ten milk kye,
Jamie Telfer has gotten thirty and three.

And he has paid the rescue shot,
Baith wi' gowd and white monie ;
And at the burial o' Willie Scott,
I wat was mony a weeping ee.

Scott is responsible for this fine riding ballad, but probably did no more than add touches here and there. This is probable, because he represents the Dodhead as being near Singlee in Ettrick. Now, Telfer could not have covered in time the great distance from Singlee to Branxholme, and he would probably have applied for aid to Scott of Tushielaw and Scott of Thirlestane, his neighbours, not to Elliot of Stobs, who was very remote. In fact there is a Dodburn (and therefore a Dodhead) on the southern side of Teviot, within touch of Stobs, but Scott was obviously unaware of the fact which makes the events in the ballad possible. It may therefore be inferred that he really received the ballad from tradition ; had he invented it he would have made the topography plausible. No English reivers would ride on a hasty foray from the Marches to Dodhead in Ettrick. Telfer would still find the kin of Jock Grieve on the old farms in Teviotdale.

The Young Tamlane.

'O I forbid ye, maidens a',
That wear gowd on your hair,
To come or gae by Carterhaugh,
For young Tamlane is there.

'There's nane that gacs by Carterhaugh,
But maun leave him a wad, pledge
Either gowd rings or green mantles,
Or else their maidenheid.

'Now gowd rings ye may buy, maidens,
Green mantles ye may spin ;
But gin ye lose your maidenheid,
Ye'll ne'er get that agen.'—

But up then spake her, fair Janet,
The fairest o' a' her kin ;
'I'll cum and gang to Carterhaugh,
And ask nae leave o' him.'

Janet has kilted her green kirtle,
A little abune her knee ;
And she has braided her yellow hair,
A little abune her bree. brow

And when she came to Carterhaugh,
She gaed beside the well ;
And there she fand his steed standing
But awa was himsell.

She hadna pu'd a red red rose,
A rose but barely three ;
Till up and starts a wee wee man,
At lady Janet's knee.

Says—'Why pu' ye the rose, Janet?
What gars ye break the tree?
Or why come ye to Carterhaugh,
Withouten leave o' me?'—

Says—'Carterhaugh it is mine ain;
My daddie gave it me:
I'll come and gang to Carterhaugh,
And ask nae leave o' thee.'

He's taen her by the milk-white hand,
Among the leaves sae green.
And what they did, I cannot tell—
The green leaves were between.

He's ta'en her by the milk-white hand,
Among the roses red;
And what they did I cannot say—
She ne'er return'd a maid.

When she cam to her father's ha',
She looked pale and wan;
They thought she'd dreed some sair sickness, borne
Or been with some leman.

She didna comb her yellow hair,
Nor make meikle o' her head;
And ilka thing that ladye took
Was like to be her deid. death

It's four and twenty ladies fair
Were playing at the ba';
Janet, the weightiest of them anes,
Was faintest o' them a'.

Four and twenty ladies fair
Were playing at the chess;
And out there came the fair Janet,
As green as any grass.

Out and spake an auld grey-headed knight,
Lay o'er the castle wa'—
'And ever, alas! for thee, Janet,
But we'll be blamed a'!'—

'Now haud your tongue, ye auld grey knight,
And an ill deid may ye dee,
Father my bairn on whom I will,
I'll father nane on thee.'

Out then spak her father dear,
And he spak meik and mild—
'And ever, alas! my sweet Janet,
I fear ye gae with child.'

'And if I be with child, father,
Mysell maun bear the blame;
There's ne'er a knight about your ha'
Shall hae the bairnie's name.

'And if I be with child, father,
'Twill prove a wondrous birth;
For weel I swear I'm not wi' bairn
To any man on earth.

'If my love were an earthly knight,
As he's an elfin grey,
I wadna gie my ain true love
For nae lord that ye hae.'

She prink'd hersell and prinn'd hersell,
By the ae light of the moon,
And she's away to Carterhaugh,
To speak wi' young Tamlane.

And when she cam to Carterhaugh,
She gaed beside the well;
And there she saw the steed standing,
But away was himsell.

She hadna pu'd a double rose,
A rose but only twae,
When up and started young Tamlane,
Says—'Lady, thou pu's nae mae!

'Why pu' ye the rose, Janet,
Within this garden grene,
And a' to kill the bonny babe
That we got us between?'

'The truth ye'll tell to me, Tamlane:
A word ye mauna lie;
Gin e'er ye was in haly chapel,
Or sained in Christentie?' blessed, baptised

'The truth I'll tell to thee, Janet,
A word I winna lee:
A knight me got, and a lady me bore,
As well as they did thee.

'Randolph, earl Murray, was my sire,
Dunbar, earl March, is thine;
We loved when we were children small,
Which yet you well may mind.

'When I was a boy just turn'd of nine,
My uncle sent for me,
To hunt and hawk, and ride with him,
And keep him companie.

'There came a wind out of the north,
A sharp wind and a snell;
And a deep sleep came over me,
And frae my horse I fell.

'The queen of fairies keepit me
(And I'm a fairy, lyth and limb), joint
In yon green hill to dwell;
Fair ladye, view me well.

'But we, that live in fairy-land,
No sickness know nor pain,
I quit my body when I will,
And take to it again.

'I quit my body when I please,
Or unto it repair;
We can inhabit at our ease,
In either earth or air.

'Our shapes and size we can convert
To either large or small;
An old nut-shell's the same to us
As is the lofty hall.

'We sleep in rose-buds soft and sweet,
We revel in the stream;
We wanton lightly on the wind,
Or glide on a sunbeam.

'And all our wants are well supplied
From every rich man's store,
Who thankless sins the gifts he gets,
And vainly grasps for more.

'Then would I never tire, Janet,
In Elfish land to dwell ;
But aye, at every seven years,
They pay the teind to hell ; tithe
And I am sae fat and fair of flesh,
I fear 'twill be mysell.

'This night is Hallowe'en, Janet,
The morn is Hallowday ;
And, gin ye dare your true love win,
Ye na hae time to stay.

'The night it is good Hallowe'en,
When fairy folk will ride ;
And they that wad their true love win,
At Miles Cross they maun bide.'—

'But how shall I thee ken, Tamlane ?
Or how shall I thee know,
Amang so many unearthly knights,
The like I never saw ?'—

'The first company that passes by,
Say na, and let them gae ;
The next company that passes by,
Say na, and do right sae ;
The third company that passes by,
Then I'll be ane o' thae.

'First let pass the black, Janet,
And syne let pass the brown ;
But grip ye to the milk-white steed,
And pu' the rider down.

'For I ride on the milk-white steed,
And aye nearest the town ;
Because I was a christen'd knight,
They gave me that renown.

'My right hand will be gloved, Janet,
My left hand will be bare ;
And these the tokens I gie thee,
Nae doubt I will be there.

'They'll turn me in your arms, Janet,
An adder and a snake ;
But haud me fast, let me not pass,
Gin ye wad buy me maik. buy me back to be your mate

They'll turn me in your arms, Janet,
An adder and an ask ; eft, newt
They'll turn me in your arms, Janet,
A bale that burns fast. fire, brand

'They'll turn me in your arms, Janet,
A red-hot gad o' airn ;
But haud me fast, let me not pass,
For I'll do you no harm.

'First dip me in a stand o' milk,
And then in a stand o' water ;
But haud me fast, let me not pass—
I'll be your bairn's father.

'And, next, they'll shape me in your arms,
A tod, but and an eel ;
But haud me fast, nor let me gang,
As you do love me weel.

'They'll shape me in your arms, Janet,
A dove, but and a swan ;
And, last, they'll shape me in your arms
A mother-naked man :
Cast your green mantle over me—
I'll be myself again.'—

Gloomy, gloomy, was the night,
And eiry was the way,
As fair Janet in her green mantle,
To Miles Cross she did gae.

The heavens were black, the night was dark,
And dreary was the place ;
But Janet stood, with eager wish,
Her lover to embrace.

Betwixt the hours of twelve and one,
A north wind tore the bent ;
And straight she heard strange elritch sounds,
Upon that wind which went.

About the dead hour o' the night,
She heard the bridles ring ;
And Janet was as glad o' that
As any earthly thing.

[Their oaten pipes blew wondrous shrill,
The hemlock small blew clear ;
And louder notes from hemlock large,
And bog-reed, struck the ear ;
But solemn sounds, or sober thoughts,
The fairies cannot bear.

They sing, inspired with love and joy,
Like skylarks in the air ;
Of solid sense, or thought that's grave,
You'll find no traces there.

Fair Janet stood, with mind unmoved,
The dreary heath upon ;
And louder, louder wax'd the sound,
As they came riding on.

Will 'o Wisp before them went,
Sent forth a twinkling light ;
And soon she saw the fairy bands
All riding in her sight.]

And first gaed by the black, black steed,
And then gaed by the brown ;
But fast she gript the milk-white steed,
And pu'd the rider down.

She pu'd him frae the milk-white steed,
And loot the bridle fa' ; let—fall
And up there raise an erlish cry—
'He's won among us a' !'—

They shaped him in fair Janet's arms,
An esk but and an adder ; eft, newt
She held him fast in every shape—
To be her bairn's father.

They shaped him in her arms at last,
A mother-naked man ;
She wrapt him in her green mantel,
And sae her true love wan !

Up then spake the Queen o' Fairies,
Out o' a bush o' bloom—
'She that has borrow'd young Tamlane,
Has gotten a stately groom.'—

Up then spake the Queen o' Fairies,
Out o' a bush o' rye—
'She's ta'en awa the bonniest knight
In a' my cumpanie.

'But had I kenn'd, Tamlane,' she says,
'A ladye wad borrow'd thee—
I wad ta'en out thy twa grey een,
Put in twa een o' tree.

wood

'Had I but kenn'd, Tamlane,' she says,
'Before ye came frae hame—
I wad ta'en out your heart o' flesh,
Put in a heart o' stane.

'Had I but had the wit yestreen
That I hae coft the day—
I'd paid my kane seven times to hell ^{tribute,}
Ere you'd been won away !' ^{customary payment}

This version is Scott's, a compound, as usual, of various oral or manuscript variants with some weak modern stanzas. The ideas, the winning of a mortal from Fairyland and the process of holding him, or her, through a series of metamorphoses, are extremely ancient (Apollodorus, Bibliotheca, iii. 13, 5, 6; the case of Peleus and Thetis). An instance of the fairy adventure is remembered in Glencoe, the events being of the nineteenth century. A tale, in prose or verse, on Tamlane was known to the author of The Complaynt of Scotlande (1549).

Robin Hood and the Curtal Frier.

In summer time, when leaves grow green,
And flowers are fresh and gay,
Robin Hood and his merry men
Were disposed to play.

Then some would leap, and some would run,
And some would use artillery ;
'Which of you can a good bow draw,
A good archer for to be ?

'Which of you can kill a buck,
Or who can kill a doe ?
Or who can kill a hart of greece ^{a fat hart}
Five hundred foot him fro ?'

Will Scadlocke he killd a buck,
And Midge he killd a doe,
And Little John killd a hart of greece,
Five hundred foot him fro.

'Gods blessing on thy heart,' said Robin Hood,
'That hath such a shot for me ;
I would ride my horse a hundred miles,
To find one could match with thee.'

This caused Will Scadlocke to laugh,
He laught full heartily :
'There lives a curtal frier in Fountains Abby ^{short-frocked}
Will beat both him and thee.

'The curtal frier in Fountains Abby
Well can a strong bow draw ;
He will beat you and your yeomen,
Set them all on a row.'

Robin Hood he took a solemn oath,
It was by Mary free,
That he would neither eat nor drink
Till the frier he did see.

Robin Hood put on his harness good,
On his head a cap of steel,
Broad sword and buckler by his side,
And they became him weel.

He took his bow into his hand,
It was made of a trusty tree,
With a sheaf of arrows at his belt,
And to Fountains Dale went he.

And comming unto Fountains Dale,
No farther would he ride ;
There he was aware of a curtal frier,
Walking by the water side.

The frier had on a harness good,
On his head a cap of steel,
Broad sword and buckler by his side,
And they became him weel.

Robin Hood lighted off his horse,
And tyed him to a thorn :
'Carry me over the water, thou curtal frier,
Or else thy life's forlorn.'

The frier took Robin Hood on his back,
Deep water he did bestride,
And spake neither good word nor bad,
Till he came at the other side.

Lightly leapt Robin off the friers back ;
The frier said to him again,
'Carry me over this water, fine fellow,
Or it shall breed thy pain.'

Robin Hood took the frier on's back,
Deep water he did bestride,
And spake neither good word nor bad,
Till he came at the other side.

Lightly leapt the frier off Robin Hoods back ;
Robin Hood said to him again,
'Carry me over this water, thou curtal frier,
Or it shall breed thy pain.'

The frier took Robin on's back again,
And stept up to the knee ;
Till he came at the middle stream
Neither good nor bad spake he.

And coming to the middle stream,
There he threw Robin in ;
'And chuse thee, chuse thee, fine fellow,
Whether thou wilt sink or swim.'

Robin Hood swam to a bush of broom,
The frier to a wicker wand ;
Bold Robin Hood is gone to shore,
And took his bow in his hand.

One of his best arrows under his belt
To the frier he let fly :
The curtal frier with his steel buckler
Did put that arrow by.

'Shoot on, shoot on, thou fine fellow,
Shoot as thou hast begun,
If thou shoot here a summers day,
Thy mark I will not shun.'

Robin Hood shot passing well,
Till his arrows all were gone ;
They took their swords and steel bucklers,
They fought with might and main,

From ten o' th' clock that day
Till four i' th' afternoon ;
Then Robin Hood came to his knees,
Of the frier to beg a boon.

'A boon, a boon, thou curtal frier,
I beg it on my knee :
Give me leave to set my horn to my mouth,
And to blow blasts three.'

'That I will do,' said the curtal frier,
'Of thy blasts I have no doubt ;
I hope thou 'lt blow so passing well,
'Till both thy eyes fall out.'

Robin Hood set his horn to his mouth,
He blew but blasts three ;
Half a hundred yeomen, with bows bent,
Came raking over the lee.

'Whose men are these,' said the frier,
'That come so hastily ?'
'These men are mine,' said Robin Hood ;
'Frier, what is that to thee ?'

'A boon, a boon,' said the curtal frier,
'The like I gave to thee ;
Give me leave to set my fist to my mouth,
And to whute whutes three.'

hoot

'That will I do,' said Robin Hood,
'Or else I were to blame ;
Three whutes in a friers fist
Would make me glad and fain.'

The frier set his fist to his mouth,
And whuted whutes three ;
Half a hundred good ban-dogs
Came running over the lee.

mastiffs, or bloodhounds

'Here's for every man of thine a dog,
And I my self for thee :'
'Nay, by my faith,' said Robin Hood,
'Frier, that may not be.'

Two dogs at once to Robin Hood did go,
The one behind, the other before ;
Robin Hoods mantle of Lincoln green
Off from his back they tore.

And whether his men shot east or west,
Or they shot north or south,
The curtal dogs, so taught they were, docked
They kept their arrows in their mouth.

'Take up thy dogs,' said Little John,
'Frier, at my bidding be ;'
'Whose man art thou,' said the curtal frier,
'Comes here to prate with me ?'

'I am Little John, Robin Hoods man,
Frier, I will not lie ;
If thou take not up thy dogs soon,
I 'le take up them and thee.'

Little John had a bow in his hand,
He shot with might and main ;
Soon half a score of the friers dogs
Lay dead upon the plain.

'Hold thy hand, good fellow,' said the curtal frier.
'Thy master and I will agree ;
And we will have new orders taken,
With all the haste that may be.'

'If thou wilt forsake fair Fountains Dale,
And Fountains Abby free,
Every Sunday throughout the year,
A noble shall be thy fee :

'And every holy day throughout the year,
Changed shall thy garment be,
If thou wilt go to fair Nottingham,
And there remain with me.'

This curtal frier had kept Fountains Dale
Seven long years or more ;
There was neither knight, lord, nor earl,
Could make him yield before.

This ballad is from a 'Garland' of 1663, the version in Percy's folio being fragmentary. The piece, says Professor Child, 'is in a genuinely popular style, and was made to sing, not to print.' There are traces of an earlier ballad as the common basis of the version given here and of that in the Percy folio.

Sir Patrick Spens.

The king sits in Dunfermline towne,
Drinking the blude-red wine ;
'O whare will I get a skeely skipper,
To sail this new ship of mine ?'

O up and spake an eldern knight,
Sat at the king's right knee,—
'Sir Patrick Spens is the best sailor,
That ever sailed the sea.'

Our king has written a braid letter,
And seal'd it with his hand,
And sent it to sir Patrick Spens,
Was walking on the strand.

'To Noroway, to Noroway,
To Noroway o'er the faem ;
The king's daughter of Noroway,
'Tis thou maun bring her hame.'

The first word that sir Patrick read,
Sae loud loud laughed he ;
The neist word that sir Patrick read,
The tear blinded his ee.

next

'O wha is this has done this deed,
 And tauld the king o' me,
 To send us out, at this time of the year,
 To sail upon the sea?

'Be it wind, be it weat, be it hail, be it sleet,
 Our ship must sail the faem;
 The king's daughter of Norway,
 'Tis we must fetch her hame.'—

They hoysed their sails on Monenday morn, hoisted
 Wi' a' the speed they may;
 They hae landed in Norway,
 Upon a Wodensday.

They hadna been a week, a week,
 In Noroway, but twae,
 When that the lords o' Norway
 Began aloud to say—

'Ye Scottishmen spend a' our king's goud,
 And a' our queenis fee.'—
 'Ye lie, ye lie, ye liars loud!
 Fu' loud I hear ye lie:

'For I brought as much white monie,
 As gane my men and me, serve for
 And I brought a half-fou of gude red goud, half-measure
 Out o'er the sea wi' me.

'Make ready, make ready, my merrymen a'!
 Our gude ship sails the morn,'—
 'Now, ever alake, my master dear,
 I fear a deadly storm!

'I saw the new moon, late yestreen,
 Wi' the auld moon in her arm;
 And, if we gang to sea, master,
 I fear we'll come to harm.'

They hadna sailed a league, a league,
 A league but barely three,
 [When the lift grew dark, and the wind blew loud,
 And gurly grew the sea.]

The ankers brak, and the top-masts lap, sprang
 It was sic a deadly storm;
 And the waves cam o'er the broken ship,
 Till a' her sides were torn.

'O where will I get a gude sailor,
 To take my helm in hand,
 Till I get up to the tall top-mast,
 To see if I can spy land?'—

'O here am I, a sailor gude,
 To take the helm in hand,
 Till you go up to the tall top-mast;
 But I fear ye'll ne'er spy land.'

He hadna gane a step, a step,
 A step but barely ane,
 When a bout flew out of our goodly ship, bolt
 And the salt sea it cam in.

'Gae, fetch a web o' the silken claith,
 Another o' the twine, ropes
 And wap them into our ship's side, pack
 And let nae the sea come in.'—

They fetch'd a web o' the silken claith,
 Another o' the twine,
 And they wrapp'd them round that gude ship's side,
 But still the sea cam in.

O laith, laith were our gude Scots lords
 To weet their cork-heel'd shoon! wet
 But lang or a' the play was play'd,
 They wat their hats aboon.

And mony was the feather-bed
 That flatter'd on the faem; tossed
 And mony was the gude lord's son
 That never mair cam hame.

The ladies wrang their fingers white,
 The maidens tore their hair,
 A' for the sake of their true loves;
 For them they'll see nae mair.

O lang, lang may the ladies sit,
 'Wi' their fans into their hand,
 Before they see sir Patrick Spens
 Come sailing to the strand!

And lang, lang may the maidens sit,
 With their goud kaims in their hair, gold combs
 A' waiting for their ain dear loves!
 For them they'll see nair.

O forty miles off Aberdeen,
 'Tis fifty fathoms deep,
 And there lies gude sir Patrick Spens,
 Wi' the Scots lords at his feet.

This ballad was first printed by Percy (1765), and then by Herd ('Sir Andrew Wood') in 1769. Scott's version is a blend of two variants. Sir Andrew Wood has only been casually introduced, he being the most famous mariner under James III. and James IV. That the ballad is really traditional is proved by a fragment of a variant collected in 1829, which contains a formula found also in 'The Bonny Earl o' Moray'—an example of the popular method of diffusing and intermingling ballads. The expedition to Norway, under Sir Patrick, is not historical, and yields no date, though conceivably it may be a refraction from the well-remembered fact of the death of the Maid of Norway on her way to Scotland (1290). The marriage of James III. with a Danish princess (1469) involved no kind of tragedy. If one might conjecture, the death of the Maid, with its terrible consequences, floated vaguely in the popular memory, as did the Danish marriage of James III. A poet unconsciously 'combined his information,' altering the characters of the tragedy, or accepting the wreck from erroneous tradition. This may have occurred in the sixteenth century, and the Danish marriage of James VI. may have recalled the vague legends and prompted the poet. Like Professor Child, we 'do not feel compelled to regard the ballad as historical.'

Sir Aldingar.

Our king he kept a false stewart,
 Sir Aldingar they him call;
 A falsar steward than he was one,
 Servde not in bower nor hall.

He wolde have layne by our comelye queene,
Her deere worshippe to betraye :
Our queene she was a good woman,
And evermore said him naye.

Sir Aldingar was wrothe in his mind,
With her hee was never content,
Till traiterous meanes he colde devyse,
In a fyer to have her brent.

There came a lazar to the kings gate,
A lazar both blinde and lame :
He tooke the lazar upon his backe,
Him on the queenes bed has layne.

'Lye still, lazår, wheras thou lyst,
Looke thou goe not hence away ;
Ile make thee a whole man and a sound
In two howers of the day.'

Then went him forth Sir Aldingar,
And hyed him to our king :
'If I might have grace, as I have space,
Sad tydings I could bring.'

'Say on, say on, Sir Aldingar,
Saye on the soothe to mee.'
'Our queene hath chosen a new new love,
And shee will have none of thee.

'If shee had chosen a right good knight,
The lesse had beene her shame ;
But she hath chose her a lazar man,
A lazar both blinde and lame.'

'If this be true, thou Aldingar,
The tyding thou tellest to me,
Then will I make thee a rich rich knight,
Rich both of golde and fee.

'But if it be false, Sir Aldingar,
As God now grant it bee !
Thy body, I sweare by the holye rood,
Shall hang on the gallows tree.'

He brought our king to the queenes chambèr,
And opend to him the dore.
'A lodlye love,' king Harry says, loathly
'For our queene dame Elinore !

'If thou were a man, as thou art none,
Here on my sword thoust dye ;
But a payre of new gallows shall be built,
And there shalt thou hang on hye.'

Forth then hyed our king, I wysse,
And an angry man was hee ;
And soone he found queene Elinore,
That bride so bright of blee. hue, complexion

'Now God you save, our queene, madame,
And Christ you save and see ;
Here you have chosen a newe newe love,
And you will have none of mee.

'If you had chosen a right good knight,
The lesse had been your shame :
But you have chose you a lazar man,
A lazar both blinde and lame.

'Therefore a fyer there shall be built,
And brent all shalt thou bee.'—
'Now out alacke !' said our comly queene,
'Sir Aldingar's false to mee.

'Now out alacke !' sayd our comlye queene, burst
'My heart with grieve will brast.
I had thought swevens had never been true ; dreams
I have proved them true at last.

'I dreamt in my sweven on thursday eve,
I my bed wheras I laye,
I dreamt a grype and a grimlie beast
Had carryed my crowne away ;

'My gorgett and my kirtle of golde,
And all my faire head-geere : tusk
And he wold worrye me with his tush
And to his nest y-beare :

'Saving there came a little gray hawke,
A merlin him they call,
Which untill the grounde did strike the grype,
That dead he downe did fall.

'Giffe I were a man, as now I am none,
A battell wold I prove,
To fight with that traitor Aldingar ;
Att him I cast my glove.

'But seeing Ime able noe battell to make,
My liege, grant me a knight
To fight with that traitor, Sir Aldingar,
To maintaine me in my right.'

'Now forty dayes I will give thee
To seeke thee a knight therin :
If thou find not a knight in forty dayes
Thy bodye it must brenn.'

Then shee sent east, and shee sent west,
By north and south bedeene : forthwith
But never a champion colde she find,
Wolde fight with that knight soe keene.

Now twenty dayes were spent and gone,
Noe helpe there might be had ;
Many a teare shed our comelye queene
And aye her hart was sad.

Then came one of the queenes damsèlles,
And knelt upon her knee,
'Cheare up, cheare up, my gracious dame,
I trust yet helpe may be.

'And here I will make mine avowe,
And with the same me binde ;
That never will I return to thee,
Till I some helpe may finde.'

Then forth she rode on a faire palfraye
Oer hill and dale about :
But never a champion colde she finde,
Wolde fighte with that knight so stout.

And nowe the daye drewe on apace,
When our good queene must dye ;
All woe-begone was that faire damsèlle,
When she found no helpe was nye.

All woe-begone was that faire damselle,
And the salt teares fell from her eye :
When lo ! as she rode by a rivers side,
She met with a tinye boye.

A tinye boy she mette, God wot,
All clad in mantle of golde ;
He seemed noe more in mans likenesse,
Then a childe of four yeere olde.

'Why grieve you, damselle faire,' he sayd,
'And what doth cause you moane ?'
The damsell scant wolde deigne a looke,
But fast she pricked on.

'Yet turne againe, thou faire damselle,
And greete thy queene from mee ;
When bale is att hiest, boote is nyest,
Nowe helpe enoughe may bee.

'Bid her remember what she dreamt
In her bedd wheras shee laye ;
How when the grype and the grimly beast
Wolde have carried her crowne awaye.

'Even then there came the little gray hawke,
And saved her from his claws :
Then bidd the queene be merry at hart,
For heaven will fende her cause.'

Back then rode that faire damselle,
And her hart it lef for glee :
And when she told her gracious dame
A gladd woman then was shee.

But when the appointed day was come,
No helpe appeared nye :
Then woeful, woeful was her hart,
And the teares stood in her eye.

And nowe a fyer was built of wood ;
And a stake was made of tree ;
And now queene Elinor forth was led,
A sorrowful sight to see.

Three times the herault he waved his hand,
And three times spake on hye :
'Giff any good knight will fende this dame,
Come forth, or shee must dye.'

No knight stood forth, no knight there came,
No helpe appeared nye :
And now the fyer was lighted up,
Queen Elinor she must dye.

And now the fyer was lighted up,
As hot as hot might bee ;
When riding upon a little white steed,
The tinye boy they see.

'Away with that stake, away with those brands,
And loose our comelye queene :
I am come to fight with Sir Aldingar,
And prove him a traitor keene.'

Forth then stood Sir Aldingar,
But when he saw the chylde ;
He laughed, and scoffed, and turned his backe,
And weened he had been beguyld.

'Now turne, now turne thee, Aldingar,
And eyther fighte or flee ;
I trust that I shall avenge the wronge,
Thoughe I am so small to see.'

The boye pulld forth a well good sworde,
So gilt it dazzled the ee ;
The first stroke stricken at Aldingar
Smote off his leggs by the knee.

'Stand up, stand up, thou false traitor,
And fight upon thy feete,
For and thou thrive, as thou begin'st,
Of height wee shall be meete.'

'A priest, a priest,' sayes Aldingar,
'While I am a man alive.
A priest, a priest,' sayes Aldingar,
'Me for to houzle and shrive. Give me the Sacrament and absolution

'I wolde have laine by our comlie queene,
But shee wolde never consent ;
Then I thought to betraye her unto our kinge,
In a fyer to have her brent.

'There came a lazar to the kings gates,
A lazar both blind and lame :
I tooke the lazar upon my backe,
And on her bedd had him layne.

'Then ranne I to our comlye king,
These tidings sore to tell.
But ever alacke !' sayes Aldingar,
'Falsing never doth well.

'Forgive, forgive me, queene, madame,
The short time I must live.'
'Nowe Christ forgive thee, Aldingar,
As freely I forgive.'

'Here take thy queene, our king Harrye,
And love her as thy life,
For never had a king in Christentye
A truer and fairer wife.'

King Henrye ran to claspe his queene,
And loosed her full sone :
Then turnd to look for the tinye boye ;
—The boye was vanisht and gone.

But first he had touchd the lazar man,
And stroakt him with his hand :
The lazar under the gallows tree
All whole and sounde did stand

The lazar under the gallows tree
Was comelye, straight and tall ;
King Henrye made him his head stewarde
To wayte withinn his hall.

Clerk Saunders.

Clerk Saunders and May Margaret
Walked ower yon garden green ;
And sad and heavy was the love
That fell thir twa betwene.

'A bed, a bed,' Clerk Saunders said,
'A bed for you and me !'—
'Fye na, fye na,' said May Margaret,
'Till anes we married be ;

'For in may come my seven bauld brothers,
Wi' torches burning bright ;
They'll say—" We hae but ae sister,
And behold she's wi' a knight !"—

'Then take the sword from my scabbard,
And slowly lift the pin ;
And you may swear, and safe your aith,
Ye never let Clerk Saunders in.

'And take a napkin in your hand,
And tie up baith your bonny een ;
And you may swear, and safe your aith,
Ye saw me na since late yestreen.'

It was about the midnight hour,
When they asleep were laid,
When in and came her seven brothers,
Wi' torches burning red.

When in and came her seven brothers,
Wi' torches burning bright ;
They said, ' We hae but ae sister,
And behold her lying with a knight !'

Then out and spake the first o' them,
'I bear the sword shall gar him dee !'
And out and spake the second o' them,
'His father has nae mair than he !'

And out and spake the third o' them,
'I wot that they are lovers dear !'—
And out and spake the fourth o' them,
'They hae been in love this mony a year.'

Then out and spake the fifth o' them,
'It were great sin true love to twain !'—
And out and spake the sixth of them,
'It were shame to slay a sleeping man !'

Then up and gat the seventh o' them,
And never a word spake he ;
But he has striped his bright brown brand ' stricken
Out through Clerk Saunders' fair bodye.

Clerk Saunders he started, and Margaret she turn'd
Into his arms as asleep she lay ;
And sad and silent was the night
That was atween thir twae.

And they lay still and slept sound,
Until the day began to daw ;
And kindly to him she did say,
'It is time, true love, you were awa.'

But he lay still, and slept sound,
Albeit the sun began to sheen ;
She looked atween her and the wa',
And dull and drowsie were his een.

Then in and came her father dear,
Said—" Let a' your mourning be ;
I'll carry the dead corpse to the clay,
And I'll come back and comfort thee."—

'Comfort weel your seven sons,
For comforted will I never be ;
I ween 'twas neither knave nor loon
Was in the bower last night wi' me.'

The clinking bell gaed through the town,
To carry the dead corse to the clay ;
And Clerk Saunders stood at May Margaret's window,
I wot, an hour before the day.

'Are ye sleeping, Margaret?' he says,
'Or are ye waking presentlie ?
Give me my faith and troth again,
I wot, true love, I gied to thee.'

'Your faith and troth you sall never get,
Nor our true love sall never twin,
Until ye come within my bower,
And kiss me cheik and chin.'—

'My mouth it is full cold, Margaret,
It has the smell, now, of the ground ;
And if I kiss thy comely mouth,
Thy days of life will not be lang.

'O, cocks are crowing a merry midnight,
I wot the wild fowls are boding day ;
Give me my faith and troth again,
And let me fare me on my way.'—

'Thy faith and troth thou sall na get,
And our true love sall never twin,
Until ye tell what comes of women,
I wot, who die in strong traivelling?

'Their beds are made in the heavens high,
Down at the foot of our good Lord's knee,
Weel set about wi' gillyflowers !
I wot sweet company for to see.

'O, cocks are crowing a merry midnight,
I wot the wild fowl are boding day ;
The psalms of heaven will soon be sung,
And I, ere now, will be miss'd away.'

Then she has ta'en a crystal wand,
And she has stroken her troth thereon ;
She has given it him out at the shot-window,
Wi' mony a sad sigh and heavy groan.

'I thank ye, Marg'ret ; I thank ye, Marg'ret ;
And aye I thank ye heartilie ;
Gin ever the dead come or the quick,
Be sure, Marg'ret, I'll come for thee.'—

It's hosen and shoon, and gown alone,
She climb'd the wall, and follow'd him,
Until she came to the green forest,
And there she lost the sight o' him.

'Is there ony room at your head, Saunders ?
Is there ony room at your feet ?
Or ony room at your side, Saunders,
Where fain, fain, I wad sleep ?'—

'There's nae room at my head, Marg'ret,
There's nae room at my feet ;
My bed it is full lowly now ;
Amang the hungry worms I sleep.

'Cauld mould is my covering now,
But and my winding-sheet ;
The dew it falls nae sooner down,
Than my resting-place is weat.

'But plait a wand o' bonny birk,
And lay it on my breast :
And shed a tear upon my grave,
And wish my saul gude rest.

'And fair Marg'ret, and rare Marg'ret,
And Marg'ret o' veritie,
Gin e'er ye love another man,
Ne'er love him as ye did me.'—

Then up and crew the milk-white cock,
And up and crew the gray ;
Her lover vanish'd in the air,
And she gaed weeping away.

This ballad is cited from Scott, whose version is a patchwork, but classical. The sequel is from 'Sweet William's Ghost,' but this ballad may once have had a similar sequel. The return of the dead lover (or brother) has Scandinavian, Romaic, and English analogies. Compare also 'The Clerks Twa Sons o' Owsenford' and 'The Wife o' Usher's Well.'

The Wife o' Usher's Well.

There lived a wife at Usher's Well,
And a wealthy wife was she,
She had three stout and stalwart sons,
And sent them o'er the sea.

They hadna been a week from her,
A week but barely ane,
When word came back to the carline wife aged
That her three sons were gane.

They hadna been a week from her,
A week but barely three,
When word came to the carline wife
That her sons she'd never see.

'I wish the wind may never cease,
Nor fishes in the flood,
Till my three sons come hame to me,
In earthly flesh and blood !'—

It fell about the Martinmas,
When nig' ts are lang and mirk,
The carline wife's three sons cam hame,
And their hats were o' the birk.

It neither grew in syke nor ditch, drain
Nor yet in ony sheugh ; water-furrow
But at the gates o' Paradise,
That birk grew fair eneuch.

'Blow up the fire, my maidens !
Bring water from the well !
For a' my house shall feast this night,
Since my three sons are well.'—

And she has made to them a bed,
She's made it large and wide ;
And she's ta'en her mantle her about,
Sat down at the bedside.

Up then crew the red red cock,
And up and crew the gray ;
The eldest to the youngest said,
'Tis time we were away.'—

The cock he hadna craw'd but ance,
And clapp'd his wings at a',
When the youngest to the eldest said,
'Brother, we must awa.—

'The cock doth crawl, the day doth daw,
The channerin' worm doth chide ; complaining
Gin we be mist out o' our place,
A sair pain we maun bide.

'Fare ye weel, my mother dear !
Fareweel to barn and byre !
And fare ye weel, the bonny lass,
That kindles my mother's fire.'

This poem of the return of the dead, disturbed by the grief of the living, was obtained, Scott says, from the recitation of an old woman at Kirkhill in West Lothian.

The Battle of Otterburn.

It fell about the Lammas tide,
When the muir-men win their hay,
The doughty Douglas bound him to ride
Into England, to drive a prey.

He chose the Gordons and the Græmes,
With them the Lindsays, light and gay,
But the Jardines wald not with him ride,
And they rue it to this day.

And he has burn'd the dales of Tyne,
And part of Bambrough shire ;
And three good towers on Reidswire fells,
He left them all on fire.

And he march'd up to Newcastle,
And rode it round about ;
'O wha's the lord of this castle,
Or wha's the lady o't ?'

But up spake proud lord Percy then,
And O but he spake hie !
'I am the lord of this castle,
My wife's the lady gay.'—

'If thou'rt the lord of this castle,
Sae weel it pleases me !
For, ere I cross the Border fells,
The tane of us shall dee.'—

He took a lang spear in his hand,
Shod with the metal free;
And for to meet the Douglas there,
He rode right furiouslie.

But O how pale his lady look'd,
Frae aff the castle wa',
When down before the Scottish spear
She saw proud Percy fa'.

'Had we twa been upon the green,
And never an eye to see,
I wad hae had you, flesh and fell ;
But your sword sall gae wi' me.'—

'But gae ye up to Otterbourne,
And wait there dayis three ;
And, if I come not ere three dayis end,
A fause knight ca' ye me.'—

'The Otterbourne's a bonnie burn ;
'Tis pleasant there to be ;
But there is nought at Otterbourne
To feed my men and me.

'The deer rins wild on hill and dale,
The birds fly wild from tree to tree ;
But there is neither bread nor kale,
To fend my men and me.

serve for

'Yet I will stay at Otterbourne,
Where you shall welcome be ;
And, if you come not at three dayis end,
A fause lord I'll ca' thee.'—

'Thither will I come,' proud Percy said,
'By the might of Our Ladye !'
'There will I bide thee,' said the Douglas,
My troth I plight to thee.'—

They lighted high on Otterbourne,
Upon the bent sae brown ;
They lighted high on Otterbourne,
And threw their pallions down.

And he that had a bonnie boy,
Sent out his horse to grass ;
And he that had not a bonnie boy,
His ain servant he was.

But up then spake a little page,
Before the peep of dawn—
'O waken ye, waken ye, my good lord,
For Percy's hard at hand.'—

'Ye lie, ye lie, ye liar loud !
Sae loud I hear ye lie :
For Percy had not men yestreen
To dight my men and me.

deal with

'But I have dreamed a dreary dream,
Beyond the Isle of Skye ;
I saw a dead man win a fight,
And I think that man was I.'

He belted on his guid braid sword,
And to the field he ran ;
But he forgot the helmet good,
That should have kept his brain.

When Percy with the Douglas met,
I wat he was fu' fain !
They swakked their swords, till sair they swat, ^{swagged,}
And the blood ran down like rain. ^{swung}

But Percy, with his good broad sword,
That could so sharply wound,
Has wounded Douglas on the brow,
'Till he fell to the ground.

Then he called on his little foot-page,
And said—'Run speedilie,
And fetch my ain dear sister's son,
Sir Hugh Montgomery.'

'My nephew good,' the Douglas said,
'What recks the death of ane !
Last night I dream'd a dreary dream,
And I ken the day's thy ain.

'My wound is deep ; I fain would sleep ;
Take thou the vanguard of the three,
And hide me by the braken bush,
That grows on yonder lilye lee.

'O bury me by the braken bush,
Beneath the blooming brier,
Let never living mortal ken
That ere a kindly Scot lies here.

He lifted up that noble lord,
Wi' the saut tears in his ee ;
He hid him in the braken bush,
That his merrie-men might not see.

The moon was clear, the day drew near,
The spears in flinders flew,
But mony a gallant Englishman
Ere day the Scotsmen slew.

The Gordons good, in English blood
They steep'd their hose and shoon ;
The Lindsays flew like fire about,
Till all the fray was done.

The Percy and Montgomery met,
That either of other were fain ;
They swapped swords, and they twa swat, ^{smote}
And aye the blood ran down between.

'Now yield thee, yield thee, Percy,' he said,
'Or else I vow I'll lay thee low !'
'To whom must I yield,' quoth Earl Percy
'Now that I see it must be so ?'—

'Thou shalt not yield to lord or loun,
Nor yet shalt thou yield to me ;
But yield ye to the braken bush,
That grows upon yon lilye lee !'—

'I will not yield to a braken bush,
Nor yet will I yield to a brier ;
But I would yield to Earl Douglas,
Or Sir Hugh the Montgomery, if he were here.

As soon as he knew it was Montgomery,
He struck his sword's point in the gronde ;
The Montgomery was a courteous knight,
And quickly took him by the honde.

This deed was done at Otterbourne
About the breaking of the day ;
Earl Douglas was buried at the braken bush,
And the Percy led captive away.

Scott's version, though confessedly a blend of two variants, is followed as the most classical. The battle occurred on August 19, 1388, and Froissart's account is easily accessible. A ballad on the theme is remarked on in The Complaynt of Scotlande (1549). This probably had affinities with our ballad. It seems probable that a far-resounding event may often have been circulated, and of course altered, in oral tradition, before it found its ballad poet ; but, as daily experience shows, oral tradition alters events of newspaper record with amazing rapidity. A notable example is Sir Alfred Austin's poem on Jameson's Raid—eminently unhistorical though contemporary.

And when we left the Staneshaw-bank,
The wind began full loud to blow ;
But 'twas wind and weet, and fire and sleet,
When we came beneath the castle wa'.

We crept on knees, and held our breath,
Till we placed the ladders against the wa';
And sae ready was Buccleuch himsell
To mount the first, before us a'.

He has ta'en the watchman by the throat,
He flung him down upon the lead—
'Had there not been peace between our land,
Upon the other side thou hadst gaed!—

'Now sound out, trumpets!' quo' Buccleuch;
'Let's waken Lord Scroope, right merrilie!'
Then loud the warden's trumpet blew—
'O wha dare meddle wi' me?'

Then speedilie to work we gaed,
And raised the slogan ane and a',
And cut a hole thro' a sheet of lead,
And so we wan to the castle ha'.

They thought King James and a' his men
Had won the house wi' bow and spear;
It was but twenty Scots and ten
That put a thousand in sic a stear! stir, panic

Wi' coulters, and wi' fore-hammers,
We garr'd the bars bang merrilie,
Untill we cam to the inner prison,
Where Willie o' Kinmont he did lie.

And when we cam to the lower prison,
Where Willie o' Kinmont he did lie—
'O sleep ye, wake ye, Kinmont Willie,
Upon the morn that thou's to die?'

'O I sleep saft, and I wake aft;
It's lang since sleeping was fleyed frae me! frightened away
Gie my service back to my wife and bairns,
And a' gude fellows that spier for me.' ask

Then Red Rowan has hente him up,
The starkest man in Teviotdale—
'Abide, abide now, Red Rowan,
Till of my Lord Scroope I take farewell.

'Farewell, farewell, my gude Lord Scroope!
My gude Lord Scroope, farewell!' he cried—
'I'll pay you for my lodging maill rent
When first we meet on the Border side.'—

Then shoulder high, with shout and cry,
We bore him down the ladder lang;
At every stride Red Rowan made,
I wot the Kinmont's airns play'd clang!

'O mony a time,' quo' Kinmont Willie,
'I have ridden horse baith wild and wood; mad
But a rougher beast than Red Rowan,
I ween my legs have ne'er bestrode.

'And mony a time,' quo' Kinmont Willie, over the furrows
'I've pricked a horse out ower the furs;
But since the day I backed a steed,
I never wore sic cumbrous spurs!'

We scarce had won the Staneshaw-bank,
When a' the Carlisle bells were rung,
And a thousand men, in horse and foot,
Cam wi' the keen Lord Scroope along.

Buccleuch has turn'd to Eden water,
Even where it flow'd frae bank to brim,
And he has plunged in wi' a' his band,
And safely swam them through the stream.

He turn'd him on the other side,
And at Lord Scroope his glove flung he—
'If ye like na my visit in merry England,
In fair Scotland come visit me!'

All sore astonish'd stood Lord Scroope,
He stood as still as rock of stane;
He scarcely dared to trew his eyes,
When through the water they had gane.

'He is either himsell a devill frae hell,
Or else his mother a witch maun be;
I wad na have ridden that wan water
For a' the gowd in Christentie.'

The date of the event is April 13, 1596 (Tytler's History of Scotland, ix. 430; Lord Scroope's Dispatch). Scott of Satchells (History of the Name of Scott, 1688) either borrowed from the ballad, or, if any one distrusts Sir Walter Scott, then he borrowed from Satchells! Sir Walter confessedly combined and emended versions, and the present writer, like Professor Child, recognises his hand in stanzas 10, 11, 12; perhaps we may add 17, 31, 39, if not 46.

THE CIVIL WAR AND THE COMMONWEALTH.

The Puritan Movement.

FROM Shakespeare to Milton—from Elizabeth to Cromwell—the parallelism of the two changes at once suggests the influence exercised upon literature by the external forces which control the religious and political life of the time. Whatever be the causes which lead to the production of great literature or great art at a given place or time, it may safely be averred that it demands the concurrence of a virile energy, strung to its highest pitch, with the moderating influence of ideas which impose limitations on the worker or the thinker, and preserve the sanity of those who act upon their contemporaries in the world of external achievement as well as in the world of mental conception. It was this combination which, on the one hand, sent forth the members of a single Athenian tribe to fight in one year in Cyprus, in Egypt, in Phœnicia, and on the soil of Greece itself, at a time when the most thorough political revolution had been carried out by constitutional methods unstained by the horrors of civil war; and, on the other hand, manifested itself alike in the counsels of Pericles, the graving-tool of Phidias, and the written word of Sophocles.

The Elizabethan age in England showed an energy as intense as that of Athens, displaying itself in a far wider field. With an outlook upon a new world still to be won to the use of civilised mankind, a religion—or rather, more than one religion—claiming not to be national but universal, the nobler Elizabethan found the boundary lines of thought and of moral rectitude pushed forward beyond the limits which had satisfied his ancestors. It is hardly strange that these 'spacious times' gave birth to the greatest of dramatists, who worked, 'not only for an age, but for all time,' and who, whilst he gave with unerring touch vitality to all his characters, limited their action by nothing less than the forces of nature herself, whether acting by external compulsion or by the influence of individual character.

Shakespeare's largeness of view was shared by the greatest of his contemporaries. It was on nature and her material laws that Bacon strove to found the new science. It was on nature and her moral laws that Hooker strove to found ecclesiastical peace. One voice, however, in the Elizabethan choir sounded a note apart. Shakespeare, Bacon, and Hooker alike deal with men and things as they are. Spenser aimed at depicting men as they ought to be, and it was the Spenserian tradition which was taken up by Milton in his earlier poems. With Milton, from the beginning, it is not the real individual man, acting in harmony with his own nature and controlled by the forces of the external world, but the individual man idealised looking forth on a world also idealised. So it is with the verses on the deaths of Bishops Andrewes and Felton (1626), with L'Allegro and Il Penseroso (1632?), and with Comus (1634). The last-named poem is especially characteristic of Milton's frame of mind at this period of his life. In it not merely is virtue exalted and vice scorned, but the inward purity of mind is represented, as by Plato and Spenser, as holding sway over the outward appearance:

So dear to Heaven is saintly chastity
That, when a soul is found sincerely so,
A thousand liveried angels lackey her,
Driving far off each thing of sin and guilt,
And in clear dream and solemn vision
Tell her of things that no gross ear can hear;
Till oft converse with heavenly habitants
Begin to cast a beam on the outward shape,
The unpolluted temple of the mind,
And turns it by degrees to the soul's essence
Till all be made immortal.

The change in the poet's point of view from Perdita and Miranda to the lady of the Comus is obvious; and it is no less obvious that it is no mere deflection in the stream of literary taste with which we have to reckon. Milton was other than Shakespeare, primarily, of course, because the two men were born different, but also because the times in which they lived were different. The world was no longer in the Miltonic age a mystery and a wonder. The Western Continent was no longer the home of men whose heads grow beneath their shoulders, but the abode of very prosaic English colonists in Virginia and New England. England no longer confronted the world in arms, but was called on to work out her own domestic problems at home. The world had grown smaller, and the boundary of political action had been drawn closer. Puritanism, which had furnished to the Elizabethan one of the phenomena of which he had to take account, threatened in the reign of Charles to absorb all others. It is unnecessary to argue that Puritanism, conceived as an ecclesiastical system, with its unbending theology and its strict discipline, was hostile to literary effort. No great work was ever inspired by the tone of thought which expressed itself in the Admonition to Parliament or in the Westminster Confession. Even the moral restrictions of Puritanism were too sternly pressed to be congenial to the artistic nature. 'Touch not, taste not, handle not,' seems best answered by the flippant comment, 'Dost thou think because thou art virtuous there shall be no more cakes and ale?' Yet the essence of Puritanism did not lie in its prohibitions but in its aspirations, in its desire to avoid the excess and riot of the world around. It was this, for instance, that imposed on men like Baxter the name of Puritan. Baxter, as he himself tells us, 'never scrupled common prayers or ceremonies, nor spoke against Bishops, nor ever so much as prayed but by a book or form, being not even acquainted then with any that did otherwise; but only for reading Scripture when the rest were dancing on the Lord's Day, and for praying—by a form out of the end of the Common Prayer Book—in his house, and for reproving drunkards and swearers, and for talking sometimes a few words of Scripture and the life to come, he was reviled commonly by the name of Puritan, precisian, and hypocrite.'

The aims of such men were of necessity individualistic. They sought to strengthen and purify the soul rather than to increase the power of their country or to spread its influence abroad. For such the imposition of the stern Puritan discipline upon the conscience was almost a necessity lest, becoming merely self-centred, they should loosen the bonds which imposed some check on the divergencies of thought and action and hindered the dissolution of the nation into a thousand hostile sects. Yet, checked as it might be, the sense of individuality was there, and bore with increasing force upon the art as well as upon the mind of Milton.

Such a system of thought could not fail to be as repulsive to one order of minds as it was attractive to another. Hostility, not to the moral tendencies but to the intellectual fetters of Puritanism, developed itself amongst scholars at the universities, where the students of Patristic literature were familiarised with thoughts very different from those which inspired Calvinistic theology. The attack on that theology led to a somewhat uncertain progress in the direction of intellectual freedom, whilst those who carried it on sought, in their reverence for external forms of worship, for that fixed order which was accepted by their opponents as residing in the sphere of intellectual belief. The English world was entering on a period of unrest and controversy, and for the first time religious controversy, which had found its way into Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar, left its mark on a truly great poem in Lycidas (1637). The lines in which the Laudian system is attacked can hardly be regarded as enhancing the merits of that splendid verse, yet it must be acknowledged that in introducing them Milton had too fine an artistic sense to take notice of the more prominent subjects under discussion at the time, and contented himself with dwelling on the neglect of duty which he ascribed to a hireling clergy. The highest poetry refused to touch satirically on such topics as the position of the communion-table or the wearing of the surplice.

Yet, on the other side, reverence rendered it possible to touch on them, if only by a tour de force. The tendency to subordinate thought to words had shown itself in the quaintness of Donne and Andrewes, and it was but a step further in George Herbert when he subordinated thought to symbolism:

Mark you the floor? That square and speckled stone

Which looks so firm and strong

Is Patience:

And th' other black and grave, wherewith each one

Is checkered all along,

Humility.

The gentle rising, which on either hand

Leads to the Quire above,

Is Confidence:

But the sweet cement, which in one sure band

Ties the whole frame, is Love

And Charity.

Such lines appeal to a restricted audience. Later generations find more sympathy with the tolerant spirit of such men as Chillingworth or John Hales, but their writings are too far involved in the special controversies of the day to give them a hold on the universal intelligence of mankind. Sir Thomas Browne, on the other hand, rises into a higher atmosphere, and aims at reconciling faith and thought in words which find an echo in later times.

Deleterious as was the effect of controversy on the literature of the time, the individualistic tendency of the day was favourable to the production of work that has lived. The poetry of the second and third quarters of the seventeenth century is remarkable for its panegyrics on individual personages, of which Lycidas furnishes an early and perhaps the best example. The handling of the subject by Milton is as unlike what Shakespeare's would have been as it is possible to be. The personality of Edward King, the hero of the piece, is more than idealised, as it is not in any way brought before our eyes; and the beauty of his character is left to be inferred from its effect upon the mind of the poet, as the beauty of Helen was left to be inferred from the passion it excited. As with Lycidas, so with the sonnets, the controversial and the panegyric are found in close connection with one another; but fortunately Milton for the most part reserved his most transient contentions for his prose and the more permanent for his poetry. The arguments about the abominations of Episcopacy or the demerits of King Charles—still more, the scurrilous assaults on his literary opponents—fall dead on the ear, whilst the proclamation of the principles of freedom which lighten up the sonnets On the new Forcers of Conscience, To the Lord General Cromwell, or To Sir Henry Vane, is of universal application, and is as fresh now as on the day when they were written. Not, indeed, that Milton kept his higher thoughts always in abeyance when he addressed himself to political or ecclesiastical argument, as is witnessed by many passages which might be selected out of works otherwise scurrilous and forbidding, and especially by the noble Areopagitica, in which reason appears instinct with imagination.

The tendency to idealise individuals was not of any sect or party. It is to be found as strongly on the Royalist as on the Parliamentary side—with this difference, that whereas Royalists preferred to make woman the theme of their verse, more especially by reason of her physical charms, the Parliamentarians preferred to dwell on the heroism and virtue of men. We have to set Carew's:

He that loves a rosy cheek
Or a coral lip admires,
Or from star-like eyes doth seek
Fuel to maintain his fires;
As old Time makes these decay,
So his flames must waste away.

But a smooth and steadfast mind,
Gentle thoughts, and calm desires,
Hearts with equal love combined,
Kindle never-dying fires:—
Where these are not, I despise
Lovely cheeks or lips or eyes;

or even Herrick's worship of the 'tempestuous petticoat,' against Milton's:

Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud
Not of war only, but detractions rude,
Guided by faith and matchless fortitude,
To peace and truth thy glorious way hast
ploughed,
And on the neck of crowned Fortune proud
Hast reared God's trophies, and this work pursued,
While Darwen stream, with blood of Scots im-
bued,
And Dunbar field resounds thy praises loud,
And Worcester's laureate wreath: yet much remains
To conquer still; Peace hath her victories
No less renowned than War: new foes arise,
Threatening to bind our souls with secular chains.
Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves whose gospel is their maw.

The echo in the concluding lines, written in 1652, of the scathing attack in the Lycidas, fifteen years before, on those who

For their bellies' sake,
Creep and intrude, and climb into the fold,

shows us Milton unchanging and unchangeable in his belief that it was possible to free the nobler work of men from earthly complications. So too, in 1654, a few months after the establishment of the Protectorate, he strove in his Second Defence of the English People to invest the coming Parliament in the ideal robes which he found suitable to the Protector. The character of his appeal to the voters on the eve of a general election is surely unparalleled before or since:

'Unless by true and sincere piety towards God and man,' he tells them, 'not vain and wordy, but efficacious and active, you drive from your souls all superstitions sprung from ignorance of true and solid religion, you will always have those who will make you their beasts of burden and sit upon your backs and necks ; they will put you up for sale as their easily gotten booty, all your victories in war notwithstanding, and make a rich income out of your ignorance and superstition. Unless you expel avarice, ambition, luxury from your minds, aye, and luxurious living also from your families, then the tyrant you thought you had to seek externally in the battlefield you will find in your own home—you will find within yourselves a still harder taskmaster, nay there will sprout daily out of your own vitals a numerous brood of intolerable tyrants. . . . Were you fallen into such an abyss of easy self-corruption, no one—not even Cromwell himself, nor a whole host of Brutuses, if they could come to life again, could deliver you if they would, or would deliver you if they could. For why should any one then assert for you the right of free suffrage, or the power of electing whom you will at the Parliament? Is it that you should be able, each of you, to elect in the cities men of your faction, or that person in the boroughs, however unworthy, who may have feasted yourselves most sumptuously or treated the country-people and the boors to the greatest quantity of drink? Then we should have our members of Parliament made for us, not by prudence and authority, but by faction and feeding ; we should have vintners and hucksters for city taverns, and graziers and cattle men for the country districts. Should one entrust the Commonwealth to those to whom nobody would entrust a matter of private business? Know that as to be free is the same thing exactly as to be pious, wise, just, temperate, self-providing, abstinent from the property of other people, and, in fine, magnanimous and brave, so to be the opposite of all that is the same thing as being a slave ; and by the customary judgment of God, and a thoroughly just law of retribution, it comes to pass that a nation that cannot rule and govern itself, but has surrendered itself in slavery to its own lusts, is surrendered also to other masters whom it does not like, and made a slave not only with its will, but also against its will.'

One reads no such election addresses now. For all that, Milton's burning words—a paraphrase of the saying in Comus, 'Love virtue, she alone is free'—are not for an age but for all time. The outward vestments of Puritanism were dropping away. The strict theologies of Calvinism were growing less in repute, and those who most firmly advanced the Puritan standard were growing weary of the doctrine of Parliamentary sovereignty under which its tender years had sheltered themselves. The assurance that constitutions, and, above all, success military and civil, are of small avail to a nation corrupt in heart and self-seeking in its aims is never out of place.

It is this which gives to Milton's political verse and to the better part of his prose a dignity and value which is shared by none of his contemporaries. In 1655, the year after this appeal was penned, Waller wrote of the external glories of the Protector :

The sea's our own ; and now all nations greet,
With bending sails, each vessel of our fleet ;
Your power resounds as far as winds can blow,
Or swelling sails upon the globe may go ;

or, better still, of Oliver's desire to succour others than those under his own government :

Whether this portion of the world were rent
By the rude ocean from the continent,
Or thus created, it was sure designed
To be the sacred refuge of mankind.

Hither the oppressed shall henceforth resort,
Justice to crave and succour at your court,
And then your Highness, not for ours alone,
But for the world's protector shall be known.

So too in Marvell's three panegyrics : the first, An Horatian ode upon Cromwell's return from Ireland, written in 1650, combines a strong appreciation of Cromwell's intellectual qualities, whilst retaining the belief that he had tricked Charles to his confusion ; the second, The first Anniversary of the Government under his Highness the Lord Protector, written probably in the opening weeks of 1655, is an encomium upon Cromwell's character as well as a defence of his political system ; whilst the third, A poem upon the death of his late Highness the Lord Protector, written after Cromwell's death in 1658, treads in Waller's steps, giving honour to the man

Who planted England on the Flandrick shore,
And stretched our frontier to the Indian ore.

It is possible that disappointment at the course taken by popular feeling drove Milton back into more ideal work. Paradise Lost, taken up seriously about the time of the great Protector's death, resumes the burden of Comus. Its central thought is the temptation of a single human soul—a masculine soul drawn down to its fate by woman's weakness. In Samson Agonistes and Paradise Regained we find the theme of temptation successfully resisted, which is, after all, no other than the theme of the triumphant virtue of the lady of the Comus. In the former poem the wiles of an evil-minded woman are defied. In the latter such influences, by the nature of the case, do not enter into consideration. In Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress we have once more attention called to the struggle of the individual against evil and his escape therefrom ; the man painfully emerging—the woman lingering behind and only freeing herself under the conduct of Greatheart, whose character is said—and probably with truth—to have been moulded on that of Cromwell. The surroundings of the personages concerned are those of the Calvinistic theology; but the book lives, in spite of this, by the life-like presentation of the allegorical personages which enter upon the stage.

The Puritan manifestation in literature, like the Puritan manifestation in the State and nation, had run its triumphant course, though in literature as well as in the nation it was to continue to exercise, when mingled with other elements, a powerful influence. Its decline may be traced to many causes, but above all to the growth of a conviction that it exalted the few at the expense of the many. The highest aim of the Protectorate was the defence of the so-called 'people of God.' The highest aim of Puritan literature was the exaltation of the strong at the expense of the weak—of the pre-eminently good at the expense of the more moderately virtuous. It was not Milton's personal misogyny resulting in the substitution of Eve or Dalila for Juliet and Rosalind; it was the habit of looking for more than was to be achieved by human nature, till the search for ideal beauty and goodness led to contemptuous blindness to the beauty and goodness inherent in our mingled nature. Human nature took its revenge both in politics and literature. The age of Cromwell and Milton passed away, to be succeeded by the rule of Charles II. and the dramatists of the Restoration.

SAMUEL R. GARDINER.

John Selden.

John Selden (1584–1654) was one of the most illustrious scholars of his time, a learned jurist, a powerful publicist, and a conspicuous political personage. He was born 16th December 1584, of a respectable family, at Salvington, near Worthing, in Sussex. After being educated at Chichester and Oxford, he studied law in London, at Clifford's Inn and the Inner Temple. Here his learning secured for him the friendship of Camden, Spelman, Sir Robert Cotton, Ben Jonson, Browne, and also of Drayton, to whose Polyolbion he furnished notes. By Milton he is spoken of as 'the chief of learned men reputed in this land.' As a conveyancer and chamber-counsel he acquired wealth, yet found time for studies at once profound and wide in range. He wrote his first treatise, Analecton Anglo-Britannicon (pub. 1615), on the civil government of Britain before the Norman Conquest, when only twenty-two years of age. In 1610 appeared his Jani Anglorum Facies Altera (Eng. trans. 1683), on the history of the laws of England to the death of Henry II., and also The Duello or Single Combat, a history of trial by battle. His largest English work, A Treatise on Titles of Honour, was published in 1614, and still continues an authority. In 1617 his fame was extended, both at home and abroad, by his Latin work on the gods of the Syrians and the heathen deities mentioned in the Old Testament. In his History of Tythes (1618), by demolishing the divine right of the Church to that tax he gave great offence to the clergy. He was summoned to the king's presence, reprimanded, and (no doubt) confuted. He was, moreover, called before several members of the formidable High Commission Court, who extracted from him a written declaration of regret for what he had done, but without any retraction of his opinion. Several replies appeared, but to these he was not allowed to publish a rejoinder, and the Privy Council suppressed the work itself. In 1621 he suffered a brief imprisonment for advising the Parliament to repudiate King James's doctrine that their privileges were originally royal grants. In 1623 he was elected member for Lancaster; in 1626 for Great Bedwin, and in 1628 for Ludgershall, both in Wilts, and henceforward till his death he took a considerable part in public affairs.

He was sincerely attached to the cause of the Parliament, and as sincerely opposed to the views of the court party and the king; but he was above all things a constitutional lawyer, and derived his ideas of the rights of the subject from the history of the nation, and not from religious fanaticism or metaphysical considerations. Still, he 'loved his ease,' as Clarendon says, and so let things be done without protest of which he did not approve. Yet he often stood up to defend the liberty of the subject. In 1628 he was active in the proceedings of the Commons that issued in the Petition of Right, and the year after he was committed to the Tower with Eliot, Holles, and the rest. After eight months' rigorous imprisonment he was transferred to the Marshalsea, but soon after was released. In 1640 he was chosen member of the Long Parliament for the University of Oxford; and now, when the struggle between the king and the nation began to point towards the fatal rupture, he was suspected of not being zealous enough by such as were themselves perhaps over-zealous. Already in 1636 he had dedicated to the king his Mare Clausum (an answer to the Mare Liberum of Grotius and the Dutch claims to fish off the British coasts), and there is evidence that Charles personally looked on him with favour. Selden was one of the committee of twenty-four appointed to draw up a remonstrance, and at this point his path first diverged from that of Hyde, yet without their friendship being impaired. He vigorously opposed the policy that led to the expulsion of the bishops from the House of Lords, and finally to the abolition of Episcopacy. Yet he adhered in the main to the cause of the Parliament, driven by the arbitrariness of the king's later measures. He took no part in the impeachment of Strafford, and voted against the Attainder Bill; and, though he furnished precedents for the measures taken against Laud, had no share in his prosecution.

He was as hostile to the 'jure-divinoship' of Presbytery as to the high claims of Episcopacy, and was reputed an Erastian. He sat as a lay-member in the Assembly of Divines at Westminster (1643), and perplexed his clerical colleagues sadly with his irony and his learning. Whitelocke records that in the debates he 'spake admirably, and confuted divers of them in their own learning; and sometimes when they had cited a text of Scripture to prove their assertion he would tell them: "Perhaps in your little pocket Bibles with gilt leaves (which they would often pull out and read) the translation may be thus, but the Greek or Hebrew signifies thus and thus," and so would silence them.' He was reported to have said 'he trusted he was not mad enough or foolish enough to deserve the name of Puritan.'

He was appointed keeper of the rolls and records in the Tower in 1644; in 1645 he was appointed one of the twelve commissioners of the Admiralty, and elected master of Trinity Hall at Cambridge, an office he declined. In 1646 he subscribed the Covenant, and the year after the sum of £5000 was voted to him by Parliament in consideration of his services and sufferings; but it seems doubtful if the money was paid. He constantly employed his influence in behalf of learning and learned men, and performed great service to both universities; as one of the university visitors (from 1647), he always used his influence to moderate the tyranny of his fanatical colleagues. One of his last public acts was to join in the last effort for a reconciliation between the king and the Parliament. After the execution of Charles, of which it is certain he strongly disapproved as both unlawful and inexpedient, he took little share in public matters; and when requested by Cromwell to answer the Eikon Basilike, he refused. He died at Whitefriars, 30th November 1654, and was buried in the Temple Church, London.

In 1689 a collection of his sayings, entitled Table-talk, was published by his amanuensis, who claimed to have enjoyed for twenty years the opportunity of hearing his master's discourse, and to have committed faithfully to writing 'the excellent things that usually fell from him.' It is more by his Table-talk than by the works published in his lifetime that Selden is now generally known as a writer. The eulogy by Clarendon shows how highly Selden was respected even by his opponents, and emphasises the contrast between the embarrassed style of his published works and the ease of his spoken utterances: 'He was a person whom no character can flatter, or transmit any expressions equal to his merit and virtue. He was of so stupendous a learning in all kinds and in all languages—as may appear in his excellent writings—that a man would have thought he had been entirely conversant amongst books, and had never spent an hour but in reading and writing; yet his humanity, affability, and courtesy were such, that he would have been thought to have been bred in the best courts, but that his good-nature, charity, and delight in doing good exceeded that breeding. His style in all his writings seems harsh, and sometimes obscure, which is not wholly to be imputed to the abstruse subjects of which he commonly treated, out of the paths trod by other men, but to a little undervaluing the beauty of style, and too much propensity to the language of antiquity; but in his conversation he was the most clear discourser, and had the best faculty of making hard things easy and present to the understanding, of any man that hath been known.'

Many of the sententious remarks in Selden's Table-talk are exceedingly acute; others are humorous; while some embody propositions which, though affirmed in familiar conversation, he probably would not have seriously maintained. Marriage he pronounces 'a desperate thing: the frogs in Æsop were extreme wise; they had a great mind to some water, but they would not leap into the well, because they could not get out again.' There are not a few satirical observations on the clergy, and plentiful indications of that cautious spirit which distinguished him throughout his career. Johnson, speaking of French Ana, said: 'A few of them are good, but we have one book of that kind better than any of them—Selden's Table-talk.' Coleridge declared, not without exaggeration, 'There is more weighty bullion sense in this book than I can find in the same number of pages of any uninspired writer.' The following are extracts from the Table-talk:

He that speaks ill of another, commonly before he is aware, makes himself such a one as he speaks against; for if he had civility or breeding, he would forbear such kind of language.

A gallant man is above ill words. An example we have in the old lord of Salisbury, who was a great wise man. Stone had called some lord about court, fool; the lord complains, and has Stone whipped; Stone cries: 'I might have called my lord of Salisbury fool often enough, before he would have had me whipped.'

Speak not ill of a great enemy, but rather give him good words, that he may use you the better if you chance to fall into his hands. The Spaniard did this when he was dying; his confessor told him, to work him to repentance, how the devil tormented the wicked that went to hell; the Spaniard replying, called the devil my lord: 'I hope my lord the devil is not so cruel.' His confessor reprov'd him. 'Excuse me,' said the Don, 'for calling him so; I know not into what hands I may fall; and if I happen into his, I hope he will use me the better for giving him good words.'

Humility is a virtue all preach, none practise, and yet everybody is content to hear. The master thinks it good doctrine for his servant, the laity for the clergy, and the clergy for the laity.

There is humilitas quadam in vitio [a faulty excess of humility]. If a man does not take notice of that excellency and perfection that is in himself, how can he be thankful to God, who is the author of all excellency and perfection? Nay, if a man hath too mean an opinion of himself, 'twill render him unserviceable both to God and man.

Pride may be allowed to this or that degree, else a man cannot keep up his dignity. In gluttons there must be eating, in drunkenness there must be drinking; 'tis not the eating, nor 'tis not the drinking, that is to be blamed, but the excess. So in pride.

A king is a thing men have made for their own sakes, for quietness-sake. Just as in a family one man is appointed to buy the meat: if every man should buy, or if there were many buyers, they would never agree; one would buy what the other liked not, or what the other had bought before, so there would be a confusion. But that charge being committed to one, he according to his discretion pleases all. If they have not what they would have one day, they shall have it the next, or something as good.

It is a vain thing to talk of an heretic, for a man for his heart can think no otherwise than he does think. In the primitive times there were many opinions, nothing scarce, but some or other held. One of these opinions being embraced by some prince, and received into his kingdom, the rest were condemned as heresies; and his religion, which was but one of the several opinions, first is said to be orthodox, and so to have continued ever since the apostles.

No man is wiser for his learning: it may administer matter to work in, or objects to work upon; but wit and wisdom are born with a man. Most men's learning is nothing but history duly taken up. If I quote Thomas Aquinas for some tenet, and believe it because the school-men say so, that is but history. Few men make themselves masters of the things they write or speak.

Oracles ceased presently after Christ, as soon as nobody believed them: just as we have no fortune-tellers, nor wise-men [wizards], when nobody cares for them. Sometimes you have a season for them, when people believe them; and neither of these, I conceive, wrought by the devil.

Dreams and prophecies do thus much good: they make a man go on with boldness and courage upon a danger or a mistress. If he obtains, he attributes much to them; if he miscarries, he thinks no more of them, or is no more thought of himself.

Nothing is text but what is spoken of in the Bible, and meant there for person and place; the rest is application, which a discreet man may do well; but 'tis his scripture, not the Holy Ghost's.

First, in your sermons use your logic, and then your rhetoric: rhetoric without logic is like a tree with leaves and blossoms, but no root.

Though some make slight of libels, yet you may see by them how the wind sits: as take a straw and throw it up into the air, you shall see by that which way the wind is, which you shall not do by casting up a stone. More solid things do not shew the complexion of the times so well as ballads and libels.

A person of quality came to my chamber in the Temple, and told me he had two devils in his head (I wondered what he meant), and just at that time one of them bid him kill me. With that I began to be afraid, and thought he was mad. He said he knew I could cure him, and therefore entreated me to give him something, for he was resolved he would go to nobody else. I, perceiving what an opinion he had of me, and that 'twas only melancholy that troubled him, took him in hand, warranted him, if he would follow my directions, to cure him in a short time. I desired him to let me be alone about an hour, and then to come again; which he was very willing to. In the meantime I got a card, and lapped it up handsome in a piece of taffeta, and put strings to the taffeta; and when he came, gave it to him to hang about his neck; withal charged him that he should not disorder himself neither with eating nor drinking, but eat very little of supper, and say his prayers duly when he went to bed, and I made no question but he would be well in three or four days. Within that time I went to dinner to his house, and asked him how he did. He said he was much better, but not perfectly well; for in truth he had not dealt clearly with me; he had four devils in his head, and he perceived two of them were gone with that which I had given him, but the other two troubled him still. 'Well,' said I, 'I am glad two of them are gone; I make no doubt to get away the other two likewise.' So I gave him another thing to hang about his neck. Three days after, he came to me to my chamber, and profest he was now as well as ever he was in his life, and did extremely thank me for the great care I had taken of him. I, fearing lest he might relapse into the like distemper, told him that there was none but myself and one physician more in the whole town that could cure the devils in the head, and that was Dr Harvey, whom I had prepared, and wished him, if ever he found himself ill in my absence, to go to him, for he could cure his disease as well as myself. The gentleman lived many years, and was never troubled after.

To quote a modern Dutchman where I may use a classic author, is as if I were to justify my reputation, and I neglect all persons of note and quality that know me, and bring the testimonial of the scullion in the kitchen.

They talk (but blasphemously enough) that the Holy Ghost is president of their general councils, when the truth is, the odd man is still the Holy Ghost.

To preach long, loud, and damnation, is the way to be cried up. We love a man that damns us, and we run after him again to save us. If a man had a sore leg, and he should go to an honest judicious chirurgeon, and he should only bid him keep it warm, and anoint with such an oil (an oil well known) that would do the cure, haply he would not much regard him, because he knows the medicine beforehand an ordinary medicine. But if he should go to a surgeon that should tell him, Your leg will gangrene within three days, and it must be cut off, and you will die, unless you do something that I could tell you, what listening there would be to this man! Oh, for the Lord's sake, tell me what this is; I will give you any content for your pains.

What a gentleman is, 'tis hard with us to define. In other countries he is known by his privileges; in Westminster-Hall he is one that is reputed one; in the court of honour, he that hath arms. The king cannot make a gentleman of blood. What have you said? Nor God Almighty: but he can make a gentleman by creation. If you ask which is the better of these two, civilly, the gentleman of blood, morally, the gentleman by creation may be the better; for the other may be a debauched man, this a person of worth.

Gentlemen have ever been more temperate in their religion than the common people, as having more reason, the others running in a hurry.

The court of England is much altered. At a solemn dancing, first you had the grave measures, then the corrautoes and the galliards, and this is kept up with ceremony; at length to Trenchmore and the cushion-dance, and then all the company dance, lord and groom, lady and kitchen-maid, no distinction. So in our court, in Queen Elizabeth's time, gravity and state were kept up. In King James's time things were pretty well.

But in King Charles's time, there has been nothing but Trenchmore and the cushion-dance, omnium gatherum, tolly-polly, hoite come toite.

'Tis a fine thing for children to learn to make verse; but when they come to be men, they must speak like other men, or else they will be laughed at. 'Tis ridiculous to speak, or write, or preach in verse. As 'tis good to learn to dance, a man may learn his leg, learn to go handsomely; but 'tis ridiculous for him to dance when he should go.

'Tis ridiculous for a lord to print verses; 'tis well enough to make them to please himself, but to make them public is foolish. If a man in a private chamber twirls his band-strings, or plays with a rush to please himself, 'tis well enough; but if he should go into Fleet-street, and sit upon a stall, and twirl a band-string, or play with a rush, then all the boys in the street would laugh at him.

Prayer should be short, without giving God Almighty reasons why he should grant this or that; he knows best what is good for us. If your boy should ask you a suit of clothes, and give you reasons, 'otherwise he cannot wait upon you, he cannot go abroad but he will discredit you,' would you endure it? You know it better than he; let him ask a suit of clothes.

If a servant that has been fed with good beef, goes into that part of England where salmon is plenty, at first he is pleased with his salmon, and despises his beef, but after he has been there a while, he grows weary of his salmon, and wishes for his good beef again. We have a while been much taken with this praying by the spirit; but in time we may grow weary of it, and wish for our Common-Prayer.

The presbyter with his elders about him, is like a young tree fenced about with two, or three, or four stakes; the stakes defend it, and hold it up, but the tree only prospers and flourishes: it may be some willow stake may bear a leaf or two, but it comes to nothing. Lay-elders are stakes, the presbyter the tree that flourishes.

Religion is like the fashion: one man wears his doublet slashed, another laced, another plain; but every man has a doublet. So every man has his religion. We differ about trimming.

Men say they are of the same religion for quietness sake; but if the matter were well examined you would scarce find three anywhere of the same religion in all points.

There's all the reason in the world divines should not be suffered to go a hair beyond their bounds, for fear of breeding confusion, since there now be so many religions on foot. The matter was not so narrowly to be looked after when there was but one religion in Christendom: the rest would cry him down for an heretic, and there was nobody to side with him.

The following passage on the value of doubt and free inquiry is from the preface to Selden's History of Tythes:

For the old sceptiques that never would profess that they had found a truth, yet shewed the best way to search for any, when they doubted as well of what those of the dogmatical sects too credulously received for infallible principles, as they did of the newest conclusions: they were indeed questionless too nice, and deceived themselves with the nimbleness of their own sophisms, that permitted no kind of established truth. But plainly he that avoids their disputing levity, yet, being able, takes to himself their liberty of inquiry, is in the only way that in all kinds of studies leads and lies open even to the sanctuary of truth; while others, that are servile to common opinion and vulgar suppositions, can rarely hope to be admitted nearer than into the base court of her temple, which too speciously often counterfeits her inmost sanctuary.

The chief of Selden's twenty-seven separate publications, besides those already mentioned, are Marmora Arundeliana (1624), on the marbles brought that year from Smyrna and Greece by the Earl of Arundel's agents; and three books on Hebrew law and usages, in which, as in all his biblical studies, he is inevitably more learned than critical. His works were collected by Dr Wilkins, and published in 1726 in three folio volumes. See Aikin's Lives of Selden and Usher (1811), G. W. Johnson's Memoir (1835), and S. H. Reynolds's introduction to the Table-talk (1892). The Selden Society was founded in 1887 to promote the study of English legal history.

John Hales (1584–1656), 'the Ever-memorable,' is usually classed with Chillingworth as a prominent defender of rational and tolerant principles in religion. Born at Bath, he was bred at Corpus Christi, Oxford, and became a fellow of Merton. He was highly distinguished for his knowledge of Greek, on which he was appointed lecturer at Oxford in 1612. Four years afterwards he went to Holland as chaplain to Sir Dudley Carleton, ambassador at The Hague; and on this occasion he attended for four months the meetings of the famous Synod of Dort (November 1618–May 1619), the proceedings of which are recorded in his published letters to Sir Dudley. Till this time he held the Calvinistic opinions in which he had been educated; but the arguments of the Arminian champion Episcopius, or his view of contentious orthodoxy and the conviction that neither side possessed a monopoly of truth, made him, in his own phrase as reported by the editor of the Golden Remains, 'bid John Calvin good-night.' His letters from Dort are characterised by Lord Clarendon as 'the best memorial of the ignorance, and passion, and animosity, and injustice of that convention.' Although the eminent learning and abilities of Hales would certainly have led to high preferment in the Church, he chose rather to live in studious retirement, and accordingly withdrew to Eton College, where he had a private fellowship under his friend Sir Henry Savile as provost. Yet he was no recluse: he delighted in the conversation of Chillingworth and Falkland, of Ben Jonson and Suckling. His famous Tract concerning Schism and Schismatics (c. 1636), in which the bad effects of episcopal ambition are freely discussed, greatly displeased Laud; but Hales defended himself so well in a letter and at a conference that Laud in 1639 gave him a prebendal stall at Windsor. In 1649 he was deprived of his offices for refusing to take the 'engagement,' or oath of fidelity to the Commonwealth of England, as then established without a king or House of Lords. His ejection reduced him to such straits that at length he was under the necessity of selling for £700 the greater part of his library, on which he had expended £2500, though from a spirit of independence he refused to accept the bounty of his friends. The learning, abilities, and amiable disposition of John Hales are spoken of in the highest terms not only by Clarendon, but by Pearson, Heylin, Marvell, and Stillingfleet. He is styled by Anthony Wood 'a walking library;' and Pearson considered him to be 'a man of as great a sharpness, quickness, and subtilty of wit as ever this or perhaps any nation bred. His industry did strive, if it were possible, to equal the largeness of his capacity, whereby he became as great a master of polite, various, and universal learning as ever yet conversed with books.' His extensive knowledge he cheerfully communicated to others; and his liberal, obliging, and charitable disposition made him a determined foe to intolerance in religious matters. Clarendon says that 'nothing troubled him more than the brawls which were grown from religion; and he therefore exceedingly detested the tyranny of the Church of Rome, more for their imposing uncharitably upon the consciences of other men, than for the errors in their own opinions.' Aubrey, who saw him at Eton after his sequestration, describes him as 'a pretty little man, sanguine, of a cheerful countenance, very gentle and courteous.'

The following is a fragment of a sermon, preached at The Hague in 1619, on the folly and wickedness of duelling, a subject on which Hales was in advance of some eminent Continental Christians of the present day:

Murder, though all be abominable, yet there are degrees in it, some is more hainous then other. Gross, malicious, premeditated, and wilful murder are by our laws, so far as humane wisdom can provide, sufficiently prevented: but murders done in haste, or besides the intent of him that did it, or in point of honour, and reputation, these find a little too much favour; or laws in this respect are somewhat defective, both in preventing that it be not done, and punishing it when it is done; men have thought themselves wiser then God, presuming to moderate the unnecessary severity (as they seem to think) of his laws. And hence it comes to pass, that in military companies, and in all great cities and places of mart and concourse, few moneths, yea, few weeks pass without some instance and example of bloodshed, either by sudden quarrel, or by challenge to duel and single combat. How many examples in a short space have we seen of young men, men of hot and fiery disposition, mutually provoking and disgracing each other, and then taking themselves bound in high terms of valour and honour, to end their quarrels by their swords? That therefore we may the better discover the unlawfulness of challenge and private combat, let us a little enquire and examine in what cases blood may lawfully, and without offence, be shed; that so we may see where, amongst these, single combat may find its place. . . .

To come then unto the question of duels ; both by the light of reason and by the practise of men it doth appear that there is no case wherein subjects may privately seek each others lives : there are extant the laws of the Jews, framed by God himself ; the laws of the Roman Empire, made partly by the Ethnick, partly by Christian princes ; a great part of the laws of Sparta and Athens (two warlike common-wealths, especially the former) lie dispersed in our books : yet amongst them all is there not a law or custom that permits this liberty to subjects : the reason of it, I conceive, is very plain ; the principal thing, next under God, by which a common-wealth doth stand, is the authority of the magistrate, whose proper end is to compose and end quarrels between man and man, upon what occasion soever they grow ; for were men peaceable, were men not injurious one to another, there were no use of government : wherefore to permit men in private to try their own rights, or to avenge their own wrongs, and so to decline the sentence of the magistrate, is quite to cut off all use of authority. Indeed it hath been sometimes seen that the event of a battel, by consent of both armies, hath been put upon single combat, to avoid further effusion of blood ; but combats betwixt subjects for private causes, till these latter ages of the world, was never allowed : yet, I must confess, the practise of it is very ancient : for Cain, the second man in the world, was the first duelist, the first that ever challenged the feild. In the fourth of Genesis the text saith, that Cain spake unto his brother, and when they were in the feild, he arose and slew him. The Septuagint, to make the sense more plain, do add another clause, and tell us what it was he said unto his brother, δύλαωμιν εἰς τὸ πεδίον, Let us go out into the feild ; and when they were in the feild, he arose and slew him : Let us go out into the feild, it is the very form and proper language of a challenge. Many times indeed our gallants can formalize in other words, but evermore the substance and usually the very words are no other but these of Cain, Let us go out into the feild. Abel I perswade my self understood them not as a challenge ; for had he so done, he would have made so much use of his discretion as to have refused it ; yet can we not chuse but acknowledge a secret judgment of God in this, that the words of Cain should still be so religiously kept till this day, as a proem and introduction to that action, which doubtless is no other then what Cain's was. When therefore our gallants are so ready to challenge the feild, and to go into the feild, let them but remember whose words they use, and so accordingly think of their action. Again, notwithstanding duels are of so antient and worshipful a parentage, yet could they never gain so good acceptance as to be permitted, much less to be counted lawful in the civil part of the world, till barbarism had over-ran it. About five or six hundred years after Christ, at the fall of the Roman Empire, abundance of rude and barbarous people brake in and possess the civiller part of the world ; who abolishing the ancient laws of the empire, set up many strange customs in their rooms. Amongst the rest, for the determining of quarrels that might arise in case of doubtful title, or of false accusation, or the like, they put themselves upon many unusual forms of trial ; as, to handle red hot iron, to walk bare-foot on burning coals, to put their hands and feet in scalding water, and many other of the like nature, which are reckoned up by Hottoman, a French lawyer : for they presumed so far on Gods providence, that if the party accused were innocent, he might do any of these without any smart or harm. In the same cases, when by reason of unsufficient and doubtful evidence, the judges could not proceed to sentence, as sometimes it falls out, and the parties contending would admit of no reasonable composition, their manner was to permit them to try it out by their swords ; that so the conquerour might be thought to be in the right. They permitted, I say, thus to do ; for at the best 'twas but a permission to prevent farther mischief ; for to this end sometimes some known abuses are tolerated : so God permitted the Jews upon sleight occasions to put their wives away, because he saw that otherwise their exorbitant lusts would not be bounded within these limits which he in Paradise in the beginning had set.

There is an air of modernity in his essay on 'The Method of Reading Profane History,' from which this is a paragraph :

One thing more, ere I leave this head, I will admonish you of. It is a common scholical errour to fill our papers and note-books with observations of great and famous events, either of great battels, or civil broiles and contentions. The expedition of Hercules his off-spring for the recovery of Peloponnese, the building of Rome, the attempt of Regulus against the great serpent of Bagradas, the Punick Wars, the ruine of Carthage, the death of Cæsar, and the like. Mean while things of ordinary course and common life gain no room in our paper-books. Petronius wittily and sharply complain'd against scholemasters in his times ; in which he wisely reproves the errour of those, who training up of youth in the practise of rhetoric never suffered them to practise their wits in things of use, but in certain strange supralunary arguments, which never fell within the sphere of common action. This complaint is good against divers of those who travel in history. For one of the greatest reasons that so many of them thrive so little, and grow no wiser men, is because they sleight things of ordinary course, and observe onely great matters of more note, but less use. How doth it benefit a man who lives in peace to observe the art how Cæsar managed wars ? or by what cunning he aspired to the monarchy ? or what advantages they were that gave Scipio the day against Hannibal ? These things may be known, not because the knowledge of these things is useful, but because it is an imputation to be ignorant of them ; their greatest use for you being onely to furnish out your discourse. Let me therefore advise you in reading to have a care of those discourses which express domestick and private actions, especially if they be such wherein your self purposes to venture your fortunes. For if you rectifie a little your conceit, you shall see that it is the same wisdom which manages private business and State affairs, and that the one is acted with as much folly and ease as the other. If you will not believe men, then look into our colleges, where you shall see that I say not the plotting for an Headship (for that is now become a court-business), but the contriving of a bursership of twenty nobles a year is many times done with as great a portion of suing, siding, supplanting, and of other court-like arts, as the gaining of the secretary's place ; onely the difference of the persons it is which makes the one comical, the other tragical. To think that there is more wisdom placed in these specious matters then in private carriages, is the same errour as if you should think there were more art required to paint a king than a countrey gentleman : whereas our Dutch pieces may serve to confute you, wherein you shall see a cup of Rhenish-wine, a dish of radishes, a brass pan, an Holland cheese, the fisher-men selling fish at Scheveling, or the kitchen-maid spitting a loin of mutton, done with as great delicacy and choiceness of art as can be expressed in the delineation of the greatest monarch in the world.

This is his account of a breeze (threatening to issue in a duel) in the Synod of Dort :

Upon Tuesday the 14 of this present in the evening, for the debating of certain particular points of controversy belonging to the first Article, the Synod came together in private. It hath been lately questioned how Christ is said to be fundamentum electionis. The doctrine generally received by the Contra-Remonstrant in this point is that God first of all resolved upon the salvation of some singular persons, and in the second place upon Christ as a mean to bring this decree to pass. So that with them God the Father alone is the author of our election, and Christ only the executioner. Others on the contrary teach that Christ is so to be held fundamentum electionis as that he is not only the executioner of election, but the author and the procurer of it : for proof of which they bring the words of the Apostle to the Ephesians the first chapter, elegit nos in Christo ante facta mundi fundamenta. The exposition of this text was the especial thing discusst at this meeting : and some taught that Christ was fundamentum electionis because he was primus electorum, or because he is fundamentum electorum, but not electionis, or because he is fundamentum beneficiorum, which descend upon us ; others brookt none of those restraints. D. Gomarus stands for the former sentence, and in defence of it had said many things on Friday. This night Martinus of Breme being required to speak his mind, signified to the Synod, that he made some scruple concerning the doctrine passant about the manner of Christs being fundamentum electionis, and that he thought Christ not only the effector of our election, but also the author and procurer thereof. Gomarus, who owes the Synod a shrewd turn, and then I fear me began to come out of debt, presently, as soon as Martinus had spoken, starts up and tells the Synod, ego hanc rem in me recipio, and therewithall casts his glove, and challenges Martinus with this proverb, Ecce Rhodum, ecce saltum, and requires the Synod to grant them a duel, adding that he knew Martinus could say nothing in refutation of that doctrine. Martinus, who goes in æquipace with Gomarus in learning and a little before him for his discretion, easily digested this affront, and after some few words of course, by the wisdom of the præses matters seemed to be a little pacified, and so according to the custom the Synod with prayer concluded. Zeal and devotion had not so well allayed Gomarus his choler, but immediately after prayers he renewed his challenge and required combat with Martinus again ; but they parted for that night without blowes. Martinus, as it seemes, is somewhat favourable to some tenents of the Remonstrants concerning reprobation, the latitude of Christs merit, the salvation of infants, &c., and to bring him to some conformity was there a private meeting of the forreign divines upon Wednesday morning in my Lord Bishops lodging, in which thus much was obtained, that though he would not leave his conclusions, yet he promised moderation and temper in such manner, that there should be no dissention in the Synod by reason of any opinion of his.

His principal work, the Golden Remains, mainly sermons and miscellanies, was edited with a Life by Bishop Pearson (1699), reprinted and extended in 1673 and 1688. In 1765 an edition of his works was published by Lord Hailes, who modernised the language, greatly to the disgust of Dr Johnson. 'An author's language, sir,' said he, 'is a characteristical part of his composition, and is also characteristical of the age in which he writes. Besides, sir, when the language is changed, we are not sure that the sense is the same. No, sir ; I am sorry Lord Hailes has done this.' See Tulloch's Rational Theology in England, vol. i. (1872).

Robert Sanderson (1587-1663), the son of the squire of Giltwhaite Hall, was born more probably at Sheffield than at Rotherham, was educated anyhow at Rotherham and at Lincoln College, Oxford (where he became fellow and reader in logic), and held the living of Boothby-Pagnell for forty years in spite of sequestration and a short imprisonment during the Civil War. In 1642 he was made Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, was ejected by the Parliamentary visitors of 1648, but was reinstated after the Restoration, and in October 1660 became Bishop of Lincoln. His Logicæ Artis Compendium (1615) was often reprinted, and was praised by Sir William Hamilton as 'the excellent work of an accomplished logician.' The Sermons of Sanderson are also admired for vigour and clearness of thought ; he is the author of the second preface to the Prayer-Book ('It hath been the wisdom'); and in virtue of his Nine Cases of Conscience Resolved (1678) Sanderson has been ranked as the greatest of English casuists. The cases selected are questions of the Sabbath, the engagement (the royalist compact of 1647 between the king and the Scots against the Parliament), the liturgy, a rash vow, marrying with a recusant (i.e. a Roman Catholic), a bond taken in the king's name, unlawful love, a military life (under what conditions it is lawful), a matrimonial contract, and of usury. On some of these points most reasonable Christians would agree, as on some of them High Churchmen and Puritans would inevitably differ widely. He denies that marrying a daughter to a 'professed Papist' is in itself unlawful, but points out the many 'evil consequents' which render it inexpedient to conclude such a marriage ; affirming that in one respect the danger is greater to marry with a Papist than with one of a worse religion, for that the main principle of his religion as a Papist is more destructive of the comfort of a conjugal society than are the principles of most heretics, 'yea, than those of Pagans or atheists' (viz. the doctrine that there is no sal-vability but in the Church). How far the Churchman of that date might differ from the Puritan may be seen from his answer to two of the questions raised about the Sabbath :

I. Concerning the name Sabbatum or Sabbath I thus conceive : 1. That in Scripture, antiquity, and all ecclesiastical writers, it is constantly appropriated to the day of the Jews' Sabbath or Saturday, and not at all till of late years used to signify our Lord's Day or Sunday. 2. That to call Sunday by the name of the Sabbath-day, rebus sic stantibus, may for sundry respects be allowed in the Christian Church without any great inconveniency; and that therefore men otherwise sober and moderate ought not to be censured with too much severity, neither charged with Judaism, if sometimes they so speak. 3. That yet for sundry other respects it were perhaps much more expedient if the word Sabbath in that notion were either not at all or else more sparingly used.

II. Concerning the name Dominica, or the Lord's Day: 1. That it was taken up in memory of our Lord Christ's resurrection, and the great work of our redemption accomplished therein. 2. That it hath warrant from the Scripture, Apoc. i. 10, and hath been of long continued use in the Christian Church, to signify the first day of the week or Sunday.

III. Concerning the name Dies Solis or Sunday: 1. That it is taken from the courses of the planets, as the names of the other days are: the reason whereof is to be learned from astronomers. 2. That it hath been used generally, and of long time, in most parts of the world. 3. That it is not justly chargeable with heathenism; and that it proceedeth from much weakness at the least, if not rather superstition, that some men condemn the use of it as profane, heathenish, or unlawful.

IV. Of the fitness of the aforesaid three names compared one with another. First, that according to the several matter or occasions of speech each of the three may be fitter in some respect, and more proper to be used than either of the other two. As, viz. 1. The name Sabbath, when we speak of a time of rest indeterminate and in general, without reference to any particular day; and the other two, when we speak determinately of that day which is observed in the Christian Church. Of which two again, 2. That of the Lord's Day is fitter in the theological and ecclesiastical; and, 3. That of Sunday in the civil, popular, and common use. Secondly. Yet so as that none of the three be condemned as utterly unlawful, whatsoever the matter or occasion be; but that every man be left to his Christian liberty herein, so long as superior authority doth not restrain it. Provided ever, that what he doth herein, he do it without vanity or affectation in himself, or without uncharitable judging or despising his brother that doth otherwise than himself doth. . . .

To the Third Question. In this matter, touching recreations to be used on the Lord's Day, much need not be said, there being little difficulty in it, and his Majesty's last declaration in that behalf having put it past disputation. I say then,

1. For the thing. That no man can reasonably condemn the moderate use of lawful recreations upon the Lord's Day, as simply and de toto genere unlawful.

2. For the kind. Albeit there can be no certain rules given herein, as in most indifferent things it cometh to pass by reason of the infinite variety of circumstances to fit with all particular cases, but that still much must be left to private discretion: yet for some directions in this matter, respect would be had in the choice of our recreations, 1. To the public laws of the state. Such games or sports as are by law prohibited, though in themselves otherwise lawful, being unlawful to them that are under the obedience of the law. 2. To the condition of the person. Walking and discoursing with men of liberal education is a pleasant recreation: it is no way delightful to the ruder sort of people, who scarce account any thing a sport which is not loud and boisterous. 3. To the effects of the recreations themselves. Those being the meetest to be used which give the best refreshing to the body, and leave the least impression in the mind. In which respect, shooting, leaping, pitching the bar, stool-ball, &c. are rather to be chosen than dicing, carding, &c.

3. For the use. That men would be exhorted to use their recreation and pastimes upon the Lord's Day in godly and commendable sort. For which purpose, amongst others, these cautions following would be remembered:

1. That they be used with great moderation, as at all other times, so especially and much more upon the Lord's Day. 2. That they be used at seasonable times, not in time of divine service, nor at such hours as are appointed by the master of the house whereunto they belong for private devotions within his own house. His Majesty's declaration limiteth men's liberty this way till after evensong be ended. 3. That they be so used as that they may rather make men the fitter for God's service the rest of the day, and for the works of their vocations the rest of the week, than any way hinder or disable them thereunto, by over-wearying the body or immoderately affecting the mind. 4. That they use them not doubtfully; for whatsoever is not of faith is sin. He therefore that is not satisfied in his own judgment that he may lawfully and without sin use bodily recreations on the Lord's Day, ought by all means to forbear the use thereof, lest he should sin against his own conscience. 5. That they be severer towards themselves than towards other men in the use of their Christian liberty herein, not making their own opinion or practice a rule to their brethren. In this as in all indifferent things a wise and charitable man will in godly wisdom deny himself many times the use of that liberty, which in a godly charity he dare not deny to his brother.

Thomas Hobbes.

Thomas Hobbes, called from his birthplace 'the Malmesbury philosopher,' was born 5th April 1588. Of him it may safely be said that no thinker or writer of the seventeenth century attracted more attention in his own time, and that few exercised a wider or more marked influence on speculation in the following age. His mother's alarm at the approach of the Spanish Armada is said to have hastened his birth and to have been the cause of a constitutional timidity which beset him through life. After studying for five years at Magdalen Hall in Oxford, where his mind was not stirred by the usual courses of Aristotelian logic and physics, he travelled in 1610 through France, Italy, and Germany as tutor to Lord William Cavendish, afterwards second Earl of Devonshire. On returning to England he continued to reside with him as his secretary; and he became intimate with Lord Bacon, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and Ben Jonson. He now studied the classical historians and poets, and produced a translation of Thucydides (1628). His pupil and friend dying in 1628, two years after his father, Hobbes spent eighteen months at Paris, and perhaps also at Venice, as tutor to the son of Sir Gervase Clifton. In 1631 he undertook to superintend the education of his first pupil's son, the third Earl of Devonshire, with whom he set off in 1634 on a three years' tour through France and Italy. At Florence he became intimate with Galileo, the astronomer, and elsewhere held communication with notable scholars and thinkers. After his return to England in 1637 he resided in the Earl's family at Chatsworth in Derbyshire. He now devoted himself to study, interrupted, however, by the political contentions of the times. His pamphlet De Corpore Politico seemed to 'bring him into danger of his life,' and he deemed it necessary in the autumn of 1640 to retire to Paris, where he lived on terms of intimacy with Mersenne, Gassendi, and other learned men of the day.

Here he engaged in a controversy about the quadrature of the circle; and in 1647 he was appointed mathematical instructor to Charles, Prince of Wales, then in the French capital. Already he had commenced the publication of those works which he sent forth in succession with the view of curbing the spirit of freedom in England by showing the philosophical foundation of despotic monarchy. The first of them was originally printed in Latin at Paris, in 1642, under the title of Elementa Philosophica de Cive, and was translated into English, in 1650, as Philosophical Rudiments concerning Government and Society. The principles maintained in it were more fully discussed in his larger work, Leviathan: or the Matter, Form, and Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil (1651). Man is here represented as a selfish and ferocious animal, requiring the strong hand of despotism to keep him in check; and all notions of right and wrong are made to depend upon views of self-interest alone. Of this Selfish System of moral philosophy Hobbes was indeed the great champion, both in the Leviathan and more particularly in his small Treatise on Human Nature, published in 1650. The freedom with which theological subjects were handled in the Leviathan, its rationalistic criticism of Scripture, and its reduction of religion to a department of state morality, as well as its offensive political views, occasioned a great outcry against the author, particularly among the royalist clergy. This led Charles to dissolve his connection with the philosopher, who, according to Lord Clarendon, 'was compelled secretly to fly out of Paris, the justice having endeavoured to apprehend him, and soon after escaped into England (1651), where he never received any disturbance.' In 1653 he resumed his relations with the Devonshire household, but remained always in London, and became intimate with Selden, Cowley, and Dr Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood. In 1654 he published a short but admirably clear and comprehensive Letter upon Liberty and Necessity, where the doctrine of the self-determining power of the will is opposed with a subtlety and profundity unsurpassed in any subsequent writer on that much agitated question—indeed, he was one of the first to expound clearly the doctrine of philosophical necessity. On this subject a long controversy took place between him and Bishop Bramhall of Londonderry. Here he fought with the skill of a master; but in a mathematical dispute with Dr Wallis, professor of geometry at Oxford, which lasted twenty years, he fairly went beyond his depth; he had not begun to study mathematics till the age of forty, and, like other late learners, greatly overestimated his knowledge. He supposed himself to have discovered the quadrature of the circle, and dogmatically upheld his claim in the face of the clearest refutation. In this controversy personal feeling, according to the custom of the time, appeared without disguise. Hobbes having published a sarcastic piece entitled Six Lessons to the Professors of Mathematics in Oxford, Wallis retorted by administering, in 1656, Due Correction for Mr Hobbes, or School-discipline for not Saying his Lessons Right. Here he debates with the philosopher in this unceremonious strain: 'It seems, Mr Hobbes, that you have a mind to say your lesson, and that the mathematic professors of Oxford should hear you. You are too old to learn, though you have as much need as those that be younger, and yet will think much to be whipt. What moved you to say your lessons in English, when the books against which you do chiefly intend them were written in Latin? Was it chiefly for the perfecting your natural rhetoric, whenever you thought it convenient to repair to Billingsgate? You found that the oyster-women could not teach you to rail in Latin. . . . Sir, those persons needed not a sight of your ears, but could tell by the voice what kind of creature brayed in your books: you dared not have said this to their faces.' When Charles II. was restored to the throne he conferred on Hobbes an annual pension of £100, very irregularly paid; but, notwithstanding this and other marks of the royal favour, much odium continued to prevail against him and his doctrines. The Leviathan and De Cive were censured in Parliament in 1666, and also drew forth many printed replies. Among the authors of these the most distinguished was Lord Clarendon, whose Brief View and Survey of the Dangerous and Pernicious Errors to Church and State, in Mr Hobbes's Book, entitled Leviathan, was posthumously published in 1676. In 1672, in his eighty-fifth year, Hobbes wrote his own Life in Latin verse! He next appeared as a translator of Homer, publishing a version of four books of the Odyssey, which was so well received that in 1675 he completed his translation, as well as one of the whole Iliad. Here, according to Pope, 'Hobbes has given us a correct explanation of the sense in general; but for particulars and circumstances, he continually lops them, and often omits the most beautiful.' Yet three large editions were required within less than ten years. His prose version of Thucydides—his first work, and awkwardly literal—was long the standard English translation. This work was undertaken by him 'from an honest desire of preventing, if possible, those disturbances in which he was apprehensive that his country would be involved, by shewing, in the history of the Peloponnesian war, the fatal consequences of intestine troubles.' At Hardwick and Chatsworth, where he spent the remainder of his days, Hobbes continued to write books, the principal of which, Behemoth, or a History of the Civil Wars from 1640 to 1660, issued surreptitiously from the press just before his death at Hardwick Hall, 4th December 1679, in his ninety-second year. He is buried in the chancel of Hault-Hucknall church, near Chesterfield.

Hobbes is described by Lord Clarendon as one for whom he 'had always had a great esteem, as a man who, besides his eminent parts of learning and knowledge, hath been always looked upon as a man of probity and a life free from scandal.' It was a saying of Charles II. in reference to the opposition which the doctrines of Hobbes met from the clergy, that 'he was a bear against whom the Church played their young dogs in order to exercise them.' In his later years he became morose and impatient of contradiction, growing infirmities and too much solitude increasing his natural arrogance and contempt for the opinions of other men. He at no time read extensively: Homer, Virgil, Thucydides, and Euclid were his favourite authors; and he used to say that, 'if he had read as much as other men, he should have been as ignorant as they.' Macaulay pronounced his style 'more precise and luminous than has ever been employed by any other metaphysical writer.' In date Hobbes falls between Bacon and Locke, but in philosophic ideas and temper he is widely separated from either. It is by his contributions to scientific psychology, ethics, and political theory that he takes rank as a profound original thinker. His ethical theory, based on pure selfishness and the arbitrary prescriptions of a sovereign power, negatively determined ethical speculation in England for a hundred years; all the great moralists wrote, directly or indirectly, as his opponents. But his political absolutism is the most famous part of his speculations. The state of nature, he argues, is a state of war and insecurity. Moved by a desire to escape from the intolerable evils of such a condition, human beings enter into a species of contract by which they surrender their individual rights, and constitute a state under an absolute sovereignty. The sovereign power need not be monarchical, but, whatever form it assumes, it is absolute and irresponsible. Hobbes was regarded by his contemporaries and the writers of the next age as the prince of unbelievers, a sort of father of lies, and even, erroneously, as an atheist. Among those who ranged themselves against his philosophy were Cumberland, Cudworth, Shaftesbury, Clarke, Butler, Hutcheson, Lord Kames, Adam Smith, Dugald Stewart, and Stewart's successor, Thomas Brown.

From the Introduction to 'Leviathan.'

Nature, the art whereby God hath made and governs the world, is by the 'art' of man, as in many other things, so in this also imitated, that it can make an artificial animal. For seeing life is but a motion of limbs, the beginning whereof is in some principal part within, why may we not say that all 'automata' (engines that move themselves by springs and wheels as doth a watch) have an artificial life? For what is the heart but a 'spring,' and the nerves but so many 'strings,' and the joints but so many 'wheels,' giving motion to the whole body, such as was intended by the artificer? 'Art' goes yet further, imitating that rational and most excellent work of nature, 'man.' For by art is created that great 'Leviathan' called a 'Commonwealth,' or 'State,' in Latin Civitas, which is but an artificial man; though of greater stature and strength than the natural, for whose protection and defence it was intended; and in which the sovereignty is an artificial 'soul,' as giving life and motion to the whole body; the magistrates, and other officers of judicature and execution, artificial 'joints;' reward and punishment, by which fastened to the seat of the sovereignty every joint and member is moved to perform his duty, are the 'nerves,' that do the same in the body natural; the wealth and riches of all the particular members are the 'strength;' salus populi, the people's safety, its 'business;' counsellors, by whom all things needful for it to know are suggested unto it, are the 'memory;' equity, and laws, an artificial 'reason' and 'will;' concord, 'health;' sedition, 'sickness;' and civil war, 'death.' Lastly, the pacts and covenants, by which the parts of this body politic were at first made, set together, and united, resemble that 'fiat,' or the 'let us make man,' pronounced by God in the creation. To describe the nature of this artificial man, I will consider—First, the matter thereof, and the artificer; both which is 'man.' Secondly, how and by what covenants it is made; what are the rights and just power or authority of a 'sovereign;' and what it is that 'preserveth' or 'dissolveth' it. Thirdly, what is a 'Christian commonwealth.' Lastly, what is the 'kingdom of darkness.'

On the State of War Universal.

So that in the nature of man, we find three principal causes of quarrel. First, competition; secondly, diffidence; thirdly, glory. The first maketh men invade for gain, the second for safety, and the third for reputation. The first use violence, to make themselves masters of other men's persons, wives, children, and cattle; the second, to defend them; the third, for trifles, as a word, a smile, a different opinion, and any other sign of undervalue, either direct in their persons, or by reflection in their kindred, their friends, their nation, their profession, or their name.

Hereby it is manifest that during the time men live without a common power to keep them all in awe, they are in that condition which is called war; and such a war as is of every man, against every man. For 'war' consisteth not in battle only, or the act of fighting; but in a tract of time wherein the will to contend by battle is sufficiently known: and therefore the notion of 'time' is to be considered in the nature of war, as it is in the nature of weather. For as the nature of foul weather lieth not in a shower or two of rain, but in an inclination thereto of many days together; so the nature of war consisteth not in actual fighting, but in the known disposition thereto during all the time there is no assurance to the contrary. All other time is 'peace.'

Whatsoever therefore is consequent to a time of war, where every man is enemy to every man, the same is consequent to the time wherein men live without other security than what their own strength and their own invention shall furnish them withal. In such condition there is no place for industry, because the fruit thereof is uncertain, and consequently no culture of the earth; no navigation, nor use of the commodities that may be imported by sea; no commodious building; no instruments of moving and removing such things as require much force; no knowledge of the face of the earth; no account of time; no arts; no letters; no society; and, which is worst of all, continual fear and danger of violent death; and the life of man, solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short.

It may seem strange to some man that has not well weighed these things, that Nature should thus dissociate and render men apt to invade and destroy one another; and he may therefore, not trusting to this inference, made from the passions, desire perhaps to have the same confirmed by experience. Let him therefore consider with himself, when taking a journey, he arms himself, and seeks to go well accompanied; when going to sleep, he locks his doors; when even in his house, he locks his chests; and this when he knows there be laws, and public officers, armed, to revenge all injuries shall be done him; what opinion he has of his fellow-subjects, when he rides armed; of his fellow-citizens, when he locks his doors; and of his children and servants, when he locks his chests. Does he not there as much accuse mankind by his actions as I do by my words? But neither of us accuse man's nature in it. The desires and other passions of man are in themselves no sin. No more are the actions that proceed from those passions, till they know a law that forbids them; which till laws be made they cannot know, nor can any law be made till they have agreed upon the person that shall make it.

It may peradventure be thought there was never such a time nor condition of war as this; and I believe it was never generally so over all the world, but there are many places where they live so now. For the savage people in many places of America, except the government of small families, the concord whereof dependeth on natural lust, have no government at all, and live at this day in that brutish manner, as I said before. Howsoever, it may be perceived what manner of life there would be where there were no common power to fear, by the manner of life which men that have formerly lived under a peaceful government, use to degenerate into in a civil war.

But though there had never been any time wherein particular men were in a condition of war one against another; yet in all times kings and persons of sovereign authority, because of their independency, are in continual jealousies and in the state and posture of gladiators; having their weapons pointing, and their eyes fixed on one another; that is, their forts, garrisons, and guns upon the frontiers of their kingdoms; and continual spies upon their neighbours; which is a posture of war. But because they uphold thereby the industry of their subjects, there does not follow from it that misery which accompanies the liberty of particular men.

To this war of every man, against every man, this also is consequent—that nothing can be unjust. The notions of right and wrong, justice and injustice, have there no place. Where there is no common power, there is no law; where no law, no injustice. Force and fraud are in war the two cardinal virtues. Justice and injustice are none of the faculties neither of the body nor mind. If they were, they might be in a man that were alone in the world, as well as his senses and passions. They are qualities that relate to men in society, not in solitude. It is consequent also to the same condition, that there be no propriety, no dominion, no 'mine' and 'thine' distinct; but only that to be every man's that he can get, and for so long as he can keep it. And thus much for the ill condition which man by mere nature is actually placed in; though with a possibility to come out of it, consisting partly in the passions, partly in his reason.

The passions that incline men to peace are fear of death; desire of such things as are necessary to commodious living; and a hope by their industry to obtain them. And reason suggesteth convenient articles of peace, upon which men may be drawn to agreement. These articles are they which otherwise are called the Laws of Nature: whereof I shall speak more particularly in the two following chapters.

(From Leviathan.)

On Antiquity.

In that part which treateth of a Christian commonwealth there are some new doctrines which, it may be, in a state where the contrary were already fully determined, were a fault for a subject without leave to divulge, as being an usurpation of the place of a teacher. But in this time, that men call not only for peace, but also for truth, to offer such doctrines as I think true, and that manifestly tend to peace and loyalty, to the consideration of those that are yet in deliberation, is no more but to offer new wine to be put into new casks, that both may be preserved together. And I suppose that then, when novelty can breed no trouble nor disorder in a state, men are not generally so much inclined to the reverence of antiquity as to prefer ancient errors before new and well-proved truth.

There is nothing I distrust more than my elocution [i.e. power of literary expression, style], which nevertheless I am confident, excepting the mischances of the press, is not obscure. That I have neglected the ornament of quoting ancient poets, orators, and philosophers, contrary to the custom of late time, whether I have done well or ill in it, proceedeth from my judgment, grounded on many reasons. For first, all truth of doctrine dependeth either upon reason or upon Scripture, both which give credit to many, but never receive it from any writer. Secondly, the matters in question are not of fact, but of right, wherein there is no place for witnesses. There is scarce any of those old writers that contradicteth not sometimes both himself and others; which makes their testimonies insufficient. Fourthly, such opinions as are taken only upon credit of antiquity are not intrinsically the judgment of those that cite them, but words that pass, like gaping, from mouth to mouth. Fifthly, it is many times with a fraudulent design that men stick their corrupt doctrine with the cloves of other men's wit. Sixthly, I find not that the ancients they cite took it for an ornament to do the like with those that wrote before them. Seventhly, it is an argument of indigestion, when Greek and Latin sentences unchewed come up again, as they use to do, unchanged. Lastly, though I reverence those men of ancient time that either have written truth perspicuously, or set us in a better way to find it out ourselves: yet to the antiquity itself I think nothing due. For if we will reverence the age, the present is the oldest. If the antiquity of the writer, I am not sure that generally they to whom such honour is given were more ancient when they wrote than I am that am writing. But if it be well considered, the praise of ancient authors proceeds not from the reverence of the dead, but from the competition and mutual envy of the living.

To conclude, there is nothing in this whole discourse, nor in that I writ before of the same subject in Latin, as far as I can perceive, contrary either to the Word of God or to good manners; or to the disturbance of the public tranquillity. Therefore I think it may be profitably printed, and more profitably taught in the universities, in case they also think so to whom the judgment of the same belongeth. For seeing the universities are the fountains of civil and moral doctrine, from whence the preachers and the gentry, drawing such water as they find, use to sprinkle the same (both from the pulpit and in their conversation) upon the people, there ought certainly to be great care taken to have it pure, both from the venom of heathen politicians and from the incantation of deceiving spirits. And by that means the most men, knowing their duties, will be the less subject to serve the ambition of a few discontented persons in their purposes against the state, and be the less grieved with the contributions necessary for their peace and defence; and the governors themselves have the less cause to maintain at the common charge any greater army than is necessary to make good the public liberty against the invasions and encroachments of foreign enemies.

And thus I have brought to an end my Discourse of Civil and Ecclesiastical Government, occasioned by the disorders of the present time, without partiality, without application, and without other design than to set before men's eyes the mutual relation between protection and obedience; of which the condition of human nature and the laws divine, both natural and positive, require an inviolable observation. And though in the revolution of states there can be no very good constellation for truths of this nature to be born under (as having an angry aspect from the dissolvers of an old government, and seeing but the backs of them that erect a new), yet I cannot think it will be condemned at this time either by the public judge of doctrine or by any that desires the continuance of public peace. And in this hope I return to my interrupted speculation of bodies natural, wherein, if God give me health to finish it, I hope the novelty will as much please as in the doctrine of this artificial body it useth to offend. For such truth as opposeth no man's profit nor pleasure is to all men welcome.

(From the conclusion of Leviathan.)

Pity and Indignation.

Pity is imagination or fiction of future calamity to ourselves, proceeding from the sense of another man's calamity. But when it lighteth on such as we think have not deserved the same, the compassion is greater, because then there appeareth more probability that the same may happen to us; for the evil that happeneth to an innocent man may happen to every man. But when we see a man suffer for great crimes, which we cannot easily think will fall upon ourselves, the pity is the less. And therefore men are apt to pity those whom they love; for whom they love they think worthy of good, and therefore not worthy of calamity. Thence it is also that men pity the vices of some persons at the first sight only, out of love to their aspect. The contrary of pity is hardness of heart, proceeding either from slowness of imagination, or some extreme great opinion of their own exemption from the like calamity, or from hatred of all or most men.

Indignation is that grief which consisteth in the conception of good success happening to them whom they think unworthy thereof. Seeing therefore men think all those unworthy whom they hate, they think them not only unworthy of the good-fortune they have, but also of their own virtues. And of all the passions of the mind, these two, indignation and pity, are most raised and increased by eloquence; for the aggravation of the calamity, and extenuation of the fault, augmenteth pity; and the extenuation of the worth of the person, together with the magnifying of his success, which are the parts of an orator, are able to turn these two passions into fury.

(From Human Nature.)

Emulation and Envy.

Emulation is grief arising from seeing one's self exceeded or excelled by his concurrent, together with hope to equal or exceed him in time to come, by his own ability. But envy is the same grief joined with pleasure conceived in the imagination of some ill-fortune that may befall him.

(From Human Nature.)

Laughter.

There is a passion that hath no name; but the sign of it is that distortion of the countenance which we call laughter, which is always joy: but what joy, what we think, and wherein we triumph when we laugh, is not hitherto declared by any. That it consisteth in wit, or, as they call it, in the jest, experience confuteth; for men laugh at mischances and indecencies, wherein there lieth no wit nor jest at all. And forasmuch as the same thing is no more ridiculous when it groweth stale or usual, whatsoever it be that moveth laughter, it must be new and unexpected. Men laugh often—especially such as are greedy of applause from everything they do well—at their own actions performed never so little beyond their own expectations; as also at their own jests: and in this case it is manifest that the passion of laughter proceedeth from a sudden conception of some ability in himself that laugheth. Also, men laugh at the infirmities of others by comparison wherewith their own abilities are set off and illustrated. Also men laugh at jests the wit whereof always consisteth in the elegant discovering and conveying to our minds some absurdity of another; and in this case also the passion of laughter proceedeth from the sudden imagination of our own odds and eminency; for what is else the recommending of ourselves to our own good opinion, by comparison with another man's infirmity or absurdity? For when a jest is broken upon ourselves, or friends, of whose dishonour we participate, we never laugh thereat. I may therefore conclude that the passion of laughter is nothing else but sudden glory arising from a sudden conception of some eminency in ourselves, by comparison with the infirmity of others, or with our own formerly; for men laugh at the follies of themselves past, when they come suddenly to remembrance, except they bring with them any present dishonour. It is no wonder, therefore, that men take heinously to be laughed at or derided—that is, triumphed over. Laughing without offence must be at absurdities and infirmities abstracted from persons, and when all the company may laugh together; for laughing to one's self putteth all the rest into jealousy and examination of themselves. Besides, it is vain-glory, and an argument of little worth, to think the infirmity of another sufficient matter for his triumph.

(From Human Nature.)

The Necessity of the Will.

The question is not, whether a man be a free agent, that is to say, whether he can write or forbear, speak or be silent, according to his will; but whether the will to write, and the will to forbear, come upon him according to his will, or according to anything else in his own power. I acknowledge this liberty, that I can do if I will; but to say, I can will if I will, I take to be an absurd speech.

[In answer to Bishop Bramhall's assertion, that the doctrine of free-will 'is the belief of all mankind, which we have not learned from our tutors, but is imprinted in our hearts by nature.']—It is true, very few have learned from tutors, that a man is not free to will; nor do they find it much in books. That they find in books, that which the poets chant in the theatres, and the shepherds on the mountains, that which the pastors teach in the churches, and the doctors in the universities, and that which the common people in the markets and all mankind in the whole world do assent unto, is the same that I assent unto—namely, that a man hath freedom to do if he will; but whether he hath freedom to will is a question which it seems neither the bishop nor they ever thought on. A wooden top that is lashed by the boys, and runs about sometimes to one wall, sometimes to another, sometimes spinning, sometimes hitting men on the shins, if it were sensible of its own motion, would think it proceeded from its own will, unless it felt what lashed it. And is a man any wiser when he runs to one place for a benefice, to another for a bargain, and troubles the world with writing errors and requiring answers, because he thinks he does it without other cause than his own will, and seeth not what are the lashings that cause that will?

(From Of Liberty and Necessity.)

On Precision in Language.

Seeing that truth consisteth in the right ordering of names in our affirmations, a man that seeketh precise truth had need to remember what every name he useth stands for, and to place it accordingly, or else he will find himself entangled in words as a bird in lime-twigs—the more he struggles, the more belimed. And therefore in geometry, which is the only science that it hath pleased God hitherto to bestow on mankind, men begin at settling the significations of their words; which settling of significations they call definitions, and place them in the beginning of their reckoning.

By this it appears how necessary it is for any man that aspires to true knowledge to examine the definitions of former authors; and either to correct them where they are negligently set down, or to make them himself. For the errors of definitions multiply themselves according as the reckoning proceeds, and lead men into absurdities, which at last they see, but cannot avoid without reckoning anew from the beginning, in which lies the foundation of their errors. From whence it happens that they which trust to books do as they that cast up many little sums into a greater, without considering whether those little sums were rightly cast up or not; and at last, finding the error visible, and not mistrusting their first grounds, know not which way to clear themselves, but spend time in fluttering over their books, as birds that, entering by the chimney, flutter at the false light of a glass window, for want of wit to consider which way they came in. So that in the right definition of names lies the first use of speech, which is the acquisition of science, and in wrong or no definitions lies the first abuse; from which proceed all false and senseless tenets, which make those men that take their instruction from the authority of books, and not from their own meditation, to be as much below the condition of ignorant men as men endued with true science are above it. For between true science and erroneous doctrines, ignorance is in the middle. Natural sense and imagination are not subject to absurdity. Nature itself cannot err; and as men abound in copiousness of language, so they become more wise or more mad than ordinary. Nor is it possible without letters for any man to become either excellently wise, or, unless his memory be hurt by disease or ill constitution of organs, excellently foolish. For words are wise men's counters—they do but reckon by them—but they are the money of fools, that value them by the authority of an Aristotle, a Cicero, or a Thomas, or any other doctor whatsoever, if but a man.

(From Leviathan.)

Cognate is the famous saying, 'Words are wise men's counters, they do but reckon by them; but they are the money of fools.' A very short specimen of Hobbes's poetry may suffice. His translation of the Iliad begins thus:

O Goddess, sing what woe the discontent
Of Thetis' son brought to the Greeks; what souls
Of heroes down to Erebus it sent,
Leaving their bodies unto dogs and fowls;
Whilst the two princes of the army strove,
King Agamemnon and Achilles stout.
That so it should be was the will of Jove,
But who was he that made them first fall out?
Apollo; who, incensed by the wrong
To his priest Chryses by Atreides done,
Sent a great pestilence the Greeks among;
Apace they died and remedy was none.

The standard edition of Hobbes is that by Sir W. Molesworth (16 vols. 1839-46); A. R. Waller edited Leviathan in 1904, and W. G. Pogson Smith in 1909. See monographs by Prof. Croon Robertson (1886), Sir Leslie Stephen (1904), A. E. Taylor (1909), and F. Tönnies (3rd ed. 1928).

Sir Robert Filmer (1590?-1653) is for all time the classical representative—in England, if not for all the world—of the extreme theory of the divine right of kings. One finds him referred to in this capacity where one least expects it—in Gustave Flaubert's Bouvard et Pécuchet, for example. He was the son of a Kentish knight, and was born at East Sutton, and studied at Cambridge. He published a series of political treatises in favour of extreme or unlimited monarchical power. The first of these seems to have appeared in 1646, and the latest and most celebrated, the Patriarcha, in 1680. The germ of his theory is the proposition that the father of a family is the divinely ordained type of a ruler, and that his power is absolute. Accordingly, Filmer taught, a king's acts should be subject to no check or control whatsoever; his will is the only right source of law. Hence he is not in any sense answerable to his subjects for his doings; for them either to depose him or even to criticise his conduct is criminal and immoral. His argument was answered by Algernon Sidney and by John Locke, who says that so much 'glib nonsense was never put together in well-sounding English.' It cannot certainly be said that the ability of Filmer's statement covers the monstrosity of his thesis. But Dr Gairdner holds that his view of English constitutional history is more correct than that of his chief opponents, and that his fundamental doctrine is not more absurd than Rousseau's of a social compact. And it should be remembered to his credit that, unlike many of his contemporaries who held similar views of government, he protested against the abominations of the witch mania. The following is part of the argument of the Patriarcha:

If any desire the direction of the New Testament, he may find our Saviour limiting and distinguishing royal power, by giving to Cæsar those things that were Cæsar's, and to God those things that were God's. Obediendum est in quibus mandatum Dei non impeditur. We must obey where the commandment of God is not hindered; there is no other law but God's law to hinder our obedience. . . .

When the Jews asked our blessed Saviour whether they should pay tribute, he did not first demand what the law of the land was, or whether there was any statute against it, nor enquired whether the tribute were given by consent of the people, nor advised them to stay their payment till they should grant it; he did no more but look upon the superscription, and concluded, This image you say is Cæsar's, therefore give it to Cæsar. Nor must it here be said that Christ taught this lesson only to the conquered Jews, for in this he gave direction for all nations, who are bound as much in obedience to their lawful kings as to any conqueror or usurper whatsoever.

Whereas being subject to the higher powers, some have strained these words to signify the laws of the land, or else to mean the highest power, as well aristocratical and democratical as regal: it seems St Paul looked for such interpretation, and therefore thought fit to be his own expositor, and to let it be known that by power he understood a monarch that carried a sword: Wilt thou not be afraid of the power? that is, the ruler that carrieth the sword, for he is the minister of God to thee . . . for he beareth not the sword in vain. It is not the law that is the minister of God, or that carries the sword, but the ruler or magistrate; so they that say the law governs the kingdom, may as well say that the carpenters rule builds an house, and not the carpenter; for the law is but the rule or instrument of the ruler. And St Paul concludes, for this cause pay you tribute also, for they are God's ministers attending continually upon this very thing. Render therefore tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom. He doth not say, give as a gift to God's minister; but ἀπόδοτε, render or restore tribute, as a due. Also St Peter doth most clearly expound this place of St Paul, where he saith, Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man, for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him. Here the very self-same word (supreme, or ὑπερέχουσας) which St Paul coupleth with power, St Peter conjoyneth with the king, βασιλεῖ ὡς ὑπερέχοντι, thereby to manifest that king and power are both one.

Robert Herrick.

One of the most exquisite of our lyrical poets is Robert Herrick, born in Cheapside, London, in August 1591; fifteen months later his father, a goldsmith, died of a fall from a window, not without suspicion of suicide. He was put to school probably at Westminster, and in 1607 was apprenticed to an uncle, also a goldsmith; but during 1613-20 he was at Cambridge, migrating in 1616 from St John's to Trinity Hall. Classical influences, especially of Martial, are to be traced in much of his work. He associated in London with the jovial spirits of the age. He 'quaffed the mighty bowl' with Ben Jonson, but could not, he tells us, 'thrive in frenzy' like rare Ben, who seems to have excelled all his 'fellow-computators' at the Mermaid in deep drinking as in high thinking. The recollection of these 'brave translunary scenes' inspired Herrick to this effect:

Ah Ben!
Say how or when
Shall we, thy guests,
Meet at those lyric feasts
Made at the Sun,
The Dog, the Triple Tunne?
Where we such clusters had
As made us nobly wild, not mad;
And yet each verse of thine
Out-did the meate, out-did the frolick wine.

My Ben!
Or come agen,
Or send to us
Thy wit's great over-plus.
But teach us yet
Wisely to husband it;
Lest we that tallent spend;
And having once brought to an end
That precious stock, the store
Of such a wit, the world sho'd have no more.

Having taken holy orders, he was presented by Charles I. in 1629 to the vicarage of Dean Prior, near Totnes, in Devonshire. After eighteen years' residence in this sequestered parish, he was ejected from his living by the storms of the Civil War, which, as Jeremy Taylor says, 'dashed the vessel of the Church and State all in pieces.' Whatever regret the poet may have felt on being turned adrift on the world, he could have experienced little on parting with his parishioners, for he describes them much as Crabbe does the natives of Suffolk, among whom he was cast, as a 'wild amphibious race,' rude 'almost as salvages,' and 'churlish as the seas.' Herrick gives us a glimpse of his own character:

Borne I was to meet with age,
And to walke life's pilgrimage:
Much I know of time is spent;
Tell I can't what's resident.
Howsoever, cares adue;
Ile have nought to say to you;

But Ile spend my comming houres
Drinking wine & crown'd with flowres.

This light and genial temperament would enable the poet to ride out the storm in composure. Many of his lighter pieces were written as early as 1610-12, a large proportion of them before 1629. Some of his pieces may have seen the light as early as 1635; in a miscellaneous collection—Wit's Recreations—without assignment of authorship, published in 1640, are sixty-two pieces that he subsequently included in Hesperides. About the time that he lost his vicarage Herrick appears to have published his works. His Noble Numbers, or Pious Pieces, are dated 1647; his Hesperides, or the Works, both Humane and Divine, of Robert Herrick, Esquire, 1648; and both came out in the same volume early in the latter year. The clerical prefix to his name seems now to have been abandoned, like the clerical habit, by the poet; and there are certainly many pieces in the second volume which, even in that lax age, could not be considered to become one ministering at the altar. Herrick lived in Westminster, and may have been supported or subsidised by the wealthy royalists; in 1662 he was restored to Dean Prior, and there he was buried on 15th October 1674. How he was received by the 'rude salvages,' or how he felt on quitting the gaieties of the capital to resume his clerical duties and seclusion, is not recorded; but, being over seventy, he may well have grown tired of canary sack and tavern jollities. He had an open eye for the pleasures of a country life, if we may judge from his works and the fondness with which he dwells on old English festivals and rural customs. Yet on the whole he wearied of the country, even 'loathed' Devonshire, and pined for the town and its pleasures. Though his rhymes were sometimes wild, he says his life was chaste, and he repented of his errors:

For those my unbaptized rhimes,
Writ in my wild unhallowed times,
For every sentence, clause, and word,
That's not inlaid with thee, (my Lord)
Forgive me, God, and blot each line
Out of my book that is not thine;
But if, 'mongst all, thou find'st here one
Worthy thy benediction,
That one of all the rest shall be
The glory of my work, and me.

The poet might have evinced the depth of his contrition by blotting out the unbaptised rhymes himself, or by not reprinting them; but the vanity of the author seems to have triumphed over the penitence of the Christian. The religious poems may have been written later than the least decorous verses, though we cannot be sure of it. Even in the secular section the arrangement is chaotic, and there is no chronological sequence whatever. There may be some slight significance in the fact that the 'Welcome to Sack' stands after the 'Farewell to Sack,' while the 'Welcome' seems the more heartly outcome, illustrates the more permanent temper. Though some of the religious pieces—'The Litany,' 'Jephthah's Daughter,' and 'A Thanksgiving,' for example—are masterpieces, most of the sacred poems are weak or formal. The special charm of Herrick lies in his secular poems; and his most secular poems are sheer paganism and epicureanism. Depth and passion are not his forte: in Sir Edmund Gosse's words, Herrick approaches the mysteries of life and death with 'airy frivolity, easy-going callousness of soul.' His careless gaiety and sensuousness are at least genuine, are his natural element; his pictures of English life are unforced, fresh, and natural; his love-poems are tender, seem heartfelt and natural, and reveal a real undertone of melancholy; the conceits and similes are sometimes overstrained, and the humour forced; but in sweetness of melody and in harmony of sound with sense Herrick has no equal amongst his Caroline contemporaries. Only his epigrams are poor and gross and thoroughly unworthy of him.

The arrangement of the secular pieces is chaotic and incongruous, offering to us a medley of poems to friends, amatory poems, epigrams, fairy fancies, odes, and short poems on all manner of subjects. Some of them are so difficult to harmonise with the devotional vein of his sacred pieces, even if we conceive the author a man of very varied moods, that it has been argued the sacred poems were in time of writing separated by a quarter of a century from his less decorous ones. But they were all published together.

Herrick's poems lay neglected for many years, were republished at the very end of the eighteenth century, but were hardly re-established in general esteem till well on in the nineteenth century; many of his shorter lyrics are now known to everybody, and some of them have been set to modern music. 'Cherry Ripe' (the idea and words of which are partly Campion's—see page 401) and 'Gather ye Rose-buds while ye may' delightfully combine playful fancy and natural feeling. Those 'To Blossoms,' 'To Daffodils,' and 'To Primroses' have even a touch of pathos that wins its way to the heart. Other gems are 'To Anthea,' 'The Mad Maid's Song,' 'The Night-piece to Julia' ('Her eyes the glow-worm lend thee'), and 'To Electra' (''Tis evening, my sweet'). Shakespeare and Jonson had scattered such delicate fancies and snatches of lyrical melody among their plays and masques; and Herrick may have been directly influenced by the songs of Marlowe, Greene, and Fletcher. It has been debated whether he formed himself after any classical models. There is in his songs and anacreontics an unforced gaiety and natural tenderness that show he wrote chiefly from the spontaneous impulses of his own thoroughly artistic, pleasure-loving temperament. Herrick's choice of words, when he is in his happiest vein, is perfect; his versification is harmony itself. His verses bound and flow like some exquisite lively melody that echoes nature by wood and dell, and presents new beauties at every turn and winding. The strain is short and sometimes fantastic; but the notes linger in the mind, and take their place for ever in the memory.

Swinburne pointed out that the first great age of lyric poetry in England was the one great age of our dramatic poetry, but that the lyric school advanced as the dramatic school declined; 'the lyrical record that begins with the author of Euphues and Endymion grows fuller if not brighter through a whole series of constellations till it culminates in the crowning star of Herrick,' whose master was undoubtedly Marlowe. The last of his line, Herrick is the first of English song-writers; 'he lives simply by virtue of his songs; his more ambitious or pretentious lyrics are merely magnified and prolonged and elaborated songs. Elegy or litany, epicede or epithalamium, his work is always a song-writer's: nothing more but nothing less than the work of the greatest song-writer ever born of English race.' 'Ye have been fresh and green' is a sweeter and better song than 'Gather ye Rose-buds'; 'The Mad Maid's Song' can only be compared with William Blake's poems. Yet Herrick has his 'brutal blemishes,' and seems to have deliberately relieved the monotony of 'spices and flowers, condiments and kisses,' by admitting rank and intolerable odours. Though his 'sacred verse at its worst is as offensive as his secular verse at its worst,' 'neither Herbert nor Crashaw could have bettered'—

We see Him come and know Him ours,
Who with His sunshine and His showers
Turns all the patient ground to flowers.

To Meadows.

Ye have been fresh and green,
Ye have been fill'd with flowers;
And ye the walks have been
Where maids have spent their hours.

You have beheld how they
With wicker arks did come,
To kiss and beare away
The richer couclips home.

Y'ave heard them sweetly sing,
And seen them in a round;
Each virgin, like a spring,
With hony-suckles crown'd.

But now, we see none here,
Whose silv'rie feet did tread,
And with dishevell'd haire
Adorn'd this smoother mead.

Like unthrifts, having spent
Your stock, and needy grown,
Y'are left here to lament
Your poore estates alone.

To Blossoms.

Faire pledges of a fruitfull tree,
 Why do yee fall so fast?
 Your date is not so past,
 But you may stay yet here a while,
 To blush and gently smile,
 And go at last.

What! were yee borne to be
 An houre or half's delight,
 And so to bid goodnight?
 'Twas pitie nature brought yee forth
 Meerly to shew your worth,
 And lose you quite.

ROBERT HERRICK.

From Frontispiece to the Hesperides (1648).

But you are lovely leaves, where we
 May read how soon things have
 Their end, though ne'r so brave:
 And after they have shewn their pride,
 Like you awhile, they glide
 Into the grave.

To Daffodils.

Faire daffadills, we weep to see
 You haste away so soone;
 As yet the early-rising sun
 Has not attained his noone:
 Stay, stay,
 Untill the hasting day

Has run

But to the even-song;
 And having prayd together, we
 Will go with you along.

We have short time to stay, as you:
 We have as short a spring;
 As quick a growth to meet decay,
 As you, or anything:
 We die,
 As your hours doe; and drie
 Away
 Like to the summers raine,
 Or as the pearles of mornings dew,
 Ne'r to be found againe.

To the Virgins, to make much of their Time.

Gather ye rose-buds while ye may,
 Old Time is still a-flying,
 And this same flower that smiles to-day,
 To-morrow will be dying.

The glorious lamp of heaven, the sun,
 The higher he's a-getting,
 The sooner will his race be run,
 And neerer he's to setting.

That age is best which is the first,
 When youth and blood are warmer;
 But, being spent, the worse, and worst
 Times, still succeed the former.

Then be not coy, but use your time,
 And while ye may, goe marry;
 For, having lost but once your prime,
 You may for ever tarry.

To Anthea, who may command him any thing.

Bid me to live, and I will live
 Thy Protestant to be:
 Or bid me love, and I will give
 A loving heart to thee.

A heart as soft, a heart as kind,
 A heart as sound and free,
 As in the whole world thou canst find,
 That heart Ile give to thee.

Bid that heart stay, and it will stay,
 To honour thy decree:
 Or bid it languish quite away,
 And 't shall doe so for thee.

Bid me to weep, and I will weep,
 While I have eyes to see:
 And having none, yet I will keep
 A heart to weep for thee.

Bid me despaire, and Ile despaire,
 Under that cypresse tree:
 Or bid me die, and I will dare
 E'en death, to die for thee.

Thou art my life, my love, my heart,
 The very eyes of me:
 And hast command of every part,
 To live and die for thee.

Cherry Ripe.

Cherrie-ripe, ripe, ripe, I cry,
Full and faire ones—come and buy.
If so be you ask me where
They doe grow?—I answer: There,
Where my Julia's lips doe smile;
There's the land, or cherry-ile;
Whose plantations fully shew
All the yeere where cherries grow.

The Rock of Rubies and the Quarrie of Pearls.

Some ask'd me where the rubies grew,
And nothing did I say,
But with my finger pointed to
The lips of Julia.
Some asked how pearls did grow, and where;
Then spake I to my girle,
To part her lips, and shew'd them there
The quarrelets of pearl.

Upon Julia's Recovery.

Droop, droop no more, or hang the head,
Ye roses almost wither'd;
New strength and newer purple get
Each here declining violet;
O primroses! let this day be
A resurrection unto ye;
And to all flowers ally'd in blood,
Or sworn to that sweet sister-hood,
For health on Julia's cheek hath shed
Clarret and creame commingled;
And these her lips doe now appeare
As beames of coral, but more cleare.

The Bag of the Bee.

About the sweet bag of a bee,
Two Cupids fell at odds;
And whose the pretty prize shu'd be,
They vow'd to ask the gods.
Which Venus hearing, thither came,
And for their boldness stript them;
And taking thence from each his flame,
With rods of mirtle whipt them.
Which done, to still their wanton cries,
When quiet grown sh'ad seen them,
She kist and wip'd their dove-like eyes,
And gave the bag between them.

The Kiss—A Dialogue.

1. Among thy fancies, tell me this:
What is the thing we call a kisse?
2. I shall resolve ye, what it is.
It is a creature born and bred
Between the lips, (all cherrie red,)
By love and warme desires fed;
Chor.—And makes more soft the bridal bed.
2. It is an active flame, that flies
First to the babies of the eyes,
And charms them there with lullabies;
Chor.—And stils the bride too, when she cries.
2. Then to the chin, the cheek, the eare
It frisks and flies: now here, now there;
'Tis now farre off, and then 'tis nere;
Chor.—And here, and there, and every where.

1. Has it a speaking virtue?—2. Yes.
1. How speaks it, say?—2. Do you but this,
Part your joyn'd lips, then speaks your kisse;
Chor.—And this loves sweetest language is.
1. Has it a body?—2. Ay, and wings,
With thousand rare encolourings;
And as it flies, it gently sings,
Chor.—Love honie yeelds, but never stings.

Corinna's going a-Maying.

Get up, get up for shame, the blooming morne
Upon her wings presents the god unshorne.
See how Aurora throws her fair
Fresh-quilted colours through the aire;
Get up, sweet slug-a-bed, and see
The dew bespangling herbe and tree.
Each flower has wept, and bow'd toward the east,
Above an houre since, yet you are not drest,
Nay! not so much as out of bed?
When all the birds have mattens said,
And sung their thankfull hymnes: 'tis sin,
Nay, profanation to keep in,
When as a thousand virgins on this day,
Spring sooner than the lark to fetch in May.
Rise, and put on your foliage, and be seene
To come forth, like the spring-time, fresh and greene,
And sweet as Flora. Take no care
For jewels for your gowne or haire;
Fear not, the leaves will strew
Gemm in abundance upon you;
Besides, the childhood of the day has kept,
Against you come, some orient pearls unwept.
Come, and receive them while the light
Hangs on the dew-locks of the night:
And Titan on the eastern hill
Retires himselfe, or else stands still
Till you come forth. Wash, dresse, be briefe in praying;
Few beads are best when once we goe a-Maying.

Come, my Corinna, come; and, comming, mark
How each field turns a street, each street a parke
Made green, and trimm'd with trees; see how Devotion gives each house a bough,
Or branch; each porch, each doore, ere this,
An arke, a tabernacle is,
Made up of white thorn neatly enterwove;
As if here were those cooler shades of love.
Can such delights be in the street
And open fields, and we not see 't?
Come, we'll abroad, and let's obay
The proclamation made for May:
And sin no more, as we have done, by staying,
But, my Corinna, come, let's goe a-Maying.
There's not a budding boy or girle, this day,
But is got up, and gone to bring in May.
A deale of youth, ere this, is come
Back, and with white-thorn laden home.
Some have despatcht their cakes and creame
Before that we have left to dreame;
And some have wept, and woo'd, and plighted troth,
And chose their priest, ere we can cast off sloth:
Many a green-gown has been given;
Many a kisse, both odde and even;
Many a glance too has been sent
From out the eye, love's firmament;

Many a jest told of the keyes betraying
This night, and locks pickt ; yet w'are not a-Maying.

Come, let us goe, while we are in our prime,
And take the harmlesse follie of the time.

We shall grow old apace, and die
Before we know our liberty.
Our life is short, and our dayes run
As fast away as do's the sunne ;

And as a vapour, or a drop of raine
Once lost, can ne'er be found againe ;
So when or you or I are made
A fable, song, or fleeting shade ;
All love, all liking, all delight
Lies drown'd with us in endlesse night.
Then, while time serves, and we are but decaying,
Come, my Corinna, come, let's goe a-Maying.

Twelfth-night, or King and Queen.

Now, now the mirth comes,
With the cake full of plums,
Where beane's the king of the sport here ;
Beside we must know,
The pea also
Must revel as queene in the court here.

Begin then to chuse,
(This night as ye use)
Who shall for the present delight here ;
Be a king by the lot,
And who shall not
Be Twelwe-day queene for the night here.

Which knowne, let us make
Joy-sops with the cake ;
And let not a man then be seen here,
Who unurg'd will not drinke,
To the base from the brink,
A health to the king and the queene here.

Next crown the bowle full
With gentle lamb's-wooll ;
Add sugar, nutmeg, and ginger,
With store of ale, too ;
And thus ye must doe
To make the wassaile a swinger.

Give them to the king
And queene wassailing ;
And though with ale ye be wet here ;
Yet part ye from hence,
As free from offence,
As when ye innocent met here.

The Bellman.

Along the dark and silent night,
With my lantern and my light,
And the tinkling of my bell,
Thus I walk, and thus I tell :
Death and dreadfulness call on
To the gen'rall session ;
To whose dismall bare, we there
All accompts must come to cleere.
Scores of sins w'ave made here, many ;
Wip't out few (God knowes) if any.
Rise, ye debtors, then, and fall
To make payment while I call.

Ponder this, when I am gone ;
By the clock 'tis almost one.

Upon a Child that Died.

Here she lies, a pretty bud,
Lately made of flesh and blood,
Who as soone fell fast asleep,
As her little eyes did peep.
Give her strewings, but not stir
The earth that lightly covers her.

Epitaph upon a Child.

Virgins promis'd, when I dy'd,
That they wo'd each primrose-tide
Duely morne and ev'ning come,
And with flowers dresse my tomb :
Having promis'd, pay your debts,
Maids, and here strew violets.

To finde God.

Weigh me the fire ; or canst thou find
A way to measure out the wind ;
Distinguish all those floods that are
Mixt in the watrie theater ;
And taste thou them as saltlesse there,
As in their channell first they were.
Tell me the people that do keep
Within the kingdomes of the deep ;
Or fetch me back that cloud again,
Beshiver'd into seeds of raine.
Tell me the motes, dusts, sands, and speares
Of corn, when summer shakes his ears ;
Shew me that world of starres, and whence
They noiselesse spill their influence :
This if thou canst, then shew me Him
That rides the glorious cherubim.

To Primroses, filled with Morning Dew.

Why doe ye weep, sweet babes ? Can tears
Speak grieve in you,
Who were but borne
Just as the modest morne
Teem'd her refreshing dew ?
Alas ! you have not known that shower
That marres a flower,
Nor felt th' unkind
Breath of a blasting wind ;
Nor are ye worne with yeares,
Or warpt as we,
Who think it strange to see
Such pretty flowers, like to orphans young,
To speak by teares before ye have a tongue.

Speak, whimp'ring younglings, and make known
The reason why
Ye droop and weep ;
Is it for want of sleep,
Or childish lullabie ?
Or that ye have not seen as yet
The violet ?
Or brought a kisse
From that sweet-heart to this ?
No, no ; this sorrow shewn
By your teares shed,
Would have this lecture read :

That things of greatest, so of meanest worth,
Conceiv'd with grief are, and with teares brought forth.

Grace for a Child.

Here a little child I stand,
Heaving up my either hand;
Cold as paddocks though they be,
Here I lift them up to Thee,
For a benizon to fall
On our meat, and on us all. Amen.

A Thanksgiving for his House.

Lord, Thou hast given me a cell
Wherein to dwell;
A little house, whose humble roof
Is weatherproof;
Under the spars of which I lie
Both soft and drie.
Where Thou my chamber for to ward
Hast set a guard
Of harmlesse thoughts, to watch and keep Me while I sleep.
Low is my porch, as is my fate,
Both void of state;
And yet the threshold of my doore
Is worn by th' poore,
Who hither come, and freely get
Good words or meat.
Like as my parlour, so my hall,
And kitchen's small;
A little butterie, and therein
A little byn,
Which keeps my little loafe of bread
Unchipt, unflead.
Some brittle sticks of thorne or briar
Make me a fire,
Close by whose living coale I sit,
And glow like it.
Lord, I confesse, too, when I dine,
The pulse is Thine,
And all those other bits that bee
There plac'd by Thee.
The worts, the purslain, and the messe
Of water-cresse,
Which of Thy kindness Thou hast sent:
And my content
Makes those, and my beloved beet
To be more sweet.
'Tis Thou that crown'st my glittering hearth
With guiltlesse mirth;
And giv'st me wassail bowles to drink,
Spic'd to the brink.
Lord, 'tis Thy plenty-dropping hand
That soiles my land: manures
And giv'st me for my bushell sowne
Twice ten for one:
Thou mak'st my teeming hen to lay
Her egg each day:
Besides my healthfull ewes to beare
Me twins each yeare:
The while the conduits of my kine
Run creame (for wine).
All these, and better, Thou dost send
Me to this end:
That I should render for my part
A thankful heart.

Which, fir'd with incense, I resigne
As wholly Thine:
But the acceptance—that must be,
My Christ, by Thee.

His Litanie, to the Holy Spirit.

In the houre of my distresse,
When temptations me oppresse,
And when I my sins confesse,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When I lie within my bed,
Sick in heart and sick in head,
And with doubts discomforted,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the house doth sigh and weep,
And the world is drown'd in sleep,
Yet mine eyes the watch do keep;
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the artlesse doctor sees
No one hope, but of his fees,
And his skill runs on the lees;
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When his potion and his pill,
Has, or none, or little skill,
Meet for nothing, but to kill;
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the passing-bell doth tole,
And the furies in a shole
Come to fright a parting soule;
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the tapers now burne blew,
And the comforters are few,
And that number more then true;
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the priest his last hath praid,
And I nod to what is said,
'Cause my speech is now decayd;
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When (God knowes) I'm tost about,
Either with despaire, or doubt;
Yet before the glasse be out,
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the tempter me pursu'th
With the sins of all my youth,
And halfe damns me with untruth;
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the flames and hellish cries
Fright mine eares, and fright mine eyes,
And all terrors me surprize;
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

When the Judgment is reveal'd,
And that open'd which was seal'd,
When to thee I have appeal'd;
Sweet Spirit, comfort me!

Francis Quarles (1592-1644) wrote more like a divine or contemplative recluse than a busy man of the world who held various public posts. Born at the manor-house of Stewards, Romford, he took his B.A. in 1608 from Christ's College, Cambridge, and then entered Lincoln's Inn. He was cup-bearer at Heidelberg to Elizabeth of Bohemia 1613-19, secretary to Archbishop Ussher, and chronologer from 1639 to the city of London. He espoused the cause of Charles I., and was so harassed by the Roundhead party, who injured his property and plundered him of his books and rare manuscripts, that his death was attributed to the affliction and ill-health caused by these disasters. Notwithstanding his loyalty, the works of Quarles have a tinge of Puritanism and ascetic piety that might have mollified the rage of his persecutors. His poems include A Feast for Wormes set forth in a Poeme of the History of Jonah (1620); Hadassa: History of Queene Ester (1621); Job Militant (1624); Sions Sonets (1625); Argalus and Parthenia (1629, on the story from Sidney's Arcadia); Historie of Samson (1631); Divine Emblems (1635); and Hieroglyphikes of the Life of Man (1638), the two last quaintly illustrated. The Emblems were wonderfully popular, but rather with the people than the cultured or well-born. Even in his own time Anthony Wood sneered at him, though a staunch royalist, as 'an old puritanicall poet . . . the sometime darling of our plebeian judgments.' After the Restoration, when things sacred and serious were usually neglected or made the subject of ribald jests, Quarles seems to have been entirely lost to the public. Even Pope, who had he really studied him, could not have overlooked his vivid fancy and point, notices only his bathos and absurdity, and says, referring to the engraved emblems, that he 'is saved by beauties not his own.' The more catholic taste of modern times has, not without recalcitrants, admitted the divine emblemist into the 'laurelled fraternity of poets,' where, if he does not occupy a conspicuous place, he is at least sure of his due measure of attention. Charles Lamb hesitated whether Quarles was not to be preferred to Wither, and did not hesitate to rank him as the wittier of the two. Thoreau said he 'uses language sometimes as greatly as Shakespeare.' Yet he is not quoted or discussed at all in such a representative work as Ward's English Poets. 'Emblems,' combining the graphic and poetic arts, to inculcate lessons of morality and religion, had been tried with success by Henry Peacham (c. 1576-1643), author of the Compleat Gentleman, by Wither, and by others. Quarles found his model in Hermann Hugo (1588-1629), a Jesuit of Brussels, who was almoner to Spinola on the battlefield, and died of plague in the Spanish camp. From Hugo's Pia Desideria Quarles directly copied a great part of his prints and mottoes, and inevitably followed the thought to some extent, in the later books mainly paraphrasing Hugo; but the best in his verses is all his own. His style is that of his age—studded with conceits, often extravagant or ridiculous. But he shows real power: his epigrammatic union of wit and devotion made him a precursor of Young and his Night Thoughts; and 'Why dost thou hide thy lovely face?' long regarded as Rochester's masterpiece (see page 781), is really Quarles's.

Flowers.

As when a lady, walking Flora's bowre,
Picks here a pinke, and there a gillyflowre,
Now plucks a violet from her purple bed,
And then a primrose, the yeere's maiden-head,
There nips the bryer, here the lover's pansy,
Shifting her dainty pleasures with her fancy,
This on her arms, and that she lists to wear
Upon the borders of her curious haire;
At length a rose-bud, passing all the rest,
She plucks, and bosoms in her lilly brest.

The Shortness of Life.

And what 's a Life?—a weary pilgrimage,
Whose glory in one day doth fill the stage
With childhood, manhood, and decrepit age.

And what 's a life?—the flourishing array
Of the proud summer meadow, which to day
Wears her green plush, and is to morrow hay.

Reade on this diall how the shades devour
My short-liv'd winter's day! houre eats up houre;
Alas, the totall 's but from eight to foure.

Behold these lilies (which thy hands have made
Fair copies of my life, and open laid
To view) how soon they droop, how soon they fade.

Shade not that diall, night will blind too soon ;
 My nonag'd day already points to noon ;
 How simple is my suit ! how small my boon !
 Nor do I beg this slender inch, to while
 The time away, or falsely to beguile
 My thoughts with joy : here 's nothing worth a smile.

Mors Tua.

Can he be faire that withers at a blast ?
 Or he be strong that avery breath can cast ?
 Can he be wise that knowes not how to live ?
 Or he be rich that nothing hath to give ?
 Can he be young that 's feeble, weake, and wan ?
 So faire, strong, wise, so rich, so young is man.
 So faire is man, that Death (a parting blast)
 Blasts his fair flower, and makes him earth at last ;
 So strong is man, that with a gasping breath
 He totters, and bequeathes his strength to Death ;
 So wise is man, that if with Death he strive,
 His wisdom cannot teach him how to live ;
 So rich is man, that (all his debts being paid)
 His wealth 's the winding-sheet wherein he 's laid ;
 So young is man, that, broke with care and sorrow,
 He 's old enough to-day to dye to-morrow :
 Why brag'st thou, then, thou worm of five foot long ?
 Th'art neither fair, nor strong, nor wise, nor rich, nor young.
 (From A Feast for Wormes.)

The Vanity of the World.

False world, thou ly'st ; thou canst not lend
 The least delight :
 Thy favours cannot gain a Friend,
 They are so slight :
 Thy morning pleasures make an end
 To please at night :
 Poore are the wants that thou supply'st,
 And yet thou vaunt'st, and yet thou vy'st [ly'st.
 With heaven ; fond earth, thou boasts ; false world, thou
 Thy babbling tongue tels golden tales
 Of endlesse treasure ;
 Thy bountie offers easie sales
 Of lasting pleasure ;
 Thou ask'st the conscience what she ails,
 And swear'st to ease her :
 There 's none can want where thou supply'st :
 There 's none can give where thou deny'st.
 Alas ! fond world, thou boasts ; false world, thou ly'st.
 What well-advised eare regards
 What earth can say ?
 Thy words are gold, but thy rewards
 Are painted clay :
 Thy cunning can but pack the cards,
 Thou canst not play :
 Thy game at weakest, still thou vy'st ;
 If seen, and then revy'd, deny'st : re-vied
 Thou art not what thou seem'st ; false world, thou ly'st.
 Thy tinsil bosome seems a mint
 Of new-coined treasure ;
 A paradise, that has no stint,
 No change, no measure ;
 A painted cask, but nothing in 't,
 Nor wealth, nor pleasure :
 Vain earth ! that falsely thus comply'st
 With man ; vain man ! that thus rely'st
 On earth ; vain man, thou dot'st ; vain earth, thou ly'st.

What mean dull souls, in this high measure,
 To haberdash
 In earth's base wares, whose greatest treasure
 Is drosse and trash ?
 The height of whose inchaunting pleasure
 Is but a flash ?
 Are these the goods that thou supply'st
 Us mortalls with ? Are these the high'st ?
 Can these bring cordiall peace ? false world, thou ly'st.

Delight in God only.

I love—and have some cause to love—the earth :
 She is my Maker's creature, therefore good :
 She is my mother, for she gave me birth ;
 She is my tender nurse, she gives me food ;
 But what 's a creature, Lord, compared with Thee ?
 Or what 's my mother or my nurse to me ?

I love the aire : her dainty sweets refresh
 My drooping soul, and to new sweets invite me ;
 Her shrill-mouthed quire sustains me with their flesh,
 And with their polyphonian notes delight me :
 But what 's the aire or all the sweets that she
 Can blesse my soul withall compared to Thee ?

I love the sea : she is my fellow-creature,
 My carefull purveyor ; she provides me store :
 She walls me round ; she makes my diet greater ;
 She wafts my treasure from a forrein shore :
 But, Lord of oceans, when compared with Thee,
 What is the ocean or her wealth to me ?

To heaven's high citie I direct my journey,
 Whose spangled suburbs entertain mine eye ;
 Mine eye, by contemplation's great attorney,
 Transcends the crystall pavement of the skie :
 But what is heaven, great God, compared to Thee ?
 Without thy presence, heaven 's no heaven to me.

Without thy presence earth gives no refection ;
 Without thy presence sea affords no treasure ;
 Without thy presence air 's a rank infection ;
 Without thy presence heaven it self 's no pleasure :
 If not possessed, if not enjoyed in Thee,
 What 's earth, or sea, or air, or heaven to me ?

The highest honours that the world can boast,
 Are subjects farre too low for my desire ;
 The brightest beams of glory are at most
 But dying sparkles of thy living fire :
 The loudest flames that earth can kindle, be
 But nightly glow-worms, if compared to Thee.

Without thy presence, wealth are bags of cares ;
 Wisdome but folly ; joy, disquiet-sadnesse ;
 Friendship is treason, and delights are snares ;
 Pleasures but pain, and mirth but pleasing madnesse ;
 Without thee, Lord, things be not what they be,
 Nor have they being, when compared with Thee.

In having all things, and not Thee, what have I ?
 Not having Thee, what have my labours got ?
 Let me enjoy but Thee, what farther crave I ?
 And having Thee alone, what have I not ?
 I wish nor sea nor land ; nor would I be
 Possesst of heaven, heaven unpossest of Thee.

Decay of Life.

The day grows old, the low-pitcht lamp hath made
 No lesse than treble shade,
 And the descending damp doth now prepare
 To uncurl bright Titan's hair ;
 Whose western wardrobe now begins to unfold
 Her purples, fringed with gold,
 To cloath his evening glory, when the alarms
 Of rest shall call to rest in restlesse Thetis' arms.

Nature now calls to supper, to refresh
 The spirits of all flesh ;
 The toyling plowman drives his thirsty teams,
 To taste the slippery streams :
 The droyling swineheard knocks away, and feasts
 His hungry whining guests :
 The boxbill ouzle and the dappled thrush
 Like hungry rivals meet at their beloved bush.

And now the cold autumnal dewes are seen
 To cobweb every green ;
 And by the low shorn rowins doth appear aftermath
 The fast declining year :
 The saplesse branches doff their summer suits
 And wain their winter fruits ; garner
 And stormy blasts have forced the quaking trees
 To wrap their trembling limbs in suits of mossy freez.
 (From the Hieroglyphikes.)

In an elegy on a friend he has these fine lines :

No azure dapples my bedarkened skies ;
 My passion has no April in her eyes.

Henry King (1592-1669), born at Worminghall, Bucks, and educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, was the son of a Bishop of London, and himself in 1642 became Bishop of Chichester. He was expelled by the Parliament in 1643 ; his estates were sequestrated and his library seized ; but he was reinstated at the Restoration. His poems are largely elegiac—on his wife, Prince Henry, King Charles I. and 'murdered' Royalists, Gustavus Adolphus, 'my ever desired friend Dr Donne,' 'my dead friend Ben Jonson,' and other less-known intimates and contemporaries. There are also translations of the Psalms and devotional poems. His Poems and Psalms, edited by Archdeacon Hannah (1843), was but a selection ; the collected poems were edited by L. Mason (1915), John Sparrow (1925).

The Dirge.

What is th' existence of mans life
 But open war, or slumber'd strife ?
 Where sickness to his sense presents
 The combat of the elements :
 And never feels a perfect peace
 Till deaths cold hand signs his release.

It is a storm, where the hot blood
 Out-vies in rage the boyling flood ;
 And each loud passion of the mind
 Is like a furious gust of wind,
 Which beats his bark with many a wave,
 Till he casts anchor in the grave.

It is a flower, which buds, and growes,
 And withers as the leaves disclose ;
 Whose spring and fall faint seasons keep,
 Like fits of waking before sleep :
 Then shrinks into that fatal mold
 Where its first being was enroll'd.

It is a dream, whose seeming truth
 Is moraliz'd in age and youth ;
 Where all the comforts he can share,
 As wandring as his fancies are ;
 Till in a mist of dark decay
 The dreamer vanish quite away.

It is a diall, which points out
 The sun-set as it moves about ;
 And shadowes out in lines of night
 The subtile stages of times flight ;
 Till all obscuring earth hath laid
 The body in perpetual shade.

It is a weary enterlude
 Which doth short joyes, long woes include.
 The world the stage, the prologue tears,
 The acts vain hope and vary'd fears :
 The scene shuts up with loss of breath,
 And leaves no epilogue but death.

Some poems attributed to him were really by Quarles. The following little poem, printed and long accepted as his, appears also among the poems of Francis Beaumont, but is more in King's characteristic vein :

Sic Vita.

Like to the falling of a starre,
 Or as the flights of eagles are ;
 Or like the fresh springs gawdy hew,
 Or silver drops of morning dew ;
 Or like a wind that chafes the flood,
 Or bubbles which on water stood :
 Even such is man, whose borrow'd light
 Is streight call'd in, and paid to night.

The wind blowes out ; the bubble dies ;
 The spring entomb'd in autumn lies ;
 The dew dries up ; the starre is shot ;
 The flight is past ; and man forgot.

Thomas Carew (c. 1594-1639) was the fore-runner of a numerous class of poets—courtiers of a gay and gallant school, who to personal accomplishments, rank, and education united a taste and talent for the conventional poetry then most popular and cultivated. A taint of sensuality and irreligion often lurked under the flowery surface of their poetry. Carew was capable, indeed, of far higher things ; in him, as in Suckling, we see glimpses of real poetic gift, and he was much more careful of the form and finish of his verses than Suckling. Of Cornish ancestry, the younger son of Sir Matthew Carew, a master in Chancery, Carew was sent to Merton College, Oxford, and passed thence to the Middle Temple. He was sent to be with Sir Dudley Carleton in Florence and afterwards at The Hague ; he visited the French court with Lord Herbert of Cherbury ; and finally he became gentleman of the privy-chamber and sewer in ordinary to Charles I. His after-life was that of a courtier—witty, affable, accomplished, heedless, and epicurean. Clarendon says—charitably and hopefully—that he ‘died with the greatest remorse for that licence, and with the greatest manifestation of Christianity that his best friends could desire.’ His poems were not collected until 1640. His death is often dated 1639, but may have been much later.

The poems of Carew are short and occasional. The only exception is a masque, written by command of the king, entitled Cælum Britannicum. This is partly in prose; the lyrical pieces were set to music by Dr Henry Lawes, the poetical musician of that age; and the scenery was designed by Inigo Jones. Carew’s short amatory lyrics were exceedingly popular, and are now the only things of his that are read. Thirty or forty years later he would have fallen into the frigid style of the court poets after the Restoration; but at the time he wrote the passionate and imaginative vein of the Elizabethan period was not wholly exhausted. This main quality is a certain Rubens-like intensity and glow of colour. The ‘genial and warm tints’ of the elder muse still coloured the landscape, and these were reflected back by Carew, who forms a very interesting link between the Elizabethans and the age after himself. He came under the influence of Donne, and he abounds in extravagant conceits, even on grave elegiac subjects. In his Epitaph on the Daughter of Sir Thomas Wentworth he says:

And here the precious dust is laid,
Whose purely temper’d clay was made
So fine that it the guest betray’d.

Else the soul grew so fast within,
It broke the outward shell of sin,
And so was hatch’d a Cherubin.

So though a virgin, yet a Bride
To every grace, she justified
A chaste Polygamy, and died.

Archbishop Trench protested against Carew’s being grouped with Waller but below him: ‘he is immensely his superior,’ he thinks; ‘in many of Carew’s lighter pieces there is an underlying vein of earnestness which is wholly wanting in the other.’ Even those who deny him pathos or natural feeling admit him to have been at least a most accomplished writer of polished vers d’occasion. The following famous song, Edward FitzGerald said, is ‘exaggerated, like all in Charles’s time, but very beautiful.’ It was extensively imitated, answered, and argued out in similar strains, and even burlesqued: there is a long series of songs beginning ‘Ask me no more,’ ‘Tell me no more,’ ‘I tell you true,’ ‘I ask thee whence,’ and the like.

Song.

Ask me no more where Jove bestows,
When June is past, the fading rose?
For in your Beauty’s orient deep,
These flowers, as in their causes, sleep.

Ask me no more, whither do stray
The golden atoms of the day?
For in pure love heaven did prepare
Those powders to enrich your hair.

Ask me no more, whither doth haste
The Nightingale, when May is past?
For in your sweet dividing throat
She winters, and keeps warm her note.

Ask me no more, where those stars ’light
That downward fall in dead of night?
For in your eyes they sit, and there
Fixed become as in their sphere.

Ask me no more, if east or west
The Phoenix builds her spicy nest?
For unto you at last she flies,
And in your fragrant bosom dies.

The Compliment.

I do not love thee for that fair
Rich fan of thy most curious hair;
Though the wires thereof be drawn
Finer than the threads of lawn,
And are softer than the leaves
On which the subtle spinner weaves.

I do not love thee for those flowers
Growing on thy cheeks—Love’s bowers;
Though such cunning hath them spread,
None can part their white and red:
Love’s golden arrows thence are shot,
Yet for them I love thee not.

I do not love thee for those soft
Red coral lips I’ve kissed so oft;
Nor teeth of pearl, the double guard
To speech, whence music still is heard;
Though from those lips a kiss being taken,
Would Tyrants melt, and Death awaken.

I do not love thee, oh! my fairest,
For that richest, for that rarest
Silver pillar, which stands under
Thy round head, that globe of wonder;
Though that neck be whiter far
Than towers of polish’d ivory are.

I love not for those eyes, nor hair,
Nor cheeks, nor lips, nor teeth so rare;

Nor for thy hand nor foot so small;
But wouldst thou know, dear Sweet?—for All!

Song.

Would you know what’s soft? I dare
Not bring you to the down or air;
Nor to stars to shew what’s bright,
Nor to snow to teach you white.

Nor, if you would Music hear,
Call the Orbs to take your ear;
Nor to please your sense bring forth
Bruised Nard or what’s more worth.

Or on food were your thoughts placed,
Bring you Nectar, for a taste:
Would you have all these in one?
Name my Mistress, and ’tis done.

Mediocrity in Love Rejected.

Give me more Love, or more Disdain;
 The torrid or the frozen zone
 Bring equal ease unto my pain,
 The temperate affords me none:
 Either extreme, of love or hate,
 Is sweeter than a calm estate.

Give me a storm; if it be Love,
 Like Danae in that golden shower,
 I swim in pleasure; if it prove
 Disdain, that torrent will devour

THOMAS CAREW.

By permission, from the Portrait of 'Two Gentlemen' in the Royal Collection at Windsor.

My vulture hopes; and he's possessed
 Of Heaven that's but from Hell released.
 Then crown my joys or cure my pain;
 Give me more Love, or more Disdain.

Disdain Returned.

He that loves a rosy cheek,
 Or a coral lip admires,
 Or from starlike eyes doth seek
 Fuel to maintain his fires;
 As old Time makes these decay,
 So his flames must waste away.

But a smooth and steadfast mind,
 Gentle thoughts and calm desires;
 Hearts with equal love combined,
 Kindle never-dying fires.
 Where these are not, I despise
 Lovely cheeks, or lips, or eyes.

No tears, Celia, now shall win
 My resolved heart to return;
 I have search'd thy soul within,
 And find nought but pride and scorn;
 I have learn'd thy arts, and now
 Can disdain as much as thou.

Some Power, in my revenge, convey
 That Love to her I cast away.

The Spring.

Now that the Winter's gone, the Earth hath lost
 Her snow-white robes, and now no more the frost
 Candies the grass, or calls an icy cream
 Upon the silver lake or crystal stream;
 But the warm sun thaws the benumbed earth,
 And makes it tender; gives a sacred birth
 To the dead swallow; wakes in hollow tree
 The drowsy Cuckoo and the Humble-bee;
 Now do a choir of chirping minstrels sing,
 In triumph to the world, the youthful Spring.
 The valleys, hills, and woods, in rich array,
 Welcome the coming of the long'd-for May.

Now all things smile: only my Love doth lour,
 Nor hath the scalding noon-day Sun the power
 To melt that marble ice, which still doth hold
 Her heart congeal'd, and makes her pity cold.
 The ox, which lately did for shelter flie
 Into the stall, doth now securely lie
 In open field; and love no more is made
 By the fire-side, but in the cooler shade.
 Amyntas now doth by his Cloris sleep
 Under a Sycamore, and all things keep
 Time with the season: only she doth carry
 June in her eyes, in her heart January.

Carew's Poems (1640) have been edited by W. C. Hazlitt (1870), J. W. Ebsworth (1893), and Arthur Vincent ('Muses Library,' 1899).

William Strode (c. 1600-45), born near Plympton, Devon, from Westminster passed to Christ Church, Oxford, and became canon thereof and public orator, as well as doctor of divinity. His poems (with the tragi-comedy The Floating Island) were first edited by Bertram Dobell in 1907.

Opposite to Melancholy.

Return, my joys! and hither bring
 A tongue not made to speak, but sing,
 A jolly spleen, an inward feast;
 A causeless laugh without a jest;
 A face which gladness doth anoint;
 An arm for joy, flung out of joint;
 A sprightly gait that leaves no print,
 And makes a feather of a flint;
 A heart that's lighter than the air;
 An eye still dancing in its sphere;
 Strong mirth which nothing shall control;
 A body nimbler than a soul;
 Free wandering thoughts not tied to muse,
 Which, thinking all things, nothing choose,
 Which, ere we see them come, are gone:
 These life itself doth feed upon.
 Men take no care but only to be jolly;
 To be more wretched than we must, is folly.

Kisses.

My love and I for kisses played:
 She would keep stakes—I was content;
 But when I won, she would be paid;
 This made me ask her what she meant.
 'Pray, since I see,' quoth she, 'your wrangling vein,
 Take your own kisses; give me mine again.'

William Habington (1605-54) was born and lived at Hindlip Hall, Worcestershire, a house with more priest's holes than any other in England. His life presents few incidents, though he came of a race of Catholic conspirators. His father lay for six years in the Tower over Babington's conspiracy; his uncle was hanged for his share in the same plot. The poet's mother atoned in some measure for this disloyalty, for she is said to have been the writer of the famous letter to Lord Monteagle which averted the execution of the Gunpowder Plot. The poet was educated at St Omer's, but declined to become a Jesuit. About 1630-33 he married Lucy Herbert, youngest daughter of the first Lord Powis, whom he had celebrated under the name of Castara. His collected poems—also entitled Castara—were published in 1634-40, the volume consisting of 'The Mistress,' 'The Wife,' and 'The Holy Man.' These titles include each several copies of verses, and the same design was afterwards adopted by Cowley. The short life of the poet seems to have glided quietly away, cheered by the society and affection of his Castara. He had no stormy passions to agitate him, and no unruly imagination to control or subdue. His poetry is of the same unruffled description—placid, tender, and often elegant, but studded with conceits to show his wit and fancy. When he talks of meadows wearing a 'green plush,' of the fire of mutual love purifying an infected city, and of a luxurious feast so rich that heaven must have rained showers of sweetmeats, as if

Heaven were Blackfriars, and each star a confectioner—

we are astonished to find one who could ridicule the 'madness of quaint oaths' and the 'fine rhetoric of clothes' in the gallants of his day, fall into such absurd and tasteless puerilities. Habington had all the vices of the 'metaphysical' school, excepting its occasional and sometimes studied licentiousness. He tells us himself (in his preface) that 'if the innocence of a chaste muse shall be more acceptable, and weigh heavier in the balance of esteem, than a fame begot in adultery of study, I doubt I shall leave no hope of competition.' And of a pure attachment he says that 'when Love builds upon the rock of Chastity, it may safely condemn the battery of the waves and threatenings of the wind; since Time, that makes a mockery of the firmest structures, shall itself be ruined before that be demolished.'

Description of Castara.

Like the violet which alone
Prosper in some happy shade,
My Castara lives unknown,
To no looser eye betrayed;
For she's to herself untrue,
Who delights i' th' public view.

Such is her beauty, as no arts
Have enriched with borrowed grace; .

Her high birth no pride imparts,
For she blushes in her place.
Folly boasts a glorious blood;
She is noblest, being good.

Cautious, she knew never yet
What a wanton courtship meant;
Nor speaks loud, to boast her wit,
In her silence eloquent:
Of herself survey she takes,
But 'tween men no difference makes.

She obeys with speedy will
Her grave parents' wise commands;
And so innocent, that ill
She nor acts nor understands:
Women's feet run still astray,
If once to ill they know the way.

She sails by that rock, the court,
Where oft Honour splits her mast;
And retiredness thinks the port,
Where her fame may anchor cast:
Virtue safely cannot sit,
Where vice is enthroned for wit.

She holds that day's pleasure best,
Where sin waits not on delight;
Without mask, or ball, or feast,
Sweetly spends a winter's night:
O'er that darkness, whence is thrust
Prayer, and sleep oft governs lust.

She her throne makes reason climb,
While wild passions captive lie:
And each article of time
Her pure thoughts to heaven fly:
All her vows religious be,
And her love she vows to me.

Epistle to a Friend.

I hate the country's dirt and manners, yet
I love the silence; I embrace the wit
And courtship, flowing here in a full tide,
But loathe the expense, the vanity and pride.
No place each way is happy. Here I hold
Commerce with some who to my care unfold,
After a due oath ministered, the height
And greatness of each star shines in the state,
The brightness, the eclipse, the influence.
With others I commune who tell me whence
The torrent doth of foreign discord flow;
Relate each skirmish, battle, overthrow,
Soon as they happen; and by rote can tell
Those German towns even puzzle me to spell.
The cross or prosperous fate of princes they
Ascribe to rashness, cunning, or delay;
And on each action comment, with more skill
Than upon Livy did old Machiavel.
O busy folly! Why do I my brain
Perplex with the dull policies of Spain,
Or quick designs of France? Why not repair
To the pure innocence o' th' country air,
And neighbour thee, dear friend? who so dost give
Thy thoughts to worth and virtue, that to live
Blest, is to trace thy ways. There might not we Arm against passion with philosophy;

And by the aid of leisure so control
 Whate'er is earth in us, to grow all soul?
 Knowledge doth ignorance engender, when
 We study mysteries of other men,
 And foreign plots. Do but in thy own shade—
 Thy head upon some flowery pillow laid,
 Kind nature's housewifery—contemplate all
 His stratagems, who labours to enthrall
 The world to his great master, and you 'll find
 Ambition mocks itself, and grasps the wind.
 Not conquest makes us great. Blood is too dear
 A price for glory: Honour doth appear
 To statesmen like a vision in the night,
 And, juggler-like, works o' th' deluded sight.
 Th' unbusied only wise: for no respect
 Endangers them to error; they affect
 Truth in her naked beauty, and behold
 Man with an equal eye, not bright in gold
 Or tall in title; so much him they weigh
 As virtue raiseth him above his clay.
 Thus let us value things: and since we find
 Time bend us toward earth, let's in our mind
 Create new youth; and arm against the rude
 Assaults of age; that no dull solitude
 O' th' country dead our thoughts, nor busy care
 O' th' town make us to think, where now we are,
 And whither we are bound. Time ne'er forgot
 His journey, though his steps we numbered not.

Thomas Randolph (1605–35) wrote miscellaneous poems and six plays, all edited by W. C. Hazlitt in 1875. He was born at Newnham-cum-Badby, near Daventry, Northamptonshire; from Westminster passed in 1623 to Trinity College, Cambridge; and in 1629 was elected a fellow. He was early distinguished for talents that procured him the friendship of Ben Jonson and the other wits of the day. Ben enrolled him among his adopted sons; but Randolph fell into intemperate habits, and the fine promise of his genius was cut short by his death in his thirtieth year at Blatherwick, in his native county. His poems (ed. Thorn-Drury, 1929) are bright and sometimes humorous: Aristippus and The Conceited Pedlar are academic interludes; The Jealous Lover is a clever but artificial comedy; The Muse's Looking-glass is a satire, in pseudo-dramatic form, on the several vices, and the virtues find occasion to join in a dance; Amyntas is a pastoral play on materials derived from Tasso and other Italians, though the plot is Randolph's own.

Upon his Picture.

When age hath made me what I am not now,
 And every wrinkle tells me where the plough
 Of time hath furrowed; when an ice shall flow
 Through every vein, and all my head be snow;
 When Death displays his coldness in my cheek,
 And I myself in my own picture seek,
 Not finding what I am, but what I was;
 In doubt which to believe, this or my glass;
 Yet though I alter, this remains the same
 As it was drawn, retains the primitive frame
 And first complexion; here will still be seen
 Blood on the cheek, and down upon the chin:

Here the smooth brow will stay, the lively eye,
 The ruddy lip, and hair of youthful dye.
 Behold what frailty we in man may see,
 Whose shadow is less given to change than he!

To a Lady admiring herself in a Looking-glass.

Fair lady, when you see the grace
 Of beauty in your looking-glass;
 A stately forehead, smooth and high,
 And full of princely majesty;
 A sparkling eye, no gem so fair,
 Whose lustre dims the Cyprian star;
 A glorious cheek, divinely sweet,
 Wherein both roses kindly meet;
 A cherry lip that would entice
 Even gods to kiss at any price;
 You think no beauty is so rare
 That with your shadow might compare;
 That your reflection is alone
 The thing that men most dote upon.
 Madam, alas! your glass doth lie,
 And you are much deceived; for I
 A beauty know of richer grace—
 Sweet, be not angry—'tis your face.
 Hence, then, O learn more mild to be,
 And leave to lay your blame on me:
 If me your real substance move,
 When you so much your shadow love,
 Wise nature would not let your eye
 Look on her own bright majesty;
 Which had you once but gazed upon,
 You could except yourself love none:
 What then you cannot love, let me;
 That face I can, you cannot see.
 'Now you have what to love,' you 'll say,
 'What then is left for me, I pray?'
 My face, sweet heart, if it please thee;
 That which you can, I cannot see:
 So either love shall gain his due,
 Yours, sweet, in me, and mine in you.

James Howell (1593–1666), whose collection of Familiar Letters is still an English classic, was the son of the minister of Abernant, in Caermarthen-shire, and having been educated at Hereford and Jesus College, Oxford, went to London in quest of employment. Appointed steward to a patent-glass manufactory, he went abroad in 1616 to procure materials and engage workmen. In the course of his four years' travels he visited Holland, Flanders, France, Spain, and Italy; brought capable workmen from Middelburg, Venice, and elsewhere; and, being of an acute and inquisitive turn, laid up a store of useful observations on men and manners, besides acquiring an extensive knowledge of modern languages. His connection with the glass company soon after ceased, and he again visited France as the travelling companion of a young gentleman. After this he was sent to Spain (1622) as agent for the recovery of an English vessel which had been seized in Sardinia on the charge of smuggling; but his good hopes of obtaining redress being destroyed by the breaking off of Prince Charles's proposed marriage with the Infanta, he returned to England in 1624. His next office was that of secretary to Lord Scrope, Lord-President of the North; and in 1627 he was chosen by the corporation of Richmond in Yorkshire to be one of their representatives in Parliament. In 1632 he visited Copenhagen as secretary to the English ambassador, and prepared the Latin orations of condolence with the Danish king on the loss of his mother. At Nottingham in 1642 he was appointed a clerk to the Privy Council; but being 'prodigally inclined,' according to Anthony Wood, 'and therefore running much into debt,' he was imprisoned eight years in the Fleet, by order of a committee of Parliament. Here he remained, supporting himself by translating and composing a variety of works. In 1661 he became historiographer-royal, the first who ever enjoyed that title; and having continued his literary vocation till his death on 3rd November 1666, he may be accounted after Markham (page 398) as one of the earliest Englishmen to make a livelihood by his pen. His forty-one publications comprise translations from Italian, French, and Spanish; controversies, pamphlets, and books on history, politics, and philological questions. His Instructions for Forreine Travel (1642) was reprinted by Professor Arber in 1869; his new editions of Cotgrave's French dictionary are interesting to lexicographers; he published a description of London and a history of all the battles between England and Scotland, apologies, A Trance or News from Hell, and The Party of Beasts (an allegory). But this witty and entertaining writer is now chiefly remembered for his Epistola Ho-Eliana, or Familiar Letters, Domestic and Foreign, divided into Sundry Sections, partly Historical, Political, and Philosophical (published in four instalments, in 1645, 1647, 1650, and 1655). The letters are dated from various places at home and abroad; but most of them seem to have been composed as a deliberate literary undertaking in the Fleet Prison, though many of them were no doubt based on his actual letters or notes of some kind, and not solely drawn from memory. His remarks on the leading events and characters of the time, as well as the description of what he saw in foreign countries, and the reflections with which his letters abound, are entertaining reading; though a large proportion of his learning is second hand, many of his most interesting facts are taken straight from books, and inaccurate statements are frequent; and the interest is rather autobiographical than historical. They set a fashion of fictitious letter-writing, and Defoe seems to have known them well. The letters are marked by lucidity, vivacity, and variety; are quite exceptional in that or any age; and have generally been voted one of the most amusing volumes extant. Montaigne's essays and Howell's letters were Thackeray's 'bedside books,' constantly in use. Hallam judged Howell rather harshly, declaring he 'had no wit, but abundance of conceit, flat and commonplace enough.' Certainly the letters are extraordinarily unequal in interest, some being obviously mere compendiums of such books as he could lay hands on at the time.

Letter from Venice.

These wishes come to you from Venice, a place where there is nothing wanting that heart can wish: renowned Venice, the admiredst city in the world; a city that all Europe is bound unto, for she is her greatest rampart against that huge eastern tyrant, the Turk, by sea; else I believe he had over-run all Christendom by this time. Against him this city hath perform'd notable exploits, and not only against him, but divers others: she hath restored emperors to their thrones, and popes to their chairs, and with her galleys often preserv'd St Peter's bark from sinking: for which, by way of reward, one of his successors espous'd her to the sea, which marriage is solemnly renew'd every year in solemn procession by the Doge and all the Clarissimos, and a gold ring cast into the sea out of the great galeass, call'd the Bucentoro, wherein the first ceremony was perform'd by the pope himself, above three hundred years since, and they say it is the self-same vessel still, tho' often put upon the careen and trimm'd. This made me think on that famous ship at Athens; nay, I fell upon an abstracted notion in philosophy, and a speculation touching the body of man, which being in perpetual flux, and a kind of succession of decays, and consequently requiring, ever and anon, a restoration of what it loseth of the virtue of the former aliment, and what was converted after the third concoction into a blood and fleshy substance, which, as in all other sub-lunary bodies that have internal principles of heat, useth to transpire, breathe out, and waste away through invisible pores, by exercise, motion, and sleep, to make room still for a supply of new nouriture: I fell, I say, to consider whether our bodies may be said to be of like condition with this Bucentoro, which, tho' it be reputed still the same vessel, yet I believe there's not a foot of that timber remaining which it had upon the first dock, having been, as they tell me, so often planked and ribbed, caulked and pierced. In like manner, our bodies may be said to be daily repaired by new sustenance, which begets new blood, and consequently new spirits, new humours, and, I may say, new flesh; the old, by continual depredation and insensible transpirations, evaporating still out of us, and giving way to fresh; so that I make a question whether, by reason of these perpetual reparations and accretions, the body of man may be said to be the same numerical body in his old age that he had in his manhood, or the same in his manhood that he had in his youth, the same in his youth that he carried about with him in his childhood, or the same in his childhood which he wore first in the womb. I make a doubt whether I had the same identical individually numerical body, when I carried a calf-leather sachel to school in Hereford, as when I wore a lambskin hood in Oxford; or whether I have the same mass of blood in my veins, and the same flesh now in Venice, which I carry'd about me three years since, up and down London streets, having, in lieu of beer and ale, drunk wine all this while, and fed upon different viands. Now, the stomach is like a crucible, for it hath a chemical kind of vertue to transmute one body into another, to transubstantiate fish and fruits into flesh within and about us: but tho' it be questionable whether I wear the same flesh which is fluxible, I am sure my hair is not the same; for you may remember

I went flaxen-haired out of England, but you shall find me returned with a very dark brown, which I impute not only to the heat and air of those hot countries I have eat my bread in, but to the quality and difference of food. But you will say that hair is but an excrementitious thing, and makes not to this purpose; moreover, methinks I hear you say that this may be true only in the blood and spirits, or such fluid parts, not in the solid and heterogeneous parts. But I will press no further at this time this philosophical notion, which the sight of Bucentoro infused into me, for it hath already made me exceed the bounds of a letter, and, I fear me, to trespass too much upon your patience; I leave the further disquisition of this point to your own contemplations, who are a far riper philosopher than I, and have waded deeper into and drank more of Aristotle's well. But, to conclude, tho' it be doubtful whether I carry about me the same body or no in all points that I had in England, I am well assur'd I bear still the same mind, and therein I verify the old verse:

'Cælum non animum mutant qui trans mare currunt.'

'The air but not the mind they change,
Who in outlandish countries range.'

For what alterations soever happen in this microcosm, in this little world, this small bulk and body of mine, you may be confident that nothing shall alter my affections, specially towards you, but that I will persevere still the same—the very same

Letter from Rome.

I am now come to Rome, and Rome, they say, is every man's country; she is called Communis Patria, for every one that is within the compass of the Latin Church finds himself here, as it were, at home, and in his mother's house, in regard of interest in religion, which is the cause that for one native there be five strangers that sojourn in this city; and without any distinction or mark of strangeness, they come to preferments and offices, both in church and state, according to merit, which is more valued and sought after here than anywhere.

But whereas I expected to have found Rome elevated upon seven hills, I met her rather spreading upon a flat, having humbled herself, since she was made a Christian, and descended from those hills to Campus Martius; with Trastevere, and the suburbs of Saint Peter, she hath yet in compass about fourteen miles, which is far short of that vast circuit she had in Claudius his time; for Vopiscus writes she was then of fifty miles' circumference, and she had five hundred thousand free citizens in a famous cense that was made, which, allowing but six to every family in women, children, and servants, came to three millions of souls; but she is now a wilderness in comparison of that number. The pope is grown to be a great temporal prince of late years, for the State of the Church extends above 300 miles in length, and 200 miles in breadth; it contains Ferrara, Bologna, Romagna, the Marquisate of Ancona, Umbria, Sabina, Perugia, with a part of Tuscany, the patrimony, Rome herself, and Latium. In these there are above fifty bishoprics; the pope hath also the duchy of Spoleto, and the exarchate of Ravenna; he hath the town of Benevento in the kingdom of Naples, and the country of Venise, called Avignon, in France. He hath title also good enough to Naples itself; but, rather than offend his champion, the king of Spain, he is contented with a white mule, and purse of pistoles about the neck, which he receives every year for a herriot or homage, or what you will call it; he pretends also to be lord-paramount of Sicily, Urbin, Parma, and Maseran; of Norway, Ireland, and England, since King John did prostrate our crown at Pandulfo his legate's feet.

The state of the apostolic see here in Italy lieth 'twixt two seas, the Adriatic and the Tyrrhene, and it runs through the midst of Italy, which makes the pope powerful to do good or harm, and more capable than any other to be an umpire or an enemy. His authority being mixed 'twixt temporal and spiritual, disperseth itself into so many members, that a young man may grow old here before he can well understand the form of government.

The consistory of cardinals meet but once a week, and once a week they solemnly wait all upon the pope. I am told there are now in Christendom but sixty-eight cardinals, whereof there are six cardinal bishops, fifty-one cardinal priests, and eleven cardinal deacons. The cardinal bishops attend and sit near the pope, when he celebrates any festival; the cardinal priests assist him at mass; and the cardinal deacons attire him. A cardinal is made by a short breve or writ from the pope in these words: Creamus te socium regibus, superiores ducibus, et fratrem nostrum: 'We create thee a companion to kings, superior to dukes, and our brother.' If a cardinal bishop should be questioned for any offence, there must be twenty-four witnesses produced against him. The Bishop of Ostia hath most privilege of any other, for he consecrates and installs the pope, and goes always next to him. All these cardinals have the repute of princes, and besides other incomes, they have the annats of benefices to support their greatness.

For point of power, the pope is able to put 50,000 men in the field, in case of necessity, besides his naval strength in galleys. We read how Paul III. sent Charles III. 12,000 foot and 500 horse. Pius V. sent a greater aid to Charles IX.; and for riches, besides the temporal dominions he hath in all the countries before named, the datary or despatching of bulls. The triennial subsidies, annats, and other ecclesiastical rights mount to an unknown sum; and it is a common saying here, that as long as the pope can finger a pen, he can want no pence. Pius V. notwithstanding his expenses in buildings, left four millions in the Castle of Saint Angelo in less than five years; more, I believe, than this Gregory XV. will, for he hath many nephews; and better is it to be the pope's nephew, than to be a favourite to any prince in Christendom.

Touching the temporal government of Rome, and opidan affairs, there is a pretor and some choice citizens, who sit in the Capitol. Among other pieces of policy, there is a synagogue of Jews permitted here (as in other places of Italy) under the pope's nose, but they go with a mark of distinction in their hats; they are tolerated for advantage of commerce, wherein the Jews are wonderful dexterous, though most of them be only brokers and Lombardeers; and they are held to be here, as the cynic held women to be, malum necessarium. . . .

Present Rome may be said to be but a monument of Rome past, when she was in that flourish that St Austin desired to see her in. She who tamed the world, tamed herself at last, and falling under her own weight, fell to be a prey to time; yet there is a providence seems to have a care of her still; for though her air be not so good, nor her circumjacent soil so kindly as it was, yet she hath wherewith to keep life and soul together still, by her ecclesiastical courts, which is the sole cause of her peopling now; so that it may be said, when the pope came to be her head, she was reduced to her first principles; for as a shepherd was founder, so a shepherd is still governor and preserver. . . .

13th Sept. 1621.

Howell tells the story of the 'Pied Piper of Hamelen' much as it is given by Browning, who may have taken it hence or from Verstegan; he shows in two letters that popular opinion in England inclined to the belief that Raleigh had deliberately fibbed about the gold-mines he pretended to go in search of on that last disastrous expedition; he reports the murder of Buckingham by Felton when the news reached him; describes the languages and religions of all countries in the world, as far as he could find out about them; has many pious and theological reflections, some naughty stories, and many statements as facts which are manifest fables (as of the lady, commemorated by Coryate also, who as a punishment for discourtesy to a poor woman bore 365 children at a birth); gives a complete statistical account of the Low Countries, and a history of the Inquisition; propounds a scheme of spelling reform, and intersperses not a few poems and hymns, most highly unpoetic. His notion of tolerance may be seen from his saying, 'I pity rather than hate Turk or Infidel . . . if I hate any, 'tis those Schismatics that puzzle the sweet peace of our Church, so that I could be content to see an Anabaptist go to Hell on a Brownist's back.' An account of the wine countries of the world begins with Greece, Spain, and Portugal, and then goes on to France.

On Wines.

France, participating of the climes of all the countries about her, affords wines of quality accordingly; as, towards the Alps and Italy, she hath a luscious rich wine called Frontinac. In the country of Provence, towards the Pyrenees in Languedoc, there are wines conglustable with those of Spain: one of the prime sort of white wines is that of Beaume; and of clarets, that of Orleans, though it be interdicted to wine the king's cellar with it, in respect of the corrosiveness it carries with it. As in France, so in all other wine-countries, the white is called the female, and the claret or red wine is called the male, because commonly it hath more sulphur, body, and heat in't: the wines that our merchants bring over upon the river of Garonne, near Bordeaux, in Gascony, which is the greatest mart for wines in all France. The Scot, because he hath always been a useful confederate to France against England, hath (among other privileges) right of pre-emption of first choice of wines in Bordeaux; he is also permitted to carry his ordnance to the very walls of the town, whereas the English are forced to leave them at Blay, a good way distant down the river. There is a hard green wine, that grows about Rochelle, and the islands thereabouts, which the cunning Hollander sometime used to fetch, and he hath a trick to put a bag of herbs, or some other infusions, into it—as he doth brimstone in Rhenish—to give it a whiter tincture and more sweetness; then they re-embark it for England, where it passeth for good Bachrag [Bacharach], and this is called stuming of wines. In Normandy there's little or no wine at all grows; therefore the common drink of that country is cider, specially in low Normandy. There are also many beer-houses in Paris and elsewhere; but though their barley and water be better than ours, or that of Germany, and though they have English and Dutch brewers among them, yet they cannot make beer in that perfection.

The prime wines of Germany grow about the Rhine, specially in the Psalts [Pfalz] or Lower Palatinate about Bachrag, which hath its etymology from Bacchi ara; for in ancient times there was an altar erected there to the honour of Bacchus, in regard of the richness of the wines. Here, and all France over, 'tis held a great part of incivility for maidens to drink wine until they are married, as it is in Spain for them to wear high shoes or to paint till then. The German mothers, to make their sons fall into a hatred of wine, do use, when they are little, to put some owls' eggs into a cup of Rhenish, and sometimes a little living eel, which twingling in the wine while the child is drinking, so scares him, that many come to abhor and have an antipathy to wine all their lives after. From Bachrag the first stock of vines which grow now in the Grand Canary Island were brought, which, with the heat of the sun and the soil, is grown now to that height of perfection, that the wines which they afford are accounted the richest, the most firm, the best bodied, and lastingst wine, and the most defecated from all earthly grossness, of any other whatsoever; it hath little or no sulphur at all in't, and leaves less dregs behind, though one drink it to excess. French wines may be said but to pickle meat in the stomachs, but this is the wine that digests, and doth not only breed good blood, but it nutritieth also, being a glutinous substantial liquor: of this wine, if of any other, may be verified that merry induction, 'that good wine makes good blood, good blood causeth good humours, good humours cause good thoughts, good thoughts bring forth good works, good works carry a man to heaven—ergo, good wine carrieth a man to heaven.' If this be true, surely more English go to heaven this way than any other; for I think there's more Canary brought into England than to all the world besides. I think also, there is a hundred times more drunk under the name of Canary wine than there is brought in; for Sherries and Malagas, well mingled, pass for Canaries in most taverns, more often than Canary itself; else I do not see how 'twere possible for the vintner to save by it, or to live by his calling, unless he were permitted sometimes to be a brewer. When Sacks and Canaries were brought in first among us, they were used to be drunk in aqua-vitæ measures, and 'twas held fit only for those to drink who were used to carry their legs in their hands, their eyes upon their noses, and an almanac in their bones; but now they go down every one's throat, both young and old, like milk.

The countries that are freest from excess of drinking are Spain and Italy. If a woman can prove her husband to have been thrice drunk, by the ancient laws of Spain she may plead for a divorce from him. Nor indeed can the Spaniard, being hot-brained, bear much drink, yet I have heard that Gondomar was once too hard for the king of Denmark, when he was here in England. But the Spanish soldiers that have been in the wars of Flanders will take their cups freely, and the Italians also. When I lived t'other side the Alps, a gentleman told me a merry tale of a Ligurian soldier, who had got drunk in

Genoa; and Prince Doria going a-horseback to walk the round one night, the soldier took his horse by the bridle, and asked what the price of him was, for he wanted a horse. The prince, seeing in what humour he was, caused him to be taken into a house and put to sleep. In the morning he sent for him, and asked him what he would give for his horse. 'Sir,' said the recovered soldier, 'the merchant that would have bought him last night of your Highness went away betimes in the morning.' The boonest companions for drinking are the Greeks and Germans; but the Greek is the merriest of the two, for he will sing, and dance, and kiss his next companions; but the other will drink as deep as he. If the Greek will drink as many glasses as there be letters in his mistress's name, the other will drink the number of his years; and though he be not apt to break out in singing, being not of so airy a constitution, yet he will drink often musically a health to every one of these six notes, ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la; which, with his reason, are all comprehended in this hexameter:

'Ut relivet miserum fatum solitosque labores.'

The fewest draughts he drinks are three—the first to quench the thirst past, the second to quench the present thirst, the third to prevent the future. I heard of a company of Low Dutchmen that had drunk so deep, that beginning to stagger, and their heads turning round, they thought verily they were at sea, and that the upper chamber where they were was a ship, insomuch that, it being foul windy weather, they fell to throw the stools and other things out of the window, to lighten the vessel, for fear of suffering shipwreck.

On Tobacco.

To usher in again old Janus, I send you a parcel of Indian perfume which the Spaniard calls the holy herb, in regard of the various virtues it hath, but we call it tobacco; I will not say it grew under the King of Spain's window, but I am told it was gather'd near his gold-mines of Potosi (where they report that in some places there is more of that ore than earth), therefore it must needs be precious stuff: if moderately and seasonably taken (as I find you always do), 'tis good for many things; it helps digestion taken a while after meat, it makes one void rheum, break wind, and keeps the body open: a leaf or two being steeped o'er night in a little white-wine is a vomit that never fails in its operation: it is a good companion to one that converseth with dead men; for if one hath been poring long upon a book, or is toil'd with the pen, and stupified with study, it quickeneth him, and dispels those clouds that usually o'er-set the brain. The smoke of it is one of the wholesomest scents that is, against all contagious airs, for it o'er-masters all other smells, as K. James, they say, found true, when being once a-hunting, a shower of rain drove him into a pig-sty for shelter, where he caus'd a pipe-full to be taken on purpose: it cannot endure a spider or a flea, with such-like vermin, and if your hawk be troubled with any such, being blown into his feathers, it frees him: it is good to fortify and preserve the sight, the smoke being let in round about the balls of the eyes once a-week, and frees them from all rheums, driving them back by way of repercussion; being taken backward 'tis excellent good against the cholique, and taken into the stomach, 'twill heat and cleanse it; for I could instance in a great lord (my Lord of Sunderland, President of York), who told me, that he taking it downward into his stomach, it made him cast up an imposthume, bag and all, which had been a long time engendering out of a bruise he had received at football, and so preserv'd his life for many years. Now to descend from the substance of the smoke to the ashes, 'tis well known the medicinal virtues thereof are very many; but they are so common, that I will spare the inserting of them here: but if one would try a petty conclusion how much smoke there is in a pound of tobacco, the ashes will tell him: for let a pound be exactly weigh'd, and the ashes kept charily and weigh'd afterwards, what wants of a pound weight in the ashes cannot be deny'd to have been smoke, which evaporated into air. I have been told that Sir Walter Rawleigh won a wager of Queen Elizabeth upon this nicety. The Spaniards and Irish take it most in powder or smutchin, and it mightily refreshes the brain, and I believe there's as much taken this way in Ireland as there is in pipes in England; one shall commonly see the serving-maid upon the washing-block, and the swain upon the plough-share, when they are tir'd with labour, take out their boxes of smutchin and draw it into their nostrils with a quill, and it will beget new spirits in them with a fresh vigour to fall to their work again. In Barbary and other parts of Afric, 'tis wonderful what a small pill of tobacco will do; for those who use to ride post thro' the sandy deserts, where they meet not with anything that's potable or edible, sometimes three days together, they use to carry small balls or pills of tobacco, which being put under the tongue, it affords them a perpetual moisture and takes off the edge of the appetite for some days.

If you desire to read with pleasure all the virtues of this modern herb, you must read Dr Thorus's Petologia [Raphael Thorius, Hymnus Tabaci sive de Peto, 1644], an accurate piece couch'd in a strenuous heroic verse, full of matter, and continuing its strength from first to last; insomuch, that for the bigness it may be compar'd to any piece of antiquity, and, in my opinion, is beyond βατραχομυομαχία [The Battle of the Frogs and the Mice, erroneously attributed to Homer] or γαλεωμυομαχία [The Battle of the Cats and the Mice, a burlesque poem by the twelfth-century Greek, Theodorus Prodromus].

So I conclude these rambling notions, presuming you will accept this small argument of my great respects to you: if you want paper to light your pipe, this letter may serve the turn; and if it be true what the poets frequently sing, that affection is fire, you shall need no other than the clear flames of the donor's love to make ignition, which is comprehended in this distich:

'*Ignis amor si fit, tabacum accendere nostrum,
Nulla petenda tibi fax nisi dantis amor.*'

'If love be fire, to light this Indian weed,
The donor's love of fire may stand instead.'

FLEET, 1 Jan. 1646.

On Learning in England.

The subject of this letter may peradventure seem a paradox to some, but not, I know, to your lordship, when you have pleased to weigh well the reasons. Learning is a thing that hath been much cried up and coveted in all ages, especially in this last century of years, by people of all sorts, tho' never so mean and mechanical: every man strains his fortunes to keep his children at school; the cobbler will clout it till midnight, the porter will carry burdens till his bones crack again, the plough-man will pinch both back and belly to give his son learning; and I find that this ambition reigns nowhere so much as in this island. But under favour this word learning is taken in a narrower sense among us than among other nations; we seem to restrain it only to the book; whereas, indeed, any artisan whatsoever (if he know the secret and mystery of his trade) may be called a learned man: a good mason, a good shoemaker, that can manage St. Crispin's lance handsomely, a skilful yeoman, a good shipwright, &c., may all be called learned men; and indeed the usefulest sort of learned men; for without the two first we might go barefoot, and lie abroad as beasts, having no other canopy than the wild air; and without the two last we might starve for bread, have no commerce with other nations, or ever be able to tread upon a continent. These, with such-like dextrous artisans, may be termed learned men, and the more behoveful for the subsistence of a country, than those Polymathists that stand poring all day in a corner upon a moth-eaten author, and converse only with dead men. The Chinese (who are the next neighbours to the rising sun on this side of the hemisphere, and consequently the acutest) have a wholesome piece of policy, that the son is always of the father's trade; and 'tis all the learning he aims at: which makes them admirable artisans; for, besides the dextrousness and propensity of the child, being descended lineally from so many of the same trade, the father is more careful to instruct him, and to discover to him all the mystery thereof. This general custom or law keeps their heads from running at random after book-learning, and other vocations. I have read a tale of Rob. Grossthead [Grosseteste], Bishop of Lincoln, that being come to this greatness, he had a brother who was a husbandman, and expected great matters from him in point of preferment; but the bishop told him that if he wanted money to mend his plow or his cart, or to buy tacklings for his horses, with other things belonging to his husbandry, he should not want what was fitting; but wish'd him to aim no higher, for a husbandman he found him, and a husbandman he would leave him.

The extravagant humour of our country is not to be altogether commended, that all men should aspire to book-learning: there is not a simpler animal, and a more superfluous member of state, than a mere scholar, than only a self-pleasing student; he is—Telluris inutile pondus.

From Howell's Instructions for Forreine Travel, which, like his Letters, contains many acute observations on men and things, we extract this on the Tales of Travellers.

Others have a custom to be always relating strange things and wonders (of the humour of Sir John Mandeville), and they usually present them to the hearers through multiplying-glasses, and thereby cause the thing to appear far greater than it is in itself; they make mountains of mole-hills, like Charenton Bridge echo, which doubles the sound nine times. Such a traveller was he that reported the Indian fly to be as big as a fox, China birds to be as big as some horses, and their mice to be as big as monkeys; but they have the wit to fetch this far enough off, because the hearer may rather believe it than make a voyage so far to disprove it.

Every one knows the tale of him who reported he had seen a cabbage under whose leaves a regiment of soldiers were sheltered from a shower of rain. Another who was no traveller, yet the wiser man, said he had passed by a place where there were 400 brasiers making of a caldron—200 within and 200 without, beating the nails in; the traveller asking for what use that huge caldron was, he told him: 'Sir, it was to boil your cabbage.'

Such another was the Spanish traveller, who was so habituated to hyperbolise and relate wonders, that he became ridiculous in all companies, so that he was forced, at last to give order to his man, when he fell into any excess this way, and report anything improbable, he should pull him by the sleeve. The master falling into his wonted hyperboles, spoke of a church in China that was ten thousand yards long; his man, standing behind, and pulling him by the sleeve, made him stop suddenly. The company asking: 'I pray, sir, how broad might that church be?' he replied: 'But a yard broad; and you may thank my man for pulling me by the sleeve, else I had made it foursquare for you.'

The following may serve as a specimen of his poetry, from a farewell letter to a dying friend:

This Life's at longest but one Day;
He who in youth posts hence away,
Leaves us i' th' morn: He who hath run
His race till Manhood parts at Noon:
And who at seventy odd forsakes this Light,
He may be said to take his leave at Night.

John Earle (1601?–65), a native of York, studied at Oxford, was deprived of his living in 1643, was Chaplain and Clerk of the Closet to Charles II. in exile, became successively Bishop of Worcester and of Salisbury, and was a very successful miscellaneous writer. He had great learning and eloquence, was extremely agreeable and facetious in conversation, and was a man of so many excellences that, in the language of Walton, there had lived since the death of Richard Hooker no man 'whom God had blessed with more innocent wisdom, more sanctified learning, or a more pious, peaceable, primitive temper.' He dealt very tenderly with the Nonconformists, and, according to Clarendon, he was among the few excellent men who never had and never could have an enemy. He wrote some poems; but his principal work is Microcosmographie, or a Peece of the World Discovered in Essayes and Characters (1628), a marvellous storehouse of wit and humour. Collections of 'characters' were long exceedingly common and popular—some two hundred such have been catalogued—and form a link between the 'humours' of the old comedy on the one hand, and the familiar essay and novel of the eighteenth century on the other. Earle's is by far the most notable. 'An undeniable wit, a real gift of finished if biting satire, a constant rattle of telling epigram, make him at his best—and he often is at his best—as good reading as the heart of man can desire;' so said the Athenaeum criticising a recent edition of the Microcosmographie, and pointing out at the same time Earle's skill in handling sentiment and his touches of poetry. Among the characters drawn are those of a raw preacher, an antiquary, a reserved man, a college butler, a carrier, a player, a pot-poet, a university dun, and a plain country fellow.

A Pot-Poet

Is the dreggs of wit; yet mingled with good drinke may have some relish. His inspirations are more reall then others; for they doe but faine a God, but hee has his by him. His verses run like the tap, and his invention as the barrell, ebs and flowes at the mercy of the spiggot. In thin drinke hee aspires not above a ballad, but a cup of sacke inflames him, and sets his Muse and nose a fire together. The presse is his mint, and stamps him now and then a sixe pence or two in reward of the baser coyne his pamphlet. His workes would scarce sell for three halfe pence, though they are given oft for three shillings, but for the pretty title that allures the country gentleman: and for which the printer maintaines him in ale a fortnight. His verses are like his clothes, miserable cento's and patches, yet their pace is not altogether so hobling as an almanacks. The death of a great man or the burning of a house furnish him with an argument, and the nine Muses are out strait in mourning gowne, and Melpomine cries Fire, Fire. His other poems are but briefs in rime, and like the poore Greekes collections to redeeme from captivity. He is a man now much imploy'd in commendations of our navy, and a bitter inveigher against the Spaniard. His frequent'st workes goe out in single sheets, and are chanted from market to market, to a vile tune, and a worse throat: whilst the poore country wench melts like her butter to heare them. And these are the stories of some men of Tiburne, or a strange monster out of Germany: or sitting in a bawdy-house, hee writes Gods judgements. Hee ends at last in some obscure painted cloth, to which himselfe made the verses, and his life like a canne too full spils upon the bench. He leaves twenty shillings on the score, which my hostesse looses.

A Plain Country Fellow

Is one that manures his ground well, but lets himselfe lie fallow and untill'd. Hee has reason enough to doe his businesse, and not enough to bee idle or melancholy. Hee seemes to have the judgement of Nabuchadnezzar: for his conversation is among beasts, and his tallons none of the shortest, only he eates not grasse, because hee loves not sallets. His hand guides the plough, and the plough his thoughts, and his ditch and land-marke is the very mound of his meditations. He expostulates with his oxen very understandingly, and speaks Gee and Ree better then English. His mind is not much distracted with objects: but if a goode fat cove come in his way, he stands dumbe and astonisht, and though his haste bee never so great, will fixe here halfe an houres contemplation. His habitation is some poore thatcht rooffe, distinguisht from his barn by the loope-holes that let out smoak, which the raine had long since washt thorow, but for the double seeling of bacon on the inside, which has hung there from his grandsires time, and is yet to make rashers for posterity. His dinner is his other worke, for he sweats at it as much as at his labour; he is a terrible fastner on a piece of beefe, and you may hope to stave the guard off sooner. His religion is a part of his copy-hold, which hee takes from his land-lord, and referres it wholly to his discretion. Yet if hee give him leave, he is a good Christian to his power; that is, comes to church in his best clothes, and sits there with his neighbours, where he is capable onely of two prayers, for raine and faire weather. Hee apprehends Gods blessings onely in a good yeere or a fat pasture, and never praises him but on good ground. Sunday he esteemes a day to make merry in, and thinkes a bag-pipe as essentiall to it as evening-prayer, where hee walkes very solemnly after service with his hands coupled behind him, and censures the dauncing of his parish. His complement with his neighbour is a good thumpe on the backe; and his salutation commonly some blunt curse. Hee thinks nothing to bee vices but pride and ill husbandrie, for which hee wil gravely dissuade youth, and has some thrifite hobnaye proverbes to clout his discourse. He is a niggard all the weeke except onely market-day, where if his corne sell well, hee thinkes hee may be drunke with a good conscience. His feete never stincke so unbecomingly as when hee trots after a lawyer in Westminster-hall, and even cleaves the ground with hard scraping, in beseeching his worship to take his money. Hee is sensible of no calamitie but the burning of a stacke of corne or the over-flowing of a meadow, and thinkes Noahs flood the greatest plague that ever was, not because it drowned the world, but spoyl'd the grasse. For Death hee is never troubled, and if hee get in but his Harvest before, let it come when it wil he cares not.

A Criticke

Is one that has speld over a great many of bookes, and his observation is the orthographie. Hee is the surgeon of old authors, and heales the wounds of dust and ignorance. He converses much in fragments and Desunt multa's, and if he piece it up with two lines, he is more proud of that booke then the authour. Hee runnes over all sciences to peruse their syntaxis, and thinkes all learning compris'd in writing Latine. Hee tastes styles, as some discreeter palats doe wine; and tels you which is genuine, which sophisticate and bastard. His owne phrase is a miscellany of old words, deceas'd long before the Cæsars, and entoomb'd by Varro, and the modern'st man hee followes is Plautus. Hee writes omneis at length, and quicquid, and his gerund is most inconformable. Hee is a troublesome vexer of the dead, which after so long sparing must rise up to the judgement of his castigations. He is one that makes all bookes sell dearer, whilst he swels them into folios with his comments.

The Microcosmographie passed through three editions in 1628, was often reprinted, was edited by Dr Philip Bliss in 1811, reprinted by Arber in 1868 and 1891, by Irwin in 1897, edited by West in 1898, and by Murphy in 1928. The first edition has but fifty-four characters, the sixth (1635) had seventy-eight.

Owen Felltham, or FELTHAM (c. 1602–68), author of Resolves; Divine, Morall, and Politicall, was of a good Suffolk family, and lived for some years as chaplain in the Northamptonshire house of the Earl of Thomond at Great Billing, where Felltham died and was buried. The Resolves appeared about 1620, being a hundred short essays. To the second edition (1628) a 'seconde centurie' was added. He wrote an account of the Low Countries in 1652, and some rather interesting poems. His Resolves fell almost completely into oblivion from 1709 (the date of the twelfth edition) till 1806, when they were reprinted by Cumming. Hallam and others have condemned Felltham's prose as obscure and affected; he strains after conceits, and the comparison with Bacon's Essays, often made, is not to the advantage of Felltham. But he has a fine vein of observation and reflection, not without frequent felicities of expression.

Of Thoughtfulness in Misery.

I like of Solon's course, in comforting his constant friend; when, taking him up to the top of a turret, overlooking all the piled buildings, he bids him think how many discontents there had been in those houses since their framing, how many are and how many will be; then, if he can, to leave the world's calamities, and mourn but for his own. To mourn for none else were hardness and injustice. To mourn for all were endless. The best way is to uncontract the brow, and let the world's mad spleen fret, for that we smile in woes. . . .

Silence was a full answer in that philosopher, that being asked what he thought of human life, said nothing, turned him round, and vanished.

Of Curiosity in Knowledge.

Nothing wraps a man in such a mist of errors as his own curiosity in searching things beyond him. How happily do they live that know nothing but what is necessary! Our knowledge doth but shew us our ignorance, we see the effect but cannot guess at the cause. Learning is like a river whose head being far in the land, is at first rising little and easily viewed; but still as you go, it gapeth with a wider bank, not without pleasure and delightful winding, while it is on both sides set with trees and the beauties of various flowers. But still the further you follow it, the deeper and the broader 'tis; till at last it inwaves itself in the unfathomed ocean; there you see more water, but no shore, no end of that liquid, fluid vastness. In many things we may sound Nature in the shallows of her revelations. We may trace her to her second causes; but beyond them we meet with nothing but the puzzle of the soul and the dazzle of the mind's dim eyes. While we speak of things that are, that we may dissect, and have power and means to find the causes, there is some pleasure, some certainty. But when we come to metaphysics, to long-buried antiquity, and unto unrevealed divinity, we are in a sea which is deeper than the short reach of the line of man. Much may be gained by studious inquisition; but more will ever rest, which man cannot discover. . . .

Against Readiness to take Offence.

We make ourselves more injuries than are offered us; they many times pass for wrongs in our own thoughts, that were never meant so by the heart of him that speaketh. The apprehension of wrong hurts more than the sharpest part of the wrong done. So by falsely making ourselves patients of wrong, we become the true and first actors. It is not good in matters of discourtesy to dive into a man's mind beyond his own comment; nor to stir upon a doubtful indignity without it, unless we have proofs that carry weight and conviction with them. Words do sometimes fly from the tongue that the heart did neither hatch nor harbour. While we think to revenge an injury, we many times begin one; and after that repent our misconceptions. In things that may have a double sense, it is good to think the better was intended; so shall we still both keep our friends and quietness.

Of Thinking.

Meditation is the soul's perspective glass, whereby in her long remove she discerneth God as if he were nearer hand. I persuade no man to make it his whole life's business. We have bodies as well as souls; and even this world, while we are in it, ought somewhat to be cared for. As those states are likely to flourish where execution follows sound advisements, so is man when contemplation is seconded by action. Contemplation generates; action propagates. Without the first, the latter is defective; without the last, the first is but abortive and embryous. St Bernard compares contemplation to Rachel, which was the more fair; but action to Leah, which was the more fruitful. I will neither always be busy and doing, nor ever shut up in nothing but thought. Yet that which some would call idleness, I will call the sweetest part of my life, and that is, my thinking.

Sir Kenelm Digby [1603-65] was born at Gothurst or Gayhurst, near Newport Pagnell, the son of the Sir Everard Digby who in 1592 came into a large estate, but seven years later turned Catholic, and was hanged for his part in the Gunpowder Plot. Kenelm himself was bred a Catholic, but in 1616 was sent to a Protestant tutor, the future Archbishop Laud; and in 1618, after seven months in Spain, entered Gloucester Hall, Oxford (now Worcester College). He left it in 1620 without a degree, and spent nearly three years abroad, in Florence chiefly. At Madrid he fell in with Prince Charles, and following him back to England, was knighted, and entered his service. In 1625, after a singular courtship, he secretly married 'that celebrated beaute and courtezane,' Venetia Stanley (1600-33), who had been his playmate in childhood. With two privateers he sailed in 1628 to the Mediterranean, and on 11th June vanquished a French and Venetian squadron off Scanderoon; in August, on the island of Melos, he began and wrote most of his Memoirs. On his beloved wife's death he withdrew to Gresham College, and there passed two hermit-like years, diverting himself with chemistry and the professors' good conversation. Meanwhile he had professed the Protestant faith, but, 'looking back,' in 1636 he announced his reconversion to Archbishop Laud; and his tortuous conduct during the Great Rebellion was dictated, it seems, by his zeal for Catholicism. He was imprisoned by the Parliament (1642-43), and had his estate confiscated; was at Rome (1645-47), where he finished by 'hectoring at his Holiness;' and thrice revisited England (1649-51-54), the third time staying two years, and entering into close relations with Cromwell. At the Restoration, however, he was well received, and retained his office of chancellor to Queen Henrietta Maria. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society (1663).

'The very Pliny of our age for lying,' said Stubbes of Digby, whom Evelyn terms 'an arrant mountebank.' Yet he was a friend of Descartes and Sir Thomas Browne; he could appreciate the discoveries of Harvey, Bacon, and Galileo. In the Dictionary of National Biography (vol. xv. 1888) Sir S. Lee points out that 'as a philosopher—an Aristotelian—Sir Kenelm undoubtedly owed much to Thomas White;' and he questions whether his much-vaunted 'powder of sympathy' was not really invented by Sir Gilbert Talbot. This powder—Digby professed to have learned the secret from a Carmelite who had travelled in the farthest East—was 'powder of vitriol'—that is, a sulphate of one of the metals powdered (presumably copperas)—and had this convenience, that it did not require to be applied to the wound itself. A bandage or anything that had the blood of the wound on it could be carried to the medicine-man, and by him hopefully immersed in sympathetic mixtures, at any distance from the sufferer. Anyhow, Digby's Discourse thereon (1658), like his treatise Of Bodies and of Man's Soul (1644), contains much that is curious, if little of real value; whilst in his Discourse concerning the Vegetation of Plants (1660), the chief of his other fifteen works, he 'is said to have been the first to notice the importance of vital air or oxygen to plants.' See his bombastic Memoirs, dealing with his courtship (ed. Nicolas, 1827); his Scanderoon Voyage (1868); Lives by a descendant (1896), and by H. M. Digby (1912); and Bligh's Digby and his Venetia (1932).

The extracts are all from the book Of Bodies save the last, which is from the appended discourse on Digby's patent medicine.

One full example this age affords us in this kind; of a man whose extremity of fear wrought upon him to give us this experiment. He was born in some village of the country of Liege: and therefore among strangers he is known by the name of John of Liege. I have been informed of this story by several (whom I dare confidently believe) that have had it from his own mouth; and have question'd him with great curiosity particularly about it.

When he was a little boy, there being wars in the country (as that state is seldom without molestations from abroad, when they have no distempers at home, which is an inseparable effect of a countries situation upon the frontiers of powerful neighbouring princes that are at variance), the village of whence he was had notice of some unruly scatter'd troupes that were coming to pillage them: which made all the people of the village flie hastily with what they could carry with them, to hide themselves in the woods; which were spacious enough to afford them shelter, for they joynd upon the Forrest of Ardenne. There they lay till some of their scouts brought them word that the souldiers, of whom they were in such apprehension, had fired their town and quitted it. Then all of them return'd home excepting this boy: who, it seems, being of a very timorous nature, had images of fear so strong in his phantasie, that first he ran further into the wood then any of the rest, and afterwards apprehended that every body he saw through the thickets, and every voice he heard, was the souldiers; and so hid himself from his parents, that were in much distress seeing him all about, and calling his name as loud as they could. When they had spent a day or two in vain, they return'd home without him; and he lived many years in the woods, feeding upon roots and wild fruits and maste.

He said that, after he had been some time in this wilde habitation, he could by the smel judge of the tast of any thing that was to be eaten: and that he could at a great distance wind by his nose where wholsom fruits or roots grew. In this state he continu'd (still shunning men with as great fear as when he first ran away; so strong the impression was, and so little could his little reason master it): till, in a very sharp winter, when many beasts of the forrest perish'd for want of food, necessity brought him to so much confidence, that, leaving the wild places of the forrest, remote from all peoples dwellings, he would in the evenings steal among cattel that were fothered, especially the swine, and among them glean that which serv'd to sustain wretchedly his miserable life. He could not do this so cunningly but that, returning often to it, he was on a time espied: and they who saw a beast of so strange a shape (for such they took him to be, he being naked and all overgrown with hair), believing him to be a satyre or some such prodigious creature as the recounters of rare accidents tells of, laid wait to apprehend him. But he, that winded them as far off as any beast could do, still avoided them; till at length they laid snares for him, and took the wind so advantageously of him that they caught him: and then soon perceiv'd he was a man, though he had quite forgotten the use of all language; but by his gestures and cries he express'd the streatest affrightedness that might be. Which afterwards he said (when he had learn'd anew to speak) was because he thought those were the souldiers he had hidden himself to avoid, when he first betook himself to the wood; and were alwayes lively in his phantasie, through his fears continually reducing them thither.

This man, within a little while after he came to good keeping and full feeding, quite lost that acuteness of smelling which formerly govern'd him in his taste; and grew to be in that particular as other ordinary men were. But at his first living with other people, a woman (that had compassion of him, to see a man so near like a beast, and that had no language to call for what he wish'd or needed to have) took particular care of him; and was alwayes very sollicitous to see him furnish'd with what he wanted: which made him so apply himself unto her in all his occurrents, that whenever he stood in need of ought, if shee were out of the way, and were gone abroad in the fields, or to any other village near by, he would scent her out presently by his scent; in such sort as with us those dogs use to do which are taught to draw dry foot. I imagine he is yet alive, to tell a better story of himself then I have done; and to confirm what I have here said of him: for I have from them who saw him but few years agoe, that he was an able strong man, and likely to last yet a good while longer.

The Spanish Lord was born deaf, so deaf, that, if a Gun were shot off close by his ear, he could not hear it; and consequently he was dumb; for not being able to hear the sound of words, he could never imitate nor understand them. The loveliness of his face, and especially the exceeding life and spiritfulness of his eyes, and the comeliness of his person & whole composure of his body throughout were pregnant signs of a well temper'd mind within: and therefore all that knew him lamented much the want of means to cultivate it, and to imbue it with the motions which it seem'd capable of, in regard of its self; had it not been so cross'd by this unhappy accident. Which to remedy, Physitians and Chyrurgians had long imploy'd their skil; but all in vain: at last, there was a Priest who undertook the teaching him to understand others when they spoke, and to speak himself that others might understand him. What at the first he was laugh't at for, made him, after some yeers, be looked on as if he had wrought a miracle. In a word, after strange patience, constancy and pains, he brought the young Lord to speak as distinctly as any man whoever; and to understand so perfectly what others said, that he would not lose a word in a whole days conversation.

To this purpose the subtilties of the Fox are of most note. They say, he uses to lie as if he were dead; therby to make Hens and Ducks come boldly to him. That, in the night when his body is unseen, he will fix his eyes upon poultry; and so make them come down to him from their roost. That, to rid himself of the fleas that afflict him in the Summer, he will sink his body by little and little into the water, while the fleas creep up to his head (to save themselves from drowning), and from thence to a bough he holds in his mouth; and will then swim away, leaving them there.

'Tis said, that, in Thracia, the Countrey people know whether the rivers, that are frozen in the winter, will bear them or no, by marking whether the Foxes venture boldly over them, or retire, after they have lai'd their ears to the Ice, to listen whether they can hear the noise of the water running under it: from whence (you may imagine) they collect, that, if they hear the current of the stream, the Ice must needs be thin; and consequently dangerous to trust their weight to it.

And, to busie my self no longer with their subtilties, I will conclude with a famous tale of one of these crafty animals, that, having kill'd a Goose on the other side of the river, and being desirous to swim over with it, to carry it to his den; before he would attempt it (lest his prey might prove too heavy for him to swim withal, and so he might lose it) he first weigh'd the Goose with a piece of wood, and then tri'd to carry that over the river, whiles he left his Goose behind in a safe place: which when he perceiv'd he was able to do with ease, he then came back again, and ventured over with his heavy bird.

They say it is the nature of the Jacatray [the Jacare, an American kind of alligator] to hide it self, and imitate the voice of such beasts, as it uses to prey upon: which makes them come to him, as to one of their own fellows; and then he seizes on and devours them.

The Jaccal, that has a subtile sent, hunts after beasts, and, in the chase, by his barking, guides the Lion, (whose nose is not so good,) till they overtake what they hunt; which peradventure would be too strong for the Jaccal: but the Lion kills the quarry, and, having first fed himself, leaves the Jaccal his share; and so between them both, by the ones dexterity and the others strength, they get meat for nourishment of them both.

He that should tell an Indian what feats Banks's Horse would do; how he would restore a glove to the due owner, after his Master had whisper'd that man's name in his ear; how he would tell the just number of pence in any piece of silver coyn, barely shew'd him by his master; and even obey presently his command, in discharging himself of his excrements, when ever he had him (so great a power art may have over nature :) would make him, I believe, admire more at this learned beast, than we do at their docile Elephants, upon the relations we have of them. Whereas, every one of us knows, by what means his painful Tutor brought him to do all his tricks; and they are no whit more extraordinary, than a Fawkners manning of a Hawk, and training her to kill Partridges, and to flie at the retrieve: but do all of them (both these, and all other jugling artifices of beasts) depend upon the same or like principles; and are known to be but directions of nature, order'd by one that composes and levels her operations to another end further off (in those actions) than she of her self would aim at. The particulars of which we need not trouble our selves to meddle with.

The great fertility and riches of England consists chiefly in pasturage for Cattle; wherof we have the fairest in the world, principally of Oxen and Kine. Ther's not the meanest Cottager, but hath a Cow to furnish his Family with milk: 'tis the principal sustenance of the poorer sort of people, as 'tis also in Switzerland; which makes them very careful of the good keeping and health of their Cows. Now, if it happen that the Milk boil over, and so comes to fall into the fire, the good woman or maid presently gives over whatever she is adoing and runs to take the Vessel off the fire: and, at the same time, she takes a handful of Salt, which uses to be commonly in the corner of the Chimney to keep it dry; and throws it upon the cinders where the milk was shed. Ask her, wherfore she doth so? and she will tell you, 'tis to prevent a mischief to the Cows Udder, which gave this milk.

Thomas May (1595-1650), poet and historian, was the son of Sir Thomas May of Mayfield, Sussex; was educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge; and admitted to Gray's Inn, but devoted himself to literature. He was much favoured by Charles I. and the court, but, according to Clarendon, 'fell from his duty and all his former friends' because of his not receiving a pension he expected; he became the secretary and apologist of the Parliament, and continued in the Parliamentary service till his death. He was somewhat of a freethinker, and was dissipated in his habits. His poems comprise a comedy, The Heir (1622), and tragedies on Antigone, Agrippina, Cleopatra, and Julius Cæsar; a better play on Nero has been, on very doubtful grounds, ascribed to him. At the king's command he wrote narrative poems on the reigns of Henry II. and Edward III. But he is best known as the translator and continuator of Lucan (1627–30); he brought down the history of the period from the battle of Pharsalia to the death of Julius Caesar, and then translated the 'Supplement to Lucan,' as it was called, into the language and verse of the original. Anthony Wood and Clarendon, both of whom despised the man, highly commended his Lucan. The translation was warmly praised by Ben Jonson; the continuation is respectable, and the Latin version of the continuation more than respectable. Dr Johnson held that May's Latin poetry was superior to either Cowley's or Milton's, and the best England could till then show. May also translated the Georgics, some of Martial's epigrams, and part of Barclay's Argenis. He is chiefly remembered as the historian of the Long Parliament. The History of the Parliament of England, which began November 3, 1640, published by him as 'Secretary for the Parliament' in 1647, has a prefatory 'view' which comprises characters of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and Charles I.; and the narrative closes in 1643, at the most interesting crisis of the struggle. He laments that the Civil War has divided 'the understandings of men as well as their affections in so high a degree that scarce could any virtue gain due applause, any reason give satisfaction, or any relation obtain credit unless amongst men of the same side;' professes impartiality; and seldom expressly passes judgment. But though not merely those of his own way of thinking praised the History, though Warburton approved its penetration and candour, and the Earl of Chatham recommended it as honester and more instructive than Clarendon's, most of his own contemporaries doubted or denied his impartiality and suspected his honesty. Mr Firth says that, while in the History he is merely the official apologist of the Parliament, in the abridged form of it, published 1650, he has become the panegyrist of the army and the Independents. The style of the History is smooth and well written, and full of Latin quotations and illustrations from Latin history. The picture May gives us of the social state of the times seems more like what we conceive of the reign of Charles II. than that of the grave and decorous First Charles:

Profaneness too much abounded everywhere; and which is most strange, where there was no religion, yet there was superstition. Luxury in diet and excess both in meat and drinke was crept into the kingdome in a high degree, not only in the quantity but in the wanton curiosity. And in abuse of those good creatures which God had bestowed upon this plentiful land, they mixed the vices of divers nations, catching at everything that was new and forraigne.

'Non vulgo nota placebant
Gaudia, non usu plebeio trita voluptas.' (PETRONIUS.)

'Old knowne delight
They scorne, and vulgar bare-worne pleasure sleight.'

As much pride and excess was in apparell, almost among all degrees of people, in new-fangled and various-fashioned attire; they not only imitated but excelled their forraigne patterns; and in fantastical gestures and behaviour, the petulancy of most nations in Europe. The serious men groaned for a parliament; but the great statesmen plied it the harder, to compleat that work they had begun, of setting up prerogative above all lawes. The Lord Wentworth (afterwards created Earle of Strafford for his service in that kinde) was then labouring to oppresse Ireland, of which he was deputy; and to begin that worke in a conquered kingdome which was intended to be afterward wrought by degrees in England: and indeed he had gone very farre and prosperously in those waies of tyranny, though very much to the endammaging and setting backe of that newly established kingdome. He was a man of great parts, of a deepe reach, subtle wit, of spirit and industry, to carry on his businesse, and such a conscience as was fit for that work he was designed to. He understood the right way, and the liberty of his country, as well as any man; for which in former parliaments he stood up stiffely, and seemed an excellent patriot. For those abilities he was soon taken off by the king, and raised in honour, to be employed in a contrary way, for enslaving of his country, which his ambition easily drew him to undertake. . . .

The court of England, during this long vacancy of parliaments, enjoyed itself in as much pleasure and splendour as ever any court did. The revels, triumphs, and princely pastimes were for those many yeares kept up at so great a height, that any stranger which travelled into England would verily believe a kingdom that looked so cheerefully in the face could not be sick in any part.

See Clarendon and Wood; the edition of May's History by Lord Maseres (1812; reprinted 1854); and Firth's article in the Dictionary of National Biography (1894).

Peter Heylyn (1599–1662) was one of the clerical adherents of the king despoiled of their goods by the Parliament. Born at Burford, in Oxfordshire, he studied at Oxford, was deprived of his living under the Commonwealth, and after the Restoration was made Dean of Westminster. A strong supporter of Laud, he was a vehement and acrimonious controversialist on the anti-Puritan side. Amongst some forty publications are a Life of Laud, a geography and cosmography, histories of the Reformation and of the Presbyterians (in England), and a history of Sabbath observance in favour of the less strict view. In a narrative of a six weeks' tour to France in 1625, not published till 1656, and then without his consent, he gives an Englishman's (not too complimentary) description of

The French.

The present French, then, is nothing but an old Gaule moulded into a new name: as rash he is, as headstrong, and as hare-brained. A nation whom you shall winne with a feather and lose with a straw; upon the first sight of him, you shall have him as familiar as your sleep, or the necessity of breathing. In one hour's conference you may indear him to you, in the second unbutton him, the third pumps him dry of all his secrets, and he gives them you as faithfully as if you were his ghostly father, and bound to conceal them sub sigillo confessionis ['under the seal of confession']; when you have learned this, you may lay him aside, for he is no longer serviceable. If you have any humor in holding him in a further acquaintance (a favour which he confesseth, and I beleave him, he is unworthy of), himself will make the first separation: he hath said over his lesson now unto you, and now must find out somebody else to whom to reapeate it. Fare him well; he is a garment whom I would be loath to wear above two dayes together, for in that time he will be thred-bare. Familiare est hominis omnia sibi remittere ['It is usual for men to overlook their own faults'], saith Velleius of all; it holdeth most properly in this people. He is very kind hearted to himself, and thinketh himself as free from wants as he is full; so much he hath in him the nature of a Chynois [Chinese], that he thinketh all men blind but himself. In this private self-conceitedness he hateth the Spaniard, loveth not the English, and contemneth the German; himself is the only courtier and compleat gentleman, but it is his own glass which he seeth in. Out of this conceit of his own excellencie, and partly out of a shallowness of brain, he is very lyable to exceptions; the least distaste that can be draweth his sword, and a minutes pause sheatheth it to your hand; afterwards, if you beat him into better manners, he shall take it kindly, and cry Serviteur. In this one thing they are wonderfully like the Devil; meekness or submission makes them insolent; a little resistance putteth them to their heeles, or makes them your spaniels. In a word (for I have held him too long) he is a walking vanitie in a new fashion.

I will give you now a taste of his table, which you shall find in a measure furnished (I speak not of the paisant), but not with so full a manner as with us. Their beef they cut out into such chops, that that which goeth there for a laudable dish, would be thought here a university commons, new served from the hatch. A loin of mutton serves amongst them for three rostings, besides the hazard of making pottage with the rump. Fowl also they have in good plenty, especially such as the king found in Scotland; to say truth, that which they have is sufficient for nature and a friend, were it not for the mistress or the kitchen wench. I have heard much fame of the French cookes, but their skill lyeth not in the neat handling of beef and mutton. They have (as generally have all this nation) good fancies, and are speciall fellows for the making of puff-pastes, and the ordering of banquets. Their trade is not to feed the belly, but the pallat. It is now time you were set down, where the first thing you must do is to say your grace: private graces are as ordinary there as private masses, and from thence I think they learned them. That done, fall to where you like best; they observe no method in their eating, and if you look for a carver, you may rise fasting. When you are risen, if you can digest the sluttishness of the cookery, which is most abominable at first sight, I dare trust you in a garrison. Follow him to church, and there he will shew himself most irreligious and irreverent; I speak not of all, but the general. At a mass in Cordeliers' church in Paris I saw two French papists, even when the most sacred mystery of their faith was celebrating, break out into such a blasphemous and atheistical laughter, that even an Ethnick would have hated it; it was well they were Catholiques, otherwise some French hot-head or other would have sent them laughing to Pluto.

The French language is indeed very sweet and delectable: it is cleared of all harshness by the cutting and leaving out the consonants, which maketh it fall off the tongue very volubly; yet in my opinion it is rather elegant than copious; and therefore is much troubled for want of words to find out periphrases. It expresseth very much of itself in the action; the head, body, and shoulders concur all in the pronouncing of it; and he that hopeth to speak it with a good grace must have something in him of the mimick. It is enriched with a full number of significant proverbs, which is a great help to the French humor in scoffing, and very full of courtship, which maketh all the people complimentary; the poorest cobbler in the village hath his court cringes and his eau béniste de cour, his court holy-water, as perfectly as the Prince of Condé.

French Love of Dancing.

At my being there, the sport was dancing, an exercise much used by the French, who doe naturally affect it. And it seems this natural inclination is so strong and deep rooted, that neither age nor the absence of a smiling fortune can prevaile against it. For on this dancing-green there assemblenth not only youth and gentry, but also age and beggery; old wives, which could not set foot to ground without a crutch in the streets, had here taught their feet to amble; you would have thought by the cleanly conveyance and carriage of their bodies that they had beene troubled with the sciatica, and yet so eager in the sport as if their dancing-dayes should never be done. Some there was so ragged, that a swift galliard would almost have shaken them into nakednesse, and they also most violent to have their carcases directed in a measure. To have attempted the staying of them at home, or the perswading of them to work when they heard the fiddle, had been a task too unweildy for Hercules. In this mixture of age and condition, did we observe them at their pastime; the rags being so interwoven with the silks, and wrinkled brows so interchangeably mingled with fresh beauties, that you would have thought it to have been a mummary of fortunes; as for those of both sexes which were altogether past action, they had caused themselves to be carried thither in their chairs, and trod the measures with their eyes.

Goldsmith in the next century dwelt in the Traveller on the same national characteristic:

Alike all ages: dames of ancient days
Have led their children through the mirthful maze;
And the gay grandsire, skilled in gestic lore,
Has frisked beneath the burden of threescore.

At Orleans, Heylyn found a large number of learned Germans resident, mainly for the study of law, and having a regular corporation, with a procurator, quæstor, assessors, and librarians:

If it happen that any of them dye there, they all accompany him to his grave, in a manner mixt so orderly of grieve and state that you would think the obsequies of some great potentate were solemnizing; and to say truth of them, they are a hearty and loving nation, not to one another onely, but to strangers, and especially to us of England. Onely I could wish that in their speech and complement they would not use the Latine tongue, or else speak it more congruously: you shall hardly finde

a man amongst them which can make a shift to expresse himselfe in that language, nor one amongst an hundred that can doe it Latinely. Galleriam, Compaginem, Gardinum and the like are as usuall in their common discourse, as to drinke at three of the clock, and as familiar as their sleep. Had they bent their study that way, I perswade my self they would have been excellent good at the common lawes, their tongues so naturally falling on these words which are necessary to a declaration: but amongst the rest, I took especial notice of one Mr Gebour [?], a man of that various mixture of words, that you would have thought his tongue to have been a very Amsterdam of languages; Cras mane sive thei nous irous ad magnam Galleriam, was one of his remarkable speeches when we were at Paris: but here at Orleans we had them of him thick and threefold. If ever he should chance to dye in a strange place, where his countrey could not be knowne but by his tongue, it could not possibly be but that more nations would strive for him than ever did for Homer. I had before read of the confusion of Babel, in him I came acquainted with it.

William Prynne, born in 1600 at Swanswick, near Bath, graduated from Oriel College, Oxford, in 1621. Admitted a student of Lincoln's Inn, he was called to the Bar, but was early drawn into theological controversy, and during 1627-30 published The Unloveliness of Love-locks, Healths Sicknesse (against drinking of healths), and three other Puritan and anti-Arminian diatribes. In 1633 appeared his Histrio-Mastix: the Players Scourge, a bulky and scurrilous pamphlet of 1040 small quarto pages, essaying to prove that play-writing, play-acting, and play-going are unlawful and immoral, are in defiance of Scripture and the Church-fathers, and are condemned by the wisest of the heathen. The book was dedicated to the masters of Lincoln's Inn, as the one of the Inns of Court that had not permitted the acting of interludes in its halls. Several passages in the work, summarised in the index as 'women-actors notorious whores,' were held to be a reflection on the virtue of Queen Henrietta Maria, who with her ladies had in the same year taken part in the performance of a play. The denunciation of magistrates who failed in the duty of suppressing theatres, and unpleasant allusions to Nero, were held to point at the king. So Prynne, arraigned in the Star Chamber, was, after a year's imprisonment, in 1634 sentenced to have his book burnt by the hangman, pay a fine of £5000, be expelled from Oxford and Lincoln's Inn, lose both his ears in the pillory, and suffer perpetual imprisonment. Three years later, for assailing Laud and the hierarchy in two more pamphlets, a fresh fine of £5000 was imposed; he was again pilloried, and was branded on both cheeks with S. L. ('seditious libeller'; 'stigmata Laudis' in Prynne's own interpretation). He remained a prisoner till, in 1640, he was released by a warrant of the House of Commons. He acted as Laud's bitter prosecutor (1644), and in 1647 became recorder of Bath, in 1648 member for Newport in Cornwall. But opposing the Independents and Charles I.'s execution, he was one of those of whom the House was 'purged,' and was even imprisoned (1650-52). On Cromwell's death he returned to Parliament as a royalist; and after the Restoration Charles II. 'kept him quiet' by making him keeper of the Tower records. He died 24th October 1669. He wrote in all some two hundred pamphlets and books, remarkable for vehemence and violence rather than for any merit of style. He assailed with equal vehemence the tyranny of the king's government and of the Commonwealth; wrote against prelates, papists, Quakers, and Jews; and attacked with equal vigour Laud, the Puritan Goodwin, Lilburne, Milton, and the Protector. After the Restoration none was more savage against the regicides or more eager for retaliatory measures. Some of his polemical pamphlets were even couched in verse of a kind, one of these being elegantly named A Pleasant Purge for Roman Catholics. Withal he did good service as a compiler of constitutional history, his best works the Calendar of Parliamentary Writs and his Records. See Documents relating to Prynne, edited by S. R. Gardiner (Camden Society, 1877); Life by Kirby (1931).

The principal part of the comprehensive title-page of Prynne's famous book is as follows:

Histrio-Mastix: The Players Scourge or Actors Tragedie, Divided into Two Parts. Wherein it is largely evidenced, by divers Arguments by the concurring Authorities and Resolutions of Sundry texts of Scripture; of the whole Primitive Church, both under the Law and Gospell; of 55 Synodes and Councils; of 71 Fathers and Christian Writers, before the yeare of our Lord 1200; of above 150 foraigne and domestique Protestant and Popish Authors, since; of 40 Heathen Philosophers, Historians, Poets; of many Heathen, many Christian Nations, Republicques, Emperors, Princes, Magistrates; of sundry Apostolicall, Canonick, Imperiall Constitutions; and of our owne English Statutes, Magistrates, Universities, Writers, Preachers. That popular Stage-plays (the very Pompes of the Divell which we renounce in Baptisme, if we beleve the Fathers) are sinfull, heathenish, lewde, ungodly Spectacles, and most pernicious Corruptions; condemned in all ages, as intolerable Mischiefes to Churches, to Republickes, to the manners, mindes, and soules of men. And that the Profession of Play-poets, of Stage-players; together with the penning, acting, and frequenting of Stage-plays, are unlawfull, infamous, and misbeseeeming Christians. All pretences to the contrary are here likewise fully answered; and the unlawfulness of acting, of beholding Academicall Enterludes, briefly discussed; besides sundry other particulars concerning Dancing, Dicing, Health-drinking, &c. of which the Table will informe you. . . . By William Prynne, an Vtter-Barrester of Lincolnes Inne.

Still in the title-page and before the imprint are a series of Latin citations, with full references, from Cyprian's De Spectaculis, Lactantius's De Vero Cultu, Chrysostom's Homilies on Matthew, and Augustine's De Civitate Dei.

From 'Histrio-Mastix.'—Actus I. Scæna Prima.

That all popular and common Stage-Playes, whether Comickall, Tragicall, Satyricall, Mimicall, or mixt of either, (especially as they are now composed and personated,) are such sinfull, hurtfull, and pernicious Recreations as are altogether unseemely and unlawfull unto Christians; I shall first of all evidence and proove it from their originall parents, and primary Inventors: which were no other but the very Devill himselfe; or at leastwise, Idolatrous and Voluptuous Pagans, impregnated with this infernall issue from Hell it selfe; from whence I argue in the first place thus.

That which had its birth and primarie conception from the very Devill himselfe, who is all and onely evill, must needs be Sinfull, Pernicious, and altogether unseemely, yea, Unlawfull unto Christians.

But Stage-Playes had their birth and primary conception from the very Devill himselfe, who is all and onely evill.

Therefore they must needs bee Sinfull, Pernicious, and altogether unseemely, yea, Unlawfull unto Christians.

The Minor, (which is onely liable to exception,) I shall easily make good; First, by the direct and punctuall testimony of sundry Fathers.

But now a-dayes Musicke is growne to such and so great licentiousnesse, that even at the ministration of the holy Sacrament all kinde of wanton and lewde trifling Songs, with piping of Organs, have their place and course. As for the Divine Service and Common prayer, it is so chaunted and minsed and mangled of our costly hired, curious, and nice Musitiens (not to instruct the audience withall, nor to stirre up mens mindes unto devotion, but with a whorish harmony to tickle their eares:) that it may justly seeme not to be a noyse made of men, but rather a bleating of brute beasts; whiles the Coristers ney descant as it were a sort of Colts; others bellowe a tenour, as it were a company of Oxen: others barke a counter-point, as it were a kennell of Dogs: others rore out a treble like a sort of Bulls: others grunt out a base as it were a number of Hogs; so that a foule evill favoured noyse is made, but as for the wordes and sentences and the very matter it selfe, is nothing understood at all; but the authority and power of judgement is taken away both from the minde and from the eares utterly. Erasmus Roterodamus expresseth his minde concerning the curious manner of singing used in Churches on this wise, and saith, Why doth the Church doubt to follow so worthy an Author (Paul), yea, how dare it be bold to dissent from? What other thing is heard in monasteries, in Colledges, in Temples almost generally, then a confused noyse of voyces? But in the time of Paul, there was no singing but saying onely.

For the Minor, that Stage-playes unavoydably produce an intollerable mispence of much pretious time, &c., it is most apparant if we will but summe up all those dayes, those houres which are vainely spent in the composing, conning, practising, acting, beholding of every publike or private Stage-play. How many golden dayes and houres, I might say weekes, nay moneths, and I had almost said whole yeeres, doe most Play-poets spend in contriving, penning, polishing their new-invented Playes, before they ripen them for the Stage. When these their Playes are brought unto maturity, how many houres, evenings, halfe-dayes, and sometimes weekes, are spent by all the Actors (especially in solemne academicall Enterludes) in copying, in conning, in practising their parts, before they are ripe for publike action. When this is finished, how many men are vainely occupied for sundry dayes (yea sometimes yeeres) together, in building Theaters, Stages, Scenes and Scaffolds; in making theatricall Pageants, Apparitions, Attires, Visars, Garments, with such-like Stage-appurtenances, for the more commodious pompous acting and adorning of these vaine-glorious Enterludes. When all things requisite for the publike personating of these Playes are thus exactly accommodated, and the day or night approacheth when these are to be acted, how many hundreds of all sorts vainely if not ridiculously spend whole dayes, whole afternoones and nights oft-times, in attyring themselves in their richest robes; in providing seates to heare, to see and to be seene of others; or in hearing, in beholding these vain lascivious Stage-playes, (which last some three or foure houres at the least, yea sometimes whole dayes and weekes together, as did some Roman Playes, and yet seeme too short to many, to whom a Lecture, a Sermon, a Prayer, not halfe so long, is over tedious:) who thinke themselves well employed all the while they are thus wasting this their pretious time (which they scarce know how to spend) upon these idle Spectacles. Adde we to this, that all our common Actors consume not onely weekes and yeeres, but even their whole lives, in learning, practising, or acting Playes, which besides nights and other seasons, engrosse every afternoone almost thorow-out the yeere, to their peculiar service; as wee see by daily experience here in London; where thousands spend the moitie of the day, the weeke, the yeere in Play-houses, at least-wise far more houres then they employ in holy duties, or in their lawfull callings. If we annex to this the time that divers waste in reading Play-bookes, which some make their chieftest study, preferring them before the Bible or all pious Bookes, on which they seldome seriously cast their eyes; together with the mispent time which the discourses of Playes, either seene or read, occasion: and then summe up all this lost, this mispent time together; we shall soone discern, we must needs acknowledge, that there are no such Helluoës, such canker-wormes, such theevish Devourers of mens most sacred (yet undervalued) time, as Stage-playes.

Not to mention the over-prodigall disbursements upon Playes and Masques of late penurious times, which have bene wel-nigh as expensive as the Wars, and I dare say more chargable to many then their soules, on which the most of us bestow least cost, least time and care. How many hundreds, if not thousands, are there now among us, (to their condemnation, if not their reformation be it spoken,) who spend more, daily, weekly, monethly, if not yeerely at a Play-house to maintaine the Devils service and his instruments, then they disburse in pious uses, in reliefe of Ministers, Schollers, poore godly Christians, or maintenance of Gods service, all their life. How many assiduuous Play-haunters are there who contribute more liberally, more frequently to Play-houses, then to Churches; to Stage-playes, then to Lectures; to Players, then to Preachers; to Actors, then to Poore mens Boxes? being at far greater cost to promote their owne and others just damnation, then themselves or others are to advance their owne or others salvation. How many are there, who can bee at cost to hire a Coach, a Boate, a Barge, to carry them to a Play-house every day, where they must pay deare for their admission, Seates and Boxes; who will hardly be at any cost to convey themselves to a Sermon once a weeke, a moneth, a yeere, (especially on a weeke day) at a Church far nearer to them then the Play-house; where they may have Seates, have entrance, (yea spirituall Cordials, and celestial Dainties to refresh their soules,) without any money or expence. How many are there, who according to their severall qualities spend 2d. 3d. 4d. 6d. 12d. 18d. 2s. and sometimes 4 or 5 shillings at a Play-house, day by day, if Coach-hire, Boate-hire, Tobacco, Wine, Beere, and such like vaine expences which Playes doe usually occasion, be cast into the reckoning; and that in these penurious times, who can hardly spare, who can never honestly get by their lawfull callings, halfe so much. How many prodigally consume not onely their charity, apparell, diet, bookes, and other necessities, but even their annuall Pensions, Revenues and Estates at Picke-purse Stage-playes; which are more expensive to them then all their necessary disbursements. If we summe up all the prodigall vaine expences which Play-houses and Playes occasion every way, we shall finde them almost infinite, wel-nigh incredible, altogether intollerable in any Christian frugall state; which must needs abandon Stage-playes as the Athenians and Romans did at last even in this regard that they impoverish and quite ruine many; as the fore-quoted testimonies, with many domestique experiments, daily testifie.

Edmund Calamy (1600–66), born in London, studied at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and became chaplain to Felton, Bishop of Ely. In 1626–36 he was lecturer at Bury St Edmunds, but resigned when the order to read the Book of Sports was enforced; in 1639 he was chosen minister of St Mary Aldermanbury, London. He had a principal share in Smectymnuus (1641), a reply to Bishop Hall's Divine Right of Episcopacy. It was so called from the initials of the names of the writers—Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurstow (the 'uu' standing for the 'w' of 'William'). Calamy was much in favour with the Presbyterian party, but was, on the whole, a moderate man, and disapproved of those measures which ended in the death of the king. Having exerted himself to promote the restoration of Charles II., he received the offer of the bishopric of Coventry and Lichfield; but, after much deliberation, it was rejected. The passing of the Act of Uniformity in 1662 made him retire from his ministerial duties, and he died heart-broken by the Great Fire of London. His sermons were of a plain and practical character; and five of them, published under the title of The Godly Man's Ark, or a City of Refuge in the Day of his Distress, acquired much popularity. —His grandson, EDMUND CALAMY, D.D. (1671–1732), studied three years at Utrecht, and declining Carstares' offer of a Scottish professorship, from 1694 was a Nonconformist minister in London. "His forty-one works include an Account of the Ejected Ministers (1702) and an interesting Autobiography, first published in 1829.

William Chillingworth (1602–44), a famous polemic, was born at Oxford, and was distinguished as a student there. Hales and Falkland were amongst his friends. An early love of disputation, in which he possessed eminent skill, developed a sceptical temper. A Jesuit named Fisher converted him to the Church of Rome—his chief argument being the necessity of an infallible living guide in matters of faith. He then studied at the Jesuits' College at Douay; and having been, imprudently, requested to write down the reasonings that led to his conversion, he studied anew the whole controversy and became 'a doubting Papist.' Laud, his godfather, wrote a weighty series of letters to him; and his friends induced him to return to Oxford, where, after additional study of the points of difference, he declared in favour of the Protestant faith. His change of creed drew him into several controversies, in which he employed the arguments that were afterwards methodically stated in his famous work, entitled The Religion of the Protestants a safe way to Salvation, published in 1637. This treatise, which placed its author in the first rank of religious controversialists, is now, in spite of its following the line of argument of a now forgotten book attacking him, hailed as a model of perspicuous reasoning, and one of the ablest defences of the Protestant faith. The author maintains that the Scripture is the only rule to which appeal ought to be made in theological disputes, that no Church is infallible, and that the Apostles' Creed embraces all the necessary points of faith. The Arminian opinions of Chillingworth brought upon him the charge of latitudinarianism; and his character for orthodoxy was still further shaken by his refusal to accept of preferment on condition of subscribing the Thirty-nine Articles. His scruples having at length been overcome, he was promoted, in 1638, to the chancellorship of Salisbury. During the Civil War he zealously adhered to the royal party, and even assisted as engineer at the siege of Gloucester in 1643. He died in the bishop's palace in Chichester in the succeeding year. Lord Clarendon, who was one of his intimate friends, has drawn the following character of this eminent divine: 'He was a man of so great a subtilty of understanding, and so rare a temper in debate, that, as it was impossible to provoke him into any passion, so it was very difficult to keep a man's self from being a little discomposed by his sharpness and quickness of argument, and instances in which he had a rare facility, and a great advantage over all the men I ever knew.' Writing to a Roman Catholic, in allusion to the changes of his own faith, Chillingworth says:

I know a man, that of a moderate Protestant turned a Papist, and the day that he did so, was convicted in conscience that his yesterday's opinion was an error. The same man afterwards, upon better consideration, became a doubting Papist, and of a doubting Papist a confirmed Protestant. And yet this man thinks himself no more to blame for all these changes, than a traveller who, using all diligence to find the right way to some remote city, did yet mistake it, and after find his error and amend it. Nay, he stands upon his justification so far, as to maintain that his alterations, not only to you, but also from you, by God's mercy, were the most satisfactory actions to himself that ever he did, and the greatest victories that ever he obtained over himself and his affections, in those things which in this world are most precious.

The following passages from his great work show a like spirit :

The Bible the Religion of Protestants.

Know then, sir, that when I say the religion of Protestants is in prudence to be preferred before yours, as, on the one side, I do not understand by your religion the doctrine of Bellarmine or Baronius, or any other private man amongst you ; nor the doctrine of the Sorbonne, or of the Jesuits, or of the Dominicans, or of any other particular company among you, but that wherein you all agree, or profess to agree, 'the doctrine of the Council of Trent ;' so accordingly on the other side, by the 'religion of protestants,' I do not understand the doctrine of Luther, or Calvin, or Melancthon ; nor the Confession of Augusta, or Geneva, nor the Catechism of Heidelberg, nor the Articles of the Church of England, no, nor the harmony of Protestant confessions ; but that wherein they all agree, and which they all subscribe with a greater harmony, as a perfect rule of their faith and actions ; that is, the BIBLE. The BIBLE, I say, the BIBLE only, is the religion of protestants ! Whatsoever else they believe besides it, and the plain, irrefragable, indubitable consequences of it, well may they hold it as a matter of opinion ; but as matter of faith and religion, neither can they with coherence to their own grounds believe it themselves, nor require the belief of it of others, without most high and most schismatical presumption. I for my part, after a long and (as I verily believe and hope) impartial search of 'the true way to eternal happiness,' do profess plainly that I cannot find any rest for the sole of my foot but upon this rock only. I see plainly and with mine own eyes, that there are popes against popes, councils against councils, some fathers against others, the same fathers against themselves, a consent of fathers of one age against a consent of fathers of another age, the church of one age against the church of another age. Traditional interpretations of scripture are pretended ; but there are few or none to be found : no tradition, but only of scripture, can derive itself from the fountain, but may be plainly proved either to have been brought in, in such an age after Christ, or that in such an age it was not in. In a word, there is no sufficient certainty but of scripture only for any considering man to build upon. This therefore, and this only, I have reason to believe : this I will profess, according to this I will live, and for this, if there be occasion, I will not only willingly, but even gladly, lose my life, though I should be sorry that Christians should take it from me.

Reason in Religion.

But you that would not have men follow their reason, what would you have them follow ? their passions ? or pluck out their eyes, and go blindfold ? No, you say ; you would have them follow authority. In God's name, let them ; we also would have them follow authority ; for it is upon the authority of universal tradition that we would have them believe Scripture. But then, as for the authority which you would have them follow, you will let them see reason why they should follow it. And is not this to go a little about ?—to leave reason for a short turn, and then to come to it again, and to do that which you condemn in others ? It being indeed a plain impossibility for any man to submit his reason but to reason ; for he that doth it to authority, must of necessity think himself to have greater reason to believe that authority.

There is a Life by Des Maizeaux (1725), and one by Birch prefixed to his edition of the works (1742), which includes also nine sermons. Another edition was published in 1838 in 3 vols. See Tulloch's Rational Theology in England.

John Gauden (1605–1662) was born at Mayland, near Maldon, in Essex ; was educated at Bury St Edmunds and St John's College, Cambridge ; and on the commencement of the Civil War complied with the Presbyterian party. He received several church preferments, which he continued to hold even after the Parliament proceeded against monarchy. When the army resolved to impeach and try the king, in 1648, he published A Religious and Loyal Protestation against their purposes and proceedings, and other polemical tractates. But his grand service to the royal cause consisted in his writing Εἰκὼν Βασιλική ; the Pourtraicture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings, a work which bears to be from the pen of Charles I. himself, and to contain the devout meditations of his later days. There appears to have been an intention to publish this Pourtraicture before the execution of the king, as an attempt to save his life by working on the feelings of the people ; but it did not make its appearance till a day or two after His Majesty's death. The sensation which it produced in his favour was extraordinary. 'It is not easy,' says Hume, 'to conceive the general compassion excited towards the king by the publishing, at so critical a juncture, a work so full of piety, meekness, and humanity. Many have not scrupled to ascribe to that book the subsequent restoration of the royal family. Milton compares its effects to those which were wrought on the tumultuous Romans by Antony's reading to them the will of Cæsar.' So eagerly and universally was the book perused by the nation that it passed through forty-seven editions in a year. Milton, in his Eikonoclastes, alludes to the doubts which prevailed as to the authorship of the work, but at this time the real history was unknown. The first statements that it was by Gauden seem to have been made, by persons well qualified to know, as early as 1674, and rumours were plentifully current when in 1692 the book was expressly said to be Gauden's composition in a circumstantial narrative published by Gauden's former curate, Walker. Several writers then entered the field on both sides of the question; the principal defender of the king's claim being Wagstaffe, a nonjuring clergyman, who published an elaborate Vindication of King Charles the Martyr in 1693. For ten years subsequently the literary war continued; but after this there ensued a long interval of repose. When Hume wrote his History, the evidence on the two sides appeared so equally balanced that, 'with regard to the genuineness of that production, it is not easy,' says he, 'for a historian to fix any opinion which will be entirely to his own satisfaction.' In 1786, however, the scale of evidence was turned by the publication, in the third volume of the Clarendon State Papers, of some of Gauden's letters, the most important of which are six addressed by him to Lord Chancellor Clarendon after the Restoration. He there complains of the poverty of the see of Exeter, to which he had already been appointed, and urgently solicits a further reward for the important secret service which he had performed to the royal cause. Some of these letters, containing allusions to the circumstance, had formerly been printed, though in a less authentic form; but now for the first time appeared one, dated the 13th of March 1661, in which he explicitly grounds his claim to additional remuneration, 'not on what was known to the world under my name, but what goes under the late blessed king's name, the Eikon or Portraiture of his Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings. This book and figure,' he adds, 'was wholly and only my invention, making, and design; in order to vindicate the king's wisdom, honour, and piety.' He professed to have begun it in 1647, and to have submitted a MS. copy to the king in the Isle of Wight. Clarendon seems to have spoken in the last year of his life as if he did not admit Gauden's authorship; but in his History of the Rebellion, undertaken at the desire of Charles I. and avowedly intended as a vindication of the royal character and cause, he maintains the most rigid silence with respect to the Eikon Basilike. The troublesome solicitations of Gauden were so effectual as to lead to his promotion, in 1662, to the bishopric of Worcester; a dignity, however, which he did not long enjoy, for he died in the same year. The controversy as to the authorship of the Eikon Basilike is by some still decided in favour of the king. Such was the conclusion arrived at in a work published in 1824 by Dr Wordsworth, Master of Trinity College; Southey took the same view, which was energetically maintained in Mr E. J. L. Scott's edition of the Eikon (1880). But the arguments of Malcolm Laing, Todd, Sir James Mackintosh, Hallam, Lingard, and most historians down to Green accept Gauden's claim (acquiesced in by many of his royalist contemporaries) to be considered the author. Doble in the Academy for May and June 1883 makes out a strong case for Gauden's authorship. Internal evidence supports Gauden's claim;

the style is much too measured and rhetorical for that of Charles, who was a careless, confused, and inexact writer. There is A Bibliography of the King's Book by Edward Almack (1896). The Eikon thus reflects on the events of the Civil War:

The various successes of this unhappy war have at least afforded me variety of good meditations. Sometimes God was pleased to try me with victory, by worsting my enemies, that I might know how with moderation and thanks to own and use his power, who is only the true Lord of Hosts, able when he pleases to repress the confidence of those that fought against me with so great advantages for power and number.

From small beginnings on my part, he let me see that I was not wholly forsaken by my people's love or his protection. Other times God was pleased to exercise my patience, and teach me not to trust in the arm of flesh, but in the living God. My sins sometimes prevailed against the justice of my cause; and those that were with me wanted not matter and occasion for his just chastisement both of them and me. Nor were my enemies lesse punished by that prosperity, which hardened them to continue that injustice by open hostility, which was begun by most riotous and unparliamentary tumults. There is no doubt but personall and private sins may oftentimes overbalance the justice of public engagements; nor doth God account every gallant man (in the world's esteeme) a fit instrument to assert in the way of war a righteous cause. The more men are prone to arrogate to their own skill, valour, and strength, the lesse doth God ordinarily work by them for his own glory. I am sure the event or successe can never state the justice of any cause, nor the peace of men's consciences, nor the eternal fate of their soules.

Those with me had (I think) clearly and undoubtedly for their justification the Word of God and the laws of the land, together with their own oathes; all requiring obedience to my just commands; but to none other under heaven without me, or against me, in the point of raising armes. Those on the other side are forced to flie to the shifts of some pretended fears, and wild fundamentals of state (as they call them) which actually overthrow the present fabrick both of church and state; being such imaginary reasons for self-defence as are most impertinent for those men to alledge, who, being my subjects, were manifestly the first assaulters of me and the lawes: first by unsuppressed tumults, after by listed forces. The same allegations they use, will fit any faction that hath but power and confidence enough to second with the sword all their demands against the present lawes and governours, which can never be such as some side or other will not find fault with, so as to urge what they call a reformation of them to a rebellion against them. Some parasitick preachers have dared to call those martyrs who died fighting against me, the lawes, their oathes and the religion established.

Arthur Wilson (1595-1652), born at Yarmouth, became secretary to Robert, Earl of Essex, afterwards Parliamentary general in the Civil Wars, whom he accompanied on his Continental campaigns (1620-25); and in 1633, after two years' study at Oxford, entered the service of the second Earl of Warwick, colonial adventurer and Parliamentary admiral. Wilson too was hostile to the Stewart régime; his Life and Reign of King James I. (1653), was called by Heylyn 'a most famous pasquil.' His plays are The Inconstant Lady (ed. Bliss, 1814), and The Swisser (ed. Feuillerat, 1904).

Sir Anthony Weldon gives an even more unfavourable picture of the same period in his Court and Character of King James. Having as Clerk of the Kitchen accompanied the king to Scotland in 1617, Weldon wrote a highly depreciatory account of Scotland, and was dismissed from office. He revenged himself by drawing up this sketch of the court and its monarch, in which a graphic but bitterly overcharged description of James's personal appearance, habits, and oddities is given. Weldon seems to have died about 1649.

Baker's Chronicle, long the standard English history, takes its name from Sir Richard Baker (1568-1645), who, born in Kent and educated at Oxford, was knighted in 1603. High-Sheriff of Oxfordshire in 1620, in 1635 he was thrown for debt into the Fleet Prison, where he died. There he wrote his famous but far from accurate Chronicle of the Kings of England unto the Death of King James (1643). Other works penned in prison were Meditations and Disquisitions on portions of Scripture, translations of Balzac's Letters and Malvezzi's Discourses on Tacitus, and two pieces in defence of the theatre. Probably no part of Baker's own Chronicle was more popular with country gentlemen than its continuation by Edward Phillips (1630-96?), Milton's nephew, who, carefully trained by the poet, became a hack writer, producing poems, dictionaries, bombastic novels, an edition of Drummond's poems, &c. His most considerable effort was his continuation of the Chronicle to the coronation of Charles II. The critical period of the civil troubles was wholly the work of Phillips, who wrote from the standpoint of a decided royalist; for the Restoration he had the help (if not the MS.) of Monk's brother-in-law, Sir Thomas Clarges. The fourth edition (1662) became the standard one; the eighth appeared in 1684. Addison makes the Chronicle the favourite reading of Sir Roger de Coverley, who kept it lying in his hall window. Doubtless Sir Roger often read the story of the king's execution (much 'contracted' in the 1730 and later editions):

On Tuesday the 30th of January, which was the fatal day on which the king was put to death, the Bishop of London did in the morning read divine service in his presence; to which duty the xxvii. chapter of St Matthew, being the history of our Saviours passion, was appointed by the Church-Calendar for the second lesson: but he, supposing it to have been selected on purpose, thanked him afterwards for his seasonable choice. But the bishop modestly declining those undue thanks, told him that it came by course to be read on that day, which very much comforted His Majesty, who proceeded to the remaining duties of receiving from the bishop the holy sacrament, and the other preparations for his approaching passion.

His devotions being ended, about ten a clock he was brought from St James's to White-hall by a regiment of foot, with colours flying, and drums beating (through the Park), part marching before and part behind, with a private guard of partisans about him, the bishop on the one hand and Colonel Tomlinson (who had the charge of him) on the other bare-headed. The guards marching a slow pace, as on a solemn and sad occasion to their ill-tuned drums, he bid them go faster (as his usual manner of walking was), saying, That he now went before them to strive for an heavenly crown with less sollicitude than he had often encouraged his souldiers to fight for an earthly diadem.

Being come to the end of the Park, he went up the stairs leading to the Long Gallery in White-Hall, where he used formerly to lodge. There finding an unexpected delay in being brought upon the scaffold, which they had begun but that morning, he past the most of that time (having received a letter from the prince in the interim by Mr Seymour) in prayer.

About twelve a clock, His Majesty (refusing to dine) eat onely a bit of bread, and drank a glass of claret; and about an hour after Colonel Hacker, with other officers and souldiers, brought him with the bishop and Colonel Tomlinson through the banquetting-house to the scaffold, whereto the passage was made through a window. A strong guard of several regiments of horse and foot were placed on all sides, which hindred the near approach of his miserable and distracted subjects (who for manifesting their sorrow, were most barbarously used), and the king from speaking what he had designed for their ears: whereupon finding himself disappointed, he omitted much of his intended matter, but having viewed the scaffold (which had irons driven in it to force him down to the block by ropes, if that he should have resisted) and the ax (of whose edge he was very careful), having minded one present of touching it with his cloak [sic]. . . .

Being upon the scaffold, he looked very earnestly upon the block, and asked Colonel Hacker if it could be no higher: and then spoke thus (directing his speech chiefly to the bishop and Colonel Tomlinson). . . .

[Then follows the king's speech in full.]

Bishop. Though your Majesties affections may be very well known to religion, yet it may be expected that you should say somewhat thereof for the worlds satisfaction.

King. I thank you very heartily, my lord, for that I had almost forgotten it; in troth, sirs, my conscience in religion I think is very well known to all the world, and therefore I declare before you all that I die a Christian, according to the profession of the Church of England, as I found it left me by my father, and this honest man I think will witness it. Then speaking to the executioner he said, I shall say but very short prayers, and when I thrust out my hands—let that be your sign.

Then he called to the bishop for his night-cap, and having put it on, he said to the executioner, Does my hair trouble you? who desired him to put it all under his cap, which the king did accordingly by the help of the executioner and the bishop: then the king turning to the bishop said, I have a good cause and a gracious God on my side.

Bishop. There is but one stage more, this stage is turbulent and troublesome, it is a short one: but you may consider it will soon carry you a very great way: it will carry you from earth to heaven, and there you will find a great deal of cordial joy and comfort.

King. I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can be, no disturbance in the world.

Bishop. You are exchanged from a temporary to an eternal crown, a good exchange.

The king then said to the executioner, Is my hair well? and took off his cloak and his George, giving his George to the bishop, saying, Remember. Then he put off his doublet, and being in his wastcoat, he put his cloak on again; then looking upon the block, he said to the executioner, You must set it fast.

Executioner. It is fast, sir.

King. When I put my hands out this way—stretching them out—then do your work.

After that, having said two or three words (as he stood) to himself, with hands and eyes lift up, immediately stooping down, he laid his neck upon the block: and then the executioner again putting his hair under his cap, the king (thinking he had been going to strike) said, Stay for the sign.

Executioner. Yes, I will, and it please your Majesty.

And after a very little pause, the king stretching forth his hands, the executioner at one blow severed his head from his body; the head being off, the executioner held it up, and shewed it to the people, which done, it was with the body put in a coffin covered with black velvet for that purpose, and conveyed into his lodgings at White-Hall; and from thence it was carried to his house at Saint James's, where his body was embalmed and put in a coffin of lead, and laid there a fortnight to be seen by the people: and on Wednesday seven-night after, his corps embalmed and coffin'd in lead, was delivered chiefly to the care of four of his servants, viz. Mr Herbert, Capt. Anthony Mildmay, his sewers, Captain Preston, and John Joyner (formerly cook to his Majesty), who with others in mourning, accompanied the herse that night to Windsor, and placed it in that which was formerly the kings bed-chamber: whence it was next day removed into the Deans Hall, and from thence by the Duke of Richmond, the Marquess of Hertford, the Marquess of Dorchester, and the Earl of Lindsey, conveyed to St George his chappel, and the corps there interred in the vault (as is supposed) of King Henry the VIII. and Queen Jane, with this inscription upon the coffin,

CHARLES KING OF ENGLAND.
M.DC.XL.VIII.

Apropos of the carp Izaak Walton quoted the Chronicle to this effect:

Hops and turkeys, carps and beer,
Came into England all in a year.

Sir William Dugdale (1605–86), antiquary, was born at Shustoke, near Coleshill, in Warwickshire. He studied law and history under his father, soon after whose death he purchased the neighbouring manor of Blythe (1625). Created Rouge Croix poursuivant (1640), he during the Great Rebellion adhered to the royalist cause, and from 1642 to 1646 was at Oxford, the king's headquarters, being made M.A. and Chester herald. He lived in obscurity during the Commonwealth, but on the Restoration received the office of Norroy, and in 1677 was promoted to be Garter Principal King of Arms and knight. His works are the Monasticon Anglicanum (1655–61–73), a Latin history of English religious foundations (Eng. ed. 6 vols. 1817–30); Antiquities of Warwickshire (1656; 3d ed. 1763–65); History of St Paul's Cathedral (1658); History of Imbanking and Drayning (1662); Origines Juridiciales (1666); and Baronage of England (3 vols. 1675–76). See his Life, Diary, and Correspondence, edited by William Hamper (1827).

Elias Ashmole (1617–92), antiquary, was born at Lichfield, and became a solicitor, but, a hearty royalist, entered Brazenose College, Oxford, where he applied himself to mathematics, natural philosophy, astronomy, astrology, and alchemy. In 1646 he became acquainted with Lilly and other astrologers; and in 1650 he edited a work of Dr Dee's, to which he subjoined a treatise of his own. In 1652 he issued his Theatrum Chymicum, and in 1672 his magnum opus, a History of the Order of the Garter. At the Restoration various honours were conferred upon him, and thenceforward he mainly devoted himself to heraldic and antiquarian studies. In 1682 he presented to the University of Oxford a fine collection of rarities, bequeathed him by his old friend John Tradescant (1608–62), gardener to Charles I., which was thereafter known as the Ashmolean Museum. Among his friends were Selden and Dugdale, whose daughter became his third wife. His Diary (1717; ed. Gunther, 1927) is entertaining.

Sir Thomas Browne,

the learned, desultory, eloquent writer of the Religio Medici, was born in London in 1605, and after being educated at Winchester and Oxford, travelled in Ireland, and also in France, Italy, and Holland. He took his doctor's degree at Leyden, and settled in 1637 as a medical practitioner at Norwich. He was knighted by Charles II. on his visit to Norwich in 1671. Browne's first and greatest work, Religio Medici ('The Religion of a Physician'), written about 1635, was published surreptitiously in 1642, and next year a perfect copy was issued by himself; this, his confession of faith, revealing a deep insight into the mysteries of the spiritual life, immediately rendered the author famous in the literary world. Here he gives a minute account of his opinions, not only on religion, but on an endless variety of philosophical and abstruse questions, besides affording the reader glimpses into the eccentricities of his personal character. The language of the work is bold and poetical, adorned with picturesque imagery, though frequently pedantic, rugged, and obscure. His most elaborate work, Pseudodoxia Epidemica, or Enquiries into . . . Vulgar Errors, appeared in 1646, and is a strange and discursive amalgam of humour, acuteness, learning, and credulity. The following enumeration of some of the errors which he endeavours to dispel will serve both to show the kind of subjects he was fond of investigating, and to exemplify the notions which prevailed in the seventeenth century:

That crystal is nothing else but ice strongly congealed; that a diamond is softened or broken by the blood of a goat; that a pot full of ashes will contain as much water as it would without them; that bays preserve from the mischief of lightning and thunder; that an elephant hath no joints; that a wolf, first seeing a man, begets a dumbness in him; that moles are blind; that the flesh of peacocks corrupteth not; that storks will only live in republics and free states; that the chicken is made out of the yolk of the egg; that men weigh heavier dead than alive; that the forbidden fruit was an apple; that there was no rainbow before the Flood; that John the Baptist should not die.

He treats also of the ring-finger, saluting upon sneezing, pigmies, the canicular or dog days, the picture of Moses with horns, the blackness of negroes, the river Nilus, Gypsies, Methuselah, the food of John the Baptist, the cessation of oracles, Friar Bacon's brazen head that spoke, the poverty of Belisarius, and the wish of Philoxenus to have the neck of a crane. In 1658 Browne published his Hydriotaphia; Urn Burial, or a Discourse of the Sepulchral Urns lately found in Norfolk, mainly a discussion of burial-customs. Here the author's learning appears in the details which he gives concerning the modes in which the bodies of the dead have been disposed of in different ages and countries; while his reflections on death, oblivion, and immortality are, for solemnity and grandeur, unsurpassed in English literature, and are set forth in language of rich and gorgeous eloquence. In a field at Walsingham were dug up between forty and fifty urns, containing the remains of human bones, some small brass instruments, boxes, and other fragmentary relics. Coals and burnt substances were found near the same plot of ground, and hence it was conjectured that this was the Ustrina, or place of burning, or the spot whereon the Druidical sacrifices were made. Thus furnished with a theme for his philosophic musings, Sir Thomas Browne comments on that vast charnel-house the earth. The Hydriotaphia commences:

In the deep discovery of the subterranean world, a shallow part would satisfy some enquirers; who if two or three yards were open above the surface, would not care to rake the bowels of Potosi and regions towards the centre. Nature hath furnished one part of the earth, and man another. The treasures of time lie high, in urns, coins, and monuments, scarce below the roots of some vegetables. Time hath endless rarities, and shows of all varieties; which reveals old things in heaven, makes new discoveries in earth, and even earth itself a discovery. That great antiquity, America, lay buried for a thousand years; and a large part of the earth is still in the urn unto us. Though, if Adam were made out of an extract of the earth, all parts might challenge a restitution, yet few have returned their bones far lower than they might receive them; not affecting the graves of giants, under hilly and heavy coverings, but content with less than their own depth, have wished their bones might lie soft, and the earth be light upon them; even such as hope to rise again would not be content with central interment, or so desperately to place their relics as to lie beyond discovery, and in no way to be seen again; which happy contrivance hath made communication with our forefathers, and left unto our view some parts which they never beheld themselves.

He then successively describes and comments upon the different modes of interment and decomposition—whether by fire ('some apprehending a purifying virtue in fire, refining the grosser com-mixture, and firing out [expelling by means of fire] the ethereal particles so deeply immersed in it'); by making their graves in the air like the Scythians, 'who swore by wind and sword;' or in the sea, like some of the nations about Egypt.

Men have lost their reason in nothing so much as their religion, wherein stones and clouts make martyrs; and since the religion of one seems madness unto another, to afford an account or rational of old rights requires no rigid reader. That they kindled the pyre aversely, or turning their face from it, was a handsome symbol of unwilling ministration; that they washed their bones with wine and milk; that the mother wrapt them in linen and dried them in her bosom, the first fostering part, and place of their nourishment; that they opened their eyes towards heaven, before they kindled the fire, as the place of their hopes or original, were no improper ceremonies. Their last valediction, thrice uttered by the attendants, was also very solemn, and somewhat answered by Christians, who thought it too little if they threw not the earth thrice upon the interred body. That in strewing their tombs the Romans affected the rose, the Greeks amaranthus and myrtle; that the funeral pyre consisted of sweet fuel, cypress, fir, larix, yew, and trees perpetually verdant, lay silent expressions of their surviving hopes; wherein Christians, who deck their coffins with bays, have found a more elegant emblem; for that tree seeming dead, will restore itself from the root, and its dry and exsuccous leaves resume their verdure again; which, if we mistake not, we have also observed in furze. Whether the planting of yew in churchyards hold not its original from ancient funeral rites, or as an emblem of resurrection, from its perpetual verdure, may also admit conjecture.

Among felicitous brevities may be quoted:

Nature is not at variance with art, nor art with nature, they being both the servants of His providence. Art is the perfection of nature. Were the world now as it was the sixth day, there were yet a chaos. Nature hath made one world, and art another. In belief, all things are artificial, for nature is the art of God. He who discommendeth others obliquely commendeth himself. I had rather stand in the shock of a basilisk than in the fury of a merciless pen. A good cause needs not to be patroned by passion, but can sustain itself upon a temperate dispute.

To the Hydriotaphia is appended a small treatise, the most whimsical and not the least laborious of his works—The Garden of Cyrus; or the Quincuncial Lozenge, Network Plantations of the Ancients, artificially, naturally, and mystically considered. It aims to prove that the mystical number five pervaded not only ancient horticulture, but that it recurs through plant and animal life. Coleridge says Browne ‘finds quincunxes in heaven above, quincunxes on earth below, quincunxes in the mind of man, quincunxes in tones, in optic nerves, in roots of trees, in leaves, in everything.’ One of the most striking of these fancies has been often quoted. Wishing to denote that it is late, or that he was writing at a late hour, he says that ‘the quincunx of heaven [the Hyades] runs low, and . . . we are unwilling to spin out our awaking thoughts into the phantasms of sleep; . . . to keep our eyes open longer were but to act our antipodes; the huntsmen are up in America, and they are already past their first sleep in Persia.’ Among Browne’s posthumous pieces are Miscellany Tracts (1684), A Letter to a Friend (1690), and a collection of aphorisms or jottings, entitled Christian Morals, apparently intended as a kind of continuation of the Religio Medici. He left in MS. also various essays on antiquarian and other subjects. Sir Thomas Browne died in 1682, at the age of seventy-seven; in 1840 his skull was stolen out of its grave in St Peter’s Mancroft, and placed in the hospital museum. He was of a modest, simple, and cheerful disposition, retiring in his habits, and sympathised little with the pursuits and feelings of the busy multitude. He sided with the king in the Civil War, and was knighted by Charles II. Though he made it his business to combat ‘vulgar errors,’ his own mind was deeply tinged with the credulity of his age. He clung to the discredited Ptolemaic system; believed in astrology and alchemy, in witchcraft, apparitions, and diabolical illusions; and gravely observes, ‘that to those who would attempt to teach animals the art of speech, the dogs and cats that usually speak unto witches may afford some encouragement.’ In 1664 at Bury St Edmunds he gave evidence against two ‘witches,’ and helped towards their conviction and burning.

Though Browne’s works are unsystematic, desultory, unequal, his thought, like his style, is strikingly original, marked by high and occasionally transcendent intellectual power, often expressed with quaint humour or searching pathos, and always carrying with it a strange impressiveness. His favourite theme throughout all his books is ever the mystery of death and what lies beyond the grave, and the visible signs of mortality mean as much to him as they did to Shakespeare himself as a text from which to descant on what transcends the little sphere of human life. His style is too peculiar, idiomatic, and difficult ever to be generally popular, and it must be admitted that his studious brevity often lapses sadly into obscurity. In his own words, ‘the quality of the subject will sometimes carry us into expressions beyond mere English apprehensions;’ and indeed no writer has equalled him in the free coinage of Latinisms. Thus, speaking in his Vulgar Errors of the nature of ice, he says: ‘Ice is only water congealed by the frigidity of the air, whereby it acquireth no new form, but rather a consistence or determination of its diffuency, and amitteth not its essence, but condition of fluidity. Neither doth there anything properly congeliate but water, or watery humidity; for the determination of quicksilver is properly fixation; that of milk, coagulation; and that of oil and unctuous bodies, only incassation.’ He employs abundantly such words as dilucidate, ampliate, resipieny, opinionatry, manuduction, indigitate, reminiscential, evocation, farraginous, advenient, ariolation, lapifidical. He also uses words of Latin origin in their etymological sense, deals freely in technical terms from the sciences, and does not hesitate to coin Grecisms or use modern French and Italian words. Yet his Latinisms and innovations seem rhetorically in harmony with the rolling rhythm of his marvellous prose.

Dr Johnson’s style shows obvious resemblances to Browne’s, especially in its Latinistic vocabulary. There can be no doubt that the author of the Rambler acquired much of his fondness for grandiloquent and sonorous words and expressions from the writings of the learned knight of Norwich; the Life of Browne prefixed to an edition of the Christian Morals (1756) was by Johnson. It is needless to say that Johnson’s clear and graceful use of his much less audaciously Latinist vocabulary differs from Browne’s abstruse and often involved and obscure style of disquisition perhaps more than it resembles it. It is inevitable that Browne’s contemplative, inquisitive, fantastic pensiveness should be compared and contrasted with the more sombre and less poetical but equally humorous temperament of his earlier contemporary, Burton, the anatomist of melancholy. Cowper's Task shows many traces of the Morals. Coleridge, who was so well qualified to appreciate the writings of Browne, has numbered him among his first favourites. 'Rich in various knowledge, exuberant in conceptions and conceits; contemplative, imaginative, often truly great and magnificent in his style and diction, though, doubtless, too often big, stiff, and hyper-Latinistic. He is a quiet and sublime enthusiast, with a strong tinge of the fantast: the humorist constantly mingling with, and flashing across, the philosopher, as the darting colours in shot-silk play upon the main dye.' Coleridge insists, too, on the entireness of Browne in every subject before him. He never wanders from it, and he has no occasion to wander; for whatever happens to be his subject, he metamorphoses all nature into it. To this should be added the complete originality of his mind. He is manifestly like no other writer, and his quaint, profound, and mystical abstractions, stamped with his peculiar style, carry the imagination by an inevitable fascination back into the primeval ages of the world, or forward into the depths of eternity. Browne's influence on English literature has been deep and lasting, if not very wide in extent. No writer bears the impress of his influence more strongly marked, alike in style and cast of thought, than Charles Lamb, who indeed boasted that he was the first 'among the moderns' to discover his excellences. Hazlitt, Carlyle, and Pater paid their tribute to him. De Quincey ranked him with Jeremy Taylor as the richest and most dazzling of rhetoricians, and Lowell called him 'our most imaginative mind since Shakespeare:' perhaps it is truer to say that his supremest merit rests in his being the highest type of the profound humorist, to whom 'all existence had been but food for contemplation.'

Oblivion.

What song the syrens sang, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women, though puzzling questions, are not beyond all conjecture. What time the persons of these ossuaries entered the famous nations of the dead, and slept with princes and counsellors, might admit a wide solution. But who were the proprietaries of these bones, or what bodies these ashes made up, were a question above antiquarianism; not to be resolved by man, nor easily perhaps by spirits, except we consult the provincial guardians, or tutelary observers. Had they made as good provision for their names as they have done for their relics, they had not so grossly erred in the art of perpetuation. But to subsist in bones, and be but pyramidally extant, is a fallacy in duration. Vain ashes, which, in the oblivion of names, persons, times, and sexes, have found unto themselves a fruitless continuation, and only arise unto late posterity, as emblems of mortal vanities, antidotes against pride, vainglory, and madding vices. Pagan vain-glories, which thought the world might last for ever, had encouragement for ambition, and finding no Atropos unto the immortality of their names, were never damp't with the necessity of oblivion. Even old ambitions had the advantage of ours, in the attempts of their vain-glories, who acting early and before the probable meridian of time, have by this time found great accomplishment of their designs, whereby the ancient heroes have already out-lasted their monuments and mechanical preservations. But in this latter scene of time we cannot expect such mummies unto our memories, when ambition may fear the prophecy of Elias; and Charles V. can never hope to live within two Methuselahs of Hector.

And therefore restless inquietude for the diuturnity of our memories unto present considerations seems a vanity almost out of date, and superannuated piece of folly. We cannot hope to live so long in our names as some have done in their persons; one face of Janus holds no proportion unto the other. 'Tis too late to be ambitious. The great mutations of the world are acted, or time may be too short for our designs. To extend our memories by monuments, whose death we daily pray for, and whose duration we cannot hope, without injury to our expectations in the advent of the last day, were a contradiction to our beliefs. We whose generations are ordained in this setting part of time, are providentially taken off from such imaginations; and being necessitated to eye the remaining particle of futurity, are naturally constituted unto thoughts of the next world, and cannot excusably decline the consideration of that duration, which maketh pyramids pillars of snow, and all that's past a moment.

Circles and right lines limit and close all bodies, and the mortal right-lined circle must conclude and shut up all. There is no antidote against the opium of time, which temporally considereth all things. Our fathers find their graves in our short memories, and sadly tell us how we may be buried in our survivors. Grave-stones tell truth scarce forty years. Generations pass while some trees stand, and old families last not three oaks. To be read by bare inscriptions like many in Gruter, to hope for eternity by enigmatical epithets or first letters of our names, to be studied by antiquaries, who we were, and have new names given us, like many of the mummies, are cold consolations unto the students of perpetuity, even by everlasting languages.

To be content that times to come should only know there was such a man, not caring whether they knew more of him, was a frigid ambition in Cardan; disparaging his horoscopal inclination and judgment of himself, who cares to subsist, like Hippocrates' patients, or Achilles' horses in Homer, under naked nominations, without deserts and noble acts, which are the balsam of our memories, the entelechia and soul of our subsistences. To be nameless in worthy deeds exceeds an infamous history. The Canaanitish woman lives more happily without a name than Herodias with one. And who had not rather have been the good thief than Pilate?

But the iniquity of oblivion blindly scattereth her poppy, and deals with the memory of men without distinction to merit or perpetuity. Who can but pity the founder of the Pyramids? Herostratus lives that burnt the temple of Diana, he is almost lost that built it. Time hath spared the epitaph of Adrian's horse, confounded that of himself. In vain we compute our felicities by the advantage of our good names, since bad have equal durations; and Thersites is like to live as long as Agamemnon. Who knows whether the best of men be known, or whether there be not more remarkable persons forgot, than any that stand remembered in the known account of time? Without the favour of the everlasting register, the first man had been as unknown as the last, and Methuselah's long life had been his only chronicle.

Oblivion is not to be hired. The greater part must be content to be as though they had not been, to be found in the register of God, not in the record of man. Twenty-seven names make up the first story [before the Flood]; and the recorded names ever since contain not one living century. The number of the dead long exceedeth all that shall live. The night of time far surpasseth the day, and who knows when was the equinox? Every hour adds unto that current arithmetick, which scarce stands one moment. And since death must be the Lucina of life, and even pagans could doubt whether thus to live were to die; since our longest sun sets at right descensions, and makes but winter arches, and therefore it cannot be long before we lie down in darkness, and have our light in ashes; since the brother of death daily haunts us with dying mementos, and time, that grows old in itself, bids us hope no long duration, diuturnity is a dream and folly of expectation.

Darkness and light divide the course of time, and oblivion shares with memory a great part even of our living beings; we slightly remember our felicities, and the smartest strokes of affliction leave but short smart upon us. Sense endureth no extremities, and sorrows destroy us or themselves. To weep into stones are fables. Afflictions induce callosities; miseries are slippery, or fall like snow upon us, which notwithstanding is no unhappy stupidity. To be ignorant of evils to come, and forgetful of evils past, is a merciful provision in nature, whereby we digest the mixture of our few and evil days, and, our delivered senses not relapsing into cutting remembrances, our sorrows are not kept raw by the edge of repetitions. A great part of antiquity contented their hopes of subsistency with a transmigration of their souls—a good way to continue their memories, while, having the advantage of plural successions, they could not but act something remarkable in such variety of beings, and, enjoying the fame of their passed selves, make accumulation of glory unto their last durations. Others, rather than be lost in the uncomfortable night of nothing, were content to recede into the common being, and make one particle of the public soul of all things, which was no more than to return into their unknown and divine original again. Egyptian ingenuity was more unsatisfied, contriving their bodies in sweet consistencies to attend the return of their souls. But all was vanity, feeding the wind, and folly. The Egyptian mummies, which Cambyes or time hath spared, avarice now consumeth. Mummy is become merchandise; Mizraim cures wounds, and Pharaoh is sold for balsams.

In vain do individuals hope for immortality, or any patent from oblivion, in preservations below the moon; men have been deceived even in their flatteries, above the sun, and studied conceits to perpetuate their names in heaven. The various cosmography of that part hath already varied the names of contrived constellations; Nimrod is lost in Orion, and Osyris in the Dog-star.

While we look for incorruption in the heavens, we find they are but like the earth;—durable in their main bodies, alterable in their parts; whereof, beside comets and new stars, perspectives begin to tell tales, and the spots that wander about the sun, with Phaeton's favour, would make clear conviction.

There is nothing strictly immortal but immortality. Whatever hath no beginning may be confident of no end (all others have a dependent being and within the reach of destruction); which is the peculiar of that necessary Essence that cannot destroy itself, and the highest strain of omnipotency, to be so powerfully constituted as not to suffer even from the power of itself; all others have a dependent being, and within the reach of destruction. But the sufficiency of Christian immortality frustrates all earthly glory, and the quality of either state after death makes a folly of posthumous memory. God, who can only destroy our souls, and hath assured our resurrection, either of our bodies or names hath directly promised no duration. Wherein there is so much of chance, that the boldest expectants have found unhappy frustration; and to hold long subsistence seems but a scape in oblivion. But man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes, and pompous in the grave, solemnising natiivities and deaths with equal lustre, nor omitting ceremonies of bravery in the infamy of his nature.

Life is a pure flame, and we live by an invisible sun within us. A small fire sufficeth for life, great flames seemed too little after death, while men vainly affected precious pyres, and to burn like Sardanapalus; but the wisdom of funeral laws found the folly of prodigal blazes, and reduced undoing fires unto the rule of sober obsequies, wherein few could be so mean as not to provide wood, pitch, a mourner, and an urn.

Five languages secured not the epitaph of Gordianus. The man of God lives longer without a tomb than any by one, invisibly interred by angels, and adjudged to obscurity, though not without some marks directing human discovery. Enoch and Elias, without either tomb or burial, in an anomalous state of being, are the great examples of perpetuity, in their long and living memory, in strict account being still on this side death, and having a late part yet to act upon this stage of earth. If in the decreitory term of the world we shall not all die but be changed, according to received translation, the last day will make but few graves; at least quick resurrections will anticipate lasting sepultures. Some graves will be opened before they be quite closed, and Lazarus be no wonder. When many that feared to die, shall groan that they can die but once, the dismal state is the second and living death, when life puts despair on the damned; when men shall wish the coverings of mountains, not of monuments, and annihilations shall be courted.

While some have studied monuments, others have studiously declined them, and some have been so vainly boisterous, that they durst not acknowledge their graves; wherein Alaricus seems most subtle, who had a river turned to hide his bones at the bottom. Even Sylla, that thought himself safe in his urn, could not prevent revenging tongues, and stones thrown at his monument. Happy are they whom privacy makes innocent, who deal so with men in this world, that they are not afraid to meet them in the next; who, when they die, make no commotion among the dead, and are not touched with that poetical taunt of Isaiah.

Pyramids, arches, obelisks were but the irregularities of vain-glory, and wild enormities of ancient magnanimity. But the most magnanimous resolution rests in the Christian religion, which trampleth upon pride, and sits on the neck of ambition, humbly pursuing that infallible perpetuity, unto which all others must diminish their diameters and be poorly seen in angles of contingency.

Pious spirits, who passed their days in raptures of futurity, made little more of this world than the world that was before it, while they lay obscure in the chaos of pre-ordination and night of their fore-beings. And if any have been so happy as truly to understand Christian annihilation, ecstasies, exolution, liquefaction, transformation, the kiss of the spouse, gustation of God, and ingression into the divine shadow, they have already had a handsome anticipation of heaven: the glory of the world is surely over, and the earth in ashes unto them.

To subsist in lasting monuments, to live in their productions, to exist in their names, and predicament of chimæras, was large satisfaction unto old expectations, and made one part of their Elysiums. But all this is nothing in the metaphysics of true belief. To live indeed is to be again ourselves, which being not only an hope but an evidence in noble believers, 'tis all one to lie in St Innocents' churchyard, as in the sands of Egypt; ready to be anything in the ecstasy of being ever, and as content with six foot as the moles of Adrianus.

(From the fifth and last chapter of Hydriotaphia.)

Ossuaries, receptacles for the bones of dead men; the prophecy of Elias, a Talmudical tradition of the house of Elijah that the world should last but six thousand years; the mortal right-lined circle is the Greek letter Θ, instead of thanatos, 'death,' and used on Roman gravestones as the symbol of death; the Inscriptiones Antiquæ (1602) of the Antwerp scholar Janus Gruter was long the standard collection; a list of a number of Hippocrates' patients has been preserved; the Aristotelian entelechia here means 'perfection' or 'ideal centre'; angles of contingency are the infinitesimally small angles between the circle and its tangent; exolution is a shortened form of exsolution; the special virtue of the earth in the churchyard of the Holy Innocents' Church in Paris is referred to by Bishop Corbet above at page 457; Adrian's Mole or Hadrian's Mausoleum, now the Castle of St Angelo, is the vast pile built by the Emperor Hadrian for the imperial tombs.

Light the Shadow of God.

Light, that makes things seen, makes some things invisible. Were it not for darkness and the shadow of the earth, the noblest part of the creation had remained unseen and the stars in heaven as invisible as on the fourth day, when they were created above the horizon with the sun, and there was not an eye to behold them. The greatest mystery of religion is expressed by adumbration, and in the noblest part of Jewish types we find the cherubims shadowing the mercy-seat. Life itself is but the shadow of death, and souls departed but the shadows of the living. All things fall under this name. The sun itself is but the dark simulacrum, and light but the shadow of God.

The Study of God's Works.

The world was made to be inhabited by beasts, but studied and contemplated by man; it is the debt of our reason we owe unto God, and the homage we pay for not being beasts. Without this, the world is still as though it had not been, or as it was before the sixth day, when as yet there was not a creature that could conceive or say there was a world. The wisdom of God receives small honour from those vulgar heads that rudely stare about, and with a gross rusticity admire his works; those highly magnify him whose judicious inquiry into his acts, and deliberate research into his creatures, return the duty of a devout and learned admiration.

Ghosts.

I cannot believe the wisdom of Pythagoras did ever positively and in a literal sense affirm his metempsychosis or impossible transmigration of the souls of men into beasts. Of all metamorphoses or transmigrations I believe only one, that of Lot's wife; for that of Nebuchodonosor proceeded not so far; in all others I conceive there is no further verity than is contained in their implicate sense and morality. I believe that the whole frame of a beast doth perish, and is left in the same state after death as before it was materialled into life; that the souls of men know neither contrary nor corruption; that they subsist beyond the body, and outlive death by the privilege of their proper natures, and without a miracle; that the souls of the faithful, as they leave earth, take possession of heaven; that those apparitions and ghosts of departed persons are not the wandering souls of men, but the unquiet walks of devils, prompting and suggesting us unto mischief, blood, and villany, instilling and stealing into our hearts; that the blessed spirits are not at rest in their graves, but wander solicitous of the affairs of the world. But that those phantasms appear often, and do frequent cemeteries, charnel-houses, and churches, it is because those are the dormitories of the dead, where the Devil, like an insolent champion, beholds with pride the spoils and trophies of his victory over Adam.

Browne on Himself.

Now for my life, it is a miracle of thirty years, which to relate were not a history, but a piece of poetry, and would sound to common ears like a fable. For the world, I count it not an inn but an hospital, and a place not to live but to die in. The world that I regard is my self; it is the microcosm of my own frame that I can cast mine eye on; for the other, I use it but like my globe, and turn it round sometimes for my recreation. Men that look upon my outside, perusing only my condition and my fortunes, do err in my altitude; for I am above Atlas his shoulders. The earth is a point not only in respect of the heavens above us, but of that heavenly and celestial part within us. That mass of flesh that circumscribes me, limits not my mind. That surface that tells the heavens it hath an end, cannot persuade me I have any. . . . Whilst I study to find how I am a microcosm, or little world, I find myself something more than the great. There is surely a piece of divinity in us—something that was before the heavens, and owes no homage unto the sun. Nature tells me I am the image of God, as well as Scripture. He that understands not thus much, hath not his introduction or first lesson, and hath yet to begin the alphabet of man.

(From Religio Medici.)

Charity.

But to return from philosophy to charity: I hold not so narrow a conceit of this virtue as to conceive that to give alms is onely to be charitable, or think a piece of liberality can comprehend the total of charity. Divinity hath wisely divided the acts thereof into many branches, and hath taught us in this narrow way many paths unto goodness: as many ways as we may do good, so many ways we may be charitable; there are infirmities not onely of body, but of soul and fortunes, which do require the merciful hand of our abilities. I cannot condemn a man for ignorance, but behold him with as much pity as I do Lazarus. It is no greater charity to cloath his body, than apparel the nakedness of his soul. It is an honourable object to see the reasons of other men wear our liveries, and their borrowed understandings do homage to the bounty of ours: it is the cheapest way of beneficence, and, like the natural charity of the sun, illuminates another without obscuring itself. To be reserved and caittiff in this part of goodness is the sordidest piece of covetousness, and more contemptible than pecuniary avarice. To this, as calling myself a scholar, I am obliged by the duty of my condition: I make not, therefore, my head a grave, but a treasure, of knowledge; I intend no monopoly, but a community in learning; I study not for my own sake only, but for theirs that study not for themselves. I envy no man that knows more than myself, but pity them that know less. I instruct no man as an exercise of my knowledge, or with an intent rather to nourish and keep it alive in mine own head, than beget and propagate it in his; and in the midst of all my endeavours, there is but one thought that dejects me, that my acquired parts must perish with myself, nor can be legacied among my honoured friends. I cannot fall out, or condemn a man for an error, or conceive why a difference in opinion should divide an affection; for controversies, disputes, and argumentations, both in philosophy and in divinity, if they meet with discreet and peaceable natures, do not infringe the laws of charity. In all disputes so much as there is of passion, so much there is of nothing to the purpose; for then reason, like a bad hound, spends upon a false scent, and forsakes the question first started. And this is one reason why controversies are never determined; for though they be amply proposed, they are scarce at all handled, they do so swell with unnecessary digressions; and the parenthesis on the party is often as large as the main discourse on the subject. The foundations of religion are already established, and the principles of salvation subscribed unto by all; there remains not many controversies worth a passion; and yet never any disputed without, not only in divinity but inferior arts.

(From Religio Medici.)

Browne's 'Evening Hymn' evidently suggested some of the thoughts in Bishop Ken's:

The night is come, like to the day,
Depart not Thou, great God, away.
Let not my sins, black as the night,
Eclipse the lustre of Thy light.
Keep still in my horizon; for to me
The sun makes not the day, but Thee.
Thou, whose nature cannot sleep,
On my temples sentry keep;
Guard me 'gainst those watchful foes
Whose eyes are open while mine close.
Let no dreams my head infest
But such as Jacob's temples blest.
While I do rest, my soul advance;
Make my sleep a holy trance:
That I may, my rest being wrought,
Awake into some holy thought;

And with as active vigour run
My course as doth the nimble sun.
Sleep is a death;—O make me try,
By sleeping, what it is to die!
And as gently lay my head
On my grave as now my bed.
Howe'er I rest, great God, let me
Awake again at last with Thee;
And thus assured, behold I lie
Securely, or to wake or die.
These are my drowsy days; in vain
I do now wake to sleep again:
O come that hour when I shall never
Sleep again, but wake for ever.

Thomas Fuller

was the son of the rector of Aldwinkle St Peter's in Northamptonshire (as Dryden was son of the rector of Aldwinkle All Saints). He was born in 1608. Quick intelligence made him a scholar in boyhood, and at Queen's College, Cambridge, he attained the highest honours. Eminently popular as a preacher in Cambridge, he passed through a rapid succession of promotions to the lectureship of the Savoy in London. His first work was a tedious poem (1631)—David's Hainous Sinne, Heartie Repentance, Heavie Punishment. In 1639 he published his History of the Holy Warre, on the Crusades, and in 1642 his Holy and Prophane State. During the Civil War he attached himself to the king's party at Oxford, and accompanied the army for some years as chaplain to Sir Ralph Hopton. For his men, apparently, he wrote and published Good Thoughts in Bad Times (1645); Good Thoughts in Worse Times (1647) was followed by The Cause and Cure of a Wounded Conscience (1647), and in 1660 by Mixt Contemplations in Better Times. A Pisgah-Sight of Palestine appeared in 1650. His company was much courted both for his learning and for his irrepressible humour. He would sit patiently for hours listening to the prattle of old women, in order to obtain snatches of local history, traditionary anecdote, and proverbial wisdom; and these he wrought up in The Worthies of England, which is a strange melange of topography, biography, and popular antiquities. In 1647, he returned to London. His Church History of Britain was given to the world in 1655 (1 vol. folio); and Heylyn denounced it as a rhapsody with three hundred and fifty errors, and full of 'impertinencies and scraps of trencher-jests interlaced in all parts of the book.' Fuller next devoted himself to the preparation of his Worthies, which was not completed till 1660, nor published till 1662 after his death (1661). He had passed through various situations in the Church, the last of which was that of chaplain to Charles II. By Charles II. he was restored to his preferments, and it was thought he would have been made a bishop had he not been prematurely cut off by fever the year after the Restoration. He was twice married. As proofs of his wonderful memory, it was fabled that he could repeat five hundred unconnected words after twice hearing them, and recite the whole of the signs in the principal thoroughfare of London after once passing through it and back again. His chief work, the Worthies, is rather a collection of brief memoranda than a regular composition. While a modern reader marvels at the vast quantity of gossip which it contains, he realises that it has preserved much curious information which would have otherwise been lost. It may be described as a magnificent miscellany about the counties of England and their illustrious natives, lightened up by unrivalled wit and felicity of illustration, and aglow with patriotism. The style, as in his other works, shows a nervous brevity and point almost new to English, and a homely directness strangely shrewd and never vulgar. The eminent men whose lives he records are arranged by Fuller according to their native counties, of which he mentions also the natural productions, manufactures, medicinal waters, herbs, wonders, buildings, local proverbs, sheriffs, and modern battles. Fuller's Holy and Prophane State contains admirably drawn characters, which are held forth as examples to be respectively imitated and avoided—such as the Good Father, the Good Soldier, the Good Master, and so on. In this and the other productions of Fuller there is a vast fund of sagacity and good sense; his conceits, as Charles Lamb says, are oftentimes 'deeply steeped in human feeling and passion.' Thus he says: 'The Pyramids themselves, dotting with age, have forgotten the names of their founders;' and negroes he characterises as 'the image of God cut in ebony.' And as smelling 'a turf of fresh earth is wholesome for the body, no less are thoughts of mortality cordial to the soul.' The first six extracts are from the Holy State, the next five from the Worthies.

The Good Schoolmaster.

There is scarce any profession in the commonwealth more necessary which is so slightly performed. The reasons whereof I conceive to be these: First, young scholars make this calling their refuge; yea perchance before they have taken any degree in the university, commence schoolmasters in the country; as if nothing else were required to set up this profession but only a rod and a ferula. Secondly, others who are able use it only as a passage to better preferment, to patch the rents in their present fortune, till they can provide a new one and betake themselves to some more gainful calling. Thirdly, they are disheartened from doing their best with the miserable reward which in some places they receive, being masters to their children and slaves to their parents. Fourthly, being grown rich they grow negligent, and scorn to touch the school but by the proxy of an usher. But see how well our schoolmaster behaves himself.

His genius inclines him with delight to his profession. Some men had as lieve be schoolboys as schoolmasters, to be tied to the school as Cooper's Dictionary and Scapula's Lexicon are chained to the desk therein; and though great scholars and skilful in other arts, are bunglers in this. But God of his goodness hath fitted several men for several callings, that the necessity of church and state in all conditions may be provided for. So that he who beholds the fabric thereof may say, God hewed out the stone, and appointed it to lie in this very place, for it would fit none other so well, and here it doth most excellent. And thus God mouldeth some for a schoolmaster's life; undertaking it with desire and delight, and discharging it with dexterity and happy success.

THOMAS FULLER.

After an Engraving.

He studieth his scholars' natures as carefully as they their books, and ranks their dispositions into several forms. And though it may seem difficult for him in a great school to descend to all particulars, yet experienced schoolmasters may quickly make a grammar of boys' natures, and reduce them all, saving some few exceptions, to these general rules:

1. Those that are ingenious and industrious. The conjunction of two such planets in a youth presage much good unto him. To such a lad a frown may be a whipping, and a whipping a death; yea, where their master whips them once, shame whips them all the week after. Such natures he useth with all gentleness.

2. Those that are ingenious and idle. These think with the hare in the fable, that running with snails (so they count the rest of their schoolfellows) they shall come soon enough to the post, though sleeping a good while before their starting. O! a good rod would finely take them napping!

3. Those that are dull and diligent. Wines, the stronger they be, the more lees they have when they are new. Many boys are muddy-headed till they be clarified with age; and such afterwards prove the best. Bristol diamonds are both bright, and squared, and pointed by nature, and yet are soft and worthless; whereas orient ones in India are rough and rugged naturally. Hard, rugged, and dull natures of youth acquit themselves afterwards the jewels of the country; and therefore their dullness at first is to be borne with, if they be diligent. That schoolmaster deserves to be beaten himself who beats nature in a boy for a fault. And I question whether all the whipping in the world can make their parts which are naturally sluggish rise one minute before the hour nature hath appointed.

4. Those that are invincibly dull, and negligent also. Correction may reform the latter, not amend the former. All the whetting in the world can never set a razor's edge on that which hath no steel in it. Such boys he consigneth over to other professions. Shipwrights and boat-makers will choose those crooked pieces of timber which other carpenters refuse. Those may make excellent merchants and mechanics who will not serve for scholars.

He is able, diligent, and methodical in his teaching; not leading them rather in a circle than forwards. He minces his precepts for children to swallow, hanging clogs on the nimbleness of his own soul, that his scholars may go along with him.

He is and will be known to be an absolute monarch in his school. If cockering mothers proffer him money to purchase their sons an exemption from his rod (to live as it were in a peculiar, out of their master's jurisdiction), with disdain he refuseth it, and scorns the late custom in some places of commuting whipping into money, and ransoming boys from the rod at a set price. If he hath a stubborn youth, correction-proof, he debaseth not his authority by contesting with him, but fairly, if he can, puts him away before his obstinacy hath infected others.

5. He is moderate in inflicting deserved correction. Many a schoolmaster better answereth the name παιδο-τριβης than παιδαγωγός, rather tearing his scholars' flesh with whipping than giving them good education. No wonder if his scholars hate the Muses, being presented unto them in the shapes of fiends and furies. Junius complains de insolenti carnificina of his schoolmaster, by whom conscindebatur flagris septies aut octies in dies singulos. Yea hear the lamentable verses of poor Tusser in his own Life:

'From Paul's I went, to Eton sent,
To learn straightways the Latin phrase,
Where fifty-three stripes given to me
At once I had.

'For fault but small or none at all
It came to pass that beat I was;
See, Udall, see the mercy of thee
To me, poor lad.'

Such an Orbilius mars more scholars than he makes. Their tyranny hath caused many tongues to stammer which spake plain by nature, and whose stuttering at first was nothing else but fears quavering on their speech at their master's presence; and whose mauling them about their heads hath dulled those who in quickness exceeded their master.

6. He makes his school free to him who sues to him in forma pauperis. And surely learning is the greatest alms that can be given. But he is a beast who, because the poor scholar cannot pay him his wages, pays the scholar in his whipping; rather are diligent lads to be encouraged with all excitements to learning. This minds me of what I have heard concerning Mr Bust, that worthy late schoolmaster of Eton, who would never suffer any wandering begging scholar, such as justly the statute hath ranked in the fore-front of rogues, to come into his school, but would thrust him out with earnestness (however privately charitable unto him) lest his schoolboys should be disheartened from their books, by seeing some scholars, after their studying in the university, preferred to beggary.

7. He spoils not a good school to make thereof a bad college, therein to teach his scholars logic. For, besides that logic may have an action of trespass against grammar for encroaching on her liberties, syllogisms are solecisms taught in the school, and oftentimes they are forced afterwards in the university to unlearn the fumbling skill they had before.

8. Out of his school he is no way pedantical in carriage or discourse; contenting himself to be rich in Latin, though he doth not jingle with it in every company wherein he comes.

To conclude, let this, amongst other motives, make schoolmasters careful in their place—that the eminencies of their scholars have commended the memories of their schoolmasters to posterity, who, otherwise in obscurity, had altogether been forgotten. Who had ever heard of R. Bond, in Lancashire, but for the breeding of learned Ascham, his scholar? or of Hartgrave, in Burnley School, in the same county, but because he was the first did teach worthy Dr Whitaker? Nor do I honour the memory of Mulcaster for anything so much as his scholar, that gulf of learning, Bishop Andrews. This made the Athenians, the day before the great feast of Theseus, their founder, to sacrifice a ram to the memory of Conidas, his schoolmaster, that first instructed him.

Bristol diamonds are transparent rock-crystals found thereabouts. Paidotribes, in paragraph 5, is 'boy-thrasher'; paidagogos, literally 'boy-leader.' Junius is Francis Junius or De Jon (see page 30). For Udall, see page 155, and for Lancelot Andrewes, page 388.

The Good Yeoman.

The good yeoman is a gentleman in ore, whom the next age may see refined, and is the wax capable of a genteel [gentle] impression, when the prince shall stamp it. Wise Solon, who accounted Tellus the Athenian the most happy man for living privately on his own lands, would surely have pronounced the English yeomanry 'a fortunate condition,' living in the temperate zone between greatness and want; an estate of people almost peculiar to England. France and Italy are like a die which hath no points between cinque and ace, nobility and peasantry. Their walls, though high, must needs be hollow, wanting filling-stones. Indeed, Germany hath her boors, like our yeomen; but by a tyrannical appropriation of nobility to some few ancient families, their yeomen are excluded from ever rising higher to clarify their bloods. In England, the temple of honour is bolted against none who have passed through the temple of virtue; nor is a capacity to be genteel denied to our yeoman who thus behaves himself. He wears russet clothes, but makes golden payment, having tin in his buttons and silver in his pocket. If he chance to appear in clothes above his rank, it is to grace some great man with his service, and then he blusheth at his own bravery. Otherwise, he is the surest landmark whence foreigners may take aim of the ancient English customs; the gentry more floating after foreign fashions. In his house he is bountiful both to strangers and poor people. Some hold, when hospitality died in England, she gave her last groan amongst the yeomen of Kent. And still at our yeoman's table you shall have as many joints as dishes; no meat disguised with strange sauces; no straggling joint of a sheep in the midst of a pasture of grass, beset with salads on every side, but solid, substantial food. No servitors (more nimble with their hands than the guests with their teeth) take away meat before stomachs are taken away. Here you have that which in itself is good, made better by the store of it, and best by the welcome to it. He improveth his land to a double value by his good husbandry. Some grounds that wept with water, or frowned with thorns, by draining the one and clearing the other, he makes both to laugh and sing with corn. By marl and limestones burned he bettereth his ground, and his industry worketh miracles, by turning stones into bread.

Recreations.

Recreations is a second creation, when weariness hath almost annihilated one's spirits. It is the breathing of the soul, which otherwise would be stifled with continual business. We may trespass in them, if using such as are forbidden by the lawyer, as against the statutes; physician, as against health; divine, as against conscience.

1. Be well satisfied in thy conscience of the lawfulness of the recreation thou usest. Some fight against cock-fighting, and baitbull and bearbaiting, because man is not to be a common barretour [raiser of strife] to set the creatures at discord; and seeing antipathy betwixt creatures was kindled by man's sin, what pleasure can he take to see it burn? Others are of the contrary opinion, and that Christianity gives us a placard to use these sports; and that man's charter of dominion over the creatures enables him to employ them as well for pleasure as necessity. In these as in all other doubtful recreations, be well assured first of the legality of them. He that sins against his conscience sins with a witness.

2. Spill not the morning (the quintessence of the day) in recreations. For sleep itself is a recreation; add not therefore sauce to sauce; and he cannot properly have any title to be refreshed who was not first faint. Pastime, like wine, is poison in the morning. It is then good husbandry to sow the head, which hath lain fallow all night, with some serious work. Chiefly entrench not on the Lord's day to use unlawful sports; this were to spare thine own flock, and to shear God's lamb.

3. Let thy recreations be ingenious [ingenuous], and bear proportion with thine age. If thou sayest with Paul, When I was a child, I did as a child; say also with him, but when I was a man, I put away childish things. Wear also the child's coat, if thou usest his sports.

4. Take heed of boisterous and over-violent exercises. Ringing oftentimes hath made good music on the bells, and put men's bodies out of tune, so that by overheating themselves they have rung their own passing-bell.

5. Yet the ruder sort of people scarce count any thing a sport which is not loud and violent. The Muscovite women esteem none loving husbands except they beat their wives. It is no pastime with country clowns that cracks not pates, breaks not shins, bruises not limbs, tumbles and tosses not all the body. They think themselves not warm in their geerst [gearings] till they are all on fire, and count it but dry sport till they swim in their own sweat. Yet I conceive the physician's rule in exercises, Ad ruborem, but non ad sudorem, is too scant measure.

6. Refresh that part of thyself which is most wearied. If thy life be sedentary, exercise thy body; if stirring and active, recreate thy mind. But take heed of cozening thy mind, in setting it to do a double task under pretence of giving it a playday, as in the labyrinth of chess, and other tedious and studious games.

Books.

It is a vanity to persuade the world one hath much learning by getting a great library. As soon shall I believe every one is valiant that hath a well-furnished armoury. I guess good housekeeping by the smoking, not the number of the tunnels [chimney-cans], as knowing that many of them, built merely for uniformity, are without chimneys, and more without fires. . . .

Some books are only cursorily to be tasted of: namely, first, voluminous books, the task of a man's life to read them over; secondly, auxiliary books, only to be repaired to on occasions; thirdly, such as are mere pieces of formality, so that if you look on them you look through them, and he that peeps through the casement of the index sees as much as if he were in the house. But the laziness of those cannot be excused who perfunctorily pass over authors of consequence, and only trade in their tables and contents. These, like city cheaters, having gotten the names of all country gentlemen, make silly people believe they have long lived in those places where they never were, and flourish with skill in those authors they never seriously studied.

Education confined too much to Language.

Our common education is not intended to render us good and wise, but learned: it hath not taught us to follow and embrace virtue and prudence, but hath imprinted in us their derivation and etymology; it hath chosen out for us not such books as contain the soundest and truest opinions, but those that speak the best Greek and Latin; and, by these rules, has instilled into our fancy the vainest humours of antiquity. But a good education alters the judgment and manners. 'Tis a silly conceit that men without languages are also without understanding. It's apparent in all ages, that some such have been even prodigies for ability; for it's not to be believed that Wisdom speaks to her disciples only in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.

Marriage.

Deceive not thyself by over-expecting happiness in the married state. Look not therein for contentment greater than God will give, or a creature in this world can receive, namely, to be free from all inconveniences. Marriage is not like the hill Olympus, ὅλος λαμπρός, 'wholly clear,' without clouds; yea, expect both wind and storms sometimes, which when blown over, the air is the clearer and wholesomer for it. Make account of certain cares and troubles which will attend thee. Remember the nightingales, which sing only some months in the spring, but commonly are silent when they have hatched their eggs, as if their mirth were turned into care for their young ones.

Decline of Great Families.

It happened in the reign of King James, when Henry Earl of Huntingdon was lieutenant of Leicestershire, that a labourer's son in that country was pressed into the wars—as I take it, to go over with Count Mansfield. The old man at Leicester requested his son might be discharged, as being the only staff of his age, who by his industry maintained him and his mother. The earl demanded his name, which the man for a long time was loath to tell, as suspecting it a fault for so poor a man to tell the truth. At last he told his name was Hastings. 'Cousin Hastings,' said the earl, 'we cannot all be top branches of the tree, though we all spring from the same root; your son, my kinsman, shall not be pressed.' So good was the meeting of modesty in a poor, with courtesy in an honourable person, and gentry I believe in both. And I have reason to believe, that some who justly own the surnames and blood of Bohuns, Mortimers, and Plantagenets, though ignorant of their own extraction, are hid in the heap of common people, where they find that under a thatched cottage which some of their ancestors could not enjoy in a leaded [lead-covered] castle, contentment, with quiet and security.

Henry de Essex. He was too well known in our English chronicles, being baron of Raleigh in Essex and standard bearer of England. It happened in the reign of this king [Henry II.] there was a fierce battle fought in Flintshire, at Coleshall, between the English and Welsh, wherein this Henry de Essex animum et signum simul abiecit (betwixt traitor and coward, cast away both his courage and banner together), occasioning a great overthrow of English. But he that had the baseness to do had the boldness to deny the doing of so foul a fact; until he was challenged in combat by Robert de Momford, a knight, eye-witness thereof, and by him overcome in a duel. Whereupon his large inheritance was confiscated to the king, and he himself, partly thrust, partly going, into a convent, hid his head in a cowl; under which, betwixt shame and sanctity, he blushed out the remainder of his life.

Richard Hackluit was born of an ancient extract in this county, whose family hath flourished at in good esteem. He was bred a student in Christ Church in Oxford, and after was prebendary of Westminster. His genius inclined him to the study of history, and especially to the marine part thereof, which made him keep constant intelligence with the most noted seamen of Wapping, until the day of his death.

He set forth a large collection of the English sea voyages, ancient, middle, modern; taken partly out of private letters which never were, or without his had not been, printed; partly out of small treatises, printed and since irrecoverably lost, had not his providence preserved them. For some pamphlets are produced which for their cheapness and smallness men for the present neglect to buy, presuming they may procure them at their pleasure; which small books, their first and last edition being past (like some spirits that appear but once), cannot afterwards with any price or pains be recovered. In a word, many of such useful tracts of sea adventures, which before were scattered as several ships, Mr Hackluit hath embodied into a fleet, divided into three squadrons, so many several volumes: a work of great honour to England; it being possible that many ports and islands in America, which, being base and barren, bear only a bare name for the present, may prove rich places for the future. And then these voyages will be produced, and pleaded, as good evidence of their belonging to England, as first discovered and denominated by Englishmen. Mr Hackluit died in the beginning of king James's reign, leaving a fair estate to an unthrift son, who embezzled it on this token, that he vaunted, 'that he cheated the covetous usurer, who had given him spick and span new money, for the old land of his great great grandfather.'

Sir Henry Sidney. . . . I will close his life with this encomium which I find in a worthy author [Naunton]: 'His disposition was rather to seek after the antiquities and the weal-publick of those countries which he governed, than to obtain lands and revenues within the same; for I know not one foot of land that he had either in Wales or Ireland.'

Sir Philip Sidney. Reader, I am resolved not to part him from his father; such the sympathy betwixt them, living and dying both within the compass of the same year. Otherwise this knight, in relation to my book, may be termed an ubiquitary, and appear amongst statesmen, soldiers, lawyers, writers, yea princes themselves, being (though not elected) in election to be king of Poland, which place he declined, preferring rather to be a subject to queen Elizabeth than a sovereign beyond the seas. He was born at Penshurst in this county [Kent], son to Sir Henry Sidney . . . and sister's son to Robert earl of Leicester; bred in Christ-church in Oxford. Such his appetite to learning, that he could never be fed fast enough therewith; and so quick and strong his digestion, that he soon turned it into wholesome nourishment, and thrived healthfully thereon. His home-bred abilities travel perfected with foreign accomplishments, and a sweet nature set a gloss upon both. He was so essential to the English court, that it seemed maimed without his company, being a complete master of matter and language, as his 'Arcadia' doth evidence. I confess I have heard some of modern pretended wits cavil thereat, merely because they made it not themselves: such who say, that his book is the occasion that many precious hours are otherwise spent no better, must acknowledge it also the cause that many idle hours are otherwise spent no worse, than in reading thereof.

At last, leaving the court, he followed the camp, being made governor of Flushing, under his uncle earl of Leicester. But the walls of that city (though high and strong) could not confine the activity of his mind, which must into the field, and before Zutphen was unfortunately slain with a shot, in a small skirmish, which we may sadly term a great battle, considering our heavy loss therein. His corpse, being brought over into England, was buried in the choir of St Paul's with general lamentation.

Nicholas Wood was born at Halingborne [Hollingbourn] in this county [Kent], being a landed man, and a true labourer. He was afflicted with a disease called Boulimia, or Caninus Appetitus; insomuch that he would devour at one meal what was provided for twenty men, eat a whole hog at a sitting, and at another time thirty dozen of pigeons, whilst others make mirth at his malady. Let us raise our gratitude to the goodness of God, specially when he giveth us appetite enough for our meat, and yet meat too much for our appetite; whereas this painful man spent all his estate to provide provant [provender] for his belly, and died very poor about the year 1630.

Edmond Doubleday, Esquire, was of a tall and proper person, and lived in this city [Westminster]. Nor had this large case a little jewel, this long body a lazy soul, whose activity and valour was adequate to his strength and greatness, whereof he gave this eminent testimony. When Sir Thomas Knevet was sent, November 4, 1605, by king James, to search the cellar beneath the Parliament-house, with very few, for the more privacy, to attend him, he took Master Doubleday with him. Here they found Guy Faux, with his dark-lantern, in the dead of the night, providing for the death of many the next morning. He was newly come out of the Devil's Closet (so I may fitly term the inward room where the powder lay and the train was to be laid) into the outward part of the cellar. Faux beginning to bustle, Master Doubleday instantly ordered him at his pleasure up with his heels, and there with the traitor lay the treason flat along the floor, by God's goodness detected, defeated. Faux vowed (and though he was a false traitor, herein I do believe him) that had he been in the inner room, he would have blown up himself and all the company therein. Thus it is pleasant music to hear disarmed malice threaten, when it cannot strike. Master Doubleday lived many years after, deservedly loved and respected; and died about the year of our Lord 1618.

Among Fuller's pithy shorter sayings are these :

It is dangerous to gather flowers that grow on the banks of the pit of hell, for fear of falling in; yea, they which play with the devil's rattles will be brought by degrees to wield his sword; and from making of sport, they come to doing of mischief.

Heat gotten by degrees, with motion and exercise, is more natural, and stays longer by one, than what is gotten all at once by coming to the fire. Goods acquired by industry prove commonly more lasting than lands by descent.

The true church antiquary doth not so adore the ancients as to despise the moderns. Grant them but dwarfs, yet stand they on giants' shoulders, and may see the farther.

Light, Heaven's eldest daughter, is a principal beauty in a building, yet it shines not alike from all parts of heaven. An east window welcomes the beams of the sun before they are of a strength to do any harm, and is offensive to none but a sluggard. In a west window, in summer time towards night, the sun grows low and over-familiar, with more light than delight.

A public office is a guest which receives the best usage from them who never invited it.

Scoff not at the natural defects of any, which are not in their power to amend. Oh! 'tis cruelty to beat a cripple with his own crutches.

Anger is one of the sinews of the soul: he that wants it hath a maimed mind.

Generally, nature hangs out a sign of simplicity in the face of a fool, and there is enough in his countenance for a hue and cry to take him on suspicion; or else it is stamped in the figure of his body: their heads sometimes so little that there is no room for wit; sometimes so long that there is no wit for so much room.

They that marry ancient people, merely in expectation to bury them, hang themselves in hope that one will come and cut the halter.

He that falls into sin is a man; that grieves at it is a saint; that boasteth of it is a devil.

Learning hath gained most by those books by which the printers have lost.

Is there no way to bring home a wandering sheep but by worrying him to death?

Moderation is the silken string running through the pearl-chain of all virtues.

Let us be careful to provide rest for our souls, and our bodies will provide rest for themselves. And let us not be herein like unto gentlewomen, who care not to keep the inside of the orange, but candy and preserve only the outside.

Tombs are the clothes of the dead. A grave is but a plain suit, and a rich monument is one embroidered.

Sir Thomas Herbert (1606–82), of ancient Yorkshire family allied to the Pembroke house, is said to have studied both at Oxford and at Cambridge, in 1626 set out on a journey to the East, in the following of the English ambassador to Persia, and after his return published, in 1634, his Description of the Persian Monarchy now being: the Orientall Indyes, Isles, and other Parts of the Greater Asia and Africk. The ambassador's party travelled by the Cape, Madagascar, and Surat to Gombroon; visited Kasbin, Kashan, and various towns in Persia; and returned by Bagdad, India, Ceylon, Mauritius, and St Helena. He was an entertaining and lively writer, and his lengthy digressions contain disquisitions as irrelevant to the main subject as the discovery of America long before Columbus by Madoc Prince of Wales. In the Civil War of England he sided with the Parliament, and at Holmby House in 1647, when the king was required to dismiss his own servants, was chosen by His Majesty one of the grooms of the bedchamber. Herbert then became much attached to the king, served him with much zeal and assiduity, was in the last months his only attendant, and was on the scaffold when the ill-fated monarch was brought to the block. After the Restoration he was rewarded by Charles II. with a baronetcy, and subsequently devoted much time to literary pursuits. In 1678 he wrote Threnodia Carolina, containing an Historical Account of the Two Last Years of the Life of King Charles I.

St Helena in 1629.

But as it was, after threescore and ten dayes further sail we attained sight of Saint Helena where the ocean bellows on every side so fretfully as the place might fear an inundation, had not the extraordinary height, but chiefly that supreme Providence which hath set the sea its bounds, safe-guarded it. It has no neighbouring isles great or small, but seems equidistant from those two noted ports called Rio Grandi and Cape Negro, in Brazelia the one, the other in Congo; both in one elevation, and parallel with Saint Helena: from that in America distant 400 leagues; from the other in Afric not much less, if any, from that number.

It had its name given by John de Nova, in, or about, the year after the incarnation of our Saviour 1502. So called for that in his return from India to Lisbon it was discovered the 3. of May; a day consecrated to the memory of Helena the Empress who first found the Cross, the most religious of Ladies in her time, mother to the first Christian Emprour, Constantine; both of them glorious in their age, Britains both; both bright gems of this our nation.

This isle is removed south from the æquator sixteen degrees: from the utmost promontory of South Africa hath two and twenty degrees of longitude, and where the needle varies five degrees and thirteen minutes, but from the lands end of England distant 4500 English miles; from the Cape of Good Hope 1740; Madagascar 3000; Surat 6600; and from Bantam 6900 or thereabouts. In that Bay, which takes name from the chappel, the isle has this resemblance.

But to what part of the inhabited world it appertains may be queried, seeing the vast Æthiopic Ocean so largely circles it. To Afer I may imagine (because it is nearest that continent) rather than Vesputius. It is but small, not exceeding thirty English miles circumference, yet excessive high; for it veils its head often in the clouds, where opening a wide mouth it gulps down sufficient moisture to cool its ardor, which by reason of the climate 'tis in, cannot but be sometimes intemperate; and but for that affinity it has with the middle region which envelops it as with a chill-cold tulipant [turban], and long nights it has, that extreme heat which the sun darts constantly twice every year perpendicular upon this isle, would doubtless make the entrails enflame (had it sulphur) like another Vesuvius. Nevertheless the land is not more eminent in its height than the ambient sea profound in the depth; so deep that it admits ill anchoring save at the N.W. from the chappel, where is 20 fathoms; so as that there are mountains in the sea as in the earth is not to be doubted; seeing that upon the casting of the lead, log, or plummet, upon the one side of the ship is sometimes found 30 fathom, and upon the other side 60. Nevertheless it is so very deep here that the sounding line or plummet will scarce find ground; which is the cause that mariners do sometimes carry their anchors ashore that they may moor or ride the more securely. By reason of the depth I could hardly discern either flux or reflux near the shore; seeming as if we were in the mid ocean where neither ebb nor flood is to be discerned. Howbeit, the salt water plashes and froths to see it self so suddenly resisted: but the moist breath usually vaporing in or upon the seas makes it sometimes turbulent.

This isle is hard to be ascended; not that the passage is craggy, but that it is so precipitous. The sailors have an ironick proverb, The way is such as a man may chuse whether he will break his heart going up, or his neck coming down: but being once up, scarce any place can yield a more large or more delightful prospect. The land is very even and plain at the top, and swells no where to a deformed rising: some springs above be sweet which below are brackish: the reason may be for that in their drilling descent they may relish of the salt hills through which it cuts an usual passage, so as they become salt both by their own composition and the salt breath which the sea evaporates. Nevertheless, there are but two noted rivolets; one which bubbles down towards the chappel, the other into the Lemmon Valley, so called from a lemmon tree and chappel built at the bottom of the isle by the Spaniard Anno 1571. and by the Dutch of late pull'd down; a place once intended for God's worship, but now disposed of to common uses. There are also some ruines of a little town lately demolisht by the Spaniard, in that it became a magazine of private trade in turning and returning out of both the Indies; no other monuments nor antiquities are there found. You see all if you look upon the ribs of a weather-beaten carrique [carack, large ship] and some broken pieces of great ordnance which albeit left there against the owners liking serve some instead of anchors. Human inhabitants there are none; nor were of late, save that in the year 1591. Captain Kendall weighing anchor sooner than was expected, one Segar a marriner was accidentally left ashore: 18 months after, Captain Parker coming to an anchor found poor Segar alive, but so amazed, or rather overjoyed at his arrival, that he dyed suddenly; by which we see that sudden joy is not easily digested. Howbeit of hogs and goats here are plenty, who agree wellfavouredly and multiply even to admiration; happy in their ease and safety till ships arrive there for refreshment. The goats leap wildly from rock to rock, and to avoid the reach of our small guns keep their centinels. . . .

Here also with a little labour we got store of pheasants, powts, quails, hens, partridge; and which was no less acceptable, divers sorts of grass and roots, as wood-sorrel, three-leav'd grass, scurvy-grass and like acid herbs sovereign against the scurvy; the usual disease from the sea, and most predominating amongst islanders: we had also basil, parsly, mint, spinage, fennel, annis, radish, mustard-seed, tabaco, and some others, which by a willing hand, directed by an ingenious eye, may soon be gathered; brought hither, and here sown, by Fernandus Lupius, a Portugal, in the year of our Lord 1509. for the good of his country-men; who nevertheless at this day dare hardly land to over-see their seminary, or own their labours; the English and Dutch in the churlish language of a cannon sometime disputing the propriety. Anno 1588. Candish [Thomas Cavendish], our countryman, landed here in his circum-navigating the globe; and found store of lemons, oranges, pomgranads, pomcitrons, figs and dates, but how the alteration comes who knows: for none of those grow there now that I could either see or hear of, one lemon-tree excepted. To conclude: In the old chappel here we buried our captain, Andrew Evans, whose death wound (as formerly told) was unhappily given him by a Mannatee at the Mauritius. He was an expert seaman, and no less vigilant than expert: so as doubtless the company had a great loss of him. . . .

So as by the judgment of that indifferent and learned writer it appears the English have the first place for sea knowledge and navigation attributed them. And amongst the best sea commanders this late captain of ours very well deserved with the rest to be ranked. But to return. That this is a very delightful isle cannot be denied, and its admirable prospect and other pleasures were sufficient to induce our longer stay; but stay we might not: So as after a weeks refreshment we discharged our reckoning in a hearty farewell, and by the invitation of a prosperous gale upon a N.W. course swiftly cut our passage through the yielding ocean; insomuch as on the sixteenth of October we were once more nadyr to the sun, which at that time was in its Antarctic progress.

Helena, saint and mother of Constantine, was of obscure origin, and was said to have been born in Britain, though other accounts say at Treves in Germany or in Bithynia. Constantine was not born in Britain, though he was in Britain when his father died at York. Afer is given eponymously for Africa. Vesputius is the Latinised second name of Amerigo Vespucci, after whom America was named.

Benjamin Whichcote (1609–83), a liberal divine of the Cambridge Platonist group, was born at Whichcote Hall of good Shropshire family, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, became tutor there, and in 1644 provost of King's. According to Tulloch, he, more than any other teacher at Cambridge, 'impressed his own mode of thought both upon his colleagues in the university and the rising generation of students.' At the Restoration Whichcote was removed from the provostship, but he retained a college rectory; and in 1668 he was presented by Bishop Wilkins to the vicarage of St Lawrence Jewry, London, which he held till his death. The works of Whichcote comprise a number of Discourses, republished in four volumes in 1751, and a series of (1200) Moral and Religious Aphorisms, collected from his MSS. The leading principle of all his thought was the use of reason in religion; like John Hales, of Eton, he wished religion and learning alike to be 'cleared of froth and grounds.' He it was who mainly gave impulse to the movement represented by the 'Cambridge Platonists' and the Latitudinarians, amongst whom, besides himself, his pupil John Smith, Cudworth, and Henry More were conspicuous. And he had the unusual honour of having a selection of his sermons edited, with a preface, by the third Earl of Shaftesbury, author of the Characteristics, and called a Deist. These are amongst his aphorisms:

It is a wise man's motto: 'I live to be wiser every day;' 'I am not too wise to be taught of any.'

Examine all principles of education; for since we are all fallible, we should suppose we may be mistaken. Quotidie depono aliquem errorem ['Daily I renounce some error or another']. Γηράσκω αἰὶν πολλὰ διδασκόμενος ['I grow old constantly learning many a thing'].

To speak of natural light, of the use of reason in religion, is to do no disservice at all to grace; for God is acknowledged in both—in the former as laying the groundwork of His creation, in the latter as reviving and restoring it.

If a man be once out of the use of reason, there are no bounds to unreasonableness.

Both heaven and hell have their foundation within us. Heaven primarily lies in a refined temper, in an internal reconciliation to the nature of God, and to the rule of righteousness. The guilt of conscience and enmity to righteousness is the inward state of hell. The guilt of conscience is the fewel of hell.

It had been better for the Christian church if that which calls itself Catholic had been less employed in creating pretended faith and more employed in maintaining universal charity.

Carefully avoid the odium of comparisons: either of persons, that you do not offend; or of things that you be not deceived. He that hath the advantage in a comparison thinks he hath but his right; he that has the disadvantage thinks he hath not his right.

Religion, which is a bond of union, ought not to be a ground of division; but it is in an unnatural use when it doth disunite. Men cannot differ by true religion, because it is true religion to agree. The spirit of religion is a reconciling spirit.

It is better for us that there shou'd be difference of judgement, if we keep charity; but it is most unmanly to quarrel because we differ.

They do not advance religion who draw it down to bodily acts or who carry it up highest into what is mystical, symbolical, emblematical, etc. Christian religion is not mystical, symbolical, ænigmatical, emblematical; but unclothed, unbodied, intellectual, rational, spiritual.

Religion is not a system of doctrines, an observance of modes, a heat of affections, a form of words, a spirit of censoriousness.

Religion is not a hear-say, a presumption, a supposition; is not a customary pretension and profession; is not an affectation of any mode; is not a piety of particular fancy, consisting in some pathetic devotions, vehement expressions, bodily severities, affected anomalies and aversions from the innocent usages of others: but consisteth in a profound humility and an universal charity.

Enthusiastic principles—good things strained out of their wits. Among Christians, those that pretend to be inspired seem to be mad; among the Turks, those that are mad seem to be inspired.

Among politicians the esteem of religion is profitable; the principles of it are troublesom.

Rule by right is the weak man's strength, and the strong man's curb; it makes mine my own, and arraigns the intruder's violence.

It is not good to live in jest, since we must die in earnest.

Jeremy Taylor,

one of the greatest preachers of the English Church, was born in the town of Cambridge, and baptised on 15th August 1613. It used to be said, on the authority, it was supposed, of his granddaughter Lady Wray, that he came of good Gloucestershire stock, and was descended from Dr Rowland Taylor, who suffered martyrdom at Hadleigh in the reign of Queen Mary. But there appears to be no foundation for these statements. His father was a barber. He had his son entered as a sizar at Caius College at the age of thirteen, having himself previously taught him the rudiments of grammar and mathematics, and sent him to the Perse School. In 1630 Jeremy Taylor took his degree of Bachelor of Arts, was chosen a fellow, and in 1634 proceeded M.A. He had already been ordained. He then removed to London, to deliver some lectures for a college friend in St Paul's Cathedral. His eloquent discourses, aided by what a contemporary calls 'his florid and youthful beauty, and pleasant air,' entranced all hearers, and procured him the patronage of Archbishop Laud. By Laud's assistance Taylor obtained a fellowship in All Souls College, Oxford, which he enjoyed for two years, till by favour of Juxon he became rector of Uppingham in Rutlandshire. He was also chaplain-in-ordinary to the king. About this time he was suspected of a Romeward tendency, and of too great familiarity with a learned Franciscan friar. In 1639 he married Phœbe Langsdale, who bore four sons and two daughters, and died in 1651. The sons of Taylor all died before their father, clouding with melancholy and regret his late and troubled years. The turmoil of the Civil War now agitated the country, and Jeremy Taylor was inevitably committed by principle and profession to the royal cause. By virtue of the king's mandate, he was made a doctor of divinity; and at the command of Charles he wrote a defence of Episcopacy. In 1645, apparently while accompanying the royal army as chaplain, or as chaplain to the king, Jeremy Taylor was taken prisoner by the Parliamentary forces, in the battle fought before Cardigan Castle. He was soon released; but the tide of war had turned against the royalists, and in the wreck of the Church, Taylor resolved to continue in Wales, and, in conjunction with two learned friends, to establish a school at Newton-hall in Caermarthenshire. He appears to have been twice imprisoned by the dominant party, but treated with no marked severity.

'In the great storm,' he says, 'which dashed the vessel of the church all in pieces, I had been cast on the coast of Wales, and in a little boat thought to have enjoyed that rest and quietness which in England in a far greater I could not hope for. Here I cast anchor, and thinking to ride safely, the storm followed me with so impetuous violence that it broke a cable, and I lost my anchor, and here again I was exposed to the mercy of the sea, and the gentleness of an element that could neither distinguish things nor persons: and but that He that stilleth the raging of the sea, and the noise of his waves, and the madness of his people, had provided a plank for me, I had been lost to all the opportunities of content or study; but I know not whether I have been more preserved by the courtesies of my friends, or the gentleness and mercies of a noble enemy.'

This fine passage is in the dedication to Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying, shewing the Unreasonableness of prescribing to other Men's Faith, and the Iniquity of persecuting Differing Opinions (1647)—'prophesying' meaning simply preaching or expounding. The work has been justly described as 'perhaps, of all Taylor's writings, that which shows him furthest in advance of the age in which he lived, and of the ecclesiastical system in which he had been reared—as the first distinct and avowed defence of toleration which had been ventured on in England, perhaps in Christendom.' He builds the right of private judgment upon the difficulty of expounding Scripture, the insufficiency and uncertainty of tradition, the fallibility of councils, the pope, ecclesiastical writers, and the Church as a body, as arbiters of controverted points, and the consequent necessity of letting every man choose his own guide or judge of the meaning of Scripture for himself; since, says he, 'any man may be better trusted for himself, than any man can be for another; for in this case his own interest is most concerned, and ability is not so necessary as honesty, which certainly every man will best preserve in his own case, and to himself—and if he does not, it's he that must smart for it; and it is not required of us not to be in error, but that we endeavour to avoid it.' Milton, in his scheme of toleration from the opposite camp, excluded Roman Catholics; and Jeremy Taylor, to establish some standard of truth and prevent anarchy, as he alleges, proposed the confession of the Apostles' Creed as the test of orthodoxy and the condition of union among Christians. The principles he advocates—that governments should not interfere with any opinions save such as directly tend to subvert them—go to destroy this limitation, and are applicable to universal toleration, which perhaps he dared hardly then avow, even if he had entertained such an aspiration. The style of his masterly 'Discourse' is more argumentative and less ornate than that of his sermons and devotional treatises; but his enlightened zeal often breaks forth in striking condemnation of those who are 'curiously busy about trifles and impertinences, while they reject those glorious precepts of Christianity and holy life which are the glories of our religion, and would enable us to gain a happy eternity.' He closes the work in the second edition (1659) with the following interesting and instructive apologue:

I end with a story which I find in the Jews' books: When Abraham sat at his tent-door according to his custom, waiting to entertain strangers, he espied an old man stopping and leaning on his staff, weary with age and travel, coming towards him, who was an hundred years of age. He received him kindly, washed his feet, provided supper, caused him to sit down; but observing that the old man eat and prayed not, nor begged for a blessing on his meat, asked him why he did not worship the God of heaven. The old man told him that he worshipped the fire only, and acknowledged no other God; at which answer Abraham grew so zealously angry, that he thrust the old man out of his tent, and exposed him to all the evils of the night and an unguarded condition. When the old man was gone, God called to Abraham, and asked him where the stranger was. He replied: 'I thrust him away because he did not worship thee.' God answered him: 'I have suffered him these hundred years, although he dishonoured me; and couldst thou not endure him one night, when he gave thee no trouble?' Upon this, saith the story, Abraham fetched him back again, and gave him hospitable entertainment and wise instruction. Go thou and do likewise, and thy charity will be rewarded by the God of Abraham.

In Wales, Jeremy Taylor was married to Mrs Joanna Bridges, absurdly said to have been a natural daughter of Charles I., but mistress of an estate in the county of Caermarthen. He was thus relieved from the irksome duties of a school-master; but the fines and sequestrations imposed by the Parliamentary party on the property of the royalists are supposed to have dilapidated his wife's fortune. It is known that he received a pension from the patriotic and excellent John Evelyn, and the literary labours of Taylor were never relaxed. In his Welsh retreat he further wrote an Apology for Authorised and Set Forms of Liturgy (1649), and The Life of Christ, or the Great Exemplar (1649). These were followed by Holy Living and Holy Dying, Twenty-seven Sermons for the Summer Half-year, and other minor works. The excellent little manual of devotion, the Golden Grove (1655), was so called after the mansion of his neighbour and patron, the Earl of Carbery, in whose family he had spent many of his happiest hours. In the preface to this work Taylor had reflected on the ruling powers in Church and State, for which he was, for a short time, committed to prison in Chepstow Castle. He next completed his Course of Sermons for the Year, and published some controversial (and rather latitudinarian) tracts on the doctrine of Original Sin. He was attacked both by High Churchmen and Calvinists, but defended himself with warmth and spirit—the only instance in which his bland and benevolent disposition was betrayed into anything approaching to personal asperity. He went to London in 1657, and officiated in a private congregation of Episcopalians, till an offer was made him by the Earl of Conway to accompany him to Ireland, and act as lecturer in a church at Lisburn. Thither he accordingly repaired in 1658, fixing his residence at Portmore, on the banks of Lough Neagh, about eight miles from Lisburn. Two years appear to have been spent in this happy retirement, when, in 1660, Taylor made a visit to London, to publish his Ductor Dubitantium, or the Rule of Conscience in all her General Measures, the most elaborate, but the least successful, of all his works. It was meant as a compound of Christian ethics and casuistry, basing morality on the will of God as revealed in and through conscience; and though eloquent and learned, is super-subtle and even at times casuistical. His journey to London was made at an auspicious period. The Commonwealth was on the eve of dissolution in the weak hands of Richard Cromwell, and the hopes of the Cavaliers were fanned by the artifice and ingenuity of Monk. Jeremy Taylor signed the declaration of the loyalists of London on the 24th of April; on the 29th of May he saw Charles II. enter London in triumph, and in August following was appointed Bishop of Down and Connor. The Restoration exalted many a worthless parasite, and disappointed many a deserving loyalist; it brought a mitre to at least one pure and pious Churchman. Taylor was afterwards made chancellor of the University of Dublin, and a member of the Irish Privy Council. The administration of the see of Dromore was also annexed to his other bishopric, 'on account of his virtue, wisdom, and industry.' These well-bestowed honours he enjoyed only about six years. The duties of his episcopal function were discharged with zeal, mingled with charity; at his first visitation he saw it his duty to eject thirty-six ministers as not episcopally ordained, and thenceforward he was kept in perpetual controversy and trouble by irreconcilable Presbyterians, and he would fain have withdrawn to a small parochial cure where he could have had peace. The few sermons which we possess delivered by him in Ireland are truly apostolic, both in spirit and language. He died at Lisburn, of a fever caught at a stricken parishioner's bedside, on the 13th of August 1667, and was buried in the cathedral of Dromore.

A finer pattern of a Christian divine never perhaps existed. His learning dignified the high station he at last attained; his gentleness and courtesy shed a grace over his whole conduct and demeanour. Dr Parr said, and Heber agreed with him, that Englishmen revere Barrow, admire Hooker, but love Jeremy Taylor. 'Most eloquent of divines,' Coleridge called him; he has no rival but Milton in impassioned prose. Of his controversial writings Parr said: 'Fraught as they are with guileless ardour, with peerless eloquence, and with the richest stores of knowledge—historical, classical, scholastic, and theological—they may be considered as irrefragable proofs of his pure, affectionate, and dutiful attachment to the reformed church of England.' His uncontroversial writings, however, form the noblest monument to his memory. He was perhaps too prone to speculations in matters of doctrine, and he was certainly no blinded adherent of the Church; he was an early example of a Liberal High Churchman. His mind loved to expatiate on the higher things of time, death, and eternity, which concern men of all parties, and to draw from the divine revelation its hopes, terrors, and injunctions—in his hands, irresistible as the flaming sword—as a means of purifying the human mind, and fitting it for a more exalted destiny. ‘Theology is rather a divine life than a divine knowledge. In heaven indeed we shall first see and then love; but here on earth we must first love, and love will open our eyes as well as our hearts; and we shall then see, and perceive, and understand.’ ‘The English Chrysostom,’ as he has been called, was a preacher of righteousness and of personal holiness rather than an expositor of doctrine or an accurate theologian. He is hardly self-consistent in all his utterances, and seems to come dangerously near heresy at times. His style is unequalled for wealth of illustration, exuberant fullness of thought, and a certain grandeur of diction; his forte was not in trenchant argument, terseness, or even perfect lucidity. At times the illustrations almost overlay the argument; and the quotations from classical and patristic sources and the learned allusions to ancient literature and story must have been beyond the apprehension of the bulk of his audiences. His devotional works are much less rhetorical than his sermons. He has sometimes been called the Spenser of the pulpit. He certainly resembled Spenser in his prolific fancy, in a certain musical arrangement and sweetness of expression, in prolonged description, and in delicious musings and reveries, suggested by some favourite image or metaphor, on which he dwells with the fondness and enthusiasm of a young poet. In these passages he is also apt to run into excess; epithet is heaped upon epithet, and figure upon figure; all the quaint conceits of his fancy and the curious stores of his learning are dragged in, till precision and proportion are lost. He writes like an orator, and produces his effect by reiterated strokes and multiplied impressions. Some of his sermons are the noblest prose-poetry; but by preference he dwells on the gentle and familiar; and his allusions to natural objects—as trees, birds, and flowers, the rising or setting sun, the charms of youthful innocence and beauty, and the helplessness of infancy and childhood—possess an almost angelic purity of feeling and delicacy of fancy. When presenting rules for morning meditation and prayer, he stops to indulge his love of nature. ‘Sometimes,’ he says, ‘be curious to see the preparation which the sun makes when he is coming forth from his chambers of the east.’ He compares a young man to a dancing bubble, ‘empty and gay, and shining like a dove’s neck, or the image of a rainbow, which hath no substance, and whose very imagery and colours are fantastical.’ The fulfilment of our duties he calls ‘presenting a rosary or chaplet of good works to our Maker;’ and he dresses even the grave with the flowers of fancy. This freshness of feeling and imagination remained with him to the last, amidst all the strife and violence of the Civil War, and the still more deadening effects of polemical controversy and systems of casuistry and metaphysics. The stormy vicissitudes of his life seem only to have taught him greater gentleness, resignation, toleration for human failings, and a more ardent love of humankind. The earlier of the extracts given below are from Of Holy Dying, the others from sermons.

The Age of Reason and Discretion.

Neither must we think that the life of a man begins when he can feed himself or walk alone, when he can fight or beget his like, for so he is contemporary with a camel or a cow; but he is first a man when he comes to a certain steady use of reason, according to his proportion; and when that is, all the world of men cannot tell precisely. Some are called ‘at age’ at fourteen, some at one-and-twenty, some never; but all men late enough; for the life of a man comes upon him slowly and insensibly. But as, when the sun approaches towards the gates of the morning, he first opens a little eye of heaven, and sends away the spirits of darkness, and gives light to a cock, and calls up the lark to matins, and by and by gilds the fringes of a cloud, and peeps over the eastern hills, thrusting out his golden horns like those which decked the brows of Moses, when he was forced to wear a veil, because himself had seen the face of God; and still, while a man tells the story, the sun gets up higher, till he shews a fair face and a full light, and then he shines one whole day, under a cloud often, and sometimes weeping great and little showers, and sets quickly: so is a man’s reason and his life. He first begins to perceive himself to see or taste, making little reflections upon his actions of sense, and can discourse of flies and dogs, shells and play, horses and liberty: but when he is strong enough to enter into arts and little institutions, he is at first entertained with trifles and impertinent things, not because he needs them, but because his understanding is no bigger, and little images of things are laid before him, like a cock-boat to a whale, only to play withal: but before a man comes to be wise, he is half dead with gout and consumptions, with catarrhs and aches, with sore eyes and a worn-out body. So that if we must not reckon the life of a man but by the accounts of his reason, he is long before his soul be dressed; and he is not to be called a man without a wise and an adorned soul, a soul at least furnished with what is necessary towards his well-being: but by that time his soul is thus furnished, his body is decayed; and then you can hardly reckon him to be alive, when his body is possessed by so many degrees of death.

But there is yet another arrest. At first he wants strength of body, and then he wants the use of reason: and when that is come, it is ten to one but he stops by the impediments of vice, and wants the strength of the spirit; and we know that body and soul and spirit are the constituent parts of every Christian man. And now let us consider what that thing is which we call years of discretion. The young man is passed his tutors, and arrived at the bondage of a caitiff spirit; he has run from discipline, and is let loose to passion. The man by this time hath wit enough to choose his vice, to act his lust, to court his mistress, to talk confidently, and ignorantly, and perpetually; to despise his betters, to deny nothing to his appetite, to do things that, when he is indeed a man, he must for ever be ashamed of : for this is all the discretion that most men shew in the first stage of their manhood ; they can discern good from evil ; and they prove their skill by leaving all that is good, and wallowing in the evils of folly and an unbridled appetite. And by this time the young man hath contracted vicious habits, and is a beast in manners, and therefore it will not be fitting to reckon the beginning of his life ; he is a fool in his understanding, and that is a sad death ; and he is dead in trespasses and sins, and that is a sadder : so that he hath no life but a natural, the life of a beast or a tree ; in all other capacities he is dead ; he neither hath the intellectual nor the spiritual life, neither the life of a man nor of a Christian ; and this sad truth lasts too long.

The Pomp of Death.

Take away but the pomps of death, the disguises, and solemn bugbears, and the actings by candlelight, and proper and fantastic ceremonies, the minstrels and the noise-makers, the women and the weepers, the swoonings and the shriekings, the nurses and the physicians, the dark room and the ministers, the kindred and the watches, and then to die is easy, ready, and quitted from its troublesome circumstances. It is the same harmless thing that a poor shepherd suffered yesterday, or a maid-servant to-day ; and at the same time in which you die, in that very night a thousand creatures die with you, some wise men and many fools ; and the wisdom of the first will not quit him, and the folly of the latter does not make him unable to die.

Miseries of Man's Life.

How few men in the world are prosperous ! What an infinite number of slaves and beggars, of persecuted and oppressed people, fill all corners of the earth with groans, and heaven itself with weeping, prayers, and sad remembrances ! How many provinces and kingdoms are afflicted by a violent war, or made desolate by popular diseases ! Some whole countries are remarked with fatal evils or periodical sicknesses. Grand Cairo in Egypt feels the plague every three years returning like a quartan ague, and destroying many thousands of persons. All the inhabitants of Arabia the desert are in continual fear of being buried in huge heaps of sand, and therefore dwell in tents and ambulatory houses, or retire to unfruitful mountains, to prolong an uneasy and wilder life. And all the countries round about the Adriatic Sea feel such violent convulsions, by tempests and intolerable earthquakes, that sometimes whole cities find a tomb, and every man sinks with his own house made ready to become his monument, and his bed is crushed into the disorders of a grave. . . . It were too sad if I should tell how many persons are afflicted with evil spirits, with spectres and illusions of the night. . . .

He that is no fool, but can consider wisely, if he be in love with this world, we need not despair but that a witty man might reconcile him with tortures, and make him think charitably of the rack, and be brought to dwell with vipers and dragons, and entertain his guests with the shrieks of mandrakes, cats, and screech-owls, with the filing of iron and the harshness of rending of silk, or to admire the harmony that is made by a herd of evening wolves, when they miss their draught of blood in their midnight revels. The groans of a man in a fit of the stone are worse than all these ; and the distractions of a troubled conscience are worse than those groans ; and yet a merry careless sinner is worse than all that. But if we could from one of the battlements of heaven espy how many men and women at this time lie fainting and dying for want of bread, how many young men are hewn down by the sword of war, how many poor orphans are now weeping over the graves of their father, by whose life they were enabled to eat ; if we could but hear how many mariners and passengers are at this present in a storm, and shriek out because their keel dashes against a rock or bulges under them ; how many people there are who weep with want and are mad with oppression, or are desperate by a too quick sense of a constant infelicity ; in all reason we should be glad to be out of the noise and the participation of so many evils. This is a place of sorrow and tears, of so great evils and a constant calamity ; let us remove from hence at least in affections and preparations of mind.

On Death.

Thus nature calls us to meditate of death by those things which are the instruments of acting it ; and God by all the variety of his providence, makes us see death everywhere, in all variety of circumstances, and dressed up for all the fancies and the expectation of every single person. Nature hath given us one harvest every year, but death hath two ; and the spring and the autumn send throngs of men and women to charnel-houses ; and all the summer long men are recovering from their evils of the spring, till the dog-days come, and then the Sirian star makes the summer deadly ; and the fruits of autumn are laid up for all the year's provision, and the man that gathers them eats and surfeits, and dies and needs them not, and himself is laid up for eternity ; and he that escapes till winter, only stays for another opportunity, which the distempers of that quarter minister to him with great variety. Thus death reigns in all the portions of our time. The autumn with its fruits provides disorders for us, and the winter's cold turns them into sharp diseases, and the spring brings flowers to strew our hearse, and the summer gives green turf and brambles to bind upon our graves. Calentures and surfeit, cold and agues, are the four quarters of the year, and all minister to death ; and you can go no whither but you tread on a dead man's bones.

The wild fellow in Petronius that escaped upon a broken table from the furies of a shipwreck, as he was sunning himself upon the rocky shore espied a man rolled upon his floating bed of waves, ballasted with sand in the folds of his garment, and carried by his civil enemy, the sea, towards the shore to find a grave. And it cast him into some sad thoughts : that peradventure this man's wife in some part of the continent, safe and warm, looks next month for the good man's return ; or, it may be, his son knows nothing of the tempest ; or his father thinks of that affectionate kiss which still is warm upon the good old man's cheek ever since he took a kind farewell, and he weeps with joy to think how blessed he shall be when his beloved boy returns into the circle of his father's arms. These are the thoughts of mortals, this is the end and sum of all their designs : a dark night and an ill guide, a boisterous sea and a broken cable, a hard rock and a rough wind, dashed in pieces the fortune of a whole family ; and they that shall weep loudest for the accident are not yet entered into the storm, and yet have suffered shipwreck. Then looking upon the carcass, he knew it, and found it to be the master of the ship, who the day before cast up the accounts of his patrimony and his trade, and named the day when he thought to be at home. See how the man swims who was so angry two days since! His passions are becalmed with the storm, his accounts cast up, his cares at an end, his voyage done, and his gains are the strange events of death, which, whether they be good or evil, the men that are alive seldom trouble themselves concerning the interest of the dead. . . .

It is a mighty change that is made by the death of every person, and it is visible to us who are alive. Reckon but from the sprightfulness of youth, and the fair cheeks and full eyes of childhood; from the vigourousness and strong flexure of the joints of five-and-twenty, to the hollowness and deadly paleness, to the loathsomeness and horror of a three days' burial, and we shall perceive the distance to be very great and very strange. But so have I seen a rose newly springing from the clefts of its hood, and at first it was fair as the morning, and full with the dew of heaven as a lamb's fleece; but when a ruder breath had forced open its virgin modesty, and dismantled its too youthful and unripe retirements, it began to put on darkness, and to decline to softness and the symptoms of a sickly age; it bowed the head, and broke its stalk; and at night, having lost some of its leaves and all its beauty, it fell into the portion of weeds and out-worn faces. The same is the portion of every man and every woman; the heritage of worms and serpents, rottenness and cold dishonor, and our beauty so changed that our acquaintance quickly knew us not; and that change mingled with so much horror, or else meets so with our fears and weak discouragements, that they who six hours ago tended upon us either with charitable or ambitious services, cannot without some regret stay in the room alone where the body lies stripped of its life and honour. I have read of a fair young German gentleman who, living, often refused to be pictured, but put off the importunity of his friends' desire by giving way, that after a few days' burial they might send a painter to his vault, and if they saw cause for it, draw the image of his death unto the life. They did so, and found his face half eaten, and his midriff and backbone full of serpents; and so he stands pictured among his armed ancestors. So does the fairest beauty change, and it will be as bad with you and me; and then what servants shall we have to wait upon us in the grave? what friends to visit us? what officious people to cleanse away the moist and unwholesome cloud reflected upon our faces from the sides of the weeping vaults, which are the longest weepers for our funeral?

Real Happiness.

If we should look under the skirt of the prosperous and prevailing tyrant, we should find, even in the days of his joys, such allays and abatements of his pleasure as may serve to represent him presently miserable, besides his final infelicities. For I have seen a young and healthful person warm and ruddy under a poor and a thin garment, when at the same time an old rich person hath been cold and paralytic under a load of sables and the skins of foxes. It is the body that makes the clothes warm, not the clothes the body; and the spirit of a man makes felicity and content, not any spoils of a rich fortune, wrapt about a sickly and an uneasy soul. Apollodorus was a traitor and a tyrant, and the world wondered to see a bad man have so good a fortune, but knew not that he nourished scorpions in his breast, and that his liver and his heart were eaten up with spectres and images of death; his thoughts were full of interruptions, his dreams of illusions: his fancy was abused with real troubles and fantastic images, imagining that he saw the Scythians flaying him alive, his daughters like pillars of fire, dancing round about a caldron in which himself was boiling, and that his heart accused itself to be the cause of all these evils.

Does he not drink more sweetly that takes his beverage in an earthen vessel, than he that looks and searches into his golden chalices, for fear of poison, and looks pale at every sudden noise, and sleeps in armour, and trusts nobody, and does not trust God for his safety?

Can a man bind a thought with chains, or carry imaginations in the palm of his hand? can the beauty of the peacock's train, or the ostrich plume, be delicious to the palate and the throat? does the hand intermeddle with the joys of the heart? or darkness, that hides the naked, make him warm? does the body live, as does the spirit? or can the body of Christ be like to common food? Indeed, the sun shines upon the good and bad; and the vines give wine to the drunkard, as well as to the sober man; pirates have fair winds and a calm sea, at the same time when the just and peaceful merchantman hath them. But although the things of this world are common to good and bad, yet sacraments and spiritual joys, the food of the soul and the blessing of Christ, are the peculiar right of saints.

Marriage.

They that enter into the state of marriage cast a die of the greatest contingency, and yet of the greatest interest in the world, next to the last throw for eternity. . . . Life or death, felicity or a lasting sorrow, are in the power of marriage. A woman indeed ventures most, for she hath no sanctuary to retire to from an evil husband; she must dwell upon her sorrow, and hatch the eggs which her own folly or infelicity hath produced; and she is more under it, because her tormentor hath a warrant of prerogative, and the woman may complain to God, as subjects do of tyrant princes; but otherwise she hath no appeal in the causes of unkindness. And though the man can run from many hours of his sadness, yet he must return to it again; and when he sits among his neighbours, he remembers the objection that lies in his bosom, and he sighs deeply. . . . The boys, and the pedlars, and the fruiterers, shall tell of this man when he is carried to his grave, that he lived and died a poor wretched person. The stags in the Greek epigram, whose knees were clogged with frozen snow upon the mountains, came down to the brooks of the valleys. . . . 'hoping to thaw their joints with the waters of the stream;' but there the frost overtook them, and bound them fast in ice, till the young herdsman took them in their stranger snare. It is the unhappy chance of many men, finding many inconveniences upon the mountains of single life, they descend into the valleys of marriage to refresh their troubles; and there they enter into fetters, and are bound to sorrow by the cords of a man's or woman's peevishness. And the worst of the evil is, they are to thank their own follies; for they fell into the snare by entering an improper way: Christ and the church were no ingredients in their choice. . . .

Man and wife are equally concerned to avoid all offences of each other in the beginning of their conversation; every little thing can blast an infant blossom; and the breath of the south can shake the little rings of the vine, when first they begin to curl like the locks of a new weaned boy: but when by age and consolidation they stiffen into the hardness of a stem, and have, by the warm embraces of the sun and the kisses of heaven, brought forth their clusters, they can endure the storms of the north, and the loud noises of a tempest, and yet never be broken: so are the early unions of an unfixed marriage; watchful and observant, jealous and busy, inquisitive and careful, and apt to take alarm at every unkind word. . . . After the hearts of the man and the wife are endeared and hardened by a mutual confidence and experience, longer than artifice and pretence can last, there are a great many remembrances, and some things present, that dash all little unkindnesses in pieces. . . .

There is nothing can please a man without love; and if a man be weary of the wise discourses of the Apostles, and of the innocency of an even and a private fortune, or hates peace, or a fruitful year, he hath reaped thorns and thistles from the choicest flowers of Paradise; 'for nothing can sweeten felicity itself but love;' but when a man dwells in love, then the breasts of his wife are pleasant as the droppings upon the Hill of Hermon; her eyes are fair as the light of heaven; she is a fountain sealed, and he can quench his thirst, and ease his cares, and lay his sorrows down upon her lap, and can retire home to his sanctuary and refectory, and his gardens of sweetness and chaste refreshments. No man can tell but he that loves his children, how many delicious accents make a man's heart dance in the pretty conversation of those dear pledges; their childishness, their stammering, their little angers, their innocence, their imperfections, their necessities, are so many little emanations of joy and comfort to him that delights in their persons and society. . . .

It is fit that I should infuse a bunch of myrrh into the festival goblet, and; after the Egyptian manner, serve up a dead man's bones at a feast: I will only shew it, and take it away again; it will make the wine bitter, but wholesome. But those married pairs that live as remembering that they must part again, and give an account how they treat themselves and each other, shall, at that day of their death, be admitted to glorious espousals; and when they shall live again, be married to their Lord, and partake of his glories, with Abraham and Joseph, St Peter and St Paul, and all the married saints. . . . 'All those things that now please us shall pass from us, or we from them;' but those things that concern the other life are permanent as the numbers of eternity. And although at the resurrection there shall be no relation of husband and wife, and no marriage shall be celebrated but the marriage of the Lamb, yet then shall be remembered how men and women passed through this state, which is a type of that; and from this sacramental union all holy pairs shall pass to the spiritual and eternal, where love shall be their portion, and joys shall crown their heads, and they shall lie in the bosom of Jesus, and in the heart of God, to eternal ages. Amen.

The Skylark.

For so I have seen a lark rising from his bed of grass, and soaring upwards, singing as he rises, and hopes to get to heaven, and climb above the clouds; but the poor bird was beaten back with the loud sighings of an eastern wind, and his motion made irregular and inconstant, descending more at every breath of the tempest, than it could recover by the libration and frequent weighing of his wings; till the little creature was forced to sit down and pant, and stay till the storm was over; and then it made a prosperous flight, and did rise and sing, as if it had learned music and motion from an angel, as he passed sometimes through the air, about his ministries here below: so is the prayer of a good man.

(From Sermon on 'The Return of Prayers'.)

The Day of Judgment.

Even you and I, and all the world, kings and priests, nobles and learned, the crafty and the easy, the wise and the foolish, the rich and the poor, the prevailing tyrant and the oppressed party, shall all appear to receive their symbol; and this is so far from abating anything of its terror and our dear concernment, that it much increases it. For although concerning precepts and discourses we are apt to neglect in particular what is recommended in general, and in incidences of mortality and sad events, the singularity of the chance heightens the apprehension of the evil; yet it is so by accident, and only in regard of our imperfection; it being an effect of self-love, or some little creeping envy, which adheres too often to the unfortunate and miserable; or else because the sorrow is apt to increase by being apprehended to be in a rare case, and a singular unworthiness in him who is afflicted otherwise than is common to the sons of men, companions of his sin, and brethren of his nature, and partners of his usual accidents; yet in final and extreme events, the multitude of sufferers does not lessen but increase the sufferings; and when the first day of judgment happened—that, I mean, of the universal deluge of waters upon the old world—the calamity swelled like the flood, and every man saw his friend perish, and the neighbours of his dwelling, and the relatives of his house, and the sharers of his joys, and yesterday's bride, and the newborn heir, the priest of the family, and the honour of the kindred, all dying or dead, drenched in water and the divine vengeance; and then they had no place to flee unto, no man cared for their souls; they had none to go unto for counsel, no sanctuary high enough to keep them from the vengeance that rained down from heaven; and so it shall be at the day of judgment, when that world and this, and all that shall be born hereafter, shall pass through the same Red Sea, and be all baptised with the same fire, and be involved in the same cloud, in which shall be thunderings and terrors infinite. Every man's fear shall be increased by his neighbour's shrieks, and the amazement that all the world shall be in, shall unite as the sparks of a raging furnace into a globe of fire, and roll upon its own principle, and increase by direct appearances and intolerable reflections. He that stands in a churchyard in the time of a great plague, and hears the passing-bell perpetually telling the sad stories of death, and sees crowds of infected bodies pressing to their graves, and others sick and tremulous, and death dressed up in all the images of sorrow round about him, is not supported in his spirit by the variety of his sorrow; and at doomsday, when the terrors are universal, besides that it is in itself so much greater, because it can affright the whole world, it is also made greater by communication and a sorrowful influence; grief being then strongly infectious, when there is no variety of state, but an entire kingdom of fear; and amazement is the king of all our passions, and all the world its subjects. And that shriek must needs be terrible, when millions of men and women, at the same instant, shall fearfully cry out, and the noise shall mingle with the trumpet of the archangel, with the thunders of the dying and groaning heavens, and the crack of the dissolving world, when the whole fabric of nature shall shake into dissolution and eternal ashes! . . .

Consider what an infinite multitude of angels, and men, and women shall then appear! It is a huge assembly when the men of one kingdom, the men of one age in a single province, are gathered together into heaps and confusion of disorder; but then, all kingdoms of all ages, all the armies that ever mustered, all that world that Augustus Cæsar taxed, all those hundreds of millions that were slain in all the Roman wars, from Numa's time till Italy was broken into principalities and small exarchates: all these, and all that can come into numbers, and that did descend from the loins of Adam, shall at once be represented; to which account, if we add the armies of heaven, the nine orders of blessed spirits, and the infinite numbers in every order, we may suppose the numbers fit to express the majesty of that God, and the terror of that Judge, who is the Lord and Father of all that unimaginable multitude! . . . The majesty of the Judge, and the terrors of the judgment, shall be spoken aloud by the immediate forerunning accidents, which shall be so great violences to the old constitutions of nature, that it shall break her very bones, and disorder her till she be destroyed. St Jerome relates out of the Jews' books, that their doctors used to account fifteen days of prodigy immediately before Christ's coming, and to every day assign a wonder; any one of which, if we should chance to see in the days of our flesh, it would affright us into the like thoughts which the old world had when they saw the countries round about them covered with water and the divine vengeance; or as these poor people near Adria and the Mediterranean Sea, when their houses and cities were entering into graves, and the bowels of the earth rent with convulsions and horrid tremblings. The sea, they say, shall rise fifteen cubits above the highest mountains, and thence descend into hollowness and a prodigious drought; and when they are reduced again to their usual proportions, then all the beasts and creeping things, the monsters and the usual inhabitants of the sea, shall be gathered together, and make fearful noises to distract mankind: the birds shall mourn and change their song into threnes and sad accents; rivers of fire shall rise from east to west, and the stars shall be rent into threads of light, and scatter like the beards of comets; then shall be fearful earthquakes, and the rocks shall rend in pieces, the trees shall distil blood, and the mountains and fairest structures shall return into their primitive dust; the wild beasts shall leave their dens, and shall come into the companies of men, so that you shall hardly tell how to call them, herds of men or congregations of beasts; then shall the graves open and give up their dead, and those which are alive in nature and dead in fear shall be forced from the rocks whither they went to hide them, and from caverns of the earth where they would fain have been concealed; because their retirements are dismantled, and their rocks are broken into wider ruptures, and admit a strange light into their secret bowels; and the men being forced abroad into the theatre of mighty horrors, shall run up and down distracted, and at their wits' end; and then some shall die, and some shall be changed; and by this time the elect shall be gathered together from the four quarters of the world, and Christ shall come along with them to judgment.

Dr Henry More (1614-87) was conspicuous among the English Platonists and metaphysicians of the seventeenth century. A native of Grantham in Lincolnshire, and Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, he devoted his life to study and religious meditation at Cambridge, and strenuously refused to accept preferment in the Church, which would have rendered it necessary for him to leave what he called his paradise. The friends of this amiable recluse once attempted to decoy him into a bishopric, and got him so far on the way to Whitehall to kiss the king's hand; but when told for what purpose they had brought him thither, he refused to move a step farther. He declined university appointments as remorselessly as he did one deanery and two bishoprics. He early revolted against the Calvinism of his parents, and gave himself entirely to philosophy, to Plato, and especially to the Neo-Platonists. He held that the wisdom of the Hebrews had descended to Pythagoras, and from him to Plato, in the writings of whom and his followers he believed that the true principles of divine philosophy were consequently to be found. He himself lived in an atmosphere of unusual spiritual exultation, and exercised great influence on the young. He was a man of uncommon benevolence, purity, and devotion. He was of a dreamy, poetical temperament; and from comparatively reasonable views he drifted gradually deeper into the abyss of mysticism or theosophy, and his works, which were extremely popular in the later half of the seventeenth century, decline progressively in value. Tulloch treats More as the most interesting but the most unreadable of the Cambridge Platonists. He was transcendentalist enough to accept as real the cures of the quack Greatrakes, and, like the philosophical sceptic Glanville, believed firmly in witches and witchcraft. Of his works the most important are The Mystery of Godliness; The Mystery of Iniquity; A Discourse on the Immortality of the Soul; the famous Divine Dialogues; treatises against atheism and idolatry; ethical, metaphysical, cabballistical, and controversial volumes; expositions of the Apocalypse and the Book of Daniel ; and Psychozoia Platonica, or a Platonical Song of the Soul, in four poems, 1642, afterwards published as Philosophical Poems, 1647. 'His poetry,' says Thomas Campbell, 'is not like a beautiful landscape on which the eye can repose, but may be compared to some curious grotto, whose gloomy labyrinths we might be curious to explore for the strange and mystic associations they excite.' We give two stanzas from the Psychozoia :

The Soul and Body.

Like to a light fast locked in lanthorn dark,
Whereby by night our wary steps we guide
In slabby streets, and dirty channels mark,
Some weaker rays through the black top do glide,
And flusher streams perhaps from horny side.
But when we've passed the peril of the way,
Arrived at home, and laid that case aside,
The naked light how clearly doth it ray,
And spread its joyful beams as bright as summer's day.

Even so the soul, in this contracted state,
Confined to these strait instruments of sense,
More dull and narrowly doth operate ;
At this hole hears, the sight must ray from thence,
Here tastes, there smells : but when she's gone from Like naked lamp she is one shining sphere, [hence,
And round about has perfect cognoscence
Whate'er in her horizon doth appear :
She is one orb of sense, all eye, all airy ear.

The first two of the prose extracts are from More's Mystery of Godliness, the others from the Divine Dialogues :

Of the Works of God.

Whether therefore our eyes be struck with that more radiant lustre of the sun, or whether we behold that more placid and calm beauty of the moon, or be refreshed with the sweet breathings of the open air, or be taken up with the contemplation of those pure sparkling lights of the stars, or stand astonished at the gushing downfalls of some mighty river, as that of Nile, or admire the height of some insuperable and inaccessible rock or mountain ; or with a pleasant horror and chillness look upon some silent wood, or solemn shady grove ; whether the face of heaven smile upon us with a cheerful bright azure, or look upon us with a more sad and minacious countenance, dark pitchy clouds being charged with thunder and lightning to let fly against the earth ; whether the air be cool, fresh, and healthful ; or whether it be sultry, contagious, and pestilential, so that, while we gasp for life, we are forced to draw in a sudden and inevitable death ; whether the earth stand firm, and prove favourable to the industry of the artificer ; or whether she threaten the very foundations of our buildings with trembling and tottering earthquakes, accompanied with remugient echoes and ghastly murmurs from below ; whatever notable emergencies happen for either good or bad to us, these are the Joves and Vejoves that we worship, which to us are not many, but one God, who has the only power to save or destroy. And therefore, from whatever part of this magnificent temple of his—the world—he shall send forth his voice, our hearts and eyes are presently directed thitherward with fear, love, and veneration.

Of the Evidence for the Existence of God.

When I say that I will demonstrate that there is a God, I do not promise that I will always produce such arguments that the reader shall acknowledge so strong, as he shall be forced to confess that it is utterly impossible that it should be otherwise ; but they shall be such as shall deserve full assent, and win full assent from any unprejudiced mind.

For I conceive that we may give full assent to that which, notwithstanding, may possibly be otherwise ; which I shall illustrate by several examples : Suppose two men got to the top of Mount Athos, and there viewing a stone in the form of an altar with ashes on it, and the footsteps of men on those ashes, or some words, if you will, as Optimo Maximo, or To agnosto Theo, or the like, written or scrawled out upon the ashes ; and one of them should cry out : Assuredly here have been some men that have done this. But the other, more nice than wise, should reply : Nay, it may possibly be otherwise ; for this stone may have naturally grown into this very shape, and the seeming ashes may be no ashes, that is, no remainders of any fuel burnt there ; but some inexplicable and unperceptible motions of the air, or other particles of this fluid matter that is active everywhere, have wrought some parts of the matter into the form and nature of ashes, and have fringed and played about so, that they have also figured those intelligible characters in the same. But would not anybody deem it a piece of weakness, no less than dotage, for the other man one whit to recede from his former apprehension, but as fully as ever to agree with what he pronounced first, notwithstanding this bare possibility of being otherwise ?

So of anchors that have been digged up, either in plain fields or mountainous places, as also the Roman urns with ashes and inscriptions, as Severianus Ful. Linus, and the like, or Roman coins with the effigies and names of the Cæsars on them, or that which is more ordinary, the skulls of men in every churchyard, with the right figure, and all those necessary perforations for the passing of the vessels, besides those conspicuous hollows for the eyes and rows of teeth, the os styloides, ethoides, and what not. If a man will say of them, that the motions of the particles of the matter, or some hidden spermatic power, has gendered these, both anchors, urns, coins, and skulls, in the ground, he doth but pronounce that which human reason must admit is possible. Nor can any man ever so demonstrate that those coins, anchors, and urns were once the artifice of men, or that this or that skull was once a part of a living man, that he shall force an acknowledgment that it is impossible that it should be otherwise. But yet I do not think that any man, without doing manifest violence to his faculties, can at all suspend his assent, but freely and fully agree that this or that skull was once a part of a living man, and that these anchors, urns, and coins were certainly once made by human artifice, notwithstanding the possibility of being otherwise.

And what I have said of assent is also true in dissent ; for the mind of man, not crazed nor prejudiced, will fully and irreconcilably disagree, by its own natural sagacity, where, notwithstanding, the thing that it doth thus resolutely and undoubtedly reject, no wit of man can prove impossible to be true. As if we should make such a fiction as this—that Archimedes, with the same individual body that he had when the soldiers slew him, is now safely intent upon his geometrical figures under ground, at the centre of the earth, far from the noise and din of this world, that might disturb his meditations, or distract him in his curious delineations he makes with his rod upon the dust; which no man living can prove impossible. Yet if any man does not as irreconcilably dissent from such a fable as this as from any falsehood imaginable, assuredly that man is next door to madness or dotage, or does enormous violence to the free use of his faculties.

Of the γυναικρατούμενοι and the men of Arcladam that lie in childbed for their wives.

Euistor. I perceive no small matters will puzzle Cuphron's invention: and therefore tho' the γυναικρατούμενοι [gunaikokratoumenoi, 'men ruled by women'] and the men of Arcladam that lie forty days in childbed for their wives, present themselves to my memory, yet I will pass them over.

Cuphron. That's a very odd thing of the men of Arcladam, Euistor: I pray you, what is it?

Euist. When the woman is delivered, she gets out of the bed as soon as she can, and follows the business of the house; but the man lies in for so many days, and does all the offices of a mother to the infant, saving the giving it suck: and the neighbours come a-gossiping to the man lying thus in bed, as in other countreys they do to the woman. And they of Arcladam give this reason for this custom, because the mother had a sufficient share of trouble in bearing the child and bringing him forth, and that therefore 'tis fit that the man should ease her now, and take off part of the care to himself, as Paulus Venetus reports.

Cuph. If the men of the country had had milk in their breasts, which several men have had, according to the testimony of many credible writers, philosophers, physicians, and anatomists, the custom had been more plausible. But such as it is, it has its reason, as you see, and it was not a pure piece of sottishness that carried them unto it. And for the gunaikokratoumenoi, in that the women rule them, it is a sign that it is fit they should. For it is in virtue of their strength, wit, or beauty. . . . They chose their kings of old from the beauty of their form, as Lucretius notes. And why do men rule the women, but upon account of more strength or more wisdom? But where the women rule the men, it is a sign they have more strength or wit, and therefore have a right to rule them. And indeed where do they not rule them? insomuch that the whole world in a manner are of the gunaikokratoumenoi. So that this is no peculiar disorder amongst the Barbarians, such as Mela and Diodorus Siculus mention.

Hylobares. The women are much beholden to you, Cuphron, for your so kind and careful patronage of them.

Cuph. I am of a large spirit, Hylobares; I love to be civil to all sects, sexes, and persons.

The gunaikokratoumenoi, men ruled by women, are dealt with in Aristotle's Politics. Arcladam is one of several odd spellings in the old Latin of Marco Polo for the region or tribe—located by Yule in western Yunnan—that Ramusio (and Purchas) calls Cardandan, and Yule Zardandan. Purchas, following Marco Polo, says of the people of Cardandan that 'when a woman is delivered of a child the man lyeth in and keepeth his bed, with visitation of gossips, the space of fortie days.' Purchas also reports the custom of the covade (as it is now called) from Brazil, where, to the joy of anthropologists, it still obtains.

Of the Pagans cruelty to their enemies, and inhuman humanity to their friends.

Hyl. Cuphron swallows all down very glibly. But, as I remember, there are some direful stories of the Pagans cruelty to their enemies, and inhuman humanity to their friends, that, methinks, should a little turn his stomach, Euistor.

Euist. There are very savage customes recorded in Pomponius Mela touching the Essedones, Axiacæ, and Geloni. The last clothe themselves and their horses with the skins of their slain enemies; with that part of the skin that covers the head they make a cap for themselves, with the rest they clothe their horses. The Essedones celebrate the funerals of their parents with great feasting and joy, eating their flesh minced and mingled with mutton (which is the manner of their burial of them); but tipping their skulls with gold, they make drinking-cups of them: as the Axiacæ quaffe in the heads of their slain enemies, as well as drink their blood in the field. In Castella del Oro the inhabitants also eat their own dead. But in the island Java, as Ludovicus Patritius reports, the children do not, like the Essedones, eat their parents, but when they are old and useless, sell them to the Anthropophagi, as the parents do the children, if desperately and irrecoverably sick in the judgment of the physician. For they hold it the noblest kind of burial to be interred in the belly of a man, and not to be eaten by worms: to which if any expose the body of his dead friend, they hold it a crime not to be expiated by any sacrifice. The laws also of the Sardoans and Berbicæ, which Ælian relates, are very savage; the one commanding the sons to knock the fathers o' th' head when they are come to dotage, the other prohibiting any to live above seventy years.

Hyl. Stop there, Euistor: let's hear what excuse the advocate of the Paynims can devise for these horrid customs.

The meaning of Providence in permitting such horrid usages in the world.

Sophron. That is very profitably and seasonably noted, O Cuphron: and tho' my judgment is not so curious as to criticize on the perpetual exactness of your applications of the sad miscarriages of the civilized parts of the world to those gross disorders of the Barbarians; yet your comparisons in the general have very much impressed that note of Philotheus upon my spirit, That the more external and gross enormities committed by the barbarous nations, are as it were a reprehensive satyr of the more fine and hypocritical wickednesses of the civilized countries; that these civilized sinners, abominating those wilder extravagancies, may withal give sentence against their own no-less wickedness, but only in a less-ugly dress. Whence it cannot be so great wonder that Providence lets such horrid usages emerge in the world, that the more affrightful face of sin in some places might quite drive out all similitude and appearance of it in others.

Bathynous. True, Sophron; but this also I conceive may be added, That divine Providence having the full comprehension of all the periods of ages, and the scenes of things succeeding in these periods, in her mind, permitted at first and afterwards some parts of the lapsed creation to plunge themselves into a more palpable darkness, that a more glorious light might succeed and emerge. The lovely splendor of which Divine dispensation would not strike the beholder so vigorously, did he not cast his eyes also upon that region of blackness and sad tyranny of the devil in preceeding ages over deluded mankind, such as Euistor has so plentifully discovered. All these things therefore seem to have been permitted in design to advance the glory and adorn the triumph of the promised Messias, the true Son of God and Saviour of the world.

The Opera Omnia, containing the Latin text of all the works, whether published originally in Latin or in English, appeared in 1679. See the Life by Ward (1712; ed. Howard, 1911), and Philosophicall Poems, ed. Grosart (1878) and Bullough (1931).

Izaak Walton,

'the father of angling,' was born at Stafford in 1593. He was an English worthy of the simple antique cast, who retained in the heart of London, and in the midst of close and successful application to business, an unworldly simplicity of character and an inextinguishable fondness for country scenes, pastimes, and recreations. As author, he had a power of natural description and lively dialogue that has rarely been surpassed. His Compleat Angler is a rich storehouse of rural pictures and pastoral poetry, of quaint but wise thoughts, of pleasing and humorous fancies, and of truly apostolic purity and kindness. A tincture of superstitious credulity and innocent eccentricity gives the book a special flavour and zest, without detracting from its higher power to soothe, instruct, and delight. Of Walton's education or his early years little is known; Wood says he acquired a modest competency as a sempster or linen-draper in London; but, like Thomas Grinsell, whose apprentice he was, he became a freeman of the Ironmongers' Company. That he had a shop in the Royal Burse in Cornhill, seven feet by five, is doubted. At all events, he had a more pleasant and spacious study in the fields and rivers in the neighbourhood of London, 'in such days and times as he laid aside business, and went a-fishing with honest Nat. and R. Roe.' Izaak—for so he always wrote his name—lived, according to tradition, in Fleet Street, where he had one half of a shop, the other half being occupied by a hosier, and afterwards in Chancery Lane, perhaps in Clerkenwell, and Paternoster Row. He married in 1626 Rachel Floud, who died in 1640; in 1647 he married again, his second wife being Anne, half-sister of Bishop Ken. This brought Walton the acquaintance of the eminent men and dignitaries of the Church, at whose houses he spent much of his time in his later years, especially after the death of his second wife in 1662, 'a woman of remarkable prudence, and of the primitive piety.'

Walton retired from business about 1644, and lived almost forty years more, in uninterrupted leisure. His first work was a Life of Dr Donne prefixed to a collection of that great man's sermons, published in 1640. Sir Henry Wotton was to have written Donne's life, Walton merely collecting the materials; but Sir Henry dying before he had begun to execute the task, Izaak 'reviewed his forsaken collections, and resolved that the world should see the best plain picture of the author's life that his artless pencil, guided by the hand of truth, could present.' Thus it was that he produced one of the most delightful miniature biographies in all English literature. He next wrote a brief and charming Life of Sir Henry Wotton (1651), and edited his literary remains. In 1652 he published a small work, a translation by Sir John Skeffington from the Spanish, The Heroe of Lorenzo, to which he prefixed a short affectionate notice of his friend, the translator. His principal production, The Compleat Angler, or the Contemplative Man's Recreation, appeared in 1653. Walton also wrote Lives of Richard Hooker (1665), George Herbert (1670), and Bishop Sanderson (1678). The Lives of Donne, Wotton, Hooker, and Sanderson—all exquisitely simple, touching, and impressive—were collected into one volume, which was one of Dr Johnson's favourite books. Though no man seems to have possessed his soul more patiently during the troublous times in which he lived, the venerable Izaak was tempted, in 1680, to write and publish anonymously two letters on the Distempers of the Times, 'written from a quiet and comformable citizen of London to two busie and factious shopkeepers in Coventry.' In 1683, when in his ninetieth year, he published the Thealma and Clearchus of Chalkhill (see page 443), and he died at Winchester on the 15th December of the same year, in the house of his son-in-law, Dr Hawkins, prebendary of Winchester.

The Compleat Angler of Walton is unique in our literature. In writing it, he says he made 'a recreation of a recreation,' and, by mingling innocent mirth and pleasant scenes with the graver part of his discourse, he designed it as a picture of his own disposition. His statements about fish are not always accurate, and his advice to anglers on their art by no means unexceptionable; the best part of his work is the idyllic and self-revealing element. The original edition had but thirteen chapters; the fifth (1676) had twenty-one, and a 'Second Part' by Charles Cotton. To the two original interlocutors, Piscator and Viator (the Fisherman and the Wayfarer), Walton had added in the second and greatly enlarged edition (1655) the Falconer (Auceps), and changed Viator into Venator (Hunter). The Hunter and Falconer serve in the dialogues only as foils to the venerable and complacent Piscator, in whom the interest of the piece wholly centres. The opening scene lets us at once into the genial character of the work and its hero. The three interlocutors meet accidentally on Tottenham Hill, near London, on a 'fine fresh May morning.' They are open and cheerful as the day. Piscator is going towards Ware, Venator to meet a pack of otter dogs upon Amwell Hill, and Auceps to Theobalds, to see a hawk that a friend there mews or moults for him. Piscator willingly joins with the lover of hounds in helping to destroy otters, for he 'hates them perfectly, because they love fish so well, and destroy so much.' The sportsmen proceed onwards together, and they agree each to 'commend his recreation' or favourite pursuit. Piscator alludes to the virtue and contentedness of anglers, but gives the precedence to his companions in discoursing on their different crafts. The lover of hawking is eloquent on the virtues of air, the element that he trades in, and on its various winged inhabitants. He describes the eager falcon 'making her highway over the steepest mountains and deepest rivers, and, in her glorious career, looking with contempt upon those high steeples and magnificent palaces which we adore and wonder at.' The singing birds, 'those little nimble musicians of the air, that warble forth their curious ditties with which nature hath furnished them to the shame of art,' are descanted upon with pure poetical feeling and expression.

The Singing Birds.

As first the lark, when she means to rejoyce, to chear herself and those that hear her, she then quits the earth, and sings as she ascends higher into the air; and having ended her heavenly employment, grows then mute and sad, to think she must descend to the dull earth, which she would not touch but for necessity.

How do the blackbird and thrush, with their melodious voices, bid welcome to the cheerful spring, and in their fixed mouths warble forth such ditties as no art or instrument can reach to!

Nay, the smaller birds also do the like in their particular seasons, as, namely, the leverock [skylark], the titlark, the little linnet, and the honest robin, that loves mankind both alive and dead.

But the nightingale, another of my airy creatures, breaths such sweet loud musick out of her little instrumental throat that it might make mankind to think miracles are not ceased. He that at midnight, when the very labourer sleeps securely, should hear, as I have very often, the clear airs, the sweet descants, the natural rising and falling, the doubling and redoubling of her voice, might well be lifted above earth and say: 'Lord, what musick hast thou provided for the saints in heaven, when thou affordest bad men such musick on earth!'

The lover of hunting next takes his turn, and comments, though with less force—for here Walton himself must have been at fault—on the perfection of smell possessed by the hound, and the joyous music made by a pack of dogs in full chase. Piscator then unfolds his long-treasured and highly prized lore on the virtues of water—sea, river, and brook—and on the antiquity and excellence of fishing and angling. Angling, he says, is 'some-what like poetry: men must be born so.' He quotes Scripture, and numbers the prophets who allude to fishing. He cannot but remember with pride that four of the twelve apostles were fishermen, and that our Saviour never reproved them for their employment or calling, as He did the Scribes and money-changers; for 'He found that the hearts of such men, by nature, were fitted for contemplation and quietness; men of mild, and sweet, and peaceable spirits, as, indeed, most anglers are.' The idea of angling seems to have unconsciously mixed itself with all Izaak Walton's speculations on goodness, loyalty, and veneration. Even worldly enjoyment he appears to have grudged to any less gifted mortals. A finely dressed dish of fish or a rich drink he pronounces too good for any but anglers or very honest men; and his parting benediction is upon 'all that are lovers of virtue, and dare trust in Providence, and be quiet, and go a-angling.' The last condition would, to his ordinary mood, when he is not peculiarly solemn or earnest, seem at least as significant as any of the others. The rhetoric and knowledge of Piscator at length fairly overcome Venator, and make him a convert to the superiority of angling as compared with his more savage pursuit of hunting. He agrees to accompany Piscator in his sport, adopts him as his master and guide, and in time becomes initiated into the practice and mysteries of the gentle craft. The angling excursions of the pair give occasion to the practical lessons and descriptions in the book, the style of which is as clear and sparkling as one of his own favourite summer streams. The discourse is interspersed with scraps of dialogue, moral reflections, quaint old verses, songs and sayings, and idyllic glimpses of country-life, and the whole breathes such cheerful piety and contentment, such sweet freshness and simplicity, as to give the book a perennial charm altogether its own. Walton loved God and man with an unaffected simplicity of mind which cast a radiant atmosphere of happiness around all the idyllic pictures that he saw, for the charm of the book is not so much in the matter, or even the manner, as the unconscious picture of the writer's own disposition. The book was the delight of Charles Lamb's childhood. Writing to Coleridge, he says: 'It breathes the very spirit of innocence, purity, and simplicity of heart. . . . It would sweeten a man's temper at any time to read it; it would Christianise every discordant angry passion.' And the tone and temper of the Angler have silently but powerfully influenced English tastes and English literature. Not an hour of the fishing day is wasted or unimproved. The master and scholar rise with the early dawn, and after four hours' fishing, breakfast at nine under a sycamore that shades them from the sun's heat. Old Piscator reads his admiring scholar a lesson on fly-fishing, and they sit and discourse while a 'smoking shower' passes off, freshening all the meadow and the flowers.

And now, scholar, I think it will be time to repair to our angle rods, which we left in the water to fish for themselves; and you shall chuse which shall be yours; and it is an even lay one of them catches.

And let me tell you, this kind of fishing with a dead rod, and laying night hooks, are like putting money to use; for they both work for the owners when they do nothing but sleep, or eat, or rejoice, as you know we have done this last hour, and sate as quietly and as free from cares under this sycamore, as Virgil's Tityrus and his Melibœus did under their broad beech-tree. No life, my honest scholar, no life so happy and so pleasant as the life of a well-governed angler; for when the lawyer is swallowed up with business, and the statesman is preventing or contriving plots, then we sit on cowslip banks, hear the birds sing, and possess our selves in as much quietness as these silent silver streams which we now see glide so quietly by us. Indeed, my good scholar, we may say of angling as Dr Boteler said of strawberries, 'Doubtless God could have made a better berry, but doubtless God never did;' and so if I might be judge, 'God never did make a more calm, quiet, innocent recreation than angling.'

I'll tell you, scholar, when I sat last on this primrose bank, and look'd down these meadows, I thought of them as Charles the Emperor did of the city of Florence, 'that they were too pleasant to be look'd on but only on holy-days.' As I then sate on this very grass, I turn'd my present thoughts into verse: 'twas a wish which I'll repeat to you:

The Angler's Wish.

I in these flow'ry meads wou'd be;
These chrystal streams should solace me;
To whose harmonious bubbling noise,
I with my angle wou'd rejoice;
Sit here, and see the turtle-dove
Court his chaste mate to acts of love;

Or on that bank feel the west wind
Breath health and plenty; please my mind
To see sweet dew-drops kiss these flowers,
And then washt off by April showers;
Here hear my Kenna sing a song;
There see a blackbird feed her young,

Or a leverock build her nest:
Here give my weary spirits rest,
And raise my low pitcht thoughts above
Earth, or what poor mortals love:
Thus, free from lawsuits and the noise
Of Princes courts, I wou'd rejoice.

Or with my Bryan and a book, his dog
Loyter long days near Shawford brook;
There sit by him and eat my meat,
There see the sun both rise and set;
There bid good-morning to next day,
There meditate my time away;
And angle on, and beg to have
A quiet passage to a welcome grave.

The master and scholar, at another time, sit under a honeysuckle-hedge while a shower falls, and encounter a handsome milkmaid and her mother, who sing to them 'that smooth song which was made by Kit Marlow:'

Come live with me, and be my love;

and the answer to it, 'which was made by Sir Walter Raleigh in his younger days' (see above at page 352). At night, when sport and instruction are over, they repair to the little alehouse, well known to Piscator, where they find 'a cleanly room, lavender in the windows, and twenty ballads stuck about the wall.' The hostess is cleanly, handsome, and civil, and knows how to dress the fish after Piscator's own fashion—he is learned in cookery—and having made a supper of their gallant trout, they drink their ale, tell tales, sing ballads, or join with a brother-angler who drops in, in a merry catch, till sleep overpowers them, and they retire to the hostess's two beds, 'the linen of which looks white and smells of lavender.' All this humble but happy picture is in colour fresh as Nature herself, and instinct with moral feeling and beauty. The only flaw in the perfection of old Piscator's benevolence arises from his entire devotion to his art. He will allow no creature to take fish but the angler, and concludes that any honest man may make a just quarrel with swan, geese, ducks, sea-gulls, and herons, &c.; and the use of live snails and worms as bait seems to have caused him no compunctions. His directions for making live-bait have subjected him to the charge of cruelty, probably not altogether serious, from Lord Byron (in Don Juan, Canto xiii.):

And angling, too, that solitary vice,
 Whatever Izaak Walton sings or says ;
 The quaint, old, cruel coxcomb, in his gullet
 Should have a hook, and a small trout to pull it.

For taking pike he recommends a perch, as being of fishes 'the longest lived on a hook;' and the poor frog is to be treated with elaborate, deliberate, and surely quite superfluous inhumanity :

And thus use your frog, that he may continue long alive : put your hook into his mouth, which you may easily do from the middle of April till August ; and then the frogs mouth grows up, and he continues so for at least six moneths without eating, but is sustained none but He whose name is Wonderful knows how. I say, put your hook, I mean the arming wire, through his mouth and out at his gills ; and with a fine needle and silk sew the upper part of his leg, with only one stitch, to the arming wire of your hook ; or tie the frogs leg above the upper joynt to the armed wire ; and, in so doing, use him as though you loved him, that is, harm him as little as you may possible, that he may live the longer. [The italics are not Walton's.]

'The Second Part of the Compleat Angler,' added to the fifth edition (1676) by Charles Cotton (see page 775), poet, translator of Montaigne, and adopted son of Walton, described itself as 'Instructions how to Angle for a Trout or Grayling in a Clear Stream.' Though the work was written in the short space of ten days, Walton's plan of dialogue was preserved, the author being Piscator junior, and his companion a traveller (Viator), who had paid a visit to the romantic scenery of Derbyshire, near which the residence of Cotton was situated. This traveller turns out to be the Venator of the first part, 'wholly addicted to the chase,' till Mr Izaak Walton taught him as good, a more quiet, innocent, and less dangerous diversion. The friends embrace ; Piscator conducts his new associate to his 'beloved river Dove,' extends to him the hospitalities of his mansion, and next morning shows him his fishing-house, inscribed 'Piscatoribus Sacrum,' with the 'prettily contrived' cipher including the first two letters of Father Walton's name and those of his son Cotton. A delicate clear river flowed about the house, which stood on a little peninsula, with a bowling-green close by, and fair meadows and mountains in the neighbourhood. This building, built in 1674, still hallows the beautiful scenery of the river Dove with memories of the venerable angler and his disciple. The extracts we give here (in which the old spelling is reproduced) are all taken from the first part of Walton's own work. The first characteristic specimen, with its wise reflections and admonitions, is from the twenty-first chapter.

Thankfulness.

Well, scholar, having now taught you to paint your rod, and we having still a mile to Tottenham High Cross, I will, as we walk towards it in the cool shade of this sweet honey suckle hedg, mention to you some of the thoughts and joys that have possess my soul since we two met together. And these thoughts shall be told you, that you also may joyn with me in thankfulness to the Giver of every good and perfect gift for our happiness. And that our present happiness may appear to be the greater, and we the more thankful for it, I will beg you to consider with me how many do even at this very time lie under the torment of the stone, the gout, and toothache ; and this we are free from. And every misery that I miss is a new mercy ; and therefore let us be thankful. There have been, since we met, others that have met disasters of broken limbs ; some have been blasted, others thunder-strucken ; and we have been freed from these and all those many other miseries that threaten humane nature : let us therefore rejoice and be thankful. Nay, which is a far greater mercy, we are free from the unsupportable burthen of an accusing, tormenting conscience—a misery that none can bear ; and therefore let us praise him for his preventing grace, and say, Every misery that I miss is a new mercy. Nay, let me tell you, there be many that have forty times our estates, that would give the greatest part of it to be healthful and chearful like us, who with the expence of a little money have eat, and drank, and laught, and angled, and sung, and slept securely ; and rose next day, and cast away care, and sung, and laught, and angled again ; which are blessings rich men cannot purchase with all their money. Let me tell you, scholar, I have a rich neighbour that is always so busie that he has no leasure to laugh ; the whole business of his life is to get money, and more money, that he may still get more and more money ; he is still drudging on, and says that Solomon says, 'The diligent hand maketh rich ;' and 'tis true indeed : but he considers not that 'tis not in the power of riches to make a man happy : for it was wisely said by a man of great observation, 'that there be as many miseries beyond riches as on this side them.' And yet God deliver us from pinching poverty, and grant that, having a competency, we may be content and thankful. Let us not repine, or so much as think the gifts of God unequally dealt, if we see another abound with riches, when, as God knows, the cares that are the keys that keep those riches hang often so heavily at the rich man's girdle, that they clog him with weary days and restless nights, even when others sleep quietly. We see but the outside of the rich man's happiness ; few consider him to be like the silkworm, that, when she seems to play, is at the very same time spinning her own bowels, and consuming herself ; and this many rich men do, loading themselves with corroding cares, to keep what they have (probably) unconscionably got. Let us therefore be thankful for health and competence, and, above all, for a quiet conscience.

Let me tell you, scholar, that Diogenes walked on a day with his friend to see a country fair, where he saw ribbons, and looking-glasses, and nut-crackers, and fiddles, and hobby-horses, and many other gim-cracks ; and having observed them, and all the other finimbruns that make a compleat country fair, he said to his friend : 'Lord, how many things are there in this world of which Diogenes hath no need !' And truly it is so, or might be so, with very many who vex and toyl themselves to get what they have no need of. Can any man charge God that he hath not given him enough to make his life happy ? No doubtless, for nature is content with a little ; and yet you shall hardly meet with a man that complains not of some want, though he indeed wants nothing but his will ; it may be, nothing but his will of his poor neighbour, for not worshipping or not flattering him : and thus, when we might be happy and quiet, we create trouble to ourselves. I have heard of a man that was angry with himself because he was no taller ; and of a woman that broke her looking-glass because it would not shew her face to be as young and handsom as her next neighbour's was. And I knew another to whom God had given health and plenty, but a wife that nature had made peevish, and her husband's riches had made purse-proud ; and must, because she was rich, and for no other virtue, sit in the highest pew in the church ; which being denied her, she engag'd her husband into a contention for it, and at last into a lawsuit with a dogged neighbour, who was as rich as he, and had a wife as peevish and purse-proud as the other ; and this lawsuit begot higher oppositions and actionable words, and more vexations and lawsuits ; for you must remember that both were rich, and must therefore have their wills. Well, this wilful purse-proud lawsuit lasted during the life of the first husband, after which his wife vexed and chid, and chid and vexed, till she also chid and vexed herself into her grave ; and so the wealth of these poor rich people was curst into a punishment, because they wanted meek and thankful hearts, for those only can make us happy. I knew a man that had health and riches, and several houses all beautiful and ready furnished, and would often trouble himself and family to be removing from one house to another ; and being asked by a friend why he removed so often from one house to another, replied : 'It was to find content in some one of them.' But his friend knowing his temper, told him, if he would find content in any of his houses, he must leave himself behind him ; for content will never dwell but in a meek and quiet soul. And this may appear, if we read and consider what our Saviour says in St Matthew's gospel, for he there says : 'Blessed be the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed be the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Blessed be the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. And blessed be the meek, for they shall possess the earth.' Not that the meek shall not also obtain mercy, and see God, and be comforted, and at last come to the kingdom of heaven ; but in the meantime, he and he only possesses the earth, as he goes toward that kingdom of heaven, by being humble and cheerful, and content with what his good God has allotted him. He has no turbulent, repining, vexatious thoughts that he deserves better ; nor is vexed when he sees others possess of more honour or more riches than his wise God has allotted for his share ; but he possesses what he has with a meek and contented quietness, such a quietness as makes his very dreams pleasing, both to God and himself.

My honest scholar, all this is told to incline you to thankfulness ; and, to incline you the more, let me tell you, that though the prophet David was guilty of murder and adultery, and many other of the most deadly sins, yet he was said to be a man after God's own heart, because he abounded more with thankfulness than any other that is mentioned in holy Scripture, as may appear in his book of Psalms, where there is such a commixture of his confessing of his sins and unworthiness, and such thankfulness for God's pardon and mercies, as did make him to be accounted, even by God himself, to be a man after his own heart : and let us, in that, labour to be as like him as we can : let not the blessings we receive daily from God make us not to value, or not praise him, because they be common ; let not us forget to praise him for the innocent mirth and pleasure we have met with since we met together. What would a blind man give to see the pleasant rivers and meadows, and flowers and fountains, that we have met with since we met together ! I have been told, that if a man that was born blind could obtain to have his sight for but only one hour during his whole life, and should, at the first opening of his eyes, fix his sight upon the sun when it was in his full glory, either at the rising or setting of it, he would be so transported and amazed, and so admire the glory of it, that he would not willingly turn his eyes from that first ravishing object to behold all the other various beauties this world could present to him. And this and many other like blessings we enjoy daily. And for most of them, because they be so common, most men forget to pay their praises ; but let not us, because it is a sacrifice so pleasing to him that made that sun and us, and still protects us, and gives us flowers and showers and stomachs and meat and content and leasure to go a-fishing.

Well, scholar, I have almost tir'd myself, and I fear more than almost tir'd you. But I now see Tottenham High Cross, and our short walk thither will put a period to my too long discourse, in which my meaning was, and is, to plant that in your mind with which I labour to possess my own soul : that is, a meek and thankful heart. And to that end I have shew'd you, that riches without them do not make any man happy. But let me tell you that riches with them remove many fears and cares. And therefore my advice is, that you endeavour to be honestly rich, or contentedly poor ; but be sure that your riches be justly got, or you spoil all ; for it is well said by Caussin : 'He that loses his conscience has nothing left that is worth keeping.' Therefore, be sure you look to that. And, in the next place, look to your health ; and if you have it, praise God, and value it next to a good conscience ; for health is the second blessing that we mortals are capable of, a blessing that money cannot buy, and therefore value it and be thankful for it. As for money, which may be said to be the third blessing, neglect it not ; but note, that there is no necessity of being rich ; for I told you there be as many miseries beyond riches as on this side them ; and if you have a competence, enjoy it with a meek, cheerful, thankful heart. I will tell you, scholar, I have heard a grave divine say that God has two dwellings, one in heaven and the other in a meek and thankful heart ; which Almighty God grant to me and to my honest scholar ! And so you are welcom to Tottenham High Cross.

Venator. Well, master, I thank you for all your good directions, but for none more than this last, of thankfulness, which I hope I shall never forget. And pray let's now rest ourselves in the sweet shady arbour.

Dean Nowell and Sir Henry Wotton.

The first is Doctor Nowell, sometime Dean of S. Paul's (in which church his monument stands yet undefaced), a man that in the reformation of Queen Elizabeth (not that of Henry the VIII.) was so noted for his meek spirit, deep learning, prudence and piety, that the then parliament and convocation both chose, enjoined, and trusted him to be the man to make a catechism for publick use, such a one as should stand as a rule for faith and manners to their posteritie: and the good old man (though he was very learned, yet knowing that God leads us not to heaven by hard questions) made that good, plain, unperplexed catechism, that is printed with the old service book. I say, this good old man was as dear a lover, and constant practicer of angling, as any age can produce; and his custome was to spend (besides his fixt hours of prayer those hours which by command of the church were enjoined the old clergy, and voluntarily dedicated to devotion by many primitive Christians :) besides those hours, this good man was observed to spend, or if you will, to bestow, a tenth part of his time in angling; and also (for I have conversed with those which have conversed with him) to bestow a tenth part of his revenue, and all his fish, amongst the poor that inhabited near to those rivers in which it was caught, saying often that charity gave life to religion: and at his return would praise God he had spent that day free from worldly trouble, both harmlesly, and in a recreation that became a church-man.

My next and last example shall be that undervaluer of money, the late provost of Eaton Colledg, Sir Henry Wotton (a man with whom I have often fish'd and convers'd), a man whose forraign employments in the service of this nation, and whose experience, learning, wit and cheerfulness, made his company to be esteemed one of the delights of mankind; this man, whose very approbation of angling were sufficient to convince any modest censurer of it, this man was also a most dear lover, and a frequent practicer of the art of angling, of which he would say, 'twas an employment for his idle time, which was not idly spent;' for angling was after tedious study 'a rest to his mind, a cheerer of his spirits, a diversion of sadness, a calmer of unquiet thoughts, a moderator of passions, a procurer of contentedness, and that it begot habits of peace and patience in those that profest and practic'd it.'

Sir, this was the saying of that learned man; and I do easily believe that peace, and patience, and a calm content did cohabit in the cheerful heart of Sir Henry Wotton, because I know that when he was beyond seventy years of age he made this description of a part of the present pleasure that possest him, as he sate quietly in a summer's evening on a bank a fishing; it is a description of the spring, which because it glides as soft and sweetly from his pen as that river does now by which it was then made, I shall repeat unto you.

Trout and Chub Fishing.

Viator. Trust me, master, I see now it is a harder matter to catch a trout than a chub; for I have put on patience, and followed you this two hours, and not seen a fish stir, neither at your minnow nor your worm.

Piscator. Well, scholer, you must endure worse luck sometime or you will never make a good angler. But what say you now? there is a trout now, and a good one too, if I can but hold him; and two or three turns more will tire him: now you see he lies still, and the sleight is to land him: reach me that landing net. So (sir) now he is mine own, what say you? is not this worth all my labour?

Viat. On my word, master, this is a gallant trout; what shall we do with him?

Pisc. Marry e'en eat him to supper: we'll go to my hostis, from whence we came; she told me, as I was going out of door, that my brother Peter, a good angler, and a cheerful companion, had sent word he would lodg there tonight, and bring a friend with him. My hostis has two beds, and I know you and I may have the best: we'll rejoice with my brother Peter and his friends, tel tales, or sing ballads, or make a catch, or find some harmless sport to content us.

Viat. A match, good master, lets go to that house, for the linnen looks white, and smels of lavender, and I long to lye in a pair of sheets that smels so: lets be going, good master, for I am hungry again with fishing.

Pisc. Nay, stay a little, good scholer, I caught my last trout with a worm, now I wil put on a minow and try a quarter of an hour about yonder trees for another, and so walk towards our lodging. Look you, scholer, thereabout we shall have a bite presently, or not at all: have with you (sir!) on my word I have him. Oh it is a great logger-headed chub: come, hang him upon that willow twig, and let's be going. But turn out of the way a little, good scholer, towards yonder high hedg: we'll sit whilst this showr falls so gently upon the teeming earth, and gives a sweeter smel to the lovely flowers that adorn the verdant meadows.

Look, under that broad beech tree I sate down when I was last this way a fishing, and the birds in the adjoining grove seemed to have a friendly contention with an echo, whose dead voice seemed to live in a hollow cave, near to the brow of that primrose hil; there I sate, viewing the silver streams glide silently towards their center, the tempestuous sca, yet sometimes opposed by rugged roots, and pibble stones, which broke their waves, and turned them into fome: and sometimes viewing the harmless lambs, some leaping securely in the cool shade, whilst others sported themselves in the cheerful sun; and others were craving comfort from the swolne udders of their bleating dams. As I thus sate, these and other sights had so fully possest my soul, that I thought as the poet hath happily exprest it:

'I was for that time lifted above earth;
And possest joyes not promis'd in my birth.'

As I left this place, and entered into the next field, a second pleasure entertained me, 'twas a handsome milk-maid that had cast away all care, and sung like a nightingale; her voice was good, and the ditty fitted for it; 'twas that smooth song which was made by Kit Marlow, now at least fifty years ago; and the milk maids mother sung an answer to it, which was made by Sir Walter Raleigh in his yonger dayes.

They were old fashioned poetry, but choicely good, I think much better than that now in fashion in this critical age. Look yonder, on my word, yonder they both be a milking again: I will give her the chub, and perswade them to sing those two songs to us.

Pisc. God speed, good woman, I have been a fishing, and am going to Bleak Hall to my bed, and having caught more fish than wil sup my self and friend, wil bestow this upon you and your daughter, for I use to sel none.

Milkwoman. Marry God requite you sir, and we'll eat it cheerfully: wil you drink a draught of red cows milk?

Pisc. No, I thank you: but I pray do us a courtesie that shal stand you and your daughter in nothing, and we wil think our selves stil something in your debt; it is but to sing us a song, that was sung by you and your daughter, when I last past over this meadow, about eight or nine dayes since.

Milk. What song was it, I pray? was it, 'Come shepherds deck your heds:' or, 'As at noon Dulcina rested:' or 'Philida flouts me?'

Pisc. No, it is none of those: it is a song that your daughter sung the first part, and you sung the answer to it.

Milk. O I know it now, I learn'd the first part in my golden age, when I was about the age of my daughter; and the later part, which indeed fits me best, but two or three years ago; you shal, God willing, hear them both. Come Maudlin, sing the first part to the gentlemen with a merrie heart, and Ile sing the second.

Of Hampshire Trouts and Sir Francis Bacon.

Pisc. And you are to know, that in Hampshire (which I think exceeds all England for pleasant brooks, and store of trouts) they use to catch trouts in the night by the light of a torch or straw, which when they have discovered, they strike with a trout spear: this kind of way they catch many, but I would not believe it till I was an eye-witness of it, nor like it now I have seen it.

Viat. But master, do not trouts see us in the night?

Pisc. Yes, and hear, and smel too, both then and in the day time, for Gesner observes, the otter smels a fish forty furlongs off him in the water; and that it may be true is affirmed by Sir Francis Bacon (in the eighth century of his natural history), who there proves that waters may be the medium of sounds, by demonstrating it thus, that if you knock two stones together very deep under the water, those that stand on a bank neer to that place may hear the noise without any diminution of it by the water. He also offers the like experiment concerning the letting an anchor fall by a very long cable or rope on a rock, or the sand within the sea: and this being so wel observed and demonstrated, as it is by that learned man, has made me to believe that celes unbend themselves, and stir at the noise of thunder, and not only as some think, by the motion or the stirring of the earth, which is occasioned by that thunder.

And this reason of Sir Francis Bacons has made me crave pardon of one that I laughed at, for affirming that he knew carps come to a certain place in a pond to be fed at the ringing of a bel: and it shall be a rule for me to make as little noise as I can when I am fishing, until Sir Francis Bacon be confuted, which I shall give any man leave to do, and so leave off this philosophical discourse for a discourse of fishing.

Of which my next shall be to tell you, it is certain, that certain fields neer Lemster, a town in Herefordshire, are observed, that they make the sheep that graze upon them more fat than the next, and also to bear finer wool; that is to say, that that year in which they feed in such a particular pasture, they shall yeeld finer wool than the year before they came to feed in it, and coarser again if they shall return to their former pasture, and again return to a finer wool being fed in the fine wool ground. Which I tell you, that you may the better believe that I am certain, if I catch a trout in one meadow, he shall be white and faint, and very like to be lowsie; and as certainly if I catch a trout in the next meadow, he shal be strong, and red, and lusty, and much better meat: trust me (scholer) I have caught many a trout in a particular meadow, that the very shape and inamelled colour of him has joyed me to look upon him, and I have with Solomon concluded, every thing is beautifull in season.

In the edition of Westwood's Chronicle of 'The Compleat Angler,' published on the two hundredth anniversary of Walton's death, there are enumerated 97 editions, as compared with over 160 in 1915—including editions by [Sir] John Hawkins (1760); Major (1824-44); Sir Harris Nicolas, with a good Life (1836); Bethune (N. Y., 1847); Jesse and Bohn (1856); Dowling (1857); Marston (2 vols. 1888, 1 vol. 1915); Harting (2 vols. 1893); Andrew Lang (1896); Dobson (1899); and a fac-simile of the original edition (1876; with intro. by Le Gallienne, 1897). A copy of the first edition brought £52 in 1874, £310 in 1891, and £925 in 1924. In 1919 the first five editions fetched $5900. Of the Lives there are editions by Zouch (1796), Major (1825), A. H. Bullen (1884), and Sampson (1903). See also S. Martin's Izaak Walton and His Friends (1903), and Keynes, The Compleat Walton (with Life, 1929).

James Harrington (1611-77), the author of Oceana, was the son of Sir Sapcotes Harrington of Rand in Lincolnshire, but was born at Upton, Northamptonshire, studied at Oxford, and for a time was a pupil of the famous Chillingworth. Afterwards he went abroad for several years. While at the Hague and at Venice he imbibed many of those Republican views which marked his writings. At Rome he attracted attention by refusing on a public occasion to kiss the Pope's toe—conduct which he afterwards adroitly defended to the King of England by saying that, 'having had the honour of kissing His Majesty's hand, he thought it beneath him to kiss the toe of any other monarch.' During the Civil War he was appointed by the parliamentary commissioners to be one of the personal attendants of King Charles, who in 1647 nominated him one of the grooms of his bed-chamber. Except upon politics the king was fond of Harrington's conversation; and the king's kindness made Harrington most anxious that a reconciliation between king and Parliament might be effected. He was much distressed when the king was brought to the scaffold. During the sway of Cromwell, Harrington occupied himself in composing the Oceana, which was published in 1656. The work is a political romance of a new England completely reconstituted (as he hoped, under Cromwell himself, Olphaus Megaletor) in accordance with the author's idea of a truly free but distinctly aristocratic republic. His model was partly based on the republics of Greece, Rome, and Venice, for which he 'ransacked the ancient archives of prudence,' but was very largely his own invention. Cromwell's actual English republic was by no means to Harrington's mind. All power, he maintains, depends upon property—chiefly upon land. An agrarian law should fix the balance of lands; and the government should be 'established upon an equal agrarian basis, rising into the superstructure, or three orders, the senate debating and proposing, the people resolving, and the magistracy executing by an equal rotation through the suffrage of the people given by ballot.' There is frequent polemic against Hobbes, whom he rejoices to confute by arguments from 'Machiavill.' After the publication of the Oceana Harrington continued to spread Republican opinions by founding a debating club called the Rota, and by holding conversations with visitors at his own house. This brought him under suspicion soon after the Restoration, and on the ground of treasonable practices he was sent to the Tower in 1661, and subsequently confined at Plymouth. He became subject to extraordinary hallucinations, from which, though he was released and afterwards married, he was never again free. He published also some twenty defences of Oceana, and translations of two of Virgil's eclogues and of six books of the Æneid.

By way of introduction to his work he gives a brief account of the people of Oceana, Marpesia, and Panopea—England, Scotland, and Ireland—and propounds a marvellous scheme for solving the Irish problem.

On Scotland and Ireland.

Marpesia, being the northern part of the same island, is the dry nurse of a populous and hardy nation, but where the staddels [small trees amongst underwood; i.e. nobles] have been formerly too thick; whence their courage answered not their hardiness except in the nobility, who governed that country much after the manner of Poland, but that the king was not elective till the people received their liberty; the yoke of the nobility being broken by the commonwealth of Oceana, which in grateful return is thereby provided with an inexhaustible magazine of auxiliaries.

Panopea, the soft mother of a slothful and pusillanimous people, is a neighbour island, anciently subjected by the arms of Oceana; since almost depopulated for shaking off the yoke, and at length replanted with a new race. But, through what virtues of the soil or vice of the air soever it be, they come still to degenerate. Wherefore seeing it is neither likely to yield men fit for arms, nor necessary it should, it had been the interest of Oceana so to have disposed of this province, being both rich in the nature of the soil, and full of commodious ports for trade, that it might have been ordered for the best in relation to her purse, which in my opinion, if it had been thought upon in time, might have been best done by planting it with Jews, allowing them their own rites and laws; for that would have brought them suddenly from all parts of the world, and in sufficient numbers. And though the Jews be now altogether for merchandize, yet in the land of Canaan (except since their exile from whence they have not been landlords) they were altogether for agriculture; and there is no cause why a man should doubt, but having a fruitful country, and excellent ports too, they would be good at both. Panopea, well peopled, would be worth a matter of four millions dry rents; that is, besides the advantage of the agriculture and trade, which, with a nation of that industry, comes at least to as much more. Wherefore Panopea, being farmed out to the Jews and their heirs for ever, for the pay of a provincial army to protect them during the term of seven years, and for two millions annual revenue from that time forward, besides the customs, which would pay the provincial army, would have been a bargain of such advantage, both to them and this commonwealth, as is not to be found otherwise by either. To receive the Jews after any other manner into a commonwealth were to maim it; for they of all nations never incorporate, but taking up the room of a limb, are of no use or office to the body, while they suck the nourishment which would sustain a natural and useful member.

If Panopea had been so disposed of, that knapsack, with the Marpesian auxiliary, had been an inestimable treasure; the situation of these countries being islands (as appears by Venice how advantageous such a one is to the like government) seems to have been designed by God for a commonwealth. And yet that, through the streightness of the place and defect of proper arms, can be no more than a commonwealth for preservation; whereas this, reduced to the like government, is a commonwealth for increase, and upon the mightiest foundation that any has been laid from the beginning of the world to this day.

'Illam arctâ capiens Neptunus compede stringit:
Hanc autem glaucis captus complectitur ulnis.'

The sea gives law to the growth of Venice, but the growth of Oceana gives law to the sea.

These countries, having been anciently distinct and hostile kingdoms, came by Morpheus the Marpesian [James VI. and I.], who succeeded by hereditary right to the crown of Oceana, not only to be joined under one head, but to be cast, as it were by a charm, into that profound sleep, which, broken at length by the trumpet of civil war, hath produced those effects that have given the occasion unto the ensuing discourse, divided into four parts.

The Election of Pastors.

The sixth order, directing, 'In case a parson or vicar of a parish comes to be removed by death or by the censors, that the congregation of the parish assemble and depute one or two elders by the ballot, who upon the charge of the parish shall repair to one of the universities of this nation with a certificate signed by the overseers, and addressed to the Vice-Chancellor, which certificate, giving notice of the death or removal of the parson or vicar, of the value of the parsonage or vicarage, and of the desire of the congregation to receive a probationer from that university, the Vice-Chancellor, upon the receipt thereof, shall call a convocation, and having made choyce of a fit person, shall return him in due time to the parish, where the person so returned shall return the full fruits of the benefice or vicaridge, and do the duty of the parson or vicar, for the space of one year, as probationer; and that being expired, the congregation of the elders shall put their probationer to the ballot, and if he attains not to two parts in three of the suffrage affirmative, he shall take his leave of the parish, and they shall send in like manner as before for another probationer; but if their probationer obtains two parts in three of the suffrage affirmative, he is then pastor of that parish. And the pastour of the parish shall pray with the congregation, preach the Word, and administer the sacraments to the same, according to the directory to be hereafter appointed by the parliament. Nevertheless such as are of gathered congregations, or from time to time shall join with any of them, are in nowise obliged to this way of electing their teachers, or to give their votes in this case, but wholly left to the liberty of their own consciences, and to that way of worship which they shall choose, being not Popish, Jewish, or idolatrous. And to the end they may be the better protected by the State in the exercise of the same, they are desired to make choyce, and in such manner as they best like, of certain magistrates in every one of their congregations, which we could wish might be four in each of them, to be auditors in cases of differences or distaste, if any through variety of opinions, that may be grievous or injurious to them, shall fall out. And such auditors or magistrates shall have power to examine the matter, and inform themselves, to the end that if they think it of sufficient weight, they may acquaint the phylarch [ruler of the tribe or county] with it, or introduce it into the councill of religion; where all such causes as those magistrates introduce shall from time be heard and determined according to such laws as are or shall hereafter be provided by the parliament for the just defence of the liberty of conscience.'

One of the liveliest passages is that in which a hearty defender of the old régime makes a very free assault, by way of reductio ad absurdum, on the new political model, the archon or supreme magistrate included:

A Conservative Counterblast.

Nevertheless my Lord Epimonus, who with much ado had been held till now, found it midsummer moon, and broke out of bedlam in this manner:

'My Lord Archon,—

'I have a singing in my head like that of a cartwheel, my brains are upon a rotation; and some are so merry, that a man cannot speak his griefs, but if your highshod prerogative, and those same slouching fellows your tribunes, do not take my lord strategus's and my lord orator's heads, and jole them together under the canopy, then let me be ridiculous to all posterity. For here is a commonwealth, to which if a man should take that of the 'prentices in their ancient administration of justice at Shrovetide, it were an aristocracy. You have set the very rabble with troncheons in their hands, and the gentry of this nation, like cocks with scarlet gills, and the golden combs of their salaries to boot, lest they should not be thrown at.

'Not a night can I sleep for some horrid apparition or other; one while these myrmidons are measuring silks by their quarter-staves, another stuffing their greasy pouches with my lord high treasurer's jacobusses [sovereigns of James I.'s coining]. For they are above a thousand in arms to three hundred, which, their gowns being pulled over their ears, are but in their doublets and hose. But what do I speak of a thousand? There be two thousand in every tribe, that is, a hundred thousand in the whole nation, not only in the posture of an army, but in a civill capacity sufficient to give us what lawes they please. Now everybody knows that the lower sort of people regard nothing but money; and you say it is the duty of a legislator to presume all men to be wicked: wherefore they must fall upon the richer, as they are an army; or, lest their minds should misgive them in such a villany, you have given them encouragement that they have a nearer way, seeing it may be done every whit as well as by the overballancing power which they have in elections. There is a fair which is annually kept in the centre of these territories at Kiberton [Kirton-in-Lindsey?], a town famous for ale, and frequented by good fellows; where there is a solemnity of the pipers and fiddlers of this nation (I know not whether Lacedemon, where the senate kept account of the stops of the flutes and of the fiddle-strings of that commonwealth, had any such custom) called the bull-running; and he that catches and holds the bull, is the annual and suprem magistrate of that comitia or congregation, called king piper, without whose license it is not lawful for any of those citizens to enjoy the liberty of his calling; nor is he otherwise legitimately qualified (or civitate donatus) to lead 'apes or bears in any perambulation of the same. Mine host of the Bear, in Kiberton, the father of ale, and patron of good football and cudgel players, has any time since I can remember been grand chancellor of this order. Now, say I, seeing great things arise from small beginnings, what should hinder the people, prone to their own advantage and loving money, from having intelligence conveyed to them by this same king piper and his chancellor, with their loyal subjects the minstrills and bearwards, masters of ceremonies, to which there is great recourse in their respective perambulations, and which they will commission and instruct, with directions to all the tribes, willing and commanding them, that as they wish their own good, they choose no other into the next primum mobile [outermost and uppermost sphere and great source of motion] but of the ablest cudgel and football players? Which done as soon as said, your primum mobile, consisting of no other stuff, must of necessity be drawn forth into your nebulones [rogues] and your galimofrys [the rabble]; and so the silken purses of your senate and prerogative being made of sowes' ears, most of them blacksmiths, they will strike while the iron is hot, and beat your estates into hobnails, mine host of the Bear being strategus [supreme military commander], and king piper lord orator. Well, my Lords, it might have been otherwise exprest, but this is well enough a-conscience. In your way, the wit of man shall not prevent this or the like inconvenience; but if this (for I have conferred with artists) be a mathematical demonstration, I could kneel to you, that ere it be too late we might return to some kind of sobriety.

'If we empty our purses with these pomps, salaries, coaches, lacquays, and pages, what can the people say less than that we have dressed a senate and a prerogative for nothing but to go to the park with the ladies?'

Stinginess of Cromwell's Commonwealth.

'But there is such a selling, such a Jewish humour in our republicans, that I cannot tell what to say to it; onely this, any man that knows what belongs to a commonwealth, or how diligent every nation in that case has been to preserve her ornaments, and shall see the waste lately made (the woods adjoining to this city, which served for the delight and health of it, being cut down to be sold for three pence), will tell you that they who did such things would never have made a commonwealth. The like may be said of the ruine or damage done upon our cathedrals, ornaments in which this nation excels all others. Nor shall this ever be excused upon the score of religion; for though it be true that God dwells not in houses made with hands, yet you cannot hold your assemblies but in such houses, and these are of the best that have been made with hands. Nor is it well argued that they are pompous, and therefore prophane, or less proper for divine service, seeing the Christians in the primitive Church chose to meet with one accord in the Temple, so far were they from any inclination to pull it down.'

There is a Life of Harrington in the edition of his works by John Toland (1700); see also H. F. Russell Smith's Harrington and his Oceana (1914), Aubrey's Letters, and Masson's Milton. Henry Morley reprinted the Oceana in 1887, but omitted the amusing Epistle to the Reader and the amazing list of errata.

Colonel Edward Saxby, who died distracted in the Tower in 1658, lived a life of curious adventure and intrigue, and merited a place in the history of English literature by writing that most audacious of political pamphlets, Killing no Murder. A Suffolk man, he took service in Cromwell's Horse about 1643, held command at the siege of Tantallon Castle in 1651, was sent to negotiate with the Frondeurs and rebellious Huguenots in France, but as an extreme Republican quarrelled finally with Cromwell when he assumed the Protectorate. He zealously intrigued against Cromwell with royalist, Catholic, and Spanish agents; tried to combine levellers and royalists against the usurper, and arranged more than one scheme for Cromwell's assassination by 'strange engines,' the firing of Whitehall and the like; and early in 1657 got his famous exhortation to tyrannicide printed in Holland and smuggled into England. The pamphlet, professing to be by one William Allen, was courteously dedicated to the Protector himself, the ironical argument being that, seeing Cromwell's life had proved such an unmitigated curse to the nation, Cromwell, if he were the public-spirited man he professed to be, was bound to welcome sudden death at the hands of a patriotic assassin as a manifest blessing to all concerned. This very ingenious irony is not long sustained, and an elaborate argument is carried out to prove—with scriptural examples and quotations from Sophocles and Tully, Plato and Aristotle, Grotius and Machiavel—that Cromwell is a tyrant of the worst description, who ought to be summarily annihilated like a wild beast by any one who had the chance. The argument is ingeniously managed; the historic parallels and applications are many of them amusingly plausible. The style is direct, effective, and at times even powerful; and the influence of the work unquestionably may be traced in the work of subsequent English pamphleteers. There is a concise statement of the origin of society in a social contract, sometimes regarded as the original contribution of Rousseau to eighteenth-century political philosophy, but traceable in Locke, Hobbes, and even the Greek sophists.

The Social Contract.

And indeed, as by the laws of God and Nature, the care, defence, and support of the family lies upon every man whose it is, so by the same law there is due unto every man from his family a subjection and obedience in compensation of that support. But several families uniting themselves together to make up one body of a Commonwealth, and being independent one of another, without any natural superiority or obligation, nothing can introduce amongst them a disparity of rule and subjection but some power that is over them, which power none can pretend to have but God and themselves. Wherefore all power which is lawfully exercised over such a society of men (which from the end of its institution we call a Commonwealth) must necessarily be derived, either from the appointment of God Almighty, who is Supreme Lord of all and every part, or from the consent of the society itself, who have the next power to his of disposing of their own liberty as they shall think fit for their own good. This power God hath given to societies of men, as well as he gave it to particular persons; and when He interposes not his own authority, and appoints not himself who shall be his vicegerents and rule under Him, He leaves it to none but the people themselves to make the election, whose benefit is the end of all government. Nay, when He himself hath been pleased to appoint rulers for that people which He was pleased peculiarly to own, He many times made the choice, but left the confirmation and ratification of that choice to the people themselves. So Saul was chosen by God, and anointed king by his prophet, but made king by all the people at Gilgal. David was anointed king by the same prophet, but was afterwards, after Saul's death, confirmed by the people of Judah, and seven years after by the elders of Israel, the people's deputies at Chebron.

The Protector a Tyrant.

This being considered, have not the people of England much reason to ask the Protector this question, 'Quis constituit te virum principem et judicem super nos?' Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? If God made thee, make it manifest to us. If the people, where did we meet to do it? Who took our subscriptions? To whom deputed we our authority? And when and where did those deputies make the choice? Sure these interrogations are very natural, and I believe would much trouble his Highness's Council and his Junto to answer. In a word, that I may not tire my reader, who will not want proofs for what I say if he wants not memory: if to change the Government without the people's consent; if to dissolve their representatives by force, and disannul their acts; if to give the name of the people's representatives to confederates of his own, that he may establish iniquity by a law; if to take away men's lives out of all course of law by certain murderers of his own appointment, whom he names a High Court of Justice; if to decimate men's estates, and by his own power to impose upon the people what taxes he pleases, and to maintain all by force of arms; if, I say, all this does make a tyrant, his own impudence cannot deny but he is as complete a one as ever hath been since there have been societies of men. He that hath done and does all this is the person for whose preservation the people of England must pray; but certainly if they do, it is for the same reason that the old woman of Syracuse prayed for the long life of the tyrant Dionysius, lest the devil should come next. . . . Tyrants accomplish their ends much more by fraud than force. . . . It is but unnecessary to say that had not his Highness had a faculty to be fluent in his tears, and eloquent in his execrations; had he not had spongy eyes, and a supple conscience; and besides to do with a people of great faith but little wit, his courage and the rest of his moral virtues, with the help of his janissaries, had never been able so far to advance him out of the reach of justice that we should have need to call for any other hand to remove him but that of the hangman. . . . Lastly, above all things they pretend a love to God and religion. This Aristotle calls 'artium tyrannicarum potissimam,' the surest and best of all the arts of tyrants; and we all know his Highness hath found it so by experience. He hath found, indeed, that in godliness there is great gain, and that preaching and praying well managed will obtain other kingdoms as well as that of heaven. His indeed have been pious arms, for he hath conquered most by those of the Church, by prayers and tears. But the truth is, were it not for our honour to be governed by one that can manage both the spiritual and temporal sword, and, Roman-like, to have our emperor our high-priest, we might have had preaching at a much cheaper rate, and it would have cost us but our tithes which now costs us all. . . . And then if he be not a tyrant, we must confess we have no definition nor description of a tyrant left us, and may well imagine there is no such thing in Nature, and that it is only a notion and a name. But if there be such a beast, and we do at all believe what we see and feel, let us now inquire, according to the method we proposed, whether this be a beast of game that we are to give law to, or a beast of prey to destroy with all means which are allowable and fair?

John Pearson (1613–86), born at Great Snoring, Norfolk, son of the Archdeacon of Suffolk, was educated at Eton and at Queen's and King's Colleges, Cambridge. In 1640, appointed chaplain to the Lord-Keeper Finch, he was presented to the Suffolk rectory of Thorington; in 1659 he published his learned Exposition of the Creed, and edited the Golden Remains of Hales of Eton. In 1660 he became rector of St Christopher's in London, a prebendary of Ely, Archdeacon of Surrey, and Master of Jesus College, Cambridge. In 1661 he was Baxter's principal antagonist at the Savoy Conference, and was appointed to the Lady Margaret chair of Divinity at Cambridge; in 1662 he became Master of Trinity, and in 1673 Bishop of Chester. He defended the genuineness of the Ignatian epistles (1672), and in 1684 published his Annales Cypriani. His Exposition of the Creed is a standard work in English divinity, remarkable equally for argument, arrangement, and style. Bentley said Pearson's 'very dross was gold'—an extravagant compliment; but most subsequent authorities have borne testimony to the merits of the Exposition. Admirable editions of it are by E. Burton (1833) and Temple Chevallier (1849; revised by Sinkler, 1882); of the Minor Theological Works, with Life, by Archdeacon Churton (1844).

The Resurrection.

Furthermore, besides the principles of which he [man] consists, and the actions which flow from us, the consideration of the things without us, and the natural course of variations in the creature, will render the resurrection yet more highly probable. Every space of twenty-four hours teacheth thus much, in which there is always a revolution amounting to a resurrection. The day dies into a night, and is buried in silence and in darkness; in the next morning it appeareth again and reviveth, opening the grave of darkness, rising from the dead of night: this is a diurnal resurrection. As the day dies into night, so doth the summer into winter: the sap is said to descend into the root, and there it lies buried in the ground; the earth is covered with snow, or crusted with frost, and becomes a general sepulchre; when the spring appeareth, all begin to rise; the plants and flowers peep out of their graves, revive and grow, and flourish: this is the annual resurrection. The corn by which we live, and for want of which we perish with famine, is notwithstanding cast upon the earth and buried in the ground, with a design that it may corrupt and, being corrupted, may revive and multiply: our bodies are fed by this constant experiment, and we continue this present life by succession of resurrections. Thus all things are repaired by corrupting, are preserved by perishing, and revived by dying; and can we think that man, the lord of all these things, which thus die and revive for him, should be detained in death as never to live again? Is it imaginable that God should thus restore all things to man, and not restore man to himself? If there were no other consideration but of the principles of human nature, of the liberty and remunerability of human actions, and of the natural revolutions and resurrections of other creatures, it were abundantly sufficient to render the resurrection of our bodies highly probable. We must not rest in this school of nature, nor settle our persuasions upon likelihoods; but as we passed from an apparent possibility into a high presumption and probability, so must we pass from thence unto a full assurance of an infallible certainty. And of this indeed we cannot be assured but by the revelation of the will of God; upon his power we must conclude that we may, from his will that we shall, rise from the dead. Now the power of God is known unto all men, and therefore all men may infer from thence a possibility; but the will of God is not revealed unto all men, and therefore all have not an infallible certainty of the resurrection.

James Nayler (? 1617–60), not altogether unreasonably nicknamed the 'Quaker Messiah,' ranks amongst the foremost Quaker writers for depth of thought, spiritual power, and unstudied eloquence. He was the son of a Yorkshire yeoman, settled in Wakefield, joined the Parliamentary army, and became a preacher. In 1651 he became a Quaker, and was the most conspicuous of Fox's early coadjutors—insomuch that Baxter regarded him as the chief leader of the movement in these years, when recruits were swarming in from amongst ranters and visionaries of all kinds. His head was turned by the enthusiastic devotion to him of 'a few forward, conceited, imaginary women,' as his friends called them, whom he allowed to kiss his feet, to call him 'the lamb of God,' and cry before him as he rode into Bristol, 'Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Israel.' He did not assume such titles to himself, and when arrested in 1656 affirmed that these honours were paid to 'Christ within him.' He was found guilty of horrid blasphemy by a committee of the House of Commons, just escaped sentence of death, was pilloried, whipped, had his tongue pierced with a hot iron, his forehead branded with a great B, and in this miserable case was thrown into prison, where he remained, spite of contrition and petitions to Cromwell, till after the Protector's death. He was released in 1659, made public confession, and with Fox's sanction resumed preaching and lecturing. He died in Huntingdonshire in 1660, on a journey afoot from London to his native county.

He wrote a large number of short works, devotional and controversial; a 'collection' of his non-controversial 'books, epistles, and papers,' published in 1716, fills a volume of nearly eight hundred pages. Others than Quakers have admitted that some of them display true spiritual genius. Nayler's 'Last Testimony, said to be delivered by him about two Hours before his Departure out of this Life,' was versified by Bernard Barton, but the paraphrase added nothing to the fervour, tenderness, and dignity of the original:

There is a Spirit which I feel, that delights to do no Evil nor to revenge any Wrong, but delights to endure all things in hope to enjoy its own in the End: Its hope is to outlive all Wrath and Contention, and to weary out all Exaltation and Cruelty, or whatever is of a Nature contrary to it self. It sees to the End of all Temptations: As it bears no Evil in it self, so it conceives none in Thoughts to any other: If it be betrayed it bears it; for its Ground and Spring is the Mercies and Forgiveness of God. Its Crown is Meekness, its Life is Everlasting Love unfeigned, and takes its Kingdom with Intreaty and not with Contention, and keeps it by Lowliness of Mind. In God alone it can rejoice, though none else regard it or can own its Life. It's conceived in Sorrow, and brought forth without any to pity it; nor doth it murmur at Grief and Oppression. It never rejoiceth but through Sufferings; for with the World's Joy it is murdered. I found it alone, being forsaken; I have Fellowship therein, with them who lived in Dens and desolate Places in the Earth, who through Death obtained this Resurrection and Eternal Holy Life.

Edmund Waller,

a courtly poet whose works have much of the smoothness and polish of modern verse, was born in 1606 at Coleshill, near Amersham (in Bucks since 1832, but then in Hertfordshire), and in his infancy was left heir to an estate of £3500 per annum. He was cousin to the patriot Hampden, and his uncle's wife was aunt to Oliver Cromwell, but his own family were hearty royalists. The poet, educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, was apparently Roundhead or royalist as best suited the occasion. He entered Parliament at sixteen. At twenty-five he married a rich heiress of London, who died soon after, and he immediately became a suitor of Lady Dorothea Sidney, eldest daughter of the Earl of Leicester. To this proud and peerless fair one Waller dedicated the best part of his poetry, and the groves of Penshurst echoed to the praises of his Sacharissa. But Lady Dorothea was inexorable, and bestowed her hand on the Earl of Sunderland. Meeting Waller long afterwards, Sacharissa asked him when he would again write such verses upon her. 'When you are as young, madam, and as handsome as you were then,' the ungallant poet replied, giving us therein a key to his witty, shallow, selfish character. As a member of Parliament he was distinguished as a speaker on the popular side, and was chosen to conduct the prosecution against Judge Crawley for his opinion in favour of levying shipmoney (1641). His speech for the impeachment was printed, and 20,000 copies of it sold in one day. But he seems to have really been royalist in heart. He was one of the commissioners sent to the king at Oxford in 1643; and having joined in a plot to surprise the city militia and let in the king's forces, was arrested, expelled the House, and tried. He behaved in an abject manner, confessed freely to the injury of his associates, and had a sentence of death commuted to a fine of £10,000 and banishment. He lived in France and Switzerland, travelled with Evelyn, and was popular amongst the royalist exiles for his hospitality as well as for his wit. He was allowed to return in 1652, and wrote a panegyric on Cromwell, which seems one of his sincerest as it is certainly one of his best poems. After Cromwell's death, however, he wrote verses On the death of the late Usurper O. C. The Commonwealth fell to pieces under Richard Cromwell, and Waller was ready with a congratulatory address to Charles II. The royal offering was considered inferior to the panegyric on Cromwell, and when the king himself—who admitted the poet to terms of courtly intimacy—commented on this inferiority, 'Poets, sire,' replied the witty, self-possessed poet, 'succeed better in fiction than in truth.' In the first Parliament summoned by Charles, Waller sat for Hastings, and he served in all the Parliaments of that reign, and Bishop Burnet admits he was the delight of the House of Commons; and in spite of his water-drinking, he was a great favourite at court. But Clarendon frustrated his scheme to be made Provost of Eton though a layman; and if Waller sought to revenge himself after that Minister's fall in 1667, the fallen Minister had his final revenge in the portrait he has left of Waller's cowardice and meanness. At the accession of James II. in 1685, the aged poet, then well-nigh eighty, was elected representative for a borough in Cornwall. The issue of James's mad career in seeking to subvert Church and constitution was foreseen by this wary and sagacious observer: 'He will be left,' said he, 'like a whale upon the strand.' The editors of Chandler's Debates and the Parliamentary History ascribe to Waller a remarkable speech against standing armies, delivered in the House of Commons in 1685; but according to Lord Macaulay, this speech was really made by Windham, member for Salisbury. 'It was with some concern,' adds the historian, 'that I found myself forced to give up the belief that the last words uttered in public by Waller were so honourable to him.' Waller purchased a small property at Coleshill, with the feeling that 'he would be glad to die like the stag, where he was roused.' The wish was not fulfilled; he died at Hall Barn, Beaconsfield, his home for fifty-six years, on 21st October 1687; and near the church (in which rest the ashes of Edmund Burke) a monument was erected to his memory.

Waller's poems comprise an early epic on the Summer's Islands, or Bermudas, and a serious poem on Divine Love, written in his later years ; but most of his things are short and occasional, about a half of the whole being the elegant but artificial love-verses to Sacharissa. His verses were widely circulated, but not published till 1645—again in 1664. His feeble character is reflected in his poetry, which is easy, flowing, polished, and felicitous, but lacking in sincerity, passion, or strength. With various modifications of his own, he revived the heroic couplet, and handled it dexterously in the form it retained for over a hundred years. In his own time he was ranked next to or the equal of his younger contemporary Cowley, and at his death was accounted the greatest of English poets. In 1729 Fenton called him 'maker and model of melodious verse.' 'Dryden said that the excellence and dignity of rhyme were never fully known till Mr Waller taught it : he first made writing easily an art, first showed us to conclude the sense most commonly in distichs.' His predecessors in writing heroic rhyming verse frequently made the sense outrun the couplet : Waller (though it has been proved that Sandys and others before him used the distich in the same way) established the more regular French fashion, and was by-and-by followed by Denham, and then by Dryden and by Pope. Of Waller it may be said that he was herald of the classical school in forsaking the Elizabethan conceits for reiterated antithesis, in which Dryden and Pope were again followers of Waller. Pope praised Waller's sweetness ; Gray and Johnson were hostile critics ; and since Cowper's time Waller has perhaps been unduly belittled, even by writers who are wont to praise style in manner more than strength or vehemence in thought. His love-ditties are frigid, no doubt ; but many of his shorter poems show a real, if slender, gift of true song.

His method of using rhyming couplets is well shown in one of his very first poems, written about 1623, on the difficulty Charles I. (then prince) had, on his return from Spain in that year, in getting on board the English fleet awaiting him at Santander. A gale of wind, with a thunderstorm and heavy rain, made the passage in a barge difficult and even dangerous.

Of the Danger His Majesty escaped in the Roads at St Andrews.

These mighty peers placed in the gilded barge,
Proud with the burden of so brave a charge,
With painted oars the youths begin to sweep
Neptune's smooth face and cleave the yielding deep ;
Which soon becomes the seat of sudden war
Between the wind and tide that fiercely jar.
As when a sort of lusty shepherds try
Their force at football, care of victory
Makes them salute so briskly, breast to breast,
That their encounters seem too rough for jest ;
They ply their feet, and still the restless ball,
Tossed to and fro, is urged by them all :
So fares the doubtful barge 'twixt tide and winds,
And like effect of their contention finds.

On Love.

Anger, in hasty words or blows,
Itself discharges on our foes ;
And sorrow, too, finds some relief
In tears, which wait upon our grief :
So every passion, but fond love,
Unto its own redress does move ;
But that alone the wretch inclines
To what prevents his own designs ;
Makes him lament, and sigh, and weep,
Disordered, tremble, fawn, and creep ;
Postures which render him despised,
Where he endeavours to be prized.
For women (born to be controlled)
Stoop to the forward and the bold ;

EDMUND WALLER.

From the Portrait by John Riley in the National Portrait Gallery.

Affect the haughty and the proud,
The gay, the frolic, and the loud.
Who first the generous steed oppressed,
Not kneeling did salute the beast ;
But with high courage, life, and force,
Approaching, tamed the unruly horse.
Unwisely we the wiser East
Pity, supposing them oppressed
With tyrants' force, whose law is will,
By which they govern, spoil, and kill ;
Each nymph, but moderately fair,
Commands with no less rigour here.
Should some brave Turk, that walks among
His twenty lasses, bright and young,
And beckons to the willing dame,
Preferred to quench his present flame,
Behold as many gallants here,
With modest guise and silent fear,
All to one female idol bend,
While her high pride does scarce descend
To mark their follies, he would swear
That these her guard of eunuchs were.

And that a more majestic queen,
Or humbler slaves, he had not seen.

All this with indignation spoke,
In vain I struggled with the yoke
Of mighty Love : that conquering look,
When next beheld, like lightning strook
My blasted soul, and made me bow
Lower than those I pitied now.

So the tall stag, upon the brink
Of some smooth stream about to drink,
Surveying there his armed head,
With shame remembers that he fled
The scorned dogs, resolves to try
The combat next ; but if their cry
Invades again his trembling ear,
He straight resumes his wonted care ;
Leaves the untasted spring behind,
And, winged with fear, outflies the wind.

On a Girdle.

That which her slender waist confined
Shall now my joyful temples bind :
No monarch but would give his crown
His arms might do what this hath done.

It was my heaven's extremest sphere,
The pale which held that lovely deer ;
My joy, my grief, my hope, my love,
Did all within this circle move !

A narrow compass ! and yet there
Dwelt all that's good, and all that's fair :
Give me but what this ribband bound,
Take all the rest the sun goes round.

On the Marriage of the Dwarfs.

Design or chance makes others wive,
But Nature did this match contrive :
Eve might as well have Adam fled,
As she denied her little bed
To him, for whom Heaven seemed to frame
And measure out this only dame.

Thrice happy is that humble pair,
Beneath the level of all care !
Over whose heads those arrows fly
Of sad distrust and jealousy ;
Secured in as high extreme,
As if the world held none but them.

To him the fairest nymphs do shew
Like moving mountains topped with snow ;
And every man a Polypheme
Does to his Galatea seem.

Ah, Chloris, that kind Nature thus
From all the world had severed us ;
Creating for ourselves us two,
As love has me for only you !

From 'A Panegyric to my Lord Protector.'

While with a strong and yet a gentle hand,
You bridle faction, and our hearts command,
Protect us from ourselves, and from the foe,
Make us unite, and make us conquer too ;

Let partial spirits still aloud complain,
Think themselves injured that they cannot reign,
And own no liberty, but where they may
Without control upon their fellows prey.

Above the waves, as Neptune shewed his face,
To chide the winds, and save the Trojan race,
So has your Highness, raised above the rest,
Storms of ambition tossing us repressed.

Your drooping country, torn with civil hate,
Restored by you, is made a glorious state ;
The seat of empire, where the Irish come,
And the unwilling Scots, to fetch their doom.

The sea's our own ; and now all nations greet
With bending sails, each vessel of our fleet ;
Your power extends as far as winds can blow,
Or swelling sails upon the globe may go.

Heaven, that hath placed this island to give law,
To balance Europe, and its states to awe,
In this conjunction doth on Britain smile,
The greatest leader, and the greatest isle !

Whether this portion of the world were rent
By the rude ocean from the continent,
Or thus created, it was sure designed
To be the sacred refuge of mankind.

Hither the oppressed shall henceforth resort,
Justice to crave, and succour at your court ;
And then your Highness, not for ours alone,
But for the world's Protector shall be known.

Still as you rise, the state exalted too,
Finds no distemper while 'tis changed by you ;
Changed like the world's great scene ! when, without noise,
The rising sun night's vulgar lights destroys.

Had you, some ages past, this race of glory
Run, with amazement we should read your story ;
But living virtue, all achievements past,
Meets envy still to grapple with at last.

This Cæsar found ; and that ungrateful age,
With losing him, went back to blood and rage ;
Mistaken Brutus thought to break their yoke,
But cut the bond of union with that stroke.

That sun once set, a thousand meaner stars
Gave a dim light to violence and wars ;
To such a tempest as now threatens all,
Did not your mighty arm prevent the fall.

If Rome's great senate could not wield that sword,
Which of the conquered world had made them lord,
What hope had ours, while yet their power was new,
To rule victorious armies, but by you ?

You, that had taught them to subdue their foes,
Could order teach, and their high spirits compose ;
To every duty could their minds engage,
Provoke their courage, and command their rage.

So when a lion shakes his dreadful mane,
And angry grows, if he that first took pain
To tame his youth approach the haughty beast,
He bends to him, but frights away the rest.

As the vexed world, to find repose, at last
Itself into Augustus' arms did cast ;
So England now does, with like toil oppress,
Her weary head upon your bosom rest.

Then let the Muses, with such notes as these,
Instruct us what belongs unto our peace.
Your battles they hereafter shall indite,
And draw the image of our Mars in fight.

Tell of towns stormed, and armies overrun,
And mighty kingdoms by your conduct won :
How, while you thundered, clouds of dust did choke
Contending troops, and seas lay hid in smoke.

Illustrious acts high raptures do infuse,
And every conqueror creates a Muse !
Here, in low strains, your milder deeds we sing,
But there, my lord, we'll bays and olives bring

To crown your head ; while you in triumph ride
O'er conquered nations, and the sea beside :
While all your neighbour Princes unto you,
Like Joseph's sheaves, pay reverence and due.

From 'On a War with Spain.'

When Britain, looking with a just disdain
Upon this gilded majesty of Spain,
And knowing well that empire must decline
Whose chief support and sinews are of coin,
Our nation's solid virtue did oppose
To the rich troublers of the world's repose.

And now some months, encamping on the main,
Our naval army had besieged Spain :
They that the whole world's monarchy designed,
Are to their ports by our bold fleet confined,
From whence our Red Cross they triumphant see,
Riding without a rival on the sea.

Others may use the ocean as their road,
Only the English make it their abode,
Whose ready sails with every wind can fly,
And make a covenant with the inconstant sky :
Our oaks secure, as if they there took root,
We tread on billows with a steady foot.

At Penshurst.

While in this park I sing, the listening deer
Attend my passion, and forget to fear ;
When to the beeches I report my flame,
They bow their heads, as if they felt the same.
To gods appealing, when I reach their bowers
With loud complaints, they answer me in showers.
To thee a wild and cruel soul is given,
More deaf than trees, and prouder than the heaven !
Love's foe professed ! why dost thou falsely feign
Thyself a Sidney ? from which noble strain
He sprung, that could so far exalt the name
Of Love, and warm our nation with his flame,
That all we can of love or high desire,
Seems but the smoke of amorous Sidney's fire.
Nor call her mother who so well does prove
One breast may hold both chastity and love.
Never can she, that so exceeds the spring
In joy and bounty, be supposed to bring
One so destructive. To no human stock
We owe this fierce unkindness, but the rock ;
That cloven rock produced thee, by whose side
Nature, to recompense the fatal pride
Of such stern beauty, placed those healing springs
Which not more help, than that destruction, brings.
Thy heart no ruder than the rugged stone,
I might, like Orpheus, with my numerous moan

Melt to compassion ; now my traitorous song
With thee conspires to do the singer wrong ;
While thus I suffer not myself to lose
The memory of what augments my woes ;
But with my own breath still foment the fire,
Which flames as high as fancy can aspire !

This last complaint the indulgent ears did pierce
Of just Apollo, president of verse ;
Highly concerned that the Muse should bring
Damage to one whom he had taught to sing :
Thus he advised me : ' On yon aged tree
Hang up thy lute, and hie thee to the sea,
That there with wonders thy diverted mind
Some truce, at least, may with this passion find.'
Ah, cruel nymph ! from whom her humble swain
Flies for relief unto the raging main,
And from the winds and tempests does expect
A milder fate than from her cold neglect !
Yet there he'll pray that the unkind may prove Blest in her choice ; and vows this endless love
Springs from no hope of what she can confer,
But from those gifts which Heaven has heaped on her.

The Bud.

Lately on yonder swelling bush,
Big with many a coming rose,
This early bud began to blush,
And did but half itself disclose ;
I plucked it though no better grown,
And now you see how full 'tis blown.

Still, as I did the leaves inspire,
With such a purple light they shone,
As if they had been made of fire,
And spreading so would flame anon.
All that was meant by air or sun,
To the young flower my breath has done.

If our loose breath so much can do,
What may the same in forms of love,
Of purest love and music too,
When Flavia it aspires to move ?
When that which lifeless buds persuades
To wax more soft, her youth invades ?

Song—Go, Lovely Rose.

Go, lovely Rose !
Tell her that wastes her time and me,
That now she knows,
When I resemble her to thee,
How sweet and fair she seems to be.

Tell her, that's young,
And shuns to have her graces spied,
That, hadst thou sprung
In deserts, where no men abide,
Thou must have uncommended died.

Small is the worth
Of beauty from the light retired ;
Bid her come forth,
Suffer herself to be desired,
And not blush so to be admired.

Then die ! that she
The common fate of all things rare
May read in thee,
How small a part of time they share
That are so wondrous sweet and fair !

From 'The Last Verses in the Book.'

The seas are quiet when the winds give o'er ;
 So calm are we when passions are no more :
 For then we know how vain it was to boast
 Of fleeting things, so certain to be lost.
 Clouds of affection from our younger eyes
 Conceal that emptiness which age describes.

The soul's dark cottage, battered and decayed,
 Lets in new light through chinks that time has made :
 Stronger by weakness wiser men become,
 As they draw near to their eternal home.
 Leaving the old, both worlds at once they view,
 That stand upon the threshold of the new.

Editions of Waller are those of Fenton (1729), and G. Thorn Drury in 'The Muses Library' (1893; which gives the 1686 text of the poems). Gosse in his Cambridge lectures, From Shakespeare to Pope (1885), has been thought to attach too much importance to the influence of Waller. See also Julia Cartwright's Sacharissa (1892), and H. C. Beeching's essay on 'Waller's Distich' in An English Miscellany (1901).

Sir William D'Avenant, poet and playwright, was born in February 1606, and was the son of a vintner at Oxford. A scandalous story was told by Pope to Oldys, and to Pope by Betterton the player—that he was the natural son of Shakespeare, who was in the habit of putting up at the Crown Tavern on his journeys between London and Stratford. This tradition was evidently encouraged by D'Avenant himself, who was ostentatious in admiring Shakespeare above all other poets, and 'one of the first essays of whose muse' in boyhood was an Ode to Shakespeare. D'Avenant's career led him through some strange vicissitudes. He was entered at Lincoln College, but left without taking a degree; he then became page to the Duchess of Richmond, and afterwards was in the service of the poet Lord Brooke. About 1628 he began to write for the stage; and in 1638, the year after the death of Ben Jonson, he was appointed Laureate. About the same time he lost his nose through an illness—a calamity which exposed him to the merriment of Suckling, Denham, and other wits. He became in 1639 manager of Drury Lane, but entering into the intrigues of the Civil War, fell under the suspicion of Parliament and fled to France. When the queen sent over to the Earl of Newcastle a quantity of military stores, D'Avenant resolved to return to England, and he distinguished himself so much in the cause of the royalists that he was knighted by Charles I. at the siege of Gloucester (September 1643). On the decline of the king's affairs he returned to France, and wrote part of his Gondibert. His next move was to sail for Virginia, sent by the queen in charge of new colonists; but the vessel was captured by one of the Parliamentary ships-of-war, and D'Avenant was lodged in prison at Cowes Castle in the Isle of Wight. In 1650 he was removed to the Tower, in order to be tried by the High Commission Court—a danger from which he was released after two years' imprisonment. Milton is said to have interposed on his behalf; and as D'Avenant is reported to have interfered in favour of Milton when the royalists were again in the ascendant after the Restoration, one would gladly believe in this graceful reciprocity. When the author of Gondibert obtained his enlargement, he set about establishing a theatre, and, to the surprise of all, succeeded in the attempt (1658), having two years earlier produced in a private house what was practically the first opera in England. By these semi-public performances in a private house, D'Avenant may be said to have revived the stage in England under the Commonwealth, and with the sanction of the authorities. But his earliest dramatic piece, Albovine, King of Lombardy, was written in 1629, and deals with some of the same personages as the poem Gondibert. It is the first of a long series of five-and-twenty plays, some in prose, some in blank verse; while the opera The Siege of Rhodes and some of the masques are in rhyme. Not a few of the plays are fairly readable; they are usually more decorous than those of his contemporaries, but in some the humour is even coarser than the diction, and the author rollicks in tales of lust and horror. The Platonick Lovers is not so coarse as might have been expected in a comedy satirising

Lovers of a pure
 Celestial kind such as some style Platonical

(as one of the characters says in words Byron might have written); though it sufficiently appears that as to Plato, in the author's opinion,

They father on him a fantastic love
 He never knew, poor gentleman.

After the Restoration he again basked in royal favour, and engaged the services of some highly accomplished actors. Killigrew and he had licenses for theatres in 1661, and were both formally empowered to employ women actors for women's parts—heretofore a sporadic occurrence. But Southey, not without some reason, says: 'His last work was his worst: it was an alteration of the Tempest, executed in conjunction with Dryden; and marvellous indeed is it that two men of such great and indubitable genius should have combined to debase and vulgarise and pollute such a poem as the Tempest.' D'Avenant, who continued to write and superintend the performance of plays till his death, 7th April 1668, was buried in Westminster Abbey.

The epic poem of Gondibert (1651), which was regarded by D'Avenant's friends and admirers—Cowley and Waller being of the number—as a great and durable monument of genius, has retained a certain interest which the author's dramas have entirely lost. The scene is laid in Lombardy; but names like Oswald and Hurgonill, Astragon and Paradine, show that no attempt is made to ensure local colour or historic vraisemblance. The critics were from the very first strangely at variance as to its merits, doubtless because the poem, though not without a certain solidity of composition, and though it has really fine passages here and there, is on the whole obscure and dull, and in its longer parts indeed almost unreadable. The prodigious length of the thing (6000 lines) repels; and its long four-lined stanza with alternate rhymes, borrowed from Sir John Davies and copied by Dryden in his Annus Mirabilis, requires a lighter hand than D'Avenant's. The poet prefixed a long and elaborate prose preface to his poem, which may be considered the precursor of Dryden's admirable critical introductions to his plays. It is addressed 'to his much honour'd friend Mr Hobs,' and drew from the Malmesbury philosopher a disquisition on æsthetics by way of reply, also prefixed to the poem. D'Avenant's worship of Shakespeare continued unabated to the last; but in later years he modelled himself upon the French tragedians. Dryden in his preface to his and D'Avenant's version of the Tempest declares that he did not set any value on what he had written in that play, but cherished it out of gratitude to the memory of Sir William D'Avenant, who, he adds, 'did me the honour to join me with him in the alteration of it. It was originally Shakespeare's—a poet for whom he had particularly a high veneration, and whom he first taught me to admire.' So was veneration for Shakespeare understood in the brave days of Glorious John, of Shadwell, and of Nahum Tate! Most of the miscellaneous work of D'Avenant, once prized so highly, is now not merely unread but contemned; and he is by some modern critics unfeelingly ranked amongst the poetasters.

To the Queen,

Entertained at night by the Countess of Anglesey.

Faire as unshaded light, or as the day
In its first birth, when all the year was May;
Sweet as the altars smook, or as the new Unfolded bud, swel'd by the early dew;
Smooth as the face of waters first appear'd,
Ere tides began to strive, or winds were heard;
Kind as the willing saints, and calmer farre
Than in their sleeps forgiven hermits are.
You that are more than our discreeter feare
Dares praise, with such full art, what make you here?
Here, where the summer is so little seen,
That leaves, (her cheapest wealth,) scarce reach at green;
You come, as if the silver planet were
Misled a while from her much injur'd sphere;
And, t' ease the travels of her beames to-night,
In this small lanthorn would contract her light.

Song.

The lark now leaves his watry nest,
And climbing shakes his dewy wings:
He takes this window for the east,
And to implore your light he sings:
Awake, awake, the morn will never rise,
Till she can dress her beauty at your eies!

The merchant bowes unto the seamans star,
The ploughman from the sun his season takes;
But still the lover wonders what they are
Who look for day before his mistress wakes:

Awake, awake, break through your vailles of lawne!
Then draw your curtains and begin the dawne.

The Virgin BIRTHA—from 'Gondibert.'

To Astragon, Heav'n for succession gave
One only pledge, and BIRTHA was her name;
Whose mother slept where flowers grew on her grave,
And she succeeded her in face and fame.

Her beauty princes durst not hope to use,
Unless, like poets, for their morning theam;
And her mindes beauty they would rather chuse,
Which did the light in beautie's lanthorn seem.

SIR WILLIAM D'AVENANT.

From an Engraving by Faithorne after a Portrait by Greenhill in the British Museum.

She ne'r saw courts, yet courts could have undone
With untaught looks, and an unpractis'd heart;
Her nets the most prepar'd could never shun,
For Nature spread them in the scorn of Art.

She never had in busie cities bin,
Ne'r warm'd with hopes, nor e'er allay'd with fears;
Not seeing punishment could guess no sin;
And sin not seeing, ne'r had use of tears.

But here her father's precepts gave her skill,
Which with incessant business fill'd the houres;
In spring she gathered blossoms for the still;
In autumn, berries; and in summer, flowers.

And as kinde Nature, with calm diligence,
Her own free vertue silently employs,
Whilst she unheard does rip'ning growth dispence,
So were her vertues busie without noise.

Whilst her great mistris, Nature, thus she tends,
The busie household waites no less on her;
By secret law, each to her beauty bends,
Though all her lowly minde to that prefer.

Gracious and free she breaks upon them all
 With morning looks ; and they, when she does rise,
 Devoutly at her dawn in homage fall,
 And droop like flowers when evening shuts her eyes.

Beneath a mirtle covert she does spend
 In maids weak wishes her whole stock of thought ;
 Fond maids ! who love with mindes fine stuff would mend,
 Which Nature purposely of bodys wrought.

She fashions him she lov'd of angels' kinde ;
 Such as in holy story were employ'd
 To the first fathers from th' Eternal Minde,
 And in short vision only are enjoy'd.

As eagles then when nearest heav'n they fly,
 Of wild impossibles soon weary grow ;
 Feeling their bodies finde no rest so high,
 And therefore perch on earthly things below ;

So now she yields ; him she an angel deem'd
 Shall be a man, the name which virgins fear ;
 Yet the most harmless to a maid he seemed,
 That ever yet that fatal name did bear.

Soon her opinion of his hurtless heart
 Affection turns to faith ; and then love's fire
 To heaven, though bashfully, she does impart,
 And to her mother in the heav'nly quire.

If I do love (said she), that love, O Heav'n !
 Your own disciple, Nature, bred in me ;
 Why should I hide the passion you have given,
 Or blush to shew effects which you decree ?

And you, my alter'd mother, grown above
 Great Nature, which you read and reverenc'd here,
 Chide not such kindness as you once called love,
 When you as mortal as my father were.

This said, her soul into her breast retires !
 With love's vain diligence of heart she dreams
 Herself into possession of desires,
 And trusts unanchor'd hope in fleeting streams.

In 'A Journey into Worcestershire' in wet weather, on horseback, and along with Endymion
 Porter and others, he thus refers to London annoyances, including inconsiderate tailors' bills :

And I whom some odd hum'rous planets bid
 To register the doughty acts they did,
 Took horse ; leaving i' th' town ill plays, sowre wines,
 Fierce serjeants, and the plague, besides of mine
 An Ethnick taylor too, that was far worse
 Than these or what just Heaven did ever curse.

D'Avenant's poem on Madagascar is probably as little explored as the most inaccessible part of the island-home of aye-ayes and traveller's trees. It provides neither amusement nor instruction, being a sort of vision, addressed to Prince Rupert, foreshadowing his fitness to be made governor of an English colony in Madagascar—a project seriously recommended to King Charles I. in 1636.

The last verse of a nautical poem on Winter Storms (of which the first verses begin 'Blow, blow,' and 'Port, port') is as follows :

Aloof, aloof ! Hey, how those carracks and ships
 Fall foul and are tumbled and driven like chips !
 Our boatsen, alas, a silly weak grisle,
 For fear to catch cold
 Lies down in the hould :
 We all hear his sighs, but few hear his whistle.

D'Avenant's Dramatic Works have been edited by Maidment and Logan (5 vols. 1872-75). The old standard edition of the Works is the folio of 1673. Aubrey is the main authority for the Life.

Sir John Suckling (1609-42) possessed such a natural liveliness of fancy and exuberance of animal spirits that he often broke through the artificial restraints imposed by the literary taste of his times, but he never rose into the poetry of strong passion. He is a delightful writer of what have been called 'occasional poems.' His polished wit, playful fancy, and knowledge of life and society enabled him to give interest to trifles and to clothe familiar thoughts in the garb of poetry.
 His own life seems to have been one summer day ; like the voyager on Gray's gilded vessel—

Youth at the prow, and Pleasure at the helm—

he dreamed of enjoyment, not of fame. His father,
 Sir John Suckling (1569-1627), was Secretary of State and comptroller of the household to James
 I. and Charles I. The year before his death the son, who was born at Whitton, in Twickenham parish, had passed from Trinity College, Cambridge, to Gray's Inn ; emancipated from all restraint, and with an immense fortune, he set off in 1628 on his travels to France and Italy. Knighted in 1630, he next year joined an auxiliary army of 6000 raised in England, and commanded by the Marquis of Hamilton, to act under Gustavus Adolphus in Germany. He served in several sieges and battles, and on his return in 1632 became celebrated for his wit, gallantry, and munificence at the court of Charles I. He was also considered the best bowler and card-player in England (cribbage was his invention) ; and his sisters, it is said, distressed and alarmed at his passion for gambling, 'came one day to the Peccadillo bowling-green, crying for the fear he should lose all their portions.' Fortune, however, would not seem to have yet deserted the poet,
 for when, in 1639, Charles I. took up arms against the Scots, Suckling presented the king with a hundred horsemen, richly equipped and maintained at his own expense, at a cost, it is said, of £12,000. This gaudy regiment formed part of the cavalry commanded by Lord Holland ; but no sooner had they come within sight of the Scots encampment on Duns Law than they turned and fled. Suckling was no worse than the rest, but he was made the subject of numerous lampoons and satires. A rival wit and poet, Sir John Mennes (1599-1671), who was successively a military and naval commander, and author of several pieces in the Musarum Deliciæ (1656), indited a ballad on the retreat, which is worth reprinting here as a lively political ditty of the period :

Sir John he got him an ambling nag,
To Scotland for to ride-a,
With a hundred horse more, all his own, he swore,
To guard him on every side-a.

No errant-knight ever went to fight
With half so gay a bravado,
Had you seen but his look, you 'd have sworn on a book
He 'd have conquered a whole armado.

The ladies ran all to the windows to see
So gallant and warlike a sight-a,
And as he passed by, they began to cry:
'Sir John, why will you go fight-a?'

But he, like a cruel knight, spurred on;
His heart would not relent-a,
For, till he came there, what had he to fear?
Or why should he repent-a?

The king (God bless him!) had singular hopes
Of him and all his troop-a;
The Borderers they, as they met him on the way,
For joy did hollo and whoop-a.

None liked him so well as his own colonell,
Who took him for John de Weart-a;
But when there were shows of gunning and blows,
My gallant was nothing so pert-a.

For when the Scots army came within sight,
And all prepared to fight-a,
He ran to his tent; they asked what he meant;
He swore he could not go right-a.

The colonell sent for him back agen,
To quarter him in the van-a,
But Sir John did swear he would not come there,
To be killed the very first man-a. . . .

But now there is peace, he's returned to increase
His money, which lately he spent-a;
But his honour lost must lie still in the dust;
At Berwick away it went-a.

Suckling continued steadfast to the royal cause, even when it seemed desperate. He joined in a scheme to promote the escape of Strafford from the Tower; but the plot being detected, he fled in May 1641 to France, and died shortly afterwards. A hideous story is told of his death. Having robbed him, his valet is said to have put an open razor—one account says a penknife, another a nail—in his master's boot, which divided an artery, and fever and death ensued. Aubrey, however, states that Suckling took poison at Paris, and family tradition confirms the statement—a sufficiently sad close to the life of the cavalier-poet.

Suckling's works consist of miscellaneous poems, four plays—possessing no vivid dramatic interest—a short prose treatise on Religion by Reason, and a small collection of letters written in a studied artificial style. His poems are all short, and the best of them are dedicated to love and gallantry. He writes with an irregularity which is absolutely extraordinary. In his Fragmenta Aurea will be found, side by side, some of the prettiest and some of the feeblest lyrics of the age. Suckling seems to have had no self-criticism and no criterion of style. His ambitious compositions are clumsy and confused, and it is only by a few singularly brilliant songs and bursts of genuine feeling that he is able to justify the prominence which his name continues to hold. Among these happy lyrics a leading place must be given to his Ballad upon a Wedding, which is inimitable for its witty levity and artful simplicity of expression. It has touches of graphic description and sprightliness hardly surpassed by earlier or later rivals.

Song.

'Tis now, since I sat down before
That foolish fort, a heart,
(Time strangely spent!) a year and more;
And still I did my part:

Made my approaches, from her hand
Unto her lip did rise;
And did already understand
The language of her eyes;

Proceeded on with no less art—
My tongue was engineer;
I thought to undermine the heart
By whispering in the ear.

When this did nothing, I brought down
Great cannon-oaths, and shot
A thousand thousand to the town,
And still it yielded not.

I then resolved to starve the place,
By cutting off all kisses,
Praising and gazing on her face,
And all such little blisses.

To draw her out, and from her strength,
I drew all batteries in;
And brought myself to lie at length,
As if no siege had been.

When I had done what man could do,
And thought the place mine own,
The enemy lay quiet too,
And smiled at all was done.

I sent to know from whence, and where,
These hopes, and this relief?
A spy informed, Honour was there,
And did command in chief.

'March, march,' quoth I; 'the word straight give;
Let's lose no time, but leave her;
That giant upon air will live,
And hold it out for ever.

'To such a place our camp remove
As will no siege abide;
I hate a fool that starves for love,
Only to feed her pride.'

A Ballad upon a Wedding.

I tell thee, Dick, where I have been,
Where I the rarest things have seen;
Oh, things without compare!
Such sights again cannot be found
In any place on English ground,
Be it at wake or fair.

At Charing Cross, hard by the way
Where we (thou know'st) do sell our hay,
There is a house with stairs ;
And there did I see coming down
Such folk as are not in our town,
Forty at least, in pairs.

Amongst the rest, one pestilent fine—
His beard no bigger, though, than mine—
Walked on before the rest :
Our landlord looks like nothing to him :
The king, God bless him ! 'twould undo him
Should he go still so drest.

SIR JOHN SUCKLING.

From the Portrait by Theodore Russel after Vandyke in the National Portrait Gallery.

At Course-a-park, without all doubt,
He should have first been taken out
By all the maids o' the town :
Though lusty Roger there had been,
Or little George upon the green,
Or Vincent of the Crown.

But wot you what ? the youth was going
To make an end of all his wooing ;
The parson for him staid :
Yet by his leave, for all his haste,
He did not so much wish all past,
Perchance, as did the maid.

The maid, and thereby hangs a tale,
For such a maid no Whitsun-ale
Could ever yet produce :
No grape that's kindly ripe could be
So round, so plump, so soft as she,
Nor half so full of juice.

Her finger was so small, the ring
Would not stay on which they did bring ;
It was too wide a peck :

And, to say truth—for out it must—
It looked like the great collar, just,
About our young colt's neck.

Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice, stole in and out,
As if they feared the light :
But oh ! she dances such a way !
No sun upon an Easter-day
Is half so fine a sight. . . .

Her cheeks so rare a white was on,
No daisy makes comparison ;
Who sees them is undone ;
For streaks of red were mingled there,
Such as are on a Catherine pear,
The side that's next the sun.

Her lips were red ; and one was thin,
Compared to that was next her chin,
Some bee had stung it newly ;
But, Dick, her eyes so guard her face,
I durst no more upon them gaze,
Than on the sun in July.

Her mouth so small, when she does speak,
Thou'dst swear her teeth her words did break,
That they might passage get :
But she so handled still the matter,
They came as good as ours, or better,
And are not spent a whit. . . .

Passion o' me ! how I run on !
There's that that would be thought upon,
I trow, besides the bride :
The bus'ness of the kitchen's great,
For it is fit that men should eat ;
Nor was it there denied.

Just in the nick, the cook knocked thrice,
And all the waiters in a trice
His summons did obey ;
Each serving-man, with dish in hand,
Marched boldly up, like our trained band,
Presented, and away.

When all the meat was on the table,
What man of knife or teeth was able
To stay to be entreated ?
And this the very reason was,
Before the parson could say grace,
The company was seated.

Now hats fly off, and youths carouse ;
Healts first go round, and then the house,
The bride's came thick and thick ;
And when 'twas named another's health,
Perhaps he made it hers by stealth,
And who could help it, Dick ?

O' the sudden up they rise and dance ;
Then sit again, and sigh, and glance :
Then dance again, and kiss.
Thus several ways the time did pass,
Till every woman wished her place,
And every man wished his.

By this time all were stolen aside
To counsel and undress the bride :
But that he must not know :

But yet 'twas thought he guessed her mind,
And did not mean to stay behind
Above an hour or so.

The wedding thus immortalised was that in 1641 of Lady Margaret Howard, daughter of the Earl of Suffolk, with Lord Broghill, afterwards Earl of Orrery. Herrick, who had no occasion to steal, took the happy simile of the eighth verse, and spoiled it in the theft:

Her pretty feet, like snails, did creep
A little out.

Wycherley also purloined Herrick's simile for one of his plays. The allusion to Easter-day is founded upon an old saying of English country-folk that the sun dances on Easter morning. The 'Dick' of this poem is Richard Lovelace.

Constancy.

Out upon it, I have loved
Three whole days together;
And am like to love three more,
If it prove fair weather.
Time shall moult away his wings,
Ere he shall discover
In the whole wide world again
Such a constant lover.
But the spite on 't is, no praise
Is due at all to me;
Love with me had made no stays,
Had it any been but she.
Had it any been but she,
And that very face,
There had been at least ere this
A dozen in her place.

Song.

I prithee send me back my heart,
Since I can not have thine,
For if from yours you will not part,
Why, then, shouldst thou have mine?
Yet now I think on 't, let it lie;
To find it were in vain;
For th' hast a thief in either eye
Would steal it back again.
Why should two hearts in one breast lie,
And yet not lodge together?
O Love! where is thy sympathy,
If thus our breasts thou sever?
But love is such a mystery,
I cannot find it out;
For when I think I'm best resolved,
I then am in most doubt.
Then farewell care, and farewell woe,
I will no longer pine;
For I'll believe I have her heart
As much as she hath mine.

Song.

Why so pale and wan, fond lover?
Prithee, why so pale?
Will, when looking well can't move her,
Looking ill prevail?
Prithee, why so pale?
Why so dull and mute, young sinner?
Prithee, why so mute?
Will, when speaking well can't win her,
Saying nothing do 't?
Prithee, why so mute?

Quit, quit for shame; this will not move,
This cannot take her;
If of herself she will not love,
Nothing can make her:
The devil take her.

The Rev. A. Suckling published Selections, with a Life (1836), reproduced by W. C. Hazlitt (new ed. 1893). Other editions are those of F. A. Stokes (N.Y., 1885) and A. H. Thompson (1910).

Shackerley Marmion (1603–39), minor dramatist, was born at his father's manor of Aynho in Northamptonshire, studied at Wadham College, Oxford, squandered his fortune, and fought in the Low Countries. He left behind an epic, Cupid and Psyche, and three comedies, Holland's Leaguer, A Fine Companion, and The Antiquary. He may be accounted 'of the tribe of Ben,' and was a scholar of some accomplishment but next to no dramatic power. His plays, in flowing blank verse, were popular, and are not without vigour and satirical point. They have been repeatedly reprinted, as by Maidment in 1875.

Jasper Mayne (1604–72), a clergyman, wrote two plays which illustrated city manners in the time of Charles I. The first of these, The City Match (1639), is easy and funny, but none too moral for the work of a clerk in holy orders; the second, entitled The Amorous War (1648), is a farcical tragi-comedy, and, like its predecessor, is spiced with improprieties. One lyric in it deserves to be better known. Mayne was born at Hatherleigh, Devon; from Westminster proceeded to Christ Church, Oxford; in 1639 became vicar of Cassington, and in 1648 of Pyrton; and at the Restoration was appointed Archdeacon of Chichester. He has even been compared to Dean Swift, though little remains to justify the comparison. Besides his plays, he wrote occasional poems and translated Lucian's Dialogues. The Puritans found no favour with this splenetic humorist, who thus makes capital of a Puritanical waiting-maid:

Aurelia. Oh, Mr Bannswright, are you come? My woman

Was in her preaching fit; she only wanted
A table's end.

Bannswright. Why, what's the matter?

Aur. Never

Poor lady had such unbred holiness
About her person; I am never drest
Without a sermon; but am forced to prove
The lawfulness of curling-irons before
She'll crisp me in a morning. I must shew
Texts for the fashions of my gowns. She'll ask
Where jewels are commanded? Or what lady
I' the primitive times wore ropes of pearl or rubies?
She will urge councils for her little ruff,
Called in Northamptonshire; and her whole service
Is a mere confutation of my clothes.

Ban. Why, madam, I assure you, time hath been,
However she be otherwise, when she had
A good quick wit, and would have made to a lady
A serviceable sinner.

Aur. She can't preserve
The gift for which I took her; but as though

She were inspired from Ipswich, she will make
The Acts and Monuments in sweetmeats; quinces,
Arraigned and burned at a stake; all my banquets
Are persecutions; Diocletian's days
Are brought for entertainment; and we eat martyrs.

Ban. Madam, she is far gone.

Aur. Nay, sir, she is a Puritan at her needle too.

Ban. Indeed!

Aur. She works religious petticoats; for flowers
She'll make church histories. Her needle doth
So sanctify my cushionets! Besides,
My smock-sleeves have such holy embroideries,
And are so learned that I fear, in time,
All my apparel will be quoted by
Some pure instructor. Yesterday I went
To see a lady that has a parrot; my woman,
While I was in discourse, converted the fowl;
And now it can speak nought but Knox's works;
So there's a parrot lost.

Ban. Faith, madam, she Was earnest to come to you. Had I known
Her mistress had so bred her, I would first
Have preferred her to New England.

Dorcas Surely, sir,
You promised me, when you did take my money,
To help me to a faithful service, a lady
That would be saved, not one that loves profane,
Unsanctified fashions.

Aur. Fly my sight,
You goody Hofman, and keep your chamber, till
You can provide yourself some cure, or I
Will forthwith excommunicate your zeal,
And make you a silent waiting-woman.

Ban. Mistress Dorcas,
If you'll be usher to that holy, learned woman
That can heal broken shins, scald heads and th' itch,
Your schoolmistress; that can expound, and teaches
To knit in Chaldee, and work Hebrew samplers,
I'll help you back again.

Dor. The motion, sure, is good,
And I will ponder of it. [Exit DORCAS.]

Aur. From thy zeal,
The frantic ladies' judgments, and Histriomastix,
Deliver me! This was of your preferring;
You must needs help me to another.

Ban. How
Would you desire her qualified? deformed
And crooked? like some ladies who do wear
Their women like black patches, to set them off?

Aur. I need no foil, nor shall I think I'm white
Only between two Moors; or that my nose
Stands wrong, because my woman's doth stand right.

Ban. But you would have her secret, able to keep Strange sights from th' knowledge of your knight, when you

Are married, madam; of a quick-feigning head?

Aur. You wrong me, Bannswright: she whom I would have
Must to her handsome shape have virtue too.

Ban. Well, madam, I shall fit you. I do know
A choleric lady which, within these three weeks,
Has, for not cutting her corns well, put off
Three women; and is now about to part
With the fourth—just one of your description.
Next change o' th' moon or weather, when her feet
Do ache again, I do believe I shall

Pleasure your ladyship.

Aur. Expect your reward. [Exit BANNSWRIGHT.]

Northamptonshire was at this time a Puritan region. From Ipswich Prynne wrote (and named) one of his violent pamphlets.
Preferred or promoted to New England, banished to the plantations. Goody Hofman was a character in a forgotten play. For Histriomastix, see under Prynne at page 584.

Thomas Killigrew (1612–83), son of a knight
and courtier of Cornish family, was born in London, and served as page in the household of Charles I.
Afterwards a dissolute companion of Charles II.
in exile and his groom of the bedchamber after the Restoration, he in 1660 received a patent along with D'Avenant to erect two new theatres and raise two new companies of actors, and finally superseded his rivals as Master of the Revels. His patent secured for him the right—new in England
—to give the female parts to women. The plays include tragedies, tragi-comedies, and comedies,
some of them apparently not intended for the stage.
They were all printed in folio in 1664. The Parson's Wedding, reprinted by Dodsley, is outrageously coarse, and tedious as well, though not without jokes, some of which Congreve copied or imitated.
A study of the plays seems to justify one part of Denham's criticism:

Had Cowley ne'er spoke, Killigrew ne'er writ,
Combined in one they'd made a matchless wit;

yet his credit as a wit was high, in spite of Denham
and his own plays.—His son, Thomas Killigrew
the younger (1657–1719), was groom of the chamber to the Prince of Wales (George II.) when he published the trifling but amusing comedy *Chit
Chat*.—The elder Killigrew's brother, Sir William Killigrew (1606–95), fought in the Civil War, and wrote a comedy, Pandora, and three tragicomedies, Selindra, Ormasdes, and The Siege of Urbis.

William Cartwright (1611–43) was admitted to the inner circle of Ben Jonson, who said of him,
'My son Cartwright writes all like a man.' His contemporaries loved him living, and deplored his early death. Born at Northway, near Tewkesbury, he was the son of an innkeeper at Cirencester
who had squandered away a patrimonial estate.
In 1635, after completing his education at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, Cartwright took holy orders; and as a zealous royalist he was imprisoned by the Parliamentary forces when they arrived in Oxford in 1642. In 1643, when he was chosen junior proctor of the university, and was also reader in metaphysics, he was said to have studied sixteen hours a day. Stricken with the malignant fever or 'camp-disease' prevalent at Oxford, he died November 23, 1643 (see Life by R. C. Goffin, 1918). The king went into mourning for his death; and when his works were published in 1651, no less than fifty-six copies of encomiastic verses were prefixed to them by the wits and scholars of the time, including Dr
Fell (who was not always so amiable!), Vaughan

the Silurist, and Izaak Walton. It is difficult to conceive, after reading Cartwright's works, why he should have obtained such extraordinary applause and reputation. His pieces are mostly short occasional poems, panegyrics of the king and royal family, addresses to ladies, noblemen, and his brother-poets Fletcher and Jonson, or slight amatory effusions not distinguished for elegance or fancy, though their conceits entitle him to a conspicuous place in the 'fantastic school.' His youthful virtues, his learning and loyalty, his singularly handsome person and winning manners, seem to have mainly contributed to his popularity, and his premature death would renew and deepen the impression of his gifts and graces. He is reported by Anthony Wood 'the most florid and seraphic preacher in the university.' Cartwright was only twenty-six when Ben Jonson died, and the compliment quoted above proves that he had then been busy with his pen. He mourned the loss of his poetical father in one of his best poems, thus commending Jonson's dramatic powers :

But thou still puts true passion on ; dost write
With the same courage that tried captains fight ;
Giv'st the right blush and colour unto things ;
Low without creeping, high without loss of wings ;
Smooth yet not weak, and, by a thorough care,
Big without swelling, without painting, fair.

His three 'tragi-comedies,' The Royal Slave, The Lady-Errant, and The Siege, are rhetorical and artificial ; his comedy, more comic than really humorous, is an imitation of Jonson's manner, and handles the Puritans roughly. The title of The Lady-Errant itself suggests a dream of the new woman, and still more the opening speech :

And if you see not women plead and judge,
Raise and depress, reward and punish, carry
Things how they please, and turn the politique door
Upon new hinges very shortly, never Believe the oracle.

But the story resolves itself into a fantastic rebellion of the princesses and ladies of Cyprus when their lords are at the wars in Crete, to be carried out by lances, falchions, javelins and helmets, armour, and ordinary military methods, till the scheme is thwarted by the triumph of true love. In spite of the unanimous agreement of the ladies—

Our souls are male as theirs.
That we have hitherto forborn t' assume
And manage thrones, that hitherto we have not Challenged a sovereignty in arts and arms,
And writ ourselves imperial, hath been
Men's tyranny and our modesty :

and in spite of eloquent adjurations—

Let us i' th' name of honour rise unto
The pitch of our creation—

they prove mere weak, loving women, and cheerfully return to subjection again.

'Lesbia's lament over her dead Sparrow, which picked crumbs, fed from its mistress's trencher or lip, and said "Philip," shows that Cartwright knew, or at least knew of, Skelton's Phylip Sparowe

(page 115). And his address or ode to Sir Francis Kynaston, 'upon the translation of Chaucer's Troilus and Creseide,' has its own interest :

Tis to your happy cares we owe that we
Read Chaucer now without a dictionary. . . .

He that hitherto

Was dumb to strangers and his own country too,
Speaks plainly now to all.

Parthenia and Argalus shows that the Arcadia was still a source of inspiration.

To a Lady Veiled.

So Love appeared, when, breaking out his way
From the dark chaos, he first shed the day ;
Newly awaked out of the bud, so shews
The half-seen, half-hid glory of the rose,
As you do through your veils ; and I may swear,
Viewing you so, that beauty doth bide there.
So Truth lay under fables, that the eye
Might reverence the mystery, not descry ;
Light being so proportioned, that no more
Was seen, but what might cause 'em to adore :
Thus is your dress so ordered, so contrived,
As 'tis but only poetry revived.
Such doubtful light had sacred groves, where rods
And twigs at last did shoof up into gods ;
Where, then, a shade darkeneth the beauteous face,
May not I pay a reverence to the place ?
So under water glimmering stars appear,
As those—but nearer stars—your eyes do here ;
So deities darkened sit, that we may find
A better way to see them in our mind.
No bold Ixion, then, be here allowed,
Where Juno dares herself be in the cloud.
Methinks the first age comes again, and we See a retrieval of simplicity.
Thus looks the country virgin, whose brown hue
Hoods her, and makes her shew even veiled as you.
Blest mean, that checks our hope, and spurs our fear,
Whiles all doth not lie hid, nor all appear !
O fear ye no assaults from bolder men ;
When they assail, be this your armour then.
A silken helmet may defend those parts
Where softer kisses are the only darts !

A Valediction.

Bid me not go where neither suns nor showers
Do make or cherish flowers ;
Where discontented things in sadness lie,
And Nature grieves as I ;
When I am parted from those eyes
From which my better day doth rise,
Though some propitious power
Should plant me in a bower,
Where, amongst happy lovers, I might see
How showers and sunbeams bring
One everlasting spring ;
Nor would those fall, nor these shine forth to me.
Nature herself to him is lost,
Who loseth her he honours most.
Then, fairest, to my parting view display
Your graces all in one full day ;
Whose blessed shapes I'll snatch and keep, till when
I do return and view again :
So by this art, fancy shall fortune cross,
And lovers live by thinking on their loss.

John Cleveland (1613-58), the cavalier poet, was equally conspicuous for political loyalty and poetical extravagance in conceits. His father was usher of a charity school at Loughborough, Leicestershire, and vicar from 1621 of Hinckley. After four years (1627-31) at Christ's College, Cambridge, Cleveland was elected a fellow of St John's, and lived nine years 'the delight and ornament of the society.' He strenuously opposed Cromwell's election for Cambridge to the Long Parliament, and was for his loyalty ejected from his fellowship in 1645. He betook himself to the king's army, and was appointed Judge-Advocate at Newark; he was deprived of that office in 1646, and next year vented his indignation at the surrender of the king in a fierce and famous satire on the Scots, part of which runs:

A land where one may pray with curs'd intent,
O may they never suffer banishment!
Had Cain been Scot, God would have chang'd his doom;
Not forc'd him wander, but confin'd him home.
Like Jews they spread and as infection fly,
As if the devil had ubiquity,
Hence 'tis they live as rovers and defie
This or that place, rags of geography,
They'r citizens o' th' world, they'r all in all,
Scotland's a nation epidemical.
And yet they ramble not to learn the mode
How to be drest, or how to lisp abroad; . . .
No, the Scots errant fight, and fight to eat,
Their ostrich-stomachs make their swords their meat;
Nature with Scots as tooth-drawers hath dealt,
Who use to string their teeth upon their belt. . . .

Lord! what a godly thing is want of shirts!
How a Scotch stomach and no meat converts!
They wanted food and rayment; so they took Religion for their seamstress and their cook.
Unmask them well, their honours and estate,
As well as conscience, are sophisticate.
Shrive but their title and their moneys poize,
A laird and twenty pence pronounc'd with noise,
When constru'd but for a plain yeoman go,
And a good sober two pence, and well so.
Hence then you proud impostors, get you gone,
You Picts in gentry and devotion.
You scandal to the stock of verse, a race
Able to bring the gibbet in disgrace.
Hyperbolus by suffering did traduce
The ostracism, and sham'd it out of use.
The Indian that heaven did forswear,
Because he heard some Spaniards were there;
Had he but known what Scots in hell had been,
He would Erasmus-like have hung between.
My muse hath done. A voyder for the nonce,
I wrong the devil should I pick their bones;
That dish is his; for when the Scots deace
Hell like their nation, feeds on bernacles.
A Scot when from the gallow-tree got loose
Drops into Styx, and turns a Soland goose.

The voyder was a servant who carried out the remains of a feast.

In 1655 Cleveland was seized at Norwich and put in prison. He petitioned the Protector, declaring his belief that, next to his adherence to the royal party, the cause of his confinement was the narrowness of his estate; for none stood committed whose estate could bail them. 'I am the only prisoner,' he says, 'who have no acres to be my hostage;' and he ingeniously argues that poverty, if it is a fault, is its own punishment. Cromwell released the poor poet, who died three years afterwards in London. Independently of his strong and biting satires, which were the cause of his popularity while living, Cleveland wrote some love-verses containing genuine poetry, amidst a mass of affected metaphors and fancies. He carried this gallantry to an extent bordering on the ludicrous. [Berdan edited Cleveland's Poems (1910). See also Saintsbury's Minor Caroline Poets, Vol. iii. (1921).]

On Phillis Walking before Sun-rising in a Morning.

The sluggish morn as yet undrest,
My Phillis brake from out her cest,
As if she'd made a match to run
With Venus, usher to the sun.
The trees, like yeomen of the guard
(Serving more for pomp than ward)
Rank'd on each side with loyal duty,
Weav'd branches to inclose her beauty.
The plants, whose luxury was lopp'd,
Or age with crutches underpropp'd
(Whose wooden carkases are grown
To be but coffins of their own)
Revive, and at her general dole,
Each receives his ancient soul.
The winged choristers began
To chirp their matins; and the fan
Of whistling winds, like organs play'd
Unto their voluntaries made
The wakened earth in odors rise
To be her morning sacrifice.
The flowers, call'd out of their beds,
Start and raise up their drowsie heads,
And he that for their colour seeks,
May find it vaulting in her cheeks,
Where roses mix; no civil war
Divides her York and Lancaster.
The marygold (whose courtier's face
Echoes the sun, and doth unlace
Her at his rise, at his full stop
Packs and shuts up her gawdy shop)
Mistakes her cue, and doth display:
Thus Phillis antedates the day.

These miracles had cramp'd the sun,
Who, fearing that his kingdom's won,
Powders with light his frizled locks,
To see what saint his lustre mocks.
The trembling leaves through which he play'd,
Dappling the walk with light and shade,
Like lattice-windows, give the spy
Room but to peep with half an eye,
Lest her full orb his sight should dim,
And bid us all good-night in him:
Till she should spend a gentle ray,
To force us a new-fashion'd day.

But what new-fashioned palsey's this,
Which makes the boughs divest their bliss;
And that they might her footsteps straw,
Drop their leaves with shivering awe?

Phillis perceiv'd, and (lest her stay
Should wed October unto May,
And as her beauty caus'd a spring,
Devotion might an autumn bring)
Withdrew her beams, yet made no night,
But left the sun her curate-light.

In an Elegy on the Archbishop of Canterbury (Laud), Cleveland has some vigorous lines :

How could success such villainies applaud ?
The State in Strafford fell, the Church in Laud.
The twins of public rage adjudg'd to dye
For treasons they should act by prophecy.
The facts were done before the laws were made,
The trump turn'd up after the game was play'd.
Be dull, great spirits, and forbear to climb,
For worth is sin, and eminence a crime.
No church-man can be innocent and high ;
'Tis height makes Grantham steeple stand awry.

Richard Lovelace (1618–58), cavalier poet, was born at Woolwich, or perhaps in Holland, the eldest son of Sir William Lovelace. Educated at the Charterhouse and Oxford, he was presented at court. Anthony Wood describes him at the age of sixteen 'as the most amiable and beautiful person that ever eye beheld; a person also of innate modesty, virtue, and courtly deportment, which made him then, but especially after, when he retired to the great city, much admired and adored by the female sex.' Thus personally distinguished, and a royalist in principle, Lovelace was chosen in 1642 by the county of Kent to deliver a petition to the House of Commons, praying that the king might be restored to his rights and the government settled. The Long Parliament was then in the ascendant, and Lovelace was thrown into prison for his boldness; in the Gatehouse at Westminster 'he wrote that celebrated song called "Stone Walls do not a Prison make."' He was liberated on £20,000 bail, was abroad 1646–48 in the French service, on his return to England was again imprisoned, and at his release towards the close of 1649 had 'consumed his whole patrimony in useless attempts to serve his sovereign.' To beguile his second captivity he collected his poems, and published them in 1649, under the title of Lucasta: Epodes, Odes, Sonnets, Songs, &c. The general title was given them on account of the 'lady of his love,' whom Wood identifies with a Miss Lucy Sacheverell, by Lovelace called Lux Casta. This was an unfortunate attachment; for the lady, hearing that Lovelace had died of a wound at Dunkirk (1646), soon after married another suitor. Lovelace was now penniless, and the reputation of a broken cavalier was no passport to better circumstances. It appears that soon, oppressed with want and melancholy, gallant Lovelace fell into a consumption. Wood relates that he became 'very poor in body and purse, was the object of charity, went in ragged clothes (whereas when he was in his glory he wore cloth of gold and silver), and mostly lodged in obscure and dirty places,' in one of which, a miserable alley near Shoe Lane, he died in April 1658. Aubrey confirms Wood's statement as to the reverse of fortune. The poetry of Lovelace, like his life, was very unequal. There is a spirit and nobleness in the best of his verses that charm the reader, as his gallant bearing and fine person captivated the fair; but in general his poetry is affected, and at times obscure. His conceits were often grotesque and his workmanship extraordinarily careless. Lucasta's fan, Lucasta's muff, the patch on her face, must needs be congratulated on being so near her sacred person; the waters at Tunbridge Wells are blessed because she is there drinking them. His taste was perverted by the fashion of the day—the affected wit, ridiculous gallantry, and boasted licentiousness of the cavaliers. That Lovelace knew how to appreciate true taste and natural grace may be seen from his lines on Lely's portrait (1647) of Charles I. and the Duke of York :

See, what a clouded majesty, and eyes
Whose glory through their mist doth brighter rise ;
See, what an humble bravery doth shine,
And grief triumphant breaking through each line,
How it commands the face ! So sweet a scorn
Never did happy misery adorn !
So sacred a contempt that others shew
To this—o' the height of all the wheel—below ;
That mightiest monarchs by this shaded book
May copy out their proudest, richest look.

Byron was criticised nearly two centuries afterwards for saying in the Bride of Abydos :

The mind, the music breathing from her face ;
but he vindicated the expression on the broad ground of its truth and appositeness. Byron did not know—what was pointed out by Sir Egerton Brydges—that Lovelace, in a song of Orpheus lamenting the death of his wife, wrote :

Oh, could you view the melody
Of every grace,
And music of her face,
You'd drop a tear ;
Seeing more harmony
In her bright eye
Than now you hear.

His two best-known songs—'To Lucasta' and 'To Althea'—are also by far the best things he did ; but even in the first, as Sir E. Gosse noted, he uses a figure of Habington's, and in the same words. Habington had in 1634, praising Castara, bestowed his veneration on 'the chaste nunnerly of her breasts.'

Song.

Why should you swear I am forsworn,
Since thine I vowed to be ?

Lady, it is already morn,
And 'twas last night I swore to thee
That fond impossibility.

Have I not loved thee much and long,
A tedious twelve hours' space ?

I must all other beauties wrong,
And rob thee of a new embrace,
Could I still dote upon thy face.

Not but all joy in thy brown hair
By others may be found ;
But I must search the black and fair,
Like skilful mineralists that sound
For treasure in unploughed-up ground.

Then, if when I have loved my round,
Thou prov'st the pleasant she ;
With spoils of meaner beauties crowned,
I laden will return to thee,
Even sated with variety.

The Rose.

Sweet, serene, sky-like flower,
Haste to adorn her bower :
From thy long cloudy bed
Shoot forth thy damask head.

Vermilion ball that's given
From lip to lip in heaven ;
Love's couch's coverlid ;
Haste, haste to make her bed.

See ! rosy is her bower,
Her floor is all thy flower ;
Her bed a rosy nest,
By a bed of roses prest.

Song.

Amarantha, sweet and fair,
Oh, braid no more that shining hair !
As my curious hand or eye
Hovering round thee let it fly.
Let it fly as unconfined
As its calm ravisher, the wind ;

Who hath left his darling, th' east,
To wanton o'er that spicy nest.
Every tress must be confest,
But neatly tangled at the best ;
Like a clue of golden thread
Most excellently ravelled.
Do not, then, wind up that light
In ribands, and o'ercloud in night,
Like the sun's in early ray ;
But shake your head, and scatter day !

To Lucasta, on going to the Wars.

Tell me not, sweet, I am unkind,
That from the nunnery
Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind,
To war and arms I fly.

True, a new mistress now I chase,
The first foe in the field ;
And with a stronger faith embrace
A sword, a horse, a shield.

Yet this inconstancy is such
As you too shall adore ;
I could not love thee, dear, so much,
Loved I not honour more.

To Althea, from Prison.

When Love with unconfined wings
Hovers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at my grates ;
When I lie tangled in her hair,
And fettered to her eye,
The birds that wanton in the air
Know no such liberty.

When flowing cups run swiftly round
With no allaying Thames,
Our careless heads with roses bound,
Our hearts with loyal flames ;
When thirsty grief in wine we steep,
When healths and draughts go free,
Fishes that tipple in the deep
Know no such liberty.

When, like committed linnets, I
With shriller throat shall sing
The sweetness, mercy, majesty,
And glories of my king ;
When I shall voice aloud how good
He is, how great should be,
Enlarged winds, that curl the flood,
Know no such liberty.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage ;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for an hermitage :
If I have freedom in my love,
And in my soul am free ;
Angels alone, that soar above,
Enjoy such liberty.

Lovelace's Posthume Poems were published by a brother in 1659 ; his works were edited by W. C. Hazlitt (1864), C. H. Wilkinson (1925 ; abbrev. 1930). See a study by Hartmann (1925).

Sir John Denham (1615-69) was born in Dublin, the only son of the Chief-Justice of the King's Bench in Ireland. He was educated in London and at Trinity College, Oxford, where Anthony Wood tells us he was 'a slow dreaming young man, and more addicted to gaming than study'—a vice from which his own essay against play did not wean him. In 1634 he married a Gloucestershire heiress with five hundred a year, and went to live with his father at Egham, an estate to which he succeeded four years later. At the outbreak of the great rebellion he was high-sheriff of Surrey, and was made governor of Farnham Castle for the king; on its capture he fell into Waller's hands, and was sent prisoner to London, but soon permitted to retire to Oxford. After Charles I. had been delivered into the hands of the army, his secret correspondence was partly carried on by Denham, who was furnished with nine several ciphers for the purpose. Charles had a respect for literature as well as the arts; and Milton records of him that he made Shakespeare's plays the closet-companion of his solitude. It would appear, however, that he wished to keep poetry apart from State affairs; for he told Denham, on seeing one of his pieces, 'that when men are young, and have little else to do, they may vent the overflowings of their fancy in that way; but when they are thought fit for more serious employments, if they still persisted in that course, it looked as if they minded not the way to any better.' In 1648 Denham helped to convey the Duke of York to Holland, and thereafter lived some time in that country and in France; in 1650 with Lord Crofts he collected £10,000 for Charles II. from Scots in Poland, and he several times visited England on secret service. The Restoration revived his fallen dignity and fortunes. He was made surveyor-general of works and a Knight of the Bath. He was a better poet than architect, but he had Christopher Wren for his deputy. In 1665 he took for his second wife a young girl, who soon showed such open favour to the Duke of York that the poor poet for a few months went mad. Soon after his recovery Lady Denham died suddenly (6th January 1667)—of a poisoned cup of chocolate, said scandal. His last years were rendered miserable betwixt poverty and the satires of Butler and others. He was buried near Chaucer in Westminster Abbey.

Cooper's Hill, the poem by which Denham is now best known, was first published in 1642, but did not receive its final form until thirteen years afterwards. It consists of between three and four hundred lines, written in the heroic couplet. Denham's muse was more reflective than descriptive. The descriptions are interspersed with sentimental digressions, suggested by the objects around—the river Thames, a ruined abbey, Windsor Forest, and the field of Runnymede. Dr Johnson gave Denham the praise of being 'the author of a species of composition that may be denominated local poetry, of which the fundamental subject is some particular landscape, to be poetically described, with the addition of such embellishments as may be supplied by historical retrospection or incidental meditation.' Ben Jonson's fine poem on Penshurst may dispute the palm of originality on this point with Cooper's Hill, but Jonson did not write with so great 'correctness' or such elaborate point as Denham. The versification is smooth and flowing, but Denham had no pretensions to the genius of Cowley, or to the depth and delicacy of feeling possessed by the dramatists or poets of the Elizabethan period. He reasoned fluently in verse, without glaring faults of style, and hence obtained from Johnson approbation far above his deserts. 'That Sir John Denham began a reformation in our verse,' says Southey in his Life of Cowper, 'is one of the most groundless assertions that ever obtained belief in literature. More thought and more skill had been exercised before his time in the construction of English metre than he ever bestowed on the subject, and by men of far greater attainments and far higher powers. To improve, indeed, either upon the versification or the diction of our great writers was impossible; it was impossible to exceed them in the knowledge or in the practice of their art, but it was easy to avoid the more obvious faults of inferior authors: and in this way he succeeded, just so far as not to be included in

The mob of gentlemen who wrote with ease;

nor consigned to oblivion with the "persons of quality" who contributed their vapid effusions to the miscellanies of those days. His proper place is among those of his contemporaries and successors who call themselves wits, and have since been entitled poets by the courtesy of England.' Denham, nevertheless, deserves a place in English literature, though not that high one which used to be assigned to him. The traveller who crosses the Alps or Pyrenees finds pleasure in the contrast afforded by level plains and calm streams; and so Denham's correctness pleases, after the daring imagination and irregular harmony of his greater predecessors. In reading him we feel that we have passed into another scene—romance is over, and we must be content with smoothness, regularity, and order. T. H. Banks edited his Poetical Works (1928).

The Thames—from 'Cooper's Hill.'

My eye, descending from the hill, surveys
Where Thames among the wanton valleys strays;
Thames, the most loved of all the Ocean's sons
By his old sire, to his embraces runs,
Hasting to pay his tribute to the sea,
Like mortal life to meet eternity.
Though with those streams he no resemblance hold,
Whose foam is amber and their gravel gold,
His genuine and less guilty wealth t' explore,
Search not his bottom, but survey his shore,

O'er which he kindly spreads his spacious wing,
 And hatches plenty for th' ensuing spring,
 Nor then destroys it with too fond a stay,
 Like mothers which their infants overlay ;
 Nor with a sudden and impetuous wave,
 Like profuse kings, resumes the wealth he gave.
 No unexpected inundations spoil
 The mower's hopes, nor mock the ploughman's toil,
 But Godlike his unwearied bounty flows ;
 First loves to do, then loves the good he does.
 Nor are his blessings to his banks confined,
 But free and common, as the sea or wind.
 When he to boast or to disperse his stores,
 Full of the tributes of his grateful shores,
 Visits the world, and in his flying towers
 Brings home to us, and makes both Indies ours :

SIR JOHN DENHAM.

From an Engraving by Legoux after a Picture in the Collection of the Earl of Chesterfield.

Finds wealth where 'tis, bestows it where it wants,
 Cities in deserts, woods in cities plants ;
 So that to us no thing, no place is strange.
 While his fair bosom is the world's Exchange.
*O could I flow like thee, and make thy stream
 My great example, as it is my theme !
 Though deep, yet clear ; though gentle, yet not dull ;
 Strong without rage ; without o'erflowing, full. . . .*

But his proud head the airy mountain hides
 Among the clouds ; his shoulders and his sides
 A shady mantle clothes ; his curled brows
 Frown on the gentle stream, which calmly flows,
 While winds and storms his lofty forehead beat,
 The common fate of all that's high or great.
 Low at his foot a spacious plain is placed,
 Between the mountain and the stream embraced,
 Which shade and shelter from the hill derives,
 While the kind river wealth and beauty gives ;
 And in the mixture of all these appears
 Variety, which all the rest endears.

This scene had some bold Greek or British bard
 Beheld of old, what stories had we heard
 Of fairies, satyrs, and the nymphs their dames,
 Their feasts, their revels, and their amorous flames ?
 'Tis still the same, although their airy shape
 All but a quick poetic sight escape.

The Reformation—Monks and Puritans.

Here should my wonder dwell, and here my praise,
 But my fixed thoughts my wandering eye betrays.
 Viewing a neighbouring hill, whose top of late
 A chapel crowned, till in the common fate
 Th' adjoining abbey fell. May no such storm
 Fall on our times, where ruin must reform !
 Tell me, my Muse, what monstrous dire offence,
 What crime could any Christian king incense
 To such a rage ? Was't luxury or lust ?
 Was he so temperate, so chaste, so just ? [more ;
 Were these their crimes ? They were his own much
 But wealth is crime enough to him that's poor,
 Who having spent the treasures of his crown,
 Condemns their luxury to feed his own.
 And yet this act, to varnish o'er the shame
 Of sacrilege, must bear devotion's name.
 No crime so bold but would be understood
 A real or at least a seeming good.
 Who fears not to do ill, yet fears the name,
 And, free from conscience, is a slave to fame.
 Thus he the church at once protects, and spoils :
 But princes' swords are sharper than their styles.
 And thus to th' ages past he makes amends,
 Their charity destroys, their faith defends.
 Then did religion in a lazy cell,
 In empty, airy contemplation dwell ;
 And like the block unmoved lay ; but ours,
 As much too active, like the stork devours.
 Is there no temperate region can be known,
 Betwixt their frigid and our torrid zone ?
 Could we not wake from that lethargic dream,
 But to be restless in a worse extreme ?
 And for that lethargy was there no cure,
 But to be cast into a calenture ?
 Can knowledge have no bound, but must advance
 So far, to make us wish for ignorance,
 And rather in the dark to grope our way,
 Than, led by a false guide, to err by day ?

Denham had sound and decided views as to the duty of a translator. 'It is not his business alone,' he says, 'to translate language into language, but poesy into poesy ; and poesy is so subtle a spirit, that, in pouring out of one language into another,
 it will all evaporate ; and if a new spirit be not added in the translation, there will remain nothing but a caput mortuum ; there being certain graces and happinesses peculiar to every language, which give life and energy to the words.' Hence he says in his poetical address to Sir Richard Fanshawe on his translation of Il Pastor Fido :

That servile path thou nobly dost decline
 Of tracing word by word, and line by line.
 Those are the laboured births of slavish brains,
 Not the effect of poetry, but pains.
 Cheap vulgar arts, whose narrowness affords
 No fight for thoughts, but poorly sticks at words.

A new and nobler way thou dost pursue,
To make translations and translators too.
They but preserve the ashes, thou the flame,
True to his sense, but truer to his fame.

Denham wrote a tragedy, The Sophy (1642-67), on a plot of Oriental jealousy, treachery, torture, and murder, based, like other plays of the time, on the Travels of Sir Thomas Herbert (see page 601), the sophy being the Shah of Persia. It was extremely popular, and in Ward's opinion deserves to rank as one of the best tragedies of the time. The story is pathetic; as might be expected from Denham, the verse is far above the average of playwrights' rhymes; and there are many pointed and felicitous lines and couplets, as when the envious king asks his counsellor Haly:

Have not I performed actions
As great, and with as great a moderation?
The courtier and friend replies:
Ay, sir; but that's forgotten:
Actions of the last age are like almanacs of the last year
—an experience which we know was nowise exceptional amongst cavaliers in the days of Charles II.

Oh! happiness of sweet content
To be at once secure and innocent—
'is a stock quotation from Denham; so is Love! in what poison is thy dart
Dipped when it makes a bleeding heart!
None know but they who feel the smart.

In the following bit of Denham's elegy on the death of Cowley, the poet by an odd oversight ignores the fact that Shakespeare was buried on the banks of his native Avon, not in Westminster Abbey, and that both he and Fletcher died long ere time had 'blasted their bays.'

On Mr Abraham Cowley.

Old Chaucer, like the morning-star,
To us discovers day from far.
His light those mists and clouds dissolved
Which our dark nation long involved;
But he descending to the shades,
Darkness again the age invades;
Next (like Aurora) Spenser rose,
Whose purple blush the day foreshews;
The other three with his own fires
Phœbus, the poet's god, inspires:
By Shakespeare's, Jonson's, Fletcher's lines,
Our stage's lustre Rome's outshines.
These poets near our princes sleep,
And in one grave their mansion keep.
They lived to see so many days,
Till time had blasted all their bays;
But cursed be the fatal hour
That plucked the fairest, sweetest flower
That in the Muses' garden grew,
And amongst withered laurels threw.
Time, which made them their fame outlive,
To Cowley scarce did ripeness give.
Old mother-wit and nature gave Shakespeare and Fletcher all they have:

In Spenser and in Jonson art
Of slower nature got the start;
But both in him so equal are,
None knows which bears the happiest share.
To him no author was unknown,
Yet what he wrote was all his own;
He melted not the ancient gold,
Nor with Ben Jonson did make bold
To plunder all the Roman stores
Of poets and of orators:
Horace his wit and Virgil's state
He did not steal, but emulate;
And when he would like them appear,
Their garb, but not their clothes, did wear:
He not from Rome alone, but Greece,
Like Jason brought the golden fleece;
To him that language—though to none
Of th' others—as his own was known.
On a stiff gale, as Flaccus sings,
The Theban swan extends his wings,
When through th' ethereal clouds he flies
To the same pitch our swan doth rise;
Old Pindar's heights by him are reached,
When on that gale his wings are stretched;
His fancy and his judgment such,
Each to th' other seemed too much;
His severe judgment giving law,
His modest fancy kept in awe.

The following song is sung with music to the prince when he is awaiting death, having been poisoned by the minister of his unnaturally jealous (and too late repentant) father:

Song to Morpheus.

Morpheus, the humble god, that dwells
In cottages and smoky cells,
Hates gilded roofs and beds of down;
And, though he fears no prince's frown,
Flies from the circle of a crown.

Come, I say, thou powerful god,
And thy leaden charming rod,
Dipt in the Lethean lake,
O'er his wakeful temples shake,
Lest he should sleep and never wake.

Nature, alas, why art thou so
Obliged to thy greatest foe?
Sleep that is thy best repast,
Yet of death it bears a taste,
And both are the same thing at last.

(From The Sophy, Act v.)

Denham's translation of the Psalms can hardly be pronounced an improvement on earlier renderings. He aims at greater variety of measure, and sometimes employs complicated stanzas. These are the first two verses of his Hundredth Psalm:

Ye nations of the earth rejoice
When ye to God yourselves present:
And make your glad harmonious voice
Of his high praise the instrument.

He is our God; for man, 'tis sure,
Made not himself: we are his sheep;
His flock with care he does secure
In grandest folds and fields does keep.

Abraham Cowley

was the most popular English poet of his times. Waller stood next in public estimation. Dryden had as yet done nothing to give him a name, and Milton's minor poems had not earned for him a supreme position: the same year that witnessed the death of Cowley ushered the Paradise Lost into the world. Cowley was born in London in 1618, and was the posthumous son of a respectable stationer in Cheapside, who, dying in the August of that year, left £140 each to his six children and to the unborn infant, the poet. His mother had influence enough to procure admission for him as a king's scholar at Westminster; and in

ABRAHAM COWLEY.

1637 he was elected a scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge, where three years afterwards he obtained a minor fellowship. Cowley 'lisp'd in numbers.' In 1633, in his fifteenth year, appeared Poetical Blossomes by A. C., with a portrait of the young poet prefixed. In his mother's parlour there used to lie a copy of Spenser's Faerie Queene, which infinitely delighted the susceptible boy and helped to make him a poet. The intensity of his youthful ambition may be seen from the first two lines in his Miscellanies:

What shall I do to be for ever known,
And make the age to come my own?

Cowley was ejected, as a royalist, from Cambridge, and betook himself to Oxford; thence in 1646 he followed Queen Henrietta Maria to France, where he remained ten years. He was sent on various embassies, and conducted the correspondence in cipher of Charles and his queen—a task that took up all his days and two or three nights every week. At last the Restoration came, with all its hopes and fears. England looked for happy days and loyalty for its reward, but for many the cup of joy was dashed with disappointment. Cowley expected to be made master of the Savoy, or to receive some other appointment, but his claims were persistently overlooked. In his youth he had written an ode to Brutus, which was remembered to his disadvantage; and a comedy, The Cutter of Coleman Street, which Cowley brought out shortly after the Restoration, and in which the riot and jollity of the cavaliers are painted in strong colours, was misrepresented or misconstrued at court. It is certain that Cowley felt his disappointment keenly, and he resolved to retire into the country. He had only just passed his fortieth year, but the greater part of his time had been spent in incessant labour, amidst dangers and suspense. 'He always professed,' says Dr Sprat, his biographer, 'that he went out of the world as it was man's, into the same world as it was nature's and as it was God's. The whole compass of the creation, and all the wonderful effects of the divine wisdom, were the constant prospect of his senses and his thoughts. And indeed he entered with great advantage on the studies of nature, even as the first great men of antiquity did, who were generally both poets and philosophers.' He thus happily refers to his wish for retirement:

Be prudent, and the shore in prospect keep,
In a weak boat trust not the deep.
Plac'd beneath envy, above envying rise;
Pity great men, great things despise.

The wise example of the heav'nly lark,
Thy fellow-poet, Cowley, mark!
Above the clouds let thy proud musick sound,
Thy humble nest build on the ground.

Cowley obtained, through Lord St Albans and the Duke of Buckingham, the lease of some lands belonging to the queen, worth about £300 per annum—a decent provision for his retirement; and he settled at Chertsey on the Thames. Here, a man of devout beliefs and pure life, he cultivated his garden and his fields, and wrote of solitude and obscurity, of the perils of greatness, and the happiness of liberty. He renewed his acquaintance with the beloved poets of antiquity, whose ease and elegance he sought to rival in praising the charms of a country life; and he composed his fine prose discourses, so full of gentle thoughts and well-digested knowledge, heightened by a delightful bonhomie and communicativeness worthy of Horace or Montaigne. Sprat mentions that Cowley excelled in letter-writing, that he and another friend had a large collection of his letters, but that they had decided that nothing of that kind should be published—a regrettable decision. Coleridge protested against the prudery of Sprat 'in refusing to let Cowley appear in slippers and dressing-gown.' The self-banished courtier was not happy in his retirement. Solitude, that had so long wooed him to her arms, was a phantom that vanished in his embrace. He had attained the long-cherished aim of his studious youth and busy manhood; the woods and fields at length enclosed the 'melancholy Cowley' in their shades. But happiness was still distant. He had quitted the 'monster London;' he had gone out from Sodom, but had not found the little Zoar of his dreams. The place of his retreat was ill selected, and his health was affected by the change of situation. The people of the country, he found, were not a whit better or more innocent than those of the town. He could get no money from his tenants, and his meadows were eaten up every night by cattle put in by his neighbours. Johnson, who would have preferred Fleet Street to all the charms of Arcadia and the golden age, published, with a sort of malicious satisfaction, a letter of Cowley's, dated from Chertsey, in which the poet makes a querulous and rueful complaint over the downfall of his rural prospects and enjoyment. One day, in the heat of summer, he had stayed too long amongst his labourers in the meadows, and caught a chill, which, neglected, proved fatal in a fortnight. This is the account of his biographer Sprat; but Pope, in his conversations with Spence, gave this (unauthenticated and unkindly) story: 'His death was occasioned by a mean accident, whilst his great friend Dean Sprat was with him on a visit. They had been together to see a neighbour of Cowley's, who, according to the fashion of those times, made them too welcome. They did not set out for their walk home till it was too late, and had drunk so deep that they lay out in the fields all night. This gave Cowley the fever that carried him off. The parish still talk of the drunken dean.' Now, as Sprat was not drunken, and was not a dean for sixteen years after this, there must be some confusion, to say the least of it, in this anecdote. And Pope was not very trustworthy in such reminiscences. Cowley died 28th July 1667. His remains were taken by water to Westminster, and interred with great pomp in the Abbey. 'The king himself,' says Sprat, 'was pleased to bestow on him the best epitaph, when, upon the news of his death, His Majesty declared that Mr Cowley had not left a better man behind him.' By his will he made his brother his heir and executor, and left legacies to relatives and friends amounting to £420, exclusive of his share in the Duke of York's Theatre. The 'little Zoar' at Chertsey had not been saddened by any fear of poverty, and Cowley to the last retained his Trinity fellowship.

Cowley's poetical works are divided into four parts—Miscellanies, including the Anacreontiques; the Mistress, or Love Verses; Pindarique Odes; and the Dauides, a Heroical Poem of the Troubles of David. Verses on Various Occasions and Essays in Verse and Prose were added in later editions of his works. His fame rapidly decayed after his death. Dryden's judgment was: 'Though he must always be thought a great poet, he is no longer esteemed a good writer;' and Pope asked:

Who now reads Cowley? If he pleases yet,
His moral pleases, not his pointed wit:
Forgot his epic, nay, Pindaric art,
But still I love the language of his heart.

Dr Johnson, rather strangely, says Cowley 'makes no selection of words, nor seeks any neatness of phrase; he has no elegances either lucky or elaborate; and he has few epithets, and these scattered without propriety or nice adaptation'—he suffered from a derangement of epitaphs, it appears. Cowper sketched Cowley in his Task, and laments that his 'splendid wit' should have been 'entangled in the cobwebs of the schools.' The manners of the court and the age constrained Cowley to display a certain gallantry, but he seems to have had neither strong passions nor deep feelings. He expresses his love in a style almost as fantastic as the euphuism of old Lyly or Sir Piercie Shafton. 'Poets,' he says, 'are scarce thought freemen of their company, without paying some duties, and obliging themselves to be true to love;' it has been said that he composed his Mistress as a sort of task-work. But though there is little apparent fervour in the poems, it may be that they do reflect an actual but hopeless love-passage. There is so much of this 'wit-writing' in Cowley's poetry that the reader is generally glad to escape from it into his prose, where he has good sense and right feeling, instead of cold though glittering conceits, forced analogies, and counterfeited passion. Johnson criticised him as one of what he called the 'meta-physical poets.' His anacreontic pieces are easy, unaffected, lively, and full of spirit; they are redolent of joy and youth, and touch the feelings as well as the fancy. His so-called Pindarique Odes, though their resemblance to Pindar is slender, contain some noble lines and illustrations. Cowley was the inventor of this kind of Pindaric odes (compare those of Congreve and Gray), attracted mainly by the freedom their irregularity gave him, and the endless scope for his ingenuity in figures and imagery. To Charles Lamb Cowley was 'very dear;' Archbishop Trench refused to agree to disparaging judgments on him; William Cullen Bryant was enthusiastic about the beauty of his best things; Gosse, while admitting that Cowley is 'justly denied the humblest place amongst erotic poets,' commends his purity in an impure time; compares The Wish, 'so simple, sincere, and fresh,' to a delicious well found in an arid desert; and professes himself the last of Cowley's admirers. Among the best of his other pieces are his lines on the death of a college companion, William Harvey or Hervey, and his noble elegy on Crashaw. The Dauides is tedious and unfinished; only four books out of twelve were published ; the specimen given shows how well Cowley could handle the heroic couplet. It is evident that Milton had read this neglected poem. Cowley's few prose essays entitle him to rank with Addison and Goldsmith as master of a simple and graceful prose.

The Wish.

Well then ; I now do plainly see,
This busie world and I shall nere agree ;
The very honey of all earthly joy
Does of all meats the soonest cloy.
And they, methinks, deserve my pity,
Who for it can endure the stings,
The croud, and buz, and murmurings
Of this great hive, the city.

Ah, yet, ere I descend to th' grave,
May I a small house and large garden have !
And a few friends, and many books ; both true,
Both wise, and both delightfull too !
And since Love neer wil from me flee,
A mistresse moderately fair,
And good as guardian-angels are,
Onely beloved, and loving me !

Oh, founts ! Oh when in you shall I
My selfe, eas'd of unpeaceful thoughts, espy ?
Oh fields ! Oh woods ! when, when shall I be made
The happy tenant of your shade ?
Here's the spring-head of pleasure's flood ;
Where all the riches lye, that she
Has coin'd and stampt for good.

Pride and ambition here,
Onely in far-fetcht metaphors appear ;
Here nought but winds can hurtfull murmurs scatter,
And nought but eccho flatter.
The gods, when they descended, hither
From heaven, did alwaies chuse their way ;
And therefore we may boldly say,
That 'tis the way too thither.

How happy here should I,
And one dear she, live, and embracing, dye ?
She who is all the world, and can exclude
In desarts, solitude.
I should have then this only fear,
Lest men, when they my pleasures see,
Should all come im'itate mee
And so make a city here.

From the Poem 'On the Death of Mr Crashaw.'

Poet and Saint ! to thee alone are given
The two most sacred names of earth and heaven,
The hard and rarest union which can be
Next that of Godhead with humanitie.
Long did the Muses, banisht slaves abide,
And built vain pyramids to mortal pride ;
Like Moses thou (though spells and charms withstand)
Hast brought them nobly home back to their holy land. . .

How well (blest swan) did Fate contrive thy death,
And made thee render up thy tuneful breath
In thy great mistress arms ? thou most divine
And richest offering of Loretto's shrine !
Where like some holy sacrifice t' expire,
A fever burns thee, and Love lights the fire.

Angels (they say) brought the famed chappel there,
And bore the sacred load in triumph thro' the aire.
'Tis surer much they brought thee there, and they,
And thou, their charge, went singing all the way.

Pardon, my mother church, if I consent
That angels led him when from thee he went ;
For ev'n in error sure no danger is
When joyn'd with so much piety as his.
Ah, mighty God, with shame I speak 't, and grief,
Ah that our greatest faults were in belief !
And our weak reason were even weaker yet,
Rather then thus our wills too strong for it.
His faith perhaps in some nice tenents might
Be wrong ; his life, I'm sure, was in the right.
And I my self a Catholick will be,
So far at least, great saint, to pray to thee.
Hail, bard triumphant ! and some care bestow
On us, the poets militant below !
Opposed by our old enemy, adverse chance,
Attacqu'd by envy, and by ignorance,
Exchain'd by beauty, tortured by desires,
Expos'd by tyrant-love to savage beasts and fires.
Thou from low earth in nobler flames didst rise,
And, like Elijah, mount alive the skies. . .

Sleep on, rest quiet as thy conscience take,
For tho' thou sleep'st thy self, thy God's awake.
Above the subtle foldings of the sky,
Above the well-set orbs' soft harmony,
Above those petty lamps that gild the night,
There is a place o'erflown with hallowed light ;
Where heav'n, as if it left it self behind,
Is stretcht out far, nor its own bounds can find :
Here peaceful flames swell up the sacred place,
Nor can the glory contain it self in th' endless space.
For there no twilight of the sun's dull ray
Glimmers upon the pure and native day.
No pale-fac'd moon does in stoln beams appear,
Or with dim taper scatters darkness there.
On no smooth spear the restless seasons slide,
No circling motion doth swift time divide ;
Nothing is there to come, and nothing past,
But an eternal now does always last.

Beneath the silent chambers of the earth,
Where the sun's fruitful beams give metals birth ;
Where he the growth of fatal gold does see,
Gold which above more influence has than he.
Beneath the dens where unfletcht tempests lye,
And infant winds their tender voices try,
Beneath the mighty ocean's wealthy caves,
Beneath th' eternal fountain of all waves,
Where their vast court the mother-waters keep,
And undisturb'd by moons in silence sleep ;
There is a place, deep, wondrous deep below,
Which genuine Night and Horror does o'erflow ;
No bound controls th' unwearied space, but hell
Endless as those dire pains that in it dwell.
Here no dear glimpse of the sun's lovely face,
Strikes through the solid darkness of the place ;
No dawning morn does her kind reds display ;
One slight weak beam would here be thought the day.
No gentle stars with their fair gems of light
Offend the tyr'anus and unquestion'd night.
Here Lucifer the mighty captive reigns
Proud, 'midst his woes, and tyrant in his chains.

Once general of a gilded host of sprights,
Like Hesper, leading forth the spangled nights.
But down like lightning, which him struck, he came,
And roar'd at his first plunge into the flame.
Myriads of spirits fell wounded round him there ;
With dropping lights thick shone the singed air. . . .
A dreadful silence fill'd the hollow place,
Doubling the native terror of hell's face ;
Rivers of flaming brimstone, which before
So loudly rag'd, crept softly by the shore ;
No hiss of snakes, no clank of chains was known :
The souls amidst their tortures durst not groan.

To Pyrrha.

In imitation of Horace (Odes I. v.).

To whom now, Pyrrha, art thou kinde ?
To what heart-ravisht lover
Dost thou thy golden locks unbinde,
Thy hidden sweets discover,
And with large bounty open set
All the bright stores of thy rich cabinet ?
Ah simple youth, how oft will he
Of thy changed faith complain ?
And his own fortunes find to be
So airy and so vain,
Of so camæleon-like an hew,
That still their colour changes with it too ?
How oft, alas, will he admire
The blackness of the skies ?
Trembling to hear the winds sound higher
And see the billows rise ;
Poor unexperienc'd he,
Who ne're, alas, before had been at sea !
He' enjoys thy calmy sun-shine now,
And no breath stirring hears ;
In the clear heaven of thy brow
No smallest cloud appears.
He sees thee gentle, fair and gay,
And trusts the faithless April of thy May.
Unhappy ! thrice unhappy he,
T' whom thou untried dost shine !
But there's no danger now for me,
Since o're Loretto's shrine,
In witness of the shipwrack past
My consecrated vessel hangs at last.

Anacreontics.

Drinking.

The thirsty earth soaks up the rain,
And drinks, and gapes for drink again.
The plants suck in the earth, and are
With constant drinking fresh and faire.
The sea it self, which one would think
Should have but little need of drink,
Drinks ten thousand rivers up,
So fill'd that they oreflow the cup.
The busie sun (and one would guess
By's drunken fry face no less)
Drinks up the sea, and when he has don,
The moon and stars drink up the sun.
They drink and dance by their own light,
They drink and revel all the night.
Nothing in nature's sober found,
But an eternal health goes round.

Fill up the bowl then, fill it high,
Fill all the glasses there, for why
Should every creature drink but I,
Why, man of morals, tell me why ?

The Epicure.

Fill the bowl with rosie wine,
Around our temple roses twine,
And let us chearfully awhile,
Like the wine and roses smile.
Crown'd with roses we contemn
Gyges wealthy diadem.
To day is ours ; what do we feare ?
To day is ours ; we have it here.
Let's treat it kindly, that it may
Wish, at least, with us to stay.
Let's banish business, banish sorrow ;
To the gods belongs to morrow.

The Grasshopper.

Happy insect, what can bee
In happiness compared to thee ?
Fed with nourishment divine,
The dewy morning's gentle wine !
Nature waits upon thee still,
And thy verdant cup does fill ;
'Tis fill'd where-ever thou dost tread,
Nature selfe's thy Ganimed.
Thou dost drink, and dance, and sing ;
Happier then the happiest king !
All the fields, which thou dost see,
All the plants belong to thee !
All that summer hours produce,
Fertile made with early juice !
Man for thee does sow and plough ;
Farmer he, and land-lord thou !
Thou dost innocently joy ;
Nor does thy luxury destroy ;
The shepherd gladly heareth thee,
More harmonious then he.
Thee countrey hindes with gladness hear,
Prophet of the ripened year !
Thee Phœbus loves, and does inspire ;
Phœbus is himself thy sire.
To thee of all things upon earth,
Life is no longer then thy mirth.
Happy insect, happy thou,
Dost neither age nor winter know.
But when thou'st drunk, and danced, and sung
Thy fill, the flowry leaves among, (Voluptuous, and wise withal,
Epicuræan animal !)
Sated with thy summer feast,
Thou retirest to endless rest.

From 'The Resurrection.'

Begin the song, and strike the living lyre ; [quire,
Lo' how the years to come, a numerous and well-fitted
All hand in hand do decently advance,
And to my song with smooth and equal measures dance.
Whilst the dance lasts, how long so e'er it be,
My musick's voice shall bear it company.
'Till all gentle notes be drown'd
In the last trumpet's dreadful sound ;
That, to the spheres themselves, shall silence bring,
Untune the universal string.

Then all the wide-extended sky,
And all th' harmonious worlds on high,
And Virgil's sacred work shall die ;
And he himself shall see in one fire shine
Rich Nature's ancient Troy, though built by hands divine.

Whom thunder's dismal noise,
And all that prophets and apostles louder spake,
And all the creatures' plain-conspiring voice,
Could not, whilst they liv'd, awake,
This mightier sound shall make
When dead t' arise,
And open tombs, and open eyes ;
To the long sluggards of five thousand years.
This mightier sound shall make its hearers ears.
Then shall the scatter'd atoms crowding come
Back to their ancient home ;
Some from birds, from fishes some,
Some from earth, and some from seas,
Some from beasts, and some from trees.
Some descend from clouds on high,
Some from metals upwards fly,
And where th' attending soul naked and shivering stands,
Meet, salute, and join their hands.
As dispers'd soldiers at the trumpet's call
Haste to their colours all.
Unhappy most, like tortur'd men,
Their joints new set, to be new rackt again.
To mountains they for shelter pray,
The mountains shake, and run about no less confus'd than they.

The Chronicle, a Ballad.

Margarita first possest,
If I remember well, my brest,
Margarita first of all ;
But when a while the wanton maid
With my restless heart had plaid,
Martha took the flying ball.

Martha soon did it resign
To the beauteous Catharine.
Beauteous Catharine gave place,
(Though loth and angry she to part
With the possession of my heart)
To Elisa's conqu'ring face.

Elisa 'till this hour might raign,
Had she not evil counsels ta'ne.
Fundamental laws she broke,
And still new favorites she chose,
'Till up in arms my passions rose,
And cast away her yoke.

Mary then and gentle Ann
Both to reign at once began ;
Alternately they sway'd,
And sometimes Mary was the fair,
And sometimes Ann the crown did wear,
And sometimes both I obey'd.

Another Mary then arose,
And did rigorous laws impose.
A mighty tyrant she !
Long, alas, should I have been Under that iron-scepter'd queen,
Had not Rebecca set me free.

When fair Rebecca set me free,
'Twas then a golden time with mee.
But soon those pleasures fled,
For the gracious princess dy'd
In her youth and beautie's pride,
And Judith reigned in her sted.

One month, three days and half an hour
Judith held the sovereign power.
Wondrous beautiful her face,
But so weak and small her wit,
That she to govern was unfit,
And so Susanna took her place.

But when Isabella came
Arm'd with a resistless flame,
And th' artillery of her eye,
Whilst she proudly marcht about
Greater conquests to find out,
She beat out Susan by the by.

But in her place I then obey'd
Black-ey'd Besse her vice-roy maid,
To whom ensu'd a vacancy.
Thousand worse passions then possest
The inter-regnum of my brest.
Bless me from such an anarchy !

Gentle Henrietta than
And a third Mary next began,
Then Jone, and Jane, and Audria.
And then a pretty Thomasine,
And then another Katharine,
And then a long et cætera.

But should I now to you relate
The strength and riches of their state,
The powder, patches, and the pins,
The ribbans, jewels, and the rings,
The lace, the paint, and warlike things
'That make up all their magazines :

If I should tell the politick arts
To take and keep men's hearts,
The letters, embassies and spies,
The frowns, and smiles, and flatteries,
The quarrels, tears, and perjuries,
Numberless, nameless mysteries !

And all the little lime-twigs laid
By Matchavil the waiting-maid ;
I more voluminous should grow,
(Chiefly if I like them should tell
All change of weathers that befell)
Then Holinshead or Stow.

But I will briefer with them be,
Since few of them were long with me.
An higher and a nobler strain
My present empress does claime,
Heleonora, first o' th' name,
Whom God grant long to reign.

Lord Bacon—from 'Ode to the Royal Society.'

From these and all long errors of the way,
In which our wandering predecessors went,
And like th' old Hebrews many years did stray,
In desarts but of small extent,

Bacon, like Moses, led us forth at last ;
 The barren wilderness he past,
 Did on the very border stand
 Of the blest promis'd land,
 And from the mountains top of his exalted wit,
 Saw it himself, and shew'd us it.
 But life did never to one man allow
 Time to discover worlds, and conquer too ;
 Nor can so short a line sufficient be
 To fadome the vast depths of nature's sea :
 The work he did we ought t' admire,
 And were unjust if we should more require
 From his few years, divided 'twixt th' excess
 Of low affliction and high happiness.
 For who on things remote can fix his sight,
 That's always in a triumph or a fight ?

From the Elegy 'On the Death of Mr William Hervey.'

It was a dismal and a fearful night ;
 Scarce could the morn drive on th' unwilling light,
 When sleep, death's image, left my troubled brest
 By something liker death possess.
 My eyes with tears did uncommanded flow,
 And on my soul hung the dull weight
 Of some intolerable fate.
 What bell was that ? Ah me ! too much I know.

My sweet companion, and my gentle peere,
 Why hast thou left me thus unkindely here,
 Thy end for ever, and my life to moan ?
 O thou hast left me all alone !
 Thy soul and body, when death's agonie
 Besieged around thy noble heart,
 Did not with more reluctance part
 Then I, my dearest friend, do part from thee.

My dearest friend, would I had dyed for thee !
 Life and this world henceforth will tedious be.
 Nor shall I know hereafter what to do
 If once my griefs prove tedious too.
 Silent and sad I walk about all day,
 As sullen ghosts stalk speechless by
 Where their hid treasures ly ;
 Alas, my treasure's gone, why do I stay ?

He was my friend, the truest friend on earth :
 A strong and mighty influence joyn'd our birth.
 Nor did we envy the most sounding name
 By friendship given of old to fame.
 None but his brethren he, and sisters knew,
 Whom the kind youth preferr'd to me ;
 And even in that we did agree,
 For much above my self I lov'd them too.

Say, for you saw us, ye immortal lights,
 How oft unwearied have we spent the nights ?
 'Till the Ledaean stars so famed for love,
 Wondred at us from above.

We spent them not in toys, in lusts, or wine ;
 But search of deep philosophy,
 Wit, eloquence, and poetry ;
 Arts which I loved, for they, my friend, were thine.

Ye fields of Cambridge, our dear Cambridge, say,
 Have ye not seen us walking every day ?
 Was there a tree about which did not know
 The love betwixt us two ?

Henceforth, ye gentle trees, for ever fade ;
 Or your sad branches thicker joyne,
 And into darksome shades combine ;
 Dark as the grave wherein my friend is laid.

Henceforth no learned youths beneath you sing,
 'Till all the tuneful birds to your bows they bring ;
 No tuneful birds play with their wonted chear,
 And call the learned youths to hear ;
 No whistling winds through the glad branches fly,
 But all with sad solemnity,
 Mute and unmoved be,
 Mute as the grave wherein my friend does ly.

Epitaph on the Living Author.

Here, stranger, in this humble nest,
 Here Cowley sleeps ; here lies,
 'Scaped all the toils that life molest,
 And its superfluous joys.

Here, in no sordid poverty,
 And no inglorious ease,
 He braves the world, and can defy
 Its frowns and flatteries.

The little earth he asks, survey :
 Is he not dead, indeed ?
 'Light lie that earth,' good stranger, pray,
 'Nor thorn upon it breed !'

With flowers, fit emblem of his fame,
 Compass your poet round ;
 With flowers of every fragrant name,
 Be his warm ashes crowned !

Hymn—To Light.

First-born of chaos, who so fair didst come
 From the old negro's darksome womb !
 Which when it saw the lovely child,
 The melancholly mass put on kind looks and smil'd.

Thou tide of glory, which no rest dost know,
 But ever ebb, and ever flow !
 Thou golden shower of a true Jove !
 Who does in thee descend, and heav'n to earth make love ! . . .

Say from what golden quivers of the sky,
 Do all thy winged arrows fly ?
 Swiftness and power by birth are thine :
 From thy great sire they came, thy sire the word
 divine. . . .

Swift as light, thoughts their empty carrere run,
 Thy race is finisht, when begun ;
 Let a post-angel start with thee,
 And thou the goal of earth shall reach as soon as
 he. . . .

When, goddess, thou listst up thy wakened head,
 Out of the morning's purple bed,
 Thy quire of birds about thee play,
 And all the joyful world salutes the rising day. . . .

A crimson garment in the rose thou wear'st ;
 • A crown of studded gold thou bear'st ;
 The virgin lillies in their white
 Are clad but with the lawn of almost naked light.

The violet, spring's little infant, stands,
 Girt in thy purple swadling-bands :
 On the fair tulip thou dost dote ;
 Thou cloath'st it in a gay and party-colour'd coat. . . .

Through the soft wayes of heav'n, and air, and sea,
 Which open all their pores to thee,
 Like a clear river thou dost glide,
 And with thy living stream through the close channels slide.

But where firm bodies thy free course oppose,
 Gently thy source the land oreflows ;
 Takes there possession, and does make,
 Of colours mingled, light, a thick and standing lake.

But the vast ocean of unbounded day
 In th' empyrean heaven does stay.
 Thy rivers, lakes, and springs below,
 From thence took first their rise, thither at last must flow.

Cowley holds a distinguished position among the prose writers of this age ; he has been placed at the head of those who cultivated that clear, easy, and natural style which was subsequently employed and improved by Dryden, Tillotson, Sir William Temple, and Addison. Johnson exaggerated the contrast between the excellence of Cowley's prose and the many defects of his poetry—for Johnson bore hard on Cowley as 'almost the last' of the metaphysical poets, though 'undoubtedly the best,' but addicted to artificial conceits and 'lax and lawless versification.' 'No author,' says he, 'ever kept his verse and his prose at a greater distance from each other. His thoughts are natural, and his style has a smooth and placid equability, which has never yet obtained its due commendation. Nothing is far-sought or hard-laboured ; but all is easy without feebleness, and familiar without grossness.' There is also wit and humour, with an occasional touch of satire ; the writer's longing for peace and retirement is a too frequently recurring theme. The prose works of Cowley extend to but sixty folio pages, and consist of Essays (appended to the collected edition of the works in 1668), which treat of Liberty, Solitude, Obscurity, Agriculture, The Garden, Greatness, Avarice, The Dangers of an Honest Man in much Company, The Shortness of Life and Uncertainty of Riches, The Danger of Procrastination, Of My Self, &c. He wrote also (apparently in the year of the Protector's death, though the earliest known printed copy dates from 1661) a Discourse, by way of Vision, concerning the Government of Oliver Cromwell, and a Proposition for the Advancement of Experimental Philosophy (1661).

Of My Self.

It is a hard and nice subject for a man to write of himself. It grates his own heart to say any thing of disparagement, and the reader's ears to hear any thing of praise from him. There is no danger from me of offending him in this kind ; neither my mind, nor my body, nor my fortune, allow me any materials for that vanity. It is sufficient for my own contentment that they have preserv'd me from being scandalous, or remarkable on the defective side. But besides that, I shall here speak of my self only in relation to the subject of these precedent discourses, and shall be likelier thereby to fall into the contempt than rise up to the estimation of most people. As far as my memory can return back into my past life, before I knew or was capable of guessing what the world, or glories, or business of it were, the natural affections of my soul gave me a secret bent of aversion from them, as some plants are said to turn away from others, by an antipathy imperceptible to themselves and inscrutable to man's understanding. Even when I was a very young boy at school, instead of running about on holy-days, and playing with my fellows, I was wont to steal from them, and walk into the fields, either alone with a book, or with some one companion, if I could find any of the same temper. I was then too so much an enemy to all constraint that my masters could never prevail on me by any persuasions or encouragements to learn without book the common rules of grammar ; in which they dispens'd with me alone, because they found I made a shift to do the usual exercise out of my own reading and observation. That I was then of the same mind as I am now (which, I confess, I wonder at my self) may appear by the latter end of an ode, which I made when I was but thirteen years old, and which was then printed with many other verses. The beginning of it is boyish, but of this part which I here set down (if a very little were corrected) I should hardly now be much asham'd.

This only grant me, that my means may lye
 Too low for envy, for contempt too high.

Some honour I would have
 Not from great deeds, but good alone.
 The unknown are better than ill known.

Rumour can ope the grave.
 Acquaintance I would have, but when 't depends
 Not on the number, but the choice of friends.

Books should, not business, entertain the light ;
 And sleep, as undisturb'd as death, the night.

My house a cottage more
 Than palace, and should fitting be
 For all my use, no luxury.

My garden painted o'er
 With Nature's hand, not Art's ; and pleasures yield
 Horace might envy in his Sabine field.

Thus would I double my life's fading space ;
 For he that runs it well, runs twice his race.

And in this true delight,
 These unbought sports, this happy state,
 I would not fear nor wish my fate,

But boldly say each night,
 To morrow let my sun his beams display,
 Or in clouds hide them ; I have liv'd to day.

You may see by it, I was even then acquainted with the poets (for the conclusion is taken out of Horace) ; and perhaps it was the immature and immoderate love of them which stamp'd first, or rather engrav'd these characters in me : they were like letters cut into the bark of a young tree, which with the tree still grow proportionably. But, how this love came to be produc'd in me so early is a hard question : I believe I can tell the particular little chance that filled my head first with such chimes of verse, as have never since left ringing there : for I remember when I began to read, and to take some pleasure in it, there was wont to lye in my mother's parlour (I know not by what accident, for she her self never in her life read any book but of devotion), but there was wont to lye Spencer's works. This I happen'd to fall upon, and was infinitely delighted with the stories of the knights, and giants, and monsters, and brave houses, which I found every where there (tho' my understanding had little to do with all this); and by degrees with the tinkling of the rhyme and dance of the numbers, so that I think I had read him all over before I was twelve years old. . . . With these affections of mind, and my heart wholly set upon letters, I went to the university; but was soon torn from thence by that violent publick storm which would suffer nothing to stand where it did, but rooted up every plant, even from the princely cedars to me the hyssop. Yet I had as good fortune as could have befallen me in such a tempest; for I was cast by it into the family of one of the best persons, and into the court of one of the best princesses in the world. Now tho' I was here engag'd in ways most contrary to the original design of my life, that is, into much company and no small business, and into a daily sight of greatness both militant and triumphant (for that was the state then of the English and French courts), yet all this was so far from altering my opinion, that it only added the confirmation of reason to that which was before but natural inclination. I saw plainly all the paint of that kind of life, the nearer I came to it; and that beauty which I did not fall in love with when for aught I knew it was real, was not like to bewitch or entice me when I saw that it was adulterate. I met with several great persons whom I liked very well, but could not perceive that any part of their greatness was to be lik'd or desir'd, no more than I would be glad or content to be in a storm, tho' I saw many ships which rid safely and bravely in it. A storm would not agree with my stomach, if it did with my courage. Tho' I was in a croud of as good company as could be found any where, tho' I was in business of great and honourable trust, tho' I eat at the best table, and enjoy'd the best conveniences for present subsistence that ought to be desir'd by a man of my condition, in banishment and publick distresses; yet I could not abstain from renewing my old school-boy's wish in a copy of verses to the same effect.

Well then; I now do plainly see
This busie world and I shall ne'er agree, &c.

And I never then propos'd to my self any other advantage from his majesty's happy restoration but the getting into some moderately convenient retreat in the country, which I thought in that case I might easily have compass'd as well as some others, who with no greater probabilities or pretences have arriv'd to extraordinary fortunes: but I had before written a shrewd prophecy against my self, and I think Apollo inspir'd me in the truth though not in the elegance of it:

Thou neither great at court, nor in the war,
Nor at th' Exchange shalt be, nor at the wrangling bar;
Content thy self with the small barren praise,
Which neglected verse does raise, &c.

However by the failing of the forces which I had expected, I did not quit the design which I had resolv'd on; I cast my self into it a corps perdu, without making capitulations or taking counsel of fortune. But God laughs at a man who says to his soul, Take thy ease: I met presently not only with many little incumbrances and impediments, but with so much sickness (a new misfortune to me) as would have spoil'd the happiness of an emperor as well as mine: yet I do neither repent nor alter my course. Non ego perfidum dixi sacramentum [I have not falsely sworn]: nothing shall separate me from a mistress which I have lov'd so long and have now at last marry'd; though she neither has brought me a rich portion nor liv'd yet so quietly with me as I hop'd from her.

*Nec vos dulcissima mundi
Nomina, vos musæ, libertas, otia, libri,
Hortique sylvæque anima remanente reinquam.*

Nor by me e'er shall you,
You of all names the sweetest, and the best,
You muses, books, and liberty and rest;
You gardens, fields, and woods forsaken be,
As long as life it self forsakes not me.

But this is a very petty ejaculation. Because I have concluded all the other chapters with a copy of verses, I will maintain the humour to the last.

The Spring-tides of Public Affairs.

I have often observed, with all submission and resignation of spirit to the inscrutable mysteries of Eternal Providence, that when the fulness and maturity of time is come that produces the great confusions and changes in the world, it usually pleases God to make it appear by the manner of them, that they are not the effects of human force or policy, but of the divine justice and predestination; and though we see a man like that which we call Jack of the clock-house, striking as it were the hour of that fulness of time, yet our reason must needs be convinced that his hand is moved by some secret and, to us who stand without, invisible direction. And the stream of the current is then so violent that the strongest men in the world cannot draw up against it; and none are so weak but they may sail down with it. These are the spring-tides of public affairs which we see often happen, but seek in vain to discover any certain causes. And one man then, by maliciously opening all the sluices that he can come at, can never be the sole author of all this, though he may be as guilty as if really he were, by intending and imagining to be so; but it is God that breaks up the flood-gates of so general a deluge, and all the art then and industry of mankind is not sufficient to raise up dikes and ramparts against it.

From the Essay 'Of Agriculture.'

The three first men in the world were a gardener, a ploughman, and a grazier; and if any man object that the second of these was a murderer, I desire he would consider that as soon as he was so, he quitted our profession and turned builder. It is for this reason, I suppose, that Ecclesiasticus forbids us to hate husbandry; because (says he) the Most High has created it. We were all born to this art, and taught by Nature to nourish our bodies by the same earth out of which they were made, and to which they must return and pay at last for their sustenance. Behold the original and primitive nobility of all those great persons, who are too proud now not only to till the ground, but almost to tread upon it. We may talk what we please of lillies and lions rampant, and spread eagles in fields d'or or d'argent; but if heraldry were guided by reason, a plough in a field arable would be the most noble and ancient arms.

From the Essay 'Of Obscurity.'

What a brave privilege it is to be free from all contentions, from all envying or being env'y'd, from receiving and from paying all kinds of ceremonies! It is, in my mind, a very delightful pastime for two good and agreeable friends to travel up and down together, in places where they are by no body known, nor know any body. It was the case of Æneas and his Achates, when they walk'd invisibly about the fields and streets of Carthage, Venus her self

'A vail of thicken'd air around them cast,
That none might know, or see them as they past.'

VIRG. I Æn.

The common story of Demosthenes's confession that he had taken great pleasure in hearing of a tanker-woman say as he pass'd, This is that Demosthenes, is wonderful ridiculous from so solid an orator. I my self have often met with that temptation to vanity (if it were any), but am so far from finding it any pleasure, that it only makes me run faster from the place, 'till I get, as it were, out of sight-shot. Democritus relates, and in such a manner as if he glory'd in the good fortune and commodity of it, that when he came to Athens no body there did so much as take notice of him; and Epicurus liv'd there very well, that is, lay hid many years in his gardens, so famous since that time, with his friend Metrodorus: after whose death, making in one of his letters a kind commemoration of the happiness which they two had enjoy'd together, he adds at last that he thought it no disparagement to those great felicities of their life, that in the midst of the most talk'd-of and talking country in the world, they had liv'd so long not only without fame, but almost without being heard of. And yet within a very few years afterward there were no two names of men more known or more generally celebrated. If we engage into a large acquaintance and various familiarities, we set open our gates to the invaders of most of our time: we expose our life to a quotidian ague of frigid impertinences, which would make a wise man tremble to think of. Now, as for being known much by sight, and pointed at, I cannot comprehend the honour that lyes in that: whatsoever it be, every mountebank has it more than the best doctor, and the hangman more than the lord chief-justice of a city. Every creature has it both of nature and art, if it be any ways extraordinary. It was as often said, This is that Bucephalus, or, This is that Incitatus, when they were led prancing through the streets, as, This is that Alexander, or, This is that Domitian; and truly for the latter, I take Incitatus to have been a much more honourable beast than his master, and more deserving the consulship than he the empire. I love and commend a true good fame because it is the shadow of virtue, not that it doth any good to the body which it accompanies, but 'tis an efficacious shadow, and like that of St Peter cures the diseases of others. The best kind of glory, no doubt, is that which is reflected from honesty, such as was the glory of Cato and Aristides, but it was harmful to them both, and is seldom beneficial to any man whilst he live; what it is to him after his death I cannot say, because I love not philosophy merely notional and conjectural, and no man who has made the experiment has been so kind as to come back to inform us. Upon the whole matter, I account a person who has a moderate mind and fortune, and lives in the conversation of two or three agreeable friends, with little commerce in the world besides, who is esteem'd well enough by his few neighbours that know him, and is truly irreproachable by any body, and so after a healthful quiet life, before the great inconveniences of old age, goes more silently out of it than he came in (for I would not have him so much as cry in the exit). This innocent deceiver of the world, as Horace calls him, this mula persona, I take to have been more happy in his part than the greatest actors that fill the stage with show and noise, nay even than Augustus himself, who ask'd with his last breath whether he had not play'd his farce very well.

The story of Demosthenes and the 'tanker-woman' (agane ferentis muliercula) is told in Cicero's Tusculana Quaestiones, v. 36.

Procrastination.

I am glad that you approve and applaud my design of withdrawing myself from all tumult and business of the world, and consecrating the little rest of my time to those studies to which nature had so motherly inclin'd me, and from which fortune, like a step-mother, has so long detain'd me. But nevertheless (you say, which but is verugo mera, a rust which spoils the good metal it grows upon. But you say) you would advise me not to precipitate that resolution, but to stay a while longer with patience and complaisance, 'till I had gotten such an estate as might afford me (according to the saying of that person whom you and I love very much, and would believe as soon as another man) cum dignitate otium. This were excellent advice to Joshua, who could bid the sun stay too. But there's no fooling with life, when it is once turn'd beyond forty. The seeking of a fortune then is but a desperate after-game, 'tis a hundred to one if a man fling two sixes and recover all; especially if his hand be no luckier than mine. There is some help for all the defects of fortune, for if a man cannot attain to the length of his wishes, he may have his remedy by cutting of them shorter. Epicurus writes a letter to Idomeneus (who was then a very powerful, wealthy, and, it seems, a bountiful person), to recommend to him, who had made so many men rich, one Pythocles, a friend of his, whom he desir'd might be made a rich man too; but I entreat you that you would not do it just the same way as you have done to many less deserving persons, but in the most gentlemanly manner of obliging him, which is not to add any thing to his estate, but to take something from his desires. The sum of this is, that for the uncertain hopes of some conveniences we ought not to defer the execution of a work that is necessary, especially when the use of those things which we would stay for may otherwise be supply'd, but the loss of time never recover'd: nay farther yet, tho' we were sure to obtain all that we had a mind to, tho' we were sure of getting never so much by continuing the game, yet when the light of life is so near going out, and ought to be so precious, le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle, the play is not worth the expence of the candle: after having been long tost in a tempest, if our masts be standing, and we have still sail and tackling enough to carry us to our port, it is no matter for the want of streamers and top-gallants; utere velis, totos pande sinus. A gentleman in our late civil wars, when his quarters were beaten up by the enemy, was taken prisoner and lost his life afterwards, only by staying to put on a band and adjust his periwig: he would escape like a person of quality or not at all, and dy'd the noble martyr of ceremony and gentility.

Vision of Oliver Cromwell—from the 'Discourse.'

I was interrupted by a strange and terrible apparition ; for there appeared to me (arising out of the earth, as I conceived) the figure of a man taller than a giant, or indeed, than the shadow of any giant in the evening. His body was naked ; but that nakedness adorned or rather deformed all over with several figures, after the manner of the Britons, painted upon it : and I perceived that most of them were the representations of the late battles in our civil wars, and, if I be not much mistaken, it was the battle of Naseby that was drawn upon his breast. His eyes were like burning brass, and there were three crowns of the same metal (as I guessed), and that looked as red-hot too, upon his head. He held in his right-hand a sword that was yet bloody, and nevertheless the motto of it was, Pax queritur bello ['We war for peace']; and in his left-hand a thick book, upon the back of which was written in letters of gold, 'Acts, ordinances, protestations, covenants, engagements, declarations, remonstrances,' &c. Though this sudden, unusual, and dreadful object might have quelled a greater courage than mine ; yet so it pleased God (for there is nothing bolder than a man in a vision) that I was not at all daunted, but asked him resolutely and briefly, 'What art thou?' And he said, 'I am called the North-west Principality, His Highness the Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions belonging thereunto ; for I am that angel to whom the Almighty has committed the government of those three kingdoms, which thou seest from this place.' And I answered and said, 'If it be so, sir, it seems to me that for almost these twenty years past Your Highness has been absent from your charge : for not only if any angel, but if any wise and honest man had, since that time, been our governor, we should not have wandered thus long in these laborious and endless labyrinths of confusion ; but either not have entered at all into them, or at least have returned back before we had absolutely lost our way : but instead of Your Highness we have had since such a protector as was his predecessor Richard the Third to the king his nephew ; for he presently slew the commonwealth, which he pretended to protect, and set up himself in the place of it : a little less guilty indeed in one respect, because the other slew the innocent, and this man did but murder a murderer. Such a protector we have had as we would have been glad to have changed for an enemy, and rather received a constant Turk than this every-month's apostate ; such a protector as man is to his flocks, which he sheers, and sells, or devours himself ; and I would fain know what the wolf, which he protects him from, could do more. Such a protector'—and, as I was proceeding, methought His Highness began to put on a displeased and threatening countenance (as men use to do when their dearest friends happen to be traduced in their company), which gave me the first rise of jealousy against him ; for I did not believe that Cromwell, amongst all his foreign correspondences, had ever held any with angels. However, I was not hardened enough yet to venture a quarrel with him then : and therefore, as I had spoken to the Protector himself in Whitehall, 'I desired him that His Highness would please to pardon me, if I had unwittingly spoken any thing to the disparagement of a person whose relations to His Highness I had not the honour to know.' At which he told me, 'that he had no other concernment for His late Highness, than as he took him to be the greatest man that ever was of the English nation, if not (said he) of the whole world ; which gives me a just title to the defence of his reputation, since I now account myself, as it were, a naturalized English angel, by having had so long the management of the affairs of that country. And pray, countryman (said he very kindly and very flatteringly), for I would not have you fall into the general error of the world, that detests and decries so extraordinary a virtue ; what can be more extraordinary than that a person of mean birth, no fortune, no eminent qualities of body (which have sometimes) or of mind (which have often, raised men to the highest dignities), should have the courage to attempt, and the happiness to succeed in so improbable a design, as the destruction of one of the most ancient, and in all appearance most solidly founded monarchies upon earth ? That he should have the power or boldness to put his prince and master to an open and infamous death : to banish that numerous and strongly allied family : to do all this under the name and wages of a parliament ; to trample upon them too as he pleased, and spurn them out of doors when he grew weary of them ; to raise up a new and unheard-of monster out of their ashes ; to stifle that in the very infancy, and set up himself above all things that ever were called sovereign in England ; to oppress all his enemies by arms, and all his friends afterwards by artifice ; to serve all parties patiently for a while, and to command them victoriously at last ; to overrun each corner of the three nations, and overcome with equal facility both the riches of the south and the poverty of the north ; to be feared and courted by all foreign princes, and adopted a brother to the gods of the earth ; to call together parliaments with a word of his pen, and scatter them again with the breath of his mouth ; to be humbly and daily petitioned to that he would please to be hired, at the rate of two millions a year, to be the master of those who had hired him before to be their servant : to have the estates and lives of three kingdoms as much at his disposal as was the little inheritance of his father, and to be as noble and liberal in the spending of them ; and lastly (for there is no end of all the particulars of his glory), to bequeath all this with one word to his posterity ; to die with peace at home, and triumph abroad ; to be buried among kings, and with more than regal solemnity ; and to leave a name behind him, not to be extinguished but with the whole world ; which, as it is now too little for his praises, so might have been too for his conquests, if the short line of his human life could have been stretched out to the extent of his immortal designs ?'

Even those who do not read Cowley now are familiar—indirectly through Cowper—with Lord Clarendon.

Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, was born 18th February 1608 at Dinton, near Salisbury, third son of a Wiltshire squire. Destined for the Church, he went up to Magdalen Hall in 1622; but the death of his elder brothers having left him the heir, he quitted Oxford for the Middle Temple in 1625. Though he rose in his profession, he loved letters better than law; for his friends he chose such brilliant spirits as Falkland, Ben Jonson, Selden, Hales, and Chillingworth, and, in his own words, 'was never so proud, or thought himself so good a man, as when he was the worst in the company.' He married twice—in 1629, Ann, daughter of Sir George Ayliffe, whose death six months afterwards 'shook all the frame of his resolutions;' next, in 1632, Frances, daughter of Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Master of Requests and of the Mint. She bore him four sons and two daughters; and with her, till her death in 1667, he 'lived very comfortably in the most uncomfortable times, and very joyfully in those times when matter of joy was administered.'

In 1640 he was returned for Wootton-Bassett to the Short Parliament, for Saltash to the Long; and up to the summer of 1641 he acted heartily with the popular party. Then he drew back. Enough, he deemed, had been done; a victorious oligarchy might prove more formidable than a humbled king; nor could he conceive 'a religion without bishops.' Charles's answer to the Grand Remonstrance was of Hyde's composing, as were most of the subsequent able manifestoes; and though in a midnight interview with the king he declined to take St John's post of Solicitor-General, thenceforward he and Falkland and Colepeper formed a veritable privy council. Unhappily they were not allowed to know everything; unfortunately for the king, their advice was not always followed; thus the attempted arrest of the five members had neither their privity nor their approval. Still Hyde headed the royalist opposition in the Commons, till in May 1642 he slipped away and followed Charles into Yorkshire. He witnessed Edgehill, in 1643 was knighted and made Chancellor of the Exchequer, in March 1645 attended the Prince of Wales to the west of England, and with him a twelvemonth later passed on to Scilly and Jersey. In Scilly, on 18th May 1646, he commenced his History; in Jersey he tarried two whole years. From November 1649 till March 1651 he was engaged in a fruitless embassy to Spain; next for nine years he filled the office of a 'Caleb Balderstone' in the needy, greedy, factious little court of Charles II., sometimes with 'neither clothes nor fire to preserve him from the sharpness of the season, and with not three sous in the world to buy a fagot.'

Charles had made him High Chancellor in 1658, and at the Restoration he was confirmed in that dignity, in November 1660 being created Baron Hyde, and in the following April Earl of Clarendon.

To this period belongs the strangest episode in all his Autobiography. In November 1659 his daughter Anne (1638–71), then lady-in-waiting to the Princess of Orange, had entered into a secret marriage-contract with the king's brother, James, Duke of York; and nine months later they were privately married at her father's house. On learning the news, if news indeed it was, he burst into a passion of the coarsest invective against her; yet people fancied that in Catherine of Braganza he purposely selected a barren bride for the king, that so his own daughter might some day come to the throne. Nor as chief Minister was he otherwise popular. A bigoted Churchman, a thorough Conservative, and always a lawyer, he would fain have restored things to the status quo ante bellum. He loved a Papist little better than a sectary, and accordingly would have nothing to do with Charles's toleration. He looked sourly on Charles's vices, yet stooped to impose Charles's mistress on Charles's queen. He could not satisfy the Cavaliers, who contrasted his opulence with their own broken fortunes; he did more than enough to irritate the Puritans. The sale of Dunkirk, the Dutch war, the very Plague and Great Fire, all heightened his unpopularity; and in 1667 he fell an easy unlamented victim to a court cabal. The great seal was taken from him; impeachment for high-treason followed; and quitting the kingdom at Charles's bidding, the old man settled at Montpellier. There and at Moulins he spent nearly six tranquil years; and afterwards from Rouen he sent a last piteous entreaty that Charles would permit him to 'die in his own country and among his own children.' His petition was disregarded, and at Rouen he died 9th December 1674. No monument marks his grave in Westminster Abbey.

Men's estimates of Clarendon have varied widely. Southey calls him 'the wisest, most upright of statesmen;' the Scottish Whig historian, George Brodie, 'a miserable sycophant and canting hypocrite.' The truth lies somewhere between the two verdicts, but Southey's is much the truer of the two. The failings and merits of the statesman are mirrored in his great History of the Rebellion in England (3 vols. 1704–7), with its supplement and continuation, more faulty and less valuable, the History of the Civil War in Ireland (1721), and the Life of Edward, Earl of Clarendon (3 vols. 1759). The publication of the History of the Rebellion in the reign of Queen Anne was an event of some importance in English politics as well as in English letters, since the glowing picture which it unfolded of the Cavalier cause and party is believed to have been one cause of the Tory and Jacobite reaction which brought Harley and St John into power. The original editors of the work were Bishop Smalridge, Dean Aldrich, and Bishop Atterbury, the last of whom successfully defended himself and his colleagues (1731) against Oldmixon's accusation that they had falsified the text. An apology more than a history, a vindication of the author and of Charles I., the History is not, does not profess to be, impartial; it suppresses the truth where the truth seemed unfavourable; and it is grossly inaccurate—the result of a fallible memory. But, Mr Green notwithstanding, it does not ‘by deliberate and malignant falsehood’ pervert the whole action of Clarendon’s adversaries; careless and ungenerous he might be, wilfully dishonest he was not. And though his style is prolix and redundant, though it ‘suffocates us by the length of its periods,’ his splendid stateliness, his narrative skill, his development of motives, and, above all, his marvellous skill in portraiture (shown best in the character of Falkland), have rendered the History an imperishable classic.

Reception of the Liturgy at Edinburgh in 1637.

On the Sunday morning appointed for the work, the Chancellor of Scotland and others of the Council being present in the cathedral church, the dean began to read the Liturgy, which he had no sooner entered upon but a noise and clamour was raised throughout the church, that no voice could be heard distinctly, and then a shower of stones and sticks and cudgels were thrown at the dean’s head. The bishop went up into the pulpit, and from thence put them in mind of the sacredness of the place, of their duty to God and the King; but he found no more reverence, nor was the clamour or disorder less than before. The Chancellor, from his seat, commanded the provost and magistrates of the city to descend from the gallery in which they sat, and by their authority to suppress the riot; which at last with great difficulty they did, by driving the rudest of those who made the disturbance out of the church, and shutting the doors, which gave the dean opportunity to proceed in the reading of the Liturgy, which was not at all intended or hearkened to by those who remained within the church; and if it had, they who were turned out continued their barbarous noise, brake the windows, and endeavoured to break down the doors; so that it was not possible for any to follow their devotions.

When all was done that at that time could be done there, and the Council and magistrates went out of the church to their houses, the rabble followed the bishops with all the opprobrious language they could invent, of bringing in superstition and Popery into the kingdom, and making the people slaves; and were not content to use their tongues, but employed their hands too in throwing dirt and stones at them, and treated the Bishop of Edinburgh (whom they looked upon as most active that way) so rudely that with great difficulty he got into a house after they had torn his habit, and was from thence removed to his own with great hazard of his life. As this was the reception it had in the cathedral, so it fared not better in the other churches in the city, but was entertained with the same hollowing and outcries, and threatening the men whose office it was to read it with the same bitter execrations against bishops and Popery.

Hitherto no person of condition or name appeared, or seemed to countenance this seditious confusion; it was the rabble, of which nobody was named, and, which is more strange, not one apprehended: and it seems the bishops thought it not of moment enough to desire or require any help or protection from the Council; but, without conferring with them or applying themselves to them, they despatched away an express to the King with a full and particular information of all that had passed, and a desire that he would take that course he thought best for the carrying on his service.

Until this advertisement arrived from Scotland, there were very few in England who had heard of any disorders there, or of anything done there which might produce any. The King himself had been always so jealous of the privileges of that his native kingdom (as hath been touched before), and that it might not be dishonoured by a suspicion of having any dependence upon England, that he never suffered any thing relating to that to be debated or so much as communicated to his Privy Council in this (though many of that nation were, without distinction, Councillors of England), but handled all those affairs himself with two or three Scotchmen who always attended in the Court for the business of that kingdom, which was upon the matter still despatched by the sole advice and direction of the Marquis of Hambleton [Hamilton].

And the truth is, there was so little curiosity either in the Court or the country to know any thing of Scotland, or what was done there, that when the whole nation was solicitous to know what passed weekly in Germany and Poland and all other parts of Europe, no man ever inquired what was doing in Scotland, nor had that kingdom a place or mention in one page of any gazette, so little the world heard or thought of that people; and even after the advertisement of this preamble to rebellion, no mention was made of it at the Council-board, but such a despatch made into Scotland upon it as expressed the King’s dislike and displeasure, and obliged the lords of the Council there to appear more vigorously in the vindication of his authority, and suppression of those tumults. But all was too little. That people, after they had once begun, pursued the business vigorously, and with all imaginable contempt of the government; and though in the hubbub of the first day there appeared nobody of name or reckoning, but the actors were really of the dregs of the people, yet they discovered by the countenance of that day that few men of rank were forward to engage themselves in the quarrel on the behalf of the bishops; whereupon more considerable persons every day appeared against them, and, as heretofore in the case of St Paul (Acts xiii. 50), the Jews stirred up the devout and honourable women, the women and ladies of the best quality declared themselves of the party, and with all the reproaches imaginable made war upon the bishops, as introducers of Popery and superstition, against which they avowed themselves to be irreconcilable enemies: and their husbands did not long defer the owning the same spirit; insomuch as within few days the bishops durst not appear in the streets nor in any courts or houses, but were in danger of their lives; and such of the lords as durst be in their company, or seemed to desire to rescue them from violence, had their coaches torn in pieces, and their persons assaulted, insomuch as they were glad to send for some of those great men who did indeed govern the rabble though they appeared not in it, who readily came and redeemed them out of their hands. So that by the time new orders came from England, there was scarce a bishop left in Edinburgh, and not a minister who durst read the Liturgy in any church.

Character of Hampden.

Mr Hampden was a man of much greater cunning, and it may be of the most discerning spirit, and of the greatest address and insinuation to bring any thing to pass which he desired of any man of that time, and who laid the design deepest. He was a gentleman of a good extraction and a fair fortune, who from a life of great pleasure and license had on a sudden retired to extraordinary sobriety and strictness, and yet retained his usual cheerfulness and affability; which, together with the opinion of his wisdom and justice and the courage he had shewed in opposing the ship-money, raised his reputation to a very great height, not only in Buckinghamshire where he lived, but generally throughout the kingdom. He was not a man of many words, and rarely began the discourse, or made the first entrance upon any business that was assumed; but a very weighty speaker, and after he had heard a full debate, and observed how the House was like to be inclined, took up the argument, and shortly and clearly and craftily so stated it that he commonly conducted it to the conclusion he desired; and if he found he could not do that, he was never without the dexterity to divert the debate to another time, and to prevent the determining any thing in the negative which might prove inconvenient in the future. He made so great a show of civility and modesty and humility, and always of mistrusting his own judgment and of esteeming his with whom he conferred for the present, that he seemed to have no opinions or resolutions but such as he contracted from the information and instruction he received upon the discourses of others, whom he had a wonderful art of governing and leading into his principles and inclinations whilst they believed that he wholly depended upon their counsel and advice. No man had ever a greater power over himself or was less the man that he seemed to be, which shortly after appeared to every body when he cared less to keep on the mask.

Character of Lord Falkland.

In this unhappy battle [the first of Newbury] was slain the Lord Viscount Falkland: a person of such prodigious parts of learning and knowledge, of that inimitable sweetness and delight in conversation, of so flowing and obliging a humanity and goodness to mankind, and of that primitive simplicity and integrity of life, that if there were no other brand upon this odious and accursed civil war than that single loss, it must be most infamous and execrable to all posterity.

'Turpe mori post te solo non posse dolore.'

Before this Parliament his condition of life was so happy that it was hardly capable of improvement. Before he came to twenty years of age he was master of a noble fortune, which descended to him by the gift of a grandfather, without passing through his father or mother, who were then both alive, and not well enough contented to find themselves passed by in the descent. His education for some years had been in Ireland, where his father was Lord Deputy; so that when he returned into England to the possession of his fortune, he was unentangled with any acquaintance or friends, which usually grow up by the custom of conversation, and therefore was to make a pure election of his company, which he chose by other rules than were prescribed to the young nobility of that time. And it cannot be denied, though he admitted some few to his friendship for the agreeableness of their natures and their undoubted affection to him, that his familiarity and friendship for the most part was with men of the most eminent and sublime parts, and of untouched reputation in point of integrity; and such men had a title to his bosom.

He was a great cherisher of wit and fancy and good parts in any man, and, if he found them clouded with poverty or want, a most liberal and bountiful patron towards them, even above his fortune; of which in those administrations he was such a dispenser as if he had been trusted with it to such uses, and if there had been the least of vice in his expense, he might have been thought too prodigal. He was constant and pertinacious in whatsoever he resolved to do, and not to be wearied by any pains that were necessary to that end. And therefore, having once resolved not to see London (which he loved above all places) till he had perfectly learned the Greek tongue, he went to his own house in the country, and pursued it with that indefatigable industry that it will not be believed in how short a time he was master of it, and accurately read all the Greek historians.

In this time, his house being within ten miles of Oxford, he contracted familiarity and friendship with the most polite and accurate men of that university, who found such an immenseness of wit, and such a solidity of judgment in him, so infinite a fancy bound in by a most logical ratiocination, such a vast knowledge that he was not ignorant in any thing, yet such an excessive humility as if he had known nothing, that they frequently resorted and dwelt with him as in a college situated in a purer air; so that his house was a university bound in a lesser volume, whither they came not so much for repose as study, and to examine and refine those grosser propositions which laziness and consent made current in vulgar conversation.

Many attempts were made upon him by the instigation of his mother (who was a lady of another persuasion in religion, and of a most masculine understanding, allayed with the passion and infirmities of her own sex) to pervert him in his piety to the Church of England, and to reconcile him to that of Rome; which they prosecuted with the more confidence, because he declined no opportunity or occasion of conference with those of that religion, whether priests or laics, having diligently studied the controversies, and exactly read all or the choicest of the Greek and Latin Fathers, and having a memory so stupendous that he remembered on all occasions whatsoever he read. And he was so great an enemy to that passion and uncharitableness which he saw produced by difference of opinion in matters of religion, that in all those disputations with priests and others of the Roman Church he affected to manifest all possible civility to their persons, and estimation of their parts; which made them retain still some hope of his reduction, even when they had given over offering farther reasons to him to that purpose. But this charity towards them was much lessened, and any correspondence with them quite declined, when by sinister arts they had corrupted his two younger brothers, being both children, and stolen them from his house and transported them beyond seas, and perverted his sisters: upon which occasion he writ two large discourses against the principal positions of that religion, with that sharpness of style and full weight of reason that the Church is deprived of great jewels in the concealment of them, and that they are not published to the world.

He was superior to all those passions and affections which attend vulgar minds, and was guilty of no other ambition than of knowledge, and to be reputed a lover of all good men; and that made him too much a contemner of those arts which must be indulged in the transactions of human affairs. In the last short Parliament he was a burgess in the House of Commons; and from the debates, which were there managed with all imaginable gravity and sobriety, he contracted such a reverence to parliaments that he thought it really impossible that they could ever produce mischief or inconvenience to the kingdom, or that the kingdom could be tolerably happy in the intermission of them. . . .

He had a courage of the most clear and keen temper, and so far from fear that he was not without appetite of danger; and therefore upon any occasion of action he always engaged his person in those troops which he thought by the forwardness of the commanders to be most like to be farthest engaged; and in all such encounters he had about him a strange cheerfulness and companionableness, without at all affecting the execution that attended them; in which he took no delight, but took pains to prevent it where it was not by resistance necessary: insomuch that at Edgehill, when the enemy was routed, he was like to have incurred great peril by interposing to save those who had thrown away their arms, and against whom it may be others were more fierce for their having thrown them away: insomuch as a man might think he came into the field only out of curiosity to see the face of danger, and charity to prevent the shedding of blood. Yet in his natural inclination he acknowledged he was addicted to the profession of a soldier; and shortly after he came to his fortune, and before he came to age, he went into the Low Countries, with a resolution of procuring command, and to give himself up to it; from which he was converted by the complete inactivity of that summer: and so he returned into England, and shortly after entered upon that vehement course of study we mentioned before, till the first alarm from the north; and then again he made ready for the field, and though he received some repulse in the command of a troop of horse, of which he had a promise, he went a volunteer with the Earl of Essex.

From the entrance into this unnatural war, his natural cheerfulness and vivacity grew clouded, and a kind of sadness and dejection of spirit stole upon him which he had never been used to; yet being one of those who believed that one battle would end all differences, and that there would be so great a victory on one side that the other would be compelled to submit to any conditions from the victor (which supposition and conclusion, generally sunk into the minds of most men, prevented the looking after many advantages which might then have been laid hold of) he resisted those indispositions, et in luctu bellum inter remedia erat. But after the King's return from Brainford, and the furious resolution of the two Houses not to admit any treaty for peace, those indispositions which had before touched him grew into a perfect habit of uncheerfulness; and he who had been so exactly unreserved and affable to all men that his face and countenance was always present and vacant to his company, and held any cloudiness and less pleasantness of the visage a kind of rudeness or incivility, became on a sudden less communicable, and thence very sad, pale, and exceedingly affected with the spleen. In his clothes and habit, which he had intended before always with more neatness and industry and expense than is usual to so great a mind, he was now only incurious but too negligent; and in his reception of suitors, and the necessary or casual addresses to his place, so quick and sharp and severe, that there wanted not some men (who were strangers to his nature and disposition) who believed him proud and imperious; from which no mortal man was ever more free. . . .

When there was any overture or hope of peace he would be more erect and vigorous, and exceedingly solicitous to press any thing which he thought might promote it; and sitting amongst his friends, often, after a deep silence and frequent sighs, would, with a shrill and sad accent, ingeminate the word Peace, Peace, and would passionately profess that the very agony of the war, and the view of the calamities and desolation of the war, and the view of the calamities and desolation

the kingdom did and must endure, took his sleep from him, and would shortly break his heart. This made some think, or pretend to think, that he was so much enamoured on peace, that he would have been glad the King should have bought it at any price; which was a most unreasonable calumny; as if a man that was himself the most punctual and precise in every circumstance that might reflect upon conscience or honour could have wished the King to have committed a trespass against either. . . .

In the morning before the battle, as always upon action, he was very cheerful, and put himself into the first rank of the Lord Byron's regiment, who was then advancing upon the enemy, who had lined the hedges on both sides with musketeers; from whence he was shot with a musket on the lower part of the belly, and in the instant falling from his horse, his body was not found till the next morning, till when there was some hope he might have been a prisoner; though his nearest friends, who knew his temper, received small comfort from that imagination. Thus fell that incomparable young man, in the four-and-thirtieth year of his age, having so much despatched the business of life, that the oldest rarely attain to that immense knowledge, and the youngest enter not into the world with more innocence: and whosoever leads such a life need not care upon how short warning it is taken from him.

The Battle of Stratton.

Towards the middle of May, the Earl of Stamford marched into Cornwall, by the north part, with a body of fourteen hundred horse and dragoons, and five thousand four hundred foot by the poll, with a train of thirteen brass ordnance, and a mortar piece, and a very plentiful magazine of victual and ammunition, and every way in as good an equipage as could be provided by men who wanted no money; whilst the King's small forces, being not half the number, and unsupplied with every useful thing, were at Lanson [Launceston]; of whom the enemy had so full a contempt, though they knew they were marching to them, within six or seven miles, that they considered only how to take them after they were dispersed, and to prevent their running into Pendennis Castle to give them further trouble. To which purpose having encamped themselves upon the flat top of a very high hill, to which the ascents were very steep every way, near Stratton, being the only part of Cornwall eminently disaffected to the King's service, they sent a party of twelve hundred horse and dragoons, under the command of Sir George Chudleigh, father to their Major-general, to Bodmin to surprise the high shrief [sheriff], and principal gentlemen of the country; and thereby, not only to prevent the coming up of any more strength to the King's party, but, under the awe of such a power of horse, to make the whole country rise for them. This design, which was not in itself unreasonable, proved fortunate to the King. For his forces which marched from Lanson, with a resolution to fight with the enemy, upon any disadvantage of place or number (which, how hazardous soever, carried less danger with it than retiring into the county, or anything else that was in their power), easily now resolved to assault the camp in the absence of their horse; and with this resolution they marched on Monday the fifteenth of May within a mile of the enemy; being so destitute of all provisions, that the best officers had but a biscuit a man a day, for two days, the enemy looking upon them as their own.

On Tuesday the sixteenth of May, about five of the clock in the morning, they disposed themselves to their work, having stood in their arms all the night. The number of foot was about two thousand four hundred, which they divided into four parts, and agreed on their several provinces. The first was commanded by the Lord Mohun and Sir Ralph Hopton, who undertook to assault the camp on the south side. Next them, on the left hand, Sir John Berkely and Sir Bevil Greenvill were to force their way. Sir Nicholas Slanning and Colonel Trevannion were to assault the north side; and on their left hand, Colonel Thomas Basset, who was Major-general of their foot, and Colonel William Godolphin were to advance with their party; each party having two pieces of cannon to dispose as they found necessary: Colonel John Digby commanding the horse and dragoons, being about five hundred, stood upon a sandy common which had a way to the camp, to take any advantage he could of the enemy, if they charged; otherwise, to be firm as a reserve.

In this manner the fight begun; the King's forces pressing with their utmost vigour those four ways up the hill, and the enemy's as obstinately defending their ground. The fight continued with very doubtful success till towards three of the clock in the afternoon, when word was brought to the chief officers of the Cornish that their ammunition was spent to less than four barrels of powder; which (concealing the defect from the soldiers) they resolved could be only supplied with courage; and therefore, by messengers to one another, they agreed to advance with their full bodies, without making any more shot, till they reached the top of the hill, and so might be upon even ground with the enemy; wherein the officer's courage and resolution was so well seconded by the soldier that they began to get ground in all places, and the enemy, in wonder of the men who out-faced their shot with their swords, to quit their post. Major-general Chudleigh, who order'd the battle, failed in no part of a soldier; and when he saw his men recoil from less numbers, and the enemy in all places gaining the hill upon him, himself advanced, with a good stand of pikes, upon that party which was led by Sir John Berkely and Sir Bevil Greenvill, and charged them so smartly that he put them into disorder; Sir Bevil Greenvill in the shock being borne to the ground, but quickly relieved by his companion, they so reinforced the charge, that having killed most of the assailants and dispersed the rest, they took the Major-general prisoner, after he had behaved himself with as much courage as a man could do. Then the enemy gave ground apace, inso-much as the four parties, growing nearer and nearer as they ascended the hill, between three and four of the clock they all met together upon one ground near the top of the hill, where they embraced with unspeakable joy, each congratulating the other's success, and all acknowledging the wonderful blessing of God; and being there possessed of some of the enemy's cannon, they turned them upon the camp, and advanced together to perfect their victory. But the enemy no sooner understood the loss of their Major-general but their hearts failed them; and being so resolutely pressed, and their ground lost, upon the security and advantage whereof they wholly depended, some of them threw down their arms and others fled; dispersing themselves, and every man shifting for himself, their general, the Earl of Stamford, giving the example, who (having stood at a safe distance all the time of the battle, environed with all the horse, which in small parties, though it is true their whole number was not above six or seven score, might have done great mischief to the several parties of foot, who with so much difficulty scaled the steep hill) as soon as he saw the day lost, and some said sooner, made all imaginable haste to Exciter [Exeter], to prepare them for the condition they were shortly to expect.

Character of Charles I.

But it will not be unnecessary to add the short character of his person, that posterity may know the inestimable loss which the nation then underwent, in being deprived of a prince whose example would have had a greater influence upon the manners and piety of the nation than the most strict laws can have. To speak first of his private qualifications as a man, before the mention of his princely and royal virtues; he was, if ever any, the most worthy of the title of an honest man; so great a lover of justice, that no temptation could dispose him to a wrongful action, except it were so disguised to him that he believed it to be just. He had a tenderness and compassion of nature which restrained him from ever doing a hard-hearted thing; and therefore he was so apt to grant pardon to malefactors, that his judges represented to him the damage and insecurity to the public that flowed from such his indulgence; and then he restrained himself from pardoning either murders or highway robberies, and quickly discerned the fruits of his severity by a wonderful reformation of those enormities. He was very punctual and regular in his devotions; so that he was never known to enter upon his recreations or sports, though never so early in the morning, before he had been at public prayers; so that on hunting-days his chaplains were bound to a very early attendance. And he was likewise very strict in observing the hours of his private cabinet devotions, and was so severe an exactor of gravity and reverence in all mention of religion, that he could never endure any light or profane word in religion, with what sharpness of wit soever it was covered: though he was well pleased and delighted with reading verses made upon any occasion, no man durst bring before him any thing that was profane or unclean; that kind of wit had never any countenance then. He was so great an example of conjugal affection, that they who did not imitate him in that particular did not brag of their liberty: and he did not only permit but direct his bishops to prosecute those scandalous vices in the ecclesiastical courts against persons of eminence and near relation to his service.

His kingly virtues had some mixture and alloy that hindered them from shining in full lustre, and from producing those fruits they should have been attended with. He was not in his nature bountiful, though he gave very much: which appeared more after the duke of Buckingham's death, after which those showers fell very rarely; and he paused too long in giving, which made those to whom he gave less sensible of the benefit. He kept state to the full, which made his Court very orderly, no man presuming to be seen in a place where he had no pretence to be. He saw and observed men long before he received any about his person, and did not love strangers, nor very confident men. He was a patient hearer of causes, which he frequently accustomed himself to at the Council board; and judged very well, and was dexterous in the mediating part; so that he often put an end to causes by persuasion, which the stubbornness of men's humours made dilatory in courts of justice.

He was very fearless in his person, but not enterprising; and had an excellent understanding, but was not confident enough of it; which made him oftentimes change his own opinion for a worse, and follow the advice of a man that did not judge so well as himself. And this made him more irresolute than the conjuncture of his affairs would admit. If he had been of a rougher and more imperious nature, he would have found more respect and duty; and his not applying some severe cures to approaching evils proceeded from the lenity of his nature and the tenderness of his conscience, which in all cases of blood made him choose the softer way, and not hearken to severe counsels, how reasonably soever urged. This only restrained him from pursuing his advantage in the first Scots expedition, when, humanly speaking, he might have reduced that nation to the most slavish obedience that could have been wished. But no man can say he had then many who advised him to it, but to the contrary; by a wonderful indisposition all his Council had had to fighting or any other fatigue. He was always an immoderate lover of the Scottish nation, having not only been born there, but educated by that people, and besieged by them always, having few English about him until he was King; and the major number of his servants being still of those, who he thought could never fail him; and then no man had such an ascendant over him by the lowest and humblest insinuations as duke Hambleton [Hamilton] had.

As he excelled in all other virtues, so in temperance he was so strict that he abhorred all deboshry to that degree that at a great festival solemnity where he once was, when very many of the nobility of the English and Scots were entertained, being told by one who withdrew from thence what vast draughts of wine they drank, and that there was one earl who had drank most of the rest down, and was not himself moved or altered, the King said that he deserved to be hanged; and that earl coming shortly after into the room where his majesty was, in some gaiety, to show how unhurt he was from that battle, the King sent some one to bid him withdraw from his majesty's presence; nor did he in some days after appear before the King.

There were so many miraculous circumstances contributed to his ruin, that men might well think that heaven and earth conspired it, and that the stars designed it. Though he was from the first declension of his power so much betrayed by his own servants that there were very few who remained faithful to him, yet that treachery proceeded not from any treasonable purpose to do him any harm, but from particular and personal animosities against other men. And afterwards, the terror all men were under of the Parliament, and the guilt they were conscious of themselves, made them watch all opportunities to make themselves gracious to those who could do them good; and so they became spies upon their master, and from one piece of knavery were hardened and confirmed to undertake another, till at last they had no hope of preservation but by the destruction of their master. And after all this, when a man might reasonably believe that less than a universal defection of three nations could not have reduced a great King to so ugly a fate, it is most certain that in that very hour when he was thus wickedly murdered in the sight of the sun, he had as great a share in the hearts and affections of his subjects in general, was as much beloved, esteemed, and longed for by the people in general of the three nations, as any of his predecessors had ever been. To conclude: he was the worthiest gentleman, the best master, the best friend, the best husband, the best father, and the best Christian that the age in which he lived had produced. And if he was not the best King, if he was without some parts and qualities which have made some kings great and happy, no other prince was ever unhappy who was possessed of half his virtues and endowments, and so much without any kind of vice.

This unparalleled murder and parricide was committed upon the thirtieth of January, in the year, according to the account used in England, 1648, in the forty and ninth year of his age, and when he had such excellent health, and so great vigour of body, that when his murderers caused him to be opened (which they did; and were some of them present at it with great curiosity) they confessed and declared that no man had ever all his vital parts so perfect and unhurt: and that he seemed to be of so admirable a composition and constitution, that he would probably have lived as long as nature could subsist. His body was immediately carried into a room at Whitehall, where he was exposed for many days to the public view, that all men might know that he was not alive. And he was then embalmed, and put into a coffin, and so carried to St James's, where he likewise remained several days. They who were qualified to order his funeral, declared that he should be buried at Windsor in a decent manner, provided that the whole expense should not exceed five hundred pounds. The Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earls of Southampton and Lindsey, who had been of his bed-chamber, and always very faithful to him, desired those who governed that they might have leave to perform the last duty to their dead master, and to wait upon him to his grave; which, after some pauses, they were permitted to do, with this, that they should not attend the corpse out of the town; since they resolved it should be privately carried to Windsor without pomp or noise, and then they should have timely notice, that if they pleased, they might be at his interment. And accordingly it was committed to four of those servants, who had been by them appointed to wait upon him during his imprisonment, that they should convey the body to Windsor, which they did. And it was that night placed in that chamber which had usually been his bed-chamber: and the next morning it was carried into the great hall, where it remained till the lords came; who arrived there in the afternoon, and immediately went to Colonel Whitchcott, the governor of the castle, and shewed the order they had from the Parliament to be present at the burial, which he admitted. But when they desired that his Majesty might be buried according to the form of the Common Prayer Book, the Bishop of London being present with them to officiate, he expressly, positively, and roughly refused to consent to it; and said it was not lawful; that the Common Prayer Book was put down, and he would not suffer it to be used in that garrison where he commanded; nor could all the reasons, persuasions, and entreaties prevail with him to suffer it. Then they went into the church, to make choice of a place to bury it in. But when they entered into it, which they had been so well acquainted with, they found it so altered and transformed, all tombs, inscriptions, and those landmarks pulled down, by which all men knew every particular place in that church, and such a dismal mutation over the whole, that they knew not where they were: nor was there one old officer that had belonged to it, or knew where the princes had used to be interred. At last there was a fellow of the town who undertook to tell them the place, where, he said, there was a vault, in which King Harry the Eighth and Queen Jane Seymour were interred. As near that place as could conveniently be, they caused the grave to be made. There the King's body was laid without any words, or other ceremonies than the tears and sighs of the few beholders. Upon the coffin was a plate of silver fixt with these words only, 'King Charles, 1648.' When the coffin was put in, the black velvet pall that had covered it was thrown over it, and then the earth thrown in; which the governor stayed to see perfectly done, and then took the keys of the church, which was seldom put to any use.

Execution of Montrose.

As soon as he had ended his discourse he was ordered to withdraw, and after a short space was again brought in, and told by the Chancellor, that he was on the morrow, being the one-and-twentieth of May 1650, to be carried to Edenborough cross, and there to be hanged upon a gallows thirty feet high, for the space of three hours, and then to be taken down, and his head to be cut off upon a scaffold, and hanged on Edenborough tollbooth, and his legs and arms to be hanged up in other public towns of the kingdom, and his body to be buried at the place where he was to be executed, except the Kirk should take off his excommunication, and then his body might be buried in the common place of burial. He desired 'that he might say somewhat to them,' but was not suffered, and so was carried back to the prison.

That he might not enjoy any ease or quiet during the short remainder of his life, their ministers came presently to insult over him with all the reproaches imaginable; pronounced his damnation, and assured him that the judgment he was the next day to undergo was but an easy prologue to that which he was to undergo afterwards. And after many such barbarities, they offered to intercede for him to the Kirk upon his repentance, and to pray with him; but he too well understood the form of their common prayers in those cases to be only the most virulent and insolent imprecations against the persons of those they prayed against ('Lord, vouchsafe yet to touch the obdurate heart of this proud incorrigible sinner, this wicked, perjured, traitorous, and profane person, who refuses to harken to the voice of thy Kirk,' and the like charitable expressions), and therefore he desired them to spare their pains, and to leave him to his own devotions. He told them that they were a miserable, deluded, and deluding people, and would shortly bring that poor nation under the most insupportable servitude ever people had submitted to. He told them he was prouder to have his head set upon the place it was appointed to be than he could have been to have his picture hang in the King's bedchamber: that he was so far from being troubled that his four limbs were to be hanged in four cities of the kingdom; that he heartily wished he had flesh enough to be sent to every city in Christendom, as a testimony of the cause for which he suffered.

The next day they executed every part and circumstance of that barbarous sentence with all the inhumanity imaginable; and he bore it with all the courage and magnanimity, and the greatest piety, that a good Christian could manifest. He magnified the virtue, courage, and religion of the last King, exceedingly commended the justice and goodness and understanding of the present King, and prayed that they might not betray him as they had done his father. When he had ended all he meant to say, and was expecting to expire, they had yet one scene more to act of their tyranny. The hangman brought the book that had been published of his truly heroic actions whilst he had commanded in that kingdom, which book was tied in a small cord that was put about his neck. The marquis smiled at this new instance of their malice, and thanked them for it, and said he was pleased that it should be there, and was prouder of wearing it than ever he had been of the Garter; and so renewing some devout ejaculations, he patiently endured the last act of the executioner.

Thus died the gallant Marquis of Montrose, after he had given as great a testimony of loyalty and courage as a subject can do, and performed as wonderful actions in several battles, upon as great inequality of numbers, and as great disadvantages in respect of arms and other preparations for war, as hath been performed in this age. He was a gentleman of a very ancient extraction, many of whose ancestors had exercised the highest charges under the King in that kingdom, and had been allied to the Crown itself. He was of very good parts, which were improved by a good education: he had always a great emulation, or rather a great contempt of the Marquis of Argyle (as he was too apt to condemn those he did not love), who wanted nothing but honesty and courage to be a very extraordinary man, having all other good talents in a great degree. He was in his nature fearless of danger, and never declined any enterprise for the difficulty of going through with it, but exceedingly affected those which seemed desperate to other men, and did believe somewhat to be in himself which other men were not acquainted with, which made him live more easily towards those who were, or were willing to be, inferior to him, and towards whom he exercised wonderful civility and generosity, than with his superiors or equals. He was naturally jealous, and suspected those who did not concur with him in the way not to mean so well as he. He was not without vanity, but his virtues were much superior, and he well deserved to have his memory preserved and celebrated amongst the most illustrious persons of the age in which he lived.

Escape of Charles II. after the Battle of Worcester.

When the night covered them, he found means to withdraw himself with one or two of his own servants, whom he likewise discharged when it began to be light; and after he had made them cut off his hair, he betook himself alone into an adjacent wood, and relied only upon Him for his preservation who alone could and did miraculously deliver him.

When the darkness of the night was over, after the King had cast himself into that wood, he discerned another man, who had gotten upon an oak in the same wood, near the place where the King had rested himself, and had slept soundly. The man upon the tree had first seen the King, and knew him, and came down from the tree to him, and was known to the King, being a gentleman of the neighbour county of Staffordshire, who had served his late majesty during the war, and had now been one of the few who resorted to the King after his coming to Worcester. His name was Carelesse, who had had a command of foot, above the degree of a captain, under the Lord Loughborough. He persuaded the King, since it could not be safe for him to go out of the wood, and that as soon as it should be fully light, the wood itself would probably be visited by those of the country, who would be searching to find those whom they might make prisoners, that he would get up into that tree where he had been, where the boughs were so thick with leaves that a man would not be discovered there without a narrower inquiry than people usually make in places which they do not suspect. The King thought it good counsel, and with the other's help climbed into the tree, and then helped his companion to ascend after him, where they sat all that day, and securely saw many who came purposely into the wood to look after them, and heard all their discourse, how they would use the King himself if they could take him. This wood was either in or upon the borders of Staffordshire; and though there was a highway near one side of it, where the King had entered into it, yet it was large, and all other sides of it opened amongst enclosures, and it pleased God that Carelesse was not unacquainted with the neighbour villages. And it was part of the King's good fortune that this gentleman was a Roman Catholic, and thereby was acquainted with those of that profession of all degrees: and it must never be denied that those of that faith, that is, some of them, had a very great share in his majesty's preservation.

The day being spent in the tree, it was not in the King's power to forget that he had lived two days with eating very little, and two nights with as little sleep; so that when the night came he was willing to make some provision for both: so that he resolved, with the advice and assistance of his companion, to leave his blessed tree; so when the night was dark, they walked through the wood into those enclosures which were farthest from any highway, and making a shift to get over hedges and ditches, and after walking at least eight or nine miles, which were the more grievous to the King by the weight of his boots (for he could not put them off when he cut off his hair, for want of shoes), before morning they came to a poor cottage, the owner whereof, being a Roman Catholic, was known to Carelesse. He was called up, and as soon as he knew one of them he easily concluded in what condition they both were, and presently carried them into a little barn full of hay, which was a better lodging than he had for himself. But when they were there, and had conferred with their host of the news and temper of the country, it was resolved that the danger would be the greater if they stayed together; and, therefore, that Carelesse should presently be gone, and should, within two days, send an honest man to the King, to guide him to some other place of security; and in the mean time his majesty should stay upon the hay-mow. The poor man had nothing for him to eat, but promised him good butter-milk the next morning; and so he was once more left alone, his companion, how weary soever, departing from him before day; the poor man of the house knowing no more than that he was a friend of the captain's, and one of those who had escaped from Worcester. The King slept very well in his lodging, till the time that his host brought him a piece of bread and a great pot of butter-milk, which he thought the best food he ever had eaten. . . .

After he had rested upon this hay-mow and fed upon this diet two days and two nights, in the evening before the third night another fellow, a little above the condition of his host, came to the house, sent from Carelesse, to conduct the King to another house, more out of any road near which any part of the army was like to march. It was above twelve miles that he was to go, and was to use the same caution he had done the first night, not to go in any common road, which his guide knew well how to avoid. Here he new dressed himself, changing clothes with his landlord, and putting on those which he usually wore: he had a great mind to have kept his own shirt, but he considered that men are not sooner discovered by any mark in disguises than by having fine linen in ill clothes; and so he parted with his shirt too, and took the same his poor host had then on. Though he had foreseen that he must leave his boots, and his landlord had taken the best care he could to provide an old pair of shoes, yet they were not easy to him when he first put them on, and in a short time after grew very grievous to him. In this equipage he set out from his first lodging in the beginning of the night, under the conduct of his comrade, who guided him the nearest way, crossing over hedges and ditches, that they might be in least danger of meeting passengers. This was so grievous a march, and he was so tired, that he was even ready to despair, and to prefer being taken and suffered to rest, before purchasing his safety at that price. His shoes had, after the walking a few miles hurt him so much that he had thrown them away, and walked the rest of the way in his ill stockings, which were quickly worn out; and his feet, with the thorns in getting over hedges, and with the stones in other places, were so hurt and wounded, that he many times cast himself upon the ground, with a desperate and obstinate resolution to rest there till the morning, that he might shift with less torment, what hazard soever he run. But his stout guide still prevailed with him to make a new attempt, sometimes promising that the way should be better, and sometimes assuring him that he had but little further to go; and in this distress and perplexity, before the morning they arrived at the house designed, which though it was better than that which he had left, his lodging was still in the barn, upon straw instead of hay, a place being made as easy in it as the expectation of a guest could dispose it. Here he had such meat and porridge as such people use to have, with which, but especially with the butter and the cheese, he thought himself well feasted; and took the best care he could to be supplied with other, little better, shoes and stockings; and after his feet were enough recovered that he could go, he was conducted from thence to another poor house, within such a distance as put him not to much trouble; for having not yet in his thought which way or by what means to make his escape, all that was designed was only by shifting from one house to another to avoid discovery; and being now in that quarter which was more inhabited by the Roman Catholics than most other parts in England, he was led from one to another of that persuasion, and concealed with great fidelity. But he then observed that he was never carried to any gentleman's house, though that country was full of them, but only to poor houses of poor men, which only yielded him rest, with very unpleasant sustenance; whether there was more danger in those better houses, in regard of the resort and the many servants, or whether the owners of great estates were the owners likewise of more fears and apprehensions.

Within few days, a very honest and discreet person, one Mr Hurlestone [Huddleston], a Benedictine monk, who attended the service of the Catholics in those parts, came to him, sent by Carelesse, and was a very great assistance and comfort to him. And when the places to which he carried him were at too great a distance to walk, he provided him a horse, and more proper habit than the rags he wore. This man told him that the Lord Wilmott lay concealed likewise in a friend's house of his, which his majesty was very glad of, and wished him to contrive some means how they might speak together, which the other easily did; and within a night or two brought them into one place. Wilmott told the King that he had by very good-fortune fallen into the house of an honest gentleman, one Mr Lane, a person of an excellent reputation for his fidelity to the King, but of so universal and general a good name, that, though he had a son who had been a colonel in the King's service during the late war, and was then upon his way with men to Worcester the very day of the defeat, men of all affections in the country and of all opinions paid the old man a very great respect; that he had been very civilly treated there; and that the old gentleman had used some diligence to find out where the King was, that he might get him to his house, where he was sure he could conceal him till he might contrive a full deliverance. . . . And so they two went together to Mr Lane's house [Bentley Hall], where the King found he was welcome, and conveniently accommodated in such places as in a large house had been provided to conceal the persons of malignants, or to preserve goods of value from being plundered; where he lodged and ate very well, and began to hope that he was in present safety. Wilmott returned under the care of the monk, and expected summons when any farther motion should be thought to be necessary.

In this station the King remained in quiet and blessed security many days, receiving every day information of the general consternation the kingdom was in, out of the apprehension that his person might fall into the hands of his enemies, and of the great diligence they used in inquiry for him. He saw the proclamation that was issued out and printed, in which a thousand pounds were promised to any man who would deliver and discover the person of Charles Steward [Stuart], and the penalty of high treason declared against those who presumed to harbour or conceal him: by which he saw how much he was beholden to all those who were faithful to him. It was now time to consider how he might find himself near the sea, from whence he might find some means to transport himself. . . .

Mr Lane had a niece, or very near kinswoman, who was married to a gentleman, one Mr Norton, a person of eight or nine hundred pounds per annum, who lived within four or five miles of Bristol, which was at least four or five days' journey from the place where the King then was, but a place most to be wished for the King to be in, because he did not only know all that country very well, but knew many persons very well to whom, in an extraordinary case, he durst make himself known. It was hereupon resolved that Mrs Lane should visit this cousin, who was known to be of good affections, and that she should ride behind the King, who was fitted with clothes and boots for such a service, and that a servant of her father's, in his livery, should wait upon her. A good house was easily pitched upon for the first night's lodging, where Wilmott had notice given him to meet. And in this equipage the King begun his journey, the colonel keeping him company at a distance, with a hawk upon his fist, and two or three spaniels, which, where there were any fields at hand, warranted him to ride out of the way, keeping his company still in his eye, and not seeming to be of it. And in this manner they came to their first night's lodging; and they need not now to contrive to come to their journey's end about the close of the evening, for it was now in the month of October far advanced, that the long journeys they made could not be despatched sooner. Here the Lord Wilmott found them, and their journeys being then adjusted, he was instructed where he should be every night; and so they were seldom seen together in the journey, and rarely lodged in the same house at night. And in this manner the colonel hawked two or three days, till he had brought them within less than a day's journey of Mr Norton's house, and then he gave his hawk to the Lord Wilmott, who continued the journey in the same exercise. . . .

They came to Mr Norton's house sooner than usual, and it being on a holyday, they saw many people about a bowling-green that was before the door; and the first man the King saw was a chaplain of his own, who was allied to the gentleman of the house, and was sitting upon the rails to see how the bowlers played. So that William, by which name the King went, walked with his horse into the stable, until his mistress could provide for his retreat. Mrs Lane was very welcome to her cousin, and was presently conducted to her chamber, where she no sooner was, than she lamented the condition of a good youth who came with her, and whom she had borrowed of his father to ride before her, who was very sick, being newly recovered of an ague; and desired her cousin that a chamber might be provided for him, and a good fire made, for that he would go early to bed, and was not fit to be below stairs. A pretty little chamber was presently made ready, and a fire prepared, and a boy sent into the stable to call William, and to shew him his chamber; who was very glad to be there, freed from so much company as was below. . . . When it was supper-time, there being broth brought to the table, Mrs Lane filled a little dish, and desired the butler, who waited at the table, to carry that dish of porridge to William, and to tell him that he should have some meat sent to him presently. The butler carried the porridge into the chamber, with a napkin and spoon and bread, and spake kindly to the young man, who was willing to be eating. And the butler, looking narrowly upon him, fell upon his knees, and with tears told him he was glad to see his majesty. The King was infinitely surprised, yet recollected himself enough to laugh at the man, and to ask him what he meant. The man had been falconer to Tom Jermin, and made it appear that he knew well enough to whom he spake, repeating some particulars which the King had not forgot. Whereupon the King conjured him not to speak of what he knew, so much as to his master, though he believed him a very honest man. The fellow promised, and faithfully kept his word; and the King was the better waited upon during the time of his abode there. . . .

After some days' stay here, and communication between the King and the Lord Wilmott by letters, the King came to know that Colonel Francis Windham lived within little more than a day's journey of the place where he was, of which he was very glad. . . . At the place of meeting they rested only one night, and then the King went to the colonel's house, where he rested many days, whilst Colonel Windham projected at what place the King might embark, and how they might procure a vessel to be ready there; which was not easy to find, there being so great caution in all the ports, and so great a fear possessing those who were honest, that it was hard to procure any vessel that was outward-bound to take in any passenger.

There was a gentleman, one Mr Ellison, who lived near Lyme in Dorsetshire, and who was well known to Colonel Windham, having been a captain in the King's army, and was still looked upon as a very honest man. With him the colonel consulted how they might get a vessel to be ready to take in a couple of gentlemen, friends of his, who were in danger to be arrested, and transport them into France. Though no man would ask who the persons were, yet every man suspected who they were; at least they concluded that it was some of Worcester party. Lyme was generally as malicious and disaffected a town to the King's interest as any town in England could be, yet there was in it a master of a bark of whose honesty this captain was very confident. This man was lately returned from France, and had unladen his vessel, when Ellison asked him when he would make another voyage, and he answered: 'As soon as he could get loading for his ship.' The other asked, 'whether he would undertake to carry over a couple of gentlemen, and land them in France, if he might be as well paid for his voyage as he used to be when he was freighted by the merchants;' in conclusion, he told him he should receive fifty pounds for his fare. The large recompense had that effect, that the man undertook it; though he said he must make his provision very secretly, for that he might be well suspected for going to sea again without being freighted after he was so newly returned. Colonel Windham, being advertised of this, came, together with the Lord Wilmott, to the captain's house, from whence the lord and the captain rode to a house near Lyme, where the master of the bark met them; and the Lord Wilmott being satisfied with the discourse of the man and his wariness, and foreseeing suspicions which would arise, it was resolved that on such a night, which upon consideration of the tides was agreed upon, the man should draw out his vessel from the pier, and being at sea should come to such a point about a mile from the town, where his ship should remain upon the beach when the water was gone, which would take it off again about break of day the next morning. There was very near that point, even in the view of it, a small inn, kept by a man who was reputed honest, to which the cavaliers of the country often resorted; and London road passed that way, so that it was seldom without company. Into that inn the two gentlemen were to come in the beginning of the night, that they might put themselves on board. And all things being thus concerted, and good earnest given to the master, the Lord Wilmott and the colonel returned to the colonel's house, about a day's journey from the place, the captain undertaking every day to look that the master should provide, and if any thing fell out contrary to expectation, to give the colonel notice at such a place, where they intended the King should be the day before he was to embark.

The King, being satisfied with these preparations, came at the time appointed to that house where he was to hear that all went as it ought to do; of which he received assurance from the captain, who found that the man had honestly put his provisions on board and had his company ready, which were but four men, and that the vessel should be drawn out that night; so that it was fit for the two persons to come to the aforesaid inn; and the captain conducted them within sight of it, and then went to his own house, not distant a mile from it; the colonel remaining still at the house where they had lodged the night before, till he might hear the news of their being embarked.

They found many passengers in the inn, and so were to be contented with an ordinary chamber, which they did not intend to sleep long in, but as soon as there appeared any light, Wilmott went out to discover the bark, of which there was no appearance. In a word, the sun rose, and nothing like a ship in view. They sent to the captain, who was as much amazed; and he sent to the town, and his servant could not find the master of the bark, which was still in the pier. They suspected the captain, and the captain suspected the master. However, it being past ten of the clock, they concluded it was not fit for them to stay longer there, and so they mounted their horses again to return to the house where they had left the colonel, who they knew resolved to stay there till he were assured that they were gone.

The truth of the disappointment was this. The man meant honestly, and had made all things ready for his departure; and the night he was to go out with his vessel he had stayed in his own house, and slept two or three hours; and the time of the tide being come that it was necessary to be on board, he took out of a cupboard some linen and other things which he used to carry with him to sea. His wife had observed that he had been for some days fuller of thoughts than he used to be, and that he had been speaking with seamen who used to go with him, and that some of them had carried provisions on board the bark; of which she had asked her husband the reason; who had told her that he was promised freight speedily, and therefore he would make all things ready. She was sure that there was yet no lading in the ship, and therefore when she saw her husband take all those materials with him, which was a sure sign that he meant to go to sea, and it being late in the night, she shut the door, and swore he should not go out of his house. He told her he must go, and was engaged to go to sea that night, for which he should be well paid. His wife told him she was sure he was doing somewhat that would undo him, and she was resolved he should not go out of his house; and if he should persist in it, she would call the neighbours, and carry him before the mayor to be examined, that the truth might be found out. The poor man, thus mastered by the passion and violence of his wife, was forced to yield to her, that there might be no farther noise, and so went into his bed.

And it was very happy that the King's jealousy hastened him from that inn. It was the solemn fast day, which was observed in those times principally to inflame the people against the King and all those who were loyal to him; and there was a chapel in that village and over against that inn, where a weaver, who had been a soldier, used to preach, and utter all the villainy imaginable against the order of government: and he was then in the chapel preaching to his congregation when the King went from thence, and telling the people that Charles Steward was lurking somewhere in that country, and that they would merit from God Almighty if they could find him out. The passengers who had lodged in the inn that night had, as soon as they were up, sent for a smith to visit their horses, it being a hard frost. The smith, when he had done what he was sent for, according to the custom of that people, examined the feet of the other two horses, to find more work. When he had observed them, he told the host of the house that one of those horses had travelled far, and that he was sure that his four shoes had been made in four several counties; which, whether his skill was able to discover or no, was very true. The smith going to the sermon told this story to some of his neighbours, and so it came to the ears of the preacher when his sermon was done. And immediately he sent for an officer, and searched the inn, and inquired for those horses; and being informed that they were gone, he caused horses to be sent to follow them, and to make inquiry after the two men who rode those horses, and positively declared that one of them was Charles Steward.

When they came again to the colonel, they presently concluded that they were to make no longer stay in those parts, nor any more to endeavour to find a ship upon that coast; and so, without farther delay, they rode back to the colonel's house, where they arrived in the night. Then they resolved to make their next attempt more southward, in Hampshire and Sussex.

Character of Oliver Cromwell.

He was one of those men quos vituperare ne inimici quidem possunt nisi ut simul laudent; for he could never have done half that mischief without great parts of courage and industry and judgment. And he must have had a wonderful understanding in the natures and humours of men, and as great a dexterity in the applying them, who from a private and obscure birth (though of a good family), without interest or estate, alliance or friendship, could raise himself to such a height, and compound and knead such opposite and contradictory tempers, humours, and interests into a consistence that contributed to his designs and to their own destruction; whilst himself grew insensibly powerful enough to cut off those by whom he had climbed, in the instant that they projected to demolish their own building. What Velleius Paterculus said of Cinna may very justly be said of him, Ausum eum quæ nemo auderet bonus; perfecisse quæ a nullo nisi fortissimo perfici possent. Without doubt, no man with more wickedness ever attempted any thing, or brought to pass what he desired more wickedly, more in the face and contempt of religion and moral honesty; yet wickedness as great as his could never have accomplished those trophies without the assistance of a great spirit, an admirable circumspection and sagacity, and a most magnanimous resolution. When he appeared first in the Parliament, he seemed to have a person in no degree gracious, no ornament of discourse, none of those talents which use to reconcile the affections of the standers-by: yet as he grew into place and authority, his parts seemed to be renewed, as if he had concealed faculties till he had occasion to use them; and when he was to act the part of a great man, he did it without any indecency, through the want of custom.

After he was confirmed and invested Protector by 'The humble Petition and Advice,' he consulted with very few upon any action of importance, nor communicated any enterprise he resolved upon with more than those who were to have principal parts in the execution of it; nor to them sooner than was absolutely necessary. What he once resolved, in which he was not rash, he would not be dissuaded from, nor endure any contradiction of his power and authority, but extorted obedience from them who were not willing to yield it. . . . Thus he subdued a spirit that had been often troublesome to the most sovereign power, and made Westminster Hall as obedient and subservient to his commands as any of the rest of his quarters. In all other matters which did not concern the life of his jurisdiction, he seemed to have great reverence for the law, and rarely interposed between party and party. And as he proceeded with this kind of indignation and haughtiness with those who were refractory and dared to contend with his greatness, so towards those who complied with his good pleasure and courted his protection, he used a wonderful civility, generosity, and bounty.

To reduce three nations, which perfectly hated him, to an entire obedience to all his dictates; to awe and govern those nations by an army that was indevoted to him and wished his ruin, was an instance of a very prodigious address. But his greatness at home was but a shadow of the glory he had abroad. It was hard to discover which feared him most, France, Spain, or the Low Countries, where his friendship was current at the value he put upon it. And as they did all sacrifice their honour and their interest to his pleasure, so there is nothing he could have demanded that either of them would have denied him. . . . He was not a man of blood, and totally declined Machiavell's method, which prescribes upon any alteration of a government, as a thing absolutely necessary, to cut off all the heads of those, and extirpate their families, who are friends to the old one. And it was confidently reported that in the council of officers it was more than once proposed that there might be a general massacre of all the royal party, as the only expedient to secure the government, but Cromwell would never consent to it; it may be, out of too great a contempt of his enemies. In a word, as he had all the wickednesses against which damnation is denounced, and for which hell-fire is prepared, so he had some virtues which have caused the memory of some men in all ages to be celebrated; and he will be looked upon by posterity as a brave bad man.

The best edition of the History is that by W. Dunn Macray (6 vols. Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1888). There are also twenty-five essays by Clarendon, his Contemplations on the Psalms (begun in 1647, and finished, like the Life, during his second exile), several controversial writings, and 3 vols. of his State Papers (1767-86; calendared, 1872-76). See Ranke's able analysis of the History; the Hon. Agar-Ellis's Historical Inquiry respecting the Character of Clarendon (1827); Lady Theresa Lewis's Lives of the Friends and Contemporaries of Clarendon (3 vols. 1852); Lives of Clarendon by T. H. Lister (1838), and Sir H. Craik (1911); J. R. Henslowe's Anne Hyde (1915); and Gardiner's History of the Great Civil War (1886-91).

Sir Matthew Hale (1609-76), one of the most upright of judges, acquired credit also by his writings. He avoided identifying himself with either party in the Civil War, and was a judge both during the Commonwealth and under Charles II.; he was appointed Chief-Justice of the King's Bench eleven years afterwards. Amidst the corruptions of Charles II.'s reign, Sir Matthew Hale stands out with peculiar lustre as an impartial, incorruptible, and determined administrator of justice; and he sought to mitigate the severity of such laws as the Conventicle Act. Yet one of his most notable acts was the condemnation of two old women accused of witchcraft at Bury St Edmunds in 1662—for he was a devout believer in witches. His works bear on natural philosophy, divinity, and law—on gravitation, the Torricellian experiment, The Pleas of the Crown, The Primitive Origination of Mankind. Several of his works were published after his death; many of his MSS. were never printed. His best-known work, the Contemplations, Moral and Divine—meditations or discourses of the chief end of man, of contentation, of humility, of afflictions, of the great audit, and the like, with two devotional poems—was in the press at his death. The letter of advice to his children, of which the following is part, was written about the year 1662:

On Speech.

CHILDREN—I thank God I came well to Farrington this Saturday, about five of the clock, and because I have some leisure time at my inn, I could not spend that time more to my own contentment, and your benefit, than by my letter to give you all good Counsel: the subject whereof, at this time, shall be concerning Speech; because much of the good or evil that befalls persons doth occasionally happen by the well or ill managing of that part of human conversation.—I shall, as I have leisure and opportunity, at other times, give you my directions concerning other subjects.

And herein I shall advise you, First, how you are to entertain the Speeches of others, according to the divers varieties thereof. Secondly, how you are to manage and order your own Speech. . . . Now, as concerning your own Speech, and how you are to manage it, something may be collected out of what goes before; but I shall add some things else.

Let your Speech be true. Never speak any thing for a Truth which you know or believe to be false: it is a great sin against God, that gave you a tongue to speak your mind, and not to speak a lie: it is a great offence against Humanity itself; for where there is no truth, there can be no safe society between man and man:

and it is an injury to the speaker, for besides the base disreputation it casts upon him, it doth in time bring a man to that baseness of mind, that he can scarce tell how to tell truth, or to avoid lying, even when he hath no colour of necessity for it; and in time, he comes to such a pass, that as another man cannot believe he tells a truth, so he himself scarce knows when he tells a lie. And observe it, a Lie ever returns, with discovery and shame at the last.

As you must be careful not to lie, so you must avoid coming near it. You must not equivocate: you must not speak that absolutely which you have but by hearsay or relation: you must not speak that as upon knowledge which you have but by conjecture or opinion only. . . . Be not over-earnest, loud, or violent in Talking, for it is unseemly; and earnest and loud talking make you overshoot and lose your business: when you should be considering and pondering your thoughts, and how to express them significantly and to the purpose, you are striving to keep your tongue going, and to silence an opponent, not with reason but with noise.

Be careful not to interrupt another in his talk. Hear him out: you will understand him the better, and be able to give him the better answer. It may be, if you will give him leave, he will say somewhat more than you have yet heard or well understood, or that which you did not expect.

Always, before you speak, especially where the business is of moment, consider before-hand; weigh the sense of your mind which you intend to utter; think upon the expressions you intend to use, that they be significant, pertinent, and inoffensive: and whereas it is the ordinary course of inconsiderate persons to speak their words, and then to think; or not to think till they speak; think first, and speak after, if it be in any matter of moment or seriousness. . . . Avoid swearing in your ordinary communication, unless called to it by the magistrate: and not only the grosser oaths, but the lesser; and not only oaths, but imprecations, earnest and deep protestations. As you have the commendable example of good men to justify a solemn oath before a magistrate, so you have the precept of our Saviour forbidding it otherwise. . . . If there be occasion for you to speak in any company, always be careful, if you speak at all, to speak latest; especially if strangers are in company: for by this means you will have the advantage of knowing the sense, judgment, temper, and relations of others, which may be a great light and help to you in ordering your speech; and you will better know the inclination of the company, and speak with more advantage and acceptance, and with more security against giving offence. . . .

I have but little more to write at this time, but to wish and command you to remember my former counsels that I have often given you. Begin and end the day with private prayers to God, upon your knees; read the Scriptures, often and seriously; be attentive to the public worship of God in the church; keep yourselves still in some good employment; for idleness is the devil's opportunity, and the nursery of vain and sinful thoughts, which corrupt the mind and disorder the life. Let the Girls take care of such business of my family as is proper for them; and their recreations may be walking abroad in the fields, in fair or frosty mornings, some work with their needle, reading of history or herbals, setting of flowers or herbs, practising their music, and such innocent and harmless exercises. Let the Boys be diligent at their books, and when they have performed their tasks, I do not deny them such recreations as may be healthy, safe, and harmless. Be you all kind and loving one to another, honouring your minister, not bitter or harsh to my servants. Be respectful to all. Bear my absence patiently, cheerfully, and faithfully. Do all things as if I were present among you, and beheld you; for you have a greater Father than I am, that always and in all places beholds you, and knows your hearts and thoughts. Study to requite the love and care and expense of your father for you, with dutifulness, observance, and obedience to him; and account it an honour that God hath given you an opportunity, in my absence, by your care, faithfulness, and industry, to pay some part of that debt that by the laws of nature and gratitude you owe unto me. Be frugal in my family, but let there be no want: provide conveniently for the poor that come to my door. And I pray God to fill all your hearts with his grace, fear, and love; and to let you see the advantage and comfort of serving him; and that his blessing, and presence, and comfort, and direction, and providence be with you and over you all.—I am your ever loving father,

MATTHEW HALE.

Richard Baxter (1615–91), born at Rowton, in Shropshire, was educated chiefly at the endowed school of Wroxeter, leaving with some Latin, a smattering of Greek, no Hebrew, and no mathematics. 'My faults,' he said, 'are no disgrace to any university, for I was of none; I have little but what I had out of books, and inconsiderable helps of country tutors. Weakness and pain helped me to study how to die; that set me on studying how to live.' In 1638 he was ordained, and was appointed master of the Free School of Dudley. From 1640 to 1642 he was pastor of Kidderminster, beloved and revered. During the Civil War he sided with the Parliament, and as chaplain in the army was present at the sieges of Bridgwater, Exeter, Bristol, and Worcester. He was disgusted with extreme views, political and religious, and vehement disputes about liberty of conscience, and was glad to leave the army and return to his old parishioners of Kidderminster, amongst whom, in spite of feeble health, he laboured with great success for fourteen years. Whilst there, during his recovery from a severe illness, he wrote his work The Saints' Everlasting Rest (1650). When Cromwell assumed the supreme power Baxter openly expressed his disapprobation, and in a conference with the Protector told him that 'the honest people of the land took their ancient monarchy to be a blessing and not an evil.' He was always opposed to intolerance. 'We intended not,' he said, 'to dig down the banks, or pull up the hedge, and lay all waste and common, when we desired the prelates' tyranny might cease.' Presbyterian though he was, he was not hostile to a modified Episcopacy. After the Restoration he was appointed one of the royal chaplains, but, like Owen, refused a bishopric offered him by Clarendon. The Act of Uniformity in 1662 drove him out of the Established Church, and he retired to Acton, in Middlesex, where, in spite of hardship and persecution, he spent several years in study and literary labour. The Act of Indulgence in 1672 allowed him to settle in London and divide his time between preaching and writing. In 1685 he published a Paraphrase on the New Testament, a practical treatise, in which certain passages were held to be seditious, and Baxter was tried and condemned by the infamous Jeffreys. When Baxter endeavoured to speak, 'Richard! Richard!' ejaculated the Judge, 'dost thou think we'll hear thee poison the court? Richard, thou art an old fellow, an old knave; thou hast written books enough to load a cart. Hadst thou been whipt out of thy writing trade forty years ago, it had been happy.' He was sentenced to pay five hundred marks, and in default to be imprisoned in the King's Bench until it was paid. Through the generous exertions of a Catholic peer, Lord Powis, the fine was remitted, and after eighteen months' imprisonment Baxter was set at liberty. He had now five years of tranquillity, dying 'in great peace and joy' on the 8th of December 1691.

Baxter was one of the most eloquent and moving preachers of his time, and a most voluminous writer; he wrote, Orme reports, no less than one hundred and sixty-eight separate works or publications, from folios to pamphlets. His practical treatises are still read and republished, especially his Saints' Everlasting Rest (1650) and Call to the Unconverted (1657)—the latter so popular that twenty thousand copies have been sold in one year. His Life of Faith (1670), Reasons of the Christian Religion (1672), Christian Directory (1675), are only less well known. His Catholic Theology (1675) and Methodus Theologiæ Christianæ (1681) are controversial works on religious subjects. In 1696 appeared the Reliquiæ Baxterianæ: Mr Richard Baxter's Narrative of the most Memorable Passages of his Life and Times, an autobiography which, like Baxter's writings generally, was a favourite book with Dr Johnson. In the next century it had no less warm an admirer in Coleridge, who terms it 'an inestimable work;' adding, 'I may not unfrequently doubt Baxter's memory, or even his competence, in consequence of his particular modes of thinking; but I could almost as soon doubt the Gospel verity as his veracity.' Another Churchman, Isaac Barrow, said that 'his practical writings were never mended, and his controversial seldom confuted.' His catholicity and tolerance led some to upbraid him as an Arminian, while others denounced him as a Calvinist. Though a keen controversialist, he was a singularly large-hearted man: he had come, he said in 1675, after a lifetime of study, to 'perceive that most of the doctrinal controversies among Protestants are far more about equivocal words than matter; and it wounded my soul to perceive what work both tyrannical and unskilful disputing clergymen had made these thirteen hundred years in the world!' Of his Poetical Fragments the best known is the hymn, 'Lord, it belongs not to my care,' still a favourite; the great physicist, Professor Clerk-Maxwell, used often to repeat it. The following extracts are all from his Reliquiæ:

The Country Clergy in 1620.

We lived in a country that had but little preaching at all: in the village where I was born there was four readers successively in six years time, ignorant men, and two of them immoral in their lives; who were all my school-masters. In the village where my father lived, there was a reader of about eighty years of age that never preached, and had two churches about twenty miles distant: his eyesight failing him, he said common-prayer without book; but for the reading of the psalms and chapters, he got a common thresher and day-labourer one year, and a taylor another year (for the clerk could not read well): and at last he had a kinsman of his own (the excellentest stage-player in all the country, and a good gamester and good fellow), that got orders and supplied one of his places! After him another younger kinsman, that could write and read, got orders: and at the same time another neighbour's son that had been a while at school turn'd minister, and who would needs go further than the rest, ventur'd to preach (and after got a living in Staffordshire), and when he had been a preacher about twelve or sixteen years, he was fain to give over, it being discovered that his orders were forged by the first ingenious stage-player. After him another neighbour's son took orders, when he had been a while an attorney's clerk, and a common drunkard, and tumbled himself into so great poverty that he had no other way to live: it was feared that he and more of them came by their orders the same way with the fore-mentioned person: these were the school-masters of my youth (except two of them), who read common prayer on Sundays and holy-days, and taught school and tumbled on the week-days, and whipt the boys when they were drunk, so that we changed them very oft. Within a few miles about us, were near a dozen more ministers that were near eighty years old apiece, and never preached; poor ignorant readers, and most of them of scandalous lives: only three or four constant competent preachers lived near us, and those (though conformable all save one) were the common marks of the people's obloquy and reproach, and any that had but gone to hear them, when he had no preaching at home, was made the derision of the vulgar rabble, under the odious name of a Puritane.

Youthful Faults.

I was much addicted to the excessive gluttonous eating of apples and pears: which I think laid the foundation of that imbecillity and flatulency of my stomach which caused the bodily calamities of my life. To this end, and to concur with naughty boys that gloried in evil, I have oft gone into other men's orchards, and stoln their fruit, when I had enough at home.

Special Mercies.

And yet two wonderful mercies I had from God: that I was never overwhelm'd with real melancholy. My distemper never went so far as to possess me with any inordinate fancies, or damp me with sinking sadness, although the physicians call'd it the hypocondriack melancholy. I had at several times the advice of no less than six and thirty physicians, by whose order I us'd druggs without number almost, which God thought not fit to make successful for a cure: and indeed all authors that I read acquainted me that my disease was incurable; whereupon I at last forsook the doctors for the most part, except when the urgency of a symptom, or pain, constrained me to seek some present ease. The second mercy which I met with was, that my pains, though daily and almost continual, did not very much disable me from my duty; but I could study, and preach, and walk almost as well if I had been free: (of which more anon).

Cured of Inclination to Gaming.

While I look back to this, it maketh me remember how God at that time did cure my inclination to gaming: About seventeen years of age, being at Ludlow Castle, where many idle gentlemen had little else to do, I had a mind to learn to play at tables; and the best gamester in the house undertook to teach me! As I remember, the first or second game, when he had so much the better that it was an hundred to one, besides the difference of our skills, the standers by laugh'd at me, as well as he, for not giving it up, and told me the game was lost: I knew no more but that it was not lost till all my table-men were lost, and would not give it over till then. He told me that he would lay me an hundred to one of it, and in good earnest laid me down ten shillings to my six pence: as soon as ever the money was down, whereas he told me that there was no possibility of my game, but by one cast often, I had every cast the same I wished, and he had every one according to my desire, so that by that time one could go four or five times about the room his game was gone, which put him in so great an admiration that I took the hint, and believed that the devil had the ruling of the dice, and did it to entice me on to be a gamester. And so I gave him his ten shillings again, and resolved I would never more play at tables whilst I lived.

Fruits of Experience.

I now see more good and more evil in all men than heretofore I did. I see that good men are not so good as I once thought they were, but have more imperfections; and that nearer approach and fuller trial doth make the best appear more weak and faulty than their admirers at a distance think. And I find that few are so bad as either malicious enemies or censorious separating professors do imagine. In some indeed I find that human nature is corrupted into a greater likeness to devils than I once thought any on earth had been. But even in the wicked, usually there is more for grace to make advantage of, and more to testify for God and holiness, than I once believed there had been. I less admire gifts of utterance, and bare profession of religion, than I once did; and have much more charity for many who, by the want of gifts, do make an obscurer profession than they. I once thought that almost all that could pray movingly and fluently, and talk well of religion, had been saints. But experience hath opened to me what odious crimes may consist with high profession; and I have met with divers obscure persons, not noted for any extraordinary profession or forwardness in religion, but only to live a quiet blameless life, whom

I have after found to have long lived, as far as I could discern, a truly godly and sanctified life; only, their prayers and duties were by accident kept secret from other men's observation. Yet he that upon this pretence would confound the godly and the ungodly, may as well go about to lay heaven and hell together.

Of his own and other Men's Knowledge.

Heretofore I knew much less than now, and yet was not half so much acquainted with my ignorance. I had a great delight in the daily new discoveries which I made, and of the light which shined in upon me (like a man that cometh into a country where he never was before): but I little knew either how imperfectly I understood those very points whose discovery so much delighted me, nor how much might be said against them, nor how many things I was yet a stranger to: But now I find far greater darkness upon all things, and perceive how very little it is that we know, in comparison of that which we are ignorant of, and have far meaner thoughts of my own understanding, though I must needs know that it is better furnished than it was then. Accordingly I had then a far higher opinion of learned persons and books than I have now; for what I wanted myself, I thought every reverend divine had attained, and was familiarly acquainted with; and what books I understood not by reason of the strangeness of the terms or matter, I the more admired, and thought that others understood their worth. But now experience hath constrained me against my will to know that reverend learned men are imperfect, and know but little as well as I, especially those that think themselves the wisest; and the better I am acquainted with them, the more I perceive that we are all yet in the dark: and the more I am acquainted with holy men, that are all for heaven, and pretend not much to subtilties, the more I value and honour them. And when I have studied hard to understand some abstruse admired book (as De Scientia Dei, De Providentia circa Malum, De Decretis, De Prædeterminatione, De Libertate Creature, &c.) I have but attained the knowledge of humane imperfections, and to see that the author is but a man as well as I. And at first I took more upon my author's credit than now I can do; and when an author was highly commended to me by others, or pleased me in some part, I was ready to entertain the whole; whereas now I take and leave in the same author, and dissent in some things from him that I like best, as well as from others.

On the Credit due to History.

I am much more cautious [cautious] in my belief of history than heretofore; not that I run into their extream that will believe nothing because they cannot believe all things. But I am abundantly satisfied by the experience of this age that there is no believing two sorts of men, ungodly men and partial men (though an honest heathen of no religion may be believed, where enmity against religion byasseth him not): yet a debauched Christian, besides his enmity to the power and practice of his own religion, is seldom without some further byass of interest or faction; especially when these concur, and a man is both ungodly and ambitious, espousing an interest contrary to a holy heavenly life, and also factious, embodying himself with a sect or party suited to his spirit and designs, there is no believing his word or oath. If you read any man partially bitter against others, as differing from him in opinion, or as cross to his greatness, interest, or designs, take heed how you believe any more than the historical evidence distinct from his word compelleth you to believe. The prodigious lies which have been published in this age in matters of fact, with unblushing confidence, even where thousands of multitudes of eye and ear witnesses knew all to be false, doth call men to take heed what history they believe, especially where power and violence affordeth that privilege to the reporter, that no man dare answer him or detect his fraud, or if they do, their writings are all suppress. As long as men have liberty to examine and contradict one another, one may partly conjecture, by comparing their words, on which side the truth is like to lie. But when great men write history, or flatterers by their appointment, which no man dare contradict, believe it but as you are constrained. Yet in these cases I can freely believe history: 1. If the person shew that he is acquainted with what he saith. 2. And if he shew you the evidences of honesty and conscience, and the fear of God, which may be much perceived in the spirit of a writing. 3. If he appear to be impartial and charitable, and a lover of goodness and of mankind, and not possessed of malignity or personal ill-will and malice, nor carried away by faction or personal interest. Conscionable men dare not lye: but faction and interest abate men's tenderness of conscience. And a charitable impartial heathen may speak truth in a love to truth and hatred of a lye; but ambitious malice and false religion will not stick to serve themselves on anything. . . . Sure I am, that as the lies of the Papists, of Luther, Zwinglius, Calvin, and Beza, are visibly malicious and impudent, by the common plenary contradicting evidence, and yet the multitude of their seduced ones believe them all, in despite of truth and charity; so in this age there have been such things written against parties and persons, whom the writers design to make odious, so notoriously false, as you would think that the sense of their honour at least should have made it impossible for such men to write. My own eyes have read such words and actions asserted with most vehement, iterated, unblushing confidence, which abundance of ear-witnesses, even of their own parties, must needs know to have been altogether false: and therefore having myself now written this history of myself, notwithstanding my protestation that I have not in anything wilfully gone against the truth, I expect no more credit from the reader than the self-evidencing light of the matter, with concurrent rational advantages from persons, and things, and other witnesses, shall constrain him to, if he be a person that is unacquainted with the author himself, and the other evidences of his veracity and credibility.

Character of Cromwell.

And as he went on, though he yet resolved not what form the new Commonwealth should be moulded into, yet he thought it but reasonable that he should be the chief person who had been chief in their deliverance (for the Lord Fairfax he knew had but the name). At last, as he thought it lawful to cut off the king, because he thought he was lawfully conquered, so he thought it lawful to fight against the Scots that would set him up, and to pull down the Presbyterian majority in the Parliament, which would else by restoring him undo all which had cost them so much blood and treasure. And accordingly he conquereth Scotland, and pulleth down the Parliament: being the easilier perswaded that all this was lawful, because he had a secret byas and eye towards his own exaltation: for he (and his officers) thought that when the king was gone a government there must be, and that no man was so fit for it as he himself, as best deserving it, and as having, by his wit and great interest in the army, the best sufficiency to manage it: yea, they thought that God had called them by successes to govern and take care of the Commonwealth, and of the interest of all his people in the land; and that if they stood by and suffered the Parliament to do that which they thought was dangerous, it would be required at their hands, whom they thought God had made the guardians of the land.

Having thus forced his conscience to justify all his cause (the cutting off the king, the setting up himself and his adherents, the pulling down the Parliament and the Scots), he thinketh that the end being good and necessary, the necessary means cannot be bad: and accordingly he giveth his interest and cause leave to tell him how far sects shall be tolerated and commended, and how far not; and how far the ministry shall be owned and supported, and how far not; yea, and how far professions, promises, and vows shall be kept, or broken; and therefore the Covenant he could not away with; nor the ministers, farther than they yielded to his ends, or did not openly resist them. He seemed exceeding open hearted, by a familiar rustick affected carriage (especially to his soldiers in sporting with them): but he thought secrecy a vertue, and dissimulation no vice, and simulation, that is, in plain English, a lie, or perfidiousness, to be a tolerable fault in a case of necessity: being of the same opinion with the Lord Bacon (who was not so precise as learned), that 'the best composition and temperature is, to have openness in fame and opinion, secrecy in habit, dissimulation in seasonable use, and a power to feign if there be no remedy' (Essay 6. pag. 31). Therefore he kept fair with all, saving his open or unreconcilable enemies. He carried it with such dissimulation, that Anabaptists, Independants, and Antinomians did all think that he was one of them: but he never endeavoured to perswade the Presbyterians that he was one of them, but only that he would do them justice, and preserve them, and that he honoured their worth and piety; for he knew that they were not so easily deceived. In a word, he did as our prelates have done, begin low and rise higher in his resolutions as his condition rose, and the promises which he made in his lower condition, he used as the interest of his higher following condition did require, and kept up as much honesty and godliness in the main as his cause and interest would allow (but there they left him): and his name standeth as a monitory monument or pillar to posterity to tell them the instability of man in strong temptations, if God leave him to himself: what great success and victories can do to lift up a mind that once seemed humble: what pride can do to make man selfish, and corrupt the heart with ill designs: what selfishness and ill designs can do to bribe the conscience, and corrupt the judgment, and make men justify the greatest errors and sins, and set against the clearest truth and duty: what bloodshed and great enormities of life an erring deluded judgment may draw men to, and patronize; and that when God hath dreadful judgments to execute, an erroneous sectary, or a proud self-seeker, is oftner his instrument than an humble, lamb-like, innocent saint.

Character of Sir Matthew Hale.

He was a man of no quick utterance, but often hesitant; but spake with great reason. He was most precisely just; inasmuch as I believe he would have lost all he had in the world rather than do an unjust act. Patient in hearing the tedious speech which any man had to make for himself. The pillar of justice, the refuge of the subject who feared oppression, and one of the greatest honours of his Majesty's government; for with some other upright judges, he upheld the honour of the English nation, that it fell not into the reproach of arbitrariness, cruelty, and utter confusion. Every man that had a just cause was almost past fear if he could but bring it to the court or assize where he was judge; for the other judges seldom contradicted him. He was the great instrument for rebuilding London; for when an act was made for deciding all controversies that hindered it, he was the constant judge, who for nothing followed the work, and by his prudence and justice removed a multitude of great impediments. His great advantage for innocency was, that he was no lover of riches or of grandeur. His garb was too plain; he studiously avoided all unnecessary familiarity with great persons, and all that manner of living which signifyeth wealth and greatness. He kept no greater a family than myself. I lived in a small house, which, for a pleasant back-side, he had a mind of; but caused a stranger, that he might not be suspected to be the man, to know of me whether I were willing to part with it, before he would meddle with it. In that house he liveth contentedly, without any pomp, and without costly or troublesome retinue or visitors; but not without charity to the poor. He continued the study of physicks and mathematicks still, as his great delight. . . . He had got but a very small estate, though he had long the greatest practice, because he would take but little money, and undertake no more business than he could well despatch. He often offered to the lord chancellor to resign his place, when he was blamed for doing that which he supposed was justice. He had been the learned Selden's intimate friend, and one of his executors; and because the Hobbians and other infidels would have persuaded the world that Selden was of their mind, I desired him to tell me the truth therein. He assured me that Selden was an earnest professor of the Christian faith, and so angry an adversary to Hobbs that he hath rated him out of the room.

Observance of the Sabbath in Baxter's Youth.

I cannot forget that in my youth, in those late times when we lost the labours of some of our conformable godly teachers, for not reading publicly the Book of Sports [re-enforced on the clergy by Laud in 1633] and dancing on the Lord's Day, one of my father's own tenants was the town-piper, hired by the year, for many years together, and the place of the dancing assembly was not a hundred yards from our door. We could not, on the Lord's Day, either read a chapter, or pray, or sing a psalm, or catechise, or instruct a servant, but with the noise of the pipe and tabor, and the shoutings in the street, continually in our ears. Even among a tractable people, we were the common scorn of all the rabble in the streets, and called puritans, precisians, and hypocrites, because we rather chose to read the Scriptures than to do as they did; though there was no savour of nonconformity in our family. And when the people by the book were allowed to play and dance out of public service-time, they could so hardly break off their sports that many a time the reader was fain to stay till the piper and players would give over. Sometimes the morris-dancers would come into the church in all their linen, and scarfs, and antic dresses, with morris-bells jingling at their legs; and as soon as common prayer was read, did haste out presently to their play again.

Baxter's Practical Works, in 23 vols., were edited, with a Life, by Orme in 1830; and reprinted in four. There are Lives by Grosart (1879), Dean Boyle (1883), Davies (1886), Powicke (1924, 1927), Ladell (1925). The Autobiography was abridged in 1925.

Thomas Goodwin (1600–80), born at Rollesby, in Norfolk, studied at Cambridge, where he was made vicar of Trinity Church; but becoming an Independent, he preached in London, and then to the English congregation at Arnheim, in Holland. He was afterwards a member of the Westminster Assembly, chaplain to Cromwell's Council of State, and president of Magdalen College, Oxford. Deprived at the Restoration, he in his later years preached to an Independent congregation in London. He published sermons full of fervour, elaborate expositions of Scripture, and some controversial pamphlets. His devotional works are still prized by evangelical divines.

John Owen (1616–83), one of the greatest of the Puritan divines, was born at Stadhampton, in Oxfordshire, and studied at Queen's College with extraordinary diligence and zeal. Driven from the university by Laud's statutes, he became a private chaplain, and having written a polemical Display of Arminianism, was appointed to a living in Essex. He passed from Presbyterianism to Independency, and repeatedly preached before the Long Parliament. Cromwell took him as chaplain to Ireland in 1649, and set him to regulate the affairs of Trinity College; and in 1650 brought him to Edinburgh, where he spent six months. Subsequently he was promoted to the deanery of Christ Church College in Oxford, and soon after to the vice-chancellorship of the university, offices he held till Cromwell's death. He was one of the Triers appointed to purge the Church of scandalous ministers, opposed the giving of the crown to Cromwell, and the year after Cromwell's death was ejected from the deanery. He bought an estate at Stadhampton, and formed a congregation there. After the Restoration he was favoured by Lord Clarendon, who offered him high preferment in the Church if he would conform—an obviously impossible suggestion. Owen also declined invitations from congregations in New England and from Harvard College. Ultimately he ministered to a congregation of Independents in Leadenhall Street. Spite of his opposition to the Church, Owen's character for singular moderation, together with his repute for ability and influence, secured him the esteem of Churchmen and courtiers, and even of the king himself, who sent for him, and after a conversation of two hours gave him a thousand guineas to be distributed among those who had suffered most from the penal laws. Owen was a man of vast learning, of very decided views, and a powerful controversialist, though he showed a courtesy and moderation in argument all too unusual on either side in those days. He was appallingly industrious and voluminous as an author. Collected editions of his works appeared in 1828 (28 vols.) and 1850 (24 vols.). Among the works are many sermons, An Exposition on the Epistle to the Hebrews, A Discourse of the Holy Spirit, and The Divine Original and Authority of the Scriptures. His style is far from admirable; his argumentation is terribly discursive, wordy, and tedious; yet there are powerful, terse, and memorable passages and pages, as in this passage on sloth from the exposition of the 130th Psalm:

Great opportunities for service neglected and great gifts not improved are oftentimes the occasion of plunging the soul into great depths. Gifts are given to trade withal for God; opportunities are the market-days for that trade: to napkin up the one and let slip the other will end in trouble and disconsolation. Disquietments and perplexities of heart are worms that will certainly breed in the rust of unexercised gifts. God loseth a revenue of glory and honour by such slothful souls, and he will make them sensible of it. I know some at this day whose omissions of opportunities for service are ready to sink them into the grave.

John Howe (1630–1705), a great Nonconformist divine, was a native of Loughborough, in Leicestershire, where his father was curate. At Cambridge he was the friend of Cudworth and Henry More, and he subsequently studied at Oxford. In 1652 he was ordained minister of Great Torrington, in Devonshire. Upon public fasts he used to begin at nine in the morning with a prayer of a quarter of an hour, then read and expounded Scripture for about three-quarters, prayed an hour, preached another hour, and prayed again for half-an-hour. The people then sang for a quarter of an hour, when he retired and took a little refreshment; he then went into the pulpit again, prayed an hour more, preached another hour, and concluded with a prayer of half-an-hour! In 1657 Howe was chosen by Cromwell to reside at Whitehall as one of his chaplains. As he had not coveted the office, he seems never to have liked it. From the ‘affected disorderliness’ of the Protector’s family in religious matters Howe despaired of doing good in his office. But he continued to be chaplain to the Protector, and, after Oliver’s death, to Richard Cromwell. When Richard was set aside the minister returned to Great Torrington, but was ejected by the Act of Uniformity in 1662. He was subsequently a minister in Ireland and London, and found leisure to write those admirable works of practical divinity which ranked him among the most gifted and eminent of the Nonconformist divines of England. From 1685 till the Declaration of Indulgence the ‘Platonic Puritan’ was in Holland; and he died in London in 1705. The principal works of John Howe are his Living Temple (1676–1702), a treatise on Delighting in God, The Blessedness of the Righteous, The Vanity of Man as Mortal, a Tractate on the Divine Presence, an Inquiry into the Doctrine of the Trinity, and The Redeemer’s Dominion over the Invisible World (1699). Robert Hall acknowledged that he had learned more from John Howe than from any other author he ever read, and said there was ‘an astonishing magnificence in his conceptions.’ Unhappily the matter of his works is vastly better than the manner; endless digressions render most of his works wearisome, his sentences are unwieldy, and the argument is but rarely illumined by lighter touches. His letters of consolation are admirable for their tenderness and Christian philosophy; that to Lady Russell after the execution of her husband is especially fine: sent unsigned, its authorship was soon discovered, and led to a lifelong friendship. A touching and dignified persuasion not to sorrow as those who have no hope, but to live for duties left, concludes thus:

I multiply words, being loth to lose my design; and shall only add that consideration, which cannot but be valuable with you, upon his first proposal, who had all the advantages imaginable to give it its full weight—I mean that of those dear pledges left behind: my own heart even bleeds to think of the case of those sweet babes, should they be bereaved of their other parent too. And even your continued visible dejection would be their unspeakable disadvantage. You will always naturally create in them a reverence of you; and I cannot but apprehend how the constant mien, aspect, and deportment of such a parent will insensibly influence the temper of dutiful children; and if that be sad and despondent, depress their spirits, blunt and take off the edge and quickness upon which their future usefulness and comfort will much depend. Were it possible their now glorious father should visit and inspect you, would you not be troubled to behold a frown in that bright serene face? You are to please a more penetrating eye, which you will best do by putting on a temper and deportment suitable to your weighty charge and duty, and to the great purposes for which God continues you in the world, by giving over unnecessary solitude and retirement, which (though it pleases) doth really prejudice you, and is more than you can bear. Nor can any rules of decency require more. Nothing that is necessary and truly Christian ought to be reckoned unbecoming. David’s example is of too great authority to be counted a pattern of indecency. The God of heaven lift up the light of his countenance upon you, and thereby put gladness into your heart; and give you to apprehend him saying to you, ‘Arise and walk in the light of the Lord.’

That I have used so much freedom in this paper, I make no apology for; but do, therefore, hide myself in the dark, not judging it consistent with that plainness which I thought the case might require, to give any other account of myself than that I am one deeply sensible of your and your noble relatives’ great affliction, and who scarce ever bow the knee before the mercy-seat without remembering it: and who shall ever be, madam, your ladyship's most sincere honourer, and most humble devoted servant.

A collected edition of Howe's works, with a Life by Calamy, was published in 1724. Other Lives are by Hunt (1810), Dunn (1836), Urwick (1846), Hewlett (1848), and especially Rogers (1836; new ed. 1879).

John Flavel (1627–91), born at Bromsgrove, and educated at Oxford, took Presbyterian orders in 1650, and was ejected from his living at Dartmouth in 1662. He continued to preach there privately, and after the Declaration of Indulgence (1687) was minister of a Nonconformist church till his death. He published some thirty works, filling in some of the collected editions six volumes. His writings were very popular, and sometimes—as in Husbandry Spiritualised and Navigation Spiritualised—show, along with higher qualities, abundance of elaborate ingenuity and perverse fancy.

Ralph Cudworth (1617–88), a very learned divine, was a chief of the group of Cambridge Platonists. Born at Aller, in Somerset, he studied at Cambridge, where, in 1645, he was appointed Regius Professor of Hebrew, and that chair he occupied till his death. He held a series of Church livings, and was Master of Christ's College from 1654, an appointment he retained after the Restoration in spite of his submission to the Government of the Commonwealth. His True Intellectual System of the Universe (1678) was designed as a refutation of atheism and contemporary freethinking. It executes only part of his design—the establishment of the three fundamental or essential truths of true religion: 'First, that all things in the world do not float without a head and governor; but that there is a God, an omnipotent understanding Being, presiding over all. Secondly, that this God being essentially good and just, there is something in its own nature immutably and eternally just and unjust; and not by arbitrary will, law, and command only. And, lastly, that we are so far forth principals or masters of our own actions as to be accountable to justice for them, or to make us guilty and blameworthy for what we do amiss, and to deserve punishment accordingly.' Against Hobbes, he maintained the natural and everlasting distinction between justice and injustice, as also the freedom of the human will; but he differs from most subsequent opponents of Hobbism, in ascribing our recognition of right and wrong entirely to the reasoning faculties, and in no degree to sentiment or emotion. In the Intellectual System ethical questions are but incidentally and occasionally touched upon; but the work is so discursive as to find room for disquisitions on the meaning of the pagan mythology and the relation of the Platonic to the Christian trinity, and though sagacious and large-minded, fatigues by its redundant digressions. In combating the atheists, Cudworth displays a prodigious amount of erudition, and that rare candour which prompts a controversialist to give a fair statement of the opinions and arguments which he means to refute. This honourable distinction brought upon him the reproach of insincerity; and by some contemporaries the epithets of Arian, Socinian, Deist, and even Atheist were freely applied to him. 'He has raised,' says Dryden, 'such strong objections against the being of a God and Providence, that many think he has not answered them'—'the common fate,' as Shaftesbury remarked, 'of those who dare to appear fair authors.' This clamour seems to have disheartened the philosopher, who refrained from publishing the other portions of his scheme. He left behind him several manuscript works, one of which, A Treatise concerning Eternal and Immutable Morality, was published in 1731 by Bishop Chandler, and was a real contribution to ethics. Some of his unprinted writings are now in the British Museum. His sermon before the House of Commons in 1647 shows the best side of the Latitudinarian school of which he was a representative, and, according to Mackintosh, may fairly be compared with Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying (published the year before) 'for charity, piety, and the most liberal toleration.' Dugald Stewart noted that 'the Intellectual System of Cudworth embraces a field much wider than his treatise of Immutable Morality. The latter is particularly directed against the doctrines of Hobbes and of the Antinomians; but the former aspires to tear up by the roots all the principles, both physical and metaphysical, of the Epicurean philosophy. It is a work, certainly, which reflects much honour on the talents of the author, and still more on the boundless extent of his learning; but it is so ill suited to the taste of the present age, that, since the time of Mr Harris and Dr Price, I scarcely recollect the slightest reference to it in the writings of our British metaphysicians.' Interest cannot be said to have revived since Dugald Stewart's time.

The first specimen is the beginning of the famous sermon to the House of Commons (on 1 John ii. 3, 4); the others, fragments from the torso of the Intellectual System.

Of Knowledge and Religion.

We have much enquiry concerning knowledge in these latter times. The sons of Adam are now as busy as ever himself was about the tree of knowledge of good and evil, shaking the boughs of it, and scrambling for the fruit; whilst, I fear, many are too unmindful of the tree of life. And though there be now no cherubims with their flaming swords to fright men off from it, yet the way that leads to it seems to be so solitary and untrodden, as if there were but few that had any mind to taste of the fruit of it. There be many that speak of new glimpses and discoveries of truth, of dawns of gospel-light; and no question but God hath reserved much of this for the very evening and sun-set of the world; for in the latter days knowledge shall be increased: but yet I wish we could in the mean time see that day to dawn which the Apostle speaks of, and that day-star to arise in men's hearts. I wish, whilst we talk of light and dispute about truth, we could walk more as children of the light. Whereas, if S. John's rule be good here in the text, that no man truly knows Christ but he that keepeth his commandments, it is much to be suspected that many of us which pretend to light have a thick and gloomy darkness within over-spreading our souls.

There be now many large volumes and discourses written concerning Christ, thousands of controversies discussed, infinite problems determined concerning his divinity, humanity, union of both together, and what not, so that our bookish Christians, that have all their religion in writings and papers, think they are now completely furnished with all kind of knowledge concerning Christ; and when they see all their leaves lying about them, they think they have a goodly stock of knowledge and truth, and cannot possibly miss of the way to heaven; as if religion were nothing but a little book-craft, a mere paper-skill.

But if S. John's rule here be good, we must not judge of our knowing of Christ by our skill in books and papers, but by our keeping of his commandments. And that, I fear, will discover many of us (notwithstanding all this light which we boast of round about us) to have nothing but Egyptian darkness within our hearts.

The vulgar sort think that they know Christ enough out of their creeds and catechisms and confessions of faith; and if they have but a little acquainted themselves with these, and like parrots conned the words of them, they doubt not but that they are sufficiently instructed in all the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. Many of the more learned, if they can but wrangle and dispute about Christ, imagine themselves to be grown great proficients in the school of Christ.

The greatest part of the world, whether learned or unlearned, think that there is no need of purging and purifying of their hearts for the right knowledge of Christ and his gospel; but though their lives be never so wicked, their hearts never so foul within, yet they may know Christ sufficiently out of their treatises and discourses, out of their meer systems and bodies of divinity: which I deny not to be useful in a subordinate way; although our Saviour prescribeth his disciples another method to come to the right knowledge of divine truths, by doing of God's will; He that will do my father's will (saith he) shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God. He is a true Christian indeed, not he that is only book-taught, but he that is God-taught; he that hath an unction from the Holy One (as our Apostle calleth it), that teacheth him all things; he that hath the spirit of Christ within him, that searcheth out the deep things of God: for as no man knoweth the things of a man save the spirit of a man which is in him, even so the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God.

Ink and paper can never make us Christians, can never beget a new nature, a living principle in us; can never form Christ or any true notions of spiritual things in our hearts. The Gospel, that new law which Christ delivered to the world, it is not merely a dead letter without us, but a quickening spirit within us. Cold theorems and maxims, dry and jejune disputes, lean syllogistical reasonings, could never yet of themselves beget the least glimpse of true heavenly light, the least sap of saving knowledge in any heart. All this is but the groping of the poor dark spirit of man after truth, to find it out with his own endeavours, and feel it with his own cold and benumbed hands. Words and syllables, which are but dead things, cannot possibly convey the living notions of heavenly truths to us. The secret mysteries of a divine life, of a new nature, of Christ formed in our hearts, they cannot be written or spoken, language and expressions cannot reach them; neither can they be ever truly understood, except the soul itself be kindled from within, and awakened into the life of them. A painter that would draw a rose, though he may flourish some likeness of it in figure and colour, yet he can never paint the scent and fragrancy; or if he would draw a flame, he cannot put a constant heat into his colours; he cannot make his pencil drop a sound, as the echo in the epigram mocks at him — Si vis similem pingere, pinge sonum. All the skill of cunning artizans and mechanicks cannot put a principle of life into a statue of their own making. Neither are we able to inclose in words and letters the life, soul, and essence of any spiritual truths, and, as it were, to incorporate it in them.

Some philosophers have determined that ἀρετή is not διδασκον, virtue cannot be taught by any certain rules or precepts. Men and books may propound some directions to us, that may set us in such a way of life and practice as in which we shall at last find it within ourselves, and be experimentally acquainted with it; but they cannot teach it us like a mechanick art or trade. No, surely, there is a spirit in man; and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding. But we shall not meet with this spirit any where but in the way of obedience: the knowledge of Christ and the keeping of his commandments must always go together, and be mutual causes of one another.

Two Atheist Arguments.

And lastly, the topick of evils in general is insisted upon by them, not those which are called culpe, evils of fault (for that is a thing which the Democritick Atheists utterly explode in the genuine sense of it), but the evils of pain and trouble, which they dispute concerning after this manner. The supposed Deity and maker of the world was either willing to abolish all evils, but not able; or he was able but not willing; or thirdly, he was neither willing nor able; or else lastly, he was both able and willing. This latter is the only thing that answers fully to the notion of a God. Now, that the supposed creator of all things was not thus both able and willing to abolish all evils is plain, because then there would have been no evils at all left. Wherefore since there is such a deluge of evils overflowing all, it must needs be that either he was willing and not able to remove them, and then he was impotent; or else he was able and not willing, and then he was envious; or lastly, he was neither able nor willing, and then he was both impotent and envious.

In the twelfth place, the Atheists further dispute in this manner. If the world were made by any Deity, then it would be governed by a providence; and if there were any providence, it must appear in human affairs. But here it is plain that all is Tohu and Bohu, chaos and confusion; things happening alike to all, to the wise and foolish, religious and impious, virtuous and vicious. (For these names the Atheist cannot chuse but make use of, though by taking away natural morality they really destroy the things.) From whence it is concluded that all things float up and down, as they are agitated and driven by the tumbling billows of careless fortune and chance. The impieties of Dionysius, his scoffing abuses of religion, and whatsoever was then sacred or worship'd under the notion of a God, were most notorious; and yet it is observed that he fared never a jot the worse for it. Hunc nec Olympius Jupiter fulmine percussit, nec Æsculapius misero diuturnoque morbo tabescentem interemit; verum in suo lectulo mortuus, in Tympanidis rogam illatus est, eamque potestatem, quam ipse per scelus nactus erat, quasi justam & legitimam hereditatis loco tradidit: Neither did Jupiter Olympius strike him with a thunderbolt, nor Æsculapius inflict any languishing disease upon him; but he died in his bed, and was honourably interred, and that power which he had wickedly acquired, he transmitted as a just and lawful inheritance to his posterity. And Diogenes the Cynick, though much a Theist, could not but acknowledge that Harpalus, a famous robber or pirate in those times, who, committing many villanous actions, notwithstanding lived prosperously, did thereby Testimonium dicere contra deos, bear testimony against the Gods. Though it has been objected by the Theists, and thought to be a strong argument for providence, that there were so many tables hung up in temples, the monuments of such as having prayed to the gods in storms and tempests, had escaped shipwreck; yet as Diagoras observed, Nusquam picti sunt qui naufragium fecerunt, there are no tables extant of those of them who were shipwreck'd. Wherefore it was not considered by these Theists, how many of them that prayed as well to the gods did notwithstanding suffer shipwreck; as also how many of those which never made any devotional addresses at all to any deity escaped equal dangers of storms and tempests.

Moreover, it is consentaneous to the opinion of a God, to think that thunder rattling in the clouds with thunderbolts should be the immediate significations of his wrath and displeasure: whereas it is plain that these are flung at random, and that the fury of them often lights upon the innocent, whilst the notoriously guilty escape untouched; and therefore we understand not how this can be answered by any Theists.

Tohu and Bohu are the Hebrew words rendered 'without form and void' in the second verse of Genesis in the Authorised Version. The Latin quotation is from Cicero, De Finibus, iii. 35.

Christianity Confirmed from the Existence of Wizards and Demoniacs.

To this phenomenon of apparitions might be added those two others of magicians or wizards, demoniacs or Energumeni; both of these proving also the real existence of spirits, and that they are not mere phancies and imaginary inhabitants of men's brains only, but real inhabitants of the world. As also that among those spirits there are some foul, unclean, and wicked ones (though not made such by God, but by their own apostacy), which is some confirmation of the truth of Christianity, the Scripture insisting so much upon these evil dæmons or devils, and declaring it to be one design of our Saviour Christ's coming into the world, to oppose these confederate powers of the kingdom of darkness, and to rescue mankind from the thralldom and bondage thereof. As for wizards and magicians, persons who associate and confederate themselves in a peculiar manner with these evil spirits, for the gratification of their own revenge, lust, ambition, and other passions; besides the Scriptures, there hath been so full an attestation given to them by persons unconcerned in all ages, that those our so confident exploders of them in this present age can hardly escape the suspicion of having some hankering towards atheism. But as for the dæmoniacks and Energumeni, it hath been wondered that there should be so many of them in our Saviour's time, and hardly any, or none, in this present age of ours. Certain it is, from the writings of Josephus, in sundry places, that the Pharisaick Jews were then generally possessed with an opinion of these δαμονιζόμενοι, dæmoniacks, men possessed with devils, or infested by them. And that this was not a mere phrase or form of speech only amongst them for persons very ill affected in their bodies may appear from hence, that Josephus declares it as his opinion concerning the dæmons or devils, that they were . . . the spirits or souls of wicked men deceased getting into the bodies of the living. From hence it was that the Jews, in our Saviour's time, were not at all surprised with his casting out of devils, it being usual for them also to exorcise the same; an art which they pretended to have learn'd from Solomon.

Sir Richard Fanshawe, poet and translator as well as royalist diplomat, was born at Ware Park, Hertfordshire, in 1608, studied at Jesus College, Cambridge, and went abroad to study languages. In the Civil War he sided with the king, and while at Oxford married in 1644 the brave and lively Anne Harrison (1625–80). In 1648 he became treasurer to the navy under Prince Rupert, in 1651 was taken prisoner at Worcester, and on Cromwell's death withdrew to the Continent. After the Restoration he was appointed ambassador at the courts of Portugal and Spain, and died suddenly at Madrid, 26th June 1666. Fanshawe's works include The Faithfull Shepherd (1647), a translation from the Italian of Guarini's Pastor Fido; Selected Parts of Horace (1652), perhaps his happiest effort in translation; a translation into Latin verse of Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess; The Lusiad (1655), a translation from Camoens, criticised by Mickle as harsh and unpoetical, but praised by Southey and commended by Burton; and Querer per Solo Querer ('To Love for Love's Sake'), a dramatic romance translated from the Spanish of Hurtado de Mendoza, and quoted by Charles Lamb with commendation both of play and translator. In the first scene of The Faithfull Shepherd, Linco and Silvio during a boar-hunt converse thus:

Linco. Fond youth, for a wild boar so far to roam,
Whom thou must hunt with danger; when at home
One's safely lodg'd!

Silvio. Dost thou speak seriously?
How near is it?

Lin. As thou art now to me.

Sil. Th' art mad.

Lin. Thou art.

Sil. In what wood doth he rest?

Lin. Silvio's the wood, and cruelty the beast!

Sil. Mad, I was sure!

Lin. To have a nymph so fair
(Rather a goddess of perfections rare),
Fresher and sweeter than a rose new blown,
Softer and whiter than an old swan's down,

From whom there lives not at this day a swain
 So proud 'mongst us but sighs and sighs in vain ;
 To have, I say, this matchless paragon
 By gods and men reserv'd for thee, nay thrown Into thine arms without one sigh or tear,
 And thou unworthy ! to disvalue her ;
 Art thou not then a beast, a savage one ?
 Rather a senseless clod, a stock, a stone ?

Sil. If not to be in love be cruelty,
 Then cruelty's a virtue ; nor do I
 Repent but boast I lodge him in my breast
 By whom I've conquer'd Love, the sweetest beast.

Lin. How could'st thou conquer, silly idiot,
 Whom thou ne're try'dst.

Sil. In that I try'd him not.

Lin. O hadst thou try'd him, Silvio, and once found
 In mutual lovers what true joyes are found,
 I know thou 'ldst say, O Love, the sweetest guest,
 Why hast thou been an alien to this breast ?
 Leave, leave the woods, leave following beasts, fond boy,
 And follow love.

Lady Fanshawe wrote Memoirs of her own life, to which were added extracts from the correspondence of her husband. They were published in 1829, edited by Sir N. Harris Nicolas, but unfortunately from a very imperfect and inaccurate copy of the original manuscript. A revised reprint appeared in 1905. The Standard Edition was prepared (1907) from an original MS. in the possession of E. J. Fanshawe of Parsloes.

An Irish Ghost.

• We went to the Lady Honor O'Brien's ; . . . she was the youngest daughter of the Earl of Thomond. There we staid three nights, the first of which I was surprised by being laid in a chamber, when, about one o'clock, I heard a voice that awakened me. I drew the curtain, and in the casement of the window I saw by the light of the moon a woman leaning into the window through the casement, in white, with red hair, and pale and ghastly complexion. She spake loud, and in a tone I had never heard, thrice, 'A horse !' and then with a sigh more like the wind than breath, she vanished, and to me her body looked more like a thick cloud than substance. I was so much frightened that my hair stood on end, and my night-clothes fell off. I pulled and pinched your father, who never woke during the disorder I was in ; but at last was much surprised to see me in this fright, and more so when I related the story and shewed him the window opened. Neither of us slept more that night, but he entertained me with telling me how much more these apparitions were usual in this country than in England ; and we concluded the cause to be the great superstition of the Irish, and the want of that knowing faith which should defend them from the power of the Devil, which he exercises among them very much. About five o'clock the lady of the house came to see us, saying she had not been in bed all night, because a cousin O'Brien of hers, whose ancestors had owned that house, had desired her to stay with him in his chamber, and that he died at two o'clock, and she said : 'I wish you to have had no disturbance, for 'tis the custom of the place, that when any of the family are dying the shape of a woman appears in the window every night till they be dead. This woman was many ages ago got with child by the owner of this place, who murdered her in his garden, and flung her into the river under the window ; but truly I thought not of it when I lodged you here, it being the best room in the house.' We made little reply to her speech, but disposed ourselves to be gone suddenly.

Domestic Diplomacy.

My husband had provided very good lodgings for us [at Bristol], and as soon as he could come home from the council, where he was at my arrival, he with all expressions of joy received me in his arms, and gave me a hundred pieces of gold, saying : 'I know thou that keeps my heart so well will keep my fortune, which from this I will ever put into thy hands as God shall bless me with increase ;' and now I thought myself a perfect queen, and my husband so glorious a crown, that I more valued myself to be called by his name than born a princess ; for I knew him very wise and very good, and his soul doated on me—upon which confidence I will tell you what happened. My Lady Rivers, a brave woman, and one that had suffered many thousand pounds loss for the king, and whom I had a great reverence for, and she a kindness for me as a kinswoman, in discourse she tacitly commended the knowledge of state affairs, and that some women were very happy in a good understanding thereof, as my Lady Aubigny, Lady Isabel Thynne, and divers others, and yet none was at first more capable than I ; that in the night she knew there came a post from Paris from the queen, and that she would be extremely glad to hear what the queen commanded the king in order to his affairs, saying if I would ask my husband privately he would tell me what he found in the packet, and I might tell her. I, that was young and innocent, and to that day had never in my mouth 'What news?' began to think there was more inquiring into public affairs than I thought of, and that it being a fashionable thing would make me more beloved of my husband, if that had been possible, than I then was. When my husband returned home from council, after welcoming him, as his custom ever was he went with his handful of papers into his study for an hour or more. I followed him ; he turned hastily and said : 'What wouldst thou have, my life?' I told him I heard the prince had received a packet from the queen, and I guessed it was that in his hand, and I desired to know what was in it. He smilingly replied : 'My love, I will immediately come to thee ; pray thee, go, for I am very busy.' When he came out of his closet, I revived my suit ; he kissed me, and talked of other things. At supper I would eat nothing ; he as usual sat by me, and drank often to me, which was his custom, and was full of discourse to company that was at table. Going to bed, I asked again, and said I could not believe he loved me if he refused to tell me all he knew ; but he answered nothing, but stopped my mouth with kisses. So we went to bed ; I cried, and he went to sleep. Next morning early, as his custom was, he called to rise, but began to discourse with me first, to which I made no reply ; he rose, came on the other side of the bed, and kissed me, and drew the curtains softly and went to court. When he came home to dinner, he presently came to me as was usual, and when I had him by the hand, I said : 'Thou dost not care to see me troubled ;' to which he, taking me in his arms, answered : 'My dearest soul, nothing upon earth can afflict me like that ; but when you asked me of my business, it was wholly out of my power to satisfy thee ; for my life and fortune shall be thine, and every thought of my heart in which the trust I am in may not be revealed ; but my honour is my own, which I cannot preserve if I communicate the prince's affairs ; and 'pray thee with this answer rest satisfied.' So great was his reason and goodness, that, upon consideration, it made my folly appear to me so vile, that from that day until the day of his death I never thought fit to ask him any business but what he communicated freely to me in order to his estate or family.

Lucy Hutchinson, born in 1620 in the Tower of London, was the daughter of its lieutenant, Sir Allan Apsley ; in 1638 she married Colonel John Hutchinson (1615-64), governor afterwards of Nottingham Castle, and one of the judges of Charles I. During 1664-71 Mrs Hutchinson wrote Memoirs of her husband's life for her children's instruction, which were not designed for publication, and were first published by a collateral descendant, the Rev. Julius Hutchinson, in 1806. This peculiarly interesting and valuable narrative, besides adding to our knowledge of the Civil War in Nottinghamshire, sheds much light on the domestic life of the time, the position of women in society, and the state of education and manners. The unsought graces of the style and its obvious sincerity and truthfulness heighten the effect of a charming picture of a Puritan gentleman and a Puritan home ; and the wifely affection conspicuous throughout (even the very exaggeration of her husband's merits and importance) stirs us to warm sympathy with both the author and the subject of the memoir, which is an undesigned rebutter of hundreds of royalist taunts and sneers levelled against Puritans as naturally all narrow-minded, bitter, and uncultured. Though he signed the sentence which condemned Charles I. to the scaffold, Colonel Hutchinson testified against Cromwell's usurpation, and lived in retirement till the Restoration. He was included then in the Act of Amnesty, but in 1663 was arrested on a groundless suspicion of treasonable conspiracy, and died after eleven months' imprisonment in Sandown Castle, Kent, 11th September 1664. Mrs Hutchinson was an exceptionally learned lady—knew French and Latin thoroughly, had some knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, and was well read in theology. She translated Lucretius into English verse, and part of the Aeneid (both yet in MS.), and wrote two theological essays, published in 1817. In an autobiographical fragment prefixed to the Memoirs, Mrs Hutchinson describes her youthful precocity and early training thus :

For my father and mother fancying me then beautiful, and more than ordinarily apprehensive, applied all their cares, and spared no cost to improve me in my education, which procured me the admiration of those that flattered my parents. By that time I was four years old I read English perfectly, and having a great memory, I was carried to sermons, and while I was very young could remember and repeat them exactly, and being carressed, the love of praise tickled me, and made me attend more heedfully. When I was about seven years of age, I remember I had at one time eight tutors in several qualities, languages, music, dancing, writing, and needlework ; but my genius was quite averse from all but my book, and that I was so eager of, that my mother thinking it prejudiced my health, would moderate me in it ; yet this rather animated me than kept me back, and every moment I could steal from my play I would employ in any book I could find, when my own were locked up from me. After dinner and supper I still had an hour allowed me to play, and then I would steal into some hole or other to read. My father would have me learn Latin, and I was so apt that I outstript my brothers who were at school, although my father's chaplain that was my tutor was a pitiful dull fellow. My brothers, who had a great deal of wit, had some emulation at the progress I made in my learning, which very well pleased my father, though my mother would have been contented I had not so wholly addicted myself to that as to neglect my other qualities : as for music and dancing, I profited very little in them, and would never practise my lute or harpsichords but when my masters were with me ; and for my needle I absolutely hated it ; play among other children I despised, and when I was forced to entertain such as came to visit me, I tired them with more grave instructions than their mothers, and plucked all their babies to pieces, and kept the children in such awe that they were glad when I entertained myself with elder company ; to whom I was very acceptable, and living in the house with many persons that had a great deal of wit ; and very profitable serious discourses being frequent at my father's table and in my mother's drawing-room, I was very attentive to all, and gathered up things that I would utter again to great admiration of many that took my memory and imitation for wit. It pleased God that through the good instructions of my mother, and the sermons she carried me to, I was convinced that the knowledge of God was the most excellent study, and accordingly applied myself to it, and to practise as I was taught : I used to exhort my mother's maids much, and to turn their idle discourses to good subjects ; but I thought, when I had done this on the Lord's day, and every day performed my due tasks of reading and praying, that then I was free to anything that was not sin, for I was not at that time convinced of the vanity of conversation which was not scandalously wicked, I thought it no sin to learn or hear witty songs and amorous sonnets or poems, and twenty things of that kind, wherein I was so apt that I became the confidante in all the loves that were managed among my mother's young women, and there was none of them but had many lovers and some particular friends beloved above the rest.

Even more classical is the picture of the sweet domesticities that rather furthered than hindered her (unpublished) translation of Lucretius :

I turned it into English in a room where my children practised the several qualities they were taught with their tutors, and I numbered the syllables of my translation by the threads of the canvas I wrought in, and set them down with a pen and ink that stood by me.

Thus she records in the Memoirs how her husband defended himself (generally rather than explicitly) before the Convention Parliament of 1660 :

Colonel Hutchinson on his Defence.

When it came to Inglesby's turn, he, with many tears, professed his repentance for that murder, and told a false tale, how Cromwell held his hand, and forced him to subscribe the sentence, and made a most whining recantation; after which he retired, and another had almost ended, when Colonel Hutchinson, who was not there at the beginning, came in, and was told what they were about, and that it would be expected he should say something. He was surprized with a thing he expected not, yet neither then nor in any the like occasion did he ever fail himself, but told them, 'that for his actings in those days, if he had erred, it was the inexperience of his age and the defect of his judgment, and not the malice of his heart, which had ever prompted him to pursue the general advantage of his country more than his own; and if the sacrifice of him might conduce to the publick peace and settlement, he should freely submit his life and fortunes to their dispose; that the vain expense of his age, and the great debts his public employments had run him into, as they were testimonies that neither avarice nor any other interest had carried him on, so they yielded him just cause to repent that he ever forsook his own blessed quiet to embark in such a troubled sea, where he had made shipwreck of all things but a good conscience. And as to that particular action of the king, he desired them to believe he had that sense of it that befitted an Englishman, a Christian, and a gentleman. What he expressed was to this effect, but so handsomely delivered that it generally tooke the whole house: only one gentleman stood up and said he had expressed himself as one that was much more sorry for the events and consequences than for the actions; but another replied that when a man's words might admit of two interpretations, it befitted gentlemen always to receive that which might be most favourable. As soon as the colonel had spoken, he retired into a room where Inglesby was, with his eyes yet red, who had called up a little spirit to succeed his whinings, and embracing Colonel Hutchinson: 'O colonel,' said he, 'did I ever imagine we could be brought to this! Could I have suspected it when I brought them Lambert in the other day, this sword should have redeemed us from being dealt with as criminals, by that people for whom we had so gloriously exposed ourselves.' The colonel told him he had foreseen, ever since those usurpers thrust out the lawful authority of the land to enthrone themselves, it could end in nothing else; but the integrity of his heart in all he had done made him as cheerfully ready to suffer as to triumph in a good cause. The result of the House that day was to suspend Colonel Hutchinson and the rest from sitting in the House. Monk, after all his great professions, now sate still, and had not one word to interpose for any person, but was as forward to set vengeance on foot as any man.

The Life of Colonel Hutchinson has been repeatedly reprinted; the best edition is that by Sir C. H. Firth (1885, 1906).

Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle (c.1624-74), was distinguished even more for her indefatigable pursuit of literature than for her faithful attachment to her lord in his long exile during the time of the Commonwealth. She was the youngest of the eight children of Sir Charles Lucas, of St John's, near Colchester, and in 1643 became a maid of honour to Henrietta Maria. Having accompanied the queen to France, she met with William Cavendish, Marquis (afterwards Duke) of Newcastle (1592-1676), and was married to him at Paris in 1645. The Marquis took up his residence at Antwerp till the troubles were over, and there Margaret wrote Philosophical Fancies and Poems and Fancies, both published in 1653. Her husband assisted her in her compositions, a circumstance which Horace Walpole ridiculed in his Royal and Noble Authors; and so industrious were the noble pair that they filled more than a dozen mighty volumes, folio, with plays, poems, orations, observations on experimental philosophy, &c., whilst the Duke by himself produced, besides plays and poems, two works upon horsemanship. His share in his wife's literary enterprises is sometimes expressly indicated, but was usually unimportant. 'It pleased God,' the Duchess Margaret said, 'to command his servant Nature to indue me with a poetical and philosophical genius even from my very birth.' In her dresses the Duchess was as peculiar as in her books. 'I took great delight,' she confesses, 'in attiring myself in fine dressing and fashions, especially such fashions as I did invent myself.' Of these we learn something from Secretary Pepys: 'Met my Lady Newcastle going with her coaches and footmen all in velvet; herself with her velvet cap, her hair about her ears, many black patches about her mouth, without anything about her neck, and a black vest fitted to the body.' Pepys afterwards saw her in her coach, with a hundred boys and girls running after her. The Duchess wrote an autobiography (1656), and a Life of her husband the Duke (1667), a work which Charles Lamb considered a jewel for which no casket was rich enough. There is a singular charm in the complete devotion of the writer to her husband (whom she ranks above Julius Cæsar), as well as in the picture presented of antiquated gallantry, chivalrous loyalty, and pure affection. After the Restoration they lived in this country, the Duke being mainly occupied in managing what was recoverable of his once vast estates. Loving and flattering one another, the Duke and Duchess lived on in their eccentric—and, in spite of their heavy losses, magnificent—way for many years; and when both were gone, a stately monument in Westminster Abbey bore record that there lay 'the loyal Duke of Newcastle and his Duchess,' adding, in language written by the Duchess, which Addison admired, 'Her name was Margaret Lucas, youngest sister to the Lord Lucas of Colchester; a noble family, for all the brothers were valiant, and all the sisters virtuous.' The philosophising of 'the Female Oracle,' mostly worthless, is, even when sound, wonderfully tedious, though sometimes enlightened by weighty and pithy sayings. Her plays are almost unreadable. Her most popular poem was The Pastime and Recreation of the Queen of Fairies in Fairy Land. It often echoes Shakespeare, but has some fine lines of the

Duchess's own, such as those descriptive of the elf queen :

She on a dewy leaf doth bathe,
And as she sits, the leaf doth wave ;
There like a new-fallen flake of snow,
Doth her white limbs in beauty shew.
Her garments fair her maids put on,
Made of the pure light from the sun.

Mirth and Melancholy deals with allegorical personifications. The former woos the poetess to dwell with her, promising sport and pleasure, and drawing a gloomy but forcible sketch of her rival Melancholy :

Her voice is low, and gives a hollow sound ;
She hates the light, and is in darkness found ;
Or sits with blinking lamps, or tapers small,
Which various shadows make against the wall.
She loves nought else but noise which discord makes,
As croaking frogs whose dwelling is in lakes ;
The raven's hoarse, the mandrake's hollow groan,
And shrieking owls which fly i' the night alone ;
The tolling bell, which for the dead rings out ;
A mill, where rushing waters run about ;
The roaring winds, which shake the cedars tall,
Plough up the seas, and beat the rocks withal.
She loves to walk in the still moonshine night,
And in a thick dark grove she takes delight ;
In hollow caves, thatched houses, and low cells,
She loves to live, and there alone she dwells.

These are fragments from the Lives :

The White-Coats.

Amongst the rest of his army, my lord had chosen for his own regiment of foot 3000 of such valiant, stout, and faithful men (whereof many were bred in the moorish grounds of the northern parts) that they were ready to die at my lord's feet, and never gave over, whensoever they were engaged in action, until they had either conquer'd the enemy or lost their lives. They were called White-Coats for this following reason : My lord being resolved to give them new liveries, and there being not red cloth enough to be had, took up so much of white as would serve to cloath them, desiring withal their patience until he had got it dyed ; but they impatient of stay, requested my lord that he would be pleased to let them have it un-dyed as it was, promising they themselves would die it in the enemies blood : which request my lord granted them, and from that time they were called White-Coats.

The Duke's Diet.

In his diet he is so sparing and temperate, that he never eats nor drinks beyond his set proportion, so as to satisfie onely his natural appetite : he makes but one meal a day, at which he drinks two good glasses of small-beer, one about the beginning, the other at the end thereof, and a little glass of sack in the middle of his dinner ; which glass of sack he also uses in the morning for his breakfast, with a morsel of bread. His supper consists of an egg and a draught of small-beer. And by this temperance he finds himself very healthful, and may yet live many years, he being now of the age of seventy three, which I pray God from my soul to grant him.

His Recreation and Exercise.

His prime pastime and recreation hath always been the exercise of mannage and weapons ; which heroick arts he used to practise every day ; but I observing that when he had over-heated himself, he would be apt to take cold, prevail'd so far that at last he left the frequent use of the mannage, using nevertheless still the exercise of weapons ; and though he doth not ride himself so frequently as he hath done, yet he takes delight in seeing his horses of mannage rid by his escuyers, whom he instructs in that art for his own pleasure. But in the art of weapons (in which he has a method beyond all that ever were famous in it, found out by his own ingenuity and practice) he never taught any body but the now Duke of Buckingham, whose guardian he hath been, and his own two sons. The rest of his time he spends in musick, poetry, architecture and the like.

The Lives were edited in 1872 by Lower, and in 1886 and 1906 by Sir C. H. Firth. There are studies of the Duke and Duchess by E. Montégut (Paris, 1895) and T. Longueville (1910).

Richard Crashaw, the most mystical of the English poets, was the only child of William Crashaw (1572–1626), a Puritan incumbent of Whitechapel, himself a writer of religious poems as well as a strenuous controversialist. Richard, probably born in 1612, was educated at Charterhouse and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and was elected to a fellowship at Peterhouse in 1636. He spent much of the following years in religious offices and in writing devotional poetry, and, as the preface to his works tells us, 'like a primitive saint, offering more prayers by night than others usually offer in the day.' His intimacy with Nicholas Ferrar and his own Catholic tendencies led him and five other Fellows to refuse the Solemn League and Covenant, so, in 1643, anticipating ejection by the Parliamentary Commissioners, he found his way to Paris, endured great privation, and became a convert to the Roman Catholic faith. Through the friendship of Cowley, Crashaw obtained the notice of Henrietta Maria, then (1646) at Paris, and was recommended by her to the Pope and dignitaries of the Church in Italy. At first attached to the service of Cardinal Palotta in Rome, he then became a sub-canon of the church of Loretto ; and there he died in August 1649. Cowley honoured his memory in one of the finest elegies in the language (see page 644).

While at Cambridge, Crashaw published, in 1634, a volume of Latin poems and epigrams, in one of which—not otherwise noteworthy—occurs the famous line on the miracle at Cana :

Nympha pudica Deum vidit et erubuit.

The conceit is found already in a hymn of St Ambrose. Crashaw's not very perfect pentameter has been very variously Englished and quoted. The rendering by Pope's friend, Aaron Hill, is :

The bashful stream hath seen its God and blush'd ;
and Dryden has it in this form :

The conscious water saw its God and blush'd.

Mr Grosart quotes a French version of it by Victor Hugo.

In 1646, on the eve of his departure for France, appeared Crashaw's English poems, Steps to the Temple: Sacred Poems, with other Delights of the Muses. The greater part of the volume consists of religious poetry, in which the poet addresses the Saviour, the Virgin Mary, and Mary Magdalene, with all the passionate earnestness and fervour of a lover. He had a warm admiration for the ecstatic writings of St Teresa, to whom two of his best poems or hymns are addressed. Of the hymns Coleridge says: 'These verses were ever present to my mind whilst writing the second part of Christabel; if indeed . . . they did not suggest the first thought of the whole poem.' In these flights into the third heavens, 'with all his garlands and singing robes about him,' Crashaw, whom Dr George Macdonald calls 'the loveliest of our angel-birds,' as hardly having a foothold on this world, but floating in the upper air of it, expatiates amidst

An hundred thousand loves and graces,
And many a mystic thing
Which the divine embraces
Of the dear Spouse of Spirits with them will bring;
For which it is no shame
That dull mortality must not know a name.

Such seem to have been his daily contemplations, the heavenly manna on which his young spirit fed with delight. This mystical mode of thought and fancy naturally led to exaggeration and to conceits. Conceits pervaded all the poetry of the time, and Crashaw could hardly escape the infection, even if there had not been in his case special predisposing causes. But amidst all his abstractions, metaphors, and apostrophes, Crashaw is seldom tedious. His imagination was only too copious, and what Coleridge called his 'power and opulence of invention,' at times wonderfully suggestive, was unbridled. Coleridge says he gave in his poems the full ebullience of his imagination, unshapen into form; and Swinburne notes the 'dazzling intricacy and affluence in refinement, the supple and cunning implication, the choiceness and subtlety,' of the poet. Though his ardour is genuine, at times his fantastic imagery and incongruous conceits tend to make solemn things all but ludicrous. But his versification is sometimes highly musical; and except Milton no poet of his day (not Cowley, whom his age preferred) is so rich in the genuine ore of poetry. He had much in common with George Herbert, but, if more melodious and less crabbed, is less simple and direct. Unhappily his life was short, and even in it he did not realise his own dream (page 680):

A happy soul, that all the way
To heaven hath a summer's day.

The poet was an accomplished scholar, and his translations from the Latin and Italian possess both force and beauty. He translated part of the Sospetto d'Herode from the Italian of Giambattista Marino (or Marini), from whom the overloading of poetry with conceits was called stilo Marinesco or Marinism; but Crashaw outdid Marino in Marinism, and to the Italian's conceits added many ornaments of his own.

Crashaw's motives in joining the Church of Rome were naturally suspected by unfriends in his own day, and, rather on theological than æsthetical grounds, Puritans like Prynne denounced him as a 'fickle shuttlecock' and 'pitiful wire-drawer.' In the reign of 'good taste and common sense' his poetry had few admirers; even during the romantic revival Hazlitt grouped him (oddly enough) with Donne and Davies, as having mistaken learning for poetry, and spoke unsympathetically of 'his seething brain' and of his 'pouring out his devout raptures and zealous enthusiasm in a torrent of poetical hyperboles.' Coleridge proclaimed his influence on Christabel; parallels have been found in Shelley and Swinburne; and many other poets and critics have acknowledged Crashaw's fascination.

In the Sospetto Crashaw thus describes the abode of Satan:

Below the bottome of the great Abyesse,
There, where one center reconciles all things,
The World's profound heart pants; there placed is Mischief's old master; close about him clings
A curl'd knot of embracing snakes, that kisse
His correspondent cheekes: these loathsome strings
Hold the perverse prince in eternal ties
Fast bound, since first he forfeited the skies. . . .

Struck with these great concurrences of things.
Symptomes so deadly unto Death and him.
Faine would he have forgor what fatall strings
Eternally bind each rebellious limbe;
He shooke himselfe, and spread his spatious wings,
Which like two bosom'd sailes, embrace the dimme
Aire with a dismall shade, but all in vaine:
Of sturdy adamant is his strong chaine.

While thus Heav'n's highest counsails, by the low
Footsteps of their effects, he trac'd too well,
He tost his troubled eyes—embers that glow
Now with new rage, and wax too hot for Hell;
With his foule clawes he fenc'd his furrowed brow,
And gave a gastly shreake, whose horrid yell
Ran trembling through the hollow vault of Night,
The while his twisted tayle he gnaw'd for spight.

The judge of torments and the king of teares,
He fills a burnisht throne of quenchlesse fire:
And for his old faire robes of light, he weares
A gloomy mantle of darke flames; the tire
That crownes his hated head on high appears:
Where seav'n tall hornes (his empire's pride) aspire.
And to make up Hell's majesty, each horne
Seav'n crested Hydras, horribly adorne.

His eyes, the sullen dens of Death and Night,
Startle the dull ayre with a dismall red:
Such his fell glances, as the fatall light
Of staring comets, that looke kingdomes dead.
From his black nostrills and blew lips, in spight
Of Hell's owne stinke, a worser stench is spread.
His breath Hell's lightning is: and each deepe groane
Disdaines to think that Heav'n thunders alone.

His flaming eyes' dire exhalation,
 Unto a dreadfull pile gives fiery breath ;
 Whose unconsum'd consumption preys upon
 The never-dying life of a long death.
 In this sad house of slow destruction,
 (His shop of flames) hee fries himself, beneath
 A masse of woes ; his teeth for torment gnash,
 While his steele sides sound with his tayle's strong lash.

Satan remembers his own quarrel with Heaven,
 and notes that his future prospects are darker :

Heaven's golden-winged herald late he saw
 To a poore Galilean virgin sent ; . . .
 Mad with spight,
 He markt how the poore shepherds ran to pay
 Their simple tribute to the Babe whose Birth
 Was the great businesse both of Heav'n and earth.

He cannot comprehend

That He Whom the sun serves should faintly peepe
 Through clouds of infant flesh : that He the old
 Eternall Word should be a child, and weepe :
 That He Who made the fire should feare the cold :
 That Heav'n's high Majesty His court should keepe
 In a clay-cottage by each blast control'd :
 That Glories Self should serve our griefs and feares,
 And free Eternity submit to yeares.

Yet he sees that his power is seriously threatened, fears that hell too may be wrested from him, and takes counsel with the powers of hell, and commissions Cruelty to go and stir up Herod to jealousy and suspicion against the Babe (hence the title of the poem), and to take steps at once to defend himself and carry out Satan's schemes.

The beginning of Sainte Mary Magdalene or the Weeper is characteristic :

Hail, sister springs !
 Parents of sylver-footed rills !
 Ever-bubbling things !
 Thawing crystall ! Snowy hills
 Still spending, never spent ! I mean
 Thy fair eyes, sweet Magdalene !

Heavens thy fair eyes be ;
 Heavens of ever-falling starres.
 'Tis seed-time still with thee ;
 And starres thou sow'st, whose harvest dares
 Promise the Earth to counter-shine
 Whatever makes heavn's forehead fine.

The Flaming Heart ('upon the book and picture of the Seraphical Saint Teresa, as she is usually expressed with a seraphim beside her') ends thus :

O thou undanted daughter of desires !
 By all thy dower of lights and fires ;
 By all the eagle in thee, all the dove ;
 By all thy lives and deaths of love ;
 By thy large draughts of intellectuall day,
 And by thy thirsts of love more large then they ;
 By all thy brim-fill'd bowles of feirce desire,
 By thy last morning's draught of liquid fire ;
 By the full kingdome of that finall kisse
 That seiz'd thy parting soul, and seal'd thee His ;
 By all the Heav'n thou hast in Him
 (Fair sister of the seraphim !)

By all of Him we have in thee,
 Leave nothing of my self in me.
 Let me so read thy life that I
 Unto all life of mine may dy.

The first of the following elaborate similes or little allegories reminds us of a passage in Jeremy Taylor's Holy Dying, and the second of one of Shakespeare's best-known sonnets :

I've seen indeed the hopefull bud
 Of a ruddy rose that stood
 Blushing to behold the ray
 Of the new-saluted Day ;
 His tender toppe not fully spread ;
 The sweet dash of a shower new shead,
 Invited him no more to hide
 Within himselfe the purple pride
 Of his forward flower ; when lo,
 While he sweetly 'gan to shew
 His swelling glories, Auster spide him ;
 Cruel Auster thither hy'd him,
 And with the rush of one rude blast
 Sham'd not spitefully to wast
 All his leaves so fresh and sweet,
 And lay them trembling at his feet.
 I've seen the Morning's lovely ray
 Hover o'er the new-borne Day,
 With rosie wings, so richly bright,
 As if he scorned to thinke of Night,
 When a ruddy storme, whose scowle
 Made heaven's radiant face looke foule,
 Call'd for an untimely night
 To blot the newly blossomed light.
 But were the roses' blush so rare,
 Were the Morning's smile so faire
 As is he, nor cloud nor wind
 But would be courteous, would be kind.

Amidst his visions of angels ascending and descending, Crashaw had little time to devote to earthly love. But the second part of the Steps is mainly secular, and contains elegies, epitaphs, and even verses in praise of women. We quote entire his version of Musick's Duell, based, like the paraphrase in Ford's Lover's Melancholy (see pages 481, 483), on the Latin of the Roman Jesuit professor Strada. It is a version, not a translation, and much of the substance is Crashaw's own :

Now westward Sol had spent the richest beams
 Of noon's high glory, when, hard by the streams
 Of Tiber, on the sceane of a greene plat,
 Under protection of an oake there sate
 A sweet Lute's-master, in whose gentle aires
 He lost the day's heat, and his owne hot cares.
 Close in the covert of the leaves there stood
 A Nightingale, come from the neighbouring wood
 (The sweet inhabitant of each glad tree,
 Their muse, their syren, harmless syren she).
 There stood she listning, and did entertaine
 The musick's soft report, and mold the same
 In her owne murmures, that whatever mood
 His curious fingers lent, her voyce made good :
 The man perceiv'd his rivall, and her art,
 Dispos'd to give the light-foot lady sport,
 Awakes his lute, and 'gainst the fight to come
 Informs it in a sweet præludium

Of closer straines, and ere the warre begin,
 He lightly skirmishes on every string,
 Charg'd with a flying touch: and streightway she Carves out her dainty voyce as readily,
 Into a thousand sweet distinguish'd tones,
 And reckons up in soft divisions
 Quicke volumes of wild notes; to let him know
 By that shrill taste, she could do something too.

His nimble hands' instinct then taught each string
 A capring cheerefullnesse; and made them sing
 To their owne dance; now negligently rash
 He throws his arme, and with a long drawne dash
 Blends all together; then distinctly tripps
 From this to that; then quicke returning skipps
 And snatches this again, and pauses there.
 Shee measures every measure, every where
 Meets art with art; sometimes as if in doubt,
 Not perfect yet, and fearing to be out,
 Trayles her plaine ditty in one long-spun note
 Through the sleeke passage of her open throat,
 A cleare unwrinkled song; then doth shee point it
 With tender accents, and severely joynt it
 By short diminutives, that being rear'd
 In controverting warbles evenly shar'd,
 With her sweet selfe shee wrangles. Hee amazed
 That from so small a channell should be rais'd
 The torrent of a voyce, whose melody
 Could melt into such sweet variety,
 Straines higher yet, that tickled with rare art
 The tatling strings (each breathing in his part)
 Most kindly doe fall out; the grumbling base
 In surly groans disdaines the treble's grace;
 The high-perch't treble chirps at this, and chides,
 Untill his finger (Moderatour) hides
 And closes the sweet quarrell, rowling all,
 Hoarse, shrill at once; as when the trumpets call
 Hot Mars to th' harvest of Death's field, and woo
 Men's hearts into their hands: this lesson too
 Shee gives him back; her supple brest thrills out
 Sharpe aires, and staggers in a warbling doubt
 Of dallying sweetnesse, hovers o're her skill,
 And folds in wav'd notes with a trembling bill
 The plyant series of her slippery song;
 Then starts shee suddenly into a throng
 Of short, thicke sobs, whose thundring volleys float
 And roule themselves over her lubrick throat
 In panting murmurs, 'still'd out of her breast,
 That ever-bubling spring; the sugred nest
 Of her delicious soule, that there does lye
 Bathing in streames of liquid melodie;
 Musick's best seed-plot, whence in ripen'd aires
 A golden-headed harvest fairly reares
 His honey-dropping tops, plow'd by her breath,
 Which there reciprocally laboureth
 In that sweet soyle; it seemes a holy quire
 Founded to th' name of great Apollo's lyre,
 Whose silver-roofe rings with the sprightly notes
 Of sweet-lipp'd angel-imps, that swill their throats
 In creame of morning Helicon, and then
 Preferre soft-anthems to the eares of men,
 To woo them from their beds, still murmuring
 That men can sleepe while they their mattens sing
 (Most divine service), whose so early lay
 Prevents the eye-lids of the blushing Day!
 There you might heare her kindle her soft voyce,
 In the close murmur of a sparkling noyse,

And lay the ground-worke of her hopefull song,
 Still keeping in the forward streame, so long,
 Till a sweet whirle-wind (striving to get out)
 Heaves her soft bosome, wanders round about,
 And makes a pretty earthquake in her breast,
 Till the fledg'd notes at length forsake their nest,
 Fluttering in wanton shoales, and to the sky,
 Wing'd with their owne wild ecchos, prattling fly.
 Shee opes the floodgate, and lets loose a tide
 Of streaming sweetnesse, which in state doth ride
 On the wav'd backe of every swelling straine,
 Rising and falling in a pompous traine.
 And while she thus discharges a shrill peale
 Of flashing aires, she qualifies their zeale
 With the coole epode of a graver noat,
 Thus high, thus low, as if her silver throat
 Would reach the brazen voyce of War's hoarse bird;
 Her little soule is ravisht, and so pour'd
 Into loose extasies, that she is plac't
 Above her selfe, Musick's Enthusiast.

Shame now and anger mixt a double staine
 In the Musitian's face; yet once againe,
 Mistresse! I come; now reach a straine, my lute,
 Above her mocke, or be for ever mute;
 Or tune a song of victory to me,
 Or to thy selfe, sing thine own obsequie:
 So said, his hands sprightly as fire, he flings
 And with a quavering coynesse tastes the strings.
 The sweet-lip't sisters, musically frighted,
 Singing their feares, are fearefully delighted,
 Trembling as when Apollo's golden haire
 Are fan'd and frizled, in the wanton ayres
 Of his own breath, which married to his lyre
 Doth tune the spheares, and make Heaven's selfe looke
 From this to that, from that to this he flies, [higher.
 Feeles Musick's pulse in all her arteries;
 Caught in a net which there Apollo spreads,
 His fingers struggle with the vocall threads.
 Following those little rills, he sinks into
 A sea of Helicon; his hand does goe
 Those pathes of sweetnesse which with nectar drop,
 Softer than that which pants in Hebe's cup.
 The humours strings expound his learned touch,
 By various glosses; now they seeme to grutch,
 And murmur in a buzzing dinne, then gingle
 In shrill-tongu'd accents, striving to be single.
 Every smooth turne, every delicious stroake
 Gives life to some new grace; thus doth h' invoke Sweetnesse by all her names; thus, bravely thus (Fraught with a fury so harmonious)
 The lute's light genius now does proudly rise,
 Heav'd on the surges of swolne rapsodies,
 Whose flourish (meteor-like) doth curl the aire
 With flash of high-borne fancies: here and there
 Dancing in lofty measures, and anon
 Creeps on the soft touch of a tender tone,
 Whose trembling murmurs melting in wild aires
 Runs to and fro, complaining his sweet cares,
 Because those pretious mysteres that dwell
 In Musick's ravish't soule he dares not tell,
 But whisper to the world: thus doe they vary
 Each string his note, as if they meant to carry
 Their Master's blest soule (snatcht out at his eares
 By a strong extasy) through all the spheares
 Of Musick's heaven, and seat it there on high
 In th' empyræum of pure harmony.

At length (after so long, so loud a strife
Of all the strings, still breathing the best life
Of blest variety, attending on
His fingers fairest revolution
In many a sweet rise, many as sweet a fall)
A full-mouth'd diapason swallows all.

This done, he lists what she would say to this,
And she, (although her breath's late exercise
Had dealt too roughly with her tender throate,)
Yet summons all her sweet powers for a noate.
Alas ! in vaine ! for while (sweet soule !) she tries
To measure all those wild diversities
Of chatt'ring strings, by the small size of one
Poore simple voyce, rais'd in a naturall tone ;
She failes, and failing grieves, and grieving dyes.
She dyes : and leaves her life the Victor's prise,
Falling upon his lute : O, fit to have
(That liv'd so sweetly) dead so sweet a grave !

Wishes.

To his Supposed Mistress.

Who ere she be,
That not impossible she
That shall command my heart and me ;

Where ere she lye,
Lock't up from mortall eye,
In shady leaves of Destiny ;

Till that ripe birth
Of studied Fate stand forth,
And teach her faire steps tread our Earth ;

Till that divine
Idæa take a shrine
Of chrystall flesh, through which to shine ;

Meet you her, my wishes,
Bespeake her to my blisses,
And be ye call'd, my absent kisses.

I wish her beauty
That owes not all its duty
To gaudy tire or glistening shoo-tye.

More than the spoyle
Of shop, or silkworme's toyle,
Or a bought blush, or a set smile.

A face that's best
By its owne beauty drest,
And can alone commend the rest.

A cheeke where Youth,
And blood, with pen of Truth
Write what their reader sweetly ru'th.

Lipps, where all day
A lover's kisse may play,
Yet carry nothing thence away.

Eyes, that displace
The neighbour diamond, and out-face
That sunshine, by their own sweet grace.

Tresses, that weare
Jewells but to declare
How much themselves more pretious are. . . .

Dayes, that need borrow
No part of their good morrow
From a fore-spent night of sorrow.

Life, that dares send
A challenge to his end,
And when it comes say, Welcome friend !

'Sydnæan showers
Of sweet discourse, whose powers
Can crown old Winter's head with flowers.

Soft silken hours ;
Open sunnes ; shady bowers ;
'Bove all, nothing within that lowers.

What ere delight
Can make Daye's forehead bright,
Or give downe to the wings of Night.

I wish her store
Of worth may leave her poore
Of wishes ; and I wish——no more.

From 'In Praise of Lessius' Rule of Health.'

Heark hither, reader ! wilt thou see
Nature her own physician be ?
Wilt see a man all his own wealth,
His own musick, his own health ?
A man whose sober soul can tell
How to wear her garments well ?
Her garments, that upon her sit,
As garments should do, close and fit ?
A well-clothed soul that's not opprest
Nor choked with what she should be drest ?
A soul sheath'd in a crystall shrine,
Through which all her bright features shine ?
As when a piece of wanton lawn,
A thin aërial vail, is drawn
O're Beauty's face, seeming to hide,
More sweetly shews the blushing bride ;
A soul whose intellectual beams
No mists do mask, no lazie steams ?
A happie soul, that all the way
To Heav'n hath a Summer's day ?
Would'st see a man whose well-warmed bloud
Bathes him in a genuine fload ?
A man whose tuned humours be
A seat of rarest harmonie ?
Would'st see blithe looks, fresh cheeks, beguile
Age ? Would'st see December smile ?
Would'st see a nest of roses grow
In a bed of reverend snow ?
Warm thoughts, free spirits flattering
Winter's self into a Spring ?
In sum, would'st see a man that can
Live to be old, and still a man ?
Whose latest and most leaden houres
Fall with soft wings, stuck with soft flowres,
And when Life's sweet fable ends,
His soul and bodie part like friends ;
No quarrels, murmures, no delay ;
A kisse, a sigh, and so away ?
This rare one, reader, wouldst thou see,
Heark hither : and thyself be he.

Part of an ode præfix'd to a little prayer-book
given to a young gentlewoman.

Lo! here a little volume, but great book
(Feare it not, sweet,
It is no hipocrit),
Much larger in itself than in its looke.
A nest of new-born sweets;
Whose native fires, disdaining
To ly thus folded and complaining
Of these ignoble sheets,
Affect more comly bands
(Fair one) from thy kind hands;
And confidently look
To find the rest
Of a rich binding in your breast.
It is, in one choise handfull, Heavn and all
Heavn's royall host incampt thus small;
To prove that true, schooles use to tell,
Ten thousand angels in one point can dwell.
It is Love's great artillery,
Which here contracts it self, and comes to ly
Close couch't in your white bosom, and from thence,
As from a snowy fortress of defence,
Against the ghostly foe to take your part,
And fortify the hold of your chast heart.
It is an armory of light:
Let constant use but keep it bright,
You'll find it yields
To holy hands and humble hearts,
More swords and sheilds
Than sin hath snares or Hell hath darts.
Only be sure
The hands be pure
That hold these weapons, and the eyes
Those of turtles, chaste and true,
Wakefull and wise,
Here is a freind shall fight for you.
Hold but this book before your heart,
Let Prayer alone to play his part.
But O the heart
That studyes this high art
Must be a sure housekeeper,
And yet no sleeper.

Dear soul, be strong!
Mercy will come e're long,
And bring his bosome full of blessings—
Flowers of never-fading graces,
To make immortal dressings,
For worthy soules whose wise embraces
Store up themselves for Him Who is alone
The spouse of virgins and the Virgin's son.

From 'Hymn to the Name above every Name,
the Name of Jesus.'

Come, lovely Name! Life of our hope!
Lo, we hold our hearts wide ope!
Unlock Thy cabinet of Day,
Dearest Sweet, and come away.
Lo, how the thirsty Lands
Gasp for thy golden showres, with long-stretcht hands!
Lo, how the laboring Earth,
That hopes to be
All Heaven by thee,
Leapes at Thy birth!

The attending World, to wait Thy rise,
First turn'd to eyes;
And then, not knowing what to doe,
Turn'd them to teares, and spent them too.
Come, royall Name! and pay the expence
Of all this pretious patience:

O come away
And kill the death of this delay!
O see, so many worlds of barren yeares
Melted and measur'd out in seas of teares:
Oh, see the weary liddes of wakefull hope
(Love's eastern windowes) all wide ope

With curtains drawn,
To catch the daybreak of Thy dawn.
Oh, dawn at last, long-lookt-for day!
Take Thine own wings and come away.
Lo, where aloft it comes! It comes among
The conduct of adoring spirits, that throng
Like diligent bees, and swarm about it.

O, they are wise,
And know what sweetes are suck't from out it.

It is the hive
By which they thrive,
Where all their hoard of hony lies.
Lo, where it comes, upon the snowy Dove's
Soft back, and brings a bosom big with loves.
Welcome to our dark world, thou womb of Day!
Unfold Thy fair conceptions, and display
The birth of our bright joyes

Sweet Name! in Thy each syllable
A thousand blest Arabias dwell;
A thousand hills of frankincense;
Mountains of myrrh and beds of spices,
And ten thousand paradises,
The soul that tastes Thee takes from thence.
How many unknown worlds there are
Of comforts, which Thou hast in keeping!
How many thousand mercyes there
In Pitty's soft lap ly a-sleeping!
Happy he who has the art
To awake them,
And to take them

Home, and lodge them in his heart.
Oh, that it were as it was wont to be!
When Thy old freinds, on fire all full of Thee,
Fought against frowns with smiles; gave glorious chase
To persecutions; and against the face
Of Death and feircest dangers, durst with brave
And sober pace march on to meet a grave!
On their bold breasts about the world they bore Thee,
And to the teeth of Hell stood up to teach Thee;
In centre of their inmost soules they wore Thee,
Where racks and torments striv'd in vain to reach Thee.

Little, alas, thought they
Who tore the fair breasts of Thy freinds,
Their fury but made way
For Thee, and serv'd them in Thy glorious ends.
What did their weapons, but with wider pores
Enlarge Thy flaming-brested lovers,
More freely to transpire
That impatient fire

The heart that hides Thee hardly covers?
What did their weapons but sett wide the doores
For Thee? fair purple doores of Love's devising;
The ruby windowes which inricht the east

Of Thy so oft-repeated rising !
 Each wound of theirs was Thy new morning,
 And re-enthroned Thee in Thy rosy nest,
 With blush of Thine Own blood Thy day adorning :
 It was the witt of love oreflowd the bounds
 Of wrath, and made Thee way through all these wounds.
 Welcome, dear, all-adored Name !

For sure there is no knee

That knows not Thee ;

Or if there be such sonns of shame,

Alas ! what will they doe

When stubborn rocks shall bow,

And hills hang down their heavn-saluting heads

To seek for humble beds

Of dust, where, in the bashfull shades of night,

Next to their own low Nothing they may ly,

And couch before the dazeling light of Thy dread Majesty.

They that by Love's mild dictate now

Will not adore Thee,

Shall then with just confusion bow

And break before thee.

The Steps of 1646 were reprinted in 1648; and as Carmen Deo Nostro (from one of the poems), with twelve vignettes from Crashaw's own designs, but without the translations from Marino and Strada, in 1652. Grosart edited the works for the Fuller Worthies (1872-73; suppt. 1887-88); Waller edited the Poems (English and Latin, 1 vol. 1904), and Martin edited the Poems English, Latin, and Greek (1927). Tutin published the English Poems, almost complete, in 2 vols. in 1900; and separately, the secular poems as The Delights of the Muses (1 vol. 1900). See Mario Praz, Secentismo e Marinismo in Inghilterra (1925).

Henry Vaughan (1622-95), long regarded with disdain as 'one of the harshest of the inferior order of the poetic school of conceits,' is now classed with George Herbert and Crashaw as a religious poet of exquisite feeling and fancy, tender and delicate expression, and meditative mysticism; though much of what he wrote is uncouth and obscure, dull and tedious, broken only occasionally by noble thoughts. Born at the farmhouse of Newton, near Skethrog, in the parish of Llan-saintffraed in Brecon, on 17th April 1622, he called himself 'Silurist' as a native of the territory of the ancient Silures; and he was twin-brother of Thomas Vaughan (1622-66), the alchemist. The brothers studied at Jesus College, Oxford, and shared the loyalty of their family for the royal cause. Both of them suffered imprisonment and deprivation, although only Thomas actually bore arms for the king. Early a devoted admirer of Ben Jonson, Randolph, and the other poets of the day, in 1646 he published his first Poems, with the Tenth Satyre of Juvenal Englished. He now studied medicine, became M.D., and settled down to practise first at Brecon, and then at his birthplace. Olor Iscanus ('Swan of Usk'), a collection of poems and translations, was sent to his brother in Oxford, and published without authority in 1651. A serious illness deepened his religious convictions, and henceforward time and eternity, sin and grace, were his main themes. Silex Scintillans ('Sparks from the Flint'; two parts, 1650-55) are religious poems and meditations. Flores Solitudinis and The Mount of Olives (1652) are devotional prose pieces. Thalia Rediviva: the Pastimes and Diversions of a Countrey Muse (1678), is a collection of poems by the twin-brothers—elegies, translations, religious verses. Henry Vaughan died 23rd April 1695; and his grave in Llan-saintffraed churchyard was restored in 1896. The close similarity between Vaughan's Retreate and Wordsworth's famous ode on Intimations of Immortality has often and justly been dwelt on. The earlier poem is at least an intimation or forerunner of the more famous one. The Retreate and Beyond the Veil are universally counted amongst the purest and most exquisite reflective pieces of the age in which Vaughan lived. He complains of the proverbial poverty and suffering of poets:

As they were merely thrown upon the stage,
 The mirth of fools, and legends of the age.

But he was not without hopes of renown, and he wished the river of his native vale, the Usk, to share in the distinction:

When I am laid to rest hard by thy streams,
 And my sun sets where first it sprang in beams,
 I'll leave behind me such a large kind light
 As shall redeem thee from oblivious night,
 And in these vows which, living yet, I pay,
 Shed such a precious and enduring ray,
 As shall from age to age thy fair name lead
 Till rivers leave to run, and men to read!

Early Rising and Prayer.

When first thy eyes unveil, give thy soul leave
 To do the like; our bodies but forerun
 The spirit's duty: true hearts spread and heave
 Unto their God, as flowers do to the sun:
 Give Him thy first thoughts then, so shalt thou keep Him company all day, and in Him sleep.

Yet never sleep the sun up; prayer shou'd
 Dawn with the day: there are set awful hours
 'Twixt heaven and us; the manna was not good
 After sunrising; fair day sullies flowres:
 Rise to prevent the sun; sleep doth sins glut,
 And heaven's gate opens when this world's is shut.

Walk with thy fellow-creatures; note the hush
 And whispers amongst them. There's not a spring
 Or leaf but hath his morning-hymn; each bush
 And oak doth know I AM. Canst thou not sing?
 O leave thy cares and follies! Go this way,
 And thou art sure to prosper all the day.

Serve God before the world; let Him not go
 Until thou hast a blessing; then resigne
 The whole unto Him; and remember who Prevailed by wrestling ere the sun did shine.
 Pour oyl upon the stones, weep for thy sin,
 Then journey on, and have an eie to heav'n.

Mornings are mysteries; the first world's youth,
 Man's resurrection, and the future's bud,
 Shroud in their births; the crown of life, light, truth,
 Is styled their 'starre,' the 'stone,' and 'hidden food.'
 Three blessings wait upon them, two of which Should move; they make us holy, happy, rich.

When the world's up, and every swarm abroad,
 Keep well thy temper ; mix not with each clay ;
 Dispatch necessities ; life hath a load
 Which must be carri'd on, and safely may ;
 Yet keep those cares without thee ; let the heart
 Be God's alone, and choose the better part. . . .

From 'The Rainbow.'

Still young and fine ! but what is still in view
 We slight as old and soil'd, though fresh and new.
 How bright wert thou when Shem's admiring eye
 Thy burnisht flaming arch did first descry !
 When Terah, Nahor, Haran, Abram, Lot,
 The youthful world's gray fathers, in one knot
 Did with intente looks watch every hour
 For thy new light, and trembled at each shower !
 When thou dost shine, darkness looks white and fair,
 Forms turn to musick, clouds to smiles and air :
 Rain gently spends his honey-drops, and pours
 Balm on the cleft earth, milk on grass and flowers.
 Bright pledge of peace and sunshine ! the sure tye
 Of my Lord's hand, the object of his eye !
 When I behold thee, though my light be dim,
 Distinct, and low, I can in thine see Him,
 Who looks upon thee from his glorious throne,
 And mindes the covenant 'twixt all and One. . . .

Monsieur Gombauld.

[From Olor Iscannus. Written after reading the romance Endymion, by the French Protestant poet J. O. de Gombauld (1570-1666), which was translated in 1637.]

I 'ave read thy soul's faire night-peece, and have seen
 Th' amours and courtship of the silent queen ;
 Her stoln descents to earth, and what did move her
 To juggle first with heav'n, then with a lover ;
 With Latmos' lowder rescue, and, alas !
 To find her out, a hue and crie in brasse ;
 Thy journall of deep mysteries, and sad
 Nocturnall pilgrimage ; with thy dreams clad
 In fancies darker than thy cave ; thy glasse
 Of sleepe draughts ; and as thy soul did passe
 In her calm voyage, what discourse she heard
 Of spirits, what dark groves and ill-shap'd guard
 Ismena led thee through ; with thy proud flight
 O'r Periardes, and deep-musing night
 Near fair Eurotas' banks ; what solemn green
 The neighbour shades weare ; and what forms are seen
 In their large bowers, with that sad path and seat
 Which none but light-heel'd nymphs and fairies beat ;
 Their solitary life, and how exempt
 From common frailty, the severe contempt
 They have of man, their priviledge to live
 A tree or fountain, and in that reprieve
 What ages they consume : with the sad valed
 Of Diophania ; and the mournfull tale
 Of th' bleeding, vocall myrtle : these and more,
 Thy richer thoughts, we are upon the score
 To thy rare fancy for. Nor doest thou fall
 From thy first majesty, or ought at all
 Betray consumption. Thy full vig'rous bayes
 Wear the same green, and scorne the lene decayes
 Of stile or matter ; just so I have known
 Some chrystal spring, that from the neighbour down
 Deriv'd her birth, in gentle murmurs steal
 To the next vale, and proudly there reveal

Her streams in lowder accents, adding still
 More noise and waters to her channell, till
 At last, swoln with increase, she glides along
 The lawnes and meadows, in a wanton throng
 Of frothy billows, and in one great name
 Swallows the tributary brooks' drown'd fame.

Nor are they meere inventions, for we
 In th' same peece find scatter'd philosophie
 And hidden, disperst truths, that enfolded lye
 In the dark shades of deep allegoric,
 So neatly weav'd, like arras, they descrie
 Fables with truth, fancy with mysterie.
 So, that thou hast, in this thy curious mould,
 Cast that commended mixture wish'd of old,
 Which shall these contemplations render far
 Lesse mutable, and lasting as their star ;
 And while there is a people, or a sunne,
 Endymion's storie with the moon shall runne.

From 'The Timber.'

Sure thou didst flourish once, and many springs,
 Many bright mornings, much dew, many showers,
 Passed ore thy head ; many light hearts and wings
 Which now are dead, lodg'd in thy living bowers.

And still a new succession siffts and flies,
 Fresh groves grow up, and their green branches shoot
 Towards the old and still enduring skies,
 While the low violet thrives at their root.

But thou beneath the sad and heavy line
 Of death, doth waste all senseless, cold, and dark,
 Where not so much as dreams of light may shine,
 Nor any thought of greenness, leaf, or bark.

And yet as if some deep hate and dissent,
 Bred in thy growth betwixt high winds and thee,
 Were still alive, thou dost great storms resent
 Before they come, and know'st how near they be.

Else all at rest thou lyeest, and the fierce breath
 Of tempests can no more disturb thy ease ;
 But this thy strange resentment after death
 Means onely those who broke, in life, thy peace.

So murdered man, when lovely life is done,
 And his blood freez'd, keeps in the center still
 Some secret sense, which makes the dead blood run
 At his approach that did the body kill.

And is there any murth'rer worse than sin ?
 Or any storms more foul than a lewd life ?
 Or what resentient can work more within
 Then true remorse, when with past sins at strife ?

The Retreat.

Happy those early dayes, when I
 Shin'd in my angell-infancy !
 Before I understood this place
 Appointed for my second race,
 Or taught my soul to fancy ought
 But a white, celestially thought ;
 When yet I had not walkt above
 A mile or two from my first love,
 And looking back, at that short space,
 Could see a glimpse of His bright face ;

When on some gilded cloud, or flowre,
My gazing soul would dwell an houre,
And in those weaker glories spy
Some shadows of eternity ;
Before I taught my tongue to wound
My conscience with a sinfull sound,
Or had the black art to dispence
A sev'rall sinne to ev'ry sence,
But felt through all this fleshly dresse
Bright shootes of everlastingnesse.

O how I long to travell back,
And tread again that ancient track !
That I might once more reach that plaine,
Where first I left my glorious traine ;
From whence th' inlightned spirit sees
That shady City of palme trees.
But ah ! my soule with too much stay
Is drunk, and staggers in the way !
Some men a forward motion love,
But I by backward steps would move ;
And when this dust falls to the urn,
In that state I came, return.

Beyond the Veil.

They are all gone into the world of light !
And I alone sit lingring here ;
Their very memory is fair and bright,
And my sad thoughts doth clear.

It glows and glitters in my cloudy brest,
Like stars upon some gloomy grove,
Or those faint beams in which this hill is drest,
After the sun's remove.

I see them walking in an air of glory,
Whose light doth trample on my days :
My days, which are at best but dull and hoary,
Meer glimmering and decays.

O holy Hope ! and high Humility,
High as the heavens above !
These are your walks, and you have shew'd them me,
To kindle my cold love.

Dear, beauteous Death ! the jewel of the just,
Shining no where but in the dark ;
What mysteries do lie beyond thy dust,
Could man outlook that mark !

He that hath found some fledg'd bird's nest may know
At first sight if the bird be flown ;
But what fair well or grove he sings in now,
That is to him unknown.

And yet, as angels in some brighter dreams
Call to the soul, when man doth sleep :
So some strange thoughts transcend our wonted theams,
And into glory peep.

If a star were confin'd into a tomb,
Her captive flames must needs burn there ;
But when the hand that lockt her up gives room,
She 'l shine through all the sphere.

O Father of eternal life, and all
Created glories under Thee !
Resume Thy spirit from this world of thrall
Into true liberty.

Either disperse these mists, which blot and fill
My perspective still as they pass :
Or else remove me hence unto that hill,
Where I shall need no glass.

(From Silex Scintillans.)

Childe-hood.

I cannot reach it ; and my striving eye
Dazles at it as at eternity.
Were now that Chronicle alive,
Those white designs which children drive,
And the thoughts of each harmless hour,
With their content too in my pow'r,
Quickly would I make my path ev'n,
And by meer playing go to Heaven.

Why should men love
A wolf more than a lamb or dove ?
Or choose hell-fire and brimstone streams
Before bright-stars and God's own beams ?
Who kisseth thorns will hurt his face,
But flowers do both refresh and grace ;
And sweetly living—fie on men !
Are, when dead, medicinal then ;
If seeing much should make staid eyes,
And long experience should make wise ;
Since all that age doth teach is ill,
Why should I not love childe-hood still ?
Why, if I see a rock or shelf,
Shall I from thence cast down my self ?
Or by complying with the world,
From the same precipice be hurl'd ?
Those observations are but foul,
Which make me wise to lose my soul.

And yet the practice worldlings call
Business, and weighty action all,
Checking the poor childe for his play
But gravely cast themselves away.

Dear, harmless age ! the short, swift span
Where weeping Virtue parts with man ;
Where love without lust dwells, and bends
What way we please without self-ends.

An age of mysteries ! which he Must live twice that would God's face see ;
Which angels guard, and with it play,
Angels ! which foul men drive away.

How do I study now, and scan
Thee more than ere I studyed man,
And onely see through a long night
Thy edges and thy bordering light
O for thy center and mid-day !
For sure that is 'the narrow way !'

The World.

I saw Eternity the other night,
Like a great ring of pure and endless light,
All calm, as it was bright ;
And round beneath it, Time in hours, days, years,
Driv'n by the spheres
Like a vast shadow mov'd ; in which the world
And all her train were hurl'd.
The doting lover in his quaintest strain
Did there complain ;
Neer him, his lute, his fancy, and his slights,
Wit's sour delights,

With gloves, and knots, the silly snares of pleasure,
 Yet his dear treasure,
 All scatter'd lay, while he his eyes did pour
 Upon a flowr.

The darksome statesman, hung with weights and woe,
 Like a thick midnight-fog, mov'd there so slow,
 He did not stay, nor go ;
 Condemning thoughts—like sad eclipses—scowl
 Upon his soul,
 And clouds of crying witnesses without
 Pursued him with one shout.
 Yet digg'd the mole, and lest his ways be found,
 Workt under ground,
 Where he did clutch his prey ; but one did see
 That policie ;
 Churches and altars fed him ; perjuries
 Were gnats and flies ;
 It rain'd about him bloud and tears, but he Drank them as free.

The fearfull miser on a heap of rust
 Sate pining all his life there, did scarce trust
 His own hands with the dust,
 Yet would not place one peece alone, but lives
 In fear of theeves.
 Thousands there were as frantick as himself,
 And hugg'd each one his pelf ;
 The downright epicure plac'd heav'n in sense,
 And scorn'd pretence ;
 While others, slipt into a wide excesse,
 Said little lesse ;
 The weaker sort, slight, triviall wares inslave,
 Who think them brave ;
 And poor despised Truth sate counting by
 Their victory.

Yet some, who all this while did weep and sing,
 And sing and weep, soar'd up into the ring ;
 But most would use no wing.
 O fools—said I—thus to prefer dark night
 Before true light !
 To live in grotts and caves, and hate the day
 Because it shews the way,
 The way which from this dead and dark abode
 Leads up to God ;
 A way where you might tread the sun, and be
 More bright than he !
 But as I did their madness so discusse
 One whisper'd thus,
 'This ring the Bridegroom did for none provide,
 But for His bride.'

John Wilkins (1614-72), Bishop of Chester, was the son of an Oxford goldsmith, but was born near Daventry, in Northamptonshire; and he studied at New Inn Hall and Magdalen Hall in Oxford. As chaplain to Lord Say, Lord Berkeley, and the Court-Palatine of the Rhine, he found time for extensive studies in mathematics and physics; and having sided with the popular party during the Civil War, he received the headship of Wadham College. He was one of a small knot of university men who used to meet for the cultivation of experimental philosophy as a diversion from the painful thoughts excited by public calamities, and who, after the Restoration, were incorporated by Charles II. under the title of the Royal Society. Having married a sister of Oliver Cromwell in 1656, he was enabled, by a dispensation from the Protector, to retain his office in Wadham College, notwithstanding a rule which made celibacy imperative; three years afterwards he became Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. At the Restoration he was ejected from this office; but his politics being neither violent nor unaccommodating, he became preacher at Grey's Inn, rector of St Laurence Jewry, and Dean of Ripon; and, by the favour of the Duke of Buckingham, was advanced in 1668 to the see of Chester. Bishop Burnet praised Wilkins 'as a man of as great mind, as true a judgment, as eminent virtues, and of as good a soul as any I ever knew. Though he married Cromwell's sister, yet he made no other use of that alliance but to do good-offices, and to cover the University of Oxford from the sourness of Owen and Goodwin.' On the other hand, like his friend and son-in-law Tillotson and other moderate Churchmen, Wilkins was much disliked by the High-Church party; Tories thought him a trimmer, and Anthony Wood maliciously said 'there was nothing deficient in him but a constant mind and settled principles.' He wrote some theological and mathematical works, and in early life (1638) published The Discovery of a New World; or a Discourse tending to prove that 'tis probable there may be another Habitable World in the Moon: with [in the 3rd edition, 1640] a Discourse concerning the Possibility of a Passage thither. The principal part of the work is an earnest attempt to refute religious and other objections to the doctrine of a plurality of worlds. Only in the fourteenth and last chapter does he become a pioneer on the path Swift in satire and E. A. Poe and Jules Verne in pure creative fiction were also to adventure on, when he seriously supports the proposition 'that it is possible for some of our posterity to find out a conveyance to this other world, and, if there be inhabitants there, to have commerce with them.' He admits that this feat has in the present state of human knowledge an air of utter impossibility; yet from this no hostile inference ought to be drawn, seeing that many things formerly supposed impossible have actually been accomplished. 'If we do but consider,' says he, 'by what steps and leasure all arts do usually rise to their growth, we shall have no cause to doubt why this also may not hereafter be found out amongst other secrets. It hath constantly yet been the method of Providence not presently to shew us all, but to lead us on by degrees from the knowledge of one thing to another. 'Twas a great while ere the planets were distinguished from the fixed stars; and some time after that ere the morning and evening stars were found to be the same. And in greater space, I doubt not but this also, and other as excellent mysteries, will be discovered.' Wilkins goes on to discuss the difficulties in the way of accomplishing the aerial journey. He disposes, in sufficiently airy fashion, of the obstacles presented by 'the natural heaviness of a man's body' and 'the extreme coldness and thinness of the ethereal air'—he held that there was air all the way; and having made it appear that even a swift journey to the moon would probably occupy a period of six months, even if a man could fly a thousand miles in a day (the distance being, as he computed, 179,712 miles), he naturally stumbles on the question, 'And how were it possible for any to tarry so long without diet or sleep?'

I suppose there could be no trusting to that fancy of Philo the Jew (mentioned before), who thinks that the musick of the spheres should supply the strength of food. Nor can we well conceive how a man should be able to carry so much luggage with him as might serve for his viaticum in so tedious a journey. But if he could, yet he must have some time to rest and sleep in. And I believe he shall scarce find any lodgings by the way. No inns to entertain passengers, nor any castles in the air—unless they be enchanted ones—to receive poor pilgrims or errant knights. And so, consequently, he cannot have any possible hopes of reaching thither.

He has, however, first to make the preliminary large postulate, 'Supposing a man could fly or by other means raise himself twenty miles upwards or thereabouts' above the vaporous atmosphere; then, he believes, he would be beyond the influence of the magnetical virtue of the earth and the force of gravity, and so 'it were possible for him to come unto the moon.' This is seriously argued at length—such was then the state of science. The difficulty as to sleep is a minor one: 'Seeing we do not then spend ourselves in any labour, we shall not, it may be, need the refreshment of sleep. But if we do, we cannot desire a softer bed than the air, where we may repose ourselves firmly and safely as in our chambers.' The necessary supply of food still remains to be provided for:

And here 'tis considerable, that since our bodies will then be devoid of gravity, and other impediments of motion, we shall not at all spend ourselves in any labour, and so, consequently, not much need the reparation of diet; but may, perhaps, live altogether without it, as those creatures have done who, by reason of their sleeping for many days together, have not spent any spirits, and so not wanted any food, which is commonly related of serpents, crocodiles, bears, cuckoos, swallows, and such-like. To this purpose Mendoza reckons up divers strange relations: as that of Epimenides, who is storied to have slept seventy-five years; and another of a rustic in Germany, who, being accidentally covered with a hayrick, slept there for all the autumn and the winter following without any nourishment.

Perhaps the greatest difficulty of all is, By what conveyance are we to get to the moon? and for this he is ready to invent a flying-machine:

If it be here inquired, what means there may be conjectured for our ascending beyond the sphere of the earth's magnetical vigor, I answer: 1. 'Tis not perhaps impossible that a man may be able to fly by the application of wings to his own body; as angels are pictured, as Mercury and Dædalus are feigned, and as hath been attempted by divers, particularly by a Turk in Constantinople, as Busbequius relates. 2. If there be such a great ruck [the roc] in Madagascar as Marcus Polus the Venetian mentions, the feathers in whose wings are twelve foot long, which can swoop up a horse and his rider, or an elephant, as our kites do a mouse; why then, it is but teaching one of these to carry a man, and he may ride up thither, as Ganymede does upon an eagle. Or if neither of these ways will serve, yet do I seriously, and upon good grounds, affirm it possible to make a flying chariot, in which a man may sit, and give such a motion unto it as shall convey him through the air. And this perhaps might be made large enough to carry divers men at the same time, together with food for their viaticum and commodities for traffic. It is not the bigness of anything in this kind that can hinder its motion, if the motive faculty be answerable thereunto. We see a great ship swims as well as a small cork, and an eagle flies in the air as well as a little gnat. This engine may be contrived from the same principles by which Archytas made a wooden dove and Regiomontanus a wooden eagle.

The particulars of the machine he reserves for some other occasion. In 1640 Wilkins published, and appended to the new edition of the Discovery, a Discourse concerning a New Planet: tending to prove that 'tis probable our Earth is one of the Planets—one of the earliest defences of the Copernican system as developed by Galileo in 1632. In 1641 Wilkins discussed writing in cipher and shorthand and communication by signals, in a work entitled Mercury, or the Secret and Swift Messenger: showing how a Man may with Privacy and Speed communicate his Thoughts to a Friend at any Distance. Here also he pointed out the indubitable advantages of a 'flying chariot,' if such a thing could be invented; and questioned the possibility of two friends at a distance communicating by help of 'needles touched by the same loadstone, indicating by sympathy the same letters on similar alphabets arranged on circular discs, with other possibilities of magnetical operations'—an unrealised dream of a future telegraph. In 1668 he produced a great treatise entitled An Essay towards a Real Character and a Philosophical Language, which was published by the Royal Society, and was based in the main on the Ars Signorum of George Dalgarno of Aberdeen (1626–87), long a schoolmaster in Oxford, and author of the Didascalocophus, or Deaf and Dumb Man's Tutor. Wilkins was the deviser of one of the most ingenious of the impossible schemes for securing perpetual motion; and he wrote on natural theology, and published sermons.

John Milton

stands high above all the poets of his age, and in the whole range of English poetry is second only to Shakespeare. He was born in London, 9th December 1608, at the 'Spread Eagle' in Bread Street, a house afterwards destroyed in the Great Fire of 1666. His grandfather was Richard Milton of Stanton St Johns, near Shotover, in Oxfordshire, a zealous Catholic, who in the year 1601 was twice fined £60 for absenting himself from the parish church and refusing to conform. His son John, the poet's father, became a Protestant, was accordingly disinherited, and established himself in London as a scrivener, a lawyer who drew contracts and arranged loans. The father's firmness under trial and his sufferings for conscience' sake tintured the temper of the son, who was a stern, unbending champion of religious freedom; and like his father, who carefully instructed him in the art, the poet loved music.

The younger Milton was educated with great care. He had as private tutor a Scottish Presbyterian, Thomas Young, M.A. of St Andrews, and at twelve he was sent to St Paul's School, London. Thence he removed to Christ's College, Cambridge, being admitted a pensioner in February 1625. He was a severe student, of a nice and haughty temper, jealous of constraint or control; and he complained that the fields around Cambridge had no soft shades to attract the muse. How far his own temper was the cause of some unpleasant incidents in his college career must be matter of conjecture; but it seems indubitable that he was once chastised in some manner by his tutor, and that he had even to leave the university for a while. Though designed for the Church, he preferred a 'blameless silence' to what he considered 'servitude and forswearing.' At this time, in his twenty-first year, he had written his grand Hymn on the Nativity, any one verse of which was sufficient to show that a new master's hand was touching the lyre of English poetry. It was not by any means his first venture in verse, for Milton ranks along with Cowley and Pope as one of the most precocious of English poets, his versions of two of the Psalms having been produced when he was fifteen years old. In 1632 he left the university, and found a new home with his father, who had retired from business and had purchased a small property at Horton, in Buckinghamshire. Here he lived nearly six years, studying the classical literatures, and here he wrote L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, Arcades, Comus, and Lycidas. The Arcades formed a portion of a 'mask' or masque 'presented' to the Countess-Dowager of Derby, at Harefield, near to Horton. Comus, also a masque, was produced at Ludlow Castle in 1634, before the Earl of Bridgewater, then president of Wales. This drama was founded on an actual occurrence. The Earl of Bridgewater then resided at

JOHN MILTON.

From the Portrait by Pieter Van der Plaas in the National Portrait Gallery.

Ludlow; his sons, Lord Brackley and Mr Thomas Egerton, and his daughter, Lady Alice Egerton, were benighted in passing through Haywood Forest in Herefordshire, on their way to Ludlow, and the lady was for a short time lost. The story was of course told to their father upon their arrival; and Milton wrote the masque on a moralised or spiritualised treatment of the incident, at the request of his friend Henry Lawes, who taught music in the family. Lawes set it to music, and it was acted on Michaelmas-night 1634, the two brothers, the young lady, and Lawes all taking part in the representation. Masques, in which the dramatic element was subordinate to spectacle, pageant, and music, had long been popular, and in Ben Jonson's and Beaumont's hands had high merit; now the taste for them had declined, and by a curious fate, though Puritans had reviled masques as well as other dramatic forms, the Puritan poet wrote the last of the masques. But it is wonderfully unlike most earlier masques—loftier and holier in feeling, rather closely modelled in some parts on Greek patterns, and splendid in lyric, monologue, and dialogue. Comus was first published in 1637, not by its author, but by Henry Lawes, who, in a dedication to Lord Bridgewater, says: 'Although not openly acknowledged by the author, yet it is a legitimate offspring, so lovely and so much desired, that the often copying of it hath tired my pen to give my several friends satisfaction.' Lycidas, written in the end of 1637, is a monody or elegy on a college companion of Milton's, Edward King, who perished by shipwreck on his passage from Chester to Ireland. This exquisite poem, of which Tennyson said to Edward FitzGerald, 'Lycidas is a touchstone of poetic taste,' formed Milton's contribution to the collection of thirty-six obituary verses, Greek, Latin, and English, to the memory of his friend, which was sent out from the Cambridge University press early in 1638. These poems of his Horton period are sufficient to lift him into the front rank of English poets; Lycidas shows already traces of the Puritan controversialist. Milton's significance as the most conspicuous literary representative of the Puritan movement has been dealt with by Dr Gardiner above at pages 542-546.

In April 1638 the poet left the paternal roof, taking one English man-servant with him, and travelled for fifteen months in France and Italy. In Paris he was introduced to Grotius. In Italy he visited Genoa, Leghorn, and Pisa; remaining four months in Florence, and nearly four in Rome, with a few days in Naples, and returning homewards by the 'Leman lake' to Geneva and Paris. His society was courted by the 'choicest Italian wits'; he made acquaintance with the veteran Manso, formerly the friend of Tasso, to whom one of the finest of his Latin poems is addressed, and at Florence he visited Galileo, then a prisoner of the Inquisition. The poet had been with difficulty restrained from testifying against popery within the shadow of the Vatican; and on his return to his native country he engaged in controversy against prelates and royalists, and with characteristic ardour vindicated the utmost freedom of thought and expression. Between the king and his Scottish subjects the feud had begun that in 1642 was to issue in the great Civil War; Milton, now engaged in tutoring his sister's children, the Phillips boys, had taken a long farewell of poetry, though it may fairly be argued that many of his arguments are dithyrambs rather than prose tracts—all but lyrical embodiments of passion, fervid admiration, and lofty contempt.

Before the commencement of the Civil War he had begun to write against Episcopacy, and he continued during the whole of the ensuing stormy period to devote his pen to the service of his party, even to the defence of that boldest of their measures, the execution of the king; and in the treatises that thus took origin he fully displayed his stern and inflexible principles on religion and on civil government. The first, Of Reformation touching Church Discipline in England, was published in 1641, and the same year appeared Of Prelatical Episcopacy, a reply to Bishop Hall's Humble Remonstrance in favour of Episcopacy. A defence of the Remonstrance having been published by the Bishop, Milton replied with Animadversions (1641); and in 1642 An Apology for Smectymnuus (another reply to Hall under this name, composed of the initials of the names of five Puritan ministers: Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurstow—w in the last name being resolved into a double u), and The Reason of Church Government urged against Prelaty, a more elaborate treatise in two books.

In 1643 Milton married Mary, the daughter of Richard Powell, a cavalier of Oxfordshire, to whom the poet was presumably known, as years before Mr Powell had borrowed £500 from his father. He brought his wife to London; but in the short space of a month the studious habits and philosophical austerity of the republican poet proved so depressing to the cavalier's daughter that she left his house on a visit to her parents, and showed no intention of returning. Milton had already resolved to repudiate her, and published a treatise on divorce, in which he argues that the law of Moses allowed of divorcement for 'unfitness or contrariety of mind' as well as for scandalous faults. This dangerous doctrine, which he maintained through life, brought on him much suspicion, dislike, and abhorrence even from his own party. Two years after her desertion—when the poet was practically enforcing his opinions by paying his addresses to 'a very handsome and witty gentlewoman'—his wife returned to him repentant. He doubtless recognised that his faults of temper must have proved repellent to a child-wife of seventeen; but it does not appear that their after-life was really happy, though she bore him three daughters. He behaved with great generosity to her parents when the further progress of the Civil War involved them in ruin. The year 1643 produced his Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, and next year The Judgment of Martin Bucer concerning Divorce. In 1644 appeared a Tractate on Education and the noblest of his prose works, his Areopagitica, a Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing. The book on divorce, it has been argued, was written not after his wife had left his house, but before she had paid that lengthy visit to her father. And it was the proceedings taken against Milton for publishing his views on divorce without the license required by the Parliament that led him to write Areopagitica, which was also published without the official imprimatur. The Areopagus (Mars Hill) was the court at Athens that dealt with morality and blasphemy; and the choice of the name Areopagitica by Milton is explained by the passage in the work that records how for atheism 'the books of Protagoras were by the judges of Areopagus commanded to be burnt and himself banished the territory.' In 1645 he followed up his heretical works on matrimony with Expositions upon the Four Chief Places of Scripture which treat of Marriage, and a pamphlet called Colasterion. Another celebrated work is a reply to the Eikon Basilike, under the title of Eikonoklastes (see GAUDEN, page 587). The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649), defending the execution of the king, was written during the trial, and published a fortnight after the execution. It led to the famous controversy with the celebrated scholar Salmasius, or De Saumaise, a French Protestant then a professor at Leyden, who, at the request of Charles II., had in the same year published in Latin a defence of Charles I. Milton's reply was the great Joannis Miltoni Angli pro Populo Anglicano Defensio (1651); a second Defensio (1654) was directed against Du Moulin, son of a famous French Calvinist, and Morus (More), son of a Scottish Protestant professor in France. There were numerous continuations and replies; and the war on both sides was carried on with a degree of virulent abuse and personality which, though common in the age of the disputants, is calculated to strike a modern reader with amazement. Salmasius triumphantly ascribes the loss of Milton's sight to the fatigues of the controversy; while Milton, on the other hand, is said to have boasted that his severities had tended to shorten the life of Salmasius. Amid the majestic eloquence of the second Defensio one reads with astonishment a detailed account of alleged amours of Morus with the maid-servants of Salmasius and other people, and his neglect of his illegitimate children; while even the bookseller who published the work must be elaborately shown up as a fraudulent bankrupt, a cheat, an impostor, and a thief! And the same Defensio it is which is so extremely interesting as containing a great deal of autobiographical matter. In 1649 Milton, whose skill as a Latinist was especially valuable when diplomatic correspondence was conducted almost wholly in Latin, had been appointed foreign or Latin secretary to the Council of State. His salary was to be £288 per annum (worth about £1000 nowadays), which was reduced when the duties were shared, first with Meadows, and afterwards with Marvell. At first his special duties were the drafting of letters sent by the Council of State to foreign states and princes; the replies were also examined and translated by him. It fell to him to send the indignant letters on the massacre of the Vaudois Protestants to the Duke of Savoy and Louis XIV. He expressed his private feelings in the sonnet On the late Massacre in Piedmont (1655).

For ten years Milton's eyesight had been failing, owing to the 'wearisome studies and midnight watchings' of his youth. The last remains of it were sacrificed in writing his (first) Defensio; he was willing and proud to make the sacrifice; and by the close of the year 1652 he was totally blind, 'dark, dark, irrecoverably dark.' His wife died about the same time. In November 1656 he married Katherine Woodcock, daughter of a Captain Woodcock of Hackney; a child was born to them in October 1657, but both mother and child died in the February following. The poet consecrated to her memory one of his solemn and touching sonnets:

Methought I saw my late espoused saint
Brought to me like Alcestis from the grave,
Whom Jove's great son to her glad husband gave,
Rescued from Death by force, though pale and faint.
Mine, as whom washed from spot of childbed taint
Purification in the Old Law did save,
And such as yet once more I trust to have Full sight of her in Heaven without restraint,
Came vested all in white, pure as her mind;
Her face was veiled, yet to my fancied sight,
Love, goodness, sweetness, in her person shined
So clear, as in no face with more delight.
But, oh! as to embrace me she inclined,
I waked, she fled, and day brought back my night.

In 1659 appeared A Treatise of Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes, and Considerations touching the likeliest means to remove hirelings out of the Church. In 1660, on the very brink of the Restoration—and the tide was running strongly against all Milton's ideas of liberty—the eager and fearless poet published The Ready and Easy Way to establish a Free Commonwealth, in the form of a letter to General Monk (of all people in the world!), containing a scheme for a perpetual Parliament, elections or selections taking place only to fill vacancies caused by death, and a draft measure of local government. The 'inconveniency of readmitting the kingship' is strongly insisted on. The last paragraph begins thus:

What I have spoken is the language of that which is not called amiss 'the good old cause.' If it seem strange to any, it will not seem more strange, I hope, than convincing to backsliders. Thus much I should perhaps have said, though I was sure I should have spoken only to trees and stones; and had none to cry to, but with the prophet: 'O earth, earth, earth!' to tell the very soil itself what her perverse inhabitants are deaf to. Nay, though what I have spoke should happen (which thou suffer not who didst create mankind free! nor thou next who didst redeem us from being servants of men!) to be the last words of our expiring liberty.

The Restoration deprived Milton of his public employment, and drove him into hiding, but by the interest of his friends—Marvell certainly, and according to a pretty story D'Avenant also—and perhaps partly because his pamphlets showed how little of a practical politician he was, his name was included in the general amnesty. The great poet was now at liberty to pursue his private studies, and to realise the devout aspirations of his youth for an immortality of literary fame. His spirit was unsubdued, and he resolved now to set about 'things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme.'

Milton long hesitated on what subject he should write a great epic, and at first thought of the Arthurian legend or some other matter from national history; but finally decided that scriptural history was of more universal and enthralling interest. His disrespectful allusions to old English history shows how little the legendary Arthur could have done to draw out the Puritan's best energies. Paradise Lost, or the fall of man, had long been before his mind as a subject for poetry; and two drafts of a dramatic treatment of this theme are preserved among his manuscripts in Trinity College Library, Cambridge. His genius was better adapted for an epic than a dramatic poem; Samson, though cast in a dramatic form, has little of dramatic interest or variety of character.

Paradise Lost, planned long before, was really begun about 1658, when the division of the secretary's duties had given him greater leisure; it was completed about 1664. He had then married a third time. His helpless state moved him to ask his friend Dr Paget to recommend him a wife. Paget recommended his own cousin, Elizabeth Minshall, daughter of a respectable yeoman living near Nantwich. They were married in 1663, the lady being then in her twenty-fifth year. She had no children, and survived her husband for fifty-three years. We get an interesting glimpse of him soon after this from Ellwood the Quaker, who visited Milton at a cottage at Chalfont, in Bucks, to which the poet had withdrawn from the Plague then raging in the metropolis (1665). The undutifulness of his daughters had added to his unhappiness; and doubtless they found their father harsh and exacting. Paradise Lost was published in 1667. The copyright was purchased by Samuel Simmons, a bookseller, on the following terms: an immediate payment of £5, and £5 more when 1300 copies should be sold; the like sum after the same number of the second edition—each edition to consist of 1500 copies—and other £5 after the sale of the third. The third edition was not published till 1678, when the poet was no more, and his widow sold all her claims to Simmons for £8. It appears that in 1669 the poet became entitled to his second payment, so that 1300 copies of Paradise Lost had been sold within less than two years of its publication—a proof that the nation was not, as has been vulgarly supposed, insensible to the merits of the divine poem then entering on its course of immortality. In eleven years from the date of its publication 3000 copies had been sold; some modern critics have doubted whether Paradise Lost, if published in our own time, would have met with a greater demand. The fall of man was a theme well suited to the taste of the serious part of the community in that age, apart from its claims as a work of genius. The Puritans, though depressed, were not extinct, nor was their beatific vision quenched by the gross sensualism of the times. Compared with Dryden's plays, how pure, how lofty must Milton's epic have appeared! The blank verse of Paradise Lost was, however, a stumbling-block. So long a poem in this measure had not before been attempted, and ere the second edition was published Samuel Simmons procured from Milton a short and spirited explanation of his reasons for departing from the 'troublesome bondage of rhyming.' In 1671 the poet published his Paradise Regained and Samson Agonistes. The former we owe to Ellwood's remark when he was asked by Milton for his opinion of the earlier and greater epic, 'Thou hast said much here of Paradise Lost, but what hast thou to say of Paradise Found?' Samson Agonistes is dramatic in form, but its spirit is lyrical. Both poems show a tendency to greater simplicity in style, even at times to baldness; they were noble pendants to the great work, at worst were 'the ebb of a mighty tide;' Sir E. Gosse praises part of Paradise Regained (in Book iv.) as showing 'greater variety and fullness of technical excellence than any other passage in English poetry.' The survey of Greece and Rome in Paradise Regained, and the description of the banquet in the grove, are as rich in restrained exuberance as anything in Paradise Lost; while the brief sketch of the thunder-storm in the wilderness is perhaps the most strikingly effective passage of the kind in all Milton's works.

Many of Milton's critics have, rather needlessly, regretted that he devoted so much of his time to politics, and did not wholly reserve himself for poetry; forgetting that he was great largely because he was a great and public-spirited Englishman. As Sir W. Raleigh argues, 'We could not have had anything at all like Paradise Lost from a dainty, shy poet-scholar; nor anything half so great.' Furthermore, Milton's prose works raise every question they touch, even when they cannot be said to solve them. In politics Milton was a thorough-going idealist. Though his pamphlets are occasional and personal, though he wrote with intensely practical aims, his arguments are based on a complete philosophy of life. In 1669 Milton had published his History of England, down to the time of the Norman Conquest (written long before), in which he retold the fables of Geoffrey of Monmouth and other highly unauthentic writers, as useful to poets and orators, and possibly 'containing in them many footsteps and relics of something true.' The actual history of the struggles of the Angles, Saxons, and Danes, and their contribution to the national history, he treats with as little reverence, calling them 'the battles of the kites and crows.' The whole is a jejune and perfunctory performance, of interest as showing his and his contemporaries' attitude towards early history. Besides a Latin grammar, a compendium of Ramus's logic, collections of Latin epistles and college exercises, and A History of Moscovia, he wrote an unimportant Treatise of True Religion, Heresy, Schism, Toleration, and the Best Means to prevent the Growth of Popery (1673). It had been conjectured, from passages in Paradise Regained, and from his treatise on True Religion, that Milton's theological opinions underwent a change in his advanced years; and the fact was made apparent by the discovery in 1823, in the State-Paper Office, of an elaborate work in Latin, a Treatise on Christian Doctrine, which was translated and published by Dr Sumner, and gave occasion for Macaulay's famous essay in the Edinburgh Review. In the beginning of this work Milton explains his reasons for compiling it. 'I deemed it safest and most advisable,' he says, 'to compile for myself, by my own labour and study, some original treatise, which should be always at hand, derived solely from the Word of God itself.' In this treatise Milton avows and defends Arian or semi-Arian opinions; defends an Arminian type of free-will against Calvinism; denounces Sabbatarianism; insists that the decalogue was abrogated, with the Mosaic law, by the gospel; and supports not only his own views on divorce, but maintains the lawfulness of polygamy. His philosophy passes from theism to something suspiciously like complete pantheism. He was evangelical on the Fall, the Atonement, and what are called the 'saving doctrines' of Christianity. It is the duty of believers, he says, to join themselves, if possible, to a Church duly constituted; yet such as cannot do this conveniently or with full satisfaction of conscience are not to be considered as excluded from the blessing bestowed by God on the Churches. In his later years he was not attached to any religious body, and attended no kind of public worship.

The active and studious life of the poet was now near a close. His later years were rendered comfortable by his wife; his daughters had learnt embroidery and gone elsewhere; he had the solace of music and the attention of friends; and though he had long been a sufferer from gout and other maladies, his mind was calm and bright to the last. He died without a struggle in his house in the Artillery Walk, Bunhill Fields—a small house rated at 'four hearths'—on Sunday the 8th of November 1674, and was buried in the chancel of St Giles's, Cripplegate, beside his father.

Milton had in him elements of temperament not easily harmonised; he was the child at once of the Renaissance and of Puritanism, a passionate lover of beauty and freedom, yet remorseless in seeking to conform all things to the standard of the Bible in its Puritan interpretation. He was vehemently Puritan, and yet what a trying Puritan to his allies! An open repudiator of the doctrine of the Trinity—for he was an Arian; an assertor of the right of free printing of heresies, and so of free-thinking itself; a pleader for free divorce; a defender of polygamy, who in his later years went to neither church nor chapel. And a Puritan, wise beyond what is written, who must needs inherit the curses on him who adds to what is written in the Book by writing a sort of novel in verse on the most sacred of divine things, and deal with the

Persons of the Godhead as with actors on the stage. The great poem partakes in like manner of contrasted Classicism and Biblicism, Hellenism and Hebraism. The form and method, spite of the religious purpose, are as far as practicable cast in classical mould; the matter and substance biblical, religious, theological, eminently dogmatic. The preliminary statement of the subject, the invocation, and much in the general machinery of the plot remind us of Virgil, especially the way in which long speeches are used, undramatically and unepically, to explain the events that preceded and those that are to follow the stages of the story actually represented in the poem—from the revolt of the Angels to the Last Judgment. There are resemblances in method to Lucan's Pharsalia also. On the other hand, Paradise Lost as a Christian poem on a religious subject finds a nearer analogue in Dante's Divina Commedia, with which at the same time it has been contrasted as inspired by Protestant freedom of conscience. Milton's conception of God's law makes it absolutely the outcome of God's will, and the unreasoning obedience of all creatures is so unhesitatingly demanded that Milton's God has been compared to an arbitrary Asiatic tyrant against whom rebellion is inevitable. For Milton freedom lay only in heroic obedience to God's law, heroic patience under God's will. Paradise Lost contains not merely an epic on the Fall and the Divine plan of redemption, but a deliberate theodicy Milton expressly designed 'to justify the ways of God to men.' To keep such heterogeneous elements in perfectly harmonious and poetic combination is obviously beyond the powers of mere man. Attempts to explain the inexplicable are inevitably difficult and unsuccessful; satisfactorily to explain the mystery of evil is beyond even Milton's powers; contradictions are inevitable where divine processes are represented under anthropomorphic forms. We know that God's will is instantly fulfilled; yet one-half of Milton's plot is to help God's will to fulfilment, the other half to oppose it. The Omnipotent is seriously alarmed at the risk He stands in, until relieved by the Son. We cannot without partly shutting our eyes, as it were, take seriously a battle between the Creator and His creatures. We cannot follow the poet's idea of the Son of God, who seems sometimes a mere double of God. Satan's superhuman intelligence should have shown him the absurdity of rebelling against Omnipotence; and this splendid creation, the hero of the poem, appeals to us only if we more or less consciously diminish him almost within mere human limits. The difficulties that are perhaps inseparable from even the most elaborate system of theological metaphysics are, treated as parts of a poem, mere incongruities and impossibilities. M. Scherer, one of the most sympathetic foreign critics of English poetry and a hearty admirer of Milton's genius, goes so far as to say that if the work survives, it is in spite of its subject; that when Milton tries to escape from the impossible Scripture conditions and gives rein to creative imagination he comes near burlesque, as when Satan becomes a toad and a cormorant. The cosmology of Heaven and Hell and Eden, with the gate and bridge, are equally impossible and unimaginable. So keenly does he feel the incongruities that he thus sums up his elaborate criticism of Milton (a criticism by a French critic, be it remembered !):

'Paradise Lost is an unreal poem, a grotesque poem, a tiresome poem. There is not one reader in a hundred who can read books nine and ten without a smile, or books eleven and twelve without a yawn. The thing does not hold together: it is a pyramid balanced on its apex, the most terrible of problems solved by the most childish of means. And yet Paradise Lost is immortal. It lives by virtue of some episodes which will be for ever famous. In contrast with Dante, who must be read as a whole if we wish really to grasp his beauties, Milton ought not to be read except in fragments; but these fragments form part of the patrimony of the human race. The invocation to Light, the character of Eve, the description of the earthly paradise, of the morning of the world, of its first love, are all masterpieces. The discourses of the prince of hell are incomparably eloquent. . . . Paradise Lost is, moreover, strewn with incomparable lines. The poetry of Milton is the very essence of poetry. The author seems to think but in images, and these images are grand and proud as his own soul—a marvellous mingling of the sublime and the picturesque. Every word of his vocabulary of expression is a discovery and unique. . . . He has not only imagery and vocabulary, but the period, the great musical phrase, a little loaded with ornament and involved with inversions, but swaying all with its superb undulation. After all and above all, he has an indefinable serenity and victoriousness, a sustained equality, an indomitable power.'

Though Paradise Lost had an immediate and striking success; though Marvell and Denham recognised its author's greatness; though few sympathised with Waller's and Winstanley's depreciation; though Dryden's saying, 'This man cuts us all out and the ancients too,' was sufficiently emphatic, as was also his later praise of 'one of the greatest, most noble, and most sublime poems which either this age or nation has produced,' it was not till the eighteenth century that Milton was a popular poet in England. Addison expressed in the Spectator—not without modest censures—the admiration of his time, and since then his pre-eminence has been undisputed. Milton left no school, but his influence is plainly to be traced in Thomson and Young, Gray and Akenside, Blair and Glover. Bentley's portentous scheme to weed out by brilliant conjectural emendations the innumerable and stupid errors of the blind author's amanuenses and editors was prompted by honest zeal.

Coleridge and De Quincey were admiring expositors and critics; Keats praised Milton with enthusiasm and delicate insight; and Landor even said of the poet, 'It may be doubted if the Creator ever created one altogether so great.'

The one great poet who connects the age of Shakespeare with the age of Dryden, the only poet of the seventeenth century except Dryden not forgotten in the eighteenth, Milton stands alone, and cannot be traced to any one line of descent in the earlier history of English literature. Dryden said Milton acknowledged to him that Spenser was his original. But this can only mean that Spenser was his first love; there is small trace of Spenser save in some of the early poems; Milton can as little be said to be of the school of Spenser as of the school of Donne. Yet he was nurtured by the Elizabethans; he studied Jonson and the dramatists assiduously; one finds here and there marks of the influence of the Fletcher brothers, of Browne of Tavistock, of Sylvester's Du Bartas, of Crashaw, of Heywood even (pages 433, 434), not to speak of the whole range of the classical poets. Yet the broad imagination, moral fervour, profound thought, the marvellous art, the vitalising power that welded all his materials into his great poem, are like those of no one else; just as his magic style and diction are unique and unapproachable. Milton took blank verse from the hands of the dramatists and modified and moulded it into a rhythm of unparalleled majesty. Before his time it had not, save in one or two early Elizabethan poems, been used for poetry other than drama. From his time on Milton's metre, or rather Milton's diction, has been industriously imitated; and blank verse seems to us the normal vehicle for various kinds of graver poetry. But Milton's verse is unapproached not merely in its splendour, but in its swinging rhythm, its harmonious and skilfully varied distribution of accents and pauses. There is something striking and imposing even in his long catalogues of names and cities, generally sonorous and musical. True, he has, more than most poets, the defects of his qualities. His majestic diction is even in his hands not quite natural; any imitation of it becomes wholly artificial. He is mainly responsible for that 'poetic diction' which, sinking from fresh invention to stale convention, stirred placid Wordsworth to reformatory wrath. He is too profuse in learned illustration; Mark Pattison said, approvingly, 'that an appreciation of Milton is the last reward of consummated scholarship.' Few great poets are so utterly without humour; alone among the greatest poets he has not sung of love. His is not the atmosphere of creatures not too great and good for human nature's daily food, and his warmest admirers reverence rather than love. Adam and Eve are the only human characters in Paradise Lost, and even they, as Dr Johnson very justly and significantly said, were in a state no other man or woman could know. Landor denied, what most critics admit, that Satan is really the hero of the poem; and even Landor knew not what interest Milton had in making him so august a personage. But with all the limitations that can be urged, in spite of antinomies and anachronisms, in spite of anthropomorphic gods and theological argumentativeness, Paradise Lost is a splendid and unequalled work of poetic art, a triumph of human genius in thought and word.

Hymn on the Nativity.

It was the winter wild,
While the heaven-born child
All meanly wrapt in the rude manger lies;
Nature, in awe to him,
Had doffed her gaudy trim,
With her great Master so to sympathize:
It was no season then for her
To wanton with the Sun, her lusty paramour.
Only with speeches fair
She woos the gentle air
To hide her guilty front with innocent snow,
And on her naked shame,
Pollute with sinful blame,
The saintly veil of maiden white to throw;
Confounded, that her Maker's eyes
Should look so near upon her foul deformities.

But he, her fears to cease,
Sent down the meek-eyed Peace:
She, crowned with olive green, came softly sliding
Down through the turning sphere,
His ready harbinger,
With turtle wing the amorous clouds dividing;
And, waving wide her myrtle wand,
She strikes a universal peace through sea and land.

No war, or battle's sound,
Was heard the world around;
The idle spear and shield were high uphung;
The hooked chariot stood
Unstained with hostile blood;
The trumpet spake not to the armed throng;
And kings sat still with awful eye,
As if they surely knew their sovran Lord was by.

But peaceful was the night,
Wherein the Prince of Light
His reign of peace upon the earth began.
The winds, with wonder whist,
Smoothly the waters kissed,
Whispering new joys to the mild Ocean,
Who now hath quite forgot to rave,
While birds of calm sit brooding on the charmed wave.

The stars, with deep amaze,
Stand fixed in steadfast gaze,
Bending one way their precious influence,
And will not take their flight,
For all the morning light,
Or Lucifer that often warned them thence;
But in their glimmering orbs did glow,
Until their Lord himself bespake, and bid them go.

And, though the shady gloom
Had given day her room,

The Sun himself withheld his wonted speed,
And hid his head for shame,
As his inferior flame
The new-enlightened world no more should need:
He saw a greater Sun appear
Than his bright throne or burning axletree could bear.

The shepherds on the lawn,
Or ere the point of dawn,
Sat simply chatting in a rustic row;
Full little thought they than
That the mighty Pan
Was kindly come to live with them below:
Perhaps their loves, or else their sheep,
Was all that did their silly thoughts so busy keep.

When such music sweet
Their hearts and ears did greet
As never was by mortal finger strook,
Divinely-warbled voice
Answering the stringed noise,
As all their souls in blissful rapture took:
The air, such pleasure loth to lose,
With thousand echoes still prolongs each heavenly close.

Nature, that heard such sound,
Beneath the hollow round
Of Cynthia's seat the Airy region thrilling,
Now was almost won
To think her part was done,
And that her reign had here its last fulfilling:
She knew such harmony alone
Could hold all Heaven and Earth in happier union.

At last surrounds their sight
A globe of circular light,
That with long beams the shamefaced Night arrayed;
The helmèd cherubim
And sworded seraphim
Are seen in glittering ranks with wings displayed,
Harping in loud and solemn quire,
With unexpressive notes, to Heaven's new-born Heir.

Such music (as 'tis said)
Before was never made,
But when of old the Sons of Morning sung,
While the Creator great
His constellations set,
And the well-balanced World on hinges hung,
And cast the dark foundations deep,
And bid the weltering waves their oozy channel keep.

Ring out, ye crystal spheres!
Once bless our human ears,
If ye have power to touch our senses so;
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time;
And let the base of heaven's deep organ blow;
And with your ninefold harmony
Make up full consort to the angelic symphony.

For, if such holy song
Enwrap our fancy long,
Time will run back and fetch the Age of Gold;
And speckled Vanity
Will sicken soon and die,
And leprous Sin will melt from earthly mould;
And Hell itself will pass away,
And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day.

Yea, Truth and Justice then
Will down return to men,
Orbed in a rainbow ; and, like glories wearing,
Mercy will sit between,
Throned in celestial sheen,
With radiant feet the tissued clouds down steering ;
And Heaven, as at some festival,
Will open wide the gates of her high palace-hall.

But wisest Fate says No,
This must not yet be so ;
The Babe yet lies in smiling infancy
That on the bitter cross
Must redeem our loss,
So both himself and us to glorify :
Yet first, to those ychained in sleep,
The wakeful trump of doom must thunder through the deep.

With such a horrid clang
As on Mount Sinai rang,
While the red fire and smouldering clouds outbrake :
The aged Earth, aghast
With terror of that blast,
Shall from the surface to the centre shake,
When, at the world's last session,
The dreadful Judge in middle air shall spread his throne.

And then at last our bliss
Full and perfect is,
But now begins ; for from this happy day
The Old Dragon under ground,
In straiter limits bound,
Not half so far casts his usurpèd sway,
And, wroth to see his kingdom fail,
Swinges the scaly horror of his folded tail.

The Oracles are dumb ;
No voice or hideous hum
Runs through the archèd roof in words deceiving.
Apollo from his shrine
Can no more divine,
With hollow shriek the steep of Delphos leaving.
No nightly trance, or breathèd spell,
Inspires the pale-eyed priest from the prophetic cell.

The lonely mountains o'er,
And the resounding shore,
A voice of weeping heard and loud lament ;
From haunted spring, and dale
Edged with poplar pale,
The parting Genius is with sighing sent ;
With flower-inwoven tresses torn
The Nymphs in twilight shade of tangled thickets mourn.

In consecrated earth,
And on the holy hearth,
The Lars and Lemures moan with midnight plaint ;
In urns, and altars round,
A drear and dying sound
Affrights the flamens at their service quaint ;
And the chill marble seems to sweat,
While each peculiar power foregoes his wonted seat.

Peor and Baälim
Forsake their temples dim,
With that twice-battered god of Palestine ;
And moonèd Ashtaroth,
Heaven's queen and mother both,
Now sits not girt with tapers' holy shine :

The Libyc Hammon shrinks his horn ;
In vain the Tyrian maids their wounded Thammuz mourn.

And sullen Moloch, fled,
Hath left in shadows dread
His burning idol all of blackest hue ;
In vain with cymbals' ring
They call the grisly king,
In dismal dance about the furnace blue ;
The brutish gods of Nile as fast,
Isis, and Orus, and the dog Anubis haste.

Nor is Osiris seen
In Memphian grove or green,
Trampling the unshowered grass with lowings loud ;
Nor can he be at rest
Within his sacred chest ;
Nought but profoundest Hell can be his shroud ;
In vain, with timbreled anthems dark,
The sable-stolèd sorcerers bear his worshiped ark.

He feels from Juda's land
The dreaded Infant's hand ;
The rays of Bethlehem blind his dusky eyn ;
Nor all the gods beside Longer dare abide,
Not Typhon huge ending in snaky twine :
Our Babe, to show his Godhead true,
Can in his swaddling bands control the damnèd crew.

So, when the sun in bed,
Curtained with cloudy red,
Pillows his chin upon an orient wave,
The flocking shadows pale
Troop to the infernal jail,
Each fettered ghost slips to his several grave,
And the yellow-skirted fays
Fly after the night-steeds, leaving their moon-loved maze.

But see ! the Virgin blest
Hath laid her Babe to rest.
Time is our tedious song should here have ending :
Heaven's youngest-teemèd star
Hath fixed her polished car,
Her sleeping Lord with handmaid lamp attending ;
And all about the courtly stable
Bright-harnessed Angels sit in order serviceable.

Scene from 'Comus.'

Lady. This is the place, as well as I may guess,
Whence even now the tumult of loud mirth
Was rife, and perfect in my listening ear ;
Yet nought but single darkness do I find.
What might this be ? A thousand fantasies
Begin to throng into my memory,
Of calling shapes, and beckoning shadows dire,
And airy tongues that syllable men's names
On sands and shores and desert wildernesses.
These thoughts may startle well, but not astound
The virtuous mind, that ever walks attended
By a strong siding champion, Conscience.
O, welcome, pure-eyed Faith, white-handed Hope,
Thou hovering angel girt with golden wings,
And thou unblemished form of Chastity !
I see ye visibly, and now believe
That He, the Supreme Good, to whom all things ill
Are but as slavish officers of vengeance,
Would send a glistening guardian, if need were,

To keep my life and honour unassailed. . . .
 Was I deceived, or did a sable cloud
 Turn forth her silver lining on the night?
 I did not err: there does a sable cloud
 Turn forth her silver lining on the night,
 And casts a gleam over this tufted grove.
 I cannot hallo to my brothers, but
 Such noise as I can make to be heard farthest
 I'll venture; for my new-enlivened spirits
 Prompt me, and they perhaps are not far off.

Song.

Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen
 Within thy airy shell
 By slow Meander's margent green,
 And in the violet-embroidered vale
 Where the love-lorn nightingale
 Nightly to thee her sad song mourneth well:
 Canst thou not tell me of a gentle pair
 That liketh thy Narcissus are?
 O, if thou have
 Hid them in some flowery cave,
 Tell me but where,
 Sweet Queen of Parley, Daughter of the Sphere!
 So may'st thou be translated to the skies,
 And give resounding grace to all Heaven's harmonies!

Comus. Can any mortal mixture of earth's mould
 Breathe such divine enchanting ravishment?
 Sure something holy lodges in that breast,
 And with these raptures moves the vocal air
 To testify his hidden residence.
 How sweetly did they float upon the wings
 Of silence, through the empty-vaulted night,
 At every fall smoothing the raven down
 Of darkness till it smiled! I have oft heard
 My mother Circe with the Sirens three,
 Amidst the flowery-kirtled Naiades,
 Culling their potent herbs and baleful drugs,
 Who, as they sung, would take the prisoned soul,
 And lap it in Elysium: Scylla wept,
 And chid her barking waves into attention,
 And fell Charybdis murmured soft applause.
 Yet they in pleasing slumber lulled the sense,
 And in sweet madness robbed it of itself;
 But such a sacred and home-felt delight,
 Such sober certainty of waking bliss,
 I never heard till now.

The Spirit's Epilogue in 'Comus.'

To the ocean now I fly,
 And those happy climes that lie
 Where day never shuts his eye,
 Up in the broad fields of the sky.
 There I suck the liquid air,
 All amidst the gardens fair
 Of Hesperus, and his daughters three
 That sing about the golden tree.
 Along the crisped shades and bowers
 Revels the spruce and jocund Spring;
 The Graces and the rosy-bosomed Hours
 Thither all their bounties bring.
 There eternal Summer dwells;
 And west winds with musky wing
 About the cedarn alleys fling
 Nard and cassia's balmy smells.

Iris there with humid bow
 Waters the odorous banks, that blow
 Flowers of more mingled hue
 Than her purpled scarf can shew,
 And drenches with Elysian dew
 (List, mortals, if your ears be true)
 Beds of hyacinth and roses,
 Where young Adonis oft reposes,
 Waxing well of his deep wound,
 In slumber soft, and on the ground
 Sadly sits the Assyrian queen.
 But far above, in spangled sheen,
 Celestial Cupid, her famed son, advanced,
 Holds his dear Psyche, sweet entranced
 After her wandering labours long,
 Till free consent the gods among
 Make her his eternal bride,
 And from her fair unspotted side
 Two blissful twins are to be born,
 Youth and Joy; so Jove hath sworn.

But now my task is smoothly done:
 I can fly, or I can run
 Quickly to the green earth's end,
 Where the bowed welkin slow doth bend,
 And from thence can soar as soon
 To the corners of the moon.
 Mortals, that would follow me,
 Love Virtue; she alone is free.
 She can teach ye how to climb
 Higher than the sphery chime;
 Or, if Virtue feeble were,
 Heaven itself would stoop to her.

L'Allegro.

Hence, loathed Melancholy,
 Of Cerberus and blackest Midnight born
 In Stygian cave forlorn
 'Mongst horrid shapes, and shrieks, and sights unholy!
 Find out some uncouth cell,
 Where brooding Darkness spreads his jealous wings,
 And the night-raven sings;
 There, under ebon shades and low-browed rocks,
 As ragged as thy locks,
 In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell.
 But come, thou Goddess fair and free,
 In Heaven yclept Euphrosyne,
 And by men heart-easing Mirth;
 Whom lovely Venus, at a birth,
 With two sister Graces more,
 To ivy-crown'd Bacchus bore:
 Or whether (as some sages sing)
 The frolic wind that breathes the spring,
 Zephyr, with Aurora playing,
 As he met her once a-Maying,
 There, on beds of violets blue,
 And fresh-blown roses washed in dew,
 Filled her with thee, a daughter fair,
 So buxom, blithe, and debonair.
 Haste thee, Nymph, and bring with thee
 Jest, and youthful Jollity,
 Quips and Cranks and wanton Wiles,
 Nods and Becks and wreath'd Smiles,
 Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
 And love to live in dimple sleek;
 Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
 And Laughter holding both his sides.

Come, and trip it, as you go,
 On the light fantastic toe ;
 And in thy right hand lead with thee
 The mountain-nymph, sweet Liberty ;
 And, if I give thee honour due,
 Mirth, admit me of thy crew,
 To live with her, and live with thee,
 In unreprieved pleasures free ;
 To hear the lark begin his flight,
 And, singing, startle the dull night,
 From his watch-tower in the skies,
 Till the dappled dawn doth rise ;
 Then to come, in spite of sorrow,
 And at my window bid good-morrow,
 Through the sweet-briar or the vine,
 Or the twisted eglantine ;
 While the cock, with lively din,
 Scatters the rear of darkness thin ;
 And to the stack, or the barn-door,
 Stoutly struts his dames before :
 Oft listening how the hounds and horn
 Cheerly rouse the slumbering morn,
 From the side of some hoar hill,
 Through the high wood echoing shrill :
 Sometimes walking, not unseen,
 By hedgerow elms, on hillocks green,
 Right against the eastern gate
 Where the great Sun begins his state,
 Robed in flames and amber light,
 The clouds in thousand liveries dight ;
 While the ploughman, near at hand,
 Whistles o'er the furrowed land,
 And the milkmaid singeth blithe,
 And the mower whets his scythe,
 And every shepherd tells his tale
 Under the hawthorn in the dale.
 Straight mine eye hath caught new pleasures,
 Whilst the landskip round it measures :
 Russet lawns, and fallows grey,
 Where the nibbling flocks do stray ;
 Mountains on whose barren breast
 The labouring clouds do often rest ;
 Meadows trim, with daisies pied ;
 Shallow brooks, and rivers wide ;
 Towers and battlements it sees
 Bosomed high in tufted trees,
 Where perhaps some beauty lies,
 The cynosure of neighbouring eyes.
 Hard by a cottage chimney smokes
 From betwixt two aged oaks,
 Where Corydon and Thyrsis met
 Are at their savoury dinner set
 Of herbs and other country messes,
 Which the neat-handed Phillis dresses ;
 And then in haste her bower she leaves,
 With Thestylis to bind the sheaves ;
 Or, if the earlier season lead,
 To the tanned haycock in the mead.
 Sometimes, with secure delight,
 The upland hamlets will invite,
 When the merry bells ring round,
 And jocund rebecks sound
 To many a youth and many a maid
 Dancing in the chequered shade,
 And young and old come forth to play
 On a sunshine holiday,

Till the lifelong daylight fail :
 Then to the spicy nut-brown ale,
 With stories told of many a feat,
 How Faery Mab the junkets eat.
 She was pinched and pulled, she said ;
 And he, by Friar's lantern led,
 Tells how the drudging goblin sweat
 To earn his cream-bowl duly set,
 When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
 His shadowy flail hath threshed the corn
 That ten day-labourers could not end ;
 Then lies him down, the lubber fiend,
 And, stretched out all the chimney's length,
 Basks at the fire his hairy strength,
 And crop-full out of doors he flings,
 Ere the first cock his matin rings.
 Thus done the tales, to bed they creep,
 By whispering winds soon lulled asleep.
 Towered cities please us then,
 And the busy hum of men,
 Where throngs of knights and barons bold,
 In weeds of peace, high triumphs hold,
 With store of ladies, whose bright eyes
 Rain influence, and judge the prize
 Of wit or arms, while both contend
 To win her grace whom all commend.
 There let Hymen oft appear
 In saffron robe, with taper clear,
 And pomp, and feast, and revelry,
 With mask and antique pageantry ;
 Such sights as youthful poets dream
 On summer eves by haunted stream.
 Then to the well-trod stage anon,
 If Jonson's learned sock be on,
 Or sweetest Shakespeare, Fancy's child,
 Warble his native wood-notes wild,
 And ever, against eating cares,
 Lap me in soft Lydian airs,
 Married to immortal verse,
 Such as the meeting soul may pierce,
 In notes with many a winding bout
 Of linked sweetness long drawn out
 With wanton heed and giddy cunning,
 The melting voice through mazes running,
 Untwisting all the chains that tie
 The hidden soul of harmony ;
 That Orpheus' self may heave his head
 From golden slumber on a bed
 Of heaped Elysian flowers, and hear
 Such strains as would have won the ear
 Of Pluto to have quite set free
 His half-regained Eurydice.
 These delights if thou canst give,
 Mirth, with thee I mean to live.

II PENSEROSO.

Hence, vain deluding Joys,
 The brood of Folly without father bred !
 How little you bested,
 Or fill the fixed mind with all your toys !
 Dwell in some idle brain,
 And fancies fond with gaudy shapes possess,
 As thick and numberless
 As the gay motes that people the sun-beams,
 Or likest hovering dreams,
 The fickle pensioners of Morpheus' train.

But, hail! thou Goddess sage and holy!
 Hail, divinest Melancholy!
 Whose saintly visage is too bright
 To hit the sense of human sight,
 And therefore to our weaker view
 O'erlaid with black, staid Wisdom's hue;
 Black, but such as in esteem
 Prince Memnon's sister might beseem,
 Or that starred Ethiop queen that strove
 To set her beauty's praise above
 The Sea-Nymphs, and their powers offended.
 Yet thou art higher far descended:
 Thee bright-haired Vesta long of yore
 To solitary Saturn bore;
 His daughter she; in Saturn's reign
 Such mixture was not held a stain.
 Oft in glimmering bowers and glades
 He met her, and in secret shades
 Of woody Ida's inmost grove,
 Whilst yet there was no fear of Jove.
 • Come, pensive Nun, devout and pure,
 Sober, steadfast, and demure,
 All in a robe of darkest grain,
 Flowing with majestic train,
 And sable stole of cypress lawn
 Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
 Come; but keep thy wonted state,
 With even step, and musing gait,
 And looks commercing with the skies,
 Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes:
 There, held in holy passion still,
 Forget thyself to marble, till
 With a sad leaden downward cast
 Thou fix them on the earth as fast.
 And join with thee calm Peace and Quiet,
 Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet,
 And hears the Muses in a ring
 Aye round about Jove's altar sing;
 And add to these retired Leisure,
 That in trim gardens takes his pleasure;
 But, first and chiefest, with thee bring
 Him that yon soars on golden wing,
 Guiding the fiery-wheelèd throne,
 The Cherub Contemplation;
 And the mute Silence hist along,
 'Less Philomel will deign a song,
 In her sweetest saddest plight,
 Smoothing the rugged brow of Night,
 While Cynthia checks her dragon yoke
 Gently o'er the accustomed oak.
 Sweet bird, that shunn'st the noise of folly,
 Most musical, most melancholy!
 Thee, chauntress, oft the woods among
 I woo, to hear thy even-song;
 And, missing thee, I walk unseen
 On the dry smooth-shaven green,
 To behold the wandering moon,
 Riding near her highest noon,
 Like one that had been led astray
 Through the heaven's wide pathless way,
 And oft, as if her head she bowed,
 Stooping through a fleecy cloud.
 Oft, on a plat of rising ground,
 I hear the far-off curfew sound,
 Over some wide-watered shore,
 Swinging slow with sullen roar;

Or, if the air will not permit,
 Some still removed place will fit,
 Where glowing embers through the room
 Teach light to counterfeit a gloom,
 Far from all resort of mirth,
 Save the cricket on the hearth,
 Or the bellman's drowsy charm
 To bless the doors from nightly harm.
 Or let my lamp, at midnight hour,
 Be seen in some high lonely tower,
 Where I may oft outwatch the Bear,
 With thrice great Hermes, or unsphere
 The spirit of Plato, to unfold
 What worlds or what vast regions hold
 The immortal mind that hath forsook
 Her mansion in this fleshly nook;
 And of those demons that are found
 In fire, air, flood, or underground,
 Whose power hath a true consent
 With planet or with element.
 Sometime let gorgeous Tragedy
 In sceptred pall come sweeping by,
 Presenting Thebes, or Pelops' line,
 Or the tale of Troy divine,
 Or what (though rare) of later age
 Ennobled hath the buskinèd stage.
 But, O sad Virgin! that thy power
 Might raise Musæus from his bower;
 Or bid the soul of Orpheus sing
 Such notes as, warbled to the string,
 Drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek,
 And made Hell grant what love did seek;
 Or call up him that left half-told
 The story of Cambuscan bold,
 Of Camball, and of Algarsife,
 And who had Canace to wife,
 That owned the virtuous ring and glass,
 And of the wondrous horse of brass
 On which the Tartar king did ride;
 And if aught else great bards beside
 In sage and solemn tunes have sung,
 Of turneys, and of trophies hung,
 Of forests, and enchantments drear,
 Where more is meant than meets the ear.
 Thus, Night, oft see me in thy pale career,
 Till civil-suited Morn appear,
 Not tricked and frownced, as she was wont
 With the Attic boy to hunt,
 But kerchieft in a comely cloud,
 While rocking winds are piping loud,
 Or ushered with a shower still,
 When the gust hath blown his fill,
 Ending on the rustling leaves,
 With minute-drops from off the eaves.
 And, when the sun begins to fling
 His flaring beams, me, Goddess, bring
 To archèd walks of twilight groves,
 And shadows brown, that Sylvan loves,
 Of pine, or monumental oak,
 Where the rude axe with heaved stroke
 Was never heard the nymphs to daunt,
 Or fright them from their hallowed haunt.
 There, in close covert, by some brook,
 Where no profaner eye may look,
 Hide me from day's garish eye,
 While the bee with honeyed thigh,

That at her flowery work doth sing,
 And the waters murmuring,
 With such consort as they keep,
 Entice the dewy-feathered Sleep.
 And let some strange mysterious dream
 Wave at his wings, in airy stream
 Of lively portraiture displayed,
 Softly on my eyelids laid ;
 And, as I wake, sweet music breathe
 Above, about, or underneath,
 Sent by some Spirit to mortals good,
 Or the unseen Genius of the wood.
 But let my due feet never fail
 To walk the studious cloister's pale,
 And love the high embow'd roof,
 With antique pillars massy-proof,
 And storied windows richly dight,
 Casting a dim religious light.
 There let the pealing organ blow,
 To the full-voiced quire below,
 In service high and anthems clear,
 As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
 Dissolve me into ecstasies,
 And bring all Heaven before mine eyes.
 And may at last my weary age
 Find out the peaceful hermitage,
 The hairy gown and mossy cell,
 Where I may sit and rightly spell
 Of every star that heaven doth shew,
 And every herb that sips the dew,
 Till old experience do attain
 To something like prophetic strain.
 These pleasures, Melancholy, give ;
 And I with thee will choose to live.

Song on May Morning.

Now the bright morning-star, Day's harbinger,
 Comes dancing from the east, and leads with her
 The flowery May, who from her green lap throws
 The yellow cowslip and the pale primrose.
 Hail, bounteous May, that dost inspire
 Mirth, and youth, and warm desire !
 Woods and groves are of thy dressing ;
 Hill and dale doth boast thy blessing.
 Thus we salute thee with our early song,
 And welcome thee, and wish thee long.

Lycidas.

Yet once more, O ye laurels, and once more,
 Ye myrtles brown, with ivy never sere,
 I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude,
 And with forced fingers rude
 Shatter your leaves before the mellowing year.
 Bitter constraint and sad occasion dear
 Compels me to disturb your season due ;
 For Lycidas is dead, dead ere his prime,
 Young Lycidas, and hath not left his peer.
 Who would not sing for Lycidas? he knew
 Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme.
 He must not float upon his watery bier
 Unwept, and welter to the parching wind,
 Without the meed of some melodious tear.
 Begin, then, Sisters of the sacred well
 That from beneath the seat of Jove doth spring ;
 Begin, and somewhat loudly sweep the string.
 Hence with denial vain and coy excuse :

So may some gentle Muse
 With lucky words favour my destined urn,
 And as he passes turn,
 And bid fair peace be to my sable shroud !

For we were nursed upon the self-same hill,
 Fed the same flock, by fountain, shade, and rill ;
 Together both, ere the high lawns appeared
 Under the opening eyelids of the Morn,
 We drove a-field, and both together heard
 What time the grey-fly winds her sultry horn,
 Battening our flocks with the fresh dews of night,
 Oft till the star that rose at evening bright
 Toward heaven's descent had sloped his westerling wheel.
 Meanwhile the rural ditties were not mute ;
 Tempered to the oaten flute
 Rough Satyrs danced, and Fauns with cloven heel
 From the glad sound would not be absent long ;
 And old Damoetas loved to hear our song.

But, oh ! the heavy change, now thou art gone,
 Now thou art gone and never must return !
 Thee, Shepherd, thee the woods and desert caves,
 With wild thyme and the gadding vine o'ergrown,
 And all their echoes, mourn.
 The willows, and the hazel copses green,
 Shall now no more be seen
 Fanning their joyous leaves to thy soft lays.
 As killing as the canker to the rose,
 Or taint-worm to the weanling herds that graze,
 Or frost to flowers, that their gay wardrobe wear,
 When first the white-thorn blows ;
 Such, Lycidas, thy loss to shepherd's ear.

Where were ye, Nymphs, when the remorseless deep
 Closed o'er the head of your loved Lycidas?
 For neither were ye playing on the steep
 Where your old bards, the famous Druids, lie,
 Nor on the shaggy top of Mona high,
 Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream.
 Ay me ! I fondly dream
 'Had ye been there,' . . . for what could that have done?
 What could the Muse herself that Orpheus bore,
 The Muse herself, for her enchanting son,
 Whom universal nature did lament,
 When, by the rout that made the hideous roar,
 His gory visage down the stream was sent,
 Down the swift Hebrus to the Lesbian shore?

Alas ! what boots it with uncessant care
 To tend the homely, slighted, shepherd's trade,
 And strictly meditate the thankless Muse?
 Were it not better done, as others use,
 To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
 Or with the tangles of Neæra's hair?
 Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise
 (That last infirmity of noble mind)
 To scorn delights and live laborious days ;
 But the fair guerdon when we hope to find,
 And think to burst out into sudden blaze,
 Comes the blind Fury with the abhorred shears,
 And slits the thin-spun life. 'But not the praise,' Phœbus replied, and touched my trembling ears :
 'Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil,
 Nor in the glittering foil
 Set off to the world, nor in broad rumour lies,
 But lives and spreads aloft by those pure eyes
 And perfect witness of all-judging Jove ;
 As he pronounces lastly on each deed,
 Of so much fame in heaven expect thy meed.'

O fountain Arethuse, and thou honoured flood,
Smooth-sliding Mincius, crowned with vocal reeds,
That strain I heard was of a higher mood.
But now my oat proceeds,
And listens to the Herald of the Sea,
That came in Neptune's plea.
He asked the waves, and asked the felon winds,
What hard mishap hath doomed this gentle swain?
And questioned every gust of rugged wings
That blows from off each beaked promontory.
They knew not of his story;
And sage Hippotades their answer brings,
That not a blast was from his dungeon strayed:
The air was calm, and on the level brine
Sleek Panope with all her sisters played.
It was that fatal and perfidious bark,
Built in the eclipse, and rigged with curses dark,
That sunk so low that sacred head of thine.

Next, Camus, reverend sire, went footing slow,
His mantle hairy, and his bonnet sedge,
Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge
Like to that sanguine flower inscribed with woe.
'Ah! who hath reft,' quoth he, 'my dearest pledge?'
Last came, and last did go,
The Pilot of the Galilean Lake;
Two massy keys he bore of metals twain
(The golden opes, the iron shuts amain).
He shook his mitred locks, and stern bespake:—
'How well could I have spared for thee, young swain,
Enow of such as, for their bellies' sake,
Creep, and intrude, and climb into the fold!
Of other care they little reckoning make
Than how to scramble at the shearers' feast,
And shove away the worthy bidden guest.
Blind mouths! that scarce themselves know how to hold
A sheep-hook, or have learnt aught else the least
That to the faithful herdman's art belongs!
What recks it them? What need they? They are sped;
And, when they list, their lean and flashy songs
Grate on their scrannel pipes of wretched straw;
The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed,
But, swoln with wind and the rank mist they draw,
Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread;
Besides what the grim wolf with privy paw
Daily devours apace, and nothing said.
But that two-handed engine at the door
Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more.'

Return, Alpheus; the dread voice is past
That shrunk thy streams; return, Sicilian Muse,
And call the vales, and bid them hither cast
Their bells and flowerets of a thousand hues.
Ye valleys low, where the mild whispers use
Of shades, and wanton winds, and gushing brooks,
On whose fresh lap the swart star sparely looks,
Throw hither all your quaint enamelled eyes,
That on the green turf suck the honeyed showers,
And purple all the ground with vernal flowers.
Bring the rathe primrose that forsaken dies,
The tufted crow-toe, and pale jessamine,
The white pink, and the pansy freaked with jet,
The glowing violet,
The musk-rose, and the well-attired woodbine,
With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head,
And every flower that sad embroidery wears;
Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,
And daffadillies fill their cups with tears,

To strew the laureate hearse where Lycid lies.
For so, to interpose a little ease,
Let our frail thoughts dally with false surmise.
Ay me! whilst thee the shores and sounding seas
Wash far away, where'er thy bones are hurled;
Whether beyond the stormy Hebrides,
Where thou perhaps under the whelming tide
Visit'st the bottom of the monstrous world;
Or whether thou, to our moist vows denied,
Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus old,
Where the great Vision of the guarded mount
Looks towards Namancos and Bayona's hold.
Look homeward, Angel, now, and melt with ruth:
And, O ye dolphins, waft the hapless youth.

Weep no more, woeful shepherds, weep no more,
For Lycidas, your sorrow, is not dead,
Sunk though he be beneath the watery floor.
So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
And tricks his beams, and with new-spangled ore
Flames in the forehead of the morning sky:
So Lycidas sunk low, but mounted high,
Through the dear might of Him that walked the waves,
Where, other groves and other streams along,
With nectar pure his oozy locks he laves,
And hears the unexpressive nuptial song,
In the blest kingdoms meek of joy and love.
There entertain him all the Saints above,
In solemn troops, and sweet societies,
That sing, and singing in their glory move,
And wipe the tears for ever from his eyes.
Now, Lycidas, the shepherds weep no more;
Henceforth thou art the Genius of the shore,
In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
To all that wander in that perilous flood.

Thus sang the uncouth swain to the oaks and rills,
While the still morn went out with sandals grey:
He touched the tender stops of various quills,
With eager thought warbling his Doric lay:
And now the sun had stretched out all the hills,
And now was dropt into the western bay.
At last he rose, and twitched his mantle blue:
To-morrow to fresh woods, and pastures new.

When the Assault was intended to the City.

Captain or Colonel, or Knight in Arms,
Whose chance on these defenceless doors may seize,
If deed of honour did thee ever please,
Guard them, and him within protect from harms.
He can requite thee; for he knows the charms
That call fame on such gentle acts as these,
And he can spread thy name o'er lands and seas,
Whatever clime the sun's bright circle warms.
Lift not thy spear against the Muses' bower:
The great Emathian conqueror bid spare
The house of Pindarus, when temple and tower
Went to the ground; and the repeated air
Of sad Electra's poet had the power
To save the Athenian walls from ruin bare.

Sonnet on his Blindness.

When I consider how my light is spent
Ere half my days in this dark world and wide,
And that one talent which is death to hide
Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent

To serve therewith my Maker, and present
 My true account, lest He returning chide,
 'Doth God exact day-labour, light denied?'
 I fondly ask. But Patience, to prevent
 That murmur, soon replies, 'God doth not need
 Either man's work or his own gifts. Who best
 Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best. His state
 Is kingly: thousands at his bidding speed,
 And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
 They also serve who only stand and wait.'

On the late Massacre in Piedmont.

Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
 Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold;
 Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
 When all our fathers worshiped stocks and stones,
 Forget not: in thy book record their groans
 Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold
 Slain by the bloody Piemontese, that rolled
 Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
 The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
 To heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes sow
 O'er all the Italian fields, where still doth sway
 The triple Tyrant; that from these may grow
 A hundredfold, who, having learnt thy way,
 Early may fly the Babylonian woe.

Satan's Address to the Sun.

O thou that, with surpassing glory crowned,
 Look'st from thy sole dominion like the god
 Of this new World—at whose sight all the stars
 Hide their diminished heads—to thee I call,
 But with no friendly voice, and add thy name,
 O Sun, to tell thee how I hate thy beams,
 That bring to my remembrance from what state
 I fell, how glorious once above thy sphere,
 Till pride and worse ambition threw me down,
 Warring in Heaven against Heaven's matchless King!
 Ah, wherefore? He deserved no such return
 From me, whom he created what I was
 In that bright eminence, and with his good
 Upbraided none; nor was his service hard.
 What could be less than to afford him praise,
 The easiest recompense, and pay him thanks,
 How due? Yet all his good proved ill in me,
 And wrought but malice. Lifted up so high,
 I scorned subjection, and thought one step higher
 Would set me highest, and in a moment quit
 The debt immense of endless gratitude,
 So burdensome, still paying, still to owe;
 Forgetful what from him I still received;
 And understood not that a grateful mind
 By owing owes not, but still pays, at once
 Indebted and discharged—what burden then?
 Oh, had his powerful destiny ordained
 Me some inferior Angel, I had stood
 Then happy; no unbounded hope had raised
 Ambition. Yet why not? Some other Power
 As great might have aspired, and me, though mean,
 Drawn to his part. But other Powers as great Fell not, but stand unshaken, from within
 Or from without to all temptations armed!
 Hadst thou the same free will and power to stand?
 Thou hadst. Whom hast thou then, or what, to accuse,
 But Heaven's free love dealt equally to all?
 Be then his love accursed, since, love or hate,

To me alike it deals eternal woe.
 Nay, cursed be thou; since against his thy will Chose freely what it now so justly rues.
 Me miserable! which way shall I fly
 Infinite wrath and infinite despair?
 Which way I fly is Hell; myself am Hell;
 And, in the lowest deep, a lower deep
 Still threatening to devour me opens wide,
 To which the Hell I suffer seems a Heaven.
 O, then, at last relent! Is there no place
 Left for repentance, none for pardon left?
 None left but by submission; and that word
 Disdain forbids me, and my dread of shame
 Among the Spirits beneath, whom I seduced
 With other promises and other vaunts
 Than to submit, boasting I could subdue
 The Omnipotent. Ay me! they little know
 How dearly I abide that boast so vain,
 Under what torments inwardly I groan.
 While they adore me on the throne of Hell,
 With diadem and sceptre high advanced,
 The lower still I fall, only supreme
 In misery: such joy ambition finds!
 But say I could repent, and could obtain,
 By act of grace, my former state; how soon
 Would highth recal high thoughts, how soon unsay
 What feigned submission swore! Ease would recant
 Vows made in pain, as violent and void
 (For never can true reconciliation grow
 Where wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep);
 Which would but lead me to a worse relapse
 And heavier fall: so should I purchase dear
 Short intermission, bought with double smart.
 This knows my Punisher; therefore as far
 From granting he, as I from begging, peace.
 All hope excluded thus, behold, instead
 Of us, outcast, exiled, his new delight,
 Mankind, created, and for him this World!
 So farewell hope, and, with hope, farewell fear,
 Farewell remorse! All good to me is lost;
 Evil, be thou my Good: by thee at least Divided empire with Heaven's King I hold,
 By thee, and more than half perhaps will reign;
 As Man ere long, and this new World, shall know.

(From Paradise Lost, Book iv. l. 32.)

Assembling of the Fallen Angels.

All these and more came flocking, but with looks
 Downcast and damp; yet such wherein appeared
 Obscure some glimpse of joy to have found their Chief:
 Not in despair, to have found themselves not lost
 In loss itself; which on his countenance cast
 Like doubtful hue. But he, his wonted pride
 Soon recollecting, with high words, that bore
 Semblance of worth, not substance, gently raised
 Their fainting courage, and dispelled their fears:
 Then straight commands that, at the warlike sound
 Of trumpets loud and clarions, be upreared
 His mighty standard. That proud honour claimed
 Azazel as his right, a Cherub tall:
 Who forthwith from the glittering staff unfurled
 The imperial ensign; which, full high advanced,
 Shone like a meteor streaming to the wind,
 With gems and golden lustre rich emblazed,
 Seraphic arms and trophies; all the while
 Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds:

At which the universal host up-sent
 A shout that tore Hell's concave, and beyond
 Frighted the reign of Chaos and old Night.
 All in a moment through the gloom were seen
 Ten thousand banners rise into the air,
 With orient colours waving : with them rose
 A forest huge of spears ; and thronging helms
 Appeared, and serried shields in thick array
 Of depth immeasurable. Anon they move
 In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood
 Of flutes and soft recorders—such as raised
 To highth of noblest temper heroes old
 Arming to battle, and instead of rage
 Deliberated valour breathed, firm, and unmoved
 With dread of death to flight or foul retreat ;
 Nor wanting power to mitigate and swage
 With solemn touches troubled thoughts, and chase
 Anguish and doubt and fear and sorrow and pain
 From mortal or immortal minds. Thus they,
 Breathing united force with fixed thought,
 Moved on in silence to soft pipes that charmed
 Their painful steps o'er the burnt soil. And now
 Advanced in view they stand—a horrid front
 Of dreadful length and dazzling arms, in guise
 Of warriors old, with ordered spear and shield,
 Awaiting what command their mighty Chief
 Had to impose. . . . He, above the rest
 In shape and gesture proudly eminent,
 Stood like a tower. His form had yet not lost
 All her original brightness, nor appeared
 Less than Archangel ruined, and the excess
 Of glory obscured : as when the sun new-risen
 Looks through the horizontal misty air
 Shorn of his beams, or, from behind the moon,
 In dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds
 On half the nations, and with fear of change
 Perplexes monarchs. Darkened so, yet shone
 Above them all the Archangel : but his face
 Deep scars of thunder had intrenched, and care
 Sat on his faded cheek, but under brows
 Of dauntless courage, and considerate pride
 Waiting revenge. Cruel his eye, but cast
 Signs of remorse and passion, to behold
 The fellows of his crime, the followers rather (Far other once beheld in bliss), condemned
 For ever now to have their lot in pain—
 Millions of Spirits for his fault amerced
 Of Heaven, and from eternal splendours flung
 For his revolt—yet faithful how they stood,
 Their glory withered ; as, when heaven's fire
 Hath scathed the forest oaks or mountain pines,
 With singed top their stately growth, though bare,
 Stands on the blasted heath. He now prepared
 To speak ; whereat their doubled ranks they bend
 From wing to wing, and half enclose him round
 With all his peers : Attention held them mute.
 Thrice he assayed, and thrice, in spite of scorn,
 Tears, such as Angels weep, burst forth : at last Words interwove with sighs found out their way.

The Garden of Eden.

So on he fares, and to the border comes
 Of Eden, where delicious Paradise,
 Now nearer, crowns with her enclosure green,
 As with a rural mound, the champaign head

Of a steep wilderness, whose hairy sides
 With thicket overgrown, grotesque and wild,
 Access denied ; and overhead up-grew
 Insuperable highth of loftiest shade,
 Cedar, and pine, and fir, and branching palm,
 A sylvan scene, and, as the ranks ascend
 Shade above shade, a woody theatre
 Of stateliest view. Yet higher than their tops
 The verdurous wall of Paradise up-sprung,
 Which to our general sire gave prospect large
 Into his nether empire neighbouring round.
 And higher than that wall a circling row
 Of goodliest trees, loaden with fairest fruit,
 Blossoms and fruits at once of golden hue,
 Appeared, with gay enamelled colours mixed ;
 On which the sun more glad impressed his beams
 Than in fair evening cloud, or humid bow,
 When God hath showered the earth : so lovely seemed
 That landskip. And of pure now purer air
 Meets his approach, and to the heart inspires
 Vernal delight and joy, able to drive
 All sadness but despair. Now gentle gales,
 Fanning their odoriferous wings, dispense
 Native perfumes, and whisper whence they stole
 Those balmy spoils. As, when to them who sail
 Beyond the Cape of Hope, and now are past
 Mozambic, off at sea north-east winds blow
 Sabeian odours from the spicy shore
 Of Araby the Blest, with such delay
 Well pleased they slack their course, and many a league
 Cheered with the grateful smell old Ocean smiles.

Morning Hymn in Paradise.

'These are thy glorious works, Parent of good,
 Almighty ! thine this universal frame,
 Thus wondrous fair : Thyself how wondrous then !
 Unspeakable ! who sitt'st above these heavens
 To us invisible, or dimly seen
 In these thy lowest works ; yet these declare
 Thy goodness beyond thought, and power divine.
 Speak, ye who best can tell, ye Sons of Light,
 Angels—for ye behold him, and with songs
 And choral symphonies, day without night,
 Circle his throne rejoicing—ye in Heaven ;
 On Earth join, all ye creatures, to extol
 Him first, him last, him midst, and without end.
 Fairest of Stars, last in the train of Night,
 If better thou belong not to the Dawn,
 Sure pledge of day, that crown'st the smiling morn
 With thy bright circlet, praise him in thy sphere
 While day arises, that sweet hour of prime.
 Thou Sun, of this great World both eye and soul,
 Acknowledge him thy greater ; sound his praise
 In thy eternal course, both when thou climb'st,
 And when high noon hast gained, and when thou fall'st.
 Moon, that now meet'st the orient Sun, now fiest,
 With the fixed Stars, fixed in their orb that flies ;
 And ye five other wandering Fires, that move
 In mystic dance, not without song, resound
 His praise who out of Darkness called up Light.
 Air, and ye Elements, the eldest birth
 Of Nature's womb, that in quaternion run
 Perpetual circle, multifiform, and mix
 And nourish all things, let your ceaseless change
 Vary to our great Maker still new praise.

Ye Mists and Exhalations, that now rise
 From hill or steaming lake, dusky or gray,
 Till the sun paint your fleecy skirts with gold,
 In honour to the World's great Author rise ;
 Whether to deck with clouds the uncoloured sky,
 Or wet the thirsty earth with falling showers,
 Rising or falling, still advance his praise.
 His praise, ye Winds, that from four quarters blow,
 Breathe soft or loud ; and wave your tops, ye Pines,
 With every Plant, in sign of worship wave.
 Fountains, and ye, that warble, as ye flow,
 Melodious murmurs, warbling tune his praise.
 Join voices, all ye living Souls. Ye Birds,
 That, singing, up to Heaven-gate ascend,
 Bear on your wings and in your notes his praise.
 Ye that in waters glide, and ye that walk
 The earth, and stately tread, or lowly creep,
 Witness if I be silent, morn or even,
 To hill or valley, fountain, or fresh shade,
 Made vocal by my song, and taught his praise.
 Hail, universal Lord ! Be bounteous still
 To give us only good ; and, if the night
 Have gathered aught of evil, or concealed,
 Disperse it, as now light dispels the dark.'

So prayed they innocent, and to their thoughts
 Firm peace recovered soon, and wonted calm.
 On to their morning's rural work they haste,
 Among sweet dews and flowers, where any row
 Of fruit-trees, over-woody, reached too far
 Their pampered boughs, and needed hands to check
 Fruitless embraces : or they led the vine
 To wed her elm ; she, spoused, about him twines
 Her marriageable arms, and with her brings
 Her dower, the adopted clusters, to adorn
 His barren leaves.

(From Paradise Lost, Book v. l. 153.)

Evening in Paradise.

Now came still Evening on, and Twilight gray
 Had in her sober livery all things clad ;
 Silence accompanied ; for beast and bird,
 They to their grassy couch, these to their nests
 Were slunk, all but the wakeful nightingale.
 She all night long her amorous descant sung ;
 Silence was pleased. Now glowed the firmament
 With living sapphires ; Hesperus, that led
 The starry host, rode brightest, till the Moon,
 Rising in clouded majesty, at length
 Apparent queen, unveiled her peerless light,
 And o'er the dark her silver mantle threw ;
 When Adam thus to Eve :—' Fair consort, the hour
 Of night, and all things now retired to rest,
 Mind us of like repose ; since God hath set
 Labour and rest, as day and night, to men
 Successive, and the timely dew of sleep,
 Now falling with soft slumberous weight, inclines
 Our eye-lids. Other creatures all day long
 Rove idle, unemployed, and less need rest ;
 Man hath his daily work of body or mind
 Appointed, which declares his dignity,
 And the regard of Heaven on all his ways ;
 While other animals unactive range,
 And of their doings God takes no account.
 To-morrow, ere fresh morning streak the east
 With first approach of light, we must be risen,
 And at our pleasant labour, to reform

Yon flowery arbours, yonder alleys green,
 Our walk at noon, with branches overgrown,
 That mock our scant manuring, and require
 More hands than ours to lop their wanton growth.
 Those blossoms also, and those dropping gums,
 That lie bestrewn, unsightly and unsmooth,
 Ask riddance, if we mean to tread with ease.
 Meanwhile, as Nature wills, Night bids us rest.'

To whom thus Eve, with perfect beauty adorned :—
 'My author and disposer, what thou bidd'st
 Unargued I obey. So God ordains :
 God is thy law, thou mine : to know no more
 Is woman's happiest knowledge, and her praise.
 With thee conversing, I forget all time,
 All seasons, and their change ; all please alike.
 Sweet is the breath of Morn, her rising sweet,
 With charm of earliest birds ; pleasant the Sun,
 When first on this delightful land he spreads
 His orient beams, on herb, tree, fruit, and flower,
 Glistering with dew ; fragrant the fertile Earth
 After soft showers ; and sweet the coming-on
 Of grateful Evening mild ; then silent Night,
 With this her solemn bird, and this fair Moon,
 And these the gems of Heaven, her starry train :
 But neither breath of Morn, when she ascends
 With charm of earliest birds ; nor rising Sun
 On this delightful land ; nor herb, fruit, flower,
 Glistering with dew ; nor fragrance after showers ;
 Nor grateful Evening mild ; nor silent Night,
 With this her solemn bird ; nor walk by moon,
 Or glittering star-light, without thee is sweet.
 But wherefore all night long shine these ? for whom
 This glorious sight, when sleep hath shut all eyes ?'

To whom our general ancestor replied :—
 'Daughter of God and Man, accomplished Eve,
 Those have their course to finish round the Earth
 By morrow evening, and from land to land
 In order, though to nations yet unborn,
 Ministering light prepared, they set and rise ;
 Lest total Darkness should by night regain
 Her old possession, and extinguish life
 In nature and all things ; which these soft fires
 Not only enlighten, but with kindly heat
 Of various influence foment and warm,
 Temper or nourish, or in part shed down
 Their stellar virtue on all kinds that grow
 On Earth, made hereby apter to receive
 Perfection from the Sun's more potent ray.
 These, then, though unbeheld in deep of night,
 Shine not in vain. Nor think, though men were none,
 That Heaven would want spectators, God want praise.
 Millions of spiritual creatures walk the Earth
 Unseen, both when we wake and when we sleep :
 All these with ceaseless praise his works behold
 Both day and night. How often, from the steep
 Of echoing hill or thicket, have we heard
 Celestial voices to the midnight air,
 Sole, or responsive each to other's note,
 Singing their great Creator ! Oft in bands
 While they keep watch, or nightly rounding walk,
 With heavenly touch of instrumental sounds
 In full harmonic number joined, their songs
 Divide the night, and lift our thoughts to Heaven.'

Thus talking, hand in hand alone they passed
 On to their blissful bower. It was a place
 Chosen by the sovran Planter, when he framed

All things to Man's delightful use. The roof
Of thickest covert was inwoven shade,
Laurel and myrtle, and what higher grew
Of firm and fragrant leaf; on either side
Acanthus, and each odorous bushy shrub,
Fenced up the verdant wall; each beauteous flower,
Iris all hues, roses, and jessamine,
Reared high their flourished heads between, and wrought
Mosaic; under foot the violet,
Crocus, and hyacinth, with rich inlay
Brodered the ground, more coloured than with stone
Of costliest emblem. Other creature here,
Beast, bird, insect, or worm, durst enter none;
Such was their awe of Man. . . .

Thus at their shady lodge arrived, both stood,
Both turned, and under open sky adored
The God that made both Sky, Air, Earth, and Heaven,
Which they beheld, the Moon's resplendent globe,
And starry Pole:—'Thou also madest the Night,
Maker Omnipotent; and thou the Day,
Which we, in our appointed work employed,
Have finished, happy in our mutual help
And mutual love, the crown of all our bliss
Ordained by thee; and this delicious place,
For us too large, where thy abundance wants
Partakers, and uncropt falls to the ground.
But thou hast promised from us two a race
To fill the Earth, who shall with us extol
Thy goodness infinite, both when we wake,
And when we seek, as now, thy gift of sleep.'

(From Paradise Lost, Book iv. l. 598.)

Expulsion from Paradise.

He added not; for Adam, at the news
Heart-strook, with chilling gripe of sorrow stood,
That all his senses bound; Eve, who unseen
Yet all had heard, with audible lament
Discovered soon the place of her retire:—

'O unexpected stroke, worse than of Death!
Must I thus leave thee, Paradise? thus leave
Thee, native soil? these happy walks and shades,
Fit haunt of Gods, where I had hope to spend,
Quiet, though sad, the respite of that day
That must be mortal to us both? O flowers,
That never will in other climate grow,
My early visitation, and my last
At even, which I bred up with tender hand
From the first opening bud, and gave ye names,
Who now shall rear ye to the Sun, or rank
Your tribes, and water from the ambrosial fount?
Thee, lastly, nuptial bower, by me adorned
With what to sight or smell was sweet, from thee
How shall I part, and whither wander down
Into a lower world, to this obscure
And wild? How shall we breathe in other air
Less pure, accustomed to immortal fruits?'

Whom thus the Angel interrupted mild:—
'Lament not, Eve, but patiently resign
What justly thou hast lost; nor set thy heart,
Thus over-fond, on that which is not thine.

Thy going is not lonely; with thee goes
Thy husband; him to follow thou art bound;
Where he abides, think there thy native soil.'

Adam, by this from the cold sudden damp
Recovering, and his scattered spirits returned,
To Michael thus his humble words addressed:—

'Celestial, whether among the Thrones, or named
Of them the highest—for such of shape may seem Prince above princes—gently hast thou told
Thy message, which might else in telling wound,
And in performing end us. What besides
Of sorrow, and dejection, and despair,
Our frailty can sustain, thy tidings bring—
Departure from this happy place, our sweet
Recess, and only consolation left
Familiar to our eyes; all places else
Inhospitable appear, and desolate,
Nor knowing us, nor known. And, if by prayer
Incessant I could hope to change the will
Of him who all things can, I would not cease
To weary him with my assiduous cries;
But prayer against his absolute decree
No more avails than breath against the wind,
Blown stifling back on him that breathes it forth:
Therefore to his great bidding I submit.
This most afflicts me—that, departing hence,
As from his face I shall be hid, deprived
His blessed countenance. Here I could frequent,
With worship, place by place where he voutsafed
Presence Divine, and to my sons relate,
"On this mount He appeared; under this tree
Stood visible; among these pines his voice
I heard; here with him at this fountain talked."
So many grateful altars I would rear
Of grassy turf, and pile up every stone
Of lustre from the brook, in memory
Or monument to ages, and thereon
Offer sweet-smelling gums, and fruits, and flowers.
In yonder nether world where shall I seek
His bright appearances, or footstep trace?
For, though I fled him angry, yet, recalled
To life prolonged and promised race, I now
Gladly behold though but his utmost skirts
Of glory, and far off his steps adore.' . . .

Now too nigh

The Archangel stood, and from the other hill
To their fixed station, all in bright array,
The Cherubim descended, on the ground
Gliding meteorous, as evening mist
Risen from a river o'er the marish glides,
And gathers ground fast at the labourer's heel
Homeward returning. High in front advanced,
The brandished sword of God before them blazed,
Fierce as a comet; which with torrid heat,
And vapour as the Libyan air adust,
Began to parch that temperate clime; whereat
In either hand the hastening Angel caught
Our lingering parents, and to the eastern gate
Led them direct, and down the cliff as fast
To the subjected plain—then disappeared.
They, looking back, all the eastern side beheld
Of Paradise, so late their happy seat,
Waved over by that flaming brand; the gate
With dreadful faces thronged and fiery arms.
Some natural tears they dropped, but wiped them
soon;

The world was all before them, where to choose
Their place of rest, and Providence their guide.
They, hand in hand, with wandering steps and slow,
Through Eden took their solitary way.

Satan's Survey of Greece.

Westward, much nearer by south-west ; behold
 Where on the Ægean shore a city stands,
 Built nobly, pure the air and light the soil—
 Athens, the eye of Greece, mother of arts
 And eloquence, native to famous wits
 Or hospitable, in her sweet recess,
 City or suburban, studious walks and shades.
 See there the olive-grove of Academe,
 Plato's retirement, where the Attic bird
 Trills her thick-warbled notes the summer long ;
 There, flowery hill, Hyættus, with the sound
 Of bees' industrious murmur, oft invites
 To studious musing ; there Ilissus rolls
 His whispering stream. Within the walls then view
 The schools of ancient sages—his who bred
 Great Alexander to subdue the world,
 Lyceum there ; and painted Stoa next.
 There thou shalt hear and learn the secret power
 Of harmony, in tones and numbers hit
 By voice or hand, and various-measured verse,
 Æolian charms and Dorian lyric odes,
 And his who gave them breath, but higher sung,
 Blind Melesigenes, thence Homer called,
 Whose poem Phœbus challenged for his own.
 Thence what the lofty grave Tragedians taught
 In chorus or iambic, teachers best
 Of moral prudence, with delight received
 In brief sententious precepts, while they treat
 Of fate, and chance, and change in human life,
 High actions and high passions best describing.
 Thence to the famous Orators repair,
 Those ancient whose resistless eloquence
 Wielded at will that fierce democracy,
 Shook the Arsenal, and fulminated over Greece
 To Macedon and Artaxerxes' throne.
 To sage Philosophy next lend thine ear,
 From heaven descended to the low-roofed house
 Of Socrates—see there his tenement—
 Whom, well inspired, the oracle pronounced
 Wisest of men ; from whose mouth issued forth
 Mellifluous streams, that watered all the schools
 Of Academics old and new, with those Surnamed Peripatetics, and the sect
 Epicurean, and the Stoic severe.
 These here revolve, or, as thou likest, at home,
 Till time mature thee to a kingdom's weight ;
 These rules will render thee a king complete
 Within thyself, much more with empire joined.

(From Paradise Regained, Book iv. l. 237.)

Milton was one of the first Latinists of his time, and the first English writer of Latin verse who could be named alongside of Buchanan. It is curious that two of the greatest British writers known to the Continent by their Latin works should both, the Scot and the Englishman alike, have been exponents of a doctrine as to kings, government, and peoples peculiarly abhorrent to all loyalists, royalists, and jure divino men wherever found. Milton's Latinity is illustrated not merely in his secretarial work, his Epistola Familiares, and his early Prolusiones, but in his Latin poems, the first and second Defensiones, and his Doctrina Christiana.

Milton's English prose style is lofty, vigorous, expressive, clear, and adorned with profuse and pregnant imagery, and his vocabulary is rich, varied, and effective, in the Saxon as well as in the Latin elements of it. His model was sonorous oratory ; 'the long winding sentence, propped on epithets and festooned with digressions, was the habitual vehicle of his meaning.' Hence, like other monuments of the age, even his best work shows undue fondness for the Latin idiom in the construction of sentences ; occasional paragraphs, like the commencement of the Areopagitica, read like a translation from the Latin. But the force and directness with which he sped his Saxon monosyllables made them at least as deadly as his sesquipedalian artillery. 'It is to be regretted,' said Lord Macaulay, 'that the prose writings of Milton should in our time be so little read. As compositions, they deserve the attention of every man who wishes to become acquainted with the full power of the English language. They abound with passages compared with which the finest declamations of Burke sink into insignificance. They are a perfect field of cloth of gold. The style is stiff with gorgeous embroidery. Not even in the earlier books of the Paradise Lost has he ever risen higher than in those parts of his controversial works in which his feelings, excited by conflict, find a vent in bursts of devotional and lyric rapture. It is, to borrow his own majestic language, "a sevenfold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies."'

A translated extract from the Defensio Secunda has been given above at pages 544, 545. The following specimens of Milton's own English are taken from The Reason of Church Government (containing the reminiscences of his early projects), from the treatise Of Education, and from the Areopagitica :

I must say, therefore, that after I had, from my first years, by the ceaseless diligence and care of my father (whom God recompense !), been exercised to the tongues, and some sciences, as my age would suffer, by sundry masters and teachers, both at home and at the schools, it was found that whether aught was imposed me by them that had the overlooking, or betaken to of mine own choice in English, or other tongue, prosing or versing, but chiefly the latter, the style, by certain vital signs it had, was likely to live. But much latelier, in the private academies of Italy, whither I was favoured to resort, perceiving that some trifles which I had in memory, composed at under twenty or thereabout (for the manner is, that every one must give some proof of his wit and reading there), met with acceptance above what was looked for ; and other things which I had shifted, in scarcity of books and conveniences, to patch up among them, were received with written encomiums, which the Italian is not forward to bestow on men of this side the Alps ; I began thus far to assent both to them and divers of my friends here at home, and not less to an inward prompting, which now grew daily upon me, that by labour and intent study (which I take to be my portion in this life), joined with the strong propensity of nature, I might perhaps leave something so written to aftertimes as they should not willingly let it die. These thoughts at once possessed me, and these other, that if I were certain to write as men buy leases, for three lives and downward, there ought no regard be sooner had than to God's glory, by the honour and instruction of my country. For which cause, and not only for that I knew it would be hard to arrive at the second rank among the Latins, I applied myself to that resolution which Ariosto followed against the persuasions of Bembo, to fix all the industry and art I could unite to the adorning of my native tongue; not to make verbal curiosities the end—that were a toilsome vanity; but to be an interpreter and relater of the best and sagest things among mine own citizens throughout this island in the mother dialect. That what the greatest and choicest wits of Athens, Rome, or modern Italy, and those Hebrews of old did for their country, I, in my proportion, with this over and above, of being a Christian, might do for mine; not caring to be once named abroad, though perhaps I could attain to that, but content with these British islands as my world; whose fortune hath hitherto been, that if the Athenians, as some say, made their small deeds great and renowned by their eloquent writers, England hath had her noble achievements made small by the unskilful handling of monks and mechanics.

Time serves not now, and perhaps I might seem too profuse, to give any certain account of what the mind at home, in the spacious circuits of her musing, hath liberty to propose to herself, though of highest hope and hardest attempting. Whether that epic form, whereof the two poems of Homer, and those other two of Virgil and Tasso, are a diffuse, and the book of Job a brief model; or whether the rules of Aristotle herein are strictly to be kept, or nature to be followed, which in them that know art and use judgment is no transgression, but an enriching of art: and, lastly, what king or knight before the Conquest might be chosen, in whom to lay the pattern of a Christian hero. And as Tasso gave to a prince of Italy his choice, whether he would command him to write of Godfrey's expedition against the Infidels, or Belisarius against the Goths, or Charlemain against the Lombards; if to the instinct of nature and the emboldening of art ought may be trusted, and that there be nothing adverse in our climate, or the fate of this age, it haply would be no rashness, from an equal diligence and inclination, to present the like offer in our own ancient stories; or whether those dramatic constitutions wherein Sophocles and Euripides reign shall be found more doctrinal and exemplary to a nation. The Scripture also affords us a divine pastoral drama in the Song of Solomon, consisting of two persons and a double chorus, as Origen rightly judges; and the Apocalypse of St John is the majestic image of a high and stately tragedy, shutting up and intermingling her solemn scenes and acts with a seven-fold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies: and this my opinion, the grave authority of Pareus, commenting that book, is sufficient to confirm. Or if occasion shall lead, to imitate those magnificent odes and hymns, wherein Pindarus and Callimachus are in most things worthy, some others in their frame judicious, in their matter most, and end faulty. But those frequent songs throughout the law and prophets beyond all these, not in their divine argument alone, but in the very critical art of composition, may be easily made appear over all the kinds of lyric poesy to be incomparable. These abilities, wheresoever they be found, are the inspired gift of God, rarely bestowed, but yet to some (though most abuse) in every nation: and are of power, besides the office of a pulpit, to inbreed and cherish in a great people the seeds of virtue and public civility, to allay the perturbations of the mind, and set the affections in right tune; to celebrate in glorious and lofty hymns the throne and equipage of God's almightiness, and what he works, and what he suffers to be wrought with high providence in his church; to sing victorious agonies of martyrs and saints, the deeds and triumphs of just and pious nations, doing valiantly through faith against the enemies of Christ; to deplore the general relapses of kingdoms and states from justice and God's true worship. Lastly, whatsoever in religion is holy and sublime, in virtue amiable or grave, whatsoever hath passion or admiration in all the changes of that which is called fortune from without, or the wily subtleties and reflexes of man's thoughts from within; all these things, with a solid and treatable smoothness, to paint out and describe. Teaching over the whole book of sanctity and virtue, through all the instances of example, with such delight to those, especially of soft and delicious temper, who will not so much as look upon Truth herself, unless they see her elegantly dressed; that whereas the paths of honesty and good life appear now rugged and difficult, though they be indeed easy and pleasant, they would then appear to all men both easy and pleasant, though they were rugged and difficult indeed. And what a benefit would this be to our youth and gentry may be soon guessed by what we know of the corruption and bane which they suck in daily from the writings and interludes of libidinous and ignorant poetasters, who having scarce ever heard of that which is the main consistence of a true poem, the choice of such persons as they ought to introduce, and what is moral and decent to each one, do for the most part lay up vicious principles in sweet pills, to be swallowed down, and make the taste of virtuous documents harsh and sour. But because the spirit of man cannot demean itself lively in this body without some repeating intermission of labour and serious things, it were happy for the commonwealth if our magistrates, as in those famous governments of old, would take into their care not only the deciding of our contentious law cases and brawls, but the managing of our public sports and festival pastimes, that they might be, not such as were authorised awhile since, the provocations of drunkenness and lust, but such as may inure and harden our bodies, by martial exercises, to all warlike skill and performances; and may civilise, adorn, and make discreet our minds, by the learned and affable meeting of frequent academies, and the procurement of wise and artful recitations, sweetened with eloquent and graceful enticements to the love and practice of justice, temperance, and fortitude; instructing and bettering the nation at all opportunities, that the call of wisdom and virtue may be heard everywhere, as Solomon saith: 'She crieth without, she uttereth her voice, in the streets, in the top of high places, in the chief concourse, and in the openings of the gates.' Whether this may be not only in pulpits, but after another persuasive method, at set and solemn paneguries, in theatres, porches, or what other place or way may win most upon the people, to receive at once both recreation and instruction, let them in authority consult. The thing which I had to say, and those intentions which have lived within me ever since I could conceive myself anything worth to my country, I return to crave excuse, that urgent reason hath plucked from me, by an abortive and fore-dated discovery. And the accomplishment of them lies not but in a power above man's to promise; but that none hath by more studious ways endeavoured, and with more unwearied spirit that none shall, that I dare almost aver of myself, as far as life and free leisure will extend; and that the land had once enfranchised herself from this impertinent yoke of prelacy, under whose inquisitorial and tyrannical duncery no free and splendid wit can flourish. Neither do I think it shame to covenant with any knowing reader, that for some few years yet I may go on trust with him toward the payment of what I am now indebted, as being a work not to be raised from the heat of youth or the vapours of wine; like that which flows at waste from the pen of some vulgar amourest, or the trencher-fury of a rhyming parasite; nor to be obtained by the invocation of Dame Memory and her siren daughters; but by devout prayer to that eternal Spirit, who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and sends out his seraphim with the hallowed fire of his altar, to touch and purify the lips of whom he pleases. To this must be added industrious and select reading, steady observation, insight into all seemly and generous arts and affairs; till which in some measure be compassed, at mine own peril and cost, I refuse not to sustain this expectation from as many as are not loth to hazard so much credulity upon the best pledges that I can give them. Although it nothing content me to have disclosed thus much beforehand, but that I trust hereby to make it manifest with what small willingness I endure to interrupt the pursuit of no less hopes than these, and leave a calm and pleasing solitariness, fed with cheerful and confident thoughts, to embark in a troubled sea of noises and hoarse disputes; put from beholding the bright countenance of truth in the quiet and still air of delightful studies, to come into the dim reflection of hollow antiquities sold by the seeming bulk, and there be fain to club quotations with men whose learning and belief lies in marginal stuffings, who when they have, like good sumpters, laid you down their horse-loads of citations and fathers at your door, with a rhapsody of who and who were bishops here or there, you may take off their packsaddles, their day's work is done, and episcopacy, as they think, stoutly vindicated. Let any gentle apprehension that can distinguish learned pains from unlearned drudgery imagine what pleasure or profoundness can be in this, or what honour to deal against such adversaries. But were it the meanest under-service, if God by his secretary conscience enjoin it, it were sad for me if I should draw back; for me especially, now when all men offer their aid to help, ease, and lighten the difficult labours of the church, to whose service, by the intentions of my parents and friends, I was destined of a child, and in mine own resolutions: till coming to some maturity of years, and perceiving what tyranny had invaded the church, that he who would take orders must subscribe slave, and take an oath withal, which, unless he took with a conscience that would retch, he must either straight perjure, or split his faith; I thought it better to prefer a blameless silence before the sacred office of speaking, bought and begun with servitude and forswearing.

From the Tractate 'Of Education.'

And seeing every nation affords not experience and tradition enough for all kind of learning, therefore we are chiefly taught the languages of those people who have at any time been most industrious after wisdom; so that language is but the instrument conveying to us things useful to be known. And though a linguist should pride himself to have all the tongues that Babel cleft the world into, yet, if he have not studied the solid things in them, as well as the words and lexicons, he were nothing so much to be esteemed a learned man as any yeoman or tradesman competently wise in his mother dialect only.

Hence appear the many mistakes which have made learning generally so displeasing and so unsuccessful: first, we do amiss to spend seven or eight years merely in scraping together so much miserable Latin and Greek as might be learned otherwise easily and delightfully in one year. And that which casts our proficiency therein so much behind is our time lost partly in too oft idle vacancies given both to schools and universities; partly in a preposterous exaction, forcing the empty wits of children to compose themes, verses, and orations which are the acts of ripest judgment, and the final work of a head filled by long reading and observing, with elegant maxims and copious invention. These are not matters to be wrung from poor striplings, like blood out of the nose, or the plucking of untimely fruit; besides the ill habit which they get of wretched barbarising against the Latin and Greek idiom, with their untutored Anglicisms, odious to be read, yet not to be avoided without a well-continued and judicious conversing among pure authors digested, which they scarce taste: whereas, if after some preparatory grounds of speech by their certain forms got into memory, they were led to the praxis thereof in some chosen short book lessoned thoroughly to them, they might then forthwith proceed to learn the substance of good things and arts in due order, which would bring the whole language quickly into their power. This I take to be the most rational and most profitable way of learning languages, and whereby we may best hope to give account to God of our youth spent herein.

And for the usual method of teaching arts, I deem it to be an old error of universities, not yet well recovered from the scholastic grossness of barbarous ages, that instead of beginning with arts most easy (and those be such as are most obvious to the sense), they present their young unmatriculated novices at first coming with the most intellective abstractions of logic and metaphysics, so that they having but newly left those grammatic flats and shallows where they stuck unreasonably to learn a few words with lamentable construction, and now on the sudden transported under another climate, to be tossed and turmoiled with their unballasted wits in fathomless and unquiet deeps of controversy, do for the most part grow into hatred and contempt of learning, mocked and deluded all this while with ragged notions and babblements, while they expected worthy and delightful knowledge; till poverty or youthful years call them importunately their several ways, and hasten them, with the sway of friends, either to an ambitious and mercenary or ignorantly zealous divinity; some allured to the trade of law, grounding their purposes not on the prudent and heavenly contemplation of justice and equity, which was never taught them, but on the promising and pleasing thoughts of litigious terms, fat contentions, and flowing fees; others betake them to state affairs, with souls so unprincipled in virtue and true generous breeding, that flattery and courtshifts and tyrannous aphorisms appear to them the highest points of wisdom, instilling their barren hearts with a conscientious slavery, if, as I rather think, it be not feigned. Others, lastly, of a more delicious and airy spirit, retire themselves, knowing no better, to the enjoyments of ease and luxury, living out their days in feast and jollity; which indeed is the wisest and the safest course of all these, unless they were with more integrity undertaken. And these are the errors, and these are the fruits of misspending our prime youth at schools and universities as we do, either in learning mere words, or such things chiefly as were better unlearned.

I shall detain you now no longer in the demonstration of what we should not do, but straight conduct you to a hillside, where I will point you out the right path of a virtuous and noble education; laborious indeed at the first ascent, but else so smooth, so green, so full of goodly prospect and melodious sounds on every side, that the harp of Orpheus was not more charming. I doubt not but ye shall have more ado to drive our dullest and laziest youth, our stocks and stubs, from the infinite desire of such a happy nurture, than we have now to hale and drag our choicest and hopefulest wits to that asinine feast of sowthistles and brambles which is commonly set before them, as all the food and entertainment of their tenderest and most docible age.

I call therefore a complete and generous education, that which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both private and public, of peace and war. And how all this may be done between twelve and one-and-twenty, less time than is now bestowed in pure trifling at grammar and sophistry, is to be thus ordered.

From the 'Areopagitica.'

I deny not but that it is of greatest concernment in the church and commonwealth to have a vigilant eye how books demean themselves as well as men; and thereafter to confine, imprison, and do sharpest justice on them as malefactors; for books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a potency of life in them, to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively and as vigorously productive as those fabulous dragon's teeth; and being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men. And yet on the other hand unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book: who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. It is true no age can restore a life, whereof perhaps there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse. We should be wary, therefore, what persecution we raise against the living labours of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man, preserved and stored up in books; since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom, and if it extend to the whole impression, a kind of massacre, whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at that ethereal and fifth essence, the breath of reason itself, slays an immortality rather than a life. . . .

Good and evil, we know, in the field of this world grow up together almost inseparably; and the knowledge of good is so involved and interwoven with the knowledge of evil, and in so many cunning resemblances hardly to be discerned, that those confused seeds which were imposed on Psyche as an incessant labour to cull out and sort asunder were not more intermixed. It was from out the rind of one apple tasted, that the knowledge of good and evil, as two twins cleaving together, leaped forth into the world. And perhaps this is that doom which Adam fell into of knowing good and evil, that is to say of knowing good by evil. As therefore the state of man now is, what wisdom can there be to choose, what continence to forbear, without the knowledge of evil? He that can apprehend and consider vice, with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true warfaring Christian. I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the world, we bring impurity much rather: that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That virtue, therefore, which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmost that vice promises to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank virtue, not a pure; her whiteness is but an excremental whiteness: which was the reason why our sage and serious poet, Spenser (whom I dare be known to think a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas), describing true temperance under the person of Guion, brings him in with his Palmer through the cave of Mammon and the bower of earthly bliss, that he might see and know, and yet abstain. Since, therefore, the knowledge and survey of vice is in this world so necessary to the constituting of human virtue, and the scanning of error to the confirmation of truth, how can we more safely and with less danger scout into the regions of sin and falsity than by reading all manner of tractates and hearing all manner of reason? And this is the benefit which may be had of books promiscuously read. . . .

I lastly proceed from the no good it can do, to the manifest hurt it causes, in being first the greatest discouragement and affront that can be offered to learning and to learned men. It was the complaint and lamentation of prelates, upon every least breath of a motion to remove pluralities and distribute more equally church-revenues, that then all learning would be for ever dashed and discouraged. But as for that opinion, I never found cause to think that the tenth part of learning stood or fell with the clergy; nor could I ever but hold it for a sordid and unworthy speech of any churchman who had a competency left him. If therefore ye be loath to dishearten utterly and discontent, not the mercenary crew and false pretenders to learning, but the free and ingenuous sort of such as evidently were born to study and love learning for itself, not for lucre or any other end, but the service of God and of truth, and perhaps that lasting fame and perpetuity of praise which God and good men have consented shall be the reward in those whose published labours advance the good of mankind ; then know that so far to distrust the judgment and the honesty of one who hath but a common repute in learning and never yet offended, as not to count him fit to print his mind without a tutor and examiner, lest he should drop a schism or something of corruption, is the greatest displeasure and indignity to a free and knowing spirit that can be put upon him. What advantage is it to be a man, over it is to be a boy at school, if we have only scraped the ferula to come under the fescue of an Imprimatur?—if serious and elaborate writings, as if they were no more than the theme of a grammar lad under his pedagogue, must not be uttered without the cursory eyes of a temporising and extemporising licenser? He who is not trusted with his own actions, his drift not being known to be evil, and standing to the hazard of law and penalty, has no great argument to think himself reputed in the commonwealth wherein he was born for other than a fool or a foreigner. When a man writes to the world, he summons up all his reason and deliberation to assist him ; he searches, meditates, is industrious, and likely consults and confers with his judicious friends ; after all which done, he takes himself to be informed in what he writes, as well as any that writ before him ; if in this, the most consummate act of his fidelity and ripeness, no years, no industry, no former proof of his abilities can bring him to that state of maturity, as not to be still mistrusted and suspected unless he carry all his considerate diligence, all his midnight watchings and expense of Palladian oil, to the hasty view of an unlicensed licenser, perhaps much his younger, perhaps far his inferior in judgment, perhaps one who never knew the labour of book-writing ; and if he be not repulsed or slighted, must appear in print like a puny with his guardian, and his censor's hand on the back of his title, to be his bail and surety that he is no idiot or seducer ; it cannot be but a dishonour and derogation to the author, to the book, to the privilege and dignity of learning. . . .

And lest some should persuade ye, Lords and Commons, that these arguments of learned men's discouragement at this your order are mere flourishes and not real, I could recount what I have seen and heard in other countries, where this kind of inquisition tyrannises ; when I have sat among their learned men (for that honour I had) and been counted happy to be born in such a place of philosophic freedom as they supposed England was, while themselves did nothing but bemoan the servile condition into which learning amongst them was brought ; that this was it which had damped the glory of Italian wits ; that nothing had been there written now these many years but flattery and fustian. There it was that I found and visited the famous Galileo, grown old, a prisoner to the Inquisition for thinking in astronomy otherwise than the Franciscan and Dominican licensers thought. And though I knew that England then was groaning loudest under the prelatical yoke, nevertheless I took it as a pledge of future happiness that other nations were so persuaded of her liberty. Yet was it beyond my hope that those worthies were then breathing in her air, who should be her leaders to such a deliverance as shall never be forgotten by any revolution of time that this world hath to finish. . . .

Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks ; methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full mid-day beam ; purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance ; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms. . . .

Though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple ; who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter? Her confuting is the best and surest suppressing. He who hears what praying there is for light and clear knowledge to be sent down among us, would think of other matters to be constituted beyond the discipline of Geneva, framed and fabricked already to our hands. Yet when the new light which we beg for shines in upon us, there be who envy and oppose, if it come not first in at their casements. What a collusion is this, whenas we are exhorted by the wise man to use diligence, 'to seek for wisdom as for hidden treasures,' early and late, that another order shall enjoin us to know nothing but by statute ! When a man hath been labouring the hardest labour in the deep mines of knowledge, hath furnished out his findings in all their equipage, drawn forth his reasons as it were a battle ranged, scattered and defeated all objections in his way, calls out his adversary into the plain, offers him the advantage of wind and sun, if he please, only that he may try the matter by dint of argument ; for his opponents then to skulk, to lay ambushments, to keep a narrow bridge of licensing where the challenger should pass, though it be valour enough in soldiership, is but weakness and cowardice in the wars of Truth. For who knows not that Truth is strong, next to the Almighty? She needs no policies, nor stratagems, nor licensings, to make her victorious ; those are the shifts and the defences that error uses against her power ; give her but room, and do not bind her when she sleeps.

The Reformation.

When I recall to mind at last, after so many dark ages wherein the huge overshadowing train of error had almost swept all the stars out of the firmament of the church, how the bright and blissful Reformation by Divine power strook through the black and settled night of ignorance and antichristian tyranny, methinks a sovereign and reviving joy must needs rush into the bosom of him that reads or hears, and the sweet odour of the returning Gospel imbathe his soul with the fragrancy of heaven. Then was the sacred Bible sought out of the dusty corners where profane falsehood and neglect had thrown it ; the schools opened ; divine and human learning raked out of the embers of forgotten tongues, the princes and cities trooping apace to the new-erected banner of salvation ; the martyrs with the irresistible might of weakness shaking the powers of darkness, and scorning the fiery rage of the old red dragon.

Then amidst the hymns and hallelujahs of saints, some one may perhaps be heard offering at high strains in new and lofty measure to sing and celebrate thy divine mercies and marvellous judgments in this land throughout all ages ; whereby this great and warlike nation, instructed and inured to the fervent and continual practice of truth and righteousness, and casting far from her the rags of her whole vices, may press on hard to that high and happy emulation to be found the soberest, wisest, and most Christian people at that day when thou, the eternal and shortly expected King, shalt open the clouds to judge the several kingdoms of the world, and distributing national honours and rewards to religious and just commonwealths, shalt put an end to all earthly tyrannies, proclaiming thy universal and mild monarchy through heaven and earth ; where they undoubtedly that by their labours, counsels, and prayers have been earnest for the common good of religion and their country, shall receive above the inferior orders of the blessed, the regal addition of principalities, legions, and thrones into their glorious titles, and in supereminence of beatific vision, progressing the dateless and irrevoluble circle of eternity, shall clasp inseparable hands with joy and bliss, in overmeasure for ever.

But they contrary that by the impairing and diminution of the true faith, the distresses and servitude of their country, aspire to high dignity, rule, and promotion here, after a shameful end in this life (which God grant them), shall be thrown down eternally into the darkest and deepest gulf of hell, where under the despiteful control, the trample and spurn of all the other damned that in the anguish of their torture shall have no other ease than to exercise a raving and bestial tyranny over them as their slaves and negroes, they shall remain in that plight for ever, the basest, the lowermost, the most dejected, most underfoot, and down-trodden vassals of perdition.

Truth.

Truth, indeed, came once into the world with her Divine Master, and was a perfect shape, most glorious to look on ; but when he ascended and his apostles after him were laid asleep, then straight arose a wicked race of deceivers, who, as that story goes of the Egyptian Typhon with his conspirators, how they dealt with the god Osiris, took the virgin Truth, hewed her lovely form into a thousand pieces, and scattered them to the four winds. From that time ever since the sad friends of Truth, such as durst appear, imitating the careful search that Isis made for the mangled body of Osiris, went up and down gathering up limb by limb still as they could find them. We have not yet found them all, Lords and Commons ! nor ever shall do till her Master's second coming ; he shall bring together every joint and member, and mould them into an immortal feature of loveliness and perfection.

Of the Roman Power in Britain.

Thus expired this great empire of the Romans ; first in Britain, soon after in Italy itself ; having borne chief sway in this island (though never thoroughly subdued, or all at once in subjection) if we reckon from the coming in of Julius to the taking of Rome by Alaric, in which year Honorius wrote those letters of discharge into Britain, the space of four hundred and sixty-two years. And with the empire fell also what before in this western world was chiefly Roman—learning, valour, eloquence, history, civility, and even language itself—all these together, as it were with equal pace, diminishing and decaying. Henceforth we are to steer by another sort of authors, near enough to the times they write, as in their own country, if that would serve, in time not much belated, some of equal age, in expression barbarous ; and to say how judicious I suspend awhile. This we must expect ; in civil matters to find them dubious relaters, and still to the best advantage of what they term Mother Church, meaning indeed themselves ; in most other matters of religion blind, astonished, and strook with superstition as with a planet ; in one word, monks. Yet these guides, where can be had no better, must be followed ; in gross it may be true enough ; in circumstance each man as his judgment gives him may reserve his faith or bestow it.

(From History of England.)

From the beginning the reception of Milton in France was hesitating, doubtful, and fluctuating. Voltaire in some measure felt the grandeur of Paradise Lost, and translated some of it, rather freely. But he was naturally unable to appreciate Milton : Pococurante in Candide probably only exaggerates Voltaire's own opinion when he refers to Paradise Lost as an 'obscure, eccentric, and disgusting poem,' and speaks of Milton as 'a barbarian who constructed a long commentary on the book of Genesis in harsh verse.' Certainly this view was not confined to Voltaire's Pococurante, though the second French translator of the Paradise Lost was the son of the great Racine. But after the Revolution Milton was made a hero. The Romanticists enrolled him amongst the greatest of poets. The translation by the venerable Jacques Delille was well received though utterly feeble ; Chateaubriand, an enthusiastic admirer, produced an impossible attempt at a literal translation ; a less unsatisfactory rendering appeared in 1838. Taine's elaborate appreciation again attracted interest in France to Milton ; and Sainte-Beuve gave a wider acceptance to Taine's estimate of 'England's most splendid and most complex poetic genius.' 'Vast knowledge, close logic, and grand passion ; these are his marks.' 'Milton's landscapes are a school of virtue.' In the twentieth century M. Denis Saurat directed his fellow-countrymen's attention to Milton as a thinker and philosopher.

In Germany, as might have been expected, Milton's reception was friendlier from the first, though there too he found unsympathetic critics ; Paradise Lost gave a great impulse to German poetry, and like and dislike of Milton were for long the notes of the two great German critical schools. Paradise Lost was twice translated into German in the seventeenth century, three times in the eighteenth century, and no less than six times in the nineteenth. Gottsched and the Leipzig school advocated in the early eighteenth century a humble adherence to French standards of taste, an almost slavish imitation of French models ; Bodmer and the Zurich or Swiss school stood up for Nature, for poetic power and depth rather than formal correctness and elegance, for religious subjects as the greatest, for rhymelessness and blank verse, and for Milton. Bodmer was himself one of the translators of Paradise Lost (1732) ; and on the whole

Bodmer and the Swiss school triumphed in a controversy somewhat analogous to that of Classicism and Romanticism in the following century, a controversy that in a way foreshadowed the great literary struggle at the close of the eighteenth and the early nineteenth centuries. And the triumph of the Swiss school prepared the way for the 'seraphic school' and for Klopstock, and secured the enthusiastic welcome given in Germany to the 'German Milton.' But except in the first flush of that enthusiasm, even German critics agreed that Klopstock at his best never rises to Milton's height, and that the Messias stands on an altogether lower plane, both of thought and expression. Herder and Lessing, it should be added, were fully conscious of Milton's poetic greatness.

Gottsched, in defence of his thesis, eagerly welcomed the unfavourable comments made in England—some of them by Milton's embittered political enemies, who saw in the poet mainly the hateful defender of the king's assassins. Gottsched imported into Germany Lauder's charge against Milton of having shamelessly plagiarised from various modern writers of Latin verse.

William Lauder, a wooden-legged Edinburgh graduate, a competent Latinist but an unsuccessful candidate for scholastic posts, settled in London as a literary hack. In 1747, in the Gentleman's Magazine, he made his famous charge against Milton, alleging Paradise Lost to be largely composed of translations from the Adamus Exsul of Grotius; the Poemata Sacra (1633) of Ramsay, an Edinburgh minister; from Masenius, Staphorstius, Taubmann, and other even less-known authors; finally (1753), he extended the list of authors whom Milton had plundered to ninety-seven! But long ere his frenzy rose so high, Lauder's friends, including Samuel Johnson, had been convinced that the passages he cited from these authors were, very many of them at least, not in the actual works named, which had been fraudulently garbled for his own purposes by the malevolent critic. Lauder had himself—as he ultimately confessed to Johnson—foisted into the quotations given as from the authors named passages which he had copied verbatim from William Hog's Latin version of Paradise Lost (published 1690). Lauder died in 1771.

On the other hand, it is perfectly known and recognised that Milton, an omnivorous reader, was influenced to some extent both in idea and expression by poetic predecessors, as well as by commentators on Scripture and systematic theologians; yet the comparisons of parallel passages only serve, on the whole, to show Milton's vast superiority. Bishop Ponet's translation (1549) of a Latin tragedy (no longer extant) by the Italian refugee Ochino seems to have left its mark on Milton's memory; there are obvious parallels noted by Dunster (1800) and others between Milton and Sylvester's translation of Du Bartas (see above at Sylvester, page 346); Gosse (1879) and Edmundson insisted on Milton's debt to the Dutch Vondel's Latin play Lucifer (1654), and so too the German critic Aug. Müller (1891). But none of the passages cited in the least diminish Milton's credit as a great poet, great both in creation and in expression. Nor would it prove Milton less original if the ingenious suggestion were true that the debates in Heaven reflect Milton's knowledge of actual debates in the Long Parliament or the Westminster Assembly; or that Belial may possibly be an uncomplimentary sketch of Sir Harry Vane, or some other of the contemporary personages whom the poet distrusted.

Probably no English author but Shakespeare has had accorded to him in as full measure as Milton the homage of constant quotation—often by the vulgar little read in poetry and all-unconscious whence their pet phrases come. How constantly does one hear cited not merely short passages or parts of passages like :

Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise
(That last infirmity of noble minds)

To scorn delights and live laborious days ;

but single lines or fragments such as 'Peace hath her victories not less renowned than war ;' 'Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven ;' 'The mind can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven ;' 'More is meant than meets the ear ;' 'Not to know me argues yourself unknown ;' 'Hence, loathed melancholy ;' 'Trip on the light fantastic toe ;' 'Death the gate of life ;' 'Laughter holding both his sides ;' 'Fallen on evil days ;' 'Smoothing the rugged brow of night ;' 'The world was all before them ;' 'Fit audience find though few ;' 'To temper justice with mercy ;' 'To make darkness visible ;' 'Heaven in her eye ;' 'Confusion worse confounded ;' 'To-morrow to fresh woods and pastures new.' Many of these phrases have passed from Milton into current speech ; some appear in curious combinations and permutations, and, like the last, are persistently misquoted ; and some have through too frequent citation in unsuitable connections been degraded into a kind of irritating slang.

Milton's nephew, Edward Phillips, wrote a Life, as did Toland, Symonds, Mitford, and Todd ; see The Early Lives of Milton, by Helen Darbishire (1932) ; but all were superseded by Masson's Life (6 vols. 1859-80 ; index vol. 1894), a stupendous monument of learned industry and scholarly research. In spite of its prejudices, Dr Samuel Johnson's sketch retains its literary interest. There are short Lives by Mark Pattison (1880 ; 1925) and Garnett (1889), and studies by W. P. Trent (1899), Raleigh (1900), Williamson (1905), Bailey (1915), Tillyard (1930, 1938), and by Saintsbury in the Cambridge History of Literature. See also A. Stern's Milton und Seine Zeit (2 vols. 1878) ; Von Treitschke's essay (1886) ; Dowden's Puritan and Anglican (1901) ; Robert Bridges's treatise on Milton's prosody (1893 ; 1921) ; Sampson's Studies in Milton (1914) ; Liljegren's (1919) ; Havens's Influence of Milton on English Poetry (1922) ; and D. Saurat's Milton, Man and Thinker (1924). Modern editions of Milton's poems are those of Masson (3 vols. 1874 ; new ed. 1890) ; Wright (1903) ; Boeching (1900 ; 1904) ; Nonesuch Press (with illustrations by Blake ; 2 vols. 1926) ; Grierson (1925 et seq.) ; Smart (Sonnets, 1921) ; Patterson (Works, 1931 et seq.). Earlier editions were the famous one by Bentley (1732), and those by Boydell (1794), Todd (1801), Sir E. Brydges (1835), and James Montgomery (1843). Bradshaw's Aldine edition appeared in 1697. There have been editions of the prose works in 1697, by Toland (1698 ; 1738 ; 1753), Symmons (1806), Fletcher (1833), Mitford (1851), and St John (Bohn, 4 vols. 1848-53). Macaulay's criticism in the Essays is characteristically brilliant. In 1690-94 Hog (Hogæus) rendered most of Milton's poems into Latin; and there are Latin versions of Paradise Lost by Joseph Trapp (1741) and William Dobson (1750). The English translation of the first Defensio usually cited is that by Joseph Washington (about 1690); of the second, that by Dr Fellows (1806); and there is another by Archdeacon Wrangham (1816). G. Jenny wrote (1890) on the influence of Milton on German literature in the eighteenth century. The Latin prose romance of Nova Solyma, first published in 1648, was reprinted, with an elaborate argument for Milton's authorship, by Walter Begley in 1902; but the attribution was by no means generally admitted. See the Topical Bibliography (1916) by E. N. S. Thompson.

Andrew Marvell was born in the village of Winestead, in the south-east angle of Yorkshire, on 31st March 1621. His father, also Andrew Marvell (c. 1586-1641), was rector of Winestead (1614-24), and then till his death Town's Preacher (or Lecturer of Holy Trinity Church) and Master of God's House (an almshouse commonly called the Charterhouse) at Hull—not master of the Grammar School there as stated by the early editors. Andrew Marvell senior was drowned in crossing the Humber. Having a presentiment of danger, according to a romantic story, he threw his cane ashore from the boat, saying to the spectators that in case he should perish the cane was to be given to his son, with the injunction that he should remember his father. His fears were verified; the boat went down in the storm. The mother of a young lady whom he was escorting, and who shared his fate, provided for the drowned minister's son—so the legend runs—and left him a fortune. (See H. M. Margoliouth and Pierre Legouis in the Modern Language Review, 1922-23, on this and other details of Marvell's life.) Young Marvell studied in 1633-41 at Trinity College, Cambridge, and then travelled for four years in Holland, France, Italy, and Spain. A letter from Milton to Secretary Bradshaw was in 1823 discovered in the State-Paper Office, in which the poet recommends Marvell as a person well fitted to assist himself in his office of Latin secretary, he being a good scholar and lately engaged by Lord Fairfax to give some instruction in the languages to his daughter. The letter is dated 21st February 1653. Marvell, however, was not engaged as Milton's assistant till 1657; meanwhile he was tutor at Eton to a ward of Cromwell's, and there got to know John Hales. In January 1659 he took his seat in Richard Cromwell's Parliament as member for Hull. He was not, like Waller, an eloquent speaker, but his consistency and integrity made him highly esteemed and respected. He maintained a close correspondence with his constituents, and his letters fill four hundred printed pages. His constituents, in return, occasionally sent him a stout cask of ale; and he was one of the last paid members, receiving in session 6s. 8d. per diem. In 1663-65 he went as a secretary of embassy to Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. Charles II. delighted in his society, and believing, like Sir Robert Walpole, that every man had his price, he sent Lord Danby, his treasurer, to wait upon Marvell, with an offer of a place at court and an immediate present of a thousand pounds. The inflexible member resisted his offers, and it is said humorously illustrated his independence by calling his servant to witness that he had dined for three days successively on a shoulder of mutton. The story adds—but the whole seems highly improbable—that when the treasurer was gone Marvell was forced to send to a friend to borrow a guinea. The patriot preserved his integrity to the last, and satirised the profligacy and arbitrary measures of the court with much wit and pungency. He died about 10th August 1678, at the time of the Popish Plot, not without suspicion of poison, but really the victim of a tertian ague, unskilfully treated by an ignorant, obstinate doctor. The town of Hull voted £50 to erect a monument to Marvell's memory, but the court interfered and forbade the votive tribute.

Marvell's prose writings were exceedingly popular in their day, but, written for temporary purposes, they have mostly gone out of date with the events that produced them. In 1672-73 he attacked Dr (afterwards Bishop) Parker in a piece entitled The Rehearsal Transposed, in which he vindicates the fair fame of Milton, who, he says, 'was and is a man of as great learning and sharpness of wit as any man.' This controversy has won him a part as interlocutor in one of the most vigorous of Landor's Imaginary Conversations, where he is made to slay the Bishop over again, and to say far finer things about Milton than he had said in his own works. One of Marvell's treatises, An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England (1677), was considered so formidable that a reward was offered for the discovery of the author and printer. As in the case of Milton and other Puritans, the energy and independence of Marvell in theological controversy verged upon freethinking and rationalism. A Short Historical Essay concerning General Councils, appended to one of his controversial tracts, is so free in its criticism of the mode of securing agreement at the Council of Nice that it looks very like a polemic against the dogmas there formulated and so forced on the Christian Church. And one is not surprised to find that this essay was republished in the interests of the eighteenth-century Deists. Ample evidence of that vein of sportive humour and raillery on national manners and absurdities, afterwards so effectively employed by Addison, Steele, Arbuthnot, and Swift, may be found in Marvell. He wrote with great liveliness, point, and vigour, though he was often coarse and personal. His poetry was, in his own time, an embellishment to his character of patriot and controversialist rather than a substantive ground of honour and distinction; yet even Sainte-Beuve (whose attention was called to him by Matthew Arnold) greeted in him a worthy though not co-equal rival of Milton, a more martial and less purely Christian champion of the same Christian and patriotic English renaissance. Only a lovable man could have written his verses on The Emigrants in the Bermudas. His poem on The Nymph Complaining for the Death of her Fawn is a triumph of grace and pathos. 'Music the mosaic of the air,' from his Music's Empire, illustrates a tendency to occasional conceits; 'Only human eyes can weep,' from Eyes and Tears, shows suggestive (if not strictly accurate) observation and phrasing. A different aspect of his genius, recalling the frank and half-pagan sensuousness of another party and an earlier age than his own, is seen in the lines To his Coy Mistress, and in those entitled The Garden. The former, perhaps his very finest verses, are too much like some of Donne's warmer amoretti for quotation in full; yet this specimen of them must at least be quoted:

But at my back I always hear
Time's winged chariot hurrying near,
And yonder all before us lie
Deserts of vast eternity.

The luscious stanzas on The Garden—a superior English rendering of a Latin exercise of Marvell's own—are not extravagantly praised by Palgrave as 'a test of any reader's insight into the most poetical aspects of poetry,' although the affinity which they display is not so much with Shelley's airy raptures as with the luxuriant fancies of Keats.

The Emigrants in the Bermudas.

Where the remote Bermudas ride
In the ocean's bosom unespied,
From a small boat that rowed along,
The listening winds received this song:
'What should we do but sing his praise
That led us through the watery maze

Unto an isle so long unknown,
And yet far kinder than our own?
Where he the huge sea-monsters wracks,
That lift the deep upon their backs;
He lands us on a grassy stage,
Safe from the storms and prelates' rage.
He gave us this eternal spring
Which here enamels everything,
And sends the fowls to us in care,
On daily visits thro' the air.
He hangs in shades the orange bright,
Like golden lamps in a green night,
And does in the pomegranates close
Jewels more rich than Ormus shews.
He makes the figs our mouths to meet,
And throws the melons at our feet.
But apples, plants of such a price,
No tree could ever bear them twice!
With cedars chosen by his hand
From Lebanon he stores the land;
And makes the hollow seas that roar,
Proclaim the ambergrease on shore.
He cast (of which we rather boast)
The Gospel's pearl upon our coast;
And in these rocks for us did frame
A temple where to sound his name.
O let our voice his praise exalt,
Till it arrive at heaven's vault,
Which then perhaps rebounding may
Echo beyond the Mexique bay.'
Thus sang they in the English boat
An holy and a cheerful note,
And all the way, to guide their chime,
With falling oars they kept the time.

The Nymph Complaining for the Death of her Fawn.

The wanton troopers riding by
Have shot my fawn, and it will die.
Ungentle men! They cannot thrive
Who killed thee. Thou ne'er didst, alive,
Them any harm; alas! nor could
Thy death yet do them any good.
I'm sure I never wished them ill,
Nor do I for all this, nor will:
But, if my simple prayers may yet
Prevail with Heaven to forget
Thy murder, I will join my tears
Rather than fail. But O my fears!
It cannot die so. Heaven's King
Keeps register of every thing,
And nothing may we use in vain;
Even beasts must be with justice slain;
Else men are made their deodands.
Though they should wash their guilty hands
In this warm life-blood, which doth part
From thine, and wound me to the heart,
Yet could they not be clean; their stain
Is dyed in such a purple grain.
There is not such another in
The world to offer for their sin.

Inconstant Sylvio, when yet
I had not found him counterfeit,
One morning, I remember well,
Tied in this silver chain and bell,

Gave it to me : nay, and I know
 What he said then, I'm sure I do.
 Said he : ' Look how your huntsman here
 Hath taught a fawn to hunt his deer.'
 But Sylvio soon had me beguiled :
 This waxed tame, while he grew wild,
 And quite regardless of my smart,
 Left me his fawn, but took his heart.

Thenceforth I set myself to play
 My solitary time away
 With this ; and very well content
 Could so mine idle life have spent ;
 For it was full of sport, and light
 Of foot and heart, and did invite
 Me to its game : it seemed to bless
 Itself in me ; how could I less Than love it ? Oh, I cannot be Unkind to a beast that loveth me !

Had it lived long, I do not know
 Whether it too might have done so
 As Sylvio did ; his gifts might be Perhaps as false, or more, than he.
 But I am sure, for aught that I
 Could in so short a time espy,
 Thy love was far more better than
 The love of false and cruel man.

With sweetest milk and sugar first
 I it at mine own fingers nursed ;
 And as it grew so every day,
 It waxed more white and sweet than they.
 It had so sweet a breath ! and oft
 I blushed to see its foot more soft,
 And white, shall I say than my hand ?
 Nay, any lady's of the land !

It was a wondrous thing how fleet
 'Twas on those little silver feet.
 With what a pretty skipping grace
 It oft would challenge me the race ;
 And when't had left me far away,
 'Twould stay, and run again, and stay ;
 For it was nimbler much than hinds,
 And trod as if on the four winds.

I have a garden of my own,
 But so with roses overgrown,
 And lilies, that you would it guess
 To be a little wilderness ;
 And all the spring-time of the year
 It only loved to be there.
 Among the beds of lilies I
 Have sought it oft, where it should lie ;
 Yet could not, till itself would rise,
 Find it, although before mine eyes ;
 For in the flaxen lilies' shade,
 It like a bank of lilies laid.
 Upon the roses it would feed,
 Until its lips even seemed to bleed ;
 And then to me 'twould boldly trip,
 And print those roses on my lip.
 But all its chief delight was still
 On roses thus itself to fill ;
 And its pure virgin limbs to fold
 In whitest sheets of lilies cold.
 Had it lived long, it would have been
 Lilies without, roses within.

O help ! O help ! I see it faint
 And die as calmly as a saint !
 See how it weeps ! The tears do come
 Sad, slowly, dropping like a gum.
 So weeps the wounded balsam ; so
 The holy frankincense doth flow ;
 The brotherless Heliades
 Melt in such amber tears as these. . . .

From 'A Poem upon the Death of His Late Highness, the Lord Protector.'

He without noise still travelled to his end,
 As silent suns to meet the night descend ;
 The stars that for him fought had only power
 Left to determine now his fatal hour,
 Which, since they might not hinder, yet they cast
 To choose it worthy of his glories past.
 No part of time but bare his mark away
 Of honour—all the year was Cromwell's day !
 But this of all the most auspicious found,
 Twice had in open field him victor crowned,
 When up the armed mountains of Dunbar
 He marched, and through deep Severn, ending war :
 What day should him eternize but the same
 That had before immortalized his name ?
 That so whoe'er would at his death have joyed
 In their own griefs might find themselves employed,
 But those that sadly his departure grieved,
 Yet joyed, remembering what he once achieved.
 And the last minute his victorious ghost
 Gave chase to Ligny on the Belgic coast :
 Here ended all his mortal toils ; he laid
 And slept in peace under the laurel shade.

I saw him dead : a leaden slumber lies,
 And mortal sleep, over those wakeful eyes ;
 Those gentle rays under the lids were fled,
 Which through his looks that piercing sweetness shed ;
 That port, which so majestic was and strong,
 Loose, and deprived of vigour, stretched along ;
 All withered, all discoloured, pale and wan,
 How much another thing, no more that man !
 O human glory vain ! O death ! O wings !
 O worthless world ! O transitory things !
 Yet dwelt that greatness in his shape decayed,
 That still, though dead, greater than death, he laid,
 And in his altered face you something feign
 That threatens Death he yet will live again !

The Character of Holland.

[A satire on Holland as supporting the cause of the pretender
 Charles II., then an exile there.]

Holland, that scarce deserves the name of land,
 As but the off-scouring of the British sand,
 And so much earth as was contributed
 By English pilots when they heaved the lead ;
 Or what by the ocean's slow alluvion fell,
 Of shipwrecked cockle and the muscle-shell ;
 This indigested vomit of the sea
 Fell to the Dutch by just propriety.
 Glad then, as miners who have found the ore,
 They, with mad labour, fished the land to shore :
 And dived as desperately for each piece
 Of earth as if't had been of ambergrease ;
 Collecting anxiously small loads of clay,
 Less than what building swallows bear away ;

Or than those pills which sordid beetles roll,
 Transfusing into them their dunghill soul.
 How did they rivet, with gigantic piles,
 Thorough the centre their new-catched miles ;
 And to the stake a struggling country bound,
 Where barking waves still bait the forced ground ;
 Building their watery Babel far more high
 To reach the sea, than those to scale the sky.
 Yet still his claim the injured ocean laid,
 And oft at leap-frog o'er their steeples played ;
 As if on purpose it on land had come
 To shew them what's their mare liberum.
 A daily deluge over them does boil ;
 The earth and water play at level-coil.¹
 The fish oft-times the burgher dispossessed,
 And sat, not as a meat, but as a guest ;
 And oft the Tritons and the sea-nymphs saw
 Whole shoals of Dutch served up for cabillau ;²
 Or, as they over the new level ranged,
 For pickled herring, pickled heeren³ changed.
 Nature, it seemed, ashamed of her mistake,
 Would throw their land away at duck and drake,
 Therefore necessity, that first made kings,
 Something like government among them brings ;
 For, as with Pigmies, who best kills the crane,
 Among the hungry he that treasures grain,
 Among the blind the one-eyed blinkard reigns,
 So rules among the drowned he that drains.
 Not who first see the rising sun commands,
 But who could first discern the rising lands.
 Who best could know to pump an earth so leak,
 Him they their Lord and Country's Father speak.
 To make a bank was a great plot of state ;
 Invent a shovel, and be a magistrate.
 Hence some small dike-grave⁴ unperceived invades
 The power, and grows, as 'twere, a king of spades ;
 But, for less envy, some joined states endures,
 Who look like a commission of the sewers :
 For these Half-anders,⁵ half-wet, and half-dry
 Nor bear strict service, nor pure liberty.
 'Tis probable religion, after this,
 Came next in order ; which they could not miss.
 How could the Dutch but be converted, when
 The Apostles were so many fishermen ?
 Besides, the waters of themselves did rise,
 And, as their land, so them did re-baptise.

¹ A game otherwise called 'hitch-buttock.' ² Kabeljauw is Dutch for 'cod-fish.' ³ Heeren is Dutch for 'men,' 'gentlemen.'

A Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland.

The forward youth that would appear,
 Must now forsake his muses dear,
 Nor in the shadows sing
 His numbers languishing :
 'Tis time to leave the books in dust,
 And oil the unused armour's rust,
 Removing from the wall
 The corselet of the hall.
 So restless Cromwell could not cease
 In the inglorious arts of peace,
 But through adventurous war
 Urged his active star ;
 And, like the three-forked lightning, first
 Breaking the clouds where it was nurst,

Did thorough his own side
 His fiery way divide ;
 (For 'tis all one to courage high,
 The emulous, or enemy,
 And with such to inclose
 Is more than to oppose ;)
 Then burning through the air he went,
 And palaces and temples rent ;
 And Cæsar's head at last
 Did through his laurels blast.
 'Tis madness to resist or blame
 The force of angry heaven's flame ;
 And if we would speak true,
 Much to the man is due
 Who from his private gardens, where
 He lived reserved and austere,
 As if his highest plot
 To plant the bergamot,
 Could by industrious valour climb
 To ruin the great work of Time,
 And cast the kingdoms old,
 Into another mould.
 Though Justice against Fate complain,
 And plead the ancient rights in vain,
 (But those do hold or break,
 As men are strong or weak),
 Nature, that hateth emptiness,
 Allows of penetration less,
 And therefore must make room
 Where greater spirits come.
 What field of all the civil war,
 Where his were not the deepest scar ?
 And Hampton shows what part
 He had of wiser art ;
 Where, twining subtle fears with hope,
 He wove a net of such a scope
 That Charles himself might chase
 To Carisbrook's narrow case,
 That thence the royal actor borne,
 The tragic scaffold might adorn,
 While round the armed bands,
 Did clap their bloody hands :
 He nothing common did or mean
 Upon that memorable scene,
 But with his keener eye
 The axe's edge did try ;
 Nor called the gods with vulgar spite
 To vindicate his helpless right,
 But bowed his comely head
 Down, as upon a bed.
 This was that memorable hour,
 Which first assured the forced power ;
 So when they did design
 The capitol's first line,
 A bleeding head, where they begun,
 Did fright the architects to run ;
 And yet in that the state
 Foresaw its happy fate.
 And now the Irish are ashamed
 To see themselves in one year tamed :
 So much one man can do,
 That does both act and know.
 They can affirm his praises best,
 And have, though overcome, confessed
 How good he is, how just,
 And fit for highest trust.

Nor yet grown stiffer with command,
 But still in the republic's hand,
 (How fit he is to sway,
 That can so well obey!)

He to the Commons' feet presents
 A kingdom for his first year's rents ;
 And, what he may, forbears
 His fame, to make it theirs ;
 And has his sword and spoils ungirt,
 To lay them at the public's skirt :
 So when the falcon high
 Falls heavy from the sky,
 She, having killed, no more doth search,
 But on the next green bough to perch ;
 Where, when he first does lure,
 The falconer has her sure.

What may not then our isle presume,
 While victory his crest does plume ?
 What may not others fear,
 If thus he crowns each year ?

As Cæsar he ere long to Gaul,
 To Italy a Hannibal,
 And to all states not free,
 Shall climacteric be.

The Pict no shelter now shall find
 Within his party-coloured mind,
 But from this valour sad,
 Shrink underneath the plaid ;
 Happy if in the tufted brake,
 The English hunter him mistake,
 Nor lay his hounds in near
 The Caledonian deer.

But thou, the war's and fortune's son
 March indefatigably on,
 And for the last effect,
 Still keep the sword erect ;
 Beside the force it has to fright
 The spirits of the shady night,
 The same arts that did gain
 A power, must it maintain.

Marvell's Poems were printed in 1681 with a preface by his widow, and by Cooke in 1726. His works were edited by Thompson (1776), Grosart (1872-74), and Margoliouth (1927 et seq.). Aitken edited the Poems and Satires (1892). See Birrell's Marvell (1905), Centenary Tributes (1922), and P. Legouis' study (1928).

Algernon Sidney (1622-82), son of the Earl of Leicester, was carefully educated, accompanied his father to Denmark and France, and when his father was Lord Deputy of Ireland, commanded a troop of horse against the Irish rebels. In 1643, during the Civil War, Sidney was permitted to return to England, where he immediately joined the parliamentary forces, and, as colonel of a regiment of horse, was present at several engagements. He was likewise successively governor of Chichester, Dublin, and Dover. In 1648 he was named a member of the court for trying the king, which, however, he did not attend, though not from any disapproval of the intentions of those who composed it. The usurpation of Cromwell gave offence to Sidney, who declined to accept office either under the Protector or his son Richard ; but when the Long Parliament recovered power, he readily consented to act as one of the Council of State. At the time of the Restoration he was engaged on an embassy to Denmark and Sweden ; and, apprehensive of the vengeance of the royalists, he remained abroad for seventeen years, flitting from place to place—Venice, Rome, Brussels, Augsburg. After his return to England by the king's permission in 1677, he opposed the measures of the court, a course which Hume and others held to be ungrateful to the king. A more serious charge was first presented in Dalrymple's Memoirs of Great Britain, published in 1773. The English patriots, with Lord William Russell at their head, intrigued with Barillon, the French ambassador, to prevent war between France and England, their purpose being to preclude Charles II. from having the command of the large funds which on such an occasion must have been entrusted to him, and which he might have used against the liberties of the nation ; while Louis was not less anxious to prevent the English from joining the list of his enemies. The association was a strange one ; but it never would have been held as a moral stain upon the patriots if Sir John Dalrymple had not discovered amongst Barillon's papers one containing a list of persons receiving bribes from the French monarch, amongst whom appears the name of Sidney, together with those of several other leading Whig members of Parliament. Lord Russell was not of the number, but that Sidney stooped to receive the money is admitted by Hallam, Macaulay, and Firth (though disputed by Ewald)—doubtless for public and not personal uses. But it is evident, as Lord Macaulay argued, that national feeling in England was at a low ebb when Charles II. was willing to become the deputy of France, and a man like Algernon Sidney would have been content to see England reduced to the condition of a French province in the wild hope that a foreign despot would assist him to establish his darling republic. It should be remembered that Sidney was as openly hostile to William of Orange as to Charles. He took a conspicuous part in the proceedings by which the Whigs endeavoured to exclude the Duke of York from the throne ; and when that attempt failed, he seems to have joined in the conspiracy for an insurrection to accomplish the same object. This was exposed in consequence of the detection of an inferior plot for the assassination of the king, in which the patriots Russell, Sidney, and others were dexterously inculpated by the court. Sidney was tried for high treason before the infamous Chief-Justice Jeffreys. Although the only witness against him was an abandoned character, Lord Howard, and nothing could be produced that even ostensibly strengthened the evidence, except some manuscripts in which the lawfulness of resisting tyrants was asserted, the right of deposing kings maintained, and a preference given to a free over an arbitrary government, the jury were servile enough to obey the directions of the judge and pronounce him guilty. Sidney was beheaded on the 7th of December 1682, 'very resolutely, and like a true rebel and Republican,' the Duke of York said.

Except some of his letters and an essay 'On Love,' the only published work of Algernon Sidney is Discourses on Government, which first appeared in 1698. The Discourses were written in reply to the Patriarcha of Sir Robert Filmer (page 559); and though tedious and diffuse, are weighty and learned, and contain admirably vigorous passages.

Liberty and Government.

Such as enter into society must, in some degree, diminish their liberty. Reason leads them to this: No one man or family is able to provide that which is requisite for their convenience or security, whilst every one has an equal right to everything, and none acknowledges a superior to determine the controversies that upon such occasions must continually arise, and will probably be so many and great that mankind cannot bear them. Therefore tho' I do not believe that Bellarmin said a commonwealth could not exercise its power; for he could not be ignorant that Rome and Athens did exercise theirs, and that all the regular kingdoms in the world are commonwealths; yet there is nothing of absurdity in saying that man cannot continue in the perpetual and entire fruition of the liberty that God hath given him. The liberty of one is thwarted by that of another; and whilst they are all equal, none will yield to any, otherwise than by a general consent. This is the ground of all just governments; for violence or fraud can create no right; and the same consent gives the form to them all, how much soever they differ from each other. Some small numbers of men, living within the precincts of one city, have as it were cast into a common stock the right which they had of governing themselves and children, and by common consent joining in one body, exercised such power over every single person as seemed beneficial to the whole; and this men call perfect democracy. Others chose rather to be governed by a select number of such as most excelled in wisdom and virtue; and this, according to the signification of the word, was called aristocracy; or when one man excelled all others, the government was put into his hands, under the name of monarchy. But the wisest, best, and far the greatest part of mankind, rejecting these simple species, did form governments mixed or composed of the three, as shall be proved hereafter, which commonly received their respective denomination from the part that prevailed, and did deserve praise or blame as they were well or ill proportioned.

It were a folly hereupon to say that the liberty for which we contend is of no use to us, since we cannot endure the solitude, barbarity, weakness, want, misery, and dangers that accompany it whilst we live alone, nor can enter into a society without resigning it; for the choice of that society, and the liberty of framing it according to our own wills, for our own good, is all we seek. This remains to us whilst we form governments, that we ourselves are judges how far 'tis good for us to recede from our natural liberty; which is of so great importance, that from thence only we can know whether we are freemen or slaves; and the difference between the best government and the worst doth wholly depend on a right or wrong exercise of that power. If men are naturally free, such as have wisdom and understanding will always frame good governments; but if they are born under the necessity of a perpetual slavery, no wisdom can be of use to them; but all must for ever depend on the will of their lords, how cruel, mad, proud, or wicked soever they be. . . .

The Grecians, amongst others who followed the light of reason, knew no other original title to the government of a nation than that wisdom, valour, and justice which was beneficial to the people. These qualities gave beginning to those governments which we call Heroum Regna [the Governments of the Heroes]; and the veneration paid to such as enjoyed them proceeded from a grateful sense of the good received from them; they were thought to be descended from the gods, who in virtue and beneficence surpassed other men: the same attended their descendants, till they came to abuse their power, and by their vices shewed themselves like to or worse than others. Those nations did not seek the most ancient but the most worthy, and thought such only worthy to be preferred before others who could best perform their duty.

Upon the same grounds we may conclude that no privilege is peculiarly annexed to any form of government, but that all magistrates are equally the ministers of God, who perform the work for which they are instituted; and that the people which institutes them may proportion, regulate, and terminate their power as to time, measure, and number of persons, as seems most convenient to themselves, which can be no other than their own good. For it cannot be imagined that a multitude of people should send for Numa, or any other person to whom they owed nothing, to reign over them, that he might live in glory and pleasure; or for any other reason than that it might be good for them and their posterity. This shews the work of all magistrates to be always and everywhere the same, even the doing of justice and procuring the welfare of those that create them. This we learn from common sense: Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and the best human authors lay it as an immovable foundation, upon which they build their arguments relating to matters of that nature.

See the Lives of Sidney by Meadley (1813), R. Chase Sidney (1835), Santvoord (New York, 1881), Ewald (1873), and G. M. Blackburne (1885); and Firth in the Dictionary of National Biography (1897).

George Fox, founder of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, was one of the foremost religious revolutionaries of the age. He was the son of a weaver at Fenny Drayton, in Leicestershire, and was born in 1624. Having been apprenticed to a shoemaker who traded in wool and cattle, he spent much of his youth in tending sheep, an employment which afforded ample room for solitary meditation. When about nineteen years of age, he was one day vexed by a disposition to intemperance which he observed in two professedly religious friends whom he met at a fair. 'I went away,' says he in his Journal, 'and, when I had done my business, returned home; but I did not go to bed that night, nor could I sleep; but sometimes walked up and down, and sometimes prayed, and cried to the Lord, who said unto me : "Thou seest how young people go together into vanity, and old people into the earth ; thou must forsake all, young and old, keep out of all, and be a stranger to all." This divine communication was scrupulously obeyed ; the advices of his friends to marry, to take tobacco, and the like had naturally no weight with him. From 1646 he ceased attendance at church ; and leaving his relations and master, he wandered about the country Bible in hand, a small competency he had supplying his slender wants. Now and for the rest of his life, Fox had many dreams and visions, and received supernatural messages from heaven. Thus, as he records in his Journal, 'One morning, as I was sitting by the fire, a great cloud came over me, and a temptation beset me, and I sate still. And it was said, All things come by nature ; and the Elements and Stars came over me, so that I was in a moment quite clouded with it ; but, inasmuch as I sate still and said nothing, the people of the house perceived nothing. And as I sate still under it and let it alone, a living hope rose in me, and a true voice arose in me which cried : There is a living God who made all things. And immediately the cloud and temptation vanished away, and the life rose over it all, and my heart was glad, and I praised the living God.' Afterwards, he tells us, 'the Lord's power broke forth, and I had great openings and prophecies, and spoke unto the people of the things of God, which they heard with attention and silence, and went away and spread the fame thereof.' He began about the year 1647 to teach publicly in the vicinity of Dukinfield and Manchester, whence he travelled through several neighbouring counties. He had now come to hold that a learned education is unnecessary to a minister ; that the existence of a separate clerical profession is unwarranted by the Bible ; that the Creator of the world is not a dweller in temples made with hands ; and that the Scriptures are not the rule either of conduct or judgment, but that man should follow 'the light of Christ within.' From about 1647 he became an itinerant preacher. He often went into churches while service was going on, and interrupted the clergymen by loudly contradicting their statements of doctrine ; and by these breaches of order, and the employment of such unceremonious fashions of address as, 'Come down, thou deceiver !' he naturally gave great offence, which led sometimes to his imprisonment, and sometimes to severe treatment from the hands of the populace. He was especially hostile to services held in 'steeple-houses' and conducted by formalist 'professors' (not so much the Laudians as the Puritans, with their long abstruse sermons and extravagant doctrines of verbal inspiration). The 'inner light' was the central idea of his teaching. He inveighed against sacerdotalism and formalism, and was equally vehement against most social conventions. Priests, lawyers, and soldiers were all obnoxious to him. The Lord forbade him to put off his hat to any, high or low, and he was required to thee and thou rich and poor equally. He denounced all public amusements, and came into collision with all sorts of people ; his life is indeed little else than a record of insults, persecutions, and imprisonments. At Derby he was imprisoned in the house of correction and then in the common jail for a year, and afterwards in a still more unpleasant cell at Carlisle for half that period.

His first convert seems to have been made in 1647, and soon there were thousands of the 'Friends of Truth,' the full designation of the new communion : in 1650 the popular name of 'Quakers' was given to the 'Friends' by Judge Bennet. Fox continued to preach, dispute, to wander about, and hold conferences. In 1654 he was sent by Colonel Hacker to Cromwell ; and of this memorable interview he gives an account in his Journal, quoted below. Carlyle's story of Fox's being equipped in a leathern suit sewed by his own hands seems to be doubtful, though Sewel (1722) distinctly alleges a complete dress of leather. Fox himself speaks only of 'leathern breeches,' a nowise outrageous garment, though no doubt his eccentricities in costume and bearing were sufficiently exasperating to his unfriends.

Amidst much opposition, Fox still continued to travel through every corner of the kingdom, expounding his views and answering objections, both verbally and in controversial pamphlets. In the course of his peregrinations he suffered frequent imprisonment, sometimes as a disturber of the peace, and sometimes because he refused to uncover his head in the presence of magistrates. He was at least eight times imprisoned, the longest spell of jail being two years and seven and a half months. In 1656, the year after he and his followers refused to take the oath of abjuration, they had increased to such an extent that there were nearly one thousand of them in jail. He visited Wales and Scotland, and (after marrying a worthy widow) went to Barbadoes, Jamaica, America (where he spent nearly two years), Holland, and Germany. In these later wanderings he was accompanied by Penn, Barclay, Keith, and other Quaker leaders. He died in London, 13th January 1691. Fox's own extravagances, especially in his earlier career, and the often grotesque proceedings of some of the recruits from the Ranters, Shakers, and other eccentric sects of the time (see on Nayler at page 623), partly explain the abhorrence with which the Quakers were regarded alike by Churchmen and Nonconformists. This gradually yielded to the essentially shrewd and sober pietism of Fox ; but his view of the 'inner light' as more than co-ordinate in authority with the Bible, the Quaker rejection of the sacraments, and suspicion as to their unsoundness on the Trinity (see at Penn, Vol. II. p. 39) maintained the dislike of the orthodox. Baxter and Bunyan were as uncompromisingly hostile as the professional controversialists. Fox had not merely a heart full of love for his fellows, but a mind capable of instituting systems of registration, poor relief, education, and self-help, which have made the community he founded a social power. His preaching and writings were often mystical, and not seldom turgid and incoherent; in the Journal his style is usually plain and simple, but eloquent and moving.

Fox's work on the use of 'thou' and 'you' has perhaps a peculiar interest for a Cyclopædia of English Literature, inasmuch as by it he sought seriously to modify established usage, and did prevail with his followers for more than two centuries. The arguments from the usage of Amalekites, Hivites, Moabites, Shuhites, &c. are taken straight from the Scripture texts in which personages of these tribes or races are quoted; and the forms of the second personal pronouns, singular and plural, in Hebrew, Arabic, Greek, Latin, French, Manx, &c., are given with tedious superfluity. Fox and his colleagues in this work, John Stubbs and Benjamin Ferrey, fully recognise the rights of the accusative, and do not propose to supersede 'thou' by an ungrammatical use of 'thee.' The following is the first quarter or so of the title of the quaint book, A Battle-Door for Teachers and Professors to learn Singular and Plural, You to many and Thou to one: Singular one, Thou; Plural many, You. Wherein is shewed forth by Grammar or Scripture examples how several Nations and Peoples have made a distinction between Singular and Plural, and so on. The book bears date 1660. In the title it is affirmed, and in the book argued, and in a postscript signed by Fox specially emphasised, that the use of 'you' in speaking to one person, which he so strongly reprobates, was 'set up by the Pope in his pride.'

In Church at Ulverstone.

After this [1652] on a lecture-day, I was moved to go to the steeple-house at Ulverstone, where were abundance of professors, priests, and people . . . and after the Lord had opened my mouth to speak John Sawrey the justice came to me and said if I would speak according to the scriptures I should speak. . . . Then he said I should not speak, contradicting himself who had said just before I should speak if I would speak according to the scriptures, which I did. Now the people were quiet and heard me gladly, until the Justice Sawrey (who was the first stirrer up of cruel persecution in the north) incensed them against me and set them to hale, beat, and bruise me. Then on a sudden the people were in a rage, and fell upon me in the steeple-house before his face, knocked me down, and kicked me, and trampled upon me, he looking on; and so great was the uproar, that some tumbled over their seats for fear. At last he came and took me from the people, led me out of the steeple-house, and put me into the hands of the constables and other officers, bidding them whip me, and put me out of the town. Then they led me about a quarter of a mile, some taking hold of my collar, and some of my arms and shoulders, and shook and dragged me along. And there being many friendly people come to the market, and some of them come to the steeplehouse to hear me, divers of these they knocked down also, and broke their heads, so that the blood ran down from several of them; and Judge Fell's son running after to see what they would do with me, they threw him into a ditch of water, some of them crying: 'Knock the teeth out of his head.' When they had haled me to the common-moss side, a multitude following, the constables and other officers gave me some blows over my back with willow-rods, and so thrust me among the rude multitude, who (having furnished themselves with staves, some with hedge-stakes, and others with holm or holly bushes) fell upon me, and beat me upon my head, arms, and shoulders, till they had amazed me; so that I fell down upon the wet common. And when I recovered myself again, and saw myself lying in a watery common, and the people standing about me, I lay still a little while; and the power of the Lord sprang through me, and the Eternal Refreshings refreshed me, so that I stood up again in the strengthening power of the Eternal God. And stretching out my arms amongst them, I said with a loud voice: 'Strike again! here are my arms, my head, and my cheeks!' . . . Then they began to fall out among themselves.

Interview with Oliver Cromwell.

After Captain Drury had lodged me at the Mermaid [over against the Mews at Charing Cross], he went to give the Protector an account of me. And when he came to me again, he told me the Protector did require that I should promise not to take up a carnal sword or weapon against him or the government, as it then was; and that I should write it in what words I saw good, and set my hand to it. I said little in reply to Captain Drury; but the next morning I was moved of the Lord to write a paper to the Protector, by the name of Oliver Cromwell, wherein I did in the presence of the Lord God declare that I did deny the wearing or drawing of a carnal sword, or any other outward weapon, against him or any man; and that I was sent of God to stand a witness against all violence, and against the works of darkness; and to turn people from darkness to the light, and to bring them from the occasion of war and fighting to the peaceable Gospel, and from being evil-doers, which the magistrates' sword should be a terror to. When I had written what the Lord had given me to write, I set my name to it, and gave it to Captain Drury to give to Oliver Cromwell, which he did. After some time, Captain Drury brought me before the Protector himself at Whitehall; it was in a morning, before he was dressed; and one Harvey, who had come a little among Friends [i.e. the Friends], but was disobedient, waited upon him. When I came in, I was moved to say: 'Peace be in this house;' and I bid him keep in the fear of God, that he might receive wisdom from him, that by it he might be ordered, and with it might order all things under his hand unto God's glory. I spoke much to him of truth, and a great deal of discourse I had with him about religion; wherein he carried himself very moderately. But he said we quarrelled with priests, whom he called ministers. I told him, I did not quarrel with them, but they quarrelled with me and my friends. But, said I, if we own the prophets, Christ, and the apostles, we cannot hold up such teachers, prophets, and shepherds as the prophets, Christ, and the apostles declared against; but we must declare against them by the same power and spirit. Then I shewed him that the prophets, Christ, and the apostles declared freely, and declared against them that did not declare freely; such as preached for filthy lucre, and divined for money, and preached for hire, and were covetous and greedy, like the dumb dogs that could never have enough; and that they that have the same spirit that Christ, and the prophets, and the apostles had, could not but declare against all such now, as they did then. As I spoke, he would several times say it was very good, and it was truth. I told him, that all Christendom (so called) had the scriptures, but they wanted the power and spirit that those had who gave forth the scriptures, and that was the reason they were not in fellowship with the Son, nor with the Father, nor with the scriptures, nor one with another. Many more words I had with him, but people coming in, I drew a little back; and as I was turning, he caught me by the hand, and with tears in his eyes said: 'Come again to my house, for if thou and I were but an hour of a day together, we should be nearer one to the other;' adding, that he wished me no more ill than he did to his own soul. I told him if he did he wronged his own soul, and I bid him hearken to God's voice, that he might stand in his counsel, and obey it; and if he did so, that would keep him from hardness of heart; but if he did not hear God's voice, his heart would be hardened. And he said it was true. Then I went out; and when Captain Drury came out after me, he told me his lord Protector said I was at liberty, and might go whither I would. Then I was brought into a great hall, where the Protector's gentlemen were to dine. And I asked them what they brought me hither for. They said it was by the Protector's order, that I might dine with them. I bid them let the Protector know I would not eat a bit of his bread, nor drink a sup of his drink. When he heard this he said: 'Now I see there is a people risen and come up that I cannot win, either with gifts, honours, offices, or places; but all other sects and people I can.' It was told him again, that we had forsook our own, and were not like to look for such things from him.

In 1656, in Hyde Park, Fox 'espyed the Protector coming in his coach. Whereupon I rode up to his coach-side; and some of his life-guard would have put me away, but he forbade them. So I rode down by his coach-side with him, declaring what the Lord gave me to say unto him of the condition and of the suffering of friends in the nation; shewing him how contrary this was to Christ's word and his apostles, and to Christianity. When we were come to James's Park gate, I left him, and at parting he desired me to come to his house.' He had a brief meeting with Cromwell very shortly before the Protector's death, described in a passage on which Carlyle founded a famous apostrophe:

The same day, taking boat, I went down [really up] to Kingston, and from thence to Hampton Court, to speak with the Protector about the sufferings of friends. I met him riding into Hampton Court Park, and before I came at him, as he rode at the head of his life-guard, I saw and felt a waft (whiff, omen) of death go forth against him. . . . And when I came to him he looked like a dead man. After I had laid the sufferings of friends before him, and had warned him according as I was moved to speak to him, he bid me come to his house. So I returned to Kingston, and the next day went up to Hampton Court to have spoken further with him. But when I came, he was sick, and Harvey, who was one that waited on him, told me the doctors were not willing that I should come in to speak with him. So I passed away, and never saw him any more.

The chief writings of George Fox, less cited as authorities on doctrine than Penn's and Barclay's (see Vol. II. pp. 38, 41) fill three folio volumes (1694, 1698, 1706) containing (1) his Journal, (2) Epistles, and (3) Gospel Truth, a collection of Doctrinal Books. A fourth folio (1659) contains The Great Mystery. Penney edited the Journal direct from the MSS. (1911, 1924); and Short Journals and Itinerary Journals, first published in 1925 by the Friends' Historical Association. The list of Fox's works, largely pamphlets, occupies fifty-three pages of Joseph Smith's Catalogue of Friends' Books (1868). See the Life by Hodgkin (1896); R. Knight's Founder of Quakerism (1922); and New Appreciations (1925).

John Bunyan,

author of the Pilgrim's Progress, was born at Elstow, near Bedford, in 1628. By universal assent the 'inspired tinker' is ranked with our English classics and great masters of allegory; his masterpiece was one of the few books Dr Johnson wished had been longer; and yet, so late as 1782, Cowper dared not name him in his poetry lest the name should provoke a sneer. According to the transcript registers from the parish of Elstow, Bunyan's father, who described himself as a 'braseyer,' married Margaret Bentley on the 23rd of May 1627, and on the 30th of November 1628 their illustrious son was baptised at Elstow church. In his seventeenth year John Bunyan, who was bred to his father's trade, was—doubtless under a levy made by Parliament upon the villages of Bedfordshire—drafted into the army, and took part in the civil war between Roundhead and Royalist, probably serving in the garrison at Newport-Pagnell under the commander assumed to be the original of Butler's Hudibras, Sir Samuel Luke (see page 735). Froude was of opinion that he enlisted in the Royalist ranks. On the disbanding of the army Bunyan returned to Elstow, and about 1649 married a wife who brought him no dower of worldly wealth, for, as he put it, 'this woman and I came together as poor as poor might be, not having so much household stuff as a dish or spoon betwixt us both.' She brought with her, however, two books which had belonged to her father, the Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven and the Practice of Piety, in which they read together, and by which Bunyan was observably influenced. His Life and Death of Mr Badman, published in 1680, shows not a little resemblance to the first of these books. Now it was—in the years when he took a lively delight in ringing the bells of Elstow church—that he passed through the deep religious experiences so vividly described in Grace Abounding. There is no reason to believe that at any time Bunyan led a vicious or depraved life, or was what Southey said he was—a blackguard. Rather he seems always to have been well disposed and tender in conscience, though careless and addicted, like his neighbours, to the customary English habit of swearing rather freely. A sincere religious enthusiast applies a severe standard to his own past life.

Dr Brown of Bedford strongly disapproves Sir Walter Scott's suggestion that, as tinkers were often Gypsies, 'the poet-apostle of the English middle classes,' as Froude has called him, may have been of Gypsy race; there were Bonyons or Buignons in Bedfordshire in the twelfth century, and the name is found in thirty different spellings. On the other hand, it has been shown that there was at least one 'Egyptian rogue' of the name of Bownian in Cornwall in 1586; but the theory of Gypsy origin is at most a speculation.

The young Bedford brazier was introduced by some Puritan friends to their minister, John Gifford, a converted royalist major who had organised a little community sometimes incorrectly described as a Baptist church, it being a church in which baptism and some other questions much debated in those days were left to the individual conscience, and not made an essential part of church life. Bunyan joined this Christian fellowship in 1653, and about 1655 he was asked by the brethren to address them in their church gatherings. This led to his beginning to preach in the villages round Bedford, and in 1656 he was brought into discussions with the followers of George Fox; this again moved him to authorship, his first book, Some Gospel Truths Opened, being published against the Quakers in 1656. That earliest effort of his pen, though rapidly but vigorously written, is altogether remarkable as the composition of a working-man whose schooldays had become a far-off memory. To it Edward Burrough, an eminent Quaker, replied, and Bunyan made rejoinder in A Vindication of Gospel Truths Opened. Two other works were published by him ere, in November 1660, he was arrested while preaching in a farmhouse at Samsell, a small hamlet a little to the south of Ampthill, in Bedfordshire. The imprisonment which followed upon this arrest lasted for twelve long years, during which Bunyan wrote Profitable Meditations, Praying in the Spirit, Christian Behaviour, The Holy City, The Resurrection of the Dead, Grace Abounding, and some smaller works. The place of incarceration was the county jail, which stood at the corner of the High Street and Silver Street, in the centre of the town of Bedford. The prisoner for conscience' sake was released after the Declaration of Indulgence of 1672, under which he became a licensed preacher, having been chosen by the church to which he belonged as their pastor. He had held this office for three years when in February 1675 the Declaration of Indulgence was cancelled and the licenses of the Nonconformist preachers recalled by proclamation. The following month a warrant was issued for his arrest, signed by no fewer than thirteen magistrates, and sealed by ten of them—a document which came to light in 1887 when the Chauncy MSS. came to the hammer at Sotheby's.

Brought to trial at the midsummer sessions under the Conventicle Act, Bunyan was sent to prison for six months in the town jail on Bedford Bridge. It was during this later and briefer imprisonment that he wrote the first part of his memorable Pilgrim's Progress—entered in the register of the Stationers' Company on 22nd December 1677, and licensed 18th February 1678. When first issued it was shorter than in its final form—it then contained no Mr Worldly Wiseman and no second meeting with Evangelist. The discourse with Charity at the Palace Beautiful, the further accounts of Mr By-ends' rich relations, the story of Diffidence, the wife of Giant Despair, with other not unimportant passages, were added in the second and third editions (1678 and 1679). This was followed by the Life and Death of Mr Badman in 1680, containing, as Froude has said, a vivid picture of rough English life in the days of Charles II.; by the Holy War, his most notable work after the Pilgrim's Progress, in 1682; and by the second part of the Pilgrim, containing the story of Christiana and her children, in 1684. Bunyan had been pastor of the Bedford church for sixteen years, when, after a ride through the rain on horseback from Reading to London, he was seized with a fatal illness at the house of his friend, John Strudwick, a grocer at the sign of the Star on Snow Hill, Holborn, and here he died on the 31st of August 1688, and was buried in Bunhill Fields, the Nonconformist Campo Santo.

During the sixty years of his life Bunyan wrote something like sixty books, but he will be best remembered by three of these—the Grace Abounding, the Holy War, and the Pilgrim's Progress, and best of all by the last of the three. Grace Abounding Macaulay describes as one of the most remarkable pieces of autobiography in the world; the Holy War is an allegory of the struggle between God and the devil for man's soul—an allegory vastly less fully realised and visualised than the opus magnum. The Pilgrim's Progress sprang at once into fame, 100,000 copies being sold during the subsequent ten years of its author's life. It was also printed at Boston, in New England, in 1681; a Dutch translation was issued at Amsterdam in 1682, and both this and a handsomer edition of 1685 were illustrated by Dutch engravers, then the leaders of the art of engraving in Europe. The book was also translated into Welsh, Walloon, French, German, Polish, and Swedish between 1688 and 1743. Since then it has been translated into about a hundred languages and dialects, the versions in Japanese and the Canton vernacular being admirably illustrated by native artists, who have adapted scenery and costumes to Chinese conditions.

When in 1830 Southey's edition of the Pilgrim's Progress appeared, with a Life of Bunyan, Macaulay—not a very likely person to appreciate the religious power of the book, its value as a manual of devotional thought, its vivid realisation of the sense of sin and of absolute need for supernatural redemption—by his famous and enthusiastic essay in the Edinburgh Review revived the interest of the educated in the Pilgrim as an unparalleled monument of creative literature, remarkable amongst all the allegories of the world in that it had a strong human interest. 'In the wildest parts of Scotland the Pilgrim's Progress is the delight of the peasantry. In every nursery the Pilgrim's Progress is a greater favourite than Jack the Giant-killer. Every reader knows the straight and narrow path as well as he knows a road in which he has gone backward and forward a hundred times. This is the highest miracle of genius, that things which are not should be as though they were, that the imaginations of one mind should become the personal recollections of another. And this miracle the tinker has wrought.

. . . The style of Bunyan is delightful to every reader, and invaluable as a study to every person who wishes to obtain a wide command over the English language. The vocabulary is the vocabulary of the common people. There is not an expression, if we except a few technical terms of theology, which would puzzle the rudest peasant. We have observed several pages which do not contain a single word of more than two syllables. Yet no writer has said more exactly what he meant to say. For magnificence, for pathos, for vehement exhortation, for subtle disquisition, for every purpose of the poet, the orator, and the divine, this homely dialect, the dialect of plain working-men, was perfectly sufficient. There is no book in our literature on which we would so readily stake the fame of the old unpolluted English language, no book which shows so well how rich that language is in its own proper wealth, and how little it has been improved by all that it has borrowed.'

Macaulay freely admitted that 'the Pilgrim's Progress undoubtedly is not a perfect allegory. The types are often inconsistent with each other; and sometimes the allegorical disguise is altogether thrown off. The river, for example, is emblematic of death; and we are told that every human being must pass through the river. But Faithful does not pass through it. He is martyred, not in shadow, but in reality, at Vanity Fair. Hopeful talks to Christian about Esau's birthright and about his own convictions of sin as Bunyan might have talked with one of his own congregation.' By more recent and less sympathetic critics it has even been complained that the allegory of the Pilgrim's Progress does not hang together, and that the details are often incongruous or even absurd. The author constantly forgets that Pilgrim carried such an incredible burden on his back, which indeed his friends were supposed not to see; and he seems to approve of a good man deserting wife and children on occasion. It is contended that though Bunyan had fervour, vigour, spiritual insight, narrative power, a gift of homely humour and satire, and extraordinary facility in handling familiar and commonplace conceptions, he yet lacked a profound imagination and the supremest gift of poetic vision. His idea of the Heavenly City, it is said, is less lofty than even the conventional one, and many of his thoughts border on vulgarity. Against such unfair depreciation Macaulay's answer still holds good: nobody, whatever his genius, could sustain a long allegory without inconsistencies; no writer, ancient or modern, has achieved this feat. The best thing an allegorist can do is to present 'a succession of analogies, each of which may separately be striking and happy, without looking very nicely to see whether they harmonise with each other.' No simile even need be expected to run on all fours. And if we go beyond Macaulay, make allowance for the dream-plot, and remember that no dream is a harmonious whole from beginning to end, we shall see that occasional lapses or incongruities hardly injure the effect of a continued reverie with dream-like episodes, and might even be said to make it liker its model. Another answer to hypercriticism is to be found in the immediate success and the permanent vitality of the book, and its power of appealing to all kinds of Christians and unchristians in so many nations and languages. The very homeliness of conception, the familiarity of the imagery, the accepted symbolisms, the shrewd, practical common-sense, and the combination of homely vernacular and Bible English all contribute to heighten the realism of the whole.

It is the irony of history that the next very eminent English writer to attach a very high value to Bunyan and Bunyan's work should also completely reject the theological system that underlies all Bunyan's writings. J. A. Froude was a much deeper critic than Macaulay; he gave full weight in human life and in literature to the ever-pressing problems of religion and ethics, but must have seemed to Bunyan almost as much an alien to the household of faith as Macaulay was. Yet, protesting throughout his book on Bunyan against the shallow judgment of those who called him 'a Philistine of genius,' Froude thus comments: 'And yet Bunyan, intensely religious as he was, and narrow as his theology was, is always human. His genius remains fresh and vigorous under the least promising conditions. All mankind being under sin together, he has no favourites to flatter, no opponents to misrepresent. There is a kindness in his descriptions, even of the Evil One's attacks upon himself.

'The Pilgrim's Progress, though professedly an allegoric story of the Protestant plan of salvation, is conceived in the large, wide spirit of humanity itself. Anglo-Catholic and Lutheran, Calvinist and Deist, can alike read it with delight, and find their own theories in it. Even the Romanist has only to blot out a few paragraphs, and can discover no purer model of a Christian life to place in the hands of his children. The religion of the Pilgrim's Progress is the religion which must be always and everywhere, as long as man believes that he has a soul and is responsible for his actions; and thus it is that, while theological folios once devoured as manna from Heaven now lie on the bookshelves dead as Egyptian mummies, this book is wrought into the mind and memory of every well-conditioned English or American child; while the matured man, furnished with all the knowledge which literature can teach him, still finds the adventures of Christian as charming as the adventures of Ulysses or Æneas.'

Froude also protests against 'the common fashion' of calling Bunyan's verse doggerel, and disputes the universal judgment mainly on the (debatable) ground that 'no verse is doggerel which has a sincere and rational meaning in it.' But few will agree with him that 'Bunyan's lines are often as successful as the best lines of Quarles or George Herbert.' Perhaps the best-known is the first verse of the shepherd-boy's song in the second part of the Pilgrim:

He that is down needs fear no fall,
He that is low no pride;
He that is humble ever shall
Have God to be his guide.

Bunyan sometimes saw the events of everyday life through a poetical magnifier. The very simple enterprise of killing an adder is described in the extract from Grace Abounding as if it had been a death-struggle with a dragon. The adder's bite, though painful, is not dangerous to any healthy man; and the sting—since adders administer their poison from a hollow tooth—was the harmless forked tongue.

Allegorical pilgrimages from this to a better world were no novelty in European literature. In 1858 an interesting parallel was shown to exist between the Pilgrim's Progress and Le Pèlerinage de l'Homme of De Guilleville or Guilleville, a Parisian poet who died about 1360. The pilgrimage here too was from the world and its vices and sorrows, through difficulties and dangers, to the celestial city of Jerusalem; the work was Englished as The Pilgrimage of the Life of Man, or Pilgrimage de Mounde, by Lydgate, in 1426 (printed by Furnivall for the E.E.T.S., Part I., 1899). Another translation was printed by Caxton. Geiler von Kaisersberg wrote also a Christliche Pilgerschaft zum ewigen Vaterland in 1512; and as Bunyan seems to have learnt something from the Anabaptists, this German 'pilgrimage to the everlasting Fatherland' might possibly have indirectly influenced him. Many resemblances between Bunyan and earlier dreamers of dreams with a purpose—including Hampole, Wyclif, Spenser, 'Piers Plowman,' and Walter Map—are discussed in N. Hill's Guillaume de Guilleville compared with Bunyan (1858) and in Wharey's Sources of Bunyan's Allegories (1904).

Hundreds of notable English writers from his own day till ours have owned their deep debt to Bunyan, and shown in their style traces of his influence. And not merely English writers: Bunyan's stamp has been found on some of Schiller's poems, and Wieland, of all people in the world, received an impulse from the English dreamer of dreams. Frank T. Bullen professed that his style was wholly based on the Bible and Bunyan. W. E. Henley said of the chameleon-like R. L. Stevenson (who surely in this respect more than any man served many masters): 'Bunyan was born a master. Stevenson was born—a student of Bunyan. There is the difference.'

From 'Grace Abounding.'

In this my relation of the merciful working of God upon my soul, it will not be amiss if in the first place I do in a few words give you a hint of my pedigree and manner of bringing up, that thereby the goodness and bounty of God towards me may be the more advanced and magnified before the sons of men.

For my descent then, it was, as is well known by many, of a low and inconsiderable generation, my father's house being of that rank that is meanest and most despised of all the families of the land. Wherefore I have not here, as others, to boast of noble blood and of any high-born state according to the flesh, though, all things considered, I magnify the heavenly majesty, for that by this door he brought me into the world, to partake of the grace and life that is in Christ by the gospel. But notwithstanding the meanness and inconsiderableness of my parents, it pleased God to put it into their hearts to put me to school, to learn me both to read and write; the which I also attained, according to the rate of other poor men's children, though to my shame I confess I did soon lose that I had learned, even almost utterly, and that long before the Lord did work his gracious work of conversion upon my soul. As for my own natural life, for the time that I was without God in the world, it was indeed according to the course of this world, and the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience, Eph. ii. 2, 3. It was my delight to be taken captive by the devil at his will, 2 Tim. ii. 26, being filled with all unrighteousness; the which did also so strongly work both in my heart and life, that I had but few equals, both for cursing, swearing, lying, and blaspheming the holy name of God. Yea, so settled and rooted was I in these things, that they became as a second nature to me; the which, as I have also with soberness considered since, did so offend the Lord that even in my childhood he did scare and terrify me with fearful dreams and visions. For often after I had spent this and the other day in sin, I have been greatly afflicted while asleep with the apprehensions of devils and wicked spirits, who, as I then thought, laboured to draw me away with them, of which I could never be rid. Also I should at these years be greatly troubled with the thoughts of the fearful torments of hell-fire, still fearing that it would be my lot to be found at last among those devils and hellish fiends who are there bound down with the chains and bonds of darkness unto the judgment of the great day.

These things, I say, when I was but a child but nine or ten years old, did so distress my soul, that then, in the midst of my many sports and childish vanities, amidst my vain companions, I was often much cast down and afflicted in my mind therewith, yet could I not let go my sins. Yea, I was also then so overcome with despair of life and heaven, that I should often wish either that there had been no hell, or that I had been a devil, supposing they were only tormentors, that if it must needs be that I went thither, I might be rather a tormentor than be tormented myself.

A while after, these terrible dreams did leave me, which also I soon forgot; for my pleasures did quickly cut off the remembrance of them, as if they had never been; wherefore with more greediness, according to the strength of nature, I did still let loose the reins of my lusts, and delighted in all transgressions against the law of God; so that until I came to the state of marriage, I was the very ringleader in all manner of vice and ungodliness. Yea, such prevalency had the lusts of the flesh on my poor soul, that had not a miracle of precious grace prevented, I had not only perished by the stroke of eternal justice, but also laid myself open to the stroke of those laws which bring some to disgrace and shame before the face of the world.

In these days the thoughts of religion were very grievous to me; I could neither endure it myself, nor that any other should; so that when I have seen some read in those books that concerned Christian piety, it would be as it were a prison to me. Then I said unto God: 'Depart from me, for I desire not the knowledge of thy ways,' Job, xxi. 14, 15. I was now void of all good consideration; heaven and hell were both out of sight and mind; and as for saving and damning, they were least in my thoughts. 'O Lord, thou knowest my life, and my ways are not hid from thee.'

But this I well remember, that though I could myself sin with the greatest delight and ease, yet even then, if I had at any time seen wicked things by those who professed goodness, it would make my spirit tremble. As once, above all the rest, when I was in the height of vanity, yet hearing one to swear that was reckoned for a religious man, it had so great a stroke upon my spirit, that it made my heart ache. But God did not utterly leave me, but followed me still, not with convictions, but judgments mixed with mercy. For once I fell into a creek of the sea, and hardly escaped drowning. Another time I fell out of a boat into Bedford river, but mercy yet preserved me; besides, another time being in the field with my companions, it chanced that an adder passed over the highway, so I, having a stick, struck her over the back, and having stunned her, I forced open her mouth with my stick, and plucked her sting out with my fingers; by which act, had not God been merciful to me, I might by my desperateness have brought myself to my end. This also I have taken notice of with thanksgiving: when I was a soldier, I with others were drawn out to go to such a place to besiege it; but when I was just ready to go, one of the company desired to go in my room; to which when I had consented, he took my place, and coming to the siege, as he stood sentinel, he was shot in the head with a musket-bullet and died. Here, as I said, were judgments and mercy, but neither of them did awaken my soul to righteousness; wherefore I sinned still, and grew more and more rebellious against God, and careless of my own salvation.

Presently after this I changed my condition into a married state, and my mercy was to light upon a wife whose father and mother were counted godly; this woman and I, though we came together as poor as poor might be, not having so much household stuff as a dish or spoon betwixt us both, yet this she had for her part, The Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven, and The Practice of Piety, which her father had left when he died. In these two books I sometimes read, wherein I found some things that were somewhat pleasant to me; but all this while I met with no conviction. She also often would tell me what a godly man her father was, and how he would reprove and correct vice, both in his house and among his neighbours, and what a strict and holy life he lived in his days, both in word and deed. Wherefore these books, though they did not reach my heart to awaken it about my sad and sinful state, yet they did beget within me some desires to reform my vicious life, and fall in very eagerly with the religion of the times; to wit, to go to church twice a day, and there very devoutly both say and sing as others did, yet retaining my wicked life; but withal was so overrun with the spirit of superstition, that I adored, and that with great devotion, even all things (both the high-place, priest, clerk, vestment, service, and what else) belonging to the church; counting all things holy that were therein contained, and especially the priest and clerk most happy, and without doubt greatly blessed, because they were the servants, as I then thought, of God, and were principal in the holy temple, to do his work therein. This conceit grew so strong upon my spirit, that had I but seen a priest, though never so sordid and debauched in his life, I should find my spirit fall under him, reverence him, and knit unto him; yea, I thought for the love I did bear unto them (supposing they were the ministers of God) I could have lain down at their feet, and have been trampled upon by them—their name, their garb, and work did so intoxicate and bewitch me. . . .

But all this while I was not sensible of the danger and evil of sin; I was kept from considering that sin would damn me, what religion soever I followed, unless I was found in Christ. Nay, I never thought whether there was such a one or no. Thus man while blind doth wander, for he knoweth not the way to the city of God, Eccles. x. 15.

But one day, amongst all the sermons our parson made, his subject was to treat of the Sabbath-day, and of the evil of breaking that, either with labour, sports, or otherwise; wherefore I fell in my conscience under his sermon, thinking and believing that he made that sermon on purpose to shew me my evil doing. And at that time I felt what guilt was, though never before that I can remember; but then I was for the present greatly loaded therewith, and so went home, when the sermon was ended, with a great burden upon my spirit. This, for that instant, did embitter my former pleasures to me; but hold, it lasted not, for before I had well dined, the trouble began to go off my mind, and my heart returned to its old course; but oh, how glad was I that this trouble was gone from me, and that the fire was put out, that I might sin again without control! Wherefore, when I had satisfied nature with my food, I shook the sermon out of my mind, and to my old custom of sports and gaming I returned with great delight. . . . But the same day, as I was in the midst of a game of cat, and having struck it one blow from the hole, just as I was about to strike it the second time, a voice did suddenly dart from heaven into my soul, which said: 'Wilt thou leave thy sins and go to heaven, or have thy sins and go to hell?' At this I was put to an exceeding maze; wherefore, leaving my cat upon the ground, I looked up to heaven, and was as if I had with the eyes of my understanding seen the Lord Jesus look down upon me, as being very hotly displeased with me, and as if he did severely threaten me with some grievous punishment for those and other ungodly practices. . . .

But quickly after this, I fell into company with one poor man that made profession of religion, who, as I then thought, did talk pleasantly of the Scriptures and of religion; wherefore, liking what he said, I betook me to my Bible, and began to take great pleasure in reading. . . . Wherefore I fell to some outward reformation both in my words and life, and did set the commandments before me for my way to heaven; which commandments I also did strive to keep, and, as I thought, did keep them pretty well sometimes, and then I should have comfort; yet now and then should break one, and so afflict my conscience; but then I should repent, and say I was sorry for it, and promise God to do better next time, and there got help again; for then I thought I pleased God as well as any man in England.

Thus I continued about a year, all which time our neighbours did take me to be a very godly and religious man, and did marvel much to see such great alteration in my life and manners; and indeed so it was, though I knew not Christ, nor grace, nor faith, nor hope; for, as I have since seen, had I then died, my state had been most fearful. But, I say, my neighbours were amazed at this my great conversion—from prodigious profaneness to something like a moral life and sober man. Now therefore they began to praise, to commend, and to speak well of me, both to my face and behind my back. Now I was, as they said, become godly; now I was become a right honest man. But oh! when I understood those were their words and opinions of me, it pleased me mighty well; for though as yet I was nothing but a poor painted hypocrite, yet I loved to be talked of as one that was truly godly. I was proud of my godliness, and indeed I did all I did either to be seen of or well spoken of by men; and thus I continued for about a twelvemonth or more.

Now you must know that before this I had taken much delight in ringing, but my conscience beginning to be tender, I thought such practice was but vain, and therefore forced myself to leave it; yet my mind hankered; wherefore I would go to the steeple-house and look on, though I durst not ring; but I thought this did not become religion neither; yet I forced myself, and would look on still. But quickly after, I began to think, 'How if one of the bells should fall?' Then I chose to stand under a main beam that lay overthwart the steeple, from side to side, thinking here I might stand sure; but then I thought again, should the bell fall with a swing, it might first hit the wall, and then rebounding upon me, might kill me for all this beam. This made me stand in the steeple-door; and now, thought I, I am safe enough; for if the bell should then fall, I can slip out behind these thick walls, and so be preserved notwithstanding. So after this I would yet go to see them ring, but would not go any further than the steeple-door; but then it came into my head, 'How if the steeple itself should fall?' And this thought (it may, for aught I know, when I stood and looked on) did continually so shake my mind, that I durst not stand at the steeple-door any longer, but was forced to flee, for fear the steeple should fall upon my head.

Another thing was my dancing; I was a full year before I could quite leave that. But all this while, when I thought I kept that or this commandment, or did by word or deed anything I thought was good, I had great peace in my conscience, and would think with myself, God cannot choose but be now pleased with me; yea, to relate it in my own way, I thought no man in England could please God better than I. But, poor wretch as I was, I was all this while ignorant of Jesus Christ, and going about to establish my own righteousness; and had perished therein, had not God in his mercy shewed me more of my state by nature.

The Golden City—from 'The Pilgrim's Progress.'

Now I saw in my dream that by this time the pilgrims were got over the Incharnted Ground, and entering into the country of Beulah, whose air was very sweet and pleasant, the way lying directly through it, they solaced them there for a season. Yea, here they heard continually the singing of birds, and saw every day the flowers appear in the earth, and heard the voice of the turtle in the land. In this country the sun shineth night and day; wherefore it was beyond the Valley of the Shadow of Death, and also out of the reach of Giant Despair; neither could they from this place so much as see Doubting Castle. Here they were within sight of the city they were going to; also here met them some of the inhabitants thereof: for in this land the Shining Ones commonly walked, because it was upon the borders of Heaven. In this land also the contract between the bride and bridegroom was renewed; yea, here, 'as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so did their God rejoice over them.' Here they had no want of corn and wine; for in this place they met abundance of what they had sought for in all their pilgrimage. Here they heard voices from out of the city, loud voices, saying: 'Say ye to the daughter of Zion, behold thy salvation cometh, behold, his reward is with him.' Here all the inhabitants of the country called them 'the holy people, the redeemed of the Lord, sought out,' &c.

Now as they walked in this land, they had more rejoicing than in parts more remote from the kingdom to which they were bound; and drawing near to the city they had yet a more perfect view thereof: it was builded of pearls and precious stones, also the streets thereof were paved with gold; so that, by reason of the natural glory of the city, and the reflection of the sunbeams upon it, Christian with desire fell sick; Hopeful also had a fit or two of the same disease: wherefore here they lay by it a while, crying out because of their pangs: 'If you see my Beloved, tell him that I am sick of love.'

But being a little strengthened, and better able to bear their sickness, they walked on their way, and came yet nearer and nearer, where were orchards, vineyards, and gardens, and their gates opened into the highway. Now as they came up to these places, behold the gardener stood in the way, to whom the pilgrims said: Whose goodly vineyards and gardens are these? He answered: They are the King's, and are planted here for his own delight, and also for the solace of pilgrims. So the gardener had them into the vineyards, and bid them refresh themselves with dainties; he also shewed them there the King's walks and arbors where he delighted to be; and here they tarried and slept.

Now I beheld in my dream that they talked more in their sleep at this time than ever they did in all their journey; and being in a muse thereabout, the gardener said even to me: Wherefore musest thou at the matter? It is the nature of the fruit of the grapes of these vineyards to go down so sweetly as to cause the lips of them that are asleep to speak.

So I saw that when they awoke they addressed themselves to go up to the city. But as I said, the reflection of the sun upon the city (for the city was pure gold) was so extremely glorious, that they could not as yet with open face behold it, but through an instrument made for that purpose. So I saw that, as they went on, there met them two men in raiment that shone like gold; also their faces shone as the light. These men asked the pilgrims whence they came; and they told them. They also asked them where they had lodged, what difficulties and dangers, what comforts and pleasures, they had met with in their way; and they told them. Then said the men that met them: You have but two difficulties more to meet with, and then you are in the city.

Christian then and his companion asked the men to go along with them; so they told them they would; but, said they, you must obtain it by your own faith. So I saw in my dream that they went on together till they came in sight of the gate.

Now I further saw that betwixt them and the gate was a river, but there was no bridge to go over, the river was very deep. At the sight therefore of this river, the pilgrims were much stounded; but the men that went with them said: You must go through, or you cannot come at the gate.

The pilgrims then began to inquire if there was no other way to the gate; to which they answered: Yes; but there hath not any save two, to wit, Enoch and Elijah, been permitted to tread that path since the foundation of the world, nor shall, until the last trumpet shall sound. The pilgrims then, especially Christian, began to dispond in his mind, and looked this way and that; but no way could be found by them by which they might escape the river. Then they asked the men if the waters were all of a depth. They said: No; yet they could not help them in that case; for said they, You shall find it deeper or shallower, as you believe in the King of the place.

They then addressed themselves to the water, and entering, Christian began to sink, and crying out to his good friend Hopeful, he said: I sink in deep waters: the billows go over my head; all the waters go over me. Selah. Then said the other: Be of good cheer, my brother; I feel the bottom, and it is good. Then said Christian: Ah! my friend, the sorrow of death hath encompassed me about: I shall not see the land that flows with milk and honey. . . .

Then I saw in my dream that Christian was in a muse a while. To whom also Hopeful added this word: Be of good cheer; Jesus Christ maketh thee whole: and with that Christian brake out with a loud voice, Oh I see him again; and he tells me: 'When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee.' Then they both took courage, and the enemy was after that as still as a stone, until they were gone over. Christian therefore presently found ground to stand upon, and so it followed that the rest of the river was but shallow. Thus they got over. Now upon the bank of the river or the other side, they saw the two shining men again, who there waited for them. Wherefore being come out of the river, they saluted them saying: 'We are ministring spirits, sent forth to minister to those that shall be heirs of salvation.' Thus they went along towards the gate. Now you must note that the city stood upon a mighty hill; but the pilgrims went up that hill with ease, because they had these two men to lead them up by the arms; they had likewise left their mortal garments behind them in the river; for though they went in with them, they came out without them. They therefore went up here with much agility and speed, though the foundation upon which the city was framed was higher than the clouds. They therefore went up through the region of the air, sweetly talking as they went, being comforted because they got safely over the river, and had such glorious companions to attend them. . . .

Now while they were thus drawing towards the gate, behold a company of the heavenly host came out to meet them; to whom it was said by the other two Shining Ones: These are the men that have loved our Lord when they were in the world, and that have left all for his holy name; and he hath sent us to fetch them, and we have brought them thus far on their desired journey, that they may go in and look their Redeemer in the face with joy. Then the Heavenly Host gave a great shout, saying: 'Blessed are they that are called to the marriage-supper of the Lamb.' There came also out at this time to meet them several of the King's trumpeters, clothed in white and shining raiment, who with melodious noises and loud made even the heavens to echo with their sound. These trumpeters saluted Christian and his fellow with ten thousand welcomes from the world; and this they did with shouting and sound of trumpet.

This done, they compassed them round about on every side; some went before, some behind, and some on the right hand, some on the left (as 'twere to guard them through the upper regions) continually sounding as they went, with melodious noise, in notes on high; so that the very sight was to them that could behold it as if heaven itself was come down to meet them. Thus, therefore, they walked on together; and as they walked, ever and anon these trumpeters, even with joyful sound, would by mixing their music with looks and gestures, still signify to Christian and his brother how welcome they were into their company, and with what gladness they came to meet them: and now were these two men, as 'twere, in heaven before they came at it, being swallowed up with the sight of angels, and with hearing of their melodious notes. Here also they had the city itself in view, and they thought they heard all the bells therein to ring, to welcome them thereto; but above all, the warm and joyful thoughts that they had about their own dwelling there with such company, and that for ever and ever. Oh! by what tongue or pen can their glorious joy be expressed? Thus they came up to the gate.

Now, when they were come up to the gate, there was written over it in letters of gold: 'Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have a right to the Tree of Life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.'

Then I saw in my dream that the shining men bid them call at the gate; the which when they did, some from above looked over the gate, to wit Enoch, Moses, Elijah, &c.; to whom it was said: These pilgrims are come from the City of Destruction, for the love that they bear to the King of this place; and then the pilgrims gave in unto them each man his certificate, which they had received in the beginning: those therefore were carried in to the King, who, when he had read them, said: Where are the men? To whom it was answered: They are standing without the gate. The King then commanded to open the gate, 'That the righteous nation,' said he, 'that keepeth truth, may enter in.'

Now I saw in my dream that these two men went in at the gate; and lo, as they entered, they were transfigured, and they had raiment put on that shone like gold. There was also that met them with harps and crowns, and gave to them; the harps to praise withal, and the crowns in token of honour. Then I heard in my dream that all the bells in the city rang again for joy, and that it was said unto them: 'Enter ye into the joy of your Lord.' I also heard the men themselves, that they sang with a loud voice, saying: 'Blessing, honour, and glory, and power be to Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever.'

Now, just as the gates were opened to let in the men, I looked in after them, and behold the city shone like the sun; the streets also were paved with gold, and in them walked many men with crowns on their heads, palms in their hands, and golden harps to sing praises withal.

One of seven known copies of the first edition (facsimile reprint, 1926) of the Pilgrim's Progress was sold in 1901 for £1475; a copy sold in 1926 for £6800 was returned on proving to be of the second issue of the first edition, with a list of 'Erata.' There is a complete series of editions down to the thirty-fourth—except the seventeenth. An incomplete folio edition of Bunyan's general works appeared in 1692, and complete editions in two volumes folio in 1736-37 and 1767. A thick folio of 1112 pages, double columns, was published in Edinburgh in 1771, and other collected editions have been issued in England, Scotland, and America. See Bibliography by F. M. Harrison (1932), who also wrote a Life (1928). See Lives by Southey (1830), Offor (1862), Froude (1880), Dr John Brown of Bedford (the fullest; 1885, new ed. 1928), Hale White (1904), G. B. Harrison (1928); and Wright's Bunyan as a Man of Letters (1916.)

Robert Boyle (1627-91), the most distinguished of the 'experimental philosophers' who in England hastened to possess the new worlds of which Bacon had glimpses, was a son of the first ('great') Earl of Cork, at whose mansion of Lismore he was born. After studying at Eton and Geneva, he travelled through Italy, returning to England in 1644; and henceforward to the end of his life he devoted himself to researches and experiments in chemistry and physics. From 1644 till 1650 he lived in the manor of Stalbridge in Dorset, now his by his father's death. In 1654 he settled at Oxford. From 1645 weekly meetings were held at London and at Oxford for the cultivation of what was then termed 'the new philosophy'—in Oxford first at the lodgings of Dr Wilkins, and subsequently, for the most part, at Boyle's. These scientific students—Wilkins, Boyle, Seth Ward, Wren, Wallis, Petty—with others who afterwards joined them, were incorporated by Charles II. in 1662 as the Royal Society. Boyle, in London after 1668, was one of its most active members, and many of his treatises originally appeared in the Society's Transactions. He died in 1691, and his works are voluminous enough to fill five folio volumes. They consist chiefly of accounts of his experimental researches in chemistry and natural philosophy, especially on the mechanical and chemical properties of air, on freezing, boiling, refraction, specific gravity, and electricity. By means of the air-pump, the construction of which he materially improved, he made valuable discoveries. In 1662 he published experimental proof of the proportional relation between elasticity and pressure, properly called Boyle's Law (sometimes called Mariotte's, after the experimenter who in 1676 confirmed Boyle's results). His researches and results in many departments mark the final defeat of mediævalism and the triumph of the modern spirit—though he clung to the belief in the transmutation of gold. A devout and amiable man, he published much in defence of Christianity, and on the importance of studying the Divine attributes as displayed in the material world. He devoted much time and money to missionary enterprises, and made provision for the delivery of eight lectures yearly in London 'for proving the Christian religion against notorious infidels, namely, atheists, theists, pagans, Jews, and Mohammedans; not descending lower to any controversies that are among Christians themselves.' In 1660 he was solicited by Lord Clarendon to take orders, but modestly professed himself unequal to the high duties of the pastoral office; he thought he had even a better chance to advance religion by his writings as a layman. He spent large sums in the translation and diffusion of the Scriptures, in publishing useful books (such as Burnet's History of the Reformation), and in advancing science. In spite of feeble health and positive illness, he continued research and writing till shortly before his death at the end of 1691. He had been elected president of the Royal Society (an honour he declined), governor of the corporation for the spread of the gospel in New England, and director of the East India Company (whose charter he helped to obtain).

Besides treatises such as The Origin of Forms and Qualities, Experiments touching Colours, Hydrostatical Paradoxes, disquisitions on gems, the temperature of the blood, the usefulness of experimental philosophy, Observations touching Cold, &c., he published books on the style of the Scriptures, against swearing, on the reconcilableness of reason and religion, on final causes, The Christian Virtuoso [i.e. experimentalist], and A Treatise on Seraphic Love; not to speak of the famous Occasional Reflections on Several Subjects (1665), mostly written in early life, which Butler caricatured and Swift ridiculed in his Meditations on a Broom-stick. Even without this association, the Reflections inevitably provoke a smile—lessons on the goodness of the Creator, the duty of humility, the uncertainty of life, &c., drawn from such 'occasions' as 'his manner of giving meat to his dog,' 'on sitting at ease in a coach that went very fast,' 'upon the taking of physic,' 'upon one's drinking water out of the brims of his hat,' and 'on killing a crow (out of a window) in a hog's trough, and immediately tracing the ensuing reflection with a pen made of one of his quills,' solemnly set forth in handsome type on great folio pages. Fifteen meditations turn on 'the accidents of an ague,' the first—'Upon the first invasion of the disease'—describing how the 'chilness' surprised him as he was 'sitting quietly in his chamber, delightfully entertained by an outlandish virtuoso with an account of the several attempts that are either made or designed in foreign parts to produce curiosities and improve knowledge.' The last of the series appropriately arises out of his 'reviewing and tacking together the several bills piled up in the apothecary's shop.' It will not be unfair to this voluminous author to choose our specimens not from the more ponderous works—written mostly in a plain and clear yet prolix style—but from the Occasional Reflections. The first is a fair average one; the second, more whimsical, contains a number of physiological remarks here omitted as now quite unsuited for general reading. But it has the reputed merit of having by its concluding paragraphs given Swift the suggestion for Gulliver's Travels. At least it is entitled to the credit of having fairly formulated the ingenious though simple plan for bringing veiled but effective satire to bear on home foibles by the ingenuous remarks of intelligent but imaginary foreigners; the device that was carried out in the next century by Dufresny, by Montesquieu, and by Goldsmith in his Citizen of the World; as also since by Morier in Hajji Baba in England, at times by Mr Punch, and by many others. There is a Life of Boyle by Flora Masson (1914), and a Bibliography by J. F. Fulton (1932).

Upon the Sight of Roses and Tulips growing near one another.

It is so uncommon a thing to see tulips last till roses come to be blown, that the seeing them in this garden grow together, as it deserves my notice, so methinks it should suggest to me some reflection or other on it. And perhaps it may not be an improper one to compare the difference betwixt these two kinds of flowers to the disparity which I have often observed betwixt the fates of those young ladies that are only very handsome, and those that have a less degree of beauty, recompensed by the accession of wit, discretion, and virtue: for tulips, whilst they are fresh, do indeed by the lustre and vividness of their colours more delight the eye than roses; but then they do not alone quickly fade, but as soon as they have lost that freshness and gaudiness that solely endeared them, they degenerate into things not only undesirable but distasteful; whereas roses, besides the moderate beauty they disclose to the eye (which is sufficient to please, though not to charm) do not only keep their colour longer than tulips, but when that decays, retain a perfumed odour, and divers useful qualities and virtues that survive the spring and recommend them all the year. Thus those unadvised young ladies, that because nature has given them beauty enough despise all other qualities, and even that regular diet which is ordinarily requisite to make beauty itself lasting, not only are wont to decay betimes, but as soon as they have lost that youthful freshness that alone endeared them, quickly pass from being objects of wonder and love, to be so of pity, if not of scorn; whereas those that were as solicitous to enrich their minds as to adorn their faces, may not only with mediocrity of beauty be very desirable whilst that lasts, but notwithstanding the recess of that and youth, may by the fragrant reputation and those virtues and ornaments of the mind that time does but improve, be always sufficiently endeared to those that have merit enough to discern and value such excellences, and whose esteem and friendship is alone worth their being concerned for. In a word, they prove the happiest as well as they are the wisest ladies, that, whilst they possess the desirable qualities that youth is wont to give, neglect not the acquist [acquisition] of those that age cannot take away.

Upon the Eating of Oysters.

Eugenius. Whilst every body else is commending these oysters, either with his tongue or with his teeth, so that one of the company sticks not to say that they are as much worth as if they contained each of them a pearl, you only seemed as unconcerned a spectator, as if you thought their proper use, like that of flowers, were rather to be looked on than to be eaten.

Lindamor. I confess, Eugenius, that I found myself more inclinable to reflect on what you are doing, than to keep you company in it; and whilst I saw such persons so gustfully swallow these extolled fishes, the sight led me to take more notice than perhaps you have done of the strange power of education and custom.

Eug. And what, I pray you, has custom to do with oysters?

Lind. You will soon know that, if I tell you, that I was considering on this occasion how forward we are to think other nations absurd or barbarous for such practices, that either the same or little better may be found unscrupled at among our selves; and I acknowledge it to be one of the chief advantages I account myself to have obtained by my travels, that as I do not easily admire, so I am not forward to deride, the practice of any people for being new, and am not apt to think their customs must be therefore worse than ours, because they widely differ from them.

I could give you store of instances to justify this impartiality; but because the circumstances of eating and drinking are those which make men with the greatest confidence term other nations brutish and barbarous, I will confine myself to some examples of that nature.

We impute it for a barbarous custom to many nations of the Indians, that like beasts they eat raw flesh. And pray how much is that worse than our eating raw fish, as we do in eating these oysters? Nor is this a practice of the rude vulgar only, but of the politest and nicest persons among us, such as physicians, divines, and even ladies. And our way of eating seems much more barbarous than theirs, since they are wont to kill before they eat, but we scruple not to devour oysters alive, and kill them not with our hands or teeth, but with our stomachs, where (for aught we know) they begin to be digested before they make an end of dying. Nay, sometimes when we dip them in vinegar, we may, for sauce to one bit, devour alive a shoal of little animals, which, whether they be fishes or worms, I am not so sure as I am that I have by the help of convenient glasses seen great numbers of them swimming up and down in less than a saucer full of vinegar.

We detest and despise some other nations for feeding upon caterpillars, grasshoppers, and other insects; and others for feeding upon carrion and stinking food.

And do not many of us do as bad, when we not only eat but extol rotten cheese, whose livid colour sufficiently betrays its putrefaction, and whose odious smell offends most men's noses and turns some men's stomachs? Nay, when this cheese is grown to that high degree of rottenness that our critical palates like it best in, we then devour whole hundreds of mites, which are really crawling insects, bred out of putrefaction, and these too are so numerous and little, that our greediness makes us swallow many of them alive. . . .

Eug. You put me in mind of a fancy of your friend Mr Boyle, who was saying that he had thoughts of making a short romantick story, where the scene should be laid in some island of the southern ocean, governed by some such rational laws and customs as those of Utopia, or the New Atlantis; and in this country, he would introduce an observing native, that upon his return home from his travels made in Europe should give an account of our countries and manners under feigned names, and frequently intimate in his relations (or in his answers to questions that should be made him), the reasons of his wondering to find our customs so extravagant, and differing from those of his country. For your friend imagined that by such a way of proposing many of our practices, we should ourselves be brought unawares to condemn or perhaps laugh at them, and should at least cease to wonder to find other nations think them as extravagant as we think the manners of the Dutch and Spaniards, as they are represented in our travellers' books.

Lind. I dislike not the project, and wish it were prosecuted by somebody that being impartial were more a friend to fables. For when I consider that the name of Barbarian was given by the two noblest people of the earth, the Greeks and Romans, not only to all the rest of the world, but to one another, though both those nations were highly civilized, and the courtly Persians, and other voluptuous Asiaticks were perhaps no less so than they; I doubt that most nations in styling one another's manners extravagant and absurd are guided more by education and partiality than reason; and that we laugh at many customs of strangers only because we never were bred to them, and prize many of our own only because we never considered them. And we may well believe that custom has much a larger empire than men seem to be aware of, since whole nations are wholly swayed by it that do not reckon themselves among its subjects, nor so much as dream that they are so.

THE RESTORATION.

THOUGH the greatest writer of his generation—Milton—strove with all the energy of despair to support the falling fabric of republicanism, to no section of the community was the restoration of Charles II. more welcome than to men of letters. Notable books had been published during the Civil Wars and Protectorate, but the chief literary product had been a rank crop of unprofitable pamphlets.

An immediate result of the Restoration was the revival of the drama. For nearly eighteen years the acting of plays had been prohibited, but at the Restoration permission was given for the establishment of two theatrical companies—the King's (under Thomas Killigrew) and the Duke's (under Sir William D'Avenant). Of the famous dramatists who flourished before the outbreak of the Civil Wars only one survived—James Shirley, who in 1659 had published The Contention of Ajax and Ulysses (written for a private entertainment), containing the fine and solemn song, 'The glories of our blood and State,' which Bowman the actor used to sing to Charles II. Several of Shirley's plays were revived at the Restoration (The Cardinal and The Traitor most frequently); but in the preface to The Contention he had announced that 'nothing of this nature shall after this engage either my pen or invention,' and he kept his word. He died in 1666; and in MacFlecknoe (1682) Dryden held up his works, with Thomas Heywood's, to derision. On the Restoration stage revivals of old plays—notably of Beaumont and Fletcher—were constantly produced, not seldom in garbled versions. The store of old dramatic poetry was ransacked from end to end by rapacious plagiarists. Shakespeare kept his popularity, though his plays were less frequently acted than Beaumont and Fletcher's; but irreverent playwrights did not hesitate to mutilate even Shakespeare's masterpieces by wanton and insipid 'alterations.'

The foremost part in restoring the fortunes of the theatre was taken by Sir William D'Avenant, who had written for the stage in the days of Charles I. He is not to be ranked with the elder and nobler dramatists, but he possessed high accomplishments and versatile abilities, and he never grew old. In his philosophical poem Gondibert he achieved a solid success. Some of his songs (notably 'The lark now leaves his watery nest') are of rare excellence. He was a devoted admirer of Shakespeare, but he had lived an exile in France, and came back a modern of the moderns. Dryden found him of 'so quick a fancy that nothing was proposed to him on which he could not suddenly produce a thought extremely pleasant and surprising.' Four years before the Restoration he had obtained leave from the authorities to produce at the Cockpit an operatic piece, The Siege of Rhodes. After the Restoration he wrote regularly for the stage, sometimes in conjunction with Dryden, down to the year of his death (1668). Too much attention was paid by D'Avenant to spectacular effects; but it cannot be denied that the personation of women's characters by women, instead of by boys as heretofore, was a welcome innovation.

One of the earliest of the Restoration dramatists was John Wilson, Recorder of Londonderry, who wrote comedies of considerable merit on the model of Ben Jonson. To the Earl of Orrery was due the introduction of rhymed tragedies. Dryden followed Orrery's lead, and wrote play after play in rhymed heroics, mixing good poetry with intolerable fustian. Sir Robert Howard, Dryden's brother-in-law, also cultivated the heroic drama. John Crowne and, at about the same date, Nathaniel Lee—writers who sixty years earlier might have done excellent work—composed tragedies that, in spite of crudeness and violent exaggeration, have unmistakable power. Lee confined himself to tragedy; but Crowne, in Sir Courtly Nice, showed comic talent of a high order. The best picture of contemporary manners is to be found in the plays of Thomas Shadwell, whom Dryden assailed so bitterly. We must not look to Shadwell for poetry, though he was appointed poet-laureate at the Revolution; but in depicting the brisk, bustling life of the town he showed himself an apt pupil of the master in whose steps he essayed to tread—Ben Jonson. More refined than Shadwell was Sir George Etherege, who may claim to be the founder of ‘artificial comedy’ or ‘comedy of manners.’ Foremost among the writers of this school are Wycherley and Congreve. The licentiousness which disfigures the Restoration drama becomes in Wycherley’s plays (valuable though they be for their vigorous satire and abundant mirth) positively revolting. For wit and brilliancy Congreve has never been surpassed; indeed, the wit and brilliancy are lavished with so free a hand as to cause at times a feeling of fatigue. In tragedy Congreve does not show to advantage. Tenderness and a measure of tragic power belonged to the ill-starred poet Thomas Otway, whose Orphan and Venice Preserved stirred by their pathos many generations of playgoers. Sir John Vanbrugh wisely refrained from attempting tragedy, but his comedies are very readable for their vivacious dialogue and dexterous plots. The plays of Mrs Aphra Behn, though they transgress the bounds of decency and decorum, are bustling and diverting. Mrs Manley’s contributions to the stage may be safely neglected; but the farcical comedies of Mrs Centlivre will repay perusal. Thomas Southerne, an amiable poet, who was the friend of Dryden, and in his old age was complimented by Gray, wrote tragedy and comedy with equal facility. His Oroonoko, founded on Mrs Behn’s once-famous romance, appealed effectively to sentimental audiences, and contains a few passages that rise above mediocrity. George Farquhar, who died at nine-and-twenty (in 1707), achieved a brilliant success with The Beaux’ Stratagem, but in his less famous plays there is no lack of exuberant spirits and comic invention. Among playwrights who would claim notice in an extended survey of the drama are the Killigrews, Sir Charles Sedley, Lacy the actor, Ravenscroft (a brutal writer), honest Tom Durfey, and Elkanah Settle (whose Empress of Morocco is prized by collectors for the ‘sculptures’ with which it is adorned).

Dryden’s supremacy in the drama was maintained throughout the later years of the seventeenth century. His first play, The Wild Gallant (1663), with a plot drawn (as frequently in Restoration plays) from Spanish sources, was a distinct failure; and The Rival Ladies, produced later in the same year, attained only a moderate success. He established his reputation firmly in 1667 by his Secret Love, which placed him at the head of contemporary playwrights. In 1671 the Duke of Buckingham, collaborating with Samuel Butler and others, held up the heroic drama to ridicule in that brilliant burlesque The Rehearsal (Dryden figuring therein as the poet Bayes); but Dryden’s popularity was secure against all assaults—though not all his plays achieved success. In 1675 appeared the last of his rhymed tragedies, Aureng-Zebe, and for three years he ceased to write for the stage. In All for Love (1677–78) he abandoned rhyme, declaring, ‘In my style I have professed to imitate the divine Shakespeare, which that I might perform freely, I have disencumbered myself from rhyme, not that I condemn my former way, but that it is more proper to my present purpose.’ On the present occasion he wrote ‘for himself;’ his earlier plays were ‘given to the people.’ No notice, however brief, of Dryden’s connection with the stage should fail to make mention of his admirably pithy and pointed prologues and epilogues, wherein he surpassed all his contemporaries.

In the Restoration drama we see reflected the dissolute manners of the court. The inevitable reaction against Puritanism had set in strongly, sweeping away the restraints prescribed by decency and good taste. Jeremy Collier’s famous attack on contemporary playwrights, in his Short View (1698), was inspired by honest indignation. Not only does the drama of the Restoration and the Revolution offend by its grossness, but it leaves on the reader’s mind an impression of ignobility and unreality. Only in an unheroic age would the impossible ‘heroic tragedy’ have been tolerated. In Elizabethan plays rant and bombast can be freely found (and grossness frequently abounds), but these faults are redeemed by the presence of fine poetry and exalted sentiment. Chapman in Bussy D’Ambois raved furiously, but his ravings were the frenzy of a poet; Dryden’s extravagances, or Crowne’s, or Lee’s, simply provoke the reader’s impatient derision. The ignobility of the Restoration drama is shown most clearly by reference to Molière. With avidity the English dramatists seized the delicate creations of the French master, and produced coarse, depraved imitations—turning pure gold to dross.

In non-dramatic poetry Dryden established his supremacy even more firmly than in the drama. Milton was to publish Paradise Lost, Paradise Regained, and Samson Agonistes, but into a discussion on Restoration poetry Milton's name must not come, for he stands aloof and afar from the Restoration writers—in solitary grandeur, unregarding and unregarded. Never was a poet more divinely inspired than Milton's friend Andrew Marvell, when he wrote in earlier manhood, 'Where the remote Bermudas ride,' and his garden fancies, 'How vainly men themselves amaze,' but at the Restoration he became more scurrilous in his satires than a fishwife. The oldest surviving poet was George Wither (born in 1588), who far back in the days of James I. had written fresh-coloured eclogues and delightful songs. Always an ardent reformer, he had suffered imprisonment in youth for his outspoken satires. Through the Civil Wars his sword and pen had been freely used in the service of the Parliament. At the Restoration his possessions were confiscated and he was flung into prison, where he still continued to issue pamphlet after pamphlet. Released in 1663, he ended his stormy career four years later. It is no light task to read even the titles of his multitudinous productions. That joyous lyrist Robert Herrick, who was only three years younger than Wither, had given to the world his Hesperides and Noble Numbers in 1647-48. At the Restoration he was reinstated in his Devonshire rectory, and there died in 1674. No lyrical poet's fame is more secure to-day than Herrick's, but his fame suffered neglect for upwards of a century. The wits of the Restoration reserved their warmest praise for Edmund Waller (1605-87), whose verses to Sacharissa are occasionally models of pointed felicity, and who undoubtedly did much to perfect the form of the heroic couplet. Dryden declared in 1664 that 'the excellence and dignity of rhyme were never fully known till Mr Waller taught it;' but Dryden's eulogy was far too extravagant. Much of Waller's writing (and he wrote comparatively little) is cold and laboured. Another poet whom it was the fashion of the age to overpraise was Sir John Denham, author of the descriptive poem Cooper's Hill, which contains the justly celebrated address to the Thames. Great, too, was the fame of Abraham Cowley, a poet who has been badly treated by posterity. When criticism has said its last word about Cowley's tortured and inept conceits, his harshness and obscurity, the frigidity of his love-poems, and the chaotic metre of his Pindariques, a few readers in every age will be attracted by the tenderness and sincerity of his elegies, the eloquence and weightiness of his didactic verse, the archness and sprightliness (though the note of genuine passion be wanting) of the group of poems devoted to his imaginary 'Mistress.' His best work was done long before the Restoration, and in later life his poetical efforts were chiefly confined to the penning of Pindariques—irregular, bastard odes that pleased the town and set a bad example to younger writers. D'Avenant's Gondibert was written in the long rhymed quatrains that Sir John Davies had employed in Nosce Tripsium, and Dryden followed D'Avenant when he chose this stately but somewhat wearisome metre for Annus Mirabilis. Very different was the metre employed by Samuel Butler in Hudibras. This witty and whimsical satire on the Puritans is written in rhymed octosyllables that hurry the reader along willy-nilly. Butler's ingenuity in rhyming was simply astonishing. Rhymed octosyllables had been employed not unsuccessfully by previous writers for lampoons, but as a metrical funambulist Butler is unequalled. Moreover, by his force of genius he was able to make this skimble-skamble metre a fitting vehicle for heightened descriptive poetry and profound moral reflection. Charles Cotton, a man of varied accomplishments, in Scarronides attempted to write in Hudibrastic verse, but showed more indelicacy than wit. That he was, however, a genuine poet his New Year verses (admired by Charles Lamb and Wordsworth) and his poetical addresses to Izaak Walton amply testify. Other poets who resembled Cotton in the extent and variety of their attainments were Thomas Stanley and Sir Richard Fanshawe; the former translated Anacreon, the latter Il Pastor Fido, and both wrote graceful original poetry. A greater poet than these was Henry Vaughan, who—taking George Herbert for his model—excelled his master. After keeping silence for nearly thirty years, he published in 1678 his last volume, Thalia Rediviva, containing many poems that are evidently early pieces, but some that were written after the Restoration. Among his friends was Mrs Katherine Philips, 'the matchless Orinda,' who presided over a literary coterie at Cardigan, translated with the help of friends some plays of Corneille, and published a volume of miscellaneous poems, which was praised by Cowley and Dryden. Another lady who cultivated poetry and patronised poets was the fantastic Duchess of Newcastle, best known by her biography of her husband (who befriended Shirley, and wrote plays in which Shirley had a hand). Her verse is diffuse and rambling, but in an artificial age she had a feeling for Nature, and has left some happy descriptive passages—such as we find later in the writings of Anne Finch, Countess of Winchester (1660–1720). The poetic achievements of these titled ladies were, it must be allowed, far surpassed by the notorious Mrs Behn, whose songs at their best are hard to beat.

Dryden's first mature poem was his Heroic Stanzas (written in his twenty-eighth year) on the death of Oliver Cromwell (1658). Elsewhere will be found (pages 791 to 797) a record and estimate of his long and varied life-work. He continued working to the end, though his health was failing fast. His Fables—renderings from Chaucer, Boccaccio, and Ovid—were published at the end of 1699; and only a few days before his death (1st May 1700) he had written a prologue and epilogue for a revival of Fletcher's Pilgrim. No sign of decaying power is noticeable in the Fables. But with all his high and varied accomplishments, Dryden could not write such songs as may be found by the score among the Elizabethan dramatists. The songs scattered through his plays are well turned and tunable, but they lack the incommunicable charm of the earlier singers. To the highest regions of romantic poetry he could not ascend. But he sharpened the weapons of satire so effectively that even Pope could hardly put a finer edge upon them; he made the heroic couplet an eloquent vehicle for philosophical argument; and in his best epistles he showed more sincerity than Horace, and hardly inferior art.

In satire Dryden's aptest pupil was Oldham, who died at thirty, and to whose memory the master paid a fine tribute. A crowd of writers essayed satire, but their efforts are chiefly marked by dullness and obscurity. The most licentious was Rochester; but he must not be held responsible for all the scurrilous effusions that were fathered upon him, and it must be allowed that he had genuine talent for song-writing. Sir Charles Sedley wrote numerous gay and sparkling songs (occasionally with too much freedom), and the generous Lord Dorset handled lyric verse lightly. Thomas Flatman, the miniaturist, wrote Pindariques (after Cowley) execrably; but his poems inspired by meditations on death are profoundly impressive. John Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, afterwards Duke of Buckinghamshire, gained some applause by his Essay on Satire (1679) and Essay on Poetry (1682), the former containing a bitter attack on Rochester; and Wentworth Dillon, Earl of Roscommon, was extravagantly lauded for his Essay on Translated Verse. At the close of the century two physicians made some stir in the world of letters. Sir Richard Blackmore—'everlasting Blackmore'—published huge epics which provoked the derision of the wits; but the more furiously they lampooned him the faster he wrote, issuing folio after folio until out of sheer weariness they forbore to attack. The other was Sir Samuel Garth, a genial, cultivated man, the friend of Dryden and Pope. His fame rests—not too securely—on The Dispensary (1699), a mock-heroic satire that has lost its savour. Thomas D'Urfey (Tom Durfey), if only for his Winchester Wedding, should not be passed over; and he did really valuable service by collecting together, from every quarter, songs old and new in his Pills to Purge Melancholy. One of his own most popular songs, 'She rose and let me in,' was Scotticised, and wrongly attributed to Francis Sempill of Beltrees, author of the oldest version of 'Auld Langsyne' (Ebsworth's Roxburghe Ballads, vol. vi. pp. 193–199). The Anacreontics of John Oldmixon had a vein of sprightliness; but Pope consigned him to eternal infamy in The Dunciad. A playful poem, The Despairing Lover, by Pope's friend William Walsh, has found a place in modern anthologies; and Peter Anthony Motteux' 'Man is for the woman made' is still remembered. But never was English poetry in a more deplorable condition than in 1700—when Dryden died and the author of The Castle of Indolence was born.

It is commonly held that, though poetry deteriorated at the Restoration, prose was improved and refined; and Dryden is regarded by competent critics as 'the great reformer of English prose.' In the second half of the seventeenth century prose certainly began to be written with more orderliness, plainness, and conciseness; but these qualities, valuable though they be, were obtained at a heavy sacrifice. At the Restoration two writers were alive whose prose has never been surpassed for lofty, sustained eloquence—the royalist physician Sir Thomas Browne, and the Puritan poet Milton. No lessons in style were needed by Browne or Milton from their younger contemporaries. Nor is it easy to see how the enduring charm of Walton's Compleat Angler could have been heightened by added graces from any later hand. Fuller will outlive South—his witty periods were richer in terse epigram and more graciously attired. Jeremy Taylor, who combines the ripe wisdom of the man of the world with the spiritual ecstasy of the divine, is widely read to-day, while Tillotson and Stillingfleet are coldly remembered and Sherlock is forgotten. When we turn from divinity to philosophy, we cannot but admit that Hobbes wrote with a force and incisiveness that were denied to Locke. The difference between the older school and the newer is nowhere more clearly seen than in comparing Clarendon's History of the Rebellion with Burnet's History of my own Time. Not only is Clarendon more generous and just in his judgments, but his diction has the weight and dignity that befit a serious historian, while Burnet writes in the facile style of modern journalism.

Few have written better prose than Cowley, whose essays have a leisurely, unstudied grace that contrasts strangely with the violent conceits of his Pindariques. Something of the same charm is found in the writings of Sir William Temple, particularly when he is discoursing on the subject of gardens. Another authority on gardening and forestry was John Evelyn, a high-minded country gentleman, whose Diary contains much information on the history and social life of the second half of the seventeenth century. Evelyn viewed with anxious concern the dissolute life of the king and the court, and gravely animadverted in his Diary on the 'inexpressible luxury and profaneness' that prevailed. But we must turn to another diarist, Samuel Pepys, if we wish to see a lively picture of Restoration society. Pepys was at once a hard-working official and frivolous man of pleasure; and in his Diary—the most astonishing record of its kind in existence—he set down, for several years together, in minutest detail his day-to-day experiences, never imagining that the key to the cipher in which it was written would one day be found, and that the frank confessions of his foibles and follies would be printed for the instruction and amusement of posterity.

Some of the best memoirs in the language belong to the second half of the seventeenth century. Walton's fragrant Lives, delightful in their artless simplicity, were written at various times, the earliest being the Life of Donne (1640), and the latest the Life of Bishop Sanderson (1678). On the Puritan side is Mrs Hutchinson's Life of her husband, Colonel Hutchinson, which is deservedly popular; but the Duchess of Newcastle—'Mad Madge,' whom Lamb chivalrously exalted—merits as full a recognition, while Lady Fanshawe is perhaps the most fascinating of the three. With these memoirs may be placed the letters of Dorothy Osborne, written a few years before the Restoration (1652-54), to her affianced husband, Sir William Temple. Such books as Ludlow's Memoirs and Whitelocke's Memorials appeal to the historical student rather than to the lover of literature. A capital, but unedifying, sketch of the court of Charles II. is afforded by the Mémoires which the Comte de Grammont dictated early in the next century, in his old age, to his brother-in-law, Anthony Hamilton. Very entertaining and very valuable is the posthumous Lives of the Norths, by Roger North (1653-1734), who—having secured, by the practice of the law, an ample fortune—retired at the Revolution (being an honest nonjuror) to his estate at Rougham, Norfolk, where he lived the life of a country gentleman, and amused himself in later years by writing memoirs of his distinguished kinsmen.

After the Restoration the study of natural science made great strides. The Royal Society, incorporated in 1662, grew out of some scientific meetings held at Oxford in the rooms of Dr John Wilkins, President of Wadham. This liberal divine is the author of some curious and fantastic treatises, written with ease and elegance. Dr Isaac Barrow was equally eminent as a mathematician and theologian. In 1669 he resigned his chair of Lucasian Professor of Mathematics to the greatest of all natural philosophers, Sir Isaac Newton. Robert Boyle, a son of Richard Boyle, Earl of Cork, cultivated natural science with success, but his moral Reflections are superficial and prolix. Theology and natural science were closely connected in the early days of the Royal Society, men of science (Newton among them) writing on theology, and theologians discussing scientific subjects. John Ray, the botanist, published in 1691 The Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation, which was widely and deservedly popular. Dr Thomas Burnet's Sacred Theory of the Earth combines high imagination with gorgeous wealth of expression. A most interesting group of writers were the 'Cambridge Platonists'—Henry More, Cudworth, Glanville, and others—profoundly learned men, steeped in mysticism.

The ranks of Dissent furnished many admirable writers. Richard Baxter's Call to the Unconverted and Saints' Everlasting Rest were as widely popular as The Whole Duty of Man (ascribed to Richard Allestree, Provost of Eton). In his old age, when he published his autobiography, Baxter became very tolerant of the opinions of others, and very critical of himself. Quakerism was well represented by the Journal of George Fox, Barclay's Apology, William Penn's No Cross, no Crown ('a most capital book, good thoughts in good language,' wrote Lamb to Coleridge), and the autobiography of Milton's young friend, Thomas Ellwood. To a Dissenter, John Bunyan, we owe the most popular religious work in the English language, Pilgrim's Progress. The Bible and Foxe's Book of Martyrs were Bunyan's prison companions; and Pilgrim's Progress, with its story of Christian's difficulties, is written in language of the bare simplicity of the Book of Genesis—language that lives in the heart of the people. Allegories are usually tedious; Pilgrim's Progress was a shining exception, but the more laboured Holy War is at times fatiguing. Bunyan's humour and irony were well displayed in his Life and Death of Mr Badman.

During the Civil Wars the French heroical romances found readers, translators, and imitators in England; and these interminable productions maintained their vogue at the Restoration. John Crowne, the Earl of Orrery, Sir Henry North, and others wrote romances—quite unreadable to-day—after the manner of Madeleine de Scudéry and La Calprenède. The modern novel had not been born, but Mrs Behn—in her humanitarian romance Oroonoko—has been claimed as a forerunner of Rousseau.

In criticism as in poetry Dryden was unrivalled. He was often captious in his judgments, but his critical dissertations are models of felicitous writing—flexible and forcible, neither ornate nor bare. For criticism and exposition no style could be better than Dryden's; and the last piece of prose to which he set his hand (the preface to his Fables) shows all his good qualities in full perfection—his clear and vigorous understanding, his adroitness and versatility, his large-heartedness, his pride of spirit, his manly blend of patience and disdain. An enlightened critic was John Dennis, Milton's admirer, who has never recovered from the attack made upon him by Pope. At the close of the seventeenth century Thomas Rymer, historiographer, put forward some extraordinary views about Shakespeare, denouncing Othello as 'a bloody farce without salt or savour.' His Tragedies of the Last Age is entertaining, but it is hard to believe that he was writing seriously. Milton's nephews, John and Edward Phillips, who were educated by their uncle, had a love for letters. Edward Phillips published an interesting anthology, The Mysteries of Love and Eloquence, and Theatrum Poetarum, an account of the English poets, in which Milton is traditionally supposed to have revised the notice of Shakespeare. A valuable Account of the English Dramatic Poets (enlarged from his earlier work Momus Triumphant, 1687) was published in 1691 by Gerard Langbaine the younger, who showed with some humour and gusto how the later writers had freely plagiarised from the old playwrights whom they affected to despise. In 1698 Jeremy Collier startled the town with his Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, in which he sturdily attacked Dryden, Congreve, Wycherley, Vanbrugh, and others. Some of Collier's strictures betray petulant intolerance, but this tractate—to which Congreve, Vanbrugh, and others replied—was by no means deficient in good sense and sound judgment; and its publication had a salutary effect.

Much attention was devoted in the later years of the seventeenth century to the study of historical antiquities. It was the age of Dugdale, Strype, Rymer, Anthony Wood, Aubrey, and many other curious inquirers. In economics Sir William Petty and Sir Josiah Child achieved high distinction. The finest classical scholar that England ever produced—Richard Bentley—published his famous Dissertation on Phalaris in 1698. Two unscrupulous controversialists, Needham and L'Estrange, claim notice as pioneers of the modern newspaper press.

'I question whether in Charles II.'s reign English did not come to its full perfection; and whether it has not had its Augustan age as well as the Latin.' So wrote the anonymous critic—doubtless Francis Atterbury—who contributed the Preface to the Second Part of Waller's Poems, 1690. 'But posterity,' he adds, 'will best judge of this.' Posterity has judged that Waller's services to English poetry were greatly overestimated by his contemporaries, and that the Restoration poets—whether lyric or dramatic—were far inferior to their Elizabethan and Jacobean predecessors. The influence of Donne had powerfully affected the Caroline poets, who reproduced his extravagant conceits so closely that it is hard at times to distinguish the master's hand from the pupil's. But these imitators, able as they were (such men as Carew, Randolph, and Cleveland), could not follow him in his higher flights. It was inevitable that there should be a reaction in the direction of 'smoothness,' and Waller set the example of writing smoothly. Among prose-writers a similar movement set in. Elaborate and intricate periods were exchanged for an easier and simpler style. Younger writers cultivated lucidity of expression, and their prose—though it lacked the stateliness and energy that distinguished the Elizabethan writers—is engagingly frank and straightforward.

However necessary it may be for convenience of treatment to divide the writers of the seventeenth century into chronological series—Elizabethan, Jacobean, Caroline, Restoration, Revolution—it is well to remember that those most strictly contemporary were often separated in tone and temper by a wide gulf, and that the continuous succession cannot be broken up without some arbitrariness. Wither, who, as we have seen, was famous in James I.'s time, was imprisoned for his satire on a Restoration Parliament. Milton, an approved poet by 1630, wrote most of Paradise Lost under Charles II. Dryden, whose first-fruits date from 1650, was still writing for the press in the very last year of the century. Many of the authors of 'good King Charles's golden days' were even more conspicuous under William and Mary; and some of them lived on well into the period of Queen Anne. Hence some of those just named in connection with the Restoration period will be found treated in an earlier, some in a later, section of this work.

Though the second half of the seventeenth century was not one of the great ages of English literature, it was a time of varied intellectual activity. The drama merely supplied amusement for a dissolute court, and high romantic poetry was dead. But the spirit of speculation was abroad, and keen intellects were engaged in searching 'Nature's infinite book of secrecy.' An age which nurtured Newton, Bunyan, Dryden, and Locke can never be described as barren.

A. H. BULLEN.

Samuel Butler.

The author of Hudibras, the most brilliant satiric-comic genius our country has ever produced, was born in 1612 at Strensham, Worcestershire, the son of a farmer, a yeoman of small estate. From Worcester grammar-school Samuel Butler went, says Wood, 'as his brother, now living, affirms, to the university of Cambridge; yet others of the neighbourhood say to Oxon, but whether true I cannot tell.' As clerk to a justice of the peace, Mr Jeffreys of Earls-Croome, Worcestershire, he occupied his leisure with music and painting. He was afterwards in the service of the Countess of Kent at Wrest, in Bedfordshire, where he had the use of a library and conversed with Selden, who often employed him as amanuensis; he also at this time made the friendship of Samuel Cooper, the miniaturist. He is next said to have been clerk to the Puritan Sir Samuel Luke, of Cople Hoo, near Bedford. Luke was one of Cromwell's officers—scoutmaster for Bedfordshire—and was doubtless marked by the convictions and usages of his party; a post under him would have been a trying one for such a wit and humorist, even had his gifts not made him a royalist. Daily exposed to association with persons whose character he could not but dislike, Butler conceived the design of a general satire on the sectaries. The matchless fiction of Cervantes supplied him with a model, in which he had to substitute the extravagances of political and religious fanaticism—even more absurdly exaggerated by the caricaturist—for those of chivalry. Butler is generally said to have satirised Luke himself in Sir Hudibras:

'Tis sung, there is a valiant Mamaluke
In foreign land, yclep'd—
To whom we oft have been compar'd
For person, parts, address and beard.

But this assumption, though not improbable, is by no means certain, and the picture could not have been designed to be a recognisable portrait. Luke is an odd link between two men so widely apart as Butler and Bunyan (see page 719).

The Restoration threw a faint and brief sunshine over the life of Butler. He was appointed secretary to the Earl of Carbery, president of the principality of Wales; and when the Wardenship of the Marches was revived, the Earl made his secretary steward of Ludlow Castle. The poet, now fifty years of age, seemed to add to his security for the future by marrying a widow named Herbert, who was of good family and fortune; but this prospect proved delusive, in consequence of the failure of persons on whom the lady's fortune depended. It was now that Butler appeared as an author. The first part of Hudibras was published in 1663, and immediately became popular. Its wit, so suited to the taste of the time, and the breadth of the satiric pictures, for which most men could doubtless supply prototypes from memory, could not fail to give it extensive currency. By the Earl of Dorset, an accomplished friend of letters, it was introduced to the court; and the king is said to have had pleasure in reading and quoting it. A second part appeared in 1664, and a third in 1678. But though the poet and his work won the praise of all ranks, from royalty downwards, he was himself little benefited by it; the later part of his life was spent in poverty and obscurity in London. The Earl of Clarendon was said to have promised him a place at court he never got; the king to have granted him but three hundred pounds—which went to his creditors; and he was favoured with an interview with the Duke of Buckingham, who, seeing two court-ladies pass, ran out to them, and did not come back. Such are the incidents reported as having checkered twenty years of obscure misery. Butler died in Rose Street, Covent Garden, 25th September 1680, and was buried in St Paul's Churchyard, Covent Garden, the expense of his funeral being defrayed by his friend William Longueville of the Temple. He is described as 'of a leonine-coloured hair, sanguine, choleric, middle-sized, strong.'

It is rarely that a pasquinade written to satirise living characters or systems outlives its own age;

when it does, we may well conclude that there is something remarkable as well in the work as in its author. Such a work is Hudibras, the Cavalier burlesque of the extreme views and rigid manners of the English Puritans of the Civil War and Commonwealth. Marked alike by the ingenuity of its versification and the profusion of its wit, this marvellous medley still retains its place amongst the classic monuments of English literature, although it is seldom read through at once—a test for which its incessant brilliancy in some measure unfits it. Yet it is not only the best burlesque on the Puritans of that age, so fertile in satire, but is the best burlesque in the English tongue. Such wealth of knowledge of the world, not always unkindly cynicism, wit, shrewdness, acute suggestion, felicitous illustration, and irresistible drollery has never been comprised within the same limits. The idea of the knight, Sir Hudibras, going out 'a-colonelling' with his squire Ralph, is of course imitated from Cervantes; but the filling-up of the story is original. Don Quixote presents us with a wide range of adventures which interest the imagination and the feelings; there is a tenderness and romance about the Spanish hero, a tone of high honour and chivalry, which was in nowise cognate to Butler's scheme. His aim was to cast ridicule on the whole body of the English Puritans, especially their leaders, and to debase them by low and vulgar associations. In many of their proceedings, no doubt, there was ground for sarcasm. The affected dress, language, and manners of some of them, their fanatical legislation against walking in the fields on Sundays, village May-poles, and other unimportant matters, were fair subjects for the satirical poet; and their religious zeal led them into intolerance and absurdity. Contending for so dear a prize as liberty (and constraint) of conscience, and believing that they were specially appointed to shake and overturn the old corruptions of the kingdom, the Puritans were hardly guided by prudence, policy, or forbearance. Even Milton, the friend and associate of the party, was forced to admit that 'New Presbyter was but Old Priest writ large.' The higher qualities of these men, their indomitable courage and lofty zeal, were of course overlooked or despised by their royalist opponents, and Butler did not choose to remember them. His burlesque was read with delight, and was popular for generations after the more eccentric Puritans had merged into the sober English Dissenters. The plot or action of Hudibras is narrow and defective, and seems only to have been used as a sort of peg on which the satirist could hang his caricatures and allusions. The first cantos were written early, when the Civil War commenced, but we are immediately carried on to the death of Cromwell, at least fifteen years later, and have a sketch of public affairs to the dissolution of the Rump Parliament. The idea of a Presbyterian justice sallying out with his attendant, an Independent clerk, to redress superstition and correct abuses, is sufficiently preposterous, and the incredible extravagance is maintained by the dialogues between the parties, however witty and ludicrous; by their attack on the bear and the fiddle; their imprisonment in the stocks; the voluntary penance of whipping submitted to by the knight, and his adventures with his lady. The love of Hudibras is almost as outré as that of Falstaff, and he argues in the same manner for the utmost freedom; men having nothing but 'frail vows' to oppose to the stratagems of the fair. This kind of deliberate outrage on Puritanism was not peculiar to Butler, who makes his hero thus moralise:

For women first were made for men,
Not men for them: It follows, then,
That men have right to every one,
And they no freedom of their own;
And therefore men have power to choose,
But they no charter to refuse.
Hence 'tis apparent that, what course
Soe'er we take to your amours,
Though by the indirectest way,
'Tis no injustice nor foul play;
And that you ought to take that course
As we take you, for better or worse,
And gratefully submit to those
Who you, before another, chose.

The poem was left unfinished, but even King Charles's contemporaries would hardly have demanded much more of it. There is a plethora of wit in Hudibras, and an artificial terseness of thought and style which becomes oppressive and tiresome. After thirty or forty pages, the reader is fain to seek a change of subject or of occupation. But many of the short burlesque descriptions are inimitable. In the Morning—

The sun has long since, in the lap
Of Thetis, taken out his nap,
And, like a lobster boiled, the morn
From black to red began to turn.

At Night—

The sun grew low, and left the skies,
Put down, some write, by ladies' eyes;
The moon pulled off her veil of light,
That hides her face by day from sight—
Mysterious veil, of brightness made,
That's both her lustre and her shade—
And in the lantern of the night,
With shining horns hung out her light;
For darkness is the proper sphere,
Where all false glories use t' appear.
The twinkling stars began to muster,
And glitter with their borrowed lustre;
While sleep the wearied world relieved,
By counterfeiting death revived.

Many of the lines and similes in Hudibras are completely incorporated with the language—such as the opening lines of Part II. canto iii.:

Doubtless the pleasure is as great
Of being cheated as to cheat;

As lookers-on feel most delight
That least perceive a juggler's sleight;
And still the less they understand,
The more they admire his sleight-of-hand.

Or where, on the head of money, the knight asks:

For what in worth is anything,
But so much money as 'twill bring?

Accomplishments of Hudibras.

When civil dudgeon first grew high,
And men fell out, they knew not why:
When hard words, jealousies, and fears,
Set folks together by the ears,
And made them fight, like mad or drunk,
For Dame Religion as for punk;
Whose honesty they all durst swear for,
Though not a man of them knew wherefore:
When gospel-trumpeter, surrounded
With long-eared rout, to battle sounded,
And pulpit, drum ecclesiastic,
Was beat with fist, instead of a stick:
Then did Sir Knight abandon dwelling,
And out he rode a-colonelling.

A wight he was, whose very sight would
Entitle him mirror of knighthood;
That never bowed his stubborn knee
To anything but chivalry;
Nor put up blow, but that which laid
Right-worshipful on shoulder-blade:
Chief of domestic knights and errant,
Either for cartel or for warrant:
Great on the bench, great in the saddle,
That could as well bind o'er, as swaddle: cudgel
Mighty he was at both of these,
And styled of war as well as peace.
(So some rats, of amphibious nature,
Are either for the land or water.)
But here our authors make a doubt,
Whether he were more wise or stout;
Some hold the one, and some the other:
I ut howsoe'er they make a pother,
The difference was so small, his brain
Outweighed his rage but half a grain;
Which made some take him for a tool
That knaves do work with, called a fool.
For't has been held by many, that
As Montaigne, playing with his cat,
Complains she thought him but an ass,
Much more she would Sir Hudibras.
(For that's the name our valiant knight
To all his challenges did write.)
But they're mistaken very much;
'Tis plain enough he was no such:
We grant, although he had much wit,
He was very shy of using it;
As being loath to wear it out,
And therefore bore it not about,
Unless on holidays or so,
As men their best apparel do;
Beside, 'tis known he could speak Greek
As naturally as pigs squeak;
That Latin was no more difficile,
Than to a blackbird 'tis to whistle:
Being rich in both, he never scanted
His bounty unto such as wanted;

But much of either would afford
To many that had not one word,
For Hebrew roots, although they're found
To flourish most in barren ground,
He had such plenty as sufficed
To make some think him circumcised. . . .

He was in logic a great critic,
Profoundly skilled in analytic ;
He could distinguish, and divide
A hair 'twixt south and south-west side ;
On either which he would dispute,
Confute, change hands, and still confute ;
He 'd undertake to prove by force
Of argument a man's no horse ;
He 'd prove a buzzard is no fowl,
And that a lord may be an owl,
A calf an alderman, a goose a justice,
And rooks committee-men and trustees.
He 'd run in debt by disputation,
And pay with ratiocination :
All this by syllogism true
In mood and figure he would do.

For rhetoric, he could not ope
His mouth but out there flew a trope ;
And when he happened to break off
I' th' middle of his speech, or cough,
H' had hard words, ready to shew why,
And tell what rules he did it by :
Else, when with greatest art he spoke,
You 'd think he talked like other folk ;
For all a rhetorician's rules
Teach nothing but to name his tools.
But when he pleased to shew 't, his speech
In loftiness of sound was rich ;
A Babylonish dialect,
Which learned pedants much affect :
It was a party-coloured dress
Of patched and piebald languages ;
'Twas English cut on Greek and Latin,
Like fustian heretofore on satin.
It had an odd promiscuous tone,
As if he had talked three parts in one ;
Which made some think, when he did gabble,
Th' had heard three labourers of Babel ;
Or Cerberus himself pronounce
A leash of languages at once.
This he as volubly would vent
As if his stock would ne'er be spent ;
And truly, to support that charge,
He had supplies as vast and large :
For he could coin and counterfeit
New words, with little or no wit ;
Words so debased and hard, no stone
Was hard enough to touch them on :
And when with hasty noise he spoke 'em,
The ignorant for current took 'em ;
That had the orator, who once
Did fill his mouth with pebble-stones
When he harangued, but known his phrase,
He would have used no other ways.
In mathematics he was greater Than Tycho Brahe or Erra Pater,
For he by geometric scale
Could take the size of pots of ale ;
Resolve by sines and tangents straight
If bread or butter wanted weight ;

A Jewish doctor to whom various as-trophological works were ascribed.

And wisely tell what hour o' th' day
The clock did strike, by algebra.

His Religion.

For his religion, it was fit
To match his learning and his wit.
'Twas Presbyterian true-blue ;
For he was of that stubborn crew
Of errant saints, whom all men grant
To be the true church militant ;
Such as do build their faith upon
The holy text of pike and gun ;
Decide all controversy by Infallible artillery ;
And prove their doctrine orthodox
By apostolic blows and knocks ;
Call fire, and sword, and desolation,
A godly thorough reformation,
Which always must be carried on,
And still be doing, never done ;
As if religion were intended
For nothing else but to be mended ;
A sect whose chief devotion lies
In odd perverse antipathies ;
In falling out with that or this,
And finding somewhat still amiss ;
More peevish, cross, and splenetic,
Than dog distract or monkey sick ;
That with more care keep holiday
The wrong, than others the right way ;
Compound for sins they are inclined to,
By damning those they have no mind to.
Still so perverse and opposite,
As if they worshipped God for spite ;
The self-same thing they will abhor
One way, and long another for ;
Free-will they one way disavow,
Another, nothing else allow ;
All piety consists therein
In them, in other men all sin ;
Rather than fail, they will defy
That which they love most tenderly ;
Quarrel with minced pies, and disparage
Their best and dearest friend, plum-porridge ;
Fat pig and goose itself oppose,
And blaspheme custard through the nose.

distraught

His Outer Man.

His tawny beard was th' equal grace
Both of his wisdom and his face ;
In cut and dye so like a tile,
A sudden view it would beguile ;
The upper part thereof was whey,
The nether, orange, mixed with gray.
This hairy meteor did denounce
The fall of sceptres and of crowns ;
With grisly type did represent
Declining age of government ;
And tell with hieroglyphic spade
Its own grave and the state's were made.
Like Samson's heart-breakers, it grew love-locks
In time to make a nation rue ;
Though it contributed its own fall,
To wait upon the public downfall ;
It was monastic, and did grow
In holy orders by strict vow ;

Of rule as sullen and severe,
As that of rigid Cordelier ;
'Twas bound to suffer persecution,
And martyrdom with resolution ;
To oppose itself against the hate
And vengeance of th' incensed state,
In whose defiance it was worn,
Still ready to be pulled and torn ;
With red-hot irons to be tortured,
Reviled, and spit upon, and martyred ;
Maugre all which 'twas to stand fast
As long as monarchy should last ;
But when the state should hap to reel,
'Twas to submit to fatal steel,
And fall, as it was consecrate,
A sacrifice to fall of state ;
Whose thread of life the fatal Sisters
Did twist together with its whiskers,
And twine so close, that Time should never,
In life or death, their fortunes sever ;
But with his rusty sickle mow
Both down together at a blow. . . .

His doublet was of sturdy buff,
And though not sword, yet cudgel proof ;
Whereby 'twas fitter for his use,
Who feared no blows but such as bruise.
His breeches were of rugged woollen,
And had been at the siege of Bullen ;
To old king Harry so well known,
Some writers held they were his own ;
Through they were lined with many a piece
Of ammunition, bread and cheese,
And fat black-puddings, proper food
For warriors that delight in blood ;
For, as we said, he always chose
To carry victual in his hose,
That often tempted rats and mice
The ammunition to surprise ;
And when he put a hand but in
The one or t' other magazine,
They stoutly on defence on 't stood,
And from the wounded foe drew blood ;
And till they were stormed and beaten out,
Ne'er left the fortified redoubt ;
And though knights-errant, as some think,
Of old, did neither eat nor drink,
Because when thorough deserts vast
And regions desolate they passed,
Where belly-timber above ground,
Or under, was not to be found,
Unless they grazed, there 's not one word
Of their provision on record ;
Which made some confidently write
They had no stomachs but to fight.
'Tis false, for Arthur wore in hall
Round table like a farthingal ;
On which, with shirt pulled out behind,
And eke before, his good knights dined ;
Though 'twas no table some suppose,
But a huge pair of round trunk-hose,
In which he carried as much meat
As he and all the knights could eat ;
When laying by their swords and truncheons,
They took their breakfasts or their nuncheons.
But let that pass at present, lest
We should forget where we digressed,

Boulogne,
1544

As learned authors use, to whom
We leave it, and to th' purpose come.

His puissant sword unto his side,
Near his undaunted heart, was tied,
With basket-hilt that would hold broth,
And serve for fight and dinner both ;
In it he melted lead for bullets
To shoot at foes, and sometimes pullets,
To whom he bore so fell a grutch.
He ne'er gave quarter t' any such.
The trenchant blade, Toledo trusty,
For want of fighting, was grown rusty,
And ate into itself, for lack
Of somebody to hew and hack :
The peaceful scabbard where it dwelt,
The rancour of its edge had felt ;
For of the lower end two handful
It had devoured, 'twas so manful,
And so much scorned to lurk in case,
As if it durst not shew its face. . . .

This sword a dagger had, his page,
That was but little for his age ;
And therefore waited on him so
As dwarfs upon knights-errant do :
It was a serviceable dudgeon,
Either for fighting, or for drudging :
When it had stabbed, or broke a head,
It would scrape trenchers, or chip bread ;
Toast cheese or bacon, though it were
To bait a mouse-trap, would not care :
'Twould make clean shoes, and in the earth
Set leeks and onions, and so forth :
It had been 'prentice to a brewer, a hit at Cromwell
Where this and more it did endure,
But left the trade, as many more
Have lately done on the same score.

Butler was not the first to write politico-religious satire in burlesque somewhat of this kind ; Hudibrasms have been pointed out in Cleveland (see page 636), for example, and other wits and satirists. But the mirthfulness of Butler's matter, the trenchant point of his sarcasms, and his extraordinary mastery of those rough-and-tumble octosyllabic couplets gave him a unique position in our literature. His incredibly clever work is too uncouth to be called a classic ; but it has become a conspicuous, characteristic, and imperishable part of English literature. It was soon imitated on all hands : Welsh, Irish, Scottish, and even High and Low Dutch Hudibrases were routed out. In the next century there were over a score of noteworthy imitations ; and to this day inconvenient persons in Church and State, in society and literature, have been 'pummelled and pounded with Hudibrastic cudgels,' though never again with the skill and effect Butler had at command when his rough-hewn weapon was new.

After his death several spurious compilations of his other literary remains were issued (1716-20) ; but out of fifty pieces thus thrust upon the world only three were genuine, the rest being anonymous waifs and strays. At length, in 1759, two volumes of Remains in Verse and Prose were published from the original MSS. by Thyer. Next to the amusing verse satire on the Royal Society called The Elephant in the Moon, the most interesting of these relics are Characters in prose (edited in 1908 by A. R. Waller, with Passages from Notebooks).

Fragments from the 'Remains.'

The truest characters of ignorance
Are vanity, and pride, and arrogance ;
As blind men use to bear their noses higher
Than those that have their eyes and sight entire.

All wit and fancy, like a diamond,
The more exact and curious 'tis ground,
Is forced for every carat to abate
As much in value as it wants in weight.

Love is too great a happiness
For wretched mortals to possess ;
For could it hold inviolate
Against those cruelties of fate
Which all felicities below
By rigid laws are subject to,
It would become a bliss too high
For perishing mortality ;
Translate to earth the joys above ;
For nothing goes to heaven but love.

All love at first, like generous wine,
Ferments and frets until 'tis fine ;
For when 'tis settled on the lee,
And from the impurer matter free,
Becomes the richer still the older,
And proves the pleasanter the colder.
As at the approach of winter, all
The leaves of great trees use to fall,
And leave them naked, to engage
With storms and tempests when they rage,
While humbler plants are found to wear
Their fresh green liveries all the year ;
So when their glorious season 's gone
With great men, and hard times come on,
The great'st calamities oppress
The greatest still, and spare the less.

In Rome no temple was so low
As that of Honour, built to shew
How humble honour ought to be,
Though there 'twas all authority.

All smatterers are more brisk and pert
Than those that understand an art ;
As little sparkles shine more bright
Than glowing coals that give them light.

As 'tis a greater mystery in the art
Of painting to foreshorten any part
Than draw it out ; so 'tis in books the chief
Of all perfections to be plain and brief.

To his Mistress.

Do not unjustly blame
My guiltless breast,
For venturing to disclose a flame
It had so long suppress.
In its own ashes it designed
For ever to have lain ;
But that my sighs, like blasts of wind,
Made it break out again.

A Small Poet

Is one that would fain make himself that which nature never meant him ; like a fanatic that inspires himself with his own whimsies. He sets up haberdasher of small poetry, with a very small stock and no credit. He believes it is invention enough to find out other men's wit ; and whatsoever he lights upon either in books or company he makes bold with as his own. This he puts together so untowardly that you may perceive his own wit as the rickets by the swelling disproportion of the joints. . . . You may know his wit not to be natural, 'tis so unquiet and troublesome in him : for as those that have money but seldom are always shaking their pockets when they have it, so does he, when he thinks he has got something that will make him appear. He is a perpetual talker ; and you may know by the freedom of his discourse that he came lightly by it, as thieves spend freely what they get. . . . He is like an Italian thief, that never robs but he murders, to prevent discovery ; so sure is he to cry down the man from whom he purloins, that his petty larceny of wit may pass unsuspected. . . . He appears so over-concerned in all men's wits, as if they were but disparagements of his own ; and cries down all they do, as if they were encroachments upon him. He takes jests from the owners and breaks them, as justices do false weights and pots that want measure. When he meets with anything that is very good, he changes it into small money, like three groats for a shilling, to serve several occasions. He disclaims study, pretends to take things in motion, and to shoot flying, which appears to be very true, by his often missing of his mark. . . . As for epithets, he always avoids those that are near akin to the sense. Such matches are unlawful and not fit to be made by a Christian poet ; and therefore all his care is to choose out such as will serve, like a wooden leg, to piece out a maimed verse that wants a foot or two, and if they will but rhyme now and then into the bargain, or run upon a letter, it is a work of supererogation. For similitudes, he likes the hardest and most obscure best ; for as ladies wear black patches to make their complexions seem fairer than they are, so when an illustration is more obscure than the sense that went before it, it must of necessity make it appear clearer than it did ; for contraries are best set off with contraries. He has found out a new sort of poetical Georgics, a trick of sowing wit like clover-grass on barren subjects, which would yield nothing before. This is very useful for the times, wherein, some men say, there is no room left for new invention. He will take three grains of wit like the elixir, and, projecting it upon the iron age, turn it immediately into gold. All the business of mankind has presently vanished, the whole world has kept holiday ; there has been no men but heroes and poets, no women but nymphs and shepherdesses : trees have borne fritters, and rivers flowed plum-porridge. . . . When he writes, he commonly steers the sense of his lines by the rhyme that is at the end of them, as butchers do calves by the tail. For when he has made one line, which is easy enough, and has found out some sturdy hard word that will but rhyme, he will hammer the sense upon it, like a piece of hot iron upon an anvil, into what form he pleases. There is no art in the world so rich in terms as poetry ; a whole dictionary is scarce able to contain them ; for there is hardly a pond, a sheep-walk, or a gravel-pit in all Greece, but the ancient name of it is become a term of art in poetry. By this means, small poets have such a stock of able hard words lying by them, as dryades, hamadryades, aónides, fauni, nymphae, sylvani, &c. that signify nothing at all; and such a world of pedantic terms of the same kind, as may serve to furnish all the new inventions and 'thorough reformations' that can happen between this and Plato's great year. . . .

The Puritans were constantly contending for a 'thorough reformation' of the Church of England. The Platonic year or perfect year was a great cycle at the end of which all the heavenly bodies were supposed to be in the same relative places as at the Creation.

A Vintner

Hangs out his bush to shew he has not good wine; for that, the proverb says, needs it not. . . . He had rather sell bad wine than good, that stands him in no more; for it makes men sooner drunk, and then they are the easier over-reckoned. By the knaveries he acts above-board, which every man sees, one may easily take a measure of those he does underground in his cellar; for he that will pick a man's pocket to his face, will not stick to use him worse in private, when he knows nothing of it. . . . He does not only spoil and destroy his wines, but an ancient reverend proverb, with brewing and racking, that says, 'In vino veritas;' for there is no truth in his, but all false and sophisticated; for he can counterfeit wine as cunningly as Apelles did grapes, and cheat men with it, as he did birds. . . . He is an anti-Christian cheat, for Christ turned water into wine, and he turns wine into water. He scores all his reckonings upon two tables, made like those of the Ten Commandments, that he may be put in mind to break them as oft as possibly he can; especially that of stealing and bearing false witness against his neighbour, when he draws him bad wine, and swears it is good, and that he can take more for the pipe than the wine will yield him by the bottle—a trick that a Jesuit taught him to cheat his own conscience with. When he is found to over-reckon notoriously, he has one common evasion for all, and that is, to say it was a mistake; by which he means, that he thought they had not been sober enough to discover it; for if it had passed, there had been no error at all in the case.

A Prater

Is a common nuisance, and as great a grievance to those that come near him, as a pewterer is to his neighbours. His discourse is like the braying of a mortar, the more impertinent the more voluble and loud, as a pestle makes more noise when it is rung on the sides of a mortar, than when it stamps downright, and hits upon the business. A dog that opens upon a wrong scent will do it oftener than one that never opens but upon a right. He is as long-winded as a ventiduct, that fills as fast as it empties; or a trade-wind, that blows one way for half a year together, and another as long, as if it drew in its breath for six months, and blew it out again for six more. He has no mercy on any man's ears or patience that he can get within his sphere of activity, but tortures him, as they correct boys in Scotland, by stretching their lugs without remorse. He is like an earwig, when he gets within a man's ear he is not easily to be got out again. . . . He is a siren to himself, and has no way to escape shipwreck but by having his mouth stopped instead of his ears. He plays with his tongue as a cat does with her tail, and is transported with the delight he gives himself of his own making.

An Antiquary

Is one that has his being in this age, but his life and conversation is in the days of old. He despises the present age as an innovation, and slights the future; but has a great value for that which is past and gone, like the madman that fell in love with Cleopatra. . . . All his curiosities take place of one another according to their seniority, and he values them not by their abilities, but their standing. He has a great veneration for words that are stricken in years, and are grown so aged that they have outlived their employments. These he uses with a respect agreeable to their antiquity, and the good services they have done. . . . He is a great time-server, but it is of time out of mind, to which he conforms exactly, but is wholly retired from the present. His days were spent and gone long before he came into the world; and since, his only business is to collect what he can out of the ruins of them. He has so strong a natural affection to anything that is old, that he may truly say to dust and worms, 'You are my father,' and to rottenness, 'Thou art my mother. He has no providence nor foresight, for all his contemplations look backward upon the days of old, and his brains are turned with them, as if he walked backwards. He had rather interpret one obscure word in any old senseless discourse than be author of the most ingenious new one. . . . He values things wrongfully upon their antiquity, forgetting that the most modern are really the most ancient of all things in the world, like those that reckon their pounds before their shillings and pence, of which they are made up. He esteems no customs but such as have outlived themselves, and are long since out of use; as the Catholics allow of no saints but such as are dead, and the fanatics, in opposition, of none but the living.

Butler's Poetical Works were edited by Bell (3 vols. 1855), Brimley Johnson (2 vols. 1893); Iludibras, by A. R. Waller (1905).

Sir Roger L'Estrange (1616–1704) enjoyed in the reigns of Charles II. and James II. great notoriety as a political writer. A native of Hunstanton, Norfolk, he took up arms for the king in 1638, and in 1644 headed a conspiracy to seize the town of Lynn; but being captured, he was condemned to death, and in Newgate for almost four years constantly expected to be led forth to execution. He escaped by the connivance of the jailer, attempted a rising in Kent, then fled to Holland, but in 1653 was pardoned by Cromwell. On the eve of the Restoration he wrote vehemently in support of monarchy. In 1663 he published Considerations and Proposals in order to the Regulation of the Press, a pamphlet for which he was rewarded by being appointed licenser or censor of the press, and also by a grant of the sole privilege of printing and publishing news. As licenser he carried out his functions rigorously. In August 1663 appeared his newspaper The Public Intelligencer. From this time till a few years before his death he was constantly occupied in editing newspapers and writing pamphlets, mostly against Whigs and Dissenters, in support of the court, from which he at last received the honour of knighthood. In 1687 he prefixed to the third series of his paper called The Observer, A Brief History of the Times, relating chiefly to the Popish Plot. After the Revolution he lost his post, and was repeatedly imprisoned. As a controversialist L'Estrange was bold, lively, and vigorous, but coarse, impudent, and abusive. He is conspicuous in the history of journalism. (See G. Kitchin's Roger L'Estrange, 1913.) Johnson said he was the first writer who regularly engaged himself to support a party, right or wrong; and Defoe, Addison, and Steele accepted many useful hints from L'Estrange. He is known also as the translator of Æsop's Fables, Seneca's Morals (abridged), Cicero's Offices, Erasmus's Colloquies (a selection), Quevedo's Visions, several French novels of startling impropriety, Bona's Guide to Eternity (compiled from the Fathers), and the works of Josephus. The elder D'Israeli commented on the curiously familiar style of L'Estrange's Æsop. Ticknor thought his translation of Quevedo the most spirited, though it is hardly faithful or accurate: he altered the jokes to suit purely English contemporary conditions. Clarendon and Pepys praise his wit and conversation; Macaulay and Hallam denounce his style as 'a mean and flippant jargon' and 'the pattern of bad writing.' He was certainly copious, inexhaustible, and ready-witted, with a great power of raillery and vituperation, and wrote with ease and familiarity, making a free use of slang.

Much in the Æsop the Greek fabulist is in nowise responsible for, though it is too much to say, as some have said, that L'Estrange's version is a new work. Further, of the five hundred fables in the volume, only two hundred and one—not to speak of the copious 'reflexions'—are professedly Æsop's, the rest being from Phædrus, Babrius, Poggio, Alcianus, La Fontaine, and many less-known authors. L'Estrange was no doubt the sole original authority for some of them. The following is a chapter on the domestic milieu in which Æsop served as slave, from the Life prefixed to the Fables:

Æsop's Invention to bring his Mistress back again to her Husband after she had left him.

The wife of Xanthus was well born and wealthy, but so proud and domineering withal, as if her fortune and her extraction had entituled her to the breeches. She was horribly bold, meddling and expensive, as that sort of women commonly are, easily put off the hooks, and monstrous hard to be pleased again; perpetually chattering at her husband, and upon all occasions of controversy threatening him to be gone. It came to this at last, that Xanthus's stock of patience being quite spent, he took up a resolution of going another way to work with her, and of trying a course of severity, since there was nothing to be done with her by kindness. But this experiment, instead of mending the matter, made it worse; for upon harder usage the woman grew desperate, and went away from him in earnest. She was as bad, 'tis true, as bad might well be, and yet Xanthus had a kind of hankering for her still; beside that, there was matter of interest in the case; and a pestilent tongue she had, that the poor husband dreaded above all things under the sun. But the man was willing, however, to make the best of a bad game, and so his wits and his friends were set at work, in the fairest manner that might be, to get her home again. But there was no good to be done in 't, it seems; and Xanthus was so visibly out of humour upon 't, that Æsop in pure pity bethought himself immediately how to comfort him. Come, master (says he), pluck up a good heart, for I have a project in my noddle, that shall bring my mistress to you back again, with as good a will as ever she went from you. What does me Æsop, but away immediately to the market among the butchers, poulterers, fishmongers, confectioners, &c. for the best of everything that was in season. Nay he takes private people in his way too, and chops into the very house of his mistress's relations, as by mistake. This way of proceeding set the whole town a gog to know the meaning of all this bustle; and Æsop innocently told everybody that his master's wife was run away from him, and he had marry'd another; his friends up and down were all invited to come and make merry with him, and this was to be the wedding feast. The news flew like lightning, and happy were they that could carry the first tydings of it to the runaway lady—for everybody knew Æsop to be a servant in that family. It gathered in the rolling, as all other stories do in the telling, especially where women's tongues and passions have the spreading of them. The wife, that was in her nature violent and unsteady, ordered her chariot to be made ready immediately, and away she posts back to her husband; falls upon him with outrages of looks and language; and after the easing of her mind a little; No, Xanthus, says she, do not you flatter yourself with the hopes of enjoying another woman while I am alive. Xanthus look'd upon this as one of Æsop's masterpieces; and for that bout all was well again betwixt master and mistress.

How very far we have got from Æsop will be sufficiently plain from Fables ccccxviii. and cccxcix., even without premising that the 'Reflexion,' or moral, on the first discusses the 'political robbers' of these times, 'cabals of sharpers,' and the 'Committee of Safety;' while that on the second recites an illustrative story 'from the French farce.'

The Conscientious Thieves.

There was a knot of good fellows that borrow'd a small sum of money of a gentleman upon the king's high-way: when they had taken all they could find, Dam ye for a dog, says one of the gang, you have more money about you sirrah, some where or other. Lord, brother, says one of his companions, can't ye take the gentleman's money civilly, but you must swear and call names! As they were about to part, Pray by your favour gentlemen, says the traveller, I have so many miles to go, and not one penny in my pocket to bear my charges; you seem to be men of some honour, and I hope you'll be so good as only to let me have so much of my money back again, as will carry me to my journey's end. Ay, ay, the Lord forbid else, they cry'd, and so they open'd one of the bags, and bad him please himself. He took them at their word, and presently fetch'd out a handfull, as much as ever he could gripe. Why how now, says one of the blades, ye confounded son of a —, ha' ye no conscience?

The Trepanning Wolf.

There's a story of a man of quality in Ireland, that a little before the troubles there, had wall'd in a piece of ground for a park, and left only one passage into 't by a gate with a portcullis to 't. The Rebellion brake out, and put a stop to his design. The place was horribly pester'd with wolves; and his people having taken one of 'em in a pit-fall, chain'd him up to a tree in the enclosure; and then planted themselves in a lodge over the gate, to see what would come on 't. The wolf in a very short time fell a howling, and was answer'd by all his brethren thereabouts, that were within hearing of it; insomuch that the hubbub was immediately put about from one mountain to another, till a whole herd of 'em were gotten together upon the outcry; and so troup'd away into the park. They were no sooner in the pound, but down goes the portcullis, and away scamper the wolves to the gate, upon the noise of the fall on 't. When they saw that there was no getting out again where they came in, and that upon hunting the whole field over, there was no possibility of making an escape, they fell by consent upon the wolf that drew them in, and tore him all to pieces.

The following is an extract from the Brief History, of which the point is in the original emphasised to the eye not merely by the multiplication of capitals, but by the printing a large proportion of the whole in italics and black-letter :

The Popish Plot.

At the first opening of this plot, almost all people's hearts took fire at it, and nothing was heard but the bellowing of execrations and revenge against the accursed bloody Papists. It was imputed at first, and in the general, to the principles of the religion; and a Roman Catholique and a regicide were made one and the same thing. Nay, it was a saying frequent in some of our great and holy mouths, that they were confident there was not so much as one soul of the whole party, within his majesty's dominions, that was not either an actor in this plot, or a friend to 't. In this heat, they fell to picking up of priests and Jesuits as fast as they could catch 'em, and so went on to consult their oracles the witnesses (with all formalities of sifting and examining) upon the particulars of place, time, manner, persons, &c.; while Westminster Hall and the Court of Requests were kept warm, and ringing still of new men come in, corroborating proofs, and further discoveries, &c. Under this train and method of reasoning, the managers advanced, decently enough, to the finding out of what they themselves had laid and concerted beforehand; and, to give the devil his due, the whole story was but a farce of so many parts, and the noisy informations no more than a lesson that they had much ado to go through with, even with the help of diligent and careful tutors, and of many and many a prompter, to bring them off at a dead lift. But popery was so dreadfull a thing, and the danger of the king's life and of the Protestant religion so astonishing a surprize, that people were almost bound in duty to be inconsiderate and outrageous upon 't; and loyalty itself would have looked a little cold and indifferent if it had not been intemperate; insomuch that zeal, fierceness, and jealousy were never more excusable than upon this occasion. And now, having excellent matter to work upon, and the passions of the people already disposed for violence and tumult, there needed no more than blowing the coal of Oates's narrative, to put all into a flame; and in the meantime, all arts and accidents were improved, as well toward the entertainment of the humour, as to the kindling of it. The people were first hayred [hared, worried, frightened] out of their senses with tales and jealousies, and then made judges of the danger, and consequently of the remedy; which upon the main, and briefly, came to no more than this: The plot was laid all over the three kingdoms; France, Spain, and Portugal taxed their quotas to 't; we were all to be burnt in our beds, and rise with our throats cut; and no way in the world but exclusion and union to help us. The fancy of this exclusion spread immediately, like a gangrene, over the whole body of the monarchy; and no saving the life of his majesty without cutting off every limb of the prerogative: the device of union passed insensibly into a league of conspiracy; and, instead of uniting Protestants against Papists, concluded in an association of subjects against their sovereign, confounding policy with religion.

A poem on The Liberty of the Imprisoned Royalists, supposed to have been written by him when in Newgate in 1645, is ascribed to L'Estrange on no very convincing evidence. There are in it echoes from other Cavaliers, as will be seen from the following stanzas :

Beat on, proud billows! Boreas, blow!
Swell, curled waves, high as Jove's roof!
Your incivility shall shew
That innocence is tempest-proof.
Though surly Nereus frown, my thoughts are calm;
Then strike, Affliction, for thy wounds are balm.

That which the world miscalls a gaol,
A private closet is to me,
Whilst a good conscience is my bail,
And innocence my liberty.
Locks, bars, walls, leanness, though together met,
Make me no prisoner, but an anchorite. . . .

My soul is free as ambient air,
Although my baser parts be mew'd;
Whilst loyal thoughts do still repair
To company my solitude;
And though rebellion may my body bind,
My king can only captivate my mind.

Have you not seen the nightingale
A pilgrim coop'd into a cage,
And heard her tell her wonted tale,
In that her narrow hermitage?
Even then her charming melody doth prove
That all her bars are trees, her cage a grove.

I am the bird whom they combine
Thus to deprive of liberty;
But though they do my corps confine,
Yet, maugre hate, my soul is free;
And though I'm mew'd, yet I can chirp and sing,
Disgrace to rebels, glory to my king!

Walter Charleton, M.D. (1619-1707), born at Shepton Mallet, studied at Oxford, was physician to Charles I. and II., a friend of Hobbes, and senior censor 1698-1706 in the College of Physicians in London. He wrote many works on theology, natural history, natural philosophy, medicine, and antiquities. He was a disciple of Van Helmont, and his medical theories were as speculative as his arguments for the immortality of the soul. In his Chorea Gigantum (1663) he maintained the Danish origin of Stonehenge, in opposition to Inigo Jones, who still more absurdly believed it to be a Roman temple. Charleton held it was a place of assembly, and the scene of the coronation of the Danish kings of England. His Brief Discourse concerning the Different Wits of Men (1675) contains lively and accurate sketches of character, two of which we quote; and, anticipating the phrenologists, attributes the varieties of talent found among men to differences in the form, size, and quality of their brains.

The Ready and Nimble Wit.

Such as are endowed wherewith have a certain extemporary acuteness of conceit, accompanied with a quick delivery of their thoughts, so as they can at pleasure entertain their auditors with facetious passages and fluent discourses even upon slight occasions; but being generally impatient of second thoughts and deliberations, they seem fitter for pleasant colloquies and drollery than for counsel and design; like fly-boats, good only in fair weather and shallow waters, and then too more for pleasure than traffic. If they be, as for the most part they are, narrow in the hold and destitute of ballast sufficient to counterpoise their large sails, they reel with every blast of argument, and are often driven upon the sands of a 'nonplus;' but where favoured with the breath of common applause, they sail smoothly and proudly, and like the City pageants discharge whole volleys of squibs and crackers, and skirmish most furiously. But take them from their familiar and private conversation into grave and severe assemblies, whence all extemporary flashes of wit, all fantastic allusions, all personal reflections are excluded, and there engage them in an encounter with solid wisdom, not in light skirmishes, but a pitched field of long and serious debate concerning any important question, and then you shall soon discover their weakness, and condemn that barrenness of understanding which is incapable of struggling with the difficulties of apodictical knowledge, and the deduction of truth from a long series of reasons. Again, if those very concise sayings and lucky repartees wherein they are so happy, and which at first hearing were entertained with so much of pleasure and admiration, be written down and brought to a strict examination of their pertinency, coherence, and verity, how shallow, how frothy, how forced will they be found! how much will they lose of that applause, which their tickling of the ear and present flight through the imagination had gained! In the greatest part therefore of such men you ought to expect no deep or continued river of wit, but only a few plashes, and those too not altogether free from mud and putrefaction.

The Slow but Sure Wit.

Some heads there are of a certain close and reserved constitution, which makes them at first sight to promise as little of the virtue wherewith they are endowed, as the former appear to be above the imperfections to which they are subject. Somewhat slow they are indeed of both conception and expression; yet no whit the less provided with solid prudence. When they are engaged to speak, their tongue doth not readily interpret the dictates of their mind, so that their language comes as it were dropping from their lips, even where they are encouraged by familiar entreaties, or provoked by the smartness of jests, which sudden and nimble wits have newly darted at them. Costive they are also in invention; so that when they would deliver somewhat solid and remarkable, they are long in seeking what is fit, and as long in determining in what manner and words to utter it. But after a little consideration, they penetrate deeply into the substance of things and marrow of business, and conceive proper and emphatic words by which to express their sentiments. Barren they are not, but a little heavy and retentive. Their gifts lie deep and concealed; but being furnished with notions, not airy and umbratiled ones borrowed from the pedantism of the schools, but true and useful—and if they have been manured with good learning and the habit of exercising their pen—often-times they produce many excellent conceptions, worthy to be transmitted to posterity. Having, however, an aspect very like to narrow and dull capacities, at first sight most men take them to be really such, and strangers look upon them with the eyes of neglect and contempt. Hence it comes that excellent parts remaining unknown often want the favour and patronage of great persons, whereby they might be redeemed from obscurity, and raised to employments answerable to their faculties, and crowned with honours proportionate to their merits. The best course therefore for these to overcome that eclipse which prejudice usually brings upon them, is to contend against their own modesty, and either by frequent converse with noble and discerning spirits to enlarge the windows of their minds, and dispel those clouds of reservedness that darken the lustre of their faculties; or by writing on some new and useful subject to lay open their talent, so that the world may be convinced of their intrinsic value.

He wrote some of his things in Latin, translated from Latin into English, and rendered into Latin the Duchess of Northumberland's Life of her husband. Some thirty works are credited to him.

William Chamberlayne (1619–89) practised as a physician at Shaftesbury, but wielded the sword as well as the lancet, for he fought among the royalists at the second battle of Newbury. He complains keenly of the poverty of poets, and of being debarred from the society of the wits of his day. His works consist of Love's Victory, a Tragi-Comedy (1658), of which an altered form was acted in 1678; and Pharonnida, an Heroick Poem (1659). The scene of the first is laid in Sicily; that of Pharonnida chiefly in Greece. Pharonnida is the daughter of the King of the Morea; Argalia, a Christian warrior who had fought at Lepanto. They love at first sight; and jealous relations, rival suitors, Turks, bandits, sieges, abductions, imprisonment, poison, and amazing adventures innumerable fail to prevent the triumph of true love. With no light or witty verses to float him into popularity, and relying solely on his two long (and not seldom tedious) works, Chamberlayne was an unsuccessful poet. His works were almost totally forgotten when Campbell, in his Specimens (1819), by quoting largely from Pharonnida, and pointing out the 'rich breadth and variety of its scenes,' and the power and pathos of its characters and situations, drew attention to the passion, imagery, purity of sentiment, and tenderness of description, which lay, 'like metals in the mine,' in the neglected volume. Southey was an admirer. But Chamberlayne's beauties are marred by infelicity of execution; he had some of the gifts of a poet, but little of the skill of the artist, though parallels have been found in him both to Endymion and to Don Juan. The impossible names and the lack of local colour and vraisemblance irritate a modern reader. The rather awkward heroic couplet, the rather lumbering blank verse, wandered sometimes into a 'wilderness of sweets,' but at other times into tediousness, mannerism, and absurdity. His discontent with his own obscurity and poverty breaks out in a description of a rich boor in his (blank verse) play:

- How purblind is the world, that such a monster,
In a few dirty acres swaddled, must
Be mounted, in Opinion's empty scale,
Above the noblest virtues that adorn
- Souls that make worth their center, and to that Draw all the lines of action! Worn with age,
The noble soldier sits, whilst in his cell
The scholar stews his catholique brains for food.
The traveller, returned and poor, may go
A second pilgrimage to farmers' doors, or end
His journey in a hospital; few being
So generous to relieve, where virtue doth
Necessitate to crave. Harsh poverty,
That moth which frets the sacred robe of wit,
Thousands of noble spirits blunts, that else
Had spun rich threads of fancy from the brain:
But they are souls too much sublimed to thrive.

(From Act i. sc. 1.)

The leading thought of the splendid opening lines of Dryden's Religio Laici is anticipated in this dream from Pharonnida:

A strong prophetic dream,
Diverting by enigmas nature's stream,
Long hovering through the portals of her mind
On vain fantastic wings, at length did find
The glimmerings of obstructed reason, by
A brighter beam of pure divinity
Led into supernatural light, whose rays
As much transcended reason's, as the day's Dull mortal fires, faith apprehends to be
Beneath the glimmerings of divinity.
Her unimprisoned soul, disrobed of all Terrestrial thoughts (like its original
In heaven, pure and immaculate), a fit
Companion for those bright angels' wit
Which the gods made their messengers, to bear
This sacred truth, seeming transported where,
Fixed in the flaming centre of the world,
The heart o' th' microcosm, about which is hurled
The spangled curtains of the sky, within Whose boundless orbs the circling planets spin
Those threads of time upon whose strength rely
The ponderous burthens of mortality.
An adamant world she sees more pure,
More glorious far than this—framed to endure
The shock of doomsday's darts.

Chamberlayne, like Milton, was fond of describing the charms of morning. For example:

Where every bough
Maintained a feathered chorister to sing
Soft panegyrics, and the rude wings bring
Into a murmuring slumber, whilst the calm
Morn on each leaf did hang her liquid balm,
With an intent, before the next sun's birth,
To drop it in those wounds which the cleft earth
Received from last day's beams.

Of virgin purity he says:

The morning pearls,
Dropt in the lily's spotless bosom, are Less chastely cool, ere the meridian sun
Hath kissed them into heat.

In a grave narrative passage of Pharonnida, he stops to note the beauties of the morning:

The glad birds had sung
A lullaby to night; the lark was fled,
On dropping wings, up from his dewy bed,
To fan them in the rising sunbeams.

When commanded by her father to marry a neighbouring prince, Pharonnida soliloquises (Argalia being happily within earshot) thus:

'Is't a sin to be
Born high, that robs me of my liberty?
Or is't the curse of greatness to behold
Virtue through such false opticks as unfold
No splendour, 'less from equal orbs they shine?
What Heaven made free, ambitious men confine
In regular degrees. Poor Love must dwell
Within no climate but what's parallel
Unto our honored births; the envied fate
Of princes oft these burthens find from state,
When lowly swains, knowing no parent's voice
A negative, make a free happy choice.'
And here she sighed; then with some drops, distilled
From Love's most sovereign elixir, filled
The chrystal fountains of her eyes, which, ere Dropped down, she thus recalls again: 'But ne'er,
Ne'er, my Argalia, shall these fears destroy
My hopes of thee: Heaven! let me but enjoy
So much of all those blessings, which their birth
Can take from frail mortality; and Earth,
Contracting all her curses, cannot make
A storm of danger loud enough to shake
Me to a trembling penitence; a curse,
To make the horror of my suffering worse,
Sent in a father's name, like vengeance fell
From angry Heaven, upon my head may dwell
In an eternal stain—my honoured name
With pale disgrace may languish—busy fame
My reputation spot—affection be Termed uncommanded lust—sharp poverty,
That weed that kills the gentle flower of love,
As the result of all these ills, may prove
My greatest misery—unless to find Myself unpitied. Yet not so unkind
Would I esteem this mercenary band,
As those far more malignant powers that stand,
Armed with dissuasions, to obstruct the way
Fancy directs; but let those souls obey
Their harsh commands, that stand in fear to shed
Repentant tears: I am resolved to tread
Those doubtful paths, through all the shades of fear
That now benights them. Love! with pity hear

Thy suppliant's prayer, and when my clouded eyes
Shall cease to weep, in smiles I'll sacrifice
To thee such offerings, that the utmost date
Of Death's rough hands shall never violate.'

The Pharonnida was edited by Professor Saintsbury in Minor Poets of the Caroline Period (vol. i. 1905). In Campbell's Specimens of the British Poets there are twenty-four pages of extracts; and see two long articles in the Retrospective Review, vol. i. (1820).

Thomas Stanley (1625-78), the editor of Æschylus (1663), and author of a biographical History of Philosophy (4 vols. 1655-62), based mainly on Diogenes Laertius and Aristotle, published in 1651 his fourth volume of verse, in which his earlier pieces were also included. The only son of Sir Thomas Stanley, Knight, of Cumberlow, Hertfordshire, he was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford; spent several years in France; and afterwards lived in the Middle Temple. His poems, original and translated (Guiney edited his Original Lyrics, 1907; Bullen his Anacreon, 1906), display vigorous thought and graceful expression, though the conceits of his age disturb.

The Tomb.

When, cruel fair one, I am slain
By thy disdain,
And, as a trophy of thy scorn,
To some old tomb am borne,
Thy fetters must their power bequeath
To those of death;
Nor can thy flame immortal burn,
Like monumental fires within an urn:
Thus freed from thy proud empire, I shall prove
There is more liberty in death than love.

And when forsaken lovers come
To see my tomb,
Take heed thou mix not with the crowd,
And (as a victor) proud,
To view the spoils thy beauty made,
Press near my shade,
Lest thy too cruel breath or name
Should fan my ashes back into a flame,
And thou, devoured by this revengeful fire,
His sacrifice, who died as thine, expire.
But if cold earth, or marble, must Conceal my dust,
Whilst hid in some dark ruins, I,
Dumb and forgotten, lie,
The pride of all thy victory
Will sleep with me;
And they who should attest thy glory,
Will or forget or not believe this story.
Then to increase thy triumph, let me rest,
Since by thine eye slain, buried in thy breast.

The Loss.

Yet ere I go,
Disdainful Beauty, thou shalt be
So wretched as to know
What joys thou sling'st away with me.
A faith so bright,
As time or Fortune could not rust;
So firm that lovers might
Have read thy story in my dust,

And crowned thy name
With laurel verdant as thy youth
Whilst the shrill voice of Fame
Spread wide thy beauty and my truth.

This thou hast lost;
For all true lovers, when they find
That my just aims were crost,
Will speak thee lighter than the wind.

And none will lay
Any oblation on thy shrine,
But such as would betray
Thy faith to faiths as false as thine.

Yet, if thou choose
On such thy freedom to bestow,
Affection may excuse,
For love from sympathy doth flow.

The Deposition.

Though when I loved thee thou wert fair,
Thou art no longer so:
Those glories, all the pride they wear
Unto opinion owe.
Beauties like stars in borrowed lustre shine,
And 'twas my love that gave thee thine.

The flames that dwelt within thine eye
Do now with mine expire;
Thy brightest graces fade and die
At once with my desire.
Love's fires thus mutual influence return;
Thine cease to shine when mine to burn.

Then, proud Celinda, hope no more
To be implored or wooed;
Since by thy scorn thou dost restore
The wealth my love bestowed;
And thy despised disdain too late shall find
That none are fair but who are kind.

Mrs Katherine Phillips (1631-64), 'the matchless Orinda,' as she was called in her own time, was honoured with the praise of Cowley and Dryden, and Jeremy Taylor addressed to her a famous letter 'on the offices of friendship.' The daughter of a London merchant, she became in 1647 the wife of James Phillips of The Priory, Cardigan, whose father had married her own widowed mother, Mrs Fowler; and she divided her time between London and Cardigan, dying of small-pox in the former city. 'Orinda' was the name she chose for herself in a social and literary coterie of Antenors and Pakemons, of Celimenas and Rosanias, English contemporaries of the précieuses of the Hôtel Rambouillet. Most of the verses are addressed to her friends on special occasions; thus, 'To my Lady M. Cavendish chusing the name of Policrite;' there are a number on friendship, love, the soul, resignation, death, and like subjects; some on the politics of the day, and one on 'The Irish Greyhound' in praise of the old wolf-hound. Her poems were enshrined by Professor Saintsbury in his Minor Poets of the Caroline Period (vol. i. 1905).

Against Pleasure.

There's no such thing as pleasure here ;
 'Tis all a perfect cheat,
 Which does but shine and disappear,
 Whose charm is but deceit ;
 The empty bribe of yielding souls,
 Which first betrays, and then controuls.

'Tis true, it looks at distance fair ;
 But if we do approach,
 The fruit of Sodom will impair,
 And perish at a touch ;
 It being than in fancy less,
 And we expect more than possess.

For by our pleasures we are cloyed,
 And so desire is done ;
 Or else, like rivers, they make wide
 The channel where they run ;
 And either way true bliss destroys,
 Making us narrow, or our joys.

We covet pleasure easily,
 But it not so possess ;
 For many things must make it be,
 But one may make it less ;
 Nay, were our state as we could chuse it,
 'Twould be consumed by fear to lose it.

What art thou, then, thou winged air,
 More weak and swift than Fame,
 Whose next successor is Despair,
 And its attendant Shame ?
 The experience-prince then reason had
 Who said of Pleasure, 'It is mad.'

John Aubrey, antiquary and folklorist, was born at Easton Piercy, near Chippenham, Wilts, on 12th March 1626, and was educated at Malmesbury (under Robert Latimer, Hobbes's preceptor), Blandford, and Trinity College, Oxford. He entered the Middle Temple in 1646, but was never called to the Bar ; in 1652 he succeeded to his father's estates in Wiltshire, Herefordshire, and Wales, but was forced through lawsuits to part with the last of them in 1670, and with his very books in 1677. His later years were passed, 'in danger of arrests,' with Hobbes, Ashmole, Lady Long of Draycott in his native county, and other protectors, till in June 1697 he died at Oxford on his way from London to Draycott. His quaint, credulous Miscellanies (1696) was the only work printed in his lifetime ; but he left a large mass of materials. Of these, his Wiltshire and Surrey collections have in part been published ; his 'Minutes of Lives' (Hobbes, Milton, Bacon, &c.), given to Anthony Wood, appeared first in Bliss's Letters written by Eminent Persons (1813), but was first adequately edited by Andrew Clark as Brief Lives, chiefly of Contemporaries (2 vols. 1898). His Remains of Gentilism and Juduism was issued by the Folklore Society in 1880. See an article by Masson in the British Quarterly (1856) ; and 'Some Additions to Aubrey' in Cornhill (Dec. 1921 and Jan. 1922).

Dreams.

When Sir Christopher Wren was at Paris about 1671, he was ill and feverish, had a pain in his reins. He sent for a physitian, who advis'd him to be let blood, thinking he had a pleurisy : but bleeding much disagreeing with his constitution, he would defer it a day longer : that night he dreamt that he was in a place where palm-trees grew (suppose Egypt), and that a woman in a romantick habit reach'd him dates. The next day he sent for dates, which cured him of the pain in his reins.

Mr Winstanly (surveyor of the king's works) hath built a handsome house at Littlebury in Cambridgshire near Audely-Inn, where are to be seen several ingenious machines ; one whereof is thus : a wooden slipper finely carved lieth on the floor of a chamber about a yard and an half within the door, which the stranger is to take up (it comes up pretty stiff) and up starts a skeleton. J. H., Esq., had been there : and being at West-Lavington with the Earl of Abbingdon, dream'd December the 9th, that he was at Mr Winstanly's house, and took up the slipper, and up rose his mother in mourning : and anon the queen [Mary of Orange] appeared in mourning. He told his dream the next morning to my lord, and his lordship imparted it to me (then there). Tuesday Dec. 11 in the evening, came a messenger post from London to acquaint Mr H. that his mother was dangerously ill : he went to London the next day : his mother lived but about 8 days longer. On Saturday Dec. 15 the queen was taken ill, which turned to the small-pox, of which she died Decem. 28 about two a clock in the morning.

Apparitions.

Sir Walter Long of Draycot (grandfather of Sir James Long) had two wives ; the first a daughter of Sir — Packinton in Worcestershire ; by whom he had a son : his second wife was a daughter of Sir John Thinne of Longleat ; by whom he had several sons and daughters. The second wife did use much artifice to render the son by the first wife (who had not much Promethean fire) odious to his father ; she would get her acquaintance to make him drunk, and then expose him in that condition to his father ; in fine she never left off her attempts, till she had got Sir Walter to disinherit him. She laid the scene for the doing this at Bath at the assizes, where was her brother Sir Egrimond Thinne, an eminent serjeant at law, who drew the writing ; and his clerk was to sit up all night to engross it ; as he was writing, he perceived a shadow on the parchment, from the candle ; he look'd up, and there appear'd a hand, which immediately vanish'd ; he was startled at it, but thought it might be only his fancy, being sleepy ; so he writ on ; by and by a fine white-hand interposed between the writing and the candle (he could discern it was a woman's hand), but vanish'd as before ; I have forgot if it appeared a third time. But with that the clerk threw down his pen, and would engross no more, but goes and tells his master of it, and absolutely refused to do it. But it was done by somebody, and Sir Walter Long was prevailed with to seal and sign it. He lived not long after ; and his body did not go quiet to the grave, it being arrested at the church-porch by the trustees of the first lady. The heir's relations took his part, and commenc'd a suit against Sir Walter (the second son) and compell'd him to accept of a moiety of the estate ; so the eldest son kept South-Wranchester, and Sir Walter the second son Dracot Cernes, &c. This was about the middle of the reign of King James the First.

Anno. 1670, not far from Cyrencester, was an apparition: being demanded, whether a good spirit, or a bad? returned no answer, but disappeared with a curious perfume and most melodious twang. Mr W. Lilly believes it was a farie.

Mr. T. M. an old acquaintance of mine hath assured me, that about a quarter of a year after his first wives death, as he lay in bed awake with his little grand-child, his wife opened the closet-door, and came into the chamber to the bed-side, and looked upon him, and stooped down and kissed him; her lips were warm, he fancied they would have been cold. He was about to have embraced her, but was afraid it might have done him hurt. When she went from him, he asked her when he should see her again? She turned about and smil'd, but said nothing. The closet-door striked, as it uses to do, both at her coming in and going out. He had every night a great coal-fire in his chamber, which gave a light as clear almost as a candle (he was hypocondrical). He marry'd two wives since; the later end of his life was uneasie.

Impulses.

Oliver Cromwel had certainly this afflatus. One that I knew, that was at the battle of Dunbar, told me that Oliver was carried on with a divine impulse: he did laugh so excessively as if he had been drunk; his eyes sparkled with spirits. He obtained a great victory; but the action was said to be contrary to human prudence. The same fit of laughter seiz'd Oliver Cromwel just before the battle of Naseby; as a kinsman of mine, and a great favourite of his, Colonel J. P. then present, testifi'd. Cardinal Mazerine said, that he was a lucky fool.

Mirandum.

Arise Evans had a fungous nose, and said it was reveal'd to him that the king's hand would cure him: and at the first coming of King Charles II. into St James's Park he kiss'd the king's hand, and rubb'd his nose with it; which disturb'd the king, but cured him. Mr Ashmole told me.

John Hales.

He had a noble librarie of bookes, and those judiciously chosen, which cost him . . . li. (quaere Mr Sloper); and which he sold to Cornelius Bee, bookeseller, in Little Britaine (as I take it, for 1000 li.), which was his maintenance after he was ejected out of his fellowship at Eaton College. He had then only reserved some few for his private use, to wind-up his last dayes withall.

The ladie Salter (neer Eaton) was very kind to him after the sequestration; he was very welcome to her ladyship, and spent much of his time there. At Eaton he lodged (after his sequestration) at the next house to the Christopher inne, where I sawe him, a prettie little man, sanguine, of a cheerfull countenance, very gentle, and courteous; I was relieved by him with much humanity: he was in a kind of violet-colour'd cloth gowne, with buttons and loopes (he wore not a black gowne), and was reading Thomas à Kempis; it was within a yeare before he deceased. He loved canarie; but moderately, to refresh his spirits.

He had a bountifull mind. I remember in 1647, a little after the visitation, when Thomas Mariett, esq., Mr William Radford, and Mr Edward Wood (all of Trinity College) had a frolique from Oxon to London, on foot, having never been there before, they happened to take Windsore in their way, made their addresse to this good gentleman, being then fellow. Mr Edward Wood was the spookes-man, remonstrated that they were Oxon scholars: he treated them well, and putt into Mr Wood's hands ten shillings.

He lies buried in the church yard at Eaton, under an altar monument of black marble, erected at the sole charge of Mr . . . Curwyn, with a too long epitaph. He was no kiff or kin to him.

Mr John Hales dyed at Mrs Powney's house, a widow-woman, in Eaton, opposite to the churchyard, adjoining to the Christopher Inne southwards. 'Tis the howse where I sawe him.

She is a very good woman and of a gratefull spirit. She told me that when she was married, Mr Hales was very bountifull to them in helping them to live in the world. She was very gratefull to him and respectfull to him.

She told me that Mr Hales was the common godfather there, and 'twas pretty to see, as he walked to Windsor, how his godchildren asked him blessing. When he was bursar, he still gave away all his groates for the acquittances to his godchildren; and by that time he came to Windsor bridge, he would have never a groate left.

William Harvey.

He was not tall; but of the lowest stature, round faced, olivaster complexion; little eie, round, very black, full of spirit; his haire was black as a raven, but quite white 20 yeares before he dyed.

I first sawe him at Oxford, 1642, after Edgehill fight, but was then too young to be acquainted with so great a doctor. I remember he came severall times to Trin. Coll. to George Bathurst, B.D., who had a hen to hatch egges in his chamber, which they dayly opened to discerne the progres and way of generation. I had not the honour to be acquainted with him till 1651, being my cosen Montague's physitian and friend. I was at that time bound for Italy (but to my great grieve dissuaded by my mother's importunity). He was very communicative, and willing to instruct any that were modest and respectfull to him. And in order to my journey, gave me [dictated to me] what to see, what company to keepe, what bookes to read, how to manage my studies: in short, he bid me goe to the fountain head, and read Aristotle, Cicero, Avicenna, and did call the neoteriques . . . He wrote a very bad hand, which (with use) I could pretty well read.

I have heard him say, that after his booke of the circulation of the blood came-out, that he tell mightily in his practize, and that 'twas beleev'd by the vulgar that he was crack-brained; and all the physitians were against his opinion, and envyed him; many wrote against him, as Dr Primige, Paracisanus, etc. (vide Sir George Ent's booke). With much adoe at last, in about 20 or 30 yeares time, it was recieved in all the universities of the world; and, as Mr Hobbes sayes in his book De Corpore, he is the only man, perhaps, that ever lived to see his owne doctrine established in his life time.

He understood Greek and Latin pretty well, but was no critique, and he wrote very bad Latin. The Circuitus Sanguinis was, as I take it, donne into Latin by Sir George

Ent (quaere), as also his booke De Generatione Animalium, but a little book in 12mo against Riolani (I thinke), wherein he makes out his doctrine clearer, was writt by himselfe, and that, as I take it, at Oxford.

His majestie king Charles I. gave him the wardenship of Merton Colledge in Oxford, as a reward for his service, but the times suffered him not to recieve or enjoy any benefitt by it.

He was physitian, and a great favorite of the Lord High Marshall of England, Thomas Howard, earle of Arundel and Surrey, with whom he travelled as his physitian in his ambassade to the Emperor . . . at Vienna, Anno Domini 163-. Mr W. Hollar (who was then one of his excellencie's gentlemen) told me that, in his voyage, he would still be making of excursions into the woods, makeing observations of strange trees, and plants, earths, etc., naturalls, and sometimes like to be lost, so that my lord ambassador would be really angry with him, for there was not only danger of thieves, but also of wild beasts.

He was much and often troubled with the gowte, and his way of cure was thus; he would then sitt with his legges bare, if it were frost, on the leads of Cockaine house, putt them into a payle of water, till he was almost dead with cold, and betake himselfe to his stove, and so 'twas gone.

He was hott-headed, and his thoughts working would many times keepe him from sleepeing; he told me that then his way was to rise out of his bed and walke about his chamber in his shirt till he was pretty coole, i.e. till he began to have a horror, and then returne to bed, and sleepe very comfortably.

I remember he was wont to drinke coffee; which he and his brother Eliab did, before coffee-houses were in fashion in London.

Anthony Wood, or A WOOD (1632-95), was born at Oxford, studied at Merton College, and being of independent means, devoted himself to heraldry and antiquarian studies, and lived mostly in Oxford. His History of Oxford the delegates of the university press had translated into Latin as Historia et Antiquitates Universitatis Oxoniensis (1674). Wood was ill-satisfied with the translation, and made a new copy of his English MS., which was long after published in 1786-96. His great Athenæ Oxonienses was a history of all the writers and bishops who had been educated in Oxford from 1500 to 1690, together with the Fasti or Annals for the said time (1691-92). Other works were The Ancient and Present State of the City of Oxford (1773) and the ill-natured Modius Salium, a Collection of Pieces of Humour (1751). He was laborious in research, but did not generously acknowledge help received from Aubrey and others. He was peevish in temper, and seemed to welcome spiteful stories. A third volume of the Athenæ was included in the second edition printed by Tonson (1721). The third edition is that by Philip Bliss (1813-20); a projected fourth by him reached only the first volume, containing Wood's Life and Times, an autobiography (1848). This last was edited in 1892-1900 by Mr Andrew Clark for the Oxford Historical Society as vols. i.-v. of a complete edition of Wood's works.

From the 'Life and Times.'

An. Dom. 1632 (Dec. 17).—Anthony Wood or à Wood, son of Tho. Wood or à Wood, bachelaur of arts and of the civil law, was borne in an antient stone-house, opposite to the forefront of Merton coll. in the collegiat parish of S. John Baptist de Merton, situat and being within the city and universitie of Oxford, on munday the seventeenth day of December (S. Lazarus day) at about 4 of the clock in the morning: which stone-house, with a backside and garden adjoyning, was bought by his father of John Lant, master of arts of the univ. of Oxon, 8 December, 6 Jac. I. Dom. 1608, and is held by his family of Merton coll. before mention'd.

An. Dom. 1633.—He was altogether nursed by his mother (of whome shal be mention made under the yeare 1666) and by none else. For as she nursed his 3 elder brothers, so she nursed him (whom she found very quiet) and the two next that followed.

An. Dom. 1637.—He was put to school to learne the Psalter. And about that time playing before the dore of his father's house, neare Merton coll, one of the horses, called Mutton, belonging to Tho. Edgerley, the university carrier, rode over him (as he was going to be watered) and bruis'd his head very much. This caused a great heaviness for some time after in his head, and perhaps a slowness in apprehending with quickness things that he read or heard; of which he was very sensible, when he came to reason.

An. Dom. 1638.—In the beginning of this yeare his eldest brother Thomas Wood (who was borne at Tetsworth in Oxfordshire) became one of the students of Christ Church, by the favour of Dr. Tho. Iles, he being then 14 yeares of age.

An. Dom. 1639.—He was in his Bible, and ready to go into his Accedence.

(Mar. 8).—His yonger brother John Wood died, and was buried the day following in Merton coll. church.

An. Dom. 1640.—He was put to a Latine school in a little house, neare to the church of S. Peter in the Baylie, and opposite to the street, called the North Baylie, which leads from New Inn to the Bocherew. The name of his master he hath forgot, but remembers, that he was master of arts and a preacher, by a good token, that one of the beades of the universitie did come with his silver staff to conduct him from the said little house (a poore thing God wot) to the church of S. Marie, there to preach a Latin sermon he thinks (for it was on a working or school day) before the universitie.

An. Dom. 1641.—He was translated to New coll. schoole, situated between the West part of the chappell and E. part of the cloyster, by the advice, as he usually conceived, of some of the fellowes of the said coll. who usually frequented his father's house. One John Maylard, fellow of the said coll., was then, or at least lately, the master (afterwards rector of Stanton S. John neare Oxon.), and after him succeeded Joh. Davys, one of the chaplaynes of the said house, whome he well remembers to be a quiet man.

His grandmother Penelope, the widdow of capt. Rob. Pettie or Le Petite gent. (his mother's father), died with grief at or neare Charlemount in Ireland, the seat of her nephew William viscount Caulfield, occasion'd by the barbarous usuage of her intimate acquaintance (but a bigotted Papist) Sr. Philim O Neale, who acted the part of an arch-traytor and rebell, when the grand rebellion broke out in that kingdome 23. October. 1641. . . .

An. Dom. 1642.—Upon the publication of his majestie's proclamation, for the suppressing of the rebellion under the conduct and command of Robert earl of Essex, the members of the universitie of Oxon. began to put themselves in a posture of defence, and especially for another reason, which was, that there was a strong report, that divers companies of soldiers [were] passing thro' the country, as sent from London by the parliament for the securing of Banbury and Warwick. Dr. Pink of New coll. the deputy-vice-chancellour, called before him to the public schooles all the privileged men's armes, to have a view of them: where not onlie privileged men of the universitie and their servants, but also many scholars appeared, bringing with them the furniture of armes of every col. that then had any. Mr. Wood's father had then armour or furniture for one man, viz. a helinet, a back and breast-piece, a pyke and a musquet, and other appurtenances: And the eldest of his men-servants (for he had then three at least) named Thomas Burnham, did appeare in those armes, when the scholars and privileged men trained; and when he could not train, as being taken up with business, the next servant did traine: and much adoe there was to keep Thomas, the eldest son, then a student of Chr. Ch. and a youth of about 18 yeares of age, from putting on the said armour and to traine among the scholars. The said scholars and privileged men did sometimes traine in New coll. quadrangle, in the eye of Dr. Rob. Pink, the dep. vicechancellour, then warden of the said coll. And it being a novel matter, there was no holding of the school-boys in their school in the cloyster from seeing and following them. And Mr. Wood remembered well, that some of them were so besotted with the training and activitie and gaytie therein of some yong scholars, as being in a longing condition to be of the traine, that they could never be brought to their books againe. It was a great disturbance to the youth of the citie, and Mr. Wood's father foresaw, that if his sons were not removed from Oxon. they would be spoyle'd.

(Oct. 23).—The great fight at Edghill in Warwickshire, called Keynton-battle, between the armies of K. Ch. I. and his parliament was began.

(Oct. 29).—Upon the first newes at Oxon. that the armies were going to fight, Mr. Wood's eldest brother Thomas, before mention'd, left his gowne at the Town's end, ran to Edghill, did his Majestie good service, return'd on horseback well accountred, and afterwards was made an officer in the king's army.

An. Dom. 1653.—After he had spent the Summer at Cassington in a lonish and retir'd condition, he return'd to Oxon., and being advised by some persons, he entertain'd a master of musick to teach him the usual way of playing on the violin, that is, by having every string tuned 5 notes lower than the other going before. The master was Charles Griffith, one of the musitians belonging to the city of Oxon. whom he thought then to be a most excellent artist, but when A. W. improv'd himself in that instrument, he found him not so. He gave him 2s. 6d. entrance, and 10s. quarterly. This person after he had extreemly wondred how he could play so many tunes as he did by fourths, without a director or guide, he then tuned his violin by fifths, and gave him instructions how to proceed, leaving then a lesson with him to practice against his next coming.

The last yeare, after he was entred into the publick library (which he took to be the happiness of his life, and into which he never entred without great veneration) he could do but little in it, because he was entred but a little while before his ague took him. But this yeare being a constant student therein, he became acquainted with the places in the arts library, (for no farther could bachelours of arts then goe,) where the books of English historie and antiquities stand. He lighted upon The Description of Leicestershire, written by Will. Burton: and being exceedingly delighted with the performance, he did this or in the yeare following, take notes thence, and make collections from it, which he had lying by him in his last dayes. He took great delight in reading The Display of Heraldry, written by John Guillim, and in other books of that faculty, written by Joh. Bossewell, John Ferne, &c., and endeavour'd to draw out and trick armes with his pen. And afterwards when he came to full yeares, he perceived it was his natural genie, and could not avoid them. Heraldry, musick and painting did so much crowd upon him, that he could not avoid them; and could never give a reason why he should delight in those studies, more than in others, so prevalent was nature, mix'd with a generosity of mind, and a hatred to all that was servile, sneaking or advantagious for lucre sake. His brother Edw. Wood was much against these studies, and advised him to enter on those that were beneficial, as his mother did. He had then a gentle companion of the same coll. (J. W.) who delighted in vertuous studies as he did, and would walk several times with him in shady recesses and retired walkes, to each others content; but the same J. W. being a gent. of a good descent, and an heir to an estate of 700l. per an. at least, he went afterwards to London, mixed himself with idle company that flatter'd and admired him, and at length debach'd him; which did not a little rouble A. W.

An. Dom. 1658 (Aug. 30).—Munday, a terrible raging wind hapned, which did much hurt. Dennis Bond, a great Olivarian and anti-monarchist, died on that day, and then the Devil took Bond for Oliver's appearance.

(Sept. 3).—Oliver Cromwell the protector died. This I set downe, because some writers tell us, that he was hurried away by the Devill in the wind before mention'd.

(Sept. 6).—Richard Cromwell his son was proclaimed protector at Oxon. at the usual places where kings have been proclaimed. While he was proclaiming before S. Marie's church dore, the mayor, recorder, townclerk, &c., accompanied by col. Unton Croke and his troopers, were pelted with carret and turnip-tops, by yong scholars, and others, who stood at a distance.

Bulstrode Whitelocke (1605–75), the son of a judge, and himself an eminent lawyer, was bred at St John's College, Oxford, and the Middle Temple. His Memorials of English Affairs from the beginning of the reign of Charles I. to the Restoration mirror the times from a point of view opposite to that of Lord Clarendon, though, like Selden and other moderate anti-royalists, he was averse to a civil war. He was chairman of the committee which managed Strafford's prosecution. As a member of Parliament, and one of the commissioners appointed to treat with the king at Oxford, he advocated pacific measures; and being an enemy to arbitrary power both in Church and State, he in the Westminster Assembly refused to admit the divine right of presbytery. Under Cromwell he held several high appointments, and during the government of the Protector's son Richard, acted as one of the keepers of the great seal. At the Restoration he retired to his Wiltshire estate of Chilton. The Memorials were not intended for publication, and, written almost wholly in the form of a diary, are to be regarded rather as a collection of historical materials than as history itself. A mutilated edition of them appeared in 1682, a much more satisfactory one in 1732. In a posthumous volume of Essays, Ecclesiastical and Civil, he strongly advocates religious toleration. His Journal of his embassy in 1653 to Sweden was edited by H. Reeve (1855). See his Memoirs by Professor R. H. Whitlocke (1860).

Thomas Rymer (1641–1713), born at Yafforth Hall, Northallerton, was the son of a Roundhead gentleman hanged at York in 1664. Having studied at Sidney Sussex, Cambridge, and at Gray's Inn, he published translations, critical discussions on poetry, dramas, and works on history, and in 1692 was appointed historiographer royal. He is remembered as compiler of the invaluable collection of historical materials known as the Fœdera, extending from the eleventh century to his own time (vols. i.–xv. in 1704–13; continuation by Sanderson in vols. xvi.–xx. in 1715–35). His principal critical work is The Tragedies of the Last Age Considered (1678), in virtue of which Pope considered him 'one of the best critics we ever had;' Macaulay, 'the worst critic that ever lived.' Dryden, who wrote the 'heads of an answer to Rymer,' treated with great respect 'this excellent critique,' but stated a case for the English poets against the Greek. Rymer's classical prejudices made him view modern English poetry and drama with jaundiced eye. Paradise Lost, 'which some are pleased to call a poem,' pleased him more, however, than Othello, 'a bloody farce without salt or savour.' His own poems are inconsiderable—verses to the memory of Waller, a poem on Queen Mary's arrival, and a few amorous ditties.

Sir William Temple (1628–99), diplomatist and essay-writer, was the son of Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls in Ireland, but was born in London. He studied at Cambridge under Cudworth as tutor, but being intended for public life, devoted his attention chiefly to French and Spanish, and at nineteen went abroad for some years. He had ere this fallen in love with Dorothy Osborne (1627–95), whose father, Sir Peter, a strong royalist, disliked the match—for Temple's father sat in the Long Parliament. But the lovers were constant in their affection, and their seven years of separation gave occasion for Dorothy's delightful letters. Temple married her in 1655, lived in Ireland, and was returned to the Irish Parliament for Carlow in 1660. On his removal two years afterwards to England, the introductions which he carried to leading statesmen speedily procured him employment in the diplomatic service. He was sent in 1665 on a secret mission to the Bishop of Münster, and on his return he was made a baronet and appointed English resident at the court of Brussels. Temple's great diplomatic success was the negotiation at the Hague in 1668, with the Grand Pensionary De Witt, of the famous Triple Alliance between England, Holland, and Sweden, by which the ambition of Louis XIV. was for a time effectually checked. He took part in the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle (1668), and as ambassador at the Hague, enjoyed for a year the intimacy of De Witt, and also of his strenuous opponent, the young Prince of Orange, afterwards William III. of England. Recalled in 1669, he retired from public business to his residence at Sheen, near Richmond, and there employed himself in literary occupations and gardening. In 1674, again ambassador to Holland, he contributed to bring about the marriage of the Prince of Orange with the Duke of York's eldest daughter, Mary (1677). Having finally returned to England in 1679, Temple refused the king's offer of a Secretaryship of State. Charles used to hold anxious conferences with Temple on the means of extricating himself from the embarrassments created by a long course of misgovernment; and Sir William advised the appointment of a privy-council of thirty persons, in conformity with whose advice the king should always act. Temple, who was himself for a time one of an inner council of four (with Halifax, Essex, and Sunderland), soon became disgusted with the policy in vogue and the constant intrigues, and in 1681 finally retired from public life. He spent the remainder of his days chiefly at Moor Park, near Farnham, in Surrey, so called by him after the other Moor Park, a seat of the Bedford family near Rickmansworth in Herts—'the sweetest place that I have seen in my life either before or since, at home or abroad.' He has left a description of the Herts garden in a famous essay, quoted below. At Moor Park, Temple had for secretary and humble companion the famous Jonathan Swift, who retained no very agreeable recollection of that period of dependence and obscurity. There also resided one with whom Swift is indissolubly associated—Esther Johnson, immortalised as 'Stella,' the daughter of Temple's housekeeper.

After the Revolution King William sometimes visited Temple and sought his advice about public affairs. Throughout his whole career his conduct was marked by a cautious regard for his personal comfort and reputation, which strongly disposed him to avoid risks of every kind, and to stand aloof from public business where special courage or decision was required; he seems to have had a lively consciousness that neither his abilities nor dispositions fitted him for vigorous action in stormy times; but as an adviser he was enlightened, safe, and sagacious. In character Sir William was estimable and decorous; his temper, naturally haughty, was generally kept in order; and among his foibles, vanity was the most prominent.

The works of Sir William Temple consist chiefly of short miscellaneous pieces. His longest disquisition is Observations upon the United Provinces of the Netherlands, composed during his first retirement at Sheen; and both this and his Essay on the Original and Nature of Government show his gift as an observer and describer. Besides several political tracts, he wrote essays entitled Miscellanea (1680-92), which became famous, on Ancient and Modern Learning, on Gardening, Heroic Virtue, Poetry, Popular Discontents, Health and Long Life, and other miscellaneous subjects. Though his philosophy was not very profound nor his intellectual power great, his Miscellanea contain many sound and acute observations, expressed in an easy and perspicuous style. Dr Johnson said 'Sir William Temple was the first writer who gave cadence to English prose: before his time, they were careless of arrangement, and did not mind whether a sentence ended with an important word or an insignificant word, or with what part of speech it was concluded.' This is hardly fair to Ben Jonson, to Bishop Hall, Cowley, and Jeremy Taylor. But even Dryden, Halifax, and Tillotson are hardly so modern as Temple, who may fairly rank as the forerunner of the eighteenth-century essayist. His Letters are many of them admirable. The three following extracts are from the Miscellanea:

English Gardening and the English Climate.

But after so much ramble into ancient times and remote places, to return home and consider the present way and humour of our gardening in England; which seem to have grown into such vogue, and to have been so mightily improved in three or four and twenty years of his Majesty's reign, that perhaps few countries are before us, either in the elegance of our gardens, or in the number of our plants; and, I believe, none equals us in the variety of fruits, which may be justly called good; and from the earliest cherry and strawberry, to the last apples and pears, may furnish every day of the circling year. For the taste and perfection of what we esteem the best, I may truly say that the French, who have eaten my peaches and grapes at Shene in no very ill year, have generally concluded that the last are as good as any they have eaten in France on this side Fountainbleau; and the first as good as any they have eat in Gascony; I mean those which come from the stone, and are properly called peaches, not those which are hard, and are termed paves; for these cannot grow in too warm a climate, nor ever be good in a cold; and are better at Madrid than in Gascony itself: Italians have agreed my white figs to be as good as any of that sort in Italy, which is the earlier kind of white fig there; for in the latter kind and the blue we cannot come near the warm climates, no more than in the Frontignac or Muscat grape.

My orange-trees are as large as any I saw when I was young in France, except those of Fountainbleau, or what I have seen since in the Low Countries, except some very old ones of the Prince of Orange's; as laden with flowers as any can well be, as full of fruit as I suffer or desire them, and as well tasted as are commonly brought over, except the best sorts of Sevil and Portugal. And thus much I could not but say, in defence of our climate, which is so much and so generally decried abroad, by those who never saw it; or, if they have been here, have yet perhaps seen no more of it than what belongs to inns, or to taverns and ordinaries; who accuse our country for their own defaults, and speak ill, not only of our gardens and houses, but of our humours, our breeding, our customs and manners of life, by what they have observed of the meaner and baser sort of mankind; and of company among us, because they wanted themselves perhaps either fortune or birth, either quality or merit, to introduce them among the good.

I must needs add one thing more in favour of our climate which I heard the king say, and I thought new and right, and truly like a king of England that loved and esteemed his own country; 'twas in reply to some of the company that were reviling our climate, and extolling those of Italy and Spain, or at least of France. He said he thought that was the best climate where he could be abroad in the air with pleasure, or at least without trouble and inconvenience, the most days of the year and the most hours of the day; and this he thought he could be in England more than in any country he knew of in Europe. And I believe it true, not only of the hot and the cold, but even among our neighbours of France and the Low Countries themselves, where the heats or the colds and changes of the seasons are less treatable than they are with us.

The truth is, our climate wants no heat to produce excellent fruits; and the default of it is only the short seasons of our heats or summers, by which many of the later are left behind and imperfect with us. But all such as are ripe before the end of August are, for aught I know, as good with us as anywhere else. This makes me esteem the true region of gardens in England to be the compass of ten miles about London, where the accidental warmth of air from the fires and steams of so vast a town, makes fruits as well as corn a great deal forwarder than in Hampshire or Wiltshire, though more southward by a full degree.

There are, besides the temper of our climate, two things particular to us that contribute much to the beauty and elegance of our gardens, which are the gravel of our walks, and the fineness and almost perpetual greenness of our turf. The first is not known anywhere else, which leaves all their dry walks in other countries very unpleasant and uneasy. The other cannot be found in France or in Holland, as we have it, the soil not admitting that fineness of blade in Holland, nor the sun that greenness in France, during most of the summer; nor, indeed, is it to be found but in the finest of our soils.

Moor Park Garden.

The perfectest figure of a garden I ever saw, either at home or abroad, was that of Moor-Park in Hertfordshire, when I knew it about thirty years ago. It was made by the Countess of Bedford, esteemed among the greatest wits of her time, and celebrated by Doctor Donne; and with very great care, excellent contrivance, and much cost; but greater sums may be thrown away without effect or honour, if there want sense in proportion to money, or if nature be not followed; which I take to be the great rule in this, and perhaps in every thing else, as far as the conduct not only of our lives, but our governments. And whether the greatest of mortal men should attempt the forcing of nature may best be judged, by observing how seldom God Almighty does it himself, by so few, true, and undisputed miracles as we see or hear of in the world. For my own part, I know not three wiser precepts for the conduct either of princes or private men, than —*Servare modum, finemque tueri,

Naturamque sequi.*

Because I take the garden I have named to have been in all kinds the most beautiful and perfect, at least in the figure and disposition, that I have ever seen, I will describe it for a model to those that meet with such a situation, and are above the regards of common expence. It lies on the side of a hill (upon which the house stands), but not very steep. The length of the house, where the best rooms and of most use or pleasure are, lies upon the breadth of the garden; the great parlour opens into the middle of a terras gravel-walk that lies even with it, and which may be, as I remember, about three hundred paces long, and broad in proportion; the border set with standard laurels, and at large distances, which have the beauty of orange-trees out of flower and fruit: from this walk are three descents by many stone-steps, in the middle and at each end, into a very large parterre. This is divided into quarters by gravel walks, and adorned with two fountains and eight statues in the several quarters; at the end of the terras-walk are two summer-houses, and the sides of the parterre are ranged with two large cloisters, open to the garden, upon arches of stone, and ending with two other summer-houses even with the cloisters, which are paved with stone, and designed for walks of shade, there being none other in the whole parterre. Over these two cloisters are two terrasses covered with lead, and fenced with balusters; and the passage into these airy walks is out of the two summer-houses, at the end of the first terras-walk. The cloister facing the south is covered with vines, and would have been proper for an orange-house, and the other for myrtles, or other more common greens; and had, I doubt not, been cast for that purpose, if this piece of gardening had been then in as much vogue as it is now.

From the middle of the parterre is a descent by many steps flying on each side of a grotto that lies between them (covered with lead, and flat) into the lower garden, which is all fruit-trees ranged about the several quarters of a wilderness which is very shady; the walks here are all green, the grotto embellished with figures of shell-rock-work, fountains, and water-works. If the hill had not ended with the lower garden, and the wall were not bounded by a common way that goes through the park, they might have added a third quarter of all greens; but this want is supplied by a garden on the other side the house, which is all of that sort, very wild, shady, and adorned with rough rock-work and fountains.

This was Moor-Park, when I was acquainted with it, and the sweetest place, I think, that I have seen in my life, either before or since, at home or abroad; what it is now, I can give little account, having passed through several hands that have made great changes in gardens as well as houses; but the remembrance of what it was is too pleasant ever to forget, and therefore I do not believe to have mistaken the figure of it, which may serve for a pattern to the best gardens of our manner, and that are most proper for our country and climate.

On Poetry.

But to spin off this thread, which is already grown too long: what honour and request the ancient poetry has lived in, may not only be observed from the universal reception and use in all nations from China to Peru, from Scythia to Arabia, but from the esteem of the best and the greatest men as well as the vulgar. Among the Hebrews, David and Solomon, the wisest kings, Job and Jeremiah, the holiest men, were the best poets of their nation and language. Among the Greeks, the two most renowned sages and lawgivers were Lycurgus and Solon, whereof the last is known to have excelled in poetry, and the first was so great a lover of it, that to his care and industry we are said (by some authors) to owe the collection and preservation of the loose and scattered pieces of Homer in the order wherein they have since appeared. Alexander is reported neither to have travelled nor slept without those admirable poems always in his company. Phalaris, that was inexorable to all other enemies, relented at the charms of Stesichorus his muse. Among the Romans, the last and great Scipio passed the soft hours of his life in the conversation of Terence, and was thought to have a part in the composition of his comedies. Cæsar was an excellent poet as well as orator, and composed a poem in his voyage from Rome to Spain, relieving the tedious difficulties of his march with the entertainments of his muse. Augustus was not only a patron, but a friend and companion of Virgil and Horace, and was himself both an admirer of poetry, and a pretender too, as far as his genius would reach, or his busy scene allow. 'Tis true, since his age we have few such examples of great princes favouring or affecting poetry, and as few perhaps of great poets deserving it. Whether it be that the fierceness of the Gothic humours or noise of their perpetual wars frightened it away, or that the unequal mixture of the modern languages would not bear it; certain it is that the great heights and excellency both of poetry and music fell with the Roman learning and empire, and have never since recovered the admiration and applauses that before attended them. Yet, such as they are amongst us, they must be confessed to be the softest and sweetest, the most general and most innocent amusements of common time and life. They still find room in the courts of princes and the cottages of shepherds. They serve to revive and animate the dead calm of poor or idle lives, and to allay or divert the violent passions and perturbations of the greatest and the busiest men. And both these effects are of equal use to human life; for the mind of man is like the sea, which is neither agreeable to the beholder nor the voyager in a calm or in a storm, but is so to both when a little agitated by gentle gales; and so the mind, when moved by soft and easy passions and affections. I know very well that many who pretend to be wise by the forms of being grave, are apt to despise both poetry and music as toys and trifles too light for the use or entertainment of serious men. But whoever find themselves wholly insensible to these charms, would I think do well to keep their own counsel, for fear of reproaching their own temper and bringing the goodness of their natures, if not of their understandings, into question: it may be thought at least an ill sign, if not an ill constitution, since some of the fathers went so far as to esteem the love of music a sign of predestination, as a thing divine, and reserved for the felicities of heaven itself. While this world lasts, I doubt not but the pleasure and requests of these two entertainments will do so too; and happy those that content themselves with these, or any other so easy and so innocent; and do not trouble the world or other men, because they cannot be quiet themselves, though no body hurts them!

When all is done, human life is at the greatest and the best but like a froward child, that must be played with and humoured a little to keep it quiet till it falls asleep, and then the care is over.

Temple's Essay upon the Ancient and Modern Learning gave occasion to a very celebrated literary controversy. The question was raised by a work of Charles Perrault (immortal as the author of 'Puss in Boots,' 'Cinderella,' and 'Blue Beard') in which, with the view of flattering the pride of the Grand Monarque, it was affirmed that the writers of antiquity had been excelled by those of modern times. Boileau strenuously opposed the doctrine; and in behalf of the ancients Sir William also took the field. According to Perrault, 'we must have more knowledge than the ancients, because we have the advantage both of theirs and our own; as a dwarf standing upon a giant's shoulders sees more and further than he;' the ancients are really the young of the earth, and we are the true ancients. Temple replies that the ancients derived vast stores of knowledge from their predecessors—the Chinese, Indians, Egyptians, Chaldeans, Persians, Syrians, and Jews; and thence, no doubt, Orpheus, Homer, Lycurgus, Pythagoras, and Plato drew their stores. Temple, whose scholarship was inadequate (he knew no Greek, and the essay was rather a jeu d'esprit than a critical performance), absurdly assumed as facts the veriest fables—as about Orpheus, asking triumphantly, 'What are become of the charms of music, by which men and beasts, fishes, fowls, and serpents, were so frequently enchanted, and their very natures changed; by which the passions of men were raised to the greatest height and violence, and then as suddenly appeased, so that they might be justly said to be turned into lions or lambs, into wolves or into harts, by the powers and charms of this admirable art?' The more ancient sages of Greece were greater men than Hippocrates, Plato, and Xenophon. 'There is nothing new in astronomy,' he says, 'to vie with the ancients, unless it be the Copernican system; nor in physic unless Harvey's circulation of the blood'! But it is disputed whether these discoveries are not derived from ancient fountains; in any case they have 'made no change in the conclusions of astronomy nor in the practice of physic, and so have been of little use to the world, though perhaps of much honour to the authors'(!) In comparing 'the great wits among the moderns' with the authors of antiquity, he mentions no Englishmen except Sir Philip Sidney, Bacon, and Selden, leaving Shakespeare and Milton altogether out of view. After Ariosto, Tasso, and Spenser, he 'knows none of the moderns that have made any achievements in heroic poetry worth recording.' Descartes and Hobbes are 'the only new philosophers that have made entries upon the noble stage of the sciences for fifteen hundred years past.' But Temple's most unlucky blunder was his adducing the Greek Epistles of Phalaris to prove that 'the oldest books we have are still in their kind the best;' these Epistles 'I think to have more grace, more spirit, more force of wit and genius, than any others I have seen, either ancient or modern.' In fairness to Temple, however, it must be added that in the essay on Poetry, published in the same volume, he shows a much more adequate knowledge and appreciation of the moderns, extolling 'the matchless writer of Don Quixote,' and asserting that the English drama, in its development under Shakespeare and his successors, had 'in some kind excelled both the ancient and the modern' achievements in that line. Temple's Essay led to the appearance of a new edition of the Epistles by Charles Boyle, afterwards Earl of Orrery; and so Boyle got into a quarrel with the great critic Bentley. Bentley demonstrated the Epistles to be a forgery, spoke irreverently of Temple, and in his immortal dissertation (1699) overwhelmed Boyle, Aldrich, Atterbury, and other Christ Church doctors with ridicule. Swift came into the field on behalf of his patron with his famous Battle of the Books, and to the end of his life spoke of Bentley with contempt. Many other contemporaries also engaged in the fray, critical opinion being all on one side, though good wit and satire were squandered on the other—and not wholly in vain, for the uncritical view continued to assert itself from time to time. To one of Bentley's allies Temple wrote a reply, which might partly have suggested Swift's account, in Gulliver's Travels, of experimental researches of the projectors at Lagado :

What has been produced for the use, benefit, or pleasure of mankind, by all the airy speculations of those who have passed for the great advancers of knowledge and learning these last fifty years (which is the date of our modern pretenders), I confess I am yet to seek, and should be very glad to find. I have indeed heard of wondrous pretensions and visions of men possessed with notions of the strange advancement of learning and sciences on foot in this age, and the progress they are like to make in the next; as the universal medicine, which will certainly cure all that have it; the philosopher's stone, which will be found out by men that care not for riches; the transfusion of young blood into old men's veins, which will make them as gamesome as the lambs from which 'tis to be derived; an universal language, which may serve all men's turn when they have forgot their own; the knowledge of one another's thoughts without the grievous trouble of speaking; the art of flying, till a man happens to fall down and break his neck; double-bottomed ships, whereof none can ever be cast away besides the first that was made; the admirable virtues of that noble and necessary juice called spittle, which will come to be sold, and very cheap, in the apothecaries' shops; discoveries of new worlds in the planets, and voyages between this and that in the moon, to be made as frequently as between York and London: which such poor mortals as I am think as wild as those of Ariosto, but without half so much wit or so much instruction; for there these modern sages may know where they may hope in time to find their lost senses, preserved in phials with those of Orlando.

You ask me how I pass my time here. I can give you a perfect account not only of what I do for the present, but of what I am likely to do this seven years if I stay here so long. I rise in the morning reasonably early, and before I am ready I go round the house till I am weary of that, and then into the garden till it grows too hot for me. About ten o'clock I think of making me ready, and when that's done I go into my father's chamber, from whence to dinner, where my cousin Mollie and I sit in great state in a room, and at a table that would hold a great many more. After dinner we sit and talk till Mr B. comes in question, and then I am gone. The heat of the day is spent in reading or working, and about six or seven o'clock I walk out into a common that lies hard by the house, where a great many young wenches keep sheep and cows, and sit in the shade singing of ballads. I go to them and compare their voices and beauties to some ancient shepherdesses that I have read of, and find a vast difference there; but, trust me, I think these are as innocent as those could be. I talk to them, and find they want nothing to make them the happiest people in the world but the knowledge that they are so. Most commonly, when we are in the midst of our discourse, one looks about her, and spies her cows going into the corn, and then away they all run as if they had wings at their heels. I, that am not so nimble, stay behind; and when I see them driving home their cattle, I think 'tis time for me to return too. When I have supped, I go into the garden, and so to the side of a small river that runs by it, when I sit down and wish you were with me (you had best say this is not kind neither). In earnest, 'tis a pleasant place, and would be much more so to me if I had your company. I sit there sometimes till I am lost with thinking; and were it not for some cruel thoughts of the crossness of our fortunes that will not let me sleep there, I should forget that there were such a thing to be done as going to bed.

Since I writ this my company is increased by two, my brother Harry and a fair niece, the eldest of my brother Peyton's children. She is so much a woman that I am almost ashamed to say I am her aunt; and so pretty, that, if I had any design to gain of servants, I should not like her company; but I have none, and therefore shall endeavour to keep her here as long as I can persuade her father to spare her, for she will easily consent to it, having so much of my humour (though it be the worst thing in her) as to like a melancholy place and little company. My brother John is not come down again, nor am I certain when he will be here. He went from London into Gloucestershire to my sister who was very ill, and his youngest girl, of which he was very fond, is since dead. But I believe by that time his wife has a little recovered her sickness and loss of her child, he will be coming this way. My father is reasonably well, but keeps his chamber still, and will hardly, I am afraid, ever be so perfectly recovered as to come abroad again.

Temple's collected works fill 4 vols. (1814). See, besides the older Lives by Boyer, Swift, and Temple's sister, Lady Giffard, the elaborate Memoirs by T. P. Courtenay (1836), Macaulay's brilliant Essay thereon, Dr C. Marburg's study (1932), and Smith's edition of Dorothy Osborne's Letters (1928). The best of all criticisms of Temple as an essayist is Lamb's essay on 'The Genteel Style of Writing.'

The Marquis of Halifax (GEORGE SAVILE; 1633-95) was distinguished as statesman, orator, and political writer. In the contests between the Crown and the Parliament after the restoration of Charles II. he was alternately in high favour with both parties as he supported or opposed the measures of each. He opposed the Test Bill in 1675; as a keen critic of the Cabal he secured the king's dislike, but after 1678 became the chiefest favourite at court. To popery he was unfeignedly hostile, and he disliked the Duke of York as the representative of French influence and Catholic hopes, yet it was his skill and power in debate that did most to defeat the bill excluding the Duke from the succession to the throne. For this he was elevated to the dignity of marquis, Keeper of the Privy Seal, and President of the Council. He retained his offices till his opposition to the proposed repeal of the Test and Habeas Corpus Acts caused his dismissal. After the flight of James, Halifax was chosen Speaker of the peers in the convention, and obtained his old office of Privy Seal, but he again lost favour, and joined the ranks of the Opposition. He was a Trimmer, as Lord Macaulay says, from principle, as well as from constitution: 'Every faction in the day of its insolent and vindictive triumph incurred his censure; and every faction when vanquished and persecuted found in him a protector;' and according to the same authority, the Revolution 'bears the character of the great and cautious mind of Halifax.' He figures (favourably) as Jotham in Absalom and Achitophel. His political and miscellaneous tracts deserve to be studied for their political insight and literary merit, and entitle him to a place among English classics. They consist of short treatises, including Advice to a Daughter, The Character of a Trimmer, Anatomy of an Equivalent, Maxims of State, and Letter to a Dissenter. Mackintosh said (hyperbolically) that the Letter to a Dissenter was the finest political tract ever written. The modern character of Halifax's style is no less remarkable than his logic and happy illustration. He ranks as one of the founders of modern English prose, and in his best passages matches the true eloquence of Sir Thomas Browne and Jeremy Taylor. The Character of a Trimmer (1685), interpreting the word in a good sense, was meant to advise Charles II. to throw off the influence of his brother James. The Rough Draft of a New Model of Sea, not published till 1701, fully recognises the importance to England of the sea and of her navy, and contains the sentence: 'To the question, What shall we do to be saved in this world? there is no answer but this: Look to your moat.' Amongst his Maxims of State are: 'He who thinks his place below him will certainly be below his place,' and 'Men love to see themselves in the false looking-glass of other men's failings.' It was Halifax who said that Rochester, when appointed to the post of Lord President, 'had been kicked upstairs.' His first wife was a daughter of Waller's 'Sacharissa'; his daughter was the mother of the famous Earl of Chesterfield. Henry Carey, the poet-musician, was a natural son of Halifax.

Miss Foxcroft has no doubt that the Character of a Trimmer was a retort to a denunciation by L'Estrange (see page 741), in the Observer in December 1684, of 'the humour of a trimmer;' as L'Estrange's burst was a reply to a pamphlet called The Observer proved a Trimmer. L'Estrange rails at a Trimmer as 'a hundred thousand things,' as 'a man of latitude as well in politiques as divinity,' as 'one that for the ease of travellers towards the New Jerusalem proposes the cutting of the broad way and the narrow both into one,' and so on, in a vehement paragraph. As L'Estrange was licenser of the press, Halifax must have made up his mind beforehand to circulate his pamphlet in MS. It was presumably written in December 1684 or January 1685, and was not published till some time in 1688.

The following are extracts (the first being the preface, the last the conclusion) from

'The Character of a Trimmer.'

It must be more than an ordinary provocation that can tempt a man to write in an age overrun with scribblers as Egypt was with flies and locusts. That worse vermin of small authors hath given the world such a surfeit that, instead of desiring to write, a man would be inclined to wish, for his own ease, that he could not read; but there are some things that do so raise our passions that our reason can make no resistance; and when madmen in the two extremes shall agree to make common-sense treason, and join to fix an ill character on the only men in a nation who deserve a good one, I am no longer master of my better resolutions to let the world alone, and must break loose from my more reasonable thoughts to expose those false coiners who would make their copper words pass upon us for good payment.

Amongst all the engines of dissension there hath been none more powerful in all times than the fixing names upon one another of contumely and reproach. And the reason is plain in respect of the people, who, though generally they are incapable of making a syllogism or forming an argument, yet they can pronounce a word; and that serveth their turn to throw it with their dull malice at the head of those they do not like. Such things ever begin in jest, and end in blood; and the same word which at first maketh the company merry, groweth in time to a military signal to cut one another's throats. These mistakes are to be lamented, though not easily to be cured, being suitable enough to the corrupted nature of mankind; but it is hard that men will not only invent ill names, but they will wrest and misinterpret good ones. So afraid some are even of a reconciling sound that they raise another noise to keep it from being heard, lest it should set up and encourage a dangerous sort of men, who prefer peace and agreement before violence and confusion. Were it not for this, why, after we have played the fool with throwing Whig and Tory one at another as boys do snowballs, do we grow angry at a new name which by its true signification might do as much to put us into our wits as the others have done to put us out of them?

This innocent word 'Trimmer' signifieth no more than this, that if men are together in a boat, and one part of the company would weigh it down of one side, another would make it lean as much to the contrary; it happeneth there is a third opinion of those who conceive it would do as well if the boat went even, without endangering the passengers. Now, it is hard to imagine by what figure in language, or by what rule in sense, this cometh to be a fault, and it is much more a wonder it should be thought a heresy. But it so happeneth that the poor Trimmer hath now all the powder spent upon him alone, whilst the Whig is a forgotten or at least a neglected enemy. There is no danger now to the state (if some men may be believed) but from the beast called a Trimmer. Take heed of him: he is the instrument that must destroy Church and State—a strange kind of monster whose deformity is so exposed that, were it a true picture that is made of him, it would be enough to fright children and make women miscarry at the first sight of it. But it may be worth examining whether he is such a beast as he is painted. I am not of that opinion, and am so far from thinking him an infidel either in Church or

State that I am neither afraid to expose the articles of his faith in relation to government, nor to say I prefer them before any other political creed that either our angry divines or our refined statesmen would impose upon us. I have therefore in the following discourse endeavoured to explain the Trimmer's principles and opinions, and then leave it to all discerning and impartial judges whether he can with justice be so arraigned, and whether those who deliberately pervert a good name do not very justly deserve the worst that can be put upon themselves.

Political Agitation not always Hurtful.

Our government is like our climate. There are winds which are sometimes loud and unquiet, and yet with all the trouble they give us, we owe great part of our health to them. They clear the air, which else would be like a standing pool, and instead of a refreshment would be a disease to us. There may be fresh gales of asserted liberty without turning into such storms of hurricane as that the state should run any hazard of being cast away by them. Those strummings which are natural to all mixed governments, while they are kept from growing into convulsions, do by a natural agitation of the several parts rather support and strengthen than weaken or maim the constitution; and the whole frame, instead of being torn or disjointed, cometh to be the better and closer knit by being thus exercised.

Truth and Moderation.

Our Trimmer adareth the goddess Truth, though in all ages she has been scurvily used, as well as those that worshipped her. . . . She showeth her greatness in this, that her enemies, even when they are successful, are ashamed to own it; nothing but powerful truth hath the prerogative of triumphing, not only after victory, but in spite of it, and to put conquest itself out of countenance. She may be kept under and suppressed, but her dignity still remaineth with her, even when she is in chains. Falsehood with all her impudence hath not enough to speak ill of her before her face. Such majesty she carrieth about her, that her most prosperous enemies are fain to whisper their treason; all the power upon the earth can never extinguish her; she hath lived in all ages; and, let the mistaken zeal of prevailing authority christen an opposition to it with what name they please, she makes it not only an ugly and unmannerly but a dangerous thing to persist. She has lived very retiredly indeed, nay sometimes so buried that only some few of the discerning part of mankind could have a glimpse of her; with all that, she hath eternity in her; she knoweth not how to die, and from the darkest clouds that shade and cover her, she breaketh from time to time with triumph for her friends and terror to her enemies.

Our Trimmer, therefore, inspired by this divine virtue, thinks fit to conclude with these assertions: That our climate is a trimmer between that part of the world where men are roasted, and the other where they are frozen: that our church is a trimmer between the frenzy of fanatic visions and the lethargic ignorance of popish dreams: that our laws are trimmers, between the excess of unbounded power and the extravagance of liberty not enough restrained: that true virtue hath ever been thought a trimmer, and to have its dwelling between the two extremes: that even God Almighty himself is divided between his two great attributes, his mercy and justice. In such company, our Trimmer is not ashamed of his name, and willingly leaveth to the bold champions of either extreme the honour of contending with no less adversaries than nature, religion, liberty, prudence, humanity, and common-sense.

The works of Halifax were first collected, revised, and edited along with his Letters and a Life by Miss Foxcroft in 1898. Sir W. Raleigh edited the Complete Works in 1912.

Isaac Barrow (1630-77) was the son of a London linen-draper. At the Charterhouse he was more distinguished for pugnacity than for application to his books; but at Felstead, in Essex, his next school, he greatly improved. He studied for the Church at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was elected a fellow in 1649. Perceiving that under the Commonwealth the ascendancy of alien theological and political opinions gave him little chance of preferment, he turned to medicine, anatomy, botany, and chemistry; but ere long he returned to theology, with mathematics and astronomy. In 1655, disappointed in his hopes of the Greek professorship at Cambridge, he went abroad for four years, visiting France, Italy, Smyrna, Constantinople, Venice, Germany, and Holland. On his outward voyage he fought bravely in a brush with Algerine corsairs; at the Turkish capital, where he spent twelve months, he studied with great delight the works of St Chrysostom, originally written in Constantinople. He returned to England in 1659, and in the following year obtained the Greek chair without opposition; and in 1662 he was further made Professor of Geometry at Gresham College in London. Both these appointments he resigned in 1663, on becoming Lucasian Professor of Mathematics at Cambridge. After lecturing for six years, and publishing a profound work on Optics, he resolved to devote himself to theology, and in 1669 resigned his chair to Newton. He was appointed one of the royal chaplains; in 1672 he was nominated to the mastership of Trinity College by the king, and for the two years before his death he was vice-chancellor of the university; and he was buried in Westminster Abbey. His candour, modesty, disinterestedness, and serenity of temper were conspicuous; his manners and aspect were more those of a student than of a man of the world; and he was oddly heedless about dress.

Of his great powers as a mathematician Barrow left evidence in a series of treatises, nearly all in Latin, though afterwards translated; and he wrote Latin verses. But it is by his theological works that he is generally known—expositions of the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Decalogue, and the Doctrine of the Sacraments; treatises on the Pope's Supremacy and the Unity of the Church; and sermons prized for depth and copiousness of thought, and nervous though unpolished eloquence. Less academic, more modern and popular than South, Barrow was rather fond of antitheses and rhetorical interrogations, and occasionally permitted himself a very homely vernacular word or a fantastic coinage from Latin. He transcribed his sermons three or four times; they seldom occupied less than an hour and a half in delivery. At a charity sermon before the Lord Mayor and aldermen of London, he spoke for three hours and a half; and when asked, on coming down from the pulpit, whether he was not tired, he replied, 'Yes, indeed, I began to be weary with standing so long.'

Of Apparitions.

I may adjoin to the former sorts of extraordinary actions, some other sorts, the consideration of which (although not so directly and immediately) may serve our main design; those (which the general opinion of mankind hath approved, and manifold testimony hath declared frequently to happen) which concern apparitions from another world, as it were, of beings unusual; concerning spirits haunting persons and places (these discerned by all senses, and by divers kinds of effects); of which the old world (the ancient poets and historians) did speak so much, and of which all ages have afforded several attestations very direct and plain, and having all advantages imaginable to beget credence; concerning visions made unto persons of especial eminency and influence (to priests and prophets); concerning presignifications of future events by dreams; concerning the power of enchantments, implying the co-operation of invisible powers; concerning all sorts of intercourse and confederacy (formal or virtual) with bad spirits: all which things he that shall affirm to be mere fiction and delusion, must thereby with exceeding immodesty and rudeness charge the world with extreme both vanity and malignity; many, if not all, worthy historians, of much inconsiderateness or fraud; most lawgivers, of great silliness and rashness; most judicatories, of high stupidity or cruelty; a vast number of witnesses, of the greatest malice or madness; all which have concurred to assert these matters of fact.

It is true no question but there have been many vain pretences, many false reports, many unjust accusations, and some undue decisions concerning these matters; that the vulgar sort is apt enough to be abused about them; that even intelligent and considerate men may at a distance in regard to some of them be imposed upon; but, as there would be no false gems obtruded, if there were no true ones found in nature; as no counterfeit coin would appear, were there no true one current; so neither can we well suppose that a confidence in some to feign or a readiness in most to believe stories of this kind could arise or should subsist without some real ground, or without such things having in gross somewhat of truth and reality. However, that the wiser and more refined sort of men, highest in parts and improvements both from study and experience (indeed the flower of every commonwealth; statesmen, lawgivers, judges, and priests), upon so many occasions of great importance, after most deliberate scanning such pretences and reports, should so often suffer themselves to be deluded, to the extreme injury of particular persons concerned, to the common abusing of mankind, to the hazard of their own reputation in point of wisdom and honesty, seems nowise reasonable to conceive. In likelihood rather the whole kind of all these things, were it altogether vain and groundless, would upon so frequent and so mature discussions have appeared to be so, and would consequently long since have been disowned, exploded, and thrust out of the world; for as upon this occasion it is said in Tully, Time wipeth out groundless conceits, but confirms that which is founded in nature and real.

Now if the truth and reality of these things (all or any of them), inferring the existence of powers invisible, at least inferior ones, though much superior to us in all sort of ability, be admitted, it will at least (as removing the chief obstacles of incredulity) confer much to the belief of that supreme Divinity, which our discourse strives to maintain.

I must acknowledge that both these arguments, drawn from testimonies concerning matters of fact (and indeed all other arguments), were invalid and insignificant, could any demonstration or any argument weighty enough be brought to shew the impossibility of such a thing to exist, as we infer to exist from them. But as it is a very easy thing (so whoever is versed in speculation and reasoning about things cannot but find) to prove many things possible to be, which do not actually exist; so it is hard to prove the impossibility of a thing's being; yea there is plainly no other mean of doing this than the manifesting an evident repugnance between being itself and some property assigned to that thing, or between several properties attributed thereto; as if we should suppose a square circle or a round square to exist. But in our case no man can shew such a repugnance; between being and wisdom, power or goodness, there is no inconsistency surely; nor can any man evince one to be between being and coexisting with matter, or penetrating body; between being and insensibility; between being and any other property which we ascribe to God; nor is there any clashing between those properties themselves: it is therefore impossible to shew that God cannot exist; and therefore it is unreasonable to disbelieve the testimonies (so many, so pregnant) that declare him to exist.

Men indeed, who affix themselves to things which their sense offers, may be indisposed to abstract their minds from such things, may be unapt to frame conceptions about any other sort of things; but to think there can be no other things than such as we see and feel, that nothing endued with other properties than such as these objected to our sense have can exist, implies a great dulness of apprehension, a greater shortness of reason and judgment; it is much like the simplicity of a rustic, who, because he never was above three miles from home, cannot imagine the world to reach ten miles farther; and will look upon all that is told him concerning things more distant to be false, and forged to abuse him. I add that these men's incredulity is hence more inexcusable, because the possibility of such a being's existence, the compatibility and concurrence of such properties in one thing, is (as we elsewhere have largely shewed) by a very plain instance declared, even by that being within every man, which in a degree partakes of all those properties.

I shall leave this head of discourse, with this one remark; that they are much mistaken who place a kind of wisdom in being very incredulous, and unwilling to assent to any testimony, how full and clear soever: for this indeed is not wisdom, but the worst kind of folly. It is folly, because it causes ignorance and mistake, with all the consequents of these; and it is very bad, as being accompanied with disingenuity, obstinacy, rudeness, uncharitableness, and the like bad dispositions; from which credulity itself, the other extreme sort of folly, is exempt. Compare we, I say, these two sorts of fools; the credulous fool, who yields his assent hastily upon any slight ground; and the suspicious fool, who never will be stirred by any the strongest reason or clearest testimony; we shall find the latter in most respects the worst of the two; that his folly arises from worse causes, hath worse adjuncts, produceth worse effects. Credulity may spring from an airy complexion, or from a modest opinion of one's self; suspiciousness hath its birth from an earthy temper of body, or from self-conceit in the mind: that carries with it being civil and affable, and apt to correct an error; with this a man is intractable, unwilling to hear, stiff and incorrigible in his ignorance or mistake: that begets speed and alacrity in action; this renders a man heavy and dumpish, slow and tedious in his resolutions and in his proceedings: both include want of judgment; but this pretending to more thereof, becomes thereby more dangerous. Forward rashness, which is the same with that, may sometimes, like an acute disease, undo a man sooner; but stupid dotage, little differing from this, is (like a chronical distemper) commonly more mischievous, and always more hard to cure. In fine, were men in their other affairs or in ordinary converse so diffident to plain testimony as some do seem to be in these matters concerning religion, they would soon feel great inconveniences to proceed thence; their business would stick, their conversation would be distasteful; they would be much more offensive, and no less ridiculous than the most credulous fool in the world. While men therefore so perversely distrustful affect to seem wise, they affect really to be fools; and practise according to the worst sort of folly.

(From Sermon, 'The Being of God proved from Supernatural Effects.')

What kind of Jestings Paul forbids.

But however manifest it is that some kind thereof he doth earnestly forbid: whence, in order to the guidance of our practice, it is needful to distinguish the kinds, severing that which is allowable from that which is unlawful; that so we may be satisfied in the case, and not on the one hand ignorantly transgress our duty, nor on the other trouble ourselves with scruples, others with censures, upon the use of warrantable liberty therein.

And such a resolution seemeth indeed especially needful in this our age (this pleasant and jocular age), which is so infinitely addicted to this sort of speaking, that it scarce doth affect or prize any thing near so much; all reputation appearing now to veil and stoop to that of being a wit: to be learned, to be wise, to be good, are nothing in comparison thereto; even to be noble and rich are inferior things, and afford no such glory. Many at least, to purchase this glory, to be deemed considerable in this faculty, and enrolled among the wits, do not only make shipwreck of conscience, abandon virtue, and forfeit all pretences to wisdom; but neglect their estates and prostitute their honour: so to the private damage of many particular persons, and with no small prejudice to the public, are our times possessed and transported with this humour. To repress the excess and extravagance whereof, nothing in way of discourse can serve better than a plain declaration when and how such a practice is allowable or tolerable; when it is wicked and vain, unworthy of a man endued with reason, and pretending to honesty or honour.

This I shall in some measure endeavour to perform.

But first it may be demanded what the thing we speak of is, or what this facetiousness doth import? To which question I might reply as Democritus did to him that asked the definition of a man, It is that which we all see and know: any one better apprehends what it is by acquaintance, than I can inform him by description. It is indeed a thing so versatile and multiform, appearing in so many shapes, so many postures, so many garbs, so variously apprehended by several eyes and judgments, that it seemeth no less hard to settle a clear and certain notion thereof, than to make a portrait of Proteus, or to define the figure of the fleeting air. Sometimes it lieth in pat allusion to a known story, or in seasonable application of a trivial saying, or in forging an apposite tale: sometimes it playeth in words and phrases, taking advantage from the ambiguity of their sense, or the affinity of their sound: sometimes it is wrapped in a dress of humorous expression: sometimes it lurketh under an odd similitude: sometimes it is lodged in a sly question, in a smart answer, in a quirkish reason, in a shrewd intimation, in cunningly diverting, or cleverly retorting an objection: sometimes it is couched in a bold scheme of speech, in a tart irony, in a lusty hyperbole, in a startling metaphor, in a plausible reconciling of contradictions, or in acute nonsense: sometimes a scencal representation of persons or things, a counterfeit speech, a mimical look or gesture passeth for it; sometimes an affected simplicity, sometimes a presumptuous bluntness giveth it being: sometimes it riseth from a lucky hitting upon what is strange, sometimes from a crafty wresting obvious matter to the purpose: often it consisteth in one knows not what, and springeth up one can hardly tell how. Its ways are unaccountable and inexplicable, being answerable to the numberless roving of fancy and windings of language. It is in short a manner of speaking out of the simple and plain way (such as reason teacheth and proveth things by), which by a pretty surprising uncouthness in conceit or expression doth affect and amuse the fancy, stirring in it some wonder, and breeding some delight thereto. It raiseth admiration, as signifying a nimble sagacity of apprehension, a special felicity of invention, a vivacity of spirit, and reach of wit more than vulgar: it seeming to argue a rare quickness of parts, that one can fetch in remote conceits applicable; a notable skill, that he can dexterously accommodate them to the purpose before him; together with a lively briskness of humour, not apt to damp those sportful flashes of imagination. (Whence in Aristotle such persons are termed ἐπιδέξιοι, dexterous men; and εὐρποιοί, men of facile or versatile manners, who can easily turn themselves to all things, or turn all things to themselves.) It also procureth delight, by gratifying curiosity with its rareness or semblance of difficulty (as monsters, not for their beauty, but their rarity; as juggling tricks, not for their use, but their abstruseness, are beheld with pleasure); by diverting the mind from its road of serious thoughts; by instilling gaiety and airiness of spirit; by provoking to such dispositions of spirit in way of emulation or complaisance; and by seasoning matters otherwise distasteful or insipid with an unusual and thence grateful tang.

(From Sermon 'Against Foolish Talking and Jestings'.)

There is an edition of Barrow's Theological Works by Napier, with a Memoir by Whewell (9 vols. 1859).

Robert South, D.D. (1634–1716), the wittiest of English divines, was born a London merchant's son at Hackney, educated for four years under Busby at Westminster, and elected student of Christ Church, together with Locke, in 1651. Three years later he took his bachelor's degree, and wrote a Latin copy of verses congratulating the Protector Cromwell on his peace with the Dutch. In 1658 he received orders from a deprived bishop, and was appointed in 1660 public orator to the university. During his tenure of this office occurred many striking occasions for his eloquence—the installation of Clarendon as chancellor in 1661; the burial of Juxon and the translation of Laud in July 1663; the visit of the king and queen, and the presentation of Monmouth for a degree, in September 1663; the foundation of the Sheldonian Theatre in 1664, and its formal opening in 1669. His vigorous sermons, full of sarcastic mockery of the Puritans, were delightful to the restored royalists. He became domestic chaplain to Clarendon, and further preferment followed quickly. In 1663 he was made prebendary of Westminster, canon of Christ Church in 1670, and rector of Islip in Oxfordshire in 1678. He went as chaplain with Clarendon's son, Laurence Hyde, afterwards Earl of Rochester, on his embassy to congratulate John Sobieski on mounting the throne of Poland (1677), and in December wrote from Danzig his impressions in the long and interesting Account sent to Pocock, the Oxford professor of Hebrew. It is supposed that South might have been a bishop if he would, and there is one story on record of his preaching in 1681 before the king on 'The lot is cast into the lap' (Prov. xvi. 33). Speaking of the strange accidents of fortune, he said, 'And who, that had beheld such a bankrupt, beggarly fellow as Cromwell, first entering the Parliament-house with a threadbare, torn cloak and a greasy hat (and perhaps neither of them paid for), could have suspected that in the space of so few years he should, by the murder of one king and the banishment of another, ascend the throne, be invested in the royal robes, and want nothing of the state of a king but the changing of his hat into a crown?' At these words the king fell into a violent fit of laughter, and turning to Lord Rochester, said, 'Ods fish, Lory, your chaplain must be a bishop, therefore put me in mind of him at the next death.' Unfortunately for the story, this sermon—one of those published by South himself—is inscribed as 'Preached at Westminster Abbey, February 22, 1684–85,' a fortnight after Charles's death. South suppressed his disapproval of James II.'s Declaration of Indulgence, 'acquiesced in' the Revolution, but blazed out with anger against the proposed scheme of Comprehension. In 1693 began his great controversy with Sherlock, Dean of St Paul's, who, in defending the Trinity against the Socinians, had used language capable of a heterodox interpretation. South flung his Animadversions anonymously into the fray, but the bitter irony and fierce sarcasms quickly betrayed his hand. Not content with demolishing Sherlock's learning, he abused his style, his orthography, the errors of the press, and even descended so low as to sneer at him as a henpecked husband. Sherlock published a Defence, to which South rejoined, and still anonymously, in his no less vigorous Tritheism charged upon Dr Sherlock's new notion of the Trinity. The controversy became the talk of the town, until the king himself interposed by an injunction addressed to the archbishops and bishops to the effect that no preacher should advance views on the Trinity other than those contained in Scripture, and agreeable to the three Creeds and the Thirty-nine Articles. One of the last things recorded of South is his activity in making interest on Dr Sacheverell's behalf, and he is said to have refused the see of Rochester and deanery of Westminster on the death of Dr Sprat (1713). He survived till eighty-three, and was buried in Westminster.

South's sermons are masterpieces of clear thought expressed in direct, vigorous English, sometimes rising to splendid eloquence, and often seasoned with a wit and sarcasm altogether unusual in the pulpit, and at times far beyond the limits of propriety. A masculine intellect, a mastery of arrangement and analysis, and an uncompromising strength of conviction and of confidence in his own opinions were qualities enough to make a great preacher, but the one supreme gift of the orator, that of genuine and quickening enthusiasm, was denied him. Still more, even his noblest passages are too often marred by a bitterness and party-spirit which warped his judgment and clouded his intellect with prejudice. 'A learned but ill-natured divine,' as Burnet calls him, he abhorred all mysticism and extravagance, sneered at the new philosophy and the recently founded Royal Society, and carried to a height unusual even among royalists the fatal Stuart theories of passive obedience and the divine right of kings. Still, though South loved to be called the 'preacher of the Old Cavaliers,' he did not spare their vices, while it still remains true that hatred of vice is far less prominent in his preaching than hatred of Nonconformity. Yet South could rise to the height of a great argument, and such sermons as that on 'Man made in the Image of God' give him rank among the greatest masters of English pulpit eloquence. Just as on the one side his power of wrapping up in homely words the bitterest ridicule and invective recalls the stronger hand of Swift, so on the other his positiveness of mind, dialectic skill, and power of passionate indignation remind us of the greater Bossuet. The extracts that follow are all, except the first, from the Sermons.

John Sobleski.

This king is a very well-spoken prince, very easy of access, and extreme civil, having most of the qualities requisite to form a complete gentleman. He is not only well versed in all military affairs, but likewise, through the means of a French education, very opulently stored with all polite and scholastical learning. Besides his own tongue, the Sclavonian, he understands the Latin, French, Italian, German, and Turkish languages: he delights much in natural history, and in all the parts of physic; he is wont to reprimand the clergy for not admitting the modern philosophy, such as Le Grand's and Cartesius's, into the universities and schools, and loves to hear people discourse of those matters, and has a particular talent to set people about him very artfully by the ears, that by their disputes he might be directed, as it happened once or twice during this embassy, where he shewed a poignancy of wit on the subject of a dispute held between the Bishop of Posen and Father de la Motte, a Jesuit and his Majesty's confessor, that gave me an extraordinary opinion of his parts.

As for what relates to his Majesty's person, he is a tall and corpulent prince, large-faced, and full eyes, and goes always in the same dress with his subjects, with his hair cut round about his ears like a monk, and wears a fur cap, but extraordinary rich with diamonds and jewels, large whiskers, and no neckcloth. A long robe hangs down to his heels, in the fashion of a coat, and a waistcoat under that, of the same length, tied close about his waist with a girdle. He never wears any gloves; and this long coat is of strong scarlet cloth, lined in the winter with rich fur, but in summer only with silk. Instead of shoes, he always wears, both abroad and at home, Turkey-leather boots with very thin soles, and hollow deep heels, made of a blade of silver bent hoop-wise into the form of a half-moon. He carries always a large scimeter by his side, the sheath equally flat and broad from the handle to the bottom, and curiously set with diamonds.

(From the Account.)

The Will for the Deed.

The third instance in which men used to plead the will instead of the deed, shall be in duties of cost and expense. Let a business of expensive charity be proposed; and then, as I shewed before, that, in matters of labour, the lazy person could find no hands wherewith to work; so neither in this case can the religious miser find any hands wherewith to give. It is wonderful to consider how a command or call to be liberal, either upon a civil or religious account, all of a sudden impoverishes the rich, breaks the merchant, shuts up every private man's exchequer, and makes those men in a minute have nothing at all to give who at the very same instant want nothing to spend. So that instead of relieving the poor, such a command strangely increases their number, and transforms rich men into beggars presently. For let the danger of their prince and country knock at their purses, and call upon them to contribute against a public enemy or calamity, then immediately they have nothing, and their riches upon such occasions—as Solomon expresses it—never fail to make themselves wings, and to fly away. . . .

To descend to matters of daily and common occurrence; what is more usual in conversation than for men to express their unwillingness to do a thing by saying they cannot do it; and for a covetous man, being asked a little money in charity, to answer that he has none? Which, as it is, if true, a sufficient answer to God and man; so, if false, it is intolerable hypocrisy towards both. But do men in good earnest think that God will be put off so? or can they imagine that the law of God will be baffled with a lie clothed in a scoff?

For such pretences are no better, as appears from that notable account given us by the apostle of this windy, insignificant charity of the will, and of the worthlessness of it, not enlivened by deeds (James, ii. 15, 16): 'If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit?' Profit, does he say? Why, it profits just as much as fair words command the market, as good wishes buy food and raiment, and pass for current payment in the shops. Come to an old rich professing vulpony [volpone, fox], and tell him that there is a church to be built, beautified, or endowed in such a place, and that he cannot lay out his money more to God's honour, the public good, and the comfort of his own conscience, than to bestow it liberally upon such an occasion; and in answer to this it is ten to one but you shall be told, 'how much God is for the inward, spiritual worship of the heart; and that the Almighty neither dwells nor delights in temples made with hands, but hears and accepts the prayers of his people in dens and caves, barns and stables; and in the homeliest and meanest cottages, as well as in the stateliest and most magnificent churches.' Thus I say you are like to be answered. In reply to which, I would have all such sly sanctified cheats—who are so often harping on this string—know once for all that that God, who accepts the prayers of his people in dens and caves, barns and stables, when, by his afflicting providence, he has driven them from the appointed places of his solemn worship, so that they cannot have the use of them, will not for all this endure to be served or prayed to by them in such places, nor accept of their barn-worship, nor their hog-sty worship; no, nor yet of their parlour or their chamber worship, where he has given them both wealth and power to build churches. For he that commands us to worship him in the spirit, commands us also to honour him with our substance. And never pretend that thou hast an heart to pray while thou hast no heart to give, since he that serves Mammon with his estate cannot possibly serve God with his heart. For as in the heathen worship of God a sacrifice without an heart was accounted ominous, so, in the Christian worship of him, an heart without a sacrifice is worthless and impertinent. And thus much for men's pretences of the will when they are called upon to give upon a religious account; according to which, a man may be well enough said—as the common word is—to be all heart, and yet the arrantest miser in the world.

But come we now to this rich old pretender to godliness in another case, and tell him that there is such an

ROBERT SOUTH.

From the Portrait in the Collect Biography.

one, a man of good family, good education, and who has lost all his estate for the king, now ready to rot in prison for debt; come, what will you give towards his release? Why, then answers the will instead of the deed as much the readier speaker of the two: 'The truth is, I always had a respect for such men; I love them with all my heart; and it is a thousand pities that any that had served the king so faithfully should be in such want.' So say I too, and the more shame is it for the whole nation that they should be so. But still, what will you give? Why, then answers the man of mouth-charity again, and tells you that 'you could not come in a worse time; that money is nowadays very scarce with him, and that therefore he can give nothing; but he will be sure to pray for the poor gentleman.' Ah, thou hypocrite! when thy brother has lost all that ever he had, and lies languishing and even gasping under the utmost extremities of poverty and distress, dost thou think thus to lick him whole again only with thy tongue? Just like that old formal hocus who denied a beggar a farthing, and put him off with his blessing.

Ingratitude an Incurable Vice.

As a man tolerably discreet ought by no means to attempt the making of such an one his friend, so neither is he, in the next place, to presume to think that he shall be able so much as to alter or meliorate the humour of an ungrateful person by any acts of kindness, though never so frequent, never so obliging. Philosophy will teach the learned, and experience may teach all, that it is a thing hardly feasible. For, love such a one, and he shall despise you. Commend him, and as occasion serves he shall revile you. Give to him, and he shall but laugh at your easiness. Save his life; but, when you have done, look to your own.

The greatest favours to such an one are but like the motion of a ship upon the waves; they leave no trace, no sign behind them; they neither soften nor win upon him; they neither melt nor endear him, but leave him as hard, as rugged, and as unconcerned as ever. All kindnesses descend upon such a temper as showers of rain or rivers of fresh water falling into the main sea; the sea swallows them all, but is not at all changed or sweetened by them. I may truly say of the mind of an ungrateful person that it is kindness proof. It is impenetrable, unconquerable; unconquerable by that which conquers all things else, even by love itself. Flints may be melted—we see it daily—but an ungrateful heart cannot; no, not by the strongest and the noblest flame. After all your attempts, all your experiments, for anything that man can do, he that is ungrateful will be ungrateful still. And the reason is manifest; for you may remember that I told you that ingratitude sprang from a principle of ill-nature: which being a thing founded in such a certain constitution of blood and spirit, as, being born with a man into the world, and upon that account called nature, shall prevent all remedies that can be applied by education, and leaves such a bias upon the mind as is beforehand with all instruction.

So that you shall seldom or never meet with an ungrateful person but, if you look backward and trace him up to his original, you will find that he was born so; and if you could look forward enough, it is a thousand to one but you will find that he also dies so; for you shall never light upon an ill-natured man who was not also an ill-natured child, and gave several testimonies of his being so to discerning persons, long before the use of his reason. The thread that nature spins is seldom broken off by anything but death. I do not by this limit the operation of God's grace, for that may do wonders: but humanly speaking, and according to the method of the world, and the little correctives supplied by art and discipline, it seldom fails but an ill principle has its course, and nature makes good its blow.

The noblest faculty of man, the understanding, was before the Fall sublime, clear, and aspiring; and, as it were the soul's upper region, lofty and serene, free from the vapours and disturbances of the inferior affections. It was the leading, controlling faculty; all the passions wore the colours of reason; it did not so much persuade as command; it was not consul but dictator. Discourse was then almost as quick as intuition; it was nimble in proposing, firm in concluding; it could sooner determine than now it can dispute. Like the sun, it had both light and agility; it knew no rest but in motion;

no quiet but in activity. It did not so properly apprehend as irradiate the object; not so much find as make things intelligible. It did arbitrate upon the several reports of sense, and all the varieties of imagination; not like a drowsy judge, only hearing, but also directing their verdict. In sum, it was vegete, quick, and lively; open as the day, untainted as the morning, full of the innocence and sprightliness of youth; it gave the soul a bright and a full view into all things, and was not only a window, but was itself the prospect. . . .

Study was not then a duty, night-watchings were needless; the light of reason wanted not the assistance of a candle. This is the doom of fallen man, to labour in the fire, to seek truth in profundo, to exhaust his time and impair his health, and perhaps to spin out his days and himself into one pitiful and controverted conclusion. There was then no poring, no struggling with memory, no straining for invention. His faculties were quick and expedite; they answered without knocking, they were ready upon the first summons, there was freedom and firmness in all their operations. I confess 'tis difficult for us, who date our ignorance from our first being, and were still bred up with the same infirmities about us with which we were born, to raise our thoughts and imaginations to those intellectual perfections that attended our nature in the time of innocence; as it is for a peasant bred up in the obscurities of a cottage, to fancy in his mind the unseen splendours of a court. But by rating positives by their privatives, and other arts of reason, by which discourse supplies the want of the reports of sense, we may collect the excellency of the understanding then by the glorious remainders of it now, and guess at the stateliness of the building by the magnificence of its ruins. All those arts, rarities, and inventions which vulgar minds gaze at, the ingenious pursue, and all admire, are but the reliques of an intellect defaced by sin and time. We admire it now only as antiquaries do a piece of old coin, for the stamp it once bore, and not for those vanishing lineaments and disappearing drafts that remain upon it at present. And certainly that must needs have been very glorious the decays of which are so admirable. He that is comely when old and decrepid, surely was very beautiful when he was young. An Aristotle was but the rubbish of an Adam, and Athens but the rudiments of Paradise.

A Good Life the Christian's Logic.

The truths of Christ crucified are the Christian's philosophy, and a good life is the Christian's logic; that great instrumental introductive art that must guide the mind into the former. And where a long course of piety and close communion with God has purged the heart, and rectified the will, and made all things ready for the reception of God's Spirit; knowledge will break in upon such a soul like the sun shining in his full might, with such a victorious light that nothing shall be able to resist it.

If now at length, some should object here, that from what has been delivered it will follow that the most pious men are still the most knowing, which yet seems contrary to common experience and observation: I answer that as to all things directly conducing and necessary to salvation, there is no doubt but they are so; as the meanest common soldier that has fought often in an army has a truer and better knowledge of war than he that has read and writ whole volumes of it, but never was in any battel.

Practical sciences are not to be learnt but in the way of action. It is experience that must give knowledge in the Christian profession, as well as in all others. And the knowledge drawn from experience is quite of another kind from that which flows from speculation or discourse. It is not the opinion but the path of the just that the wisest of men tells us shines more and more unto a perfect day. The obedient and the men of practice are those sons of light that shall outgrow all their doubts and ignorances, that shall ride upon these clouds and triumph over their present imperfections, till persuasion pass into knowledge, and knowledge advance into assurance, and all come at length to be completed in the beatifick vision and a full fruition of those joys which God has in reserve for them, whom by his grace he shall prepare for glory.

Against Lewd Wits.

In the mean time, it cannot but be matter of just indignation to all knowing and good men, to see a company of lewd, shallow-brain'd huffs making atheism and contempt of religion the sole badge and character of wit, gallantry, and true discretion; and then, over their pots and pipes, claiming and engrossing all these wholly to themselves; magisterially censuring the wisdom of all antiquity, scoffing at all piety, and (as it were) new modelling the whole world. When yet such as have had opportunity to sound these braggers throughly, by having sometimes endured the penance of their sottish company, have found them in converse so empty and insipid, in discourse so trifling and contemptible, that it is impossible but that they should give a credit and an honour to whatsoever and whomsoever they speak against: they are indeed such as seem wholly incapable of entertaining any design above the present gratification of their palates, and whose very souls and thoughts rise no higher than their throats; but yet withal of such a clamorous and provoking impiety that they are enough to make the nation like Sodom and Gomorrah in their punishment, as they have already made it too like them in their sins. Certain it is that blasphemy and irreligion have grown to that daring height here of late years that had men in any sober, civilized heathen nation spoke or done half so much in contempt of their false gods and religion, as some in our days and nation, wearing the name of Christians, have spoke and done against God and Christ, they would have been infallibly burnt at a stake, as monsters and public enemies of society.

The truth is, the persons here reflected upon are of such a peculiar stamp of impiety, that they seem to be a set of fellows got together and formed into a kind of diabolical society for the finding out new experiments in vice; and therefore they laugh at the dull, unexperienced, obsolete sinners of former times; and scorning to keep themselves within the common, beaten, broad way to hell, by being vicious only at the low rate of example and imitation, they are for searching out other ways and latitudes, and obliging posterity with unheard-of inventions and discoveries in sin; resolving herein to admit of no other measure of good and evil but the judgment of sensuality, as those who prepare matters to their hands, allow no other measure of the philosophy and truth of things but the sole judgment of sense. And these (forsooth) are our great sages, and those who must pass for the only shrewd, thinking and inquisitive men of the age; and such as by a long, severe, and profound speculation of nature have redeemed themselves from the pedantry of being conscientious and living virtuously, and from such old-fashioned principles and creeds, as tie up the minds of some narrow-spirited, uncomprehensive zealots, who know not the world nor understand that he only is the truly wise man who per fas et nefas gets as much as he can.

But for all this, let atheists and sensualists satisfy themselves as they are able. The former of which will find, that as long as reason keeps her ground, religion neither can nor will lose hers. And for the sensual epicure, he also will find that there is a certain living spark within him which all the drink he can pour in will never be able to quench or put out; nor will his rotten abused body have it in its power to convey any putrefying, consuming, rotting quality to the soul: no, there is no drinking, or swearing, or ranting, or fluxing a soul out of its immortality. But that must and will survive and abide, in spite of death and the grave; and live for ever to convince such wretches to their eternal woe that the so much repeated ornament and flourish of their former speeches, 'God damn 'em!' was commonly the truest word they spoke, though least believed by them while they spoke it.

Canting Prayers and the English Liturgy.

And thus having accounted for the prayers of our Church according to the great rule prescribed in the text, Let thy words be few: let us now, according to the same, consider also the way of praying, so much used and applauded by such as have renounced the communion and liturgy of our Church; and it is but reason that they should bring us something better in the room of what they have so disdainfully cast off. But, on the contrary, are not all their prayers exactly after the heathenish and pharisaical copy? always notable for those two things, length and tautology? Two whole hours for one prayer at a fast used to be reckoned but a moderate dose; and that for the most part fraught with such irreverent, blasphemous expressions, that to repeat them would profane the place I am speaking in; and indeed they seldom carried on the work of such a day (as their phrase was), but they left the Church in need of a new consecration. Add to this, the incoherence and confusion, the endless repetitions, and the unsufferable nonsense that never failed to hold out even with their utmost prolixity; so that in all their long fasts from first to last, from seven in the morning to seven in the evening (which was their measure), the pulpit was always the emptiest thing in the Church: and I never knew such a fast kept by them but their hearers had cause to begin a thanksgiving as soon as they had done. And the truth is, when I consider the matter of their prayers, so full of ramble, and inconsequence, and in every respect so very like the language of a dream; and compare it with their carriage of themselves in prayer, with their eyes for the most part shut, and their arms stretched out in yawning posture, a man that should hear any of them pray, might by a very pardonable error be induced to think that he was all the time hearing one talking in his sleep: besides the strange virtue which their prayers had to procure sleep in others too. So that he who should be present at all their long cant, would shew a greater ability in watching than ever they could pretend to in praying, if he could forbear sleeping, having so strong a provocation to it and so fair an excuse for it. In a word, such were their prayers, both for matter and expression, that could any one truly and exactly write them out, it would be the shrewdest and most effectual way of writing against them that could possibly be thought of.

I should not have thus troubled either you, or my self, by raking into the dirt and dunghill of these men's devotions, upon the account of any thing either done or said by them in the late times of confusion; for as they have the king's, so I wish them God's pardon also, whom I am sure they have offended much more than they have both kings put together. But that which has provoked me thus to rip up and expose to you their nauseous and ridiculous way of addressing to God even upon the most solemn occasions, is that intolerably rude and unprovoked insolence and scurrility with which they are every day reproaching and scoffing at our liturgy and the users of it, and thereby alienating the minds of the people from it, to such a degree that many thousands are drawn by them into a fatal schism; a schism that, unrepented of and continued in, will as infallibly ruin their souls as theft, whoredom, murder, or any other of the most crying, damning sins whatsoever. But leaving this to the justice of the government, to which it belongs to protect us in our spiritual, as well as in our temporal concerns, I shall only say this, that nothing can be more for the honour of our liturgy than to find it despised only by those who have made themselves remarkable to the world for despising the Lord's Prayer as much.

In the mean time, for our selves of the Church of England, who, without pretending to any new lights, think it equally a duty and commendation to be wise, and to be devout only to sobriety, and who judge it no dishonour to God himself to be worshipped according to law and rule. If the directions of Solomon, the precept and example of our Saviour, and lastly, the piety and experience of those excellent men and martyrs, who first composed and afterwards owned our liturgy with their dearest blood, may be looked upon as safe and sufficient guides to us in our public worship of God; then upon the joint authority of all these we may pronounce our liturgy the greatest treasure of rational devotion in the Christian world. And I know no prayer necessary that is not in the liturgy but one, which is this: That God would vouchsafe to continue the liturgy it self in use, honour, and veneration in this Church for ever. And I doubt not but all wise, sober, and good Christians will with equal judgment and affection give it their Amen.

Characteristic sayings are: 'An Aristotle was but the rubbish of an Adam, and Athens but the rudiments of Paradise;' of elderly men and women, "'Time out of mind" is wrote upon every line of their face;' and of the people in Isaiah xxx. 10, who exclaim: 'Prophecy not unto us right things, but prophecy unto us smooth things; As if they had said, Do but oil the razor for us, and let us alone to cut our own throats.'

South himself published many single sermons, and a collected edition in six volumes in 1692, which went through various editions, and was supplemented by five additional volumes in 1744. In 1717 appeared his Posthumous Works, with a Memoir, also his Opera Posthuma Latina. The foregoing were republished at the Clarendon Press, Oxford, in 7 vols. in 1823 (5 vols. 1842). A useful edition of the sermons was that published by Bohn (2 vols. 1844).

John Evelyn (1620–1706) was born at Wotton near Dorking, studied at Balliol, and was admitted to the Inner Temple; but after ‘studying a little, but dauncing and fooling more,’ joined the king’s army in 1642, only to leave it in three days lest himself and his brothers should be ‘expos’d to ruine, without any advantage to his majestie.’ The Covenant being pressed on him, he travelled for four years in France, Italy, and Holland; married at Paris in 1647 the ambassador’s daughter; and settled in England in 1652 at Sayes Court near Deptford. A gentleman of easy fortune and amiable character, Evelyn was one of the first in this country to treat gardening and planting scientifically; and his grounds at Sayes Court were much admired for the number of foreign plants which he reared in them, and the fine order in which they were kept. The Czar Peter—a ‘right nasty’ inmate—occupied the house after the removal of Evelyn to Wotton; and the old man was mortified by the gross manner in which his house and garden were abused by the Russian potentate and his retinue. It was one of Peter’s amusements to demolish a ‘most glorious and impenetrable holly-hedge,’ by riding through it on a wheelbarrow. A thorough-going but prudent royalist, Evelyn was much about the court after the Restoration; he acted on many committees, was one of the Commissioners of the Privy Seal, and Treasurer of Greenwich Hospital. From the first a conspicuous member of the Royal Society, he remained vigorous in intellect to the last. Active and intelligent, though neither a sage nor a hero, Evelyn wielded a busy pen and wrote on a multitude of subjects—‘architecture, painting, engraving, numismatics, history, politics, morals, education, agriculture, gardening, and commerce.’ He spake also of trees, from the cedar in Lebanon (Of Forest Trees, 1664) even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall (Acetaria, a Discourse of Sallets, 1699); of London fogs (‘the hellish and dismal cloude of sea-coale’); of men’s fashions and women’s (Tyrannus, 1661, and Mundus Muliebris, 1690); and, in The Three Late Famous Impostors (1669), of Sabatai Sevi, the most recent of Jewish Messiahs. His Sylva, or a Discourse of Forest Trees (1664), was written after an appeal to the Royal Society by the Commissioners of the Navy, dreading a scarcity of timber; and this work, aided by the king’s example, stimulated the landholders to plant an immense number of oak-trees, which, a century after, proved of the greatest service to the nation for building ships-of-war. Terra; a Discourse of the Earth, relating to the Culture and Improvement of it, appeared in 1675.

The entertaining Diary (first published in 1818, in 2 vols. 4to), to which Evelyn owes his present fame, covers a period of seventy memorable years, and is a treasury of inestimable value for our knowledge of the time; Scott said he ‘had never seen a mine so rich.’ In its pages Evelyn entered every remarkable event in which he was in any way concerned. He chronicles, without loss of dignity, familiar as well as important circumstances, and everywhere preserves the tone of an educated and reflecting observer. It is amusing to read in this work of great men going after dinner to attend a council of State, or the business of their offices; of an hour’s sermon being thought of moderate length; of ladies painting their faces treated as a novelty, or of their receiving visits from gentlemen whilst dressing, after having just risen out of bed; of the Abigail of a lady of fashion travelling on a pillion behind one of the footmen, and footmen riding with swords. When on his travels, this unromantic traveller found the scenery of the Alps horrid and melancholy: Nature seemed to him to have ‘swept up the rubbish of the earth in the Alps, to form and clear the plains of Lombardy.’ In his notices of the court, Evelyn passes quickly, but with austere dignity, over the scenes of folly and vice displayed in that circle. Thus:

I thence walk’d . . . thro’ St James’s Parke to the garden, when I both saw and heard a very familiar discourse between [the king] and Mrs Nellie, as they call’d an impudent comedian [Nell Gwynn]; she looking out of her garden on a terrace at the top of the wall, and [the king] standing on the greene walke under it. I was heartily sorry at this scene. Thence the king walked to the Dutchess of Cleaveland, another lady of pleasure, and curse of our nation.

The Last Sunday of Charles II.

I can never forget the inexpressible luxury and prophaneness, gaming, and all dissoluteness, and as it were total forgetfulness of God (it being Sunday evening) which this day se’ennight I was witness of, the king sitting and toying with his concubines, Portsmouth, Cleaveland, and Mazarine, &c.; a French boy singing love-songs in that glorious gallery, whilst about 20 of the greates courtiers and other dissolute persons were at basset round a large table, a bank of at least £2000 in gold before them, upon which two gentlemen who were with me made reflexions with astonishment. Six days after, all was in the dust!

The Great Fire in London.

1666. 2nd Sept. This fatal night about ten began that deplorable fire neere Fish streete in London.

3rd. I had public prayers at home. The fire continuing, after dinner I took coach with my Wife and Sonn and went to the Bank side in Southwark, where we beheld that dismal spectacle, the whole city in dreadful flames near the water side; all the houses from the Bridge, all Thames streete and upwards towards Cheap-side, downe to the Three Cranes, were now consum’d; and so returned exceedingly astonished what would become of the rest.

The fire having continu’d all this night (if I may call that night which was light as day for 10 miles round about, after a dreadful manner) when conspiring with a fierce eastern wind in a very drie season, I went on foote to the same place, and saw the whole south part of ye citty burning from Cheapside to ye Thames, and all along Cornehill (for it kindl’d back against ye wind as well as forward), Tower streete, Fen-church streete, Gracious [Gracechurch] streete, and so along to Bainard's Castle, and was now taking hold of St Paule's Church, to which the scaffolds contributed exceedingly. The conflagration was so universal, and the people so astonish'd, that from the beginning, I know not by what despondency or fate, they hardly stirr'd to quench it, so that there was nothing heard or seene but crying out and lamentation, running about like distracted creatures, without at all attempting to save even their goods, such a strange consternation there was upon them, so as it burned both in breadth and length, the churches, public halls, exchange, hospitals, monuments, and ornaments, leaping after a prodigious manner from house to house and streete to streete, at greate distances one from ye other; for ye heate with a long set of faire and warme weather had even ignited the air, and prepar'd the materials to conceive the fire, which devour'd after an incredible manner houses, furniture, and everything. Here we saw the Thames cover'd with goods floating, all the barges and boates laden with what some had time and courage to save, as, on ye other, ye carts, &c. carrying out to the fields, which for many miles were strew'd with moveables of all sorts, and tents erecting to shelter both people and what goods they could get away. Oh the miserable and calamitous spectacle! such as happily the world had not seene since the foundation of it, nor be outdon till the universal conflagration thereof. All the skie was of a fiery aspect, like the top of a burning oven, and the light seene above 40 miles round about for many nights. God grant mine eyes may never behold the like, who now saw above 10,000 houses all in one flame: the noise, and cracking, and thunder of the impetuous flames, ye shrieking of women and children, the hurry of people, the fall of towers, houses, and churches, was like an hideous storme, and the aire all about so hot and inflam'd, that at last one was not able to approach it, so that they were forc'd to stand still and let ye flames burn on, which they did for neere two miles in length and one in bredth. The cloud of smoke was dismall, and reach'd upon computation neer 50 miles in length. Thus I left it this afternoone burning, a resemblance of Sodom or the last day. It forcibly called to my mind that passage — non enim hic habemus stabilem civitatem ['for here we have no continuing city']: the ruines resembling the picture of Troy. London was, but is no more! Thus I returned.

4th. The burning still rages, and it was now gotten as far as the Inner Temple: all Fleete streete, the Old Bailey, Ludgate Hill, Warwick lane, Newgate, Paul's chaine, Watling streete, now flaming, and most of it reduc'd to ashes; the stones of Paul's flew like granados, ye mealting lead running downe the streetes in a streame, and the very pavements glowing with fiery rednesse, so as no horse nor man was able to tread on them, and the demolition had stopp'd all the passages, so that no help could be applied. The eastern wind still more impetuously driving the flames forward. Nothing but ye Almighty power of God was able to stop them, for vaine was ye help of man.

5th. It crossed towards White-hall: but oh, the confusion there was then at that court! It pleased his Majesty to command me among ye rest to looke after the quenching of Fetter lane end, to preserve if possible that part of Holborn, whilst the rest of ye gentlemen tooke their several posts, some at one part, some at another (for now they began to bestir themselves, and not till now, who hitherto had stood as men intoxicated, with their hands acrossed), and began to consider that nothing was likely to put a stop but the blowing up of so many houses, as might make a wider gap than any had yet been made by the ordinary method of pulling them down with engines; this some stout seamen propos'd early enough to have sav'd neere ye whole citty, but this some tenacious and avaritious men, aldermen, &c. would not permit, because their houses must have ben of the first. It was therefore now commanded to be practic'd, and my concern being particularly for the Hospital of St Bartholomew, neere Smithfield, where I had many wounded and sick men, made me the more diligent to promote it, nor was my care for the Savoy lesse. It now pleas'd God, by abating the wind, and by the industrie of ye people, infusing a new spirit into them, that the fury of it began sensibly to abate about noone, so as it came no further than ye Temple westward, nor than ye entrance of Smithfield north. But continu'd all this day and night so impetuous towards Cripplegate and the tower, as made us all despaire; it also broke out againe in the Temple, but the courage of the multitude persisting, and many houses being blown up, such gaps and desolations were soone made, as with the former three days' consumption the back fire did not so vehemently urge upon the rest as formerly. There was yet no standing neere the burning and glowing ruines by neere a furlong's space. The coale and wood wharves and magazines of oyle, rosin, &c. did infinite mischief, so as the invective which a little before I had dedicated to his Maty, and publish'd, giving warning what might probably be the issue of suffering those shops to be in the citty, was look'd on as a prophecy. The poore inhabitants were dispers'd about St George's Fields, and Moorefields, as far as Highgate, and severall miles in circle, some under tents, some under miserable hutts and hovells, many without a rag or any necessary utensills, bed or board, who from delicatenesse, riches, and easy accommodations in stately and well-furnish'd houses, were now reduc'd to extreamest misery and poverty. In this calamitous condition, I return'd with a sad heart to my house, blessing and adoring the mercy of God to me and mine. who in the midst of all this ruine was like Lot, in my little Zoar, safe and sound. . . .

7th. I went this morning on foot from Whitehall as far as London Bridge, thro' the late Fleete streete, Ludgate hill, by St Pauls, Cheapside, Exchange, Bishopgate, Aldersgate, and out to Moorefields, thence thro' Cornehill, &c. with extraordinary difficulty, clambering over heaps of yet smoking rubbish, and frequently mistaking where I was. The ground under my feete was so hot that it even burnt the soles of my shoes. In the meantime his Maty got to the Tower by water, to demolish ye houses about the graff [moat], which being built intirely about it, had they taken fire and attack'd the White Tower where the magazine of powder lay, would undoubtedly not only have beaten down and destroy'd all ye bridge, but sunke and torne the vessells in ye river, and render'd ye demolition beyond all expression for several miles about the country.

At my return, I was infinitely concern'd to find that goodly Church St Pauls now a sad ruine, and that beautiful portico (for structure comparable to any in Europe, as not long before repair'd by the late King) now rent in pieces, flakes of vast stone split asunder, and nothing remaining intire but the inscription in the architrave, showing by whom it was built, which had not one letter of it defac'd. It was astonishing to see what immense stones the heate had in a manner calcin'd, so that all ye ornaments, columns, freezes, and projectures of massie Portland stone flew off, even to ye very roofe, where a sheet of lead covering a great space (no less than six akers by measure) was totally mealte; the ruines of the vaulted roofe falling broken into St Faith's, which being filled with the magazines of bookes belonging to ye stationers, and carried thither for safety, they were all consum'd, burning for a weeke following. It is also observable that the lead over ye altar at ye east end was untouch'd, and among the divers monuments, the body of one bishop remain'd intire. Thus lay in ashes that most venerable church, one of the most antient pieces of early piety in ye Christian world, besides neere 100 more. The lead, yron worke, bells, plate, &c. mealte; the exquisitely wrought Mercers Chapell, the sumptuous Exchange, ye august fabriq of Christ Church, all ye rest of the Companies Halls, sumptuous buildings, arches, enteries all in dust; the fountaines dried up and ruin'd, whilst the very waters remain'd boiling; the voragos of subterranean cellars, wells, and dungeons, formerly warehouses, still burning in stench and dark clouds of smoke, so that in 5 or 6 miles traversing about, I did not see one load of timber unconsum'd, nor many stones but what were calcin'd white as snow. The people who now walk'd about ye ruines appear'd like men in a dismal desert, or rather in some greate citty laid waste by a cruel enemy; to which was added the stench that came from some poore creatures bodies, beds, and other combustible goods. Sir Tho. Gressham's statue, tho' fallen from its nich in the Royal Exchange, remain'd intire, when all those of ye Kings since ye Conquest were broken to pieces; also the standard in Cornehill, and Q. Elizabeth's effigies, with some armes on Ludgate, continued with but little detriment, whilst the vast yron chaines of the Citty streetes, hinges, barrs, and gates of prisons, were many of them mealte and reduc'd to cinders by ye vehement heate. I was not able to passe through any of the narrower streetes, but kept the widest; the ground and air, smoake and fiery vapour continu'd so intense, that my haire was almost sing'd, and my feete unsufferably surbated [bruised]. The bye lanes and narrower streetes were quite fill'd up with rubbish, nor could one have knowne where he was, but by ye ruines of some Church or Hall, that had some remarkable tower or pinnacle remaining. I then went towards Islington and Highgate, where one might have scene 200,000 people of all ranks and degrees dispers'd and lying along by their heapes of what they could save from the fire, deploring their losse, and tho' ready to perish for hunger and destitution, yet not asking one penny for reliefe, which to me appear'd a stranger sight than any I had yet beheld. His Majesty and Council indeede tooke all imaginable care for their reliefe, by proclamation for the country to come in and refresh them with provisions. In ye midst of all this calamity and confusion, there was, I know not how, an alarme begun that the French and Dutch, with whom we were now in hostility, were not onely landed, but even entering the Citty. There was in truth some days before greate suspicion of those two nations joyning; and now that they had ben the occasion of firing the towne. This report did so terrifie, that on a suddaine there was such an uproare and tumult that they ran from their goods, and taking what weapons they could come at, they could not be stopp'd from falling on some of those nations, whom they casually met, without sense or reason. The clamour and peril grew so excessive, that it made the whole court amaz'd, and they did with infinite paines and greate difficulty reduce and appease the people, sending troops of soldiers and guards to cause them to retire into ye fields againe, where they were watch'd all this night. I left them pretty quiet, and came home sufficiently weary and broken. Their spirits thus a little calmed, and the affright abated, they now began to repaire into ye suburbs about the Citty, where such as had friends or opportunity got shelter for the present, to which his Matys proclamation also invited them.

Still ye plague continuing in our parish, I could not adventure to our church.

10th. I went againe to ye ruines, for it was now no longer a Citty.

A Fortunate Courtier not Envied.

Sept. 6 [1680]. I din'd with Sir Stephen Fox, now one of the Lords Commissioners of ye Treasury. This gentleman came first a poore boy from the quire of Salisbury, then was taken notice of by Bp. Duppa, and afterwards waited on my Lord Percy (brother to Algernon E. of Northumberland), who procur'd for him an inferior place amongst the Clerks of the Kitchen and Greene-Cloth side, where he was found so humble, diligent, industrious, and prudent in his behaviour, that his Maty being in exile, and Mr Fox waiting, both the King and Lords about him frequently employ'd him about their affaires; trusted him both with receiving and paying the little mony they had. Returning with his Maty to England, after greate wants and greate sufferings, his Maty found him so honest and industrious, and withall so capable and ready, that being advanc'd from Clerk of ye Kitchen to that of ye Greene-Cloth, he procur'd to be Paymaster to the whole Army; and by his dexterity and punctual dealing he obtained such credit among the banquers, that he was in a short time able to borrow vast sums of them upon any exigence. The continual turning thus of mony, and the souldiers moderate allowance to him for his keeping touch with them, did so enrich him, that he is believed to be worth at least £200,000 honestly gotten and unenvied, which is next to a miracle. With all this he continues as humble and ready to do a courtesie as ever he was. He is generous, and lives very honorably; of a sweete nature, well-spoken, well-bred, and is so highly in his Maty's esteeme, and so usefull, that being long since made a knight, he is also advanced to be one of ye Lords Commissrs of ye Treasurie, and has the reversion of the Cofferer's place after Harry Brounker. He has married his eldest daughter to my Lord Cornwallis, and gave her 12,000 pounds, and restor'd that intangl'd family besides. He match'd his son to Mrs Trollop, who brings with her (besides a great sum) neere, if not altogether £2000 per ann. Sr Stephen's lady (an excellent woman) is sister to Mr Whittle, one of the King's chirurgeons. In a word, never was man more fortunate than Sir Stephen; he is an handsome person, vertuous, and very religious.

Fox was founder of the noble English house to which the Lords Holland and Charles James Fox belonged.

Frost Fair on the Thames.

1683-4. 1st January. The weather continuing intolerably severe, streetes of booths were set upon the Thames; the aire was so very cold and thick, as of many yeares there had not ben the like. The small pox was very mortal. . . .

9th. I went crosse the Thames on the ice, now become so thick as to beare not onely streetes of booths, in which they roasted meate, and had divers shops of wares, quite acrosse as in a towne, but coaches, carts, and horses passed over. So I went from Westminster Stayres to Lambeth, and din'd with the archbishop: where I met my Lord Bruce, Sir Geo. Wheeler, Coll. Cooke, and severall divines. After dinner and discourse with his Grace till evening prayers, Sir Geo. Wheeler and I walked over the ice from Lambeth Stayres to the Horse Ferry.

16th. The Thames was fill'd with people and tents, selling all sorts of wares as in the City.

24th. The frost continuing more and more severe, the Thames before London was still planted with bootches in formal streetes, all sorts of trades and shops furnish'd and full of commodities, even to a printing-presse, where the people and ladyes tooke a fancy to have their names printed, and the day and year set down when printed on the Thames: this humour took so universally, that 'twas estimated the printer gained £5 a day for printing a line onely, at sixpence a name, besides what he got by ballads, &c. Coaches plied from Westminster to the Temple, and from several other staires to and fro, as in the streetes, sleds, sliding with skeets, a bull-baiting, horse and coach-races, puppet-plays and interludes, cookes, tipling and other lewd places, so that it seem'd to be a bacchanalian triumph, or carnival on the water, whilst it was a severe judgment on the land, the trees not onely splitting as if lightning-struck, but men and cattle perishing in divers places, and the very seas so lock'd up with ice, that no vessels could stir out or come in. The fowles, fish, and birds, and all our exotiq plants and greenes, universally perishing. Many parkes of deer were destroyed, and all sorts of fuell so deare that there were greate contributions to preserve the poore alive. Nor was this severe weather much less intense in most parts of Europe, even as far as Spaine and the most southern tracts. London, by reason of the excessive coldnesse of the aire hindering the ascent of the smoke, was so filled with the fuliginous steame of the sea-coale, that hardly could one see crosse the streetes, and this filling the lungs with its grosse particles, exceedingly obstructed the breath, so as one could scarcely breath. Here was no water to be had from the pipes and engines, nor could the brewers and divers other tradesmen work, and every moment was full of disastrous accidents.

February 5th. It began to thaw, but froze again. My coach crossed from Lambeth to the Horseferry at Millbank, Westminster. The booths were almost all taken downe; but there was first a map or landskip cut in copper representing all the manner of the camp, and the several actions, sports, and pastimes thereon, in memory of so signal a frost.

Mary Evelyn.

March 7 [1685]. My daughter Mary [in the nineteenth year of her age] was taken with the small-pox, and there was soon found no hope of her recovery. A greate affliction to me, but God's holy will be done.

March 10. She receiv'd the blessed sacrament; after which, disposing herselfe to suffer what God should determine to inflict, she bore the remainder of her sicknesse with extraordinary patience and piety, and more than ordinary resignation and blessed frame of mind. She died the 14th, to our unspeakable sorrow and affliction; and not to ours onely, but that of all who knew her, who were many of the best quality, greatest and most virtuous persons. The justnesse of her stature, person, comeliness of countenance, gracefullnesse of motion, unaffected tho' more than ordinarily beautifull, were the least of her ornaments, compared with those of her mind. Of early piety, singularly religious, spending a part of every day in private devotion, reading, and other vertuous exercises; she had collected and written out many of the most usefull and judicious periods of the books she read in a kind of common place, as out of Dr Hammond on the New Testament, and most of the best practical treatises. She had read and digested a considerable deale of history and of places [geography]. The French tongue was as familiar to her as English; she understood Italian, and was able to render a laudable account of what she read and observed, to which assisted a most faithful memory and discernment; and she did make very prudent and discrete reflexions upon what she had observ'd of the conversations among which she had at any time ben, which being continually of persons of the best quality, she thereby improved. She had an excellent voice, to which she play'd a thorough-bass on the harpsichord, in both which she arived to that perfection, that of the schollars of those two famous masters Signors Pietro and Bartholome she was esteem'd the best; for the sweetnesse of her voice and management of it added such an agreeablenesse to her countenance, without any constraint or concerne, that when she sung, it was as charming to the eye as to the eare; this I rather note, because it was a universal remarke, and for which so many noble and judicious persons in musiq desired to heare her, the last being at Lord Arundel's of Wardour. What shall I say, or rather not say, of the cheerefullnesse and agreeableness of her humour? Condescending to the meanest servant in the family, or others, she still kept up respect, without the least pride. She would often read to them, examine, instruct, and pray with them if they were sick, so as she was exceedingly beloved of every body. . . . She never played at cards without extreme importunity. No one could read prose or verse better or with more judgment; and, as she read, so she writ, not only most correct orthography, with that maturitie of judgment and exactnesse of the periods, choice of expressions, and familiarity of stile, that some letters of hers have astonish'd me and others. . . . Nothing was so delightful to her as to go into my study, where she would willingly have spent whole dayes, for, as I said, she had read abundance of history, and all the best poets; even Terence, Plautus, Homer, Virgil, Horace, Ovid; all the best romances and modern poems; she could compose happily, and put in pretty symbols, as in the Mundus Muliebris, wherein is an enumeration of the immense variety of the modes and ornaments belonging to the sex; but all these are vain trifles to the virtues that adorn'd her soule; she was sincerely religious, most dutifull to her parents, whom she lov'd with an affection temper'd with great esteeme, so as we were easy and free, and never were so well pleas'd as when she was with us, nor needed we other conversation. She was kind to her sisters, and was still improving them by her constant course of piety. O deare, sweete, and desirable child, how shall I part with all this goodness and virtue without the bitterness of sorrow and reluctance of a tender parent! Thy affection, duty, and love to me was that of a friend as well as a child. Nor lesse deare to thy mother, whose example and tender care of thee was unparallel'd; nor was thy returne to her lesse conspicuous. Oh, how she mourns thy loss! how desolate hast thou left us! to the grave shall we both carry thy memory!

From 'Tyrannus, or the Mode.'

'Twas a witty expression of Malvezzi, I vestimenti negli animali sono molto sicuri segni della loro natura; negli huomini del lor cervello—garments, says he, in animals are infallible signes of their nature; in men, of their understanding. Though I would not judge of the monk by the hood he wears, or celebrate the humour of Julian's court, where the philosophic mantle made all his officers appear like so many conjurors, 'tis worth the observing yet, that the people of Rome left off the toga, an ancient and noble garment, with their power, and that the vicissitude of their habite was little better than a presage of that of their fortune; for the military saga differencing them from their slaves, was no small indication of the declining of their courage, which shortly follow'd. And I am of opinion that when once wee shall see the Venetian senat quit the gravity of their vests, the state itself will not long subsist without some considerable alteration. It is not a trivial remark (which I have somewhere met with) that when a nation is able to impose and give laws to the habit of another (as the late Tartars did to China) it has, like that of language, proved the forerunner of their conquests there. . . . I am of opinion that the Swiss had not been now a nation but for keeping to their prodigious breeches. . . .

But, be it excusable in the French to alter and impose the mode on others, for the reasons deduced; 'tis no less a weakness and a shame in the rest of the world, who have no dependency on them, to admit them, at least to that degree of levity as to turn into all their shapes without discrimination; so as when the freak takes our Monsieurs to appear like so many farces or Jack-Puddings on the stage, all the world should alter shape, and play the pantomims with them.

Methinks a French taylor with his ell in his hand looks the enchantress Circe over the companions of Ulysses, and changes them into as many formes. One while we are made to be loose in our clothes, . . . and by and by appear like so many malefactors sew'd up in sacks, as of old they were wont to treat a parricide, with a dog, an ape, and a serpent. Now, we are all twist, and at a distance look like a pair of tongs, and anon stuff'd out behind like a Dutchman. This gallant goes so pinch'd in the wast, as if he were prepar'd for the question of the fiery plate in Turkey; and that so loose in the middle, as if he would turn insect, or drop in two; now, the short wasts and skirts in Pye-court is the mode; then the wide hose, or a man in coats again; monstrum geminum, de viro femina, mox de femina vir. Methinks we should learn to handle distaffe too; Hercules did so when he courted Omphale; and those who sacrificed to Ceres put on the petty-coat with much confidence. . . .

It was a fine silken thing which I spied walking th' other day through Westminster Hall, that had as much ribbon about him as would have plundered six shops, and set up twenty country pedlers. All his body was drest like a May-pole, or a Tom-a-Beck's cap. A fregat newly rigged kept not half such a clatter in a storme as this puppet's streamers did when the wind was in his shrouds; the motion was wonderful to behold, and the well-chosen colours were red, orange, blew, of well gum'd satin, which argued a happy fancy; but so was our gallant overcharged. . . . [that] whether he did wear this garment, or as a porter bear it only, was not easily to be resolved. . . .

For my part, I profess that I delight in a cheerfull gaiety, affect and cultivate variety. The universe itself were not beautifull to me without it: but as that is in constant and uniforme succession in the natural, where men do not disturb it, so would I have it also in the artificial. If the kings of Mexico chang'd four times a day, it was but an upper vest, which they were us'd to honour some meritorious servant with. Let men change their habits as oft as they please, so the change be for the better. I would have a summer habit, and a winter; for the spring and for the autumn. Something I would indulge to youth; something to age and humour. . . . What have we to do with these foreign butterflies? In God's name, let the change be our own, not borrow'd of others; for why should I dance after a Monsieur's flajolet only, that have a set of English viols for my concert? We need no French inventions for the stage, or for the back; we have better materials for clothes, they better taylors. I hope to see the day when all this shall be reform'd, and when all the world shall receive their standard from our most illustrious Prince and his grandees, . . . and that it shall be as presumptuous for any foreign nation to impose upon our court, as it is indeed ridiculous it should and its greatest diminution.

Samuel Pepys

was born 23rd February 1633, the son of a London tailor belonging to an old family in the eastern counties. He was born almost certainly in London, but possibly at Brampton near Huntingdon, where his father's family had a small property; he went to school at Huntingdon before entering St Paul's School. Thence he passed in 1651 to Magdalene College, Cambridge. In 1655, very soon after leaving college, he married Elizabeth St Michel, a beautiful but portionless girl of fifteen, daughter of a refugee Huguenot who lived the precarious life of a projector. Sir Edward Montagu (afterwards Earl of Sandwich), whose mother was a Pepys, gave a helping hand to the imprudent couple, and allowed them to live in his house. Probably Montagu, his father's cousin, had ere this been Samuel's patron: to Montagu, at all events, his start in life was entirely due. He was secretary to Montagu when in command of the fleet that brought Charles

II. back to England. His appointment to the clerkship of the Acts of the Navy in 1660 was an obvious piece of nepotism, for he knew nothing about naval matters; but he soon became master of the work of his office, and both now and subsequently as Secretary to the Admiralty, he was an industrious, energetic, and distinguished naval official. At the Revolution his career was closed, but until the end of his life he was still looked upon as the Nestor of navy affairs, to be consulted upon matters of particular importance. His longest expedition from home was when he accompanied the commander sent to Tangier to demolish the forts and bring home the garrison. Pepys's life was prosperous; he lived well, kept a carriage, but steadily made money. He was twice Master of the Trinity House, was Master of the Clothworkers Company, twice sat for a short time in Parliament, and was even President of the Royal Society (1684-86). But he was not without his troubles. At the Popish Plot in 1679 he was committed to the Tower, and in 1690 he was placed in Gatehouse at Westminster for a few days; and at his death the Crown was indebted to him to the extent of £28,000, a sum which was never paid. He died on the 26th of May 1703. His library, bequeathed to Magdalene College, Cambridge, still remains in the exact condition in which he left it.

It is not as an official that the fame of Pepys still lives, nor as the author of important Memoirs relating to the state of the Royal Navy (1690)—his only acknowledged publication—but as the writer of a Diary which is unique in the literature of the world. This work has thrown the most unexpected light upon the history and manners of his day, while at the same time it presents a most remarkable psychological study. Never before had man written down his inmost feelings with so little disguise. The events of the day, the gaieties of the court, his views on men and things, are not recorded with so much particularity as the steps in his own upward progress to credit, influence, wealth; his occupations, amusements, household economies, and even domestic squabbles. His most trifling thoughts and sudden impulses, his vanities, his sillinesses, his numerous and considerable lapses from propriety in various directions—many of them such as even he himself regarded as distinctly discreditable—are set down with a frankness, fullness, and particularity that almost pass comprehension, even when we know that the catalogue was never meant for publicity, and did in fact escape the knowledge of the world for more than two hundred years. His record of ten years' experiences was enshrined in the shorthand Pepys doubtless used in his office; and the deciphering of it (by means of Pepys's own longhand transcript of a story in it) occupied John Smith, rector of Baldock in Herts, for some twelve or fourteen hours a day from 1819 till 1822. The book was first published by Lord Braybrooke, with extensive omissions, in 1825. Mr Mynors Bright added many passages in his edition of 1875; but the Diary had never been published in practical entirety till 1893-96, when Mr Wheatley's great edition appeared. And even he had to omit some quite unprintable anekdota—such as Pepys was wont even in his shorthand MS. to partly disguise in French, Latin, Greek, or Spanish. The Diary was begun on New Year's Day 1659-60, and discontinued 31st May 1669, when his eyesight began to fail.

Why any sane man should have executed such a self-portraiture remains a mystery. Very many of the peccadilloes recorded, even the most innocent of them, are exactly such as the average man is unwilling to plead guilty to at the bar of conscience, or if he secretly admits them, is eminently anxious to forget (and forgive) for ever. Clearly there is here a vast quantity of materials wholly beside the purpose, even if Pepys had himself designed to construct a regular autobiography. The broken straws in a turbid current, the trifles that are now held to be significant and interesting elements in the development of a soul (even of a fifth-rate one), were not then valued for biographical purposes. Augustine's Confessions were a spiritual exercise, a religious penance; even Rousseau's, a century after Pepys, were a literary tour de force meant to challenge the attention of all France and astonish the world. In the contents of Pepys's six private MS. volumes of secret notes, memoranda, and confessions, whatever purpose he meant them to serve, we have enough and to spare of interest, historical, social, and psychological. For the psychological attraction, though the most problematical, is not predominant. Pepys is an acute and observant authority on authentic history at first hand, especially of that kind of history which, though not included in the dignified annals of the time, is yet of essential importance in its own way, and of perennial interest. It deals largely with facts which, if not weighty in themselves or in their influence on the course of events, are yet wonderfully valuable for giving an insight into contemporary life, and for exhibiting to us a realistic picture of Pepys's times. The charm of Pepys's own character-studies does not depend mainly on its showing the development of a soul. It is often said that a sincere and detailed record of the growth of any mind, however commonplace, would be profoundly interesting. Interesting as psychology perhaps, not necessarily as literature. But Pepys's mind was by no means commonplace, though it had very many commonplace bits in it. And in that department of his Diary he gives us exactly the kind of thing which as gossip has always enormously interested mankind. Usually gossip, whether about neighbours or eminent persons, is meagre in detail and of dubious authority. Pepys has indefeasible fascination for his readers in that he furnishes a vast supply of what may be called gossip about himself, more highly detailed and fully authenticated than the most imaginative general rumour ever put in currency, and at least as highly seasoned.

By his remorseless and superfluous confessions, Pepys unquestionably did himself serious injustice in the minds of those who came to know him through these long unseen and unread note-books of his. Amidst so much high eating and deep drinking, such junketings, theatre-goings, and musical parties, it is difficult to remember that the writer transacted laborious and responsible work systematically and regularly. The small vanities and multiform frailties, the childish ambitions and indiscreet and frequent amorous ebullitions, suggest a feeble, an absurd creature, a gadabout, a man without character. Undoubtedly his character was far from perfect; but it must have had much good, sound stuff in it. This correspondent of Isaac Newton, of Christopher Wren, and of Hans Sloane was trusted by his superiors, liked by his inferiors in office, and is still remembered with respect at the Admiralty. He loved emoluments, perquisites, and gifts, but in a corrupt age was not himself corrupt—was a determined foe to corruption in others, and a resolute, active, and patriotic reformer of abuses. He had a lively interest in music and literature, and considerable culture in both arts, though his judgment in literature was not at all times sound; he was a virtuoso, a collector, and in the science of the time a very intelligent dilettante. He was shrewd, sagacious, persistent throughout, and in many crises of life he acted a very manful part. In spite of his vanity and garrulousness, and the copiousness of his amazing self-revelation, he has not been fair to himself in his Diary; his most sterling moods are hardly illuminated, his foibles and more serious failings stand out in too strong light. One of the charms of the Diary is that it is so spontaneous, natural, and sincere; the style, always unstudied and often slipshod, lacks all literary merit except its perfect naturalness, its obvious closeness to the lively chatter of the man amongst his intimates in Good King Charles's golden days.

At the commencement of his Diary his fortunes were at a low ebb; but after his voyage with Montagu in June 1660, he records that on casting up his accounts he found that he was worth £100, 'for which,' he piously adds, 'I bless Almighty God, it being more than I hoped for so soon, being, I believe, not clearly worth £25 when I came to sea, besides my house and goods.' The emoluments and perquisites of his office soon added to his riches, and the Clerk of the Acts gradually soared into that region of fashion and gaiety which he had contemplated with wonder and admiration from a distance. On the 10th of July he put on his first silk suit; and the subsequent additions to his wardrobe—camlet cloaks with gold and silver buttons, and the like magnificence—are all carefully noted. His wife (whom he is never tired of praising) also shares in this finery, and her first grand appearance is thus recorded:

Mrs Pepys in a New Dress.

August 18th, 1660.—This morning I took my wife towards Westminster by water, and landed her at Whitefriars with £5 to buy her a petticoat, and I to the Privy Seal. By and by comes my wife to tell me that my father has persuaded her to buy a most fine cloth of 26s. a yard, and a rich lace, that the petticoat will come to £5, at which I was somewhat troubled, but she doing it very innocently, I could not be angry. I did give her more money and sent her away, and I and Creed and Captain Hayward (who is now unkindly put out of the Plymouth to make way for Captain Allen to go to Constantinople, which I know will trouble my Lord) went and dined at the Leg in King Street, when Captain Ferrers, my Lord's cornet, comes to us, who after dinner took me and Creed to the Cockpitt play, the first that I have had time to see since my coming from sea, The Loyall Subject, where one Kinaston, a boy, acted the Duke's sister, but made the loveliest lady that ever I saw in my life, only her voice was not very good. After the play done, we three went to drink, and by Captain Ferrers' means Kinaston, and another that acted Archas the General, came and drank with us. . . .

19th (Lord's Day).— . . . This morning Sir W. Batten, Pen, and myself, went to church to the churchwardens, to demand a pew, which at present could not be given us, but we are resolved to have one built. So we staid, and heard Mr Mills, a very good minister. Home to dinner, where my wife had on her new petticoat that she bought yesterday, which indeed is a very fine cloth and a fine lace; but that being of a light colour, and the lace all silver, it makes no great show.

In the Park.

July 14th, 1663.—Hearing that the King and Queen are rode abroad with the Ladies of Honour to the Park, and seeing a great crowd of gallants staying here to see their return, I also staid, walking up and down. . . . By and by the King and Queen, who looked in this dress (a white laced waistcoat and a crimson short petticoat, and her hair dressed à la négligence) mighty pretty; and the King rode hand in hand with her. Here was also my Lady Castlemaine rode among the rest of the ladies; but the king took, methought, no notice of her; nor when they 'light, did anybody press (as she seemed to expect, and staid for it) to take her down, but was taken down by her own gentleman. She looked mighty out of humour, and had a yellow plume in her hat (which all took notice of), and yet is very handsome, but very melancholy; nor did anybody speak to her, or she so much as smile or speak to anybody. I followed them up into Whitehall, and into the Queen's presence, where all the ladies walked, talking and fiddling with their hats and feathers, and changing and trying one another's by one another's heads, and laughing. But it was the finest sight to me, considering their great beautys and dress, that ever I did see in all my life. But, above all, Mrs Stewart [afterwards Duchess of Richmond] in this dress, with her hat cocked and a red plume, with her sweet eye, little Roman nose, and excellent taille, is now the greatest beauty I ever saw, I think, in my life; and, if ever woman can, do exceed my Lady Castlemaine, at least in this dress: nor do I wonder if the king changes, which I verily believe is the reason of his coldness to my Lady Castlemaine.

Mr Pepys sets up a Carriage.

November 5th, 1668.—Thence with Mr Povy, spent all the afternoon going up and down among the coachmakers in Cow Lane, and did see several, and at last did pitch upon a little chariott, whose body was framed, but not covered, at the widow's that made Mr Lowther's fine coach; and we are mightily pleased with it, it being light, and will be very genteel and sober: to be covered with leather, and yet will hold four. Being much satisfied with this, I carried him to White Hall. And so by coach home, where give my wife a good account of my day's work, and so to the office, and there late, and so to bed.

30th.—My wife, after dinner, went the first time abroad [in] her coach, calling on Roger Pepys, and visiting Mrs Creed, and my cozen Turner, while I at home all the afternoon and evening, very busy and doing much work, to my great content. . . . Thus ended this month with very good content, that hath been the most sad to my heart and the most expensive to my purse on things of pleasure, having furnished my wife's closet and the best chamber, and a coach and horses, that ever I yet knew in the world; and do put me into the greatest condition of outward state that ever I was in, or hoped ever to be, or desired; and this at a time when we do daily expect great changes in this Office; and by all reports we must all of us turn out.

December 2nd.— . . . And so back home and abroad with my wife, the first time that ever I rode in my own coach, which do make my heart rejoice, and praise God, and pray him to bless it to me and continue it. So she and I to the King's play-house, and there saw The Usurper; a pretty good play, in all but what is designed to resemble Cromwell and Hugh Peters, which is mighty silly. The play done, we to Whitehall; where my wife staid while I up to the Duchesse's and Queen's side, to speak with the Duke of York; and here saw all the ladies, and heard the silly discourse of the King, with his people about him, telling a story of my Lord Rochester's. . . .

April 11th, 1669.—Thence to the Park, my wife and I; and here Sir W. Coventry did first see me and my wife in a coach of our own; and so did also this night the Duke of York, who did eye my wife mightily. But I begin to doubt that my being so much seen in my own coach at this time may be observed to my prejudice; but I must venture it now. . . .

May 1st.—Up betimes. Called up by my tailor, and there first put on a summer suit this year; but it was not my fine one of flowered tabby vest, and coloured camelott tunique, because it was too fine with the gold lace at the bands, that I was afraid to be seen in it; but put on the stuff suit I made the last year, which is now repaired; and so did go to the Office in it, and sat all the morning, the day looking as if it would be fowle. At noon, home to dinner, and there find my wife extraordinary fine, with her flowered tabby gown that she made two years ago, now laced exceeding pretty; and indeed was fine all over; and mighty earnest to go, though the day was very lowering; and she would have me put on my fine suit, which I did. And so anon we went alone through the town with our new liveries of serge, and the horses' manes and tails tied with red ribbons, and the standards there gilt with varnish, and all clean, and green reines, that people did mightily look upon us; and, the truth is, I did not see any coach more pretty, though more gay, than ours, all the day. But we set out, out of humour—I because Betty, whom I expected, was not come to go with us; and my wife that I would sit on the same seat with her, which she likes not, being so fine: and she then expected to meet Sheres, which we did in the Pell Mell, and, against my will, I was forced to take him into the coach, but was sullen all day almost, and little complaisant: the day also being displeasing, though the Park full of coaches, but dusty, and windy, and cold, and now and then a little dribbling rain; and, what made it worst, there were so many hackney-coaches as spoiled the sight of the gentlemen's; and so we had little pleasure. But here was W. Batelier and his sister in a borrowed coach by themselves, and I took them and we to the lodge; and at the door did give them a syllabub, and other things, cost me 12s. and pretty merry. And so back to the coaches, and there till the evening, and then home.

Pepys on 'Hudibras.'

December 26th, 1662.—Up, my wife to the making of Christmas pies all day, doeing now pretty well again, and I abroad to several places about some businesses, among others bought a bake-pan in Newgate Market, and sent it home, it cost me 16s. So to Dr Williams, but he is out of town, then to the Wardrobe. Hither come Mr Battersby; and we falling into discourse of a new book of drollery in use, called Hudibras, I would needs go find it out, and met with it at the Temple: cost me 2s. 6d. But when I come to read it, it is so silly an abuse of the Presbyter Knight going to the wars, that I am ashamed of it; and by and by meeting at Mr Townsend's at dinner, I sold it to him for 18d. . . .

February 6th.— . . . Thence to Lincoln's Inn Fields; and it being too soon to go to dinner, I walked up and down, and looked upon the outside of the new theatre now a-building in Covent Garden, which will be very fine. And so to a bookseller's in the Strand, and there bought Hudibras again, it being certainly some ill-humour to be so against that which all the world cries up to be the example of wit; for which I am resolved once more to read him, and see whether I can find it or no. . . .

November 28th.— . . . And thence abroad to Paul's Church-yard, and there looked upon the second part of Hudibras, which I buy not, but borrow to read, to see if it be as good as the first, which the world cry so mightily up, though it hath not a good liking in me, though I had tried by twice or three times reading to bring myself to think it witty. Back again and home to my office. . . .

Pepys at the Theatre.

March 2nd, 1667.—After dinner, with my wife, to the King's house to see The Mayden Queene, a new play of Dryden's mightily commended for the regularity of it, and the strain and wit; and the truth is there is a comical part done by Nell [Gwynn], which is Florimell, that I never can hope ever to see the like done again, by man or woman. The King and Duke of York were at the play. But so great performance of a comical part was never, I believe, in the world before as Nell do this, both as a mad girl, then most and best of all, when she comes in like a young gallant; and hath the motions and carriage of a spark the most that ever I saw any man have. It makes me, I confess, admire her. Thence home and to the office, where busy a while, and then home to read the lives of Henry 5th and 6th in Speede, and so to bed.

October 5th.— . . . And so to the King's house; and there, going in, met with Knepp, and she took us up into the tiring-rooms: and to the women's shift, where Nell was dressing herself, and was all unready, and is very pretty, prettier than I thought. And so walked all up and down the house above, and then below into the scene-room, and here sat down, and she gave us fruit: and there I read the questions to Knepp, while she answered me, through all her part of Flora's Figary's [Rhodes's play of Flora's Vagaries], which was acted to-day. But, Lord! to see how they were both painted would make a man mad, and did make me loath them; and what base company of men comes among them, and how lewdly they talk! and how poor the men are in clothes, and yet what a show they make on the stage by candle-light, is very observable. But to see how Nell cursed for having so few people in the pit, was pretty; the other house carrying away all the people at the new play, and is said, now-a-days, to have generally most company, as being better players. By and by into the pit, and there saw the play, which is pretty good. . . .

December 28th.—Up, and to the office, where busy all the morning, at noon home, and there to dinner with my clerks and Mr Pelling, and had a very good dinner, among others a haunch of venison boiled, and merry we were, and I rose soon from dinner, and with my wife and girl to the King's house, and there saw The Mad Couple, which is but an ordinary play; but only Nell's and Hart's mad parts are most excellent done, but especially hers: which makes it a miracle to me to think how ill she do any serious part, as the other day, just like a fool or changeling; and in a mad part do beyond imitation almost. It pleased us mightily to see the natural affection of a poor woman, the mother of one of the children, brought on the stage: the child crying, she by force got upon the stage, and took up her child, and carried it away off the stage from Hart. Many fine faces here to-day. Thence home, and then to the office late, and then home to supper and to bed.

February 27, 1667-8.—All the morning at the office, and at noon home to dinner, and thence with my wife and Deb to the King's house, to see The Virgin Martyr [by Massinger and Dekker], the first time it hath been acted a great while: and it is mighty pleasant; not that the play is worth much, but it is finely acted by Becke Marshall. But that which did please me beyond anything in the whole world was the wind-musique when the angel comes down, which is so sweet that it ravished me, and indeed, in a word, did wrap up my soul so that it made me really sick, just as I have formerly been when in love with my wife; that neither then, nor all the evening going home, and at home, I was able to think of anything, but remained all night transported, so as I could not believe that ever any musick hath that real command over the soul of a man as this did upon me: and makes me resolve to practise wind-musique, and to make my wife do the like.

Pepys at Church.

May 26th, 1667 (Lord's Day).—Up sooner than usual on Sundays, and to walk, it being exceedingly hot all night (so as this night I begun to leave off my waistcoat this year) and this morning, and so to walk in the garden till toward church time, when my wife and I to church, where several strangers of good condition come to our pew. After dinner, I by water alone to Westminster, where . . . did go towards the parish church . . . and then much against my will staid out the whole church in pain . . . but I did entertain myself with my perspective glass up and down the church, by which I had the great pleasure of seeing and gazing at a great many very fine women; and what with that, and sleeping, I passed away the time till sermon was done. . . . I away to my boat, and up with it as far as Barne Elmes, reading of Mr Evelyn's late new book against Solitude [On Employment, against Sir George Mackenzie Upon Solitude], in which I do not find much excess of good matter, though it be pretty for a bye discourse. I walked the length of the Elmes, and with great pleasure saw some gallant ladies and people come with their bottles, and baskets, and chairs, and forms, to sup under the trees by the waterside, which was mighty pleasant. I to boat again and to my book, and having done that I took another book, Mr Boyle's Of Colours, and there read, where I laughed, finding many fine things worthy observation, and so landed at the Old Swan, and so home, where I find my poor father newly come out of an unexpected fit of his pain, that they feared he would have died.

His Great Speech in the House of Commons.

March 5th, 1668.—With these thoughts I lay troubling myself till six o'clock, restless, and at last getting my wife to talk to me to comfort me, which she at last did, and made me resolve to quit my hands of the office, and endure the trouble of it no longer than till I can clear myself of it. So with great trouble, yet with some ease from this discourse with my wife, I up and to my office, whither come my clerks, and so I did huddle the best I could some more notes for my discourse to-day, and by nine o'clock was ready, and did go down to the Old Swan, and there by boat, with T. H[ater] and W. H[ewer] with me, to Westminster, where I found myself come time enough, and my brethren all ready. But I full of thoughts and trouble touching the issue of this day; and to comfort myself, did go to the Dog, and drink half a pint of mulled sack, and in the Hall [Westminster] did drink a dram of brandy at Mrs Hewlett's; and with the warmth of this did find myself in better order as to courage, truly. So we all up to the lobby; and between eleven or twelve o'clock were called in, with the mace before us, into the House, where a mighty full House; and we stood at the bar, namely, Brouncker, Sir J. Minnes, Sir T. Harvey, and myself, W. Pen being in the House, as a member. I perceive the whole House was full of expectation of our defence what it would be, and with great prejudice. After the Speaker had told us the dissatisfaction of the House, and read the Report of the Committee, I began our defence most acceptably and smoothly, and continued at it without any hesitation or losse, but with full scope, and all my reason free about me, as if it had been at my own table, from that time till past three in the afternoon; and so ended, without any interruption from the Speaker; but we withdrew.

And there all my fellow-officers, and all the world that was within hearing, did congratulate me, and cry up my speech as the best thing they ever heard; and my fellow-officers overjoyed in it. . . . After the play, to my wife, whom W. Hewer had told of my success, and she overjoyed; and, after talking a while, I betimes to bed, having had no quiet rest a good while.

6th.—Up betimes, and with Sir D. Gawden to Sir W. Coventry's chamber; where the first word he said to me was: 'Good-morrow, Mr Pepys, that must be Speaker of the Parliament-house:' and did protest I had got honour for ever in Parliament. He said that his brother, that sat by him, admires me; and another gentleman said that I could not get less than £1000 a year, if I would put on a gown and plead at the Chancery-bar; but what pleases me most, he tells me that the Solicitor-general did protest that he thought I spoke the best of any man in England. After several talks with him alone touching his own businesses, he carried me to Whitehall, and there parted; and I to the Duke of York's lodgings, and find him going to the Park, it being a very fine morning, and I after him; and, as soon as he saw me, he told me, with great satisfaction, that I had converted a great many yesterday, and did, with great praise of me, go on with the discourse with me. And by and by overtaking the King, the King and Duke of York come to me both; and he [the King] said: 'Mr Pepys, I am very glad of your success yesterday;' and fell to talk of my well speaking; and many of the Lords there. My Lord Barkeley did cry me up for what they had heard of it; and others, Parliament-men there about the King, did say that they never heard such a speech in their lives delivered in that manner. Progers, of the Bedchamber, swore to me afterwards before Brouncker, in the afternoon, that he did tell the King that he thought I might teach the Solicitor-general. Everybody that saw me almost come to me, as Joseph Williamson and others, with such eulogys as cannot be expressed. From thence I went to Westminster Hall, where I met Mr G. Montagu, who come to me and kissed me, and told me that he had often heretofore kissed my hands, but now he would kiss my lips: protesting that I was another Cicero, and said, all the world said the same of me.

Charles Cotton (1630-87)—a name best known from its piscatorial association with that of good old Izaak Walton—was a cheerful, witty, accomplished man, and a versatile, pithy, and brilliant writer, who only wanted wealth and prudence to have made him one of the leading characters of his day. (For his addition of a 'Second Part' to the Compleat Angler, see Vol. I. pp. 613, 616.) Born at Beresford in north-east Staffordshire, he married in 1656 a sister of Colonel Hutchinson, and two years later inherited from his father estates in Stafford and Derby shires, watered by the river Dove, so famous in the annals of trout-fishing. The property was much encumbered, and the poet soon added to its burdens. As a means of pecuniary relief, as well as recreation, Cotton translated books from the French and Italian, including Montaigne's Essays. His Montaigne, easy and familiar in style, is certainly liker the garrulous and witty old Gascon's conversational diction than the more stately Elizabethan periods of his predecessor Florio. In his fortieth year, Cotton obtained a captain's commission in the army, and afterwards made a fortunate second marriage with the Countess-Dowager of Ardglass, who possessed a jointure of £1500 a year. But Cotton never got out of his difficulties; the lady's fortune was secured from his mismanagement, and the poet died insolvent. His happy, careless disposition seems to have enabled him to study, angle, and delight his friends amidst all his embarrassments. He published several burlesques and travesties, some of them grossly indecent; but he wrote also many verses full of genuine poetry. One of his humorous pieces, A Voyage to Ireland in Burlesque, seems to have anticipated, as Campbell said, the manner of Anstey in the New Bath Guide. Both in prose and verse his style was simple and almost conversational, yet pithy and graceful. Scarronides, 'that villainous specimen of burlesque verse,' describes itself as 'the first book of Virgil Travestie,' and is on somewhat the same lines as Scarron's Virgile Travesti; it is witty certainly, but in deplorable taste. And so is Burlesque upon Burlesque, or the Scoffer Scoft, parodies of Lucian's dialogues in 'English Fustian,' as Cotton himself describes it.

The New Year.

Hark, the cock crows, and yon bright star
Tells us the day himself's not far;
And see where, breaking from the night,
He gilds the western hills with light.
With him old Janus does appear,
Peeping into the future year,
With such a look as seems to say
The prospect is not good that way.
Thus do we rise ill sights to see,
And 'gainst ourselves to prophesie,
When the prophetic fear of things
A more tormenting mischief brings,
More full of soul-tormenting gall
Than direst mischiefs can befall.
But stay! but stay! methinks my sight,
Better informed by clearer light,
Discerns sereneness in that brow,
That all contracted seemed but now.
His reversed face may shew distaste,
And frown upon the ills are past;
But that which this way looks is clear,
And smiles upon the new-born year.
He looks, too, from a place so high,
The year lies open to his eye;
And all the moments open are
To the exact discoverer.
Yet more and more he smiles upon
The happy revolution.

Why should we then suspect or fear
The influences of a year?
So smiles upon us the first morn,
And speaks us good as soon as born.
Pox on't! the last was ill enough,
This cannot but make better proof;
Or at the worst, as we brushed through
The last, why so we may this too;
And then the next in reason shou'd
Be superexcellently good:
For the worst ills, we daily see,
Have no more perpetuity
Than the best fortunes that do fall;
Which also brings us wherewithall
Longer their being to support,
Than those do of the other sort:
And who has one good year in three,
And yet repines at destiny,
Appears ingrateful in the case,
And merits not the good he has.
Then let us welcome the new guest
With lusty brimmers of the best:
Mirth always should good-fortune meet,
And renders e'en disaster sweet;
And though the Princess turn her back,
Let us but line ourselves with sack,
We better shall by far hold out
Till the next year she face about.

The Princess is Fortune.

A Welsh Guide.

The sun in the morning disclosed his light,
With complexion as ruddy as mine overnight;
And o'er th' eastern mountains peeping up's head,
The casement being open, espied me in bed;
With his rays he so tickled my lids, I awaked,
And was half ashamed, for I found myself naked;
But up I soon start, and was dressed in a trice,
And called for a draught of ale, sugar, and spice;
Which having turned off, I then call to pay,
And packing my nails, whipt to horse, and away.
A guide I had got who demanded great vails,
For conducting me over the mountains of Wales:
Twenty good shillings, which sure very large is;
Yet that would not serve, but I must bear his charges;
And yet for all that, rode astride on a beast,
The worst that e'er went on three legs, I protest;
It certainly was the most ugly of jades;
His hips and his rump made a right ace of spades;
His sides were two ladders, well spur-galled withal;
His neck was a helve, and his head was a mall;
For his colour, my pains and your trouble I'll spare,
For the creature was wholly denuded of hair;
And except for two things as bare as my nail,
A tuft of a mane, and a sprig of a tail. . . .
Now such as the beast was, even such was the rider,
With a head like a nutmeg, and legs like a spider;
A voice like a cricket, a look like a rat,
The brains of a goose, and the heart of a cat;
Ev'n such was my guide and his beast; let them pass,
The one for a horse, and the other an ass.

(From the Voyage to Ireland.)

Cotton's translation of Montaigne's Essays (1685) was edited by W. C. Hazlitt (1877, 1902). J. R. Tutin issued selections of his poems (1903), and J. Beresford edited his shorter poems (1923). See the Life and Poetry of Charles Cotton, by C. G. Semblower (Univ. of Penn. 1911).

Thomas Traherne (1636?-1674), son of a Hereford shoemaker, became a Commoner of Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1652, and graduated M.A. in 1661, B.D. in 1669. Private chaplain to Sir Orlando Bridgman, Lord Keeper of the Seals (1667), he retired to Teddington in 1672 with his patron, died a few months after him, and was buried under the reading-desk of the church on 10th October 1674. Two theological books, Roman Forgeries (1673) and Christian Ethics (1675), and an anonymous series of thanksgivings, A Serious and Pathetical Contemplation of the Mercies of God (1699), gave no hint of genius; not until Bertram Dobell identified and published from MSS. The Poetical Works of Thomas Traherne (1903) and Centuries of Meditations (1908) was it realised that, hidden for two centuries, there had at last been brought to light not only a poet worthy to rank with Herbert, Crashaw, and Vaughan, but a (perhaps) still greater master of English prose. In 1910 H. I. Bell edited Traherne's Poems of Felicity; these (including thirty-eight not found in Dobell's collection) he discovered among the Burney MSS. in the British Museum, apparently prepared for the press (just before or after Traherne's death) by the poet's brother Philip, but never published.

If Dobell, not inexcusably, pitched his praise of Traherne as a poet overhigh, Dr Grosart had done Vaughan no injustice in ascribing to him the verses since proved to be Traherne's. The proper place of this lovable divine is unquestionably among the older mystics and sacred poets of his century, but his recollections of childhood inevitably suggest affinities with Blake and Wordsworth. In Centuries of Meditations are parallel passages to certain of his verses, and these have convinced many critics that Traherne's true medium was prose. Imperfect technique, diffuseness, faulty rimes, stop-gap 'dos' and 'dids,' and catalogues often mar the fine rapture of the poet, and, says H. I. Bell, 'we get the impression rather of imaginative thought turned into verse than of a naturally poetic inspiration finding its inevitable expression.' Traherne's prose, with its rhythmic flow and natural splendour, invites comparison on the one hand with the Old Testament, on the other with the vers libre of Walt Whitman.

Meditations.

The corn was orient and immortal wheat which never should be reaped nor was ever sown. I thought it had stood from everlasting to everlasting. The dust and stones of the street were as precious as gold: the gates were at first the end of the world. The green trees when I saw them first through one of the gates transported and ravished me; their sweetness and unusual beauty made my heart to leap, and almost mad with ecstasy, they were such strange and wonderful things. The Men! O what venerable and reverend creatures did the aged seem! Immortal Cherubims! And young men glittering and sparkling angels, and maids strange seraphic pieces of life and beauty! Boys and girls tumbling in the street were moving jewels: I knew not that they were born or should die. But all things abided eternally as they were in their proper places. Eternity was manifest in the Light of the Day, and something infinite behind everything appeared, which talked with my expectation and moved my desire. The City seemed to stand in Eden or to be built in Heaven. The streets were mine, the temple was mine, the people were mine, their clothes and gold and silver were mine, as much as their sparkling eyes, fair skins, and ruddy faces. The skies were mine, and so were the sun and moon and stars, and all the world was mine; and I the only spectator and enjoyer of it.

Once I remember (I think I was about four years old) when I thus reasoned with myself. Sitting in a little obscure room in my father's poor house: If there be a God certainly He must be Infinite in Goodness, and that I was prompted to, by a real whispering instinct of nature. And if He be Infinite in Goodness, and a perfect Being in Wisdom and Love, certainly He must do most glorious things and give us infinite riches; how comes it to pass, therefore, that I am so poor? Of so scanty and narrow a fortune, enjoying few and obscure comforts? I thought I could not believe Him a God to me unless all His power were employed to glorify me. I knew not then my Soul or Body, nor did I think of the Heavens and the Earth, the Rivers and the Stars, the Sun or the Seas: all those were lost and absent from me. But when I found them made out of nothing for me, then I had a God indeed whom I could praise and rejoice in.

The Salutation.

These little limbs,
These eyes and hands which here I find,
These rosy cheeks wherewith my life begins,
Where have ye been? behind
What curtain were ye from me hid so long,
Where was, in what abyss, my speaking tongue?

When silent I
So many thousand, thousand years
Beneath the dust did in a chaos lie,
How could I smiles or tears,
Or lips or hands or eyes or ears perceive?
Welcome ye treasures which I now receive.

I that so long
Was nothing from eternity,
Did little think such joys as ear or tongue
To celebrate or see:
Such sounds to hear, such hands to feel, such feet,
Beneath the skies on such a ground to meet.

New burnisht joys!
Which yellow gold and pearls excel!
Such sacred treasures are the limbs in boys,
In which a soul doth dwell;
Their organised joints and azure veins
More wealth include than all the world contains.

From dust I rise,
And out of nothing now awake,
These brighter regions which salute mine eyes,
A gift from God I take.
The earth, the seas, the light, the day, the skies,
The sun and stars are mine; if those I prize.

Long time before
 I in my mother's womb was born,
 A God preparing did this glorious store,
 The world for me adorn.
 Into this Eden so divine and fair,
 So wide and bright, I come His son and heir.

A stranger here
 Strange things doth meet, strange glories see ;
 Strange treasures lodg'd in this fair world appear,
 Strange all and new to me ;
 But that they mine should be, who nothing was,
 That strangest is of all, yet brought to pass.

The Rapture.

Sweet Infancy !
 O fire of heaven ! O sacred Light !
 How fair and bright !
 How great am I,
 Whom all the world doth magnify !

O Heavenly joy !
 O great and sacred blessedness
 Which I possess !
 So great a joy
 Who did into my arms convey !

From God above
 Being sent, the Heavens me enflame :
 To praise his Name
 The stars do move !
 The burning sun doth shew His love.

O how divine
 Am I ! To all this sacred wealth,
 This life and health,
 Who raised ? Who mine
 Did make the same ? What hand divine !

Thanksgiving.

Such is the glory of Thy exquisite presence, that it is at once wholly in millions of persons—
 Wholly in them all, like the sun in a mirror, in a thousand thousand mirrors, that maketh by its beams the Heavens also to be present there ;
 And me like a mirror the entire possessor of all Thy glories.
 Most really, O Lord, are they all within me, because Thou art really dwelling there.
 Even thou, my Sun, Who with all Thy Kingdom art dwelling there.

Thinking them Vaughan's, Grosart purchased two anonymous
 MSS. volumes picked up on a bookstall in 1896-97 by Wm. T.
 Brooke. After Grosart's death Bertram Dobell acquired and identified these and a third MS. volume (containing Traherne's private prayers and devotions). Except the last, the above extracts are taken, by kind permission, from Dobell's editions of Traherne's Poems (1903) and Centuries of Meditations (1908). Traherne's
Poetical Works were edited by Gladys Wade in 1932. See also Bell's edition of Poems of Felicity (1910), and Miss Willett's Essay (1919).

The Earl of Roscommon (WENTWORTH DILLON ; c. 1633-85), nephew and godson of the famous Earl of Strafford, was born in Ireland while his uncle was Lord-Deputy there. During the Civil War he studied at Caen and travelled in France, Germany, and Italy ; and returning soon after the Restoration, was reinstated in his large Irish possessions, and received appointments in the household of the Duke of York. Roscommon, though addicted to gambling, cultivated literature,

 and produced an Essay on Translated Verse (1684), translations from Horace's Art of Poetry, from Virgil, Lucan, and Guarini, prologues and epilogues to plays, verses 'On the Death of a Lady's Dog,' and an address by the ghost of the old House of Commons to the new one. The Essay on Translated Verse inculcates in frigid couplets the rational principles of translation previously laid down by Cowley and Denham ; he commends the sixth book of Paradise Lost, published a few years before, for its sublimity. Dryden heaped on Roscommon the most lavish praise ;
 and Pope, who with some truth said that

In all Charles's days
 Roscommon only boasts unspotted bays,

declared that 'every author's merit was his own.'
 Posterity has not confirmed the last judgment ;
 Roscommon explicitly condemned indecency in verse as bad taste and lack of sense, and is much less immoral than most of his contemporaries, but, like Denham, is elegant and sensible, cold and unimpassioned.

From the 'Essay on Translated Verse.'

Take then a subject proper to expound,
 But moral, great, and worth a poet's voice ;
 For men of sense despise a trivial choice :
 And such applause it must expect to meet,
 As would some painter busy in a street
 To copy bulls and bears, and every sign
 That calls the staring sots to nasty wine.
 Yet 'tis not all to have a subject good ;
 It must delight us when 'tis understood.
 He that brings fulsome objects to my view
 (As many old have done, and many new)
 With nauseous images my fancy fills,
 And all goes down like oxymel of squills.
 Instruct the listening world how Maro sings
 Of useful subjects and of lofty things.
 These will such true, such bright ideas raise,
 As merit gratitude, as well as praise.
 But foul descriptions are offensive still,
 Either for being like or being ill.
 For who without a qualm hath ever looked
 On holy garbage, though by Homer cooked ?
 Whose railing heroes, and whose wounded gods,
 Make some suspect he snores as well as nods.
 But I offend ; Virgil begins to frown,
 And Horace looks with indignation down :
 My blushing Muse with conscious fear retires,
 And whom they like implicitly admires.

Virgil

On sure foundations let your fabric rise,
 And with attractive majesty surprise ;
 Not by affected meretricious arts,
 But strict harmonious symmetry of parts ;
 Which through the whole insensibly must pass
 With vital heat, to animate the mass :
 A pure, an active, an auspicious flame,
 And bright as heaven, from whence the blessing came.

But few, few spirits pre-ordained by fate,
 The race of gods, have reached that envied height.
 No rebel Titans' sacrilegious crime,
 By heaping hills on hills, can hither climb:
 The grisly ferryman of hell denied
 Aeneas entrance, till he knew his guide.
 How justly then will impious mortals fall,
 Whose pride would soar to heaven without a call!
 Pride, of all others the most dangerous fault,
 Proceeds from want of sense, or want of thought. . . .
 I pity from my soul unhappy men,
 Compelled by want to prostitute the pen;
 Who must, like lawyers, either starve or plead,
 And follow, right or wrong, where guineas lead!
 But you, Pompilian, wealthy pampered heirs,
 Who to your country owe your swords and cares;
 Let no vain hope your easy mind seduce,
 For rich ill poets are without excuse;
 'Tis very dangerous tampering with the Muse;
 The profit's small, and you have much to lose;
 For though true wit adorns your birth or place,
 Degenerate lines degrade the attained race.
 No poet any passion can excite,
 But what they feel transport them when they write.

Part of his Version of the 'Dies Irae.'

That day of wrath, that dreadful day,
 Shall the whole world in ashes lay,
 As David and the Sibyls say.

What horror will invade the mind,
 When the strict Judge, who would be kind,
 Shall have few venial faults to find!

The last loud trumpet's wondrous sound
 Shall through the rending tombs rebound,
 And wake the nations under ground.

Nature and Death shall, with surprise,
 Behold the pale offender rise,
 And view the Judge with conscious eyes.

Then shall, with universal dread,
 The sacred mystic book be read,
 To try the living and the dead.

The Judge ascends his awful throne;
 He makes each secret sin be known,
 And all with shame confess their own.

O then, what interest shall I make
 To save my last important stake,
 When the most just have cause to quake?

Sir Charles Sedley (c. 1639-1701) was one of the brightest satellites of the court of Charles II. —as witty and gallant as Rochester, hardly less notorious for dissipation of all kinds, and with something of the same gift as a writer. He was the son of a Kentish baronet, Sir John Sedley (or Sidley) of Aylesford. The Restoration drew him to London, and he became such a favourite for his taste and accomplishments that Charles is said to have asked him if he had not obtained from Nature a patent to be Apollo's viceroy. His estate, his time, and whatever character he had were squandered at court; but latterly the poet largely redeemed himself, attended Parliament, and promoted or at least acquiesced in the Revolution. James had made Sedley's daughter his mistress, and created her Countess of Dorchester. 'I hate ingratitude,' said the witty Sedley; 'as the king has made my daughter a countess, I will endeavour to make his daughter a queen'—this is one form of the anecdote. Sir Charles wrote plays, occasional poems, and songs, which were all extravagantly praised by his contemporaries. Buckingham eulogised the 'witchcraft' of Sedley, and Rochester spoke of his 'gentle prevailing art.' Dryden called him the Tibullus of his age: 'Lisideius' in 'The Essay of Dramatic Poesy' is a sort of anagram of his name Latinised (Sidleius). His plays are sometimes in prose, in couplets, or a combination of the two, sometimes in blank verse; the best, Bellamira, is founded on Terence, as Molière is the original of The Mulberry Garden. His political pamphlets, speeches, and essays are in excellent prose. His songs are light and graceful; felicitous in diction, and at times sound a truer note of passion than is usual with the court-poets. See study (1927) by V. de Sola Pinto, who edited the Works (1928).

His best-known song, 'Phyllis is my only joy,' owes something of its continued popularity to the melody to which it is set; another is—

Get you gone, you will undo me;
 If you love me, don't pursue me.

To Celia.

Not, Celia, that I juster am,
 Or better than the rest;
 For I would change each hour like them
 Were not my heart at rest.

But I am tied to very thee,
 By every thought I have;
 Thy face I only care to see,
 Thy heart I only crave.

All that in woman is adored
 In thy dear self I find;
 For the whole sex can but afford
 The handsome and the kind.

Why then should I seek further store
 And still make love anew;
 When change itself can give no more,
 'Tis easy to be true.

To Chloris.

Ah! Chloris, that I now could sit
 As unconcerned as when
 Your infant beauty could beget
 No pleasure, nor no pain.

When I the dawn used to admire,
 And praised the coming day,
 I little thought the growing fire
 Must take my rest away.

Your charms in harmless childhood lay
 Like metals in the mine;
 Age from no face took more away,
 Than youth concealed in thine.

But as your charms insensibly
To their perfection prest,
Fond love as unperceived did fly,
And in my bosom rest.

My passion with your beauty grew,
And Cupid at my heart,
Still as his mother favoured you,
Threw a new flaming dart.

Each gloried in their wanton part :
To make a lover, he Employed the utmost of his art ;
To make a beauty, she.

Though now I slowly bend to love,
Uncertain of my fate,
If your fair self my chains approve,
I shall my freedom hate.

Lovers, like dying men, may well
At first disordered be,
Since none alive can truly tell
What fortune they must see.

Love like the Sea.

Love still has something of the sea,
From whence his mother rose ;
No time his slaves from doubt can free,
Nor give their thoughts repose.

They are becalmed in clearest days,
And in rough weather tost ;
They wither under cold delays,
Or are in tempests lost.

One while they seem to touch the port,
Then straight into the main
Some angry wind, in cruel sport,
The vessel drives again.

At first disdain and pride they fear,
Which if they chance to 'scape,
Rivals and falsehood soon appear
In a more dreadful shape.

By such degrees to joy they come,
And are so long withstood ;
So slowly they receive the sum,
It hardly does them good.

'Tis cruel to prolong a pain ;
And to defer a joy,
Believe me, gentle Celimene,
Offends the winged boy.

A hundred thousand oaths your fears
Perhaps would not remove ;
And if I gazed a thousand years,
I could no deeper love.

To Phillis.

Phillis, men say that all my vows
Are to thy fortune paid ;
Alas ! my heart he little knows,
Who thinks my love a trade.

Were I of all these woods the lord,
One berry from thy hand
More solid pleasure would afford
Than all my large command.

My humble love has learned to live
On what the nicest maid
Without a conscious blush can give
Beneath the myrtle shade.

Of costly food it hath no need,
And nothing will devour ;
But like the harmless bee can feed,
And not impair the flower.

A spotless innocence like thine
May such a flame allow ;
Yet thy fair name for ever shine
As doth thy beauty now.

I heard thee wish my lambs might stray
Safe from the fox's power,
Though every one become his prey,
I'm richer than before !

The Earl of Rochester (JOHN WILMOT ; 1647-80) is known principally from his having, to use Johnson's words, 'blazed out his youth and his health in lavish voluptuousness,' and died from physical exhaustion and decay at the age of thirty-three. Born at Ditchley in Oxfordshire, and educated at Burford school and Wadham College, Oxford, he travelled in France and Italy, and on his return repaired to court, where his elegant person and lively wit soon made him a prominent figure. In 1665 he was at sea with the Earl of Sandwich and Sir Edward Spragge, and distinguished himself for bravery, in the heat of an engagement carrying a message in an open boat amidst a storm of shot. This manliness of character must have forsaken him in England, if he really betrayed cowardice in street-quarrels, and refused to fight with the Duke of Buckingham.

From the Portrait by W. Wissing in the National Portrait Gallery.

Handsome, accomplished, witty, and with a remarkable charm of manner, he became a prime favourite of the king, though he often quarrelled with him. In Charles's profligate court, Rochester was the most profligate; his intrigues, his low amours and disguises, his erecting a stage and playing the mountebank on Tower-hill, were notorious; he himself affirmed to Bishop Burnet that 'for five years together he was continually drunk.' Yet his domestic letters show him in a different light—'tender, playful, and alive to all the affections of a husband, a father, and a son.' When his health was ruined and death approached, the brilliant, reckless profligate repented; Bishop Burnet, who was his spiritual guide on his death-bed, believed his repentance was sincere and unreserved. He was probably one of those whose vices are less the effect of an inborn tendency than of external corrupting circumstances; 'nothing in his life became him like the leaving it.'

Some of his wittiest verses are the most objectionable. Of the rest, among the best Johnson ranked an imitation of Horace, the verses to Lord Mulgrave, a satire against mankind, and the poem Upon Nothing, which is an ingenious series of paradoxes, conceits, and puns on nothing and something (see page 786).

Nothing! thou elder brother ev'n to shade,
Thou hadst a being ere the world was made,
And, well fixt, art alone of ending not afraid.

E'er time and place were, time and place were not
When primitive nothing something straight begot
Then all proceeded from the great united—What.

Something the gen'ral attribute of all
Sever'd from thee, its sole original
Into thy boundless self must undistinguish'd fall. . . .

French truth, Dutch prowess, British policy,
Hibernian learning, Scotch civility,
Spaniards' dispatch, Danes' wit are mainly seen in thee

—that is, in nothing; and the great man's gratitude to his best friend, king's promises, and vows, towards thee they bend,

Flow swiftly into thee, and in thee ever end.

The Satyr against Mankind (adapted from Boileau) begins:

Were I, who to my cost already am
One of those strange, prodigious creatures, man,
Spirit-free to chuse for my own share
What sort of flesh and blood I pleas'd to wear,
I'd be a monkey, dog, or bear,
Or any thing but that vain animal
Who is so proud of being rational.

And after showing the worthlessness of reason—

And 'tis this very reason I despise,
This supernatural gift that makes a mite
Think he's the image of the Infinite—holds it proved that

For all his pride and his philosophy
'Tis evident beasts are in their degree
As wise at least and better far than he.

Horace Walpole said: 'Lord Rochester's poems have more obscenity than wit, more wit than poetry, more poetry than politeness.' But many of them are eminently witty; a few of the lyrics are full of true poetry, or touch a high poetical level. Some of the smoothest and most rhythmical are obviously artificial; here and there is a note of convincing passion. The satires are vivid but gross. The courtier did not spare his master's vices or his master's mistresses: 'A merry monarch, scandalous and poor,' is a royal character summed up in a line.

Here lies our sovereign lord the King,
Whose word no man relies on,
Who never said a foolish thing,
Nor ever did a wise one—is a well-authenticated epitaph-epigram, and is by no means Rochester's frankest testimony to his patron's eccentricities.

Before his death Rochester expressed the wish that his indecent verses should be suppressed; but that very year these and many that he never wrote were published—ostensibly at Antwerp, really at London. Some of the worst poems attributed to him are really not his: his loose life encouraged the attribution to him of all manner of licentious rhymes. The grossest editions were the most frequently reprinted; the edition of 1691, issued by his friends, contained nothing very startling, but was less popular. His tragedy of Valentinian was but a poor adaptation of Beaumont and Fletcher's.

Love and Murder.

While on those lovely looks I gaze,
To see a wretch pursuing,
In raptures of a blest'd amaze,
His pleasing happy ruin;
'Tis not for pity that I move;
His fate is too aspiring
Whose heart, broke with a load of love,
Dies wishing and admiring.

But if this murder you'd forego,
Your slave from death removing,
Let me your art of charming know,
Or learn you mine of loving.
But whether life or death betide,
In love 'tis equal measure;
The victor lives with empty pride,
The vanquish'd die with pleasure.

Constancy.

I cannot change as others do,
Though you unjustly scorn;
Since that poor swain that sighs for you
For you alone was born.
No, Phillis, no; your heart to move
A surer way I'll try;
And, to revenge my slighted love,
Will still love on, will still love on, and die.

When, kill'd with grief, Amintas lies,
 And you to mind shall call
 The sighs that now unpity'd rise,
 The tears that vainly fall ;
 That welcome hour that ends his smart
 Will then begin your pain,
 For such a faithful tender heart
 Can never break, can never break in vain.

Inseparable.

My dear mistress has a heart
 Soft as those kind looks she gave me,
 When with love's resistless art
 And her eyes she did enslave me.
 But her constancy's so weak,
 She's so wild and apt to wander,
 That my jealous heart would break,
 Should we live one day asunder.
 Melting joys about her move,
 Killing pleasures, wounding blisses ;
 She can dress her eyes in love,
 And her lips can warm with kisses.
 Angels listen when she speaks ;
 She's my delight, all mankind's wonder ;
 But my jealous heart would break,
 Should we live one day asunder.

In such verses as

The time that is to come is not :
 How can it then be mine ?
 The present moment 's all my lot,
 And that, as fast as it is got,
 Phillis, is only thine—

we have a specimen of his Epicurean philosophising.

When wearied with a world of woe
 To thy safe bosom I retire,
 Where love and peace and truth does flow,
 May I contented there expire—

breathes deep and undying devotion, but is less characteristic than the bacchanalian—

Love a woman ! You're an ass,
 'Tis a most insipid passion,
 To chuse out for your happiness,
 The silliest part of God's creation.

[The following charming lyric, often ascribed to Rochester, and praised by eminent literary critics as typically his, is really from Quarles's Divine Emblems (see Vol. I. p. 566).

To his Mistress.

Why dost thou shade thy lovely face ? O why
 Does that eclipsing hand of thine deny
 The sunshine of the sun's enlightening eye ?

Without thy light what light remains in me ?
 Thou art my life ; my way, my light 's in thee ;
 I live, I move, and by thy beams I see.

Thou art my life ; if thou but turn away
 I die a thousand deaths. Thou art my way ;
 Without thee, love, I travel not, but stray.

My light thou art ; without thy glorious sight
 My eyes are darkened with eternal night.
 My love, thou art my way, my life, my light.

Thou art my way ; I wander if thou fly.
 Thou art my light ; if hid, how blind am I !
 Thou art my life ; if thou withdraw'st, I die.

My eyes are dark and blind, I cannot see ;
 To whom or whither should my darkness flee
 But to that light ? and who's that light but thee ?

If I have lost my path, dear lover, say
 Shall I still wander in a doubtful way ?
 Love, shall a lamb of Israel's sheepfold stray ?

My path is lost, my wandering steps do stray ;
 I cannot go, nor can I safely stay ;
 Whom should I seek but thee, my path, my way ?

And yet thou turn'st away thy face and fly'st me !
 And yet I sue for grace and thou deny'st me !
 Speak, art thou angry, love, or only try'st me ?

Thou art the pilgrim's path, the blind man's eye,
 The dead man's life. On thee my hopes rely ;
 If I but them remove, I surely die.

Dissolve thy sunbeams, close thy wings and stay.
 See, see how I am blind and dead, and stray,
 Oh thou that art my life, my light, my way !

Then work thy will ! If passion bid me flee,
 My reason shall obey, my wings shall be
 Stretched out no further than from me to thee !]

Burnet's Some Passages of the Life and Death of John, Earl of Rochester (1680), was republished in Wordsworth's Ecclesiastical Biography. Tutin issued Selections from Suckling, Sedley, and Rochester in 1906, and Hayward edited Rochester's Works (1926). See also Rochester and other Literary Rakes (1902), Swinburne's Studies (1894), and Dobrée's Rochester (1926).

The Earl of Dorset (CHARLES SACKVILLE ; 1638-1706) wrote little, but had it in him to have written much more notable things ; and being a liberal patron of poets, he was a highly popular man of fashion. His manners and his morals were like those of his friends Sir Charles Sedley and the rest. In the first Dutch war, 1665, as Lord Buckhurst, he went as a volunteer under the Duke of York, and was said to have written the song, 'To all you ladies'—'one of the prettiest that ever was made,' according to Prior—the night before the naval engagement in which the Dutch admiral Opdam was blown up with all his crew. To have written such a lively, lengthy, easy-flowing song at sea, just before a great battle, was surely something to brag of ! But when Pepys's Diary was published, it was found that the song (in which, it should be added, there is a strong dash of a witty, antithetical, burlesquing strain, as in Goldsmith's Mad Dog, quite beyond the nature of a true lyric) existed six clear months before the great sea-fight ; Prior's story was an embellishment. The courtier-sailor may have touched up the song just—or soon—before the battle. Created Earl of Middlesex in 1675, he succeeded his father two years later, and was a lord of the bedchamber to Charles II., chamberlain of the household to William and Mary. When Dorset, as chamberlain, was obliged to take the king's pension from Dryden, he allowed him an equivalent out of his own estate. He inroduced Butler's Hudibras to the notice of the court, was consulted by Waller, and idolised by Dryden. Yet his works are few, trifling, and mostly indecent; a few satires and songs make up the catalogue. Smart and graceful though they are, Prior was absurd when he wrote of them, 'There is a lustre in his verses like that of the sun in Claude Lorraine's landscapes.' Three of the songs are given below. The refrain of the last is repeated at each verse.

Dorinda.

Dorinda's sparkling wit and eyes,
United, cast too fierce a light,
Which blazes high, but quickly dies;
Pains not the heart, but hurts the sight.

Love is a calmer, gentler joy;
Smooth are his looks, and soft his pace;
Her Cupid is a blackguard boy,
That runs his link full in your face.

Love its own Reward.

May the ambitious ever find
Success in crowds and noise,
While gentle love does fill my mind
With silent, real joys.

May knaves and fools grow rich and great,
And the world think 'em wise;
While I lie dying at her feet,
And all the world despise. . . .

To the Ladies at Home.

To all you ladies now at land,
We men at sea indite;
But first would have you understand
How hard it is to write;
The Muses now, and Neptune too,
We must implore to write to you.
With a fa la, la, la, la.

For though the Muses should prove kind,
And fill our empty brain;
Yet if rough Neptune rouse the wind,
To wave the azure main,
Our paper, pen, and ink, and we,
Roll up and down our ships at sea.

Then if we write not by each post,
Think not we are unkind;
Nor yet conclude our ships are lost
By Dutchmen or by wind:
Our tears we'll send a speedier way—
The tide shall bring them twice a day.

The king with wonder and surprise
Will swear the seas grow bold,
Because the tides will higher rise
Than e'er they used of old:
But let him know it is our tears
Bring floods of grief to Whitehall-stairs.

Should foggy Opdam chance to know
Our sad and dismal story,
The Dutch would scorn so weak a foe,
And quit their fort at Goree;
For what resistance can they find
From men who've left their hearts behind?

Let wind and weather do its worst,
Be you to us but kind;
Let Dutchmen vapour, Spaniards curse,
No sorrow we shall find:
'Tis then no matter how things go,
Or who's our friend, or who's our foe.

To pass our tedious hours away,
We throw a merry main;
Or else at serious ombre play;
But why should we in vain
Each other's ruin thus pursue?
We were undone when we left you.

But now our fears tempestuous grow,
And cast our hopes away;
Whilst you, regardless of our woe,
Sit careless at a play:
Perhaps permit some happier man
To kiss your hand, or flirt your fan.

When any mournful tune you hear,
That dies in every note,
As if it sighed with each man's care
For being so remote:
Think then how often love we've made
To you, when all those tunes were played.

In justice you can not refuse
To think of our distress,
When we for hopes of honour lose
Our certain happiness;
All those designs are but to prove
Ourselves more worthy of your love.

And now we've told you all our loves,
And likewise all our fears,
In hopes this declaration moves
Some pity for our tears;
Let's hear of no inconstancy,
We have too much of that at sea.
With a fa la, la, la, la.

Thomas D'Urfey (1653-1723), dramatist and song-writer, had usually his name Anglicised and familiarised into Tom Durfey. Born at Exeter of Huguenot ancestry (as gracefully alluded to by the 'facetious' Tom Brown; see Vol. II. p. 78), he was a nephew of Honoré d'Urfé (1568-1625), author of the famous romance of Astrée. He early became a busy playwright, his comedies especially being popular. Among these were The Fond Husband (1676), Madame Fickle (1677), and Sir Burnaby Whig (1681). In 1683 he published his New Collection of Songs and Poems, which was followed by a long series of songs, republished, along with some by other authors, as Wit and Mirth, or Pills to Purge Melancholy (6 vols. 1719-20; reprinted 1872). Not a few are set to Scottish and Northern tunes; some of them are written in an impossible Scottish dialect (see page 788). Several were afterwards attributed to Scottish authors; in particular (as has been said at page 732), the famous song:

The night her blackest sable wore,
And gloomy were the skies;
And glittering stars there were no more
Than those in Stella's eyes;

each complete stanza of which ends with 'She'd rise and let me in,' 'That e'er she let me in,' &c., was Scotticised and claimed for Francis Sempill. His songs, amorous (beyond the bounds of decency, not a few of them), bacchanalian, and political, were enormously popular, many of them being set to music by Purcell, Blew, and Farmer, who were friends of his. Addison, a man of very different temper, invited the readers of the Guardian to a benefit for the decayed author's behoof, and praised Tom as a diverting companion, a cheerful, honest, good-natured man, who, by making the world merry, had put it under a debt of gratitude. And Steele (also in the Guardian) upbraided that same world for its thanklessness to one 'who was so large a contributor to this treatise, and to whose humorous productions so many rural squires in the remotest part of this island are obliged for the dignity and state which corpulency gives them.' The following song, reprinted in the Pills, is far from his most 'divertive' or tuneful lyrics, but has a literary interest as being a reply to Collier's impeachment of the contemporary stage. Tom did not, like Congreve, plead guilty. The full title is A Song sung in my play of 'the Campaigners,' extremely divertive, just after Mr — C——'s vile Satyr upon Poets and the Stage. Set to a tune of Mr Henry Purcell's:

New reformation begins thro' the nation,
And our grumbling sages, that hope for good wages
Direct us the way:
Sons of the muses, then cloak your abuses,
And least you shou'd trample on pious example,
Observe and obey.
Time frenzy curers, and stubborn Nonjurors,
For want of diversion, now scourge the leud times:
They've hinted, they've printed, our vein it profane is,
And worst of all crimes;
Dull clod pated railers, smiths, coblers and colliers,
Have damn'd all our rhimes.

Under the notion of zeal for devotion,
The humour has fir'd 'em, or rather inspir'd 'em,
To tutor the age:
But if in season you'd know the true reason;
The hopes of preferment is what make the vermin
Now rail at the stage.
Cuckolds and canters, with scruples and banter,
The old forty-one peal against poetry ring:
But let State revolvers, and treason absolvers,
Excuse me if I sing:
The rebel that chuses to cry down the muses,
Wou'd cry down the king.

Thomas Flatman (1635–88), born in London, passed through Winchester to New College, Oxford, and became a great miniaturist and a minor poet. Painting miniatures was his profession; in rhyming, he protests, 'my utmost End was merely for Diversion of myself and a few Friends whom I very well love.' He 'always took a peculiar delight in the Pindarique strain,' for reasons—rather arbitrary than artistic—which he details in the sprightly preface to his poems. Many of his contemporaries treated him as a great poet; Rochester jeered at him as a poor imitator of Cowley; and what his and Izaak Walton's brilliant friend Charles Cotton praised (in verse) as 'charming numbers,' 'full of sinewy strength as well as wit,' were later neglected and forgotten. Some of his shorter poems are much more interesting than his more ambitious 'Pindarique odes' and elegies on dukes, earls, 'matchless Orindas,' and kings. 'A Thought of Death' obviously influenced Pope's 'Dying Christian'; 'Death: a Song,' is suggestive rather than melodious; some of the love-poems are graceful, and so are the translations from Horace. 'An Appeal to Cats in the matter of love-making' is facetious and sounds modern:

Ye cats that at midnight spit love at each other,
Who best feel the pangs of a passionate lover,
I appeal to your scratches and your tattered furr
If the business of love be no more than to purr.

A burlesque romance, Don Juan Lamberto, 'by Montilion,' was generally regarded as his. He collected his Poems and Songs in 1674. Saintsbury champions him in Minor Caroline Poets (vol. iii. 1921). There is a Life by F. A. Child (Penn. 1922).

Hymn for the Morning.

Awake my soul! Awake mine eyes!
Awake my drowsie faculties;
Awake and see the new born light
Spring from the darksome womb of night.
Look up and see; th' unwearied Sun
Already has his race begun:
The pretty lark is mounted high,
And sings her matins in the sky.
Arise my soul! and thou my voice
In songs of praise, early rejoice!
O great Creator, heavenly king,
Thy praises let me ever sing.
Thy power has made, thy goodness kept
This fenceless body while I slept,
Yet one day more hast given me
From all the powers of darkness free:
O keep my heart from sin secure,
My life unblameable and pure,
That when the last of all my days is come,
Chearful and fearless I may wait my doom.

A Thought of Death.

When on my sick bed I languish,
Full of sorrow, full of anguish,
Fainting, gasping, trembling, crying,
Panting, groaning, speechless, dying,
My soul just now about to take her flight
Into the regions of eternal night;
Oh tell me you
That have been long below,
What shall I do?
What shall I think, when cruel Death appears,
That may extenuate my fears?
Methinks I hear some gentle spirit say,
Be not fearful, come away!
Think with thy self that now thou shalt be free.
And find thy long expected liberty;

Better thou mayst, but worse thou can'st not be
Than in this vale of tears and misery.
Like Caesar, with assurance then come on,
And unamaz'd attempt the laurel crown,
That lies on th' other side Death's Rubicon.

The Surrender.

I yield, I yield! Divine Althæa, see
How prostrate at thy feet I bow,
Fondly in love with my captivity,
So weak am I, so mighty thou.
Not long ago I could defie,
Arm'd with wine and company,
Beauty's whole artillery:
Quite vanquish'd now by thy miraculous charms,
Here, fair Althæa, take my arms,
For sure he cannot be of human race,
That can resist so bright, so sweet a face.

Richard Flecknoe, poet and dramatist, was perhaps an Irishman, perhaps the nephew of a distinguished Jesuit of the English Mission, William Flecknoe or Flexney (b. 1575) of Oxford. Richard was educated at various foreign Jesuit colleges, became a Jesuit, and was ordained priest. He soon left the Society; was during the Civil War driven as a Catholic to go abroad; but after some ten years travels in the Low Countries, Rome, Constantinople, Portugal, and Brazil (1640-50), came to London, mingled in the wars of the wits, and became a writer for the press. In Flecko an English Priest at Rome, Andrew Marvell gives an amusing account of his visit to the long, lean, half-starved priest-poet, in his narrow garret up three pair of stairs in Rome. Flecknoe, who seems to have died about 1678, produced some volumes of religious verse and prose, several plays, a number of odes and occasional verses, Enigmaticall Characters, Heroick Portraits, Epigrams, all of which are long forgotten. His name is now remembered only as that of the stalking-horse over whom Dryden applied the merciless lash of his satire to Shadwell—that savage Mac Flecknoe which served as part-model to Pope's more famous Dunciad. Flecknoe, who—

In prose and verse was owned without dispute
Through all the realms of nonsense absolute,

seeks a successor, and fixes on Shadwell as the one of his sons on whom most appropriately his mantle might be laid. How far he owes his oblivion—an oblivion so complete that in several large and well-equipped libraries you shall with difficulty find one single odd specimen of all his twenty separate publications—to the inherent defects of his work and how far to Dryden's offended amour propre may be doubted. And it is also open to doubt if Dryden thought him such an utter dullard and fool as he pretends. It should be remembered—to Flecknoe's credit—that more than thirty years before Jeremy Collier's famous impeachment of the stage, Flecknoe, himself a playwright, made a pithy and vehement onslaught, in prose and verse, on the grossness and indecency of some contemporary plays. And Dryden, whom Flecknoe in one of his epigrams had praised as

The Muses' darling and delight,
Than whom none ever flew so high a flight,

was notoriously one of the worst offenders against decency in his comedies: An Evening's Love (1668) was condemned on this score not merely by Evelyn but by Pepys! Southey shrewdly guessed that this was probably a main reason for Dryden's dislike. And Southey justly says that Flecknoe was 'by no means the despicable writer Dryden suggests'—adding, 'if the little volume of epigrams which I possess may be considered a sample.' He further shows his limited acquaintance with Flecknoe by inferring from one of the epigrams that he must have been in Brazil, and regretting he did not write a book of travels. Now, as is well known, Flecknoe did in 1656 publish his Relation of Ten Years Travel in Europe, Asia, Affrique, and America. Southey not unjustly suggests that Flecknoe imitated D'Avenant, and finds fault with him for introducing conversational and unduly familiar expressions. 'Far from despicable' is faint praise. Flecknoe was not a great poet, but some of his verses are pretty, his thoughts felicitous, and his conceits not so strained as those of many contemporaries. It seems hard that he should not merely have been driven from a modest place in the temple of Fame, but made a minus quantity in the scale of intelligence and a byword to boot, by a spiteful sneer of 'glorious John's.'

Among the works were a Hierothalamium or the Heavenly Nuptials of our Blessed Saviour with a Pious Soule; The Affections of a Pious Soule unto our Saviour Christ; Love's Dominion, a Dramatick Piece; The Marriage of Oceanus and Britannia; The Idea of his Highness Oliver, late Lord Protector; Erminia or the Fair and Virtuous Lady; The Damoiselles à la Mode; Sir William D'Avenant's Voyage to the other World. Of his plays, only Love's Dominion, 'written as a pattern for the reformed stage,' was acted in London, but (as might be guessed) it was not successful.

To the fair Daughter of as fair a Mother.

What you'll be in Time we know
By the stock on which you grow,
As by Roses we may see
What in time the Buds will be:
So in Flowers and so in Trees,
So in everything that is;
Like its like does still produce,
As 'tis Nature's constant use.
Grow still then till you discover
All the beauties of your Mother;
Nothing but fair and sweet can be
From so sweet and fair a Tree.

To Sir K(enelm) D(igby) in Italy, with a Memorial.

I must beg of you, Sir, nay what is more
('Tis a disease so infectious to be poor!)
Must beg you'd beg for me; which whilst I do,
What is't but even to make you beggar too?

But poverty being as honourable now
As 'twas when Cincinnatus held the plough;
Senators Sow'd and Reap'd, and who had been
In Car of Triumph fetcht the harvest in:
Whilst mightiest Peers do want, nay what is worse,
Even greatest Princes live on others purse
And very Kings themselves are beggars made,
No shame for any, Sir, to be o' th' Trade.

Flecknoe anticipates Burns writing thus pointedly

Of an Unworthy Nobleman.

See yonder thing that looks as if he'd cry
I am a Lord, a mile ere he comes nigh?
And thinks to carry it by being proud
Or looking high and big, and talking loud.
But mark him well, you'll hardly finde enough
In the whole man to make a Laquey of;
And for his words, you'll hardly pick from thence
So much of man as comes to common sence.
Such things as he have nothing else of worth,
But place and title for to set them forth
Just like a Dwarf drest up in Gyant's cloaths,
Bigger he'd seem the lesser still he shows;
Or like small Statues on huge Bases set
Their highth but onely makes them [seem] less great.

He ingeniously apostrophises the smallpox as

One of those Devils that by power Divine,
Cast out of men once, went to the heard of Swine,
And giving them the Pox art come agen
To play the Devil, as thou didst, with men;

and says of a 'malitious person:'

She lov'd not the world and 'twas less to be pittied
Since the world lov'd not her, and so they were fitted.

On your scurrilous and obscene Dramatick Poets.

Shame and disgrace o' th' Actors and the Age
Poet more fit for th' Brothel than the Stage!
Who makes thy Muse a Strumpet, and she thee
Bawd to her lust, and so you will agree.
Bawdry however washt is foul enough,
But thou dost write such foul unwashed stuff,
Thou onely seems to have taken all the pain
To write for Whitstones-parke or Lewknors-lane:
And Water-poets we have had before,
But never Kennel ones till thee before.
What Divel made thee write? for sure there's none
Coud write so bad without the help of one,
Which till't be exorcised and quite cast out,
Th' art onely fit to write for the common rout,
And with thy impudent lines and scurrilous stile
To make Fools laugh and wise men blush the while.

Whetstone's Park, between Lincoln's Inn Fields and Holborn, was notorious for its immorality; and Lewknor's Lane, off Drury Lane, was an even more unholy rendezvous.

If Dryden supposed he was even remotely alluded to in this, or supposed that the cap fitted, he might well conceive a profound disdain for Flecknoe's person, character, and abilities.

One of the pieces quoted by Southey (in Omniانا), and from him probably by Lamb (prefixed to his essay on a Quaker's meeting), is from Flecknoe's play of Love's Dominion, and called Invocation to Silence.

Sacred Silence, thou that art
Floud-gate of the deeper heart;
Off-spring of a heavenly kinde;
Frost o' th' mouth, and thaw o' th' minde;
Admiration's readiest Tongue;
Leave thy Desert Shades among Reverend Hermits hallowed cells
Where retyr'd devotion dwells;
With thy Enthusiasmes come,
Ceaze this Nymph, and strike her dumb.

Noble Love.

It is the counterpoise that mindes
To fair and vertuous things inclines;
It is the gust we have and sence
Of every noble excellence;
It is the pulse by which we know
Whether our souls have life or no;
And such a soft and gentle fire
As kindles and inflames desire;
Until it all like Incence burns
And unto melting sweetness turns.

In these fifth and sixth lines surely noble love is described by a noble metaphor nobly worded.

In a little pastoral we have, neatly put, the very plot of Henryson's famous Robin and Makyne:

A Rural Dialogue.

Chorus. Once a nymph and shepherd meeting,
Never past there such a greeting,
Nor was heard 'twixt such a pair
Plainer dealing than was there.
He pay'd women, and she men;
He slights her, she him again.
Words with words were overthwarted,
Thus they meet and greet and parted.

Shepherd. He who never takes a wife
Lives a most contented life.

Nymph. She the whole contentment loses
Who a husband ever chooses.

Sh. I of women know too much
Ere to care for any such.

Ny. I of men too much do know
To care [whether you do or no].

Sh. Since you are resolv'd, farewell;
Look you lead not Apes in Hell.

Ny. Better lead apes thither, then than Thither to be led by men.

Sh. They to Paradise would bear ye,
Be but rul'd by what they bid ye.

Ny. To Fools Paradise, 'tis true,
Would they but be rul'd by you.

Chorus. Thus they parted as they met;
Hard to say who best did get
Or of love was least affraid.
When being parted either said:

Ambo. Love, what fools thou makst of men
When th' are in thy power; but when
From thy power they once are free,
Love, what a Fool men make of thee!

In 1822 a writer in the Retrospective Review discovered Flecknoe, and, on the strength of the Enigmaticall Characters and the Epigrams, sought to modify the harsh censure universally accepted, to show that Flecknoe was 'not the contemptible scribbler he has been generally represented,' while cautiously repudiating the wish to 'canonise dullness.' He quoted freely from the only two small volumes at his command, including one smart and lively description from the Characters:

A Make-bate.

She is a tattling gossip that goes a fishing or groping for secrets, and tickles you under the gills, till she catches hold of you; only the politick eel escapes her hand, and wrigles himself out again: she tells you others' secrets only to hook yours out of you, and baits men as they do fishes one with another still. She is as industrious as a bee in flying about and sucking every flower; only she has the spider's quality of making poison instead of honey of it. For she has all her species of arithmetic, multiplication, addition, and detraction too, only at numeration she is always out, making everything more or less than 'tis indeed. . . . In fine you have divers serpents so venomous as they infect and poison with their very breaths; but none have breaths more infectious nor poisonous than she, who would set man and wife at dissention the first day of their marriage, and children and parents the last day of their lives; nor will innocence ever be safe nor conversation innocent till such as she be banished human society; the bane of all societies where they come; and if I could afford them being anywhere with Ariosto's discord, it should be only amongst my enemies: meantime 'tis my prayer, God bless my friends from them.

It seems odd, but so it is, that critics who pooh-pooh Dryden's own plays, and while admiring the ability deny the poetry of his verse, should without inquiry or hesitation subscribe to his most damning critical judgments on dramatists and poets. And it should be remembered that in the poem which has overwhelmed Flecknoe and Mac Flecknoe, Dryden treats with the same contempt both Heywood and Shirley, as well as Ogilby and Shadwell. Among the forgotten rubbish of the past,

Much Heywood, Shirley, Ogleby there lay,
But loads of Shadwell almost choked the way.

Now, Charles Lamb praises Heywood as a 'prose Shakespeare,' and calls Shirley the 'last of a great race, all of whom spoke nearly the same language;' and more modern critics recognise 'the simplicity and directness of Heywood's pathos,' and the 'charming poetry' and 'pleasing and musical songs' scattered through his plays. It seems now agreed that Shirley, condemned by Dryden, was a 'dramatic poet of rare original power,' whose plays are 'adorned and elevated by the spirit of poetry.' Without assuming that Flecknoe was either poet or dramatist of this rank, we may hold that the reversal of Dryden's estimate of two such men as Heywood and Shirley justify us in reconsidering the verdict, still currently taken as final, on Flecknoe (see pages 431 and 484; and for Ogilby, page 823).

Langbaine, the author of the Account of the English Dramatic Poets, had a fierce and long-maintained feud with Dryden. But it was not on that account presumably that he says of Flecknoe's Characters that 'they were written with all the advantages and helps that the noblest company, divertisements and accommodation could afford to quicken the wit, heighten the fancy, and delight the mind whose main design is to honour nobility, praise virtue, tax vice, laugh at folly, and pity ignorance.'

Flecknoe anticipated Rochester in writing a poem On Nothing, which Flecknoe dedicated to some one who had already produced a poem on that interesting subject. Flecknoe's pastoral may have suggested Rochester's cynical Dialogue between Strephon and Daphne, also two unloving lovers, and in the very same rhythms, beginning:

Prithee now, fond Fool, give over
Since my Heart is gone before.
To what purpose should I stay?
Love commands another way.

It should be recorded to Flecknoe's credit that in D'Avenant's Voyage to the other World he shows more intelligent respect for Shakespeare than Dryden or most of his contemporaries; for Shakespeare amongst the shades is aggrieved at D'Avenant's 'so mangling and spoiling of his plays.'

Gillow's Biographical Dictionary of the English Catholics (vol. ii. 1885) has facts about Flecknoe not given in the Dictionary of National Biography. There is no ground for calling him an Irishman.

John Tatham was a minor dramatist of whose personal history little is known save that he seems to have succeeded Taylor, the water-poet, as laureate of the Lord Mayor's Show in 1653, the pageants in this connection having been regularly produced by him from 1657 to 1664. The dates of his birth and death are not known: he printed a pastoral play, Love Crowns the End, in 1632; a dozen pageants—several of them bearing the same name, London's Triumphs or London's Glory, another The Royal Oak—are extant; but his chief dramatic productions are The Distracted State (written in 1641); The Scots Figgaries, or a Knot of Knaves (1651); and The Rump, or the Mirrour of the Late Times (1661). Tatham was a vehement Cavalier who hated all Puritans, but especially loathed and abhorred the Scots, whom he represents also as base and contemptible. To this end apparently he invented for the Scots characters he introduces a marvellous jargon, which he may have believed to resemble the vernacular Scottish as spoken by his contemporaries. A good many of the words are actually genuine Scots or very near it; some are exaggerated but not wholly unfair phonetic spellings of some Scottish pronunciations of English words, Aberdonian and Border tones being quite impartially and impossibly compounded; many of the most conspicuous and characteristic Scots words or sounds have not been noted; and much of this preposterous lingo is mere perverted English, with no kind of resemblance to anything spoken or heard in any part of Scotland at any period in the history of the world. In The Distracted State 'a Scotch mountebank' jabbars some screeds of this gibberish in bargaining to poison a king for a trifling consideration. In The Scots Figgaries half-a-dozen pages at a time are printed, continuously and unbrokenly, in this factitious dialect—for whose edification or amusement it is hard to say; for if spoken as printed it must have been, like so many 'Scotch' jokes still made in England, almost as incomprehensible to Englishmen as to Scotsmen. In The Rump the jargon is more sparingly used, mainly by 'Lord Wareston,' a caricature of Johnston of Warriston. Yet this monstrous fiction seems not merely to have been accepted by Tatham's contemporaries as actual Scots, but to have been rather extensively imitated. There is something of the kind in the numerous songs supposed to be Scottish that appear in The Westminster Drollery and D'Urfey's Pills to Purge Melancholy; and Lacy's Sauny the Scot, in the play so called (1686), though happily he talks less than Tatham's Scottish rogues and fools, is for a Scotsman quite as puzzling. In this artificial jargon, for example, the English no and go and so are represented by nea and gea and sea (for nae, gae, sae); tang is supposed to be Scots for tongue; awd and cawd for old and cold. Stomach is weem or weomb (wame being good Scots); one finger is spelt not ae or ane finger, but ean finger; more is meer, and bearns stands for bairns. It should be remembered that in Middle English ee had the sound of the modern ā, and that ea had still quite regularly the sound it still keeps in great, break, steak; that in 1720 and later tea rhymed with pay and obey. A short specimen from Tatham's Scots Figgaries has at least some linguistic interest. The first act is mainly a dialogue between two base Scotsmen who, to their good fortune, have found their way into England, and begins thus:

Jocky. A sirs! thes eyr hes a mickle geod savour. I ha creept thus firr intol th' kingdom like an erivigg intoll a mons lug, and sall as herdly be got oout. Tatham's Dramatic Works were republished in 1879 in Pater-son's 'Dramatists of the Restoration.'

Roger Boyle (1621–79), soldier, statesman, and dramatist, was third son of the Earl of Cork, and in childhood was made Baron Broghill. Educated at Trinity College, Dublin, he in the Civil War first took the royalist side, but after the death of the king came under the personal influence of Cromwell, and distinguished himself in the Irish campaign. He became one of Cromwell's special council, and a member of his House of Lords. On Cromwell's death he tried to support Richard, but foreseeing that his cause was hopeless, crossed to Ireland, and secured it for the king. Four months after the Restoration he was made Earl of Orrery. He is noteworthy as having introduced rhymed tragedies, having six tragedies and two comedies to his account (several of them fairly successful). Besides, he produced some poems, a romance entitled Parthenissa (1654), and a Treatise of the Art of War (1677); and he enjoyed the friendship of D'Avenant, Dryden, and Cowley.

Sir Robert Howard (1626–98), sixth son of the first Earl of Berkshire, fought on the royalist side, was imprisoned under the Commonwealth, but after the Restoration held many public posts (including that of auditor of the Exchequer), besides being knighted. As a member of the House of Commons he was a strong Whig. He wrote half-a-dozen tragedies and comedies, of which The Committee, a comedy, was the best and long held the stage. Very bad was the dramatic blank-verse in which he wrote expressly to confute his brother-in-law Dryden's contention in favour of rhymed plays. He had collaborated with Dryden in the play of The Indian Queen.

John Wilson (1627?–96), playwright, was born in London, was educated at Exeter College and Lincoln's Inn, and about 1681 was appointed Recorder of Londonderry. A devoted loyalist throughout, he followed James after the siege, and died in London. Besides Jonsonian comedies (The Cheats and The Projectors), he wrote a tragedy and a blank-verse tragedy.

The Duke of Buckingham (GEORGE VILLIERS; 1628-87), intriguing statesman and wit, was the son of the first duke, and after his father's assassination was brought up with Charles I.'s children. On the outbreak of the Civil War he hurried from Cambridge to the royalist camp, and lost, recovered, and once more lost his estates. He attended Charles II. to Scotland, and after the battle of Worcester escaped in disguise to the Continent. There he was regarded with much suspicion by Clarendon and the king's other advisers, who could not make out whether he was a Papist or a Presbyterian, admitted his cleverness, but thought him wanting in judgment and character. Estranged from the king, and returning secretly to England, he married, in 1657, the daughter of Lord Fairfax, to whom his forfeited estates had been assigned. The Restoration gave them back to their owner and brought Buckingham to court, where for twenty-five years he was the wildest and wickedest roué of them all. In 1667 he killed in a duel the Earl of Shrewsbury, whose countess, his paramour, looked on, disguised as a page. When sated with pleasure, he would turn for a change to ambition, and four times his mad freaks lodged him in the Tower. He was mainly instrumental in Clarendon's downfall; was a member of the infamous 'Cabal'; and on its break-up in 1673 passed over, like Shaftesbury, to the popular side. But crippled with debt, he retired, after Charles's death in 1685, to his manor of Helmsley, in Yorkshire, and amused himself with the chase. He died on 16th April 1687 at Kirby-Moorside, miserably enough, if not, as Pope put it, 'in the worst inn's worst room.' Buckingham, though best remembered as the 'Zimri' of Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, a portraiture of merciless fidelity—

A man so various that he seemed to be
Not one, but all mankind's epitome—

was the friend of Cowley from his youth up, of Etherege and Wycherley; a patron of writers, he was also an accomplished author in various kinds. He wrote pamphlets on political and ecclesiastical questions, occasional poems, lampoons, several comedies (two being adaptations of Beaumont and Fletcher), and even a treatise in defence of religion. Though the Duke was a spendthrift of body, time, and estate, a libertine in life, and without political morals, his Discourse on the Reasonableness of Religion seems sincere enough to disprove current suggestions that he was an atheist; his last lamentable letter from his death-bed—'forsaken by all my acquaintances, despised by my country, and, I fear, forsaken by my God'—is rather repentant than despairing in tone.

The wittiest of the plays, The Rehearsal (1671), a satiric comedy or burlesque still read and edited, was a deliberate onslaught on the heroic drama that had come into vogue, and was specifically a travesty of several of Dryden's tragedies of this type. It was a carefully considered publication, and seems, though not performed till 1671, to have been written before 1665. The Restoration dramatists, beginning with D'Avenant, contravened the rules of French taste, and in deference to English popular taste made their plays 'heroic' and sensational. Buckingham also detested rhyming plays. In The Rehearsal as first written D'Avenant was the Bayes satirised, and some of the points retained in the acted version apply only to him. But the play was adapted to take off the foibles of Dryden, poet-laureate when it actually came on the stage; and the nickname 'Bayes' (i.e. 'laureate') stuck to Dryden, though originally meant for Dryden's predecessor in the laureateship. Ultimately this clever burlesque, which served as model to Fielding for his Tom Thumb and to Sheridan for his Critic, is believed to have satirised and caricatured seventeen plays, of which six are Dryden's; a key to the points was published in 1705. Evelyn speaks of it as a 'ridiculous farce and rhapsody, buffooning all plays.' It created a prodigious sensation, created a model for such things, and raised controversies, personal and literary, that lasted into another generation. In his chef d'œuvre Buckingham is said to have had the assistance of Martin Clifford, afterwards Master of the Charterhouse; of his own chaplain, Sprat, afterwards Bishop of Rochester; and also of Butler, author of Hudibras; but there is no reason to doubt that the work was in substance mainly his own. The plan is that Bayes, the author-manager, is made to submit his new piece to the criticism of a town amateur and a country gentleman, and receives their comments and suggestions with no very good grace.

From 'The Rehearsal.'

Johnson. Honest Frank! I am glad to see thee with all my heart: how long hast thou been in town?

Smith. Faith, not above an hour: and, if I had not met you here, I had gone to look you out; for I long to talk with you freely of all the strange new things we have heard in the country.

Johns. And, by my troth, I have long'd as much to laugh with you at all the impertinent, dull, fantastical things we are tired out with here.

Smith. Dull and fantastical! that's an excellent composition. Pray, what are our men of business doing?

Johns. I ne'er inquire after 'em. Thou knowest my humour lies another way. I love to please myself as much, and to trouble others as little as I can; and therefore do naturally avoid the company of those solemn fops, who, being incapable of reason and insensible of wit and pleasure, are always looking grave and troubling one another, in hopes to be thought men of business.

Smith. Indeed, I have ever observed that your grave lookers are the dullest of men.

Johns. Ay, and of birds and beasts too: your gravest bird is an owl, and your gravest beast is an ass.

Smith. Well: but how dost thou pass thy time?

Johns. Why, as I used to do; eat, drink as well as I can, have a friend to chat with in the afternoon, and sometimes see a play; where there are such things, Frank, such hideous, monstrous things, that it has almost made me forswear the stage, and resolve to apply myself to the solid nonsense of your men of business, as the more ingenious pastime.

Smith. I have heard, indeed, you have had lately many new plays; and our country wits commend 'em.

Johns. Ay, so do some of our city wits too; but they are of the new kind of wits.

Smith. New kind! what kind is that?

Johns. Why, your virtuosi; your civil persons, your drolls; fellows that scorn to imitate nature, but are given altogether to elevate and surprise.

Smith. Elevate and surprise! prithee, make me understand the meaning of that.

Johns. Nay, by my troth, that's a hard matter: I don't understand that myself. 'Tis a phrase they have got among them, to express their no-meaning by. I'll tell you, as near as I can, what it is. Let me see; 'tis fighting, loving, sleeping, rhyming, dying, dancing, singing, crying; and everything, but thinking and sense.

Bayes [entering]. Your most obsequious, and most observant, very servant, sir.

• Johns. Odso, this is an author. I'll go fetch him to you.

Smith. No, prithee let him alone.

Johns. Nay, by the Lord, I'll have him. [Goes after him.] Here he is; I have caught him. Pray, sir, now for my sake, will you do a favour to this friend of mine?

Bayes. Sir, it is not within my small capacity to do favours, but receive 'em; especially from a person that does wear the honourable title you are pleased to impose, sir, upon this—sweet sir, your servant.

Smith. Your humble servant, sir.

Johns. But wilt thou do me a favour, now?

Bayes. Ay, sir, what is't?

Johns. Why, to tell him the meaning of thy last play.

Bayes. How, sir, the meaning? Do you mean the plot?

Johns. Ay, ay; anything.

Bayes. Faith, sir, the intrigo's now quite out of my head; but I have a new one in my pocket that I may say is a virgin; it has never yet been blown upon. I must tell you one thing: 'tis all new wit, and, though I say it, a better than my last; and you know well enough how that took. In fine, it shall read, and write, and act, and plot, and show, ay, and pit, box, and gallery, egad, with any play in Europe. This morning is its last rehearsal, in their habits, and all that, as it is to be acted; and if you and your friend will do it but the honour to see it in its virgin attire, though, perhaps, it may blush, I shall not be ashamed to discover its nakedness unto you. I think it is in this pocket.

Johns. Sir, I confess I am not able to answer you in this new way; but if you please to lead, I shall be glad to follow you, and I hope my friend will do so too.

Smith. Sir, I have no business so considerable as should keep me from your company.

Bayes. Yes, here it is. No, cry you mercy: this is my book of Drama Commonplaces, the mother of many other plays.

Johns. Drama Commonplaces! pray what's that?

Bayes. Why, sir, some certain helps that we men of art have found it convenient to make use of.

Smith. How, sir, helps for wit?

Bayes. Ay, sir, that's my position. And I do here aver that no man yet the sun e'er shone upon has parts sufficient to furnish out a stage, except it were by the help of these my rules.

Johns. What are those rules, I pray?

Bayes. Why, sir, my first rule is the rule of transversion, or Regula Duplex; changing verse into prose, or prose into verse, alternativè as you please.

Smith. Well; but how is this done by a rule, sir?

Bayes. Why thus, sir; nothing so easy when understood. I take a book in my hand, either at home or elsewhere, for that's all one; if there be any wit in't, as there is no book but has some, I transverse it; that is, if it be prose, put it into verse (but that takes up some time), and if it be verse, put it into prose.

Johns. Methinks, Mr Bayes, that putting verse into prose should be called transprosing.

Bayes. By my troth, sir, 'tis a very good notion; and hereafter it shall be so.

Smith. Well, sir, and what d'ye do with it then?

Bayes. Make it my own. 'Tis so changed that no man can know it. My next rule is the rule of record, by way of table-book. Pray observe.

Johns. We hear you, sir; go on.

Bayes. As thus. I come into a coffee-house, or some other place where witty men resort, I make as if I minded nothing; do you mark? but as soon as any one speaks, pop I slap it down, and make that too my own.

Johns. But, Mr Bayes, are you not sometimes in danger of their making you restore, by force, what you have gotten thus by art?

Bayes. No, sir; the world's unmindful: they never take notice of these things.

Smith. But pray, Mr Bayes, among all your other rules, have you no one rule for invention?

Bayes. Yes, sir, that's my third rule that I have here in my pocket.

Smith. What rule can that be, I wonder?

Bayes. Why, sir, when I have anything to invent, I never trouble my head about it, as other men do; but presently turn over this book, and there I have, at one view, all that Persius, Montaigne, Seneca's Tragedies, Horace, Juvenal, Claudian, Pliny, Plutarch's Lives, and the rest, have ever thought upon this subject: and so, in a trice, by leaving out a few words, or putting in others of my own, the business is done.

Johns. Indeed, Mr Bayes, this is as sure and compendious a way of wit as ever I heard of.

Bayes. Sir, if you make the least scruples of the efficacy of these my rules, do but come to the playhouse, and you shall judge of 'em by the effects.

(From Act i. sc. 1.)

In the piece as rehearsed a battle is fought between foot and great hobby-horses. At last Drawcansir comes in and kills all on both sides. While the battle is fighting, Bayes is telling them when to shout, and shouts with them.

Drawcansir. Others may boast a single man to kill; But I the blood of thousands daily spill.

Let petty kings the names of parties know:

Where'er I come, I slay both friend and foe.

The swiftest horsemen my swift rage controls,

And from their bodies drives their trembling souls.

If they had wings, and to the gods could fly,

I would pursue and beat 'em through the sky;

And make proud Jove, with all his thunder, see

This single arm more dreadful is than he.

Bayes. There's a brave fellow for you now, sirs. You may talk of your Hectors, and Achilles's, and I know not who; but I defy all your histories, and your romances too, to show me one such conqueror as this Drawcansir.

Johns. I swear I think you may.

Smith. But, Mr Bayes, how shall all these dead men go off? for I see none alive to help 'em.

Bayes. Go off! why, as they came on, upon their legs: how should they go off? Why, do you think the people here don't know they are not dead? He is mighty ignorant, poor man: your friend here is very silly, Mr Johnson; egad, he is. Ha, ha, ha! Come, sir, I'll show you how they shall go off. Rise, rise, sirs, and go about your business. There's go off for you now; ha, ha, ha! Mr Ivory, a word. Gentlemen, I'll be with you presently.

Johns. Will you so? Then we'll be gone.

Smith. Ay, prithee let's go, that we may preserve our hearing. One battle more will take mine quite away.

Bayes [entering with Players]. Where are the gentlemen?

1st Player. They are gone, sir.

Bayes. Gone! 'sdeath, this act is best of all. I'll go fetch 'em again.

1st Player. What shall we do, now he is gone away?

2nd Player. Why, so much the better; then let's go to dinner.

3rd Player. Stay, here's a foul piece of paper. Let's see what 'tis.

4th Player. Ay, ay, come, let's hear it.

3rd Player [Reads the argument of the fifth act]. 'Cloris, at length, being sensible of Prince Prettyman's passion' . . . —This will never do: 'tis just like the rest. Come, let's be gone.

Most of the Players. Ay, plague on't, let's go away.

Bayes [entering]. A plague on 'em both for me! they have made me sweat, to run after 'em. A couple of senseless rascals, that had rather go to dinner than see this play out, with a plague to 'em. What comfort has a man to write for such dull rogues! Come, Mr—a—where are you, sir? Come away, quick, quick.

Stage-keeper. Sir: they are gone to dinner.

Bayes. Yes, I know the gentlemen are gone; but I ask for the players.

Stage-keeper. Why, an't please your worship, sir, the players are gone to dinner too.

Bayes. How! are the players gone to dinner? 'tis impossible: the players gone to dinner! egad, if they are, I'll make 'em know what it is to injure a person that does them the honour to write for 'em, and all that. A company of proud, conceited, humorous, cross-grain'd persons, and all that. Egad, I'll make 'em the most contemptible, despicable, inconsiderable persons, and all that, in the whole world, for this trick. Egad, I'll be revenged on 'em; I'll sell this play to the other house.

Stage-keeper. Nay, good sir, don't take away the book; you'll disappoint the company that comes to see it acted here this afternoon.

Bayes. That's all one, I must reserve this comfort to myself, my play and I shall go together; we will not part, indeed, sir.

Stage-keeper. But what will the town say, sir?

Bayes. The town! why, what care I for the town? Egad, the town has us'd me as scurvily as the players have done: but I'll be reveng'd on them too; for I'll lampoon 'em all. And since they will not admit of my plays, they shall know what a satirist I am. And so farewell to this stage, egad, for ever. (From Act v. sc. 1.)

Tom Br wn collected Buckingham's Miscellaneous Works in 1704-5, and they were repeatedly re-edited and reprinted. See the Life of Buckingham by his faithful follower, Brian Fairfax, reprinted in Arber's edition of The Rehearsal (1868); the Life by Lady Burghclere (1903); Summers's edition of The Rehearsal (1914); and the Quarterly Review for January 1898, which gives some account of an unpublished Commonplace-book.

John Oldham (1653-83), son of a Nonconformist minister at Shipton-Moyne in Gloucestershire, studied at St Edmund Hall, Oxford; was for three years usher in Croydon Free School; and became subsequently a private tutor. His early death (from smallpox) drew eloquent tributes from Waller and from Dryden, from Tate, Flatman, Tom Durfey, and Tom Brown. Pope, who was indebted to him for some hints, regretted his 'indelucacy,' and thought his 'strong rage' too like Billingsgate. He made clever paraphrases from the classical satirists, adapted to contemporary London conditions, and skilful translations from Greek, Latin, and French poets (including some of the least modest things of Petronius, Ovid, and Voiture), as well as of passages of Scripture; wrote four violent satires against the Jesuits, and an ironical one against virtue; satires on a false woman, on a printer, on the calamities of authors; and produced a number of occasional lyrics, many of them 'Pindarics.' The most elaborate was a 'Pindaric' in memory of a college friend, one of whose forty-two stanzas runs thus:

Thy soul within such silent pomp did keep,
As if humanity were lull'd asleep;
So gentle was thy pilgrimage beneath,
Time's unheard feet scarce make less noise,
Or the soft journey which a planet goes;
Life seem'd all calm as its last breath,
A still tranquillity so husht thy breast,
As if some halcyon were its guest,
'And there had built her nest;
It hardly now enjoys a greater rest.
As that smooth sea which wears the name of peace
Still with one even face appears,
And feels no tides to change it from its place,
No waves to alter the fair form it bears;
As that unspotted sky,
Where Nile does want of rain supply,
Is free from clouds, from storm is ever free:
So thy unvary'd mind was always one,
And with such clear serenity still shone,
As caus'd thy little world to seem all temp'rate zone.

The satire in which 'Spenser is brought in dissuading the author from poetry' gives a poor account of contemporary poets:

So many now and had the scribblers be,
'Tis scandal to be of their company. . . .
The fools are troubled with the flux of brains,
And each on paper squirts his filthy sense.
A leash of sonnets and of dull lampoon
Set up an author, who forthwith is grown
A man of parts, of rhiming, and renown:
Even that vile wretch who in lewd verse each year
Describes the pageants and my good Lord-May'r,
Whose works must serve the next election day
For making squibs and under pies to lay,
Yet counts himself of the inspir'd train,
And dares in thought the sacred name profane.

John Dryden

—one of the very few English writers who have been accepted as the greatest men of letters of their time, and the only one perhaps who holds a position of equal importance in verse, in prose, and (for his time) in drama—was born probably, if not certainly, on the 9th of August 1631, in the rectory of Aldwinkle All Saints, Northamptonshire. (It was in the rectory of Aldwinkle St Peter's that Fuller was born; see page 596.) His father was Erasmus, the third son of Sir Erasmus Dryden, Bart., of Canons Ashby, in the same county, but on the opposite or western side of it, near Towcester, while Aldwinkle is on the eastern side, in the Nen valley, between Thrapston and Oundle. To this latter district belonged the family of the poet's mother, Mary Pickering, daughter of a clergyman and granddaughter of Sir Gilbert Pickering, Bart. A small estate at Blakesley, in the Canons Ashby neighbourhood, descended to Dryden from his father; but he never resided there, and his frequent visits in later life were always to his mother's relations in the Nen valley. The Dryden family themselves (who up to, and in some cases after, the poet's time usually spelt the name with an i) were of northern (probably Border) origin, and were not seated in Northants till the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when Canons Ashby came to them by marriage with the heiress of the Copes. It, with the baronetcy, would have come to the poet himself had he lived long enough; and both actually came to one of his sons. (The present Drydens of Canons Ashby are descended from the 7th Baronet's niece and heiress, whose husband took the name and in 1795 was created a baronet.)

We know very little of Dryden's youth, but it seems to have been passed at Tichmarsh, the headquarters of the Pickerings. Nor do we know when he went to Westminster, where he was a king's scholar, and where, before he left it for Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1650, he wrote his first published poem, a highly 'metaphysical' epicede on his schoolfellow, Henry Lord Hastings, who had died of smallpox. Its schoolboy exaggeration of the fashionable style of the time is exactly what we see in the early work of some, if not of all, great poets. Dryden held a Westminster scholarship at Trinity, and took his B.A. in the beginning of 1654. But he did not proceed from his scholarship to be Fellow, nor did he take his Master's, though he is said to have resided for the full, or nearly the full, seven years which qualified for that degree. We know really nothing of his college career except that he knew Pepys there; that he contributed soon after he went up another poem, commendatory this time to the book of a living friend, John Hodgesdon's Sion and Parnassus; and that in July of his second year he was discomfited, and sentenced to confess his crime in hall for disobedience to the vice-master and contumacy. His father died six months after he took his B.A., and Dryden succeeded to two-thirds of the little Blakesley property (the other third not falling in till nearly twenty years later at his mother's death). The whole of this was valued then at about £60 a year. Dryden's share would probably be equal to about £150 per annum now, and he had therefore enough to live on, but no more. This is not quite superfluous in considering the character of his work.

He seems to have come to London about the middle of 1657, and as all his relations (more particularly his cousin, the Sir Gilbert Pickering of the day) were not only Parliament men but Cromwellians, he may have expected some of those State pickings on which, as we know from his friend Pepys, all men who had any kind of interest then counted. But the rapid changes of events would have disappointed him if nothing else had;

though, in some times and circumstances, far worse poems than his Heroic Stanzas on the death of Oliver Cromwell have made a man's fortune. But there was not in Dryden the making of a regular place-man. He was too shy, to begin with; probably too much of a man of letters by taste and predestination, in the second place; and (though he has been accused of want of high-mindedness) almost certainly too fastidious, in the third. He had not the slightest objection to flatter—hardly anybody in that day and long afterwards had. But those who have taken the trouble to know Dryden thoroughly cannot imagine him either calmly embezzling, as most public servants then did, or unblushingly bargaining (as Pepys, who did not embezzle, bargained) with contractors and suitors and understrappers for palm-grease and 'pots of wine.'

Fortunately, however, literature was once more becoming something of a refuge for the destitute; and Dryden, though of no imperative or precocious literary tendencies, was, as was soon to be seen, endowed with a multifarious craftsmanship such as hardly any other writer has ever possessed. His enemies later accused him of doing hack-work for the booksellers, especially Herringman, who certainly published most of his early pieces. Anyhow, soon after the return of Charles, he produced palinodes to the Heroic Stanzas (which, however, are themselves rather pro-Cromwellian than anti-royalist) in Astraea Redux, the Poem on the Coronation, and one to Clarendon—all couched in a splendid massive heroic couplet which owed very little to any forerunner. And when the taste of everybody, from the king to the rabble, for the newly revived drama had shown itself, he set to work manfully to achieve success in this no less profitable than popular kind. He was not at first very successful, but after a time his plays added very largely to his income. Their literary value will best be considered together and later. But for a period they drew him away from poetry proper, his last effort in poetry of any consequence for nearly fifteen years being the fine Annus Mirabilis (1666), in which he celebrated the Fire of London and the Dutch War.

Although his relations do not appear to have done much for his worldly prosperity, it must have been partly due to his connection that—as it seems pretty early—he had access to various sides of 'the great world.' He was an early member of the Royal Society, which was fashionable as well as scientific; he must soon after the Restoration have made acquaintance with Sir Robert Howard, son of the royalist Earl of Berkshire; and now, on 1st December 1663, he married Lady Elizabeth, Sir Robert's sister. The usual books contain aspersions on this lady's character and temper, and expressions adverse to the happiness of the marriage, which, it may be well to say bluntly, rest upon no positive evidence whatsoever.

For some sixteen or seventeen years after his marriage Dryden's life was one of hardly chequered good fortune, and was chiefly passed in London, though he spent the Plague-time and a little longer (1665–66) at Charlton, his father-in-law's seat in Wiltshire; and there composed not merely Annus Mirabilis, but the masterly Essay of Dramatic Poesy, which is a landmark alike in English criticism and English prose style. As his family increased so did his means. He held for some years a lucrative share in the King's Playhouse, was made (1670) poet-laureate in succession to D'Avenant, and historiographer-royal in succession to Howell, with a joint salary of £200, and later had additional pensions and small appointments. These, with his own little means, may have at one time given him the value of some £2000 a year of modern money. He knew many distinguished persons from the king downwards. He had for a time no great share of literary quarrels—it appears that the famous squib of the Rehearsal (see infra) in 1671, as it certainly did not in the least affect the public taste for the heroic style of play, so it affected his own composure very little. Only towards the close of the period he had the unpleasant experience of being waylaid and cudgelled by bravoës hired (as it was believed, though never proved) by the malignant and cowardly Rochester, who had been a friend and patron of Dryden, but had taken a spite against him as more closely attached to Rochester's enemy, Mulgrave. Lady Elizabeth bore him three sons, two of whom were sent to their father's own old school (the third went to the Charterhouse), and of whom both parents appear to have been exceedingly fond. But it was somewhat later than this that Dryden settled in the well-known house in Gerrard Street, Soho, where he died; his longest residence during this time appears to have been in Fetter Lane. He knew Milton personally, and had a great admiration for him; while Milton, though denying him 'poetry' (of course in the classical sense of 'invention'), seems to have thought about as well of him as the difference of the two in politics, religion, morals, and poetical theory (not to mention the elder poet's arrogant and ungracious temper) could let us expect.

The frenzy of the Popish Plot, and the welter of conspiracy and partisanship into which it threw the nation, had the most important effects upon Dryden's life and literary career. At first it seemed rather doubtful what part he might take. He had had (or had been thought to have) some connections with Shaftesbury; he brought out, as late as 1681, The Spanish Friar as 'a Protestant play.' But it must be remembered that for some time the king himself either did not dare or did not choose to take any strong part against the plotmongers, and that it was only when they made a dead-set at his brother's succession, and almost directly threatened his own crown, that he threw away the scabbard. Charles has been traditionally said to have given Dryden hints both for Absalom and Achitophel itself and for The Medal. He was quite clever enough; but though extreme originality was not Dryden's forte, he was himself more than capable of seizing the obvious handles presented. The results at any rate were, on the one hand, the production—in the original Absalom and Achitophel, in Dryden's contribution to its Second Part, in The Medal, and in the episodic or retaliatory lampoon of MacFlecknoe addressed to Shadwell—of such a series of political satires as the world had never seen. Dryden's long practice in verse, and especially in the casuistical declamation of the heroic play (see infra), had supplied him with weapons of unparalleled sharpness and power; his temperament, neither phlegmatic nor sentimental, gave him exactly the cool command of vigorous method which the satirist requires. On the other hand, the series identified him irrevocably with the Tory party, and drew upon him all the fury and all the venom of the Whigs.

A more remarkable change (for he had been a royalist for twenty years, and there is no evidence that he had ever been at heart a Republican) seems about the same time to have come over Dryden's mind. Hitherto he had been, at least in expression, by no means precise either in morals or religion. That curious depravation in both, which Pepys exhibits to us more especially in himself and in Lord Sandwich, had no doubt taken place in Dryden likewise; and while great part of his dramatic work exhibits (to put it in the most favourable way) complete complaisance to the least respectable desires of the frequenters of the playhouse in language and choice of subject, his references to religion are, if not directly free-thinking, anything but reverent or devout. In the very remarkable poem of Religio Laici (1682), written almost concurrently with the satires, all this is changed, and changed in a manner for which it is impossible to suspect or even suggest any unworthy motive. Dryden appears here as a philosophical but orthodox Anglican, with just a desire for some more authoritative decision on doubtful points of faith and practice than the Anglican creed provides.

Such an attitude if feigned could have 'curried favour' with no person and no party at that time; but if not feigned, it clears away much if not all suspicion from Dryden's change of faith shortly after the accession of James II. This change was of course made the occasion of the most violent attacks on him at the time—attacks which have been more recently revived by Macaulay and others, sometimes with the assistance of false (at best mistaken) assertions as to the rewards he received. All that can be said truly is that Dryden is not the only person who has succumbed (especially after a youth of somewhat reckless living and thinking) to the attractions of an infallible

Church; that the alleged lowness of his moral tone has been greatly exaggerated in order to disprove the possibility of his sincerity; that as a matter of fact he gained nothing (he simply did not lose) by his change; and that when the fresh change came it struck him impavidum and unflinching. It is simply absurd to suppose that a party in the dire straits for literary talent in which the Whigs were then would not have welcomed Dryden even if they had despised him; in fact, they could not have helped themselves. Had Dryden chosen to take the oaths, William might, even without 'Dutch rudeness,' have turned his back on him, and the wits might have emptied their quivers; but the Treasury could not have kept back his pay.

The reign of James, which the almost inhuman folly of the king made disastrous to himself and to all connected with him, was not, even while it lasted, particularly fortunate for Dryden. The only wages of what some are pleased to call his apostasy were troublesome commissions from the court—a translation of the Life of St Francis Xavier; an ill-starred attempt to urge Romanism on the people by help of the papers of the dead king, which brought upon him a severe castigation from the practised hand of Stillingfleet; &c. The better, though not wholly good, polemical poem of The Hind and the Panther could not possibly have owed anything to the dull brain of James as its forerunners had perhaps owed something to the bright one of Charles; and the laureate's poem on the birth of the Prince of Wales, with some fine passages, was the least good of all the serious efforts of his maturity. On the other hand, when the wreck came it was, as far as place and pension went, total. For the last twelve years of his life Dryden had nothing to rely upon but his insignificant private fortune, the liberality of patron-friends like Dorset—who, in spite of all political differences, stuck to his old companion on the voyage down the river (see pages 781 and 813), when they talked of the English drama to the accompaniment of the Dutch guns—and the profits of his literary exertions. These latter were meagre, rather in proportion to the merit of the work than to the standards and necessities of the time. His latest attempts at drama are, in at any rate some cases, better literature than all save the best of his earlier; but they were much less successful. This was partly, no doubt, owing to the fact that even Dryden's iron craftsmanship could not in old age work against the grain (and such work, he himself acknowledged, drama had always been to him) as it had worked in youth; but partly also to the other facts that the public taste was changing, and that the interests, court and other, which had once been on his side were now against him.

Fortunately he had another string to his bow. The standard of English learning, both in the classical and in the modern languages, was falling;

but, partly from this very cause, there was a greater appetite than ever for translations. For translation—or at least for a peculiar kind of version which ranged from tolerably free translation to the loosest possible paraphrase—Dryden's genius, both creative and critical, was peculiarly suited. He had indeed, by one of his characteristic processes of critical evolution, arrived at a regular theory of it which was perhaps better justified by his practice than in itself. According to this theory the translator frankly disclaims all literal fidelity, and endeavours to rearrange or recreate the work in his hands, so as to produce something that seems to him to stand in the same relation to the language of the time and the probable readers of his own day as that in which the original stood in regard to those to whom it was addressed. He had, in the early volumes of a series of Miscellanies, begun this process on divers classical authors, almost as soon as the time of his first great satires. In this latest period he carried it out, partially or exclusively, in three works of importance—a translation of Juvenal and Persius, executed partly by himself, partly by others; the famous version of Virgil; and his last and greatest book of verse, the Fables, of which the most considerable portions were what he called 'translations' of Chaucer and Boccaccio. The Virgil is believed to have brought him in as much as £1200; the Fables were sold for the far more inadequate initial price of two hundred and fifty guineas. Moreover, during nearly the whole of his later literary life Dryden derived an income—small and uncertain in amount, but no doubt useful to him—from the supply of prologues and epilogues, according to the demand of the time, for plays other than his own. As these pieces were specially addressed ad vulgus, some of the less estimable features of his language and sentiment appear in them; but hardly any part of his work shows more triumphantly his almost miraculous power of literary adjustment, the trumpet-ring and echo of his verse, and the clear, shrewd, solid strength of his sense and thought. Although in these years his literary primacy was not really disputed by any competent judgment, he naturally had his share, and more than his share, of the controversial amenities of the roughest and fiercest period of political strife in English history; while very late in his life (1698) he was assailed from another side and in the house of his political friends, having to bear no small part of the brunt of Jeremy Collier's famous onslaught on the Profaneness and Immorality of the Stage. He had not merely the good sense but (as everything tends to show) the sincere good feeling to plead guilty, at most claiming extenuating circumstances.

Otherwise the last years of his life were fairly happy. All his family survived him—though all followed him at no great distance of time, death being in the case of his wife and youngest son preceded by impaired sanity. Some of his connections, both of the older and newer generations, were his fast friends to the last. However much he might be abused by mere snarlers or by political and religious partisans, everybody felt—and he knew that everybody felt—that he had succeeded to much more than the position of Ben Jonson as not merely official but actual head of English poetry and English literature; while all the best of the younger men of letters (except Swift, his kinsman, and the recipient of an imagined affront) were his hearty admirers. It was while the Fables were still in the first flush of success that he died (from mortification of the toe caused by gout) on 1st May 1700, and was (ultimately) buried in Westminster Abbey. Even those who, like Macaulay earlier and Sir Leslie Stephen later, have taken, for political or other reasons, an unfairly low view of Dryden's moral character, admit his possession of not a few moral virtues—modesty; absence of jealousy, conceit, or arrogance; family affection. Others, acknowledging that some of the degradation of a rather degraded time affected him, regard him as on the whole in need of very little whitewashing even morally. His intellectual and literary greatness, if not always fully or properly recognised, has scarcely ever been denied by any competent authority.

His position can spare the aid of the historic estimate, but is largely heightened, widened, and strengthened thereby. In himself, and without any account taken of independence of his predecessors or influence on those who came after him, Dryden is a dramatist of singular variety, volume, and (at his best) vigour; a prose-writer forcible, agreeable, and adequate to his subject as are few; a poet wanting only in the highest and rarest atmosphere of poetry; and in all these departments a master at once of the formal and the material constituents of literature. Hardly any one, except Lucretius, can argue in verse as he can; no one has a securer and defter grasp of the weapons of satire; in declamation (an inferior kind, no doubt) he has hardly a superior. Whether we look at the variety of his gifts or at the excellences of their individual expression, his contribution to English literature approves itself at once. But when we supplement this mere 'tasting' by an orderly examination of the state of that literature before and after his time, enjoyment becomes definite appreciation. We no longer, in a phrase of his own, 'like grossly,' but accurately, and with discrimination of what he did.

In every one of the three departments it is all-important to notice that Dryden by no means displaced or rejected the great Elizabethan work, preference (and just preference) of which has made some judges unjust to him. If one or two men of the 'giant race,' such as Milton and Browne, survived till he was no longer young, they were but survivals; and even as such they passed away before he reached his own perfection. As a poet he is to be compared not with Milton, hardly even with Cowley, but with D'Avenant on the one hand and Chamberlayne on the other; as a prose-writer and a dramatist hardly with any one of his forerunners, seeing that he represents in each class a new style rising on the already broken-down ruins of the past. Practically, with a decision and unanimity rare at such crises, the Restoration turned over a new leaf in all three volumes; and it was of the utmost importance that such a master as Dryden was there to set the copy on the blanks.

It was also extremely fortunate that he was not a precocious writer, and that he was (beyond almost all other men of letters in any way his equals) in the habit of reconstructing his theory and practice from time to time. But, like all great poets, he was born with certain secrets which he did not indeed discover or apply very early, but which gave an unmistakable impress to his work when, and almost before, it became mature. In poetry the chief of these was the mastery of a singularly strong and nervous line, which, by the agency partly of the new-stopped or mainly-stopped couplet, was girded up from the flaccid looseness into which both the blank-verse practice of the later dramatists and the luxuriantly overlapped couplet of the poets from Wither to Chamberlayne, had plunged the decasyllable. Something of this appears even in the Heroic Stanzas, but it is much more conspicuous in the three couplet poems above referred to and in Annus Mirabilis. Up, however, to the date of the latter Dryden's versification worked a little stiffly. It still needed expletives like 'do' and 'did;' still had recourse to effective but obvious tricks, such as the scattering of identical emphatic words like 'you' and 'your' in different places of the line. His fifteen years' practice in drama—couplet at first, then blank-verse—relieved him of this; and when he reappeared with Absalom and Achitophel there was hardly a formal blemish left on his verse—for the uses of the triplet and the Alexandrine, to which he resorted to avoid monotony, cannot be called blemishes. In the twenty years that remained to him he improved even on this standard; he certainly adjusted it to wider ranges of subject than political and controversial matters could afford. And while the exquisite lines to the Duchess of Ormond in his latest volume take up the device of 'you' which has been noticed in him forty years before, they employ it, in common with other devices, after such a fashion of combined grace and grandeur as nothing but the very topmost summits of poetic workmanship can excel.

Nor, though the couplet is Dryden's chief medium, is it by any means the only one of which he is a master. His 'Pindarics'—the irregularly rhymed stanzas which Cowley had made fashionable—are, not merely in the universally known Alexander's Feast, but in the partly better Ode on Mrs Anne Killigrew and other places, the finest of their kind. His lighter lyrics (in his playsongs chiefly), though they never have the sweetest or airiest charm of those of the poets of Charles the First's time, or even that of the best pieces of Dorset and Rochester, Sedley and Afra Behn, have been as a rule much undervalued; and he gave no small assistance to the reintroduction of the triple-foot, anapæstic or dactylic, into English poetry for purposes superior to those of doggerel and ballad.

The diction and the subjects of this verse were of equal importance. As far as the latter head is concerned, Dryden's accomplishment in verse-argument was of course not unmixedly beneficial to English literature. It made poetry attempt as a main business what is really a main business of prose; and it gave, if not countenance, yet pretext to a deplorable family of verse didactics. But it was in itself too consummate not to 'conquer time' (as Landor put it), and it by no means prevented the poet from doing much besides arguing. Dryden's narration is admirable, his discourse in non-argumentative ways superb; and his description has since the days of Wordsworth been unduly depreciated. He cannot (or at least he does not) attempt to describe with the elaboration of the modern word-painter; but he is equal to the images he attempts to reproduce, and his single epithets are often admirably luminous and suggestive.

Undoubtedly, however, his great claim, next to his versification, lies in his diction. He rejects the euphuistic promiscuousness of his forerunners without falling into the mere vulgarity of some of his immediate contemporaries, or into the grayness and lack of colour of standard eighteenth-century English. He has not the slightest horror either of a new word or of a foreign word or of an archaic word, yet by a half-instinctive process of selection he has arranged a vocabulary which, though no doubt there can never be any final standard of English, perhaps approaches that ideal as near as any that can be mentioned. So at least thought Charles James Fox, who, when he undertook his History of James II., resolved to use no word which was not to be found in Dryden. But Dryden's practice belies Fox's theory.

The combination of these gifts with a far smaller portion of the true 'poetic fire' than has been assigned to Dryden by all but one-sided criticism would have sufficed to secure an altogether unusually high level of merit. It is not even true that (as Landor qualifies the praise given above by saying) he is 'never tender or sublime.' He is not often tender, but he is sometimes; he is sublime not seldom. But the intellectual and artistic qualities of his verse are no doubt on the whole above the emotional. His best poems have been glanced at already, but a short catalogue of all the more important, with dates and a brief note of the subject, &c., of each, may be useful. Heroic Stanzas, quatrains on Cromwell's death (1658); Astræa Redux, on the king's return, and, like the two following, in heroic couplets (1660); Panegyric on the Coronation (1661); To My Lord

Chancellor (New Year's Day 1662); Annus Mirabilis (winter of 1666), quatrains; Absalom and Achitophel, with its sequels, all in couplets, and all written and published between November 1681 and November 1682; Religio Laici, religious-philosophical couplets (1682); Threnodia Augustalis, a Pindaric on the death of Charles II. (1685); The Hind and the Panther, an allegorical polemic in couplets on the quarrel between the Anglican and Roman Churches, with side-hits at the Protestant sects and obnoxious persons like Burnet (1687); Britannia Rediviva, also couplets (1688); Eleonora, an epicede on Lady Abingdon, written to order, but with splendid passages, in couplets (1692). The dates of the great translations and of the Fables (which included rehandlings of the Knight's, Nun's Priest's, and Wife of Bath's Tales from Chaucer; of The Flower and the Leaf; and of the stories of Sigismonda, Honoria, and Cymon, from Boccaccio) have been given above. Dryden's minor poems, which are very numerous, are scattered over the whole forty years of his literary life, and in many places—his plays, those of others, the Miscellanies which he edited, and the various books for which, as compliments or commendations or otherwise, they were specially written.

It will have been observed from this catalogue—and indeed it is generally known—that the larger part of Dryden's poetical work is written in the heroic or decasyllabic couplet, to which he gave an entirely new stamp, and which, directly or through the refined but not in all ways improved form given to it by Pope, became the reigning metre of English verse for nearly a hundred and fifty years. And attention has been drawn already to the importance of his dramatic work in reference to this. That work falls into four classes—comedies or tragi-comedies, heroic plays, later blank-verse dramas, and operas.

Dryden's comedies have, in the general opinion, been ranked lowest among his works; and with some excuse. His touch was scarcely light enough for the kind; and, perhaps here only, he never worked out a distinct form of his own. His comedies, tragi-comedies, and (in the useful French limitation of the word) dramas float between the humour-comedy of Jonson, the romantic-prosaic comedy of Beaumont and Fletcher, and the brilliant new comedy of manners which, quite early in his career, Etherege aimed at, and which, late in that career, Congreve and Vanbrugh triumphantly achieved. This uncertainty of scheme and spirit is not helped by the very frequent coarseness of language and incident or by the indistinctness of comic character. But in one particular situation—the pair of light-o'-loves who flirt and bicker but are really very fond of each other—Dryden is not unsuccessful; while in one figure of an affected coquette, the Melantha of Marriage à la Mode (1672), he has borrowed little from any one else, and has lent a great deal to one of Congreve's masterpieces, Millamant. The drawbacks of his comedy appear at once in his earliest play, The Wild Gallant (1663), and have not disappeared in his last, the tragi-comic Love Triumphant of 1694. Its merits appear chiefly in Secret Love, or the Maiden Queen (1667), where Nell Gwynne's acting undoubtedly helped, but by no means wholly created, the attractive part of Florimel, one of the flirts above mentioned; the also-mentioned Marriage à la Mode; The Spanish Friar (1681); and Amphitryon (1690). The blank-verse tragedies, which he produced after giving up rhyme, undoubtedly contain his noblest work in drama—the bold, but not wholly too bold, attempt on the subject of Antony and Cleopatra called All for Love, or the World Well Lost (1678); the carefully wrought and admirably written Don Sebastian (1690); and the fine rhetorical Cleomenes (1692), his last play but one. These, however, are inevitably brought into contrast with the Elizabethan masterpieces, and suffer accordingly. The operas, Albion and Albanus (1685) and King Arthur (1691), contain good work, especially in the lyric parts; but they are mainly curiosities, historically interesting as marking a transition from the masque. A curiosity, again, is the rhymed or 'tagged' dramatisation of Paradise Lost, called The State of Innocence (1674), which Dryden also called an opera, and which is said to have been good-naturedly though half-contemptuously authorised by Milton himself. Curiosities of a less agreeable kind occur in the Shakespearian alterations of The Tempest, after D'Avenant (1667), and of Troilus and Cressida (1679); but some of Dryden's drama is only 'curious' in a worse sense still.

The heroic play deserves separate treatment for many reasons—the chief being its pre-eminent serviceableness in perfecting his verse, its odd historical isolation as a kind immensely popular for a time and then chiefly laughed at, and its close connection with the admirable Essay of Dramatic Poesy. He did not exactly invent it; it is one of those literary kinds which, in a famous phrase, were never directly invented by any one, but 'grewed.' The heroic play has something to do with the long-winded but universally read French novels of the Scudéry class; something with the French tragedy of Corneille and his earlier contemporaries; much with the out-at-heel degradation of blank-verse in the last plays written immediately before the closing of the theatres in 1642; much also with the growing distaste for remote imaginative conceit and emotion, the growing fancy for sharp intellectual rally and repartee. The first example of it in its high-flown sentimental, rhetorical style, and non-natural situation is D'Avenant's Siege of Rhodes, which, safeguarded by its title of 'opera,' actually preceded the Restoration and the reopening of the theatre generally (1656). It was written for nearly forty years after that date. But its flourishing time was from 1665 to 1680, and all its best examples were mainly or wholly Dryden's work. He it was who first achieved the hectoring, ringing tenor of its couplet tirades, and the sharp battledore-and-shuttlecock (so admirably ridiculed by Butler and in the Rehearsal, and always on the point of burlesquing itself) of its single-line interchanges of speech. The Indian Queen, which he wrote in collaboration with his brother-in-law, Sir Robert Howard, appeared as early as January 1664; The Indian Emperor, by himself, and far superior, followed in 1665. But he made much farther advances to the eccentric perfection which the thing admitted in Tyrannic Love, or the Royal Martyr (1669), on the story of St Catharine, and the two parts of The Conquest of Granada (1670), all three of which are triumphs of preposterous situation and sentiment, carried off by the most extraordinary bravado of poetical rhetoric, which not seldom becomes, for moments, actual poetry of a high class. His last, and in some ways his greatest, heroic or rhymed tragedy was Aurengzebe (1675), a play interesting because of its contemporary if remote subject, and though not possessing the furia and sweep of its two predecessors, including passages (one especially) which display at nearly their best Dryden's masterly fashion of writing and his criticism—not subtle or profound, but strong and true and everlasting—of life.

The transition to his prose is all the easier because, as was noted above, the first considerable example of that prose, the Essay of Dramatic Poesy, is in part a defence of rhymed plays. Congreve represents Dryden as acknowledging indebtedness to Tillotson; but Dryden was too proud a man to be a vain one, and it is very difficult to trace the indebtedness chronologically as well as aesthetically. It is certain that for years past there had been, unconsciously or consciously, both a vague desire for and actual attempts at a style less gorgeous but more generally useful than the styles of Milton, Taylor, and Browne, less intricate and cumbrous than that of Clarendon, easier and more conversational than that of Hobbes. Beginnings of such a style are found as far back as Jonson; Cowley's essays mark a great advance in it. But these essays were not published early. The real bringers of it about were a group of men—Tillotson, Temple, Halifax, South, Dryden himself, and one or two more—who were all born about the year 1630. For the perfecting of such a style the essay, with its freedom from stiff rhetorical rules of argument and its wide liberty, offered special advantages; and Dryden, who, if he did not require, always preferred, a model, found in Corneille's examens of his own plays one for the adjustment of the essay to purposes of literary criticism. Most of the long succession of essays, prefaces, and so forth with which he followed up the Essay of Dramatic Poesy itself are, like it, devoted to literary subjects, with, naturally enough, a strong admixture of political and other polemic, in the period from the Popish Plot to the Revolution. But whatever the subject, the style is the same, or rather it adjusts itself to almost any subject with slight variations. Fault has been found with it (by Coleridge) for not possessing a 'stricter and purer grammar;' but this comes from the mistaken notion that English grammar has a 'sealed pattern' lying somewhere stored up and not to be varied from, instead of being, as it really is, in the main an induction from the practice of the best writers. At first he was perhaps a little too colloquial; but as this fault grew upon his contemporaries he himself corrected it. He was at first also too much given to the use of foreign words; but though he, wisely, never gave this up, he used it later with an equally wise moderation. His diction has the same clear-cut force and form that it possesses in poetry; and the mould of his sentences, with its not excessive or monotonous antithesis, its easy swing and vibration, and the clenching stroke at the end, reminds one in no unpleasant way of his management of the couplet. The great character of his prose throughout is its combination of ease that is never (or hardly ever) slipshod with weight which is still more rarely 'loaded' or clumsy. Here, as in verse, he improved continually to the last; and his prose Preface to the Fables, with its opening epistle to the Duke of Ormond, is as much a 'diploma-piece' of his style in this harmony as the verses to the Duchess (given at page 801) are of his fashion of poetry. In both he was for his time a perfect master of the game; and in such mastery he is very unlikely to be excelled at any time, whatsoever may be the changes that come over English literature.

I. Dryden's Poems.—The first group of illustrative extracts are from Dryden's poetry other than dramatic, the second from his dramas, the third from his prose.

Character of Shaftesbury.

Of these the false Achitophel was first;
A name to all succeeding ages curst:
For close designs and crooked counsels fit,
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit,
Restless, unfixed in principles and place,
In power unpleased, impatient of disgrace:
A fiery soul, which, working out its way,
Fretted the pigmy body to decay,
And o'er-informed the tenement of clay.
A daring pilot in extremity;
Pleased with the danger, when the waves went high,
He sought the storms; but, for a calm unfit,
Would steer too nigh the sands to boast his wit.
Great wits are sure to madness near allied,
And thin partitions do their bounds divide;
Else why should he, with wealth and honour blest,
Refuse his age the needful hours of rest?
Punish a body which he could not please,
Bankrupt of life, yet prodigal of ease?
And all to leave what with his toil he won,
To that unfeathered two-legged thing, a son;
Got while his soul did huddled notions try,
And born a shapeless lump, like anarchy.

In friendship false, implacable in hate ;
 Resolved to ruin or to rule the state :
 To compass this, the triple bond he broke,
 The pillars of the public safety shook,
 And fitted Israel for a foreign yoke :
 Then, seized with fear, yet still affecting fame,
 Usurped a patriot's all-atoning name.
 So easy still it proves, in factious times,
 With public zeal to cancel private crimes.
 How safe is treason, and how sacred ill,
 Where none can sin against the people's will !
 Where crowds can wink, and no offence be known,
 Since in another's guilt they find their own !
 Yet fame deserved no enemy can grudge ;
 The statesman we abhor, but praise the judge.
 In Israel's courts ne'er sat an Abbethdin—
 With more discerning eyes, or hands more clean,
 Unbribed, unsought, the wretched to redress,
 Swift of despatch, and easy of access.
 Oh ! had he been content to serve the crown
 With virtues only proper to the gown,
 Or had the rankness of the soil been freed
 From cockle that oppressed the noble seed,
 David for him his tuneful harp had strung,
 And heaven had wanted one immortal song.
 But wild ambition loves to slide, not stand,
 And Fortune's ice prefers to Virtue's land.
 Achitophel, grown weary to possess
 A lawful fame and lazy happiness,
 Disdained the golden fruit to gather free,
 And lent the crowd his arm to shake the tree.

(From Absalom and Achitophel.)

It is significant that Dryden avoids the spelling Ahithophel, which the Authorised Version had long made the stereotyped English spelling, and clings to Achitophel, the spelling not merely of the Latin Vulgate but of the (Catholic) Douay version. Abbethdin, 'father of the house of justice,' was the Hebrew title of a Jewish supreme judge.

The Duke of Buckingham.

Some of their chiefs were princes of the land :
 In the first rank of these did Zimri stand ;
 A man so various that he seemed to be
 Not one, but all mankind's epitome :
 Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong,
 Was everything by starts, and nothing long ;
 But, in the course of one revolving moon,
 Was chymist, fiddler, statesman, and buffoon ;
 Then all for women, painting, rhyming, drinking,
 Besides ten thousand freaks that died in thinking.
 Blest madman, who could every hour employ
 With something new to wish or to enjoy !
 Railing and praising were his usual themes,
 And both, to shew his judgment, in extremes ;
 So over-violent, or over-civil,
 That every man with him was god or devil.
 In squandering wealth was his peculiar art ;
 Nothing went unrewarded but desert :
 Beggared by fools, whom still he found too late,
 He had his jest, and they had his estate ;
 He laughed himself from court, then sought relief
 By forming parties, but could ne'er be chief ;
 For, spite of him, the weight of business fell
 On Absalom and wise Achitophel :
 Thus, wicked but in will, of means bereft,
 He left not faction, but of that was left.

(From Absalom and Achitophel.)

Shaftesbury's Address to Monmouth.

Auspicious prince, at whose nativity
 Some royal planet ruled the southern sky,
 Thy longing country's darling and desire,
 Their cloudy pillar and their guardian fire ;
 Their second Moses, whose extended wand
 Divides the seas, and shews the promised land ;
 Whose dawning day in every distant age
 Has exercised the sacred prophet's rage :
 The people's prayer, the glad diviner's theme,
 The young men's vision, and the old men's dream ;
 Thee saviour, thee, the nation's vows confess,
 And, never satisfied with seeing, bless :
 Swift unbespoken poms thy steps proclaim,
 And stammering babes are taught to lisp thy name :
 How long wilt thou the general joy detain,
 Starve and defraud the people of thy reign ?
 Content ingloriously to pass thy days,
 Like one of virtue's fools that feeds on praise ;
 Till thy fresh glories, which now shine so bright,
 Grow stale, and tarnish with our daily sight ;
 Believe me, royal youth, thy fruit must be
 Or gathered ripe, or rot upon the tree :
 Heaven has to all allotted, soon or late,
 Some lucky revolution of their fate ;
 Whose motions, if we watch and guide with skill,
 (For human good depends on human will,)
 Our fortune rolls as from a smooth descent,
 And from the first impression takes the bent ;
 But if unseized, she glides away like wind,
 And leaves repenting folly far behind.
 Now, now she meets you with a glorious prize,
 And spreads her locks before you as she flies !
 Had thus old David, from whose loins you spring,
 Not dared, when fortune called him to be king,
 At Gath an exile he might still remain,
 And heaven's anointing oil had been in vain.
 Let his successful youth your hopes engage,
 But shun the example of declining age ;
 Behold him setting in his western skies,
 The shadows lengthening as the vapours rise.
 He is not now as when on Jordan's sand
 The joyful people thronged to see him land,
 Covering the beach and blackening all the strand !

(From Absalom and Achitophel.)

Jordan's sand is simply for the English coast, and refers to no incident in Hebrew history.

Ode to the Memory of Mrs Anne Killigrew.

Thou youngest virgin-daughter of the skies,
 Made in the last promotion of the blest ;
 Whose palms, new-plucked from Paradise,
 In spreading branches more sublimely rise,
 Rich with immortal green above the rest :
 Whether, adopted to some neighbouring star,
 Thou roll'st above us, in thy wandering race,
 Or, in procession fixed and regular,
 Mov'st with the heaven-majestic pace ;
 Or, called to more superior bliss,
 Thou tread'st, with seraphims, the vast abyss :
 Whatever happy region be thy place,
 Cease thy celestial song a little space ;
 Thou wilt have time enough for hymns divine,
 Since Heaven's eternal year is thine.
 Hear, then, a mortal Muse thy praise rehearse,
 In no ignoble verse ;

But such as thy own voice did practise here,
When thy first-fruits of poesy were given,
To make thyself a welcome inmate there ;
While yet a young probationer,
And candidate of heaven.

If by traduction came thy mind,
Our wonder is the less to find
A soul so charming from a stock so good ;
Thy father was transfused into thy blood :
So wert thou born into the tuneful strain,
An early, rich, and inexhausted vein.
But if thy pre-existing soul
Was formed at first with myriads more,
It did through all the mighty poets roll,
Who Greek or Latin laurels wore,
And was that Sappho last, which once it was before.
If so, then cease thy flight, O heaven-born mind !
Thou hast no dross to purge from thy rich ore :
Nor can thy soul a fairer mansion find
Than was the beauteous frame she left behind.
Return to fill or mend the quire of thy celestial kind. . . .

O gracious God ! how far have we
Profaned thy heavenly gift of Poesy !
Made prostitute and profligate the Muse,
Debased to each obscene and impious use,
Whose harmony was first ordained above
For tongues of angels, and for hymns of love !
Oh wretched we ! why were we hurried down
This lubric and adulterate age,
(Nay, added fat pollutions of our own,)
To increase the steaming ordures of the stage ?
What can we say to excuse our second fall ?
Let this thy vestal, Heaven, atone for all ;
Her Arethusian stream remains unsoiled,
Unmixed with foreign filth and undefiled ;
Her wit was more than man ; her innocence a child. . . .

When in mid-air the golden trump shall sound,
To raise the nations underground ;
When in the valley of Jehosophat
The judging God shall close the book of Fate ;
And there the last assizes keep
For those who wake, and those who sleep ;
When rattling bones together fly
From the four corners of the sky ;
When sinews o'er the skeletons are spread,
Those clothed with flesh, and life inspires the dead ;
The sacred poets first shall hear the sound,
And foremost from the tomb shall bound,
For they are covered with the lightest ground ;
And straight, with inborn vigour, on the wing,
Like mountain larks, to the new morning sing.
There thou, sweet saint, before the quire shall go,
As harbinger of heaven, the way to shew,
The way which thou so well hast learned below.

(Miss) Anne Killigrew, daughter of a prebendary of Westminster (who was the brother of the two dramatists ; see Vol. II.), died of smallpox in 1685, aged twenty-five. She painted pictures, and a volume of her poems was published after her death. The traducian or derivative theory of the origin of the individual soul is opposed to the creationist view. Jehosophat is neither the Vulgate nor the Douay spelling (Josaphat), nor yet that of the A.V. (Jehoshaphat).

Satire on Shadwell.

All human things are subject to decay ;
And, when Fate summons, monarchs must obey.
This Flecknoe found, who, like Augustus, young
Was called to empire, and had governed long,
In prose and verse was owned, without dispute,
Through all the realms of Nonsense absolute.
This aged prince, now flourishing in peace,
And blest with issue of a large increase,
Worn out with business, did at length debate
To settle the succession of the state ;
And pondering which of all his sons was fit
To reign and wage immortal war with Wit,
Cried : 'Tis resolved ; for Nature pleads that he Should only rule who most resembles me.
Shadwell alone my perfect image bears,
Mature in dulness from his tender years :
Shadwell alone of all my sons is he
Who stands confirmed in full stupidity.
The rest to some faint meaning make pretence ;
But Shadwell never deviates into sense.
Some beams of wit on other souls may fall,
Strike through, and make a lucid interval ;
But Shadwell's genuine night admits no ray ;
His rising fogs prevail upon the day.
Besides, his goodly fabric fills the eye,
And seems designed for thoughtless majesty :
Thoughtless as monarch oaks that shade the plain,
And, spread in solemn state, supinely reign.
Heywood and Shirley were but types of thee,
Thou last great prophet of tautology !
Even I, a dunce of more renown than they,
Was sent before but to prepare thy way.'

(From Mac-Flecknoe.)

For Flecknoe, see page 784 of this volume, and for Shadwell, Vol. II. p. 63 ; and for Heywood and Shirley, unkindly comprehended in the same condemnation, pages 431, 484 of this volume.

To my dear Friend, Mr Congreve, on his Comedy called 'The Double Dealer.'

Well then, the promised hour is come at last,
The present age of wit obscures the past :
Strong were our sires, and as they fought they writ,
Conquering with force of arms and dint of wit :
Theirs was the giant race before the flood ;
And thus, when Charles returned, our empire stood.
Like Janus, he the stubborn soil manured,
With rules of husbandry the rankness cured ;
Tamed us to manners, when the stage was rude,
And boisterous English wit with art endued.
Our age was cultivated thus at length,
But what we gained in skill we lost in strength.
Our builders were with want of genius curst ;
The second temple was not like the first ;
Till you, the best Vitruvius, come at length,
Our beauties equal, but excel our strength.
Firm Doric pillars found your solid base,
The fair Corinthian crowns the higher space ;
Thus all below is strength, and all above is grace.
In easy dialogue is Fletcher's praise ;
He moved the mind, but had not power to raise.
Great Jonson did by strength of judgment please,
Yet, doubling Fletcher's force, he wants his ease.
In differing talents both adorned their age,
One for the study, t'other for the stage.

But both to Congreve justly shall submit,
 One matched in judgment, both o'ermatched in wit.
 In him all beauties of this age we see,
 Etherege his courtship, Southern's purity,
 The satire, wit, and strength of manly Wycherly.
 All this in blooming youth you have achieved ;
 Nor are your foiled contemporaries grieved.
 So much the sweetness of your manners move,
 We cannot envy you, because we love.
 Fabius might joy in Scipio, when he saw
 A beardless Consul made against the law,
 And join his suffrage to the votes of Rome,
 Though he with Hannibal was overcome.
 Thus old Romano bowed to Raphael's fame,
 And scholar to the youth he taught became.

O that your brows my laurel had sustained !
 Well had I been deposed, if you had reigned :
 The father had descended for the son ;
 For only you are lineal to the throne.
 Thus, when the state one Edward did depose,
 A greater Edward in his room arose :
 But now, not I but poetry is curst ;
 For Tom the second reigns like Tom the first.
 But let them not mistake my patron's part,
 Nor call his charity their own desert.
 Yet this I prophesy—Thou shalt be seen,
 Though with some short parenthesis between,
 High on the throne of wit, and, seated there,
 Not mine—that's little—but thy laurel wear.
 Thy first attempt an early promise made,
 That early promise this has more than paid.
 So bold, yet so judiciously you dare,
 That your least praise is to be regular.
 Time, place, and action may with pains be wrought,
 But genius must be born, and never can be taught.
 This is your portion, this your native store ;
 Heaven, that but once was prodigal before, [more.
 To Shakespeare gave as much ; she could not give him

Maintain your post : that's all the fame you need ;
 For 'tis impossible you should proceed.
 Already I am worn with cares and age,
 And just abandoning the ungrateful stage :
 Unprofitably kept at Heaven's expense,
 I live a rent-charge on His providence ;
 But you, whom every Muse and Grace adorn,
 Whom I foresee to better fortune born,
 Be kind to my remains ; and oh, defend,
 Against your judgment, your departed friend !
 Let not the insulting foe my fame pursue,
 But shade those laurels which descend to you :
 And take for tribute what these lines express :
 You merit more, nor could my love do less.

Tom the First and Tom the Second are apparently Thomas Shadwell and Thomas Rymer of the Federa, also a dramatist, and the worst of all actual and possible critics.

On Milton.

Three poets, in three distant ages born,
 Greece, Italy, and England did adorn.
 The first in loftiness of thought surpassed ;
 The next in majesty ; in both the last.
 The force of Nature could no farther go ;
 To make a third, she joined the former two.

On Cromwell.

His grandeur he derived from Heaven alone,
 For he was great ere Fortune made him so ;

And wars, like mists that rise against the sun,
 Made him but greater seem, not greater grow. . . .

Nor was he like those stars which only shine
 When to pale mariners they storms portend ;
 He had his calmer influence, and his mien
 Did love and majesty together blend.

(From Heroic Stanzas.)

Reason and Religion.

Dim as the borrowed beams of moon and stars
 To lonely, weary, wandering travellers,
 Is Reason to the soul ; and as on high
 Those rolling fires discover but the sky,
 Not light us here ; so Reason's glimmering ray
 Was lent, not to assure our doubtful way,
 But guide us upward to a better day.
 And as those nightly tapers disappear,
 When day's bright lord ascends our hemisphere ;
 So pale grows Reason at Religion's sight ;
 So dies, and so dissolves in supernatural light.

(From Religio Laici.)

It is worth noting the rhyming of stars with travellers.

Hind and Panther Described.

A milk-white Hind, immortal and unchanged,
 Fed on the lawns, and in the forest ranged ;
 Without unspotted, innocent within,
 She feared no danger, for she knew no sin.
 Yet had she oft been chased with horns and hounds,
 And Scythian shafts, and many winged wounds
 Aimed at her heart ; was often forced to fly,
 And doomed to death, though fated not to die. . .

The Panther, sure the noblest next the Hind,
 And fairest creature of the spotted kind ;
 Oh, could her inborn stains be washed away.
 She were too good to be a beast of prey !
 How can I praise or blame, and not offend,
 Or how divide the frailty from the friend ?
 Her vaults and virtues lie so mixed, that she
 Nor wholly stands condemned nor wholly free.
 Then like her injured Lion, let me speak ;
 He cannot bend her, and he would not break.
 Unkind already, and estranged in part,
 The Wolf begins to share her wandering heart.
 Though unpolluted yet with actual ill,
 She half commits who sins but in her will.
 If, as our dreaming Platonists report,
 There could be spirits of a middle sort,
 Too black for heaven, and yet too white for hell,
 Who just dropped half-way down, nor lower fell ;
 So poised, so gently she descends from high,
 It seems a soft dismission from the sky.

(From The Hind and the Panther, Part I.)

The Swallow.

The swallow, privileged above the rest
 Of all the birds as man's familiar guest,
 Pursues the sun in summer, brisk and bold,
 But wisely shuns the persecuting cold ;
 Is well to chancels and to chimneys known,
 Though 'tis not thought she feeds on smoke alone.
 From hence she has been held of heavenly line,
 Endued with particles of soul divine :
 This merry chorister had long possessed
 Her summer seat, and feathered well her nest,

Till frowning skies began to change their cheer,
 And time turned up the wrong side of the year;
 The shedding trees began the ground to strow
 With yellow leaves, and bitter blasts to blow:
 Such auguries of winter thence she drew,
 Which by instinct or prophecy she knew;
 When prudence warned her to remove betimes,
 And seek a better heaven and warmer climes,
 Her sons were summoned on a steeple's height,
 And, called in common council, vote a flight.
 The day was named, the next that should be fair;
 All to the general rendezvous repair; [in air.
 They try their fluttering wings, and trust themselves

Who but the swallow now triumphs alone?
 The canopy of heaven is all her own:
 Her youthful offspring to their haunts repair,
 And glide along in glades, and skim in air,
 And dip for insects in the purling springs,
 And stoop on rivers to refresh their wings.

(From The Hind and the Panther, Part iii.)

The Church's Testimony.

But, gracious God! how well dost Thou provide
 For erring judgments an unerring guide!
 Thy throne is darkness in the abyss of light,
 A blaze of glory that forbids the sight.
 O teach me to believe Thee thus concealed,
 And search no farther than Thy self revealed,
 But her alone for my director take
 Whom thou hast promised never to forsake!
 My thoughtless youth was winged with vain desires,
 My manhood, long misled by wandering fires,
 Followed false lights; and when their glimpse was gone,
 My pride struck out new sparkles of her own.
 Such was I, such by nature still I am;
 Be Thine the glory, and be mine the shame!

(From The Hind and the Panther, Part i.)

The four lines from the eighth present a noteworthy parallel to the keynote of Newman's 'Lead, kindly Light.'

The Cost of Conversion.

If joys hereafter must be purchased here
 With loss of all that mortals hold so dear,
 Then welcome infamy and public shame,
 And last, a long farewell to worldly fame.
 'Tis said with ease, but oh, how hardly tried
 By haughty souls to human honour tied!
 O sharp convulsive pangs of agonising pride!
 Down, then, thou rebel, never more to rise,
 And what thou didst, and dost so dearly prize,
 That fame, that darling fame, make that thy sacrifice.
 'Tis nothing thou hast given; then add thy tears
 For a long race of unrepenting years:
 'Tis nothing yet, yet all thou hast to give;
 Then add those may-be years thou hast to live:
 Yet nothing still; then poor and naked come;
 Thy Father will receive his unthrift home,
 And thy blest Saviour's blood discharge the mighty sum.

(From The Hind and the Panther, Part iii.)

Dreams.

Dreams are but interludes which Fancy makes;
 When monarch Reason sleeps, this mimic wakes
 Compounds a medley of disjointed things,
 A mob of cobblers, and a court of kings:

Light fumes are merry, grosser fumes are sad:
 Both are the reasonable soul run mad;
 And many monstrous forms in sleep we see,
 That neither were, nor are, nor e'er can be.
 Sometimes forgotten things long cast behind
 Rush forward in the brain, and come to mind.
 The nurse's legends are for truths received,
 And the man dreams but what the boy believed.
 Sometimes we but rehearse a former play,
 The night restores our actions done by day,
 As hounds in sleep will open for their prey.

(From The Cock and the Fox, modernised from Chaucer.)

To the Duchess of Ormond.

MADAM,

The bard who first adorned our native tongue
 Tuned to his British lyre this ancient song;
 Which Homer might without a blush rehearse,
 And leaves a doubtful palm in Virgil's verse:
 He matched their beauties, where they most excel;
 Of love sung better, and of arms as well.
 Vouchsafe, illustrious Ormond, to behold
 What power the charms of beauty had of old;
 Nor wonder if such deeds of arms were done,
 Inspired by two fair eyes that sparkled like your own.

If Chaucer by the best idea wrought,
 And poets can divine each other's thought,
 The fairest nymph before his eyes he set;
 And then the fairest was Plantagenet,
 Who three contending princes made her prize,
 And ruled the rival nations with her eyes;
 Who left immortal trophies of her fame,
 And to the noblest order gave the name.

Like her, of equal kindred to the throne,
 You keep her conquests, and extend your own:
 As when the stars, in their ethereal race,
 At length have rolled around the liquid space,
 At certain periods they resume their place,
 From the same point of heaven their course advance,
 And move in measures of their former dance;
 Thus, after length of ages, she returns,
 Restored in you, and the same place adorns:
 Or you perform her office in the sphere,
 Born of her blood, and make a new Platonic year.

O true Plantagenet, O race divine,
 (For beauty still is fatal to the line,)
 Had Chaucer lived that angel-face to view,
 Sure he had drawn his Emily from you;
 Or had you lived to judge the doubtful right,
 Your noble Palamon had been the knight;
 And conquering Theseus from his side had sent
 Your generous lord, to guide the Theban government.

Time shall accomplish that; and I shall see
 A Palamon in him, in you an Emily.

Already have the Fates your path prepared,
 And sure presage your future sway declared:
 When westward, like the sun, you took your way,
 And from benighted Britain bore the day,
 Blue Triton gave the signal from the shore,
 The ready Nereids heard, and swam before
 To smooth the seas; a soft Etesian gale
 But just inspired, and gently swelled the sail;
 Portunus took his turn, whose ample hand
 Heaved up the lightened keel, and sunk the sand,
 And steered the sacred vessel safe to land.
 The land, if not restrained, had met your way,
 Projected out a neck, and jutted to the sea.

Hibernia, prostrate at your feet, adored
In you the pledge of her expected lord,
Due to her isle; a venerable name;
His father and his grandsire known to fame;
Awed by that house, accustomed to command,
The sturdy kerns in due subjection stand,
Nor hear the reins in any foreign hand.

At your approach, they crowded to the port;
And scarcely landed, you create a court:
As Ormond's harbinger, to you they run,
For Venus is the promise of the Sun.

The waste of civil wars, their towns destroyed,
Pales unhonoured, Ceres unemployed,
Were all forgot; and one triumphant day
Wiped all the tears of three campaigns away.
Blood, rapines, massacres, were cheaply bought,
So mighty recompense your beauty brought.
As when the dove returning bore the mark
Of earth restored to the long-labouring ark,
The relics of mankind, secure of rest,
Oped every window to receive the guest,
And the fair bearer of the message blessed:
So, when you came, with loud repeated cries,
The nation took an omen from your eyes,
And God advanced his rainbow in the skies,
To sign inviolable peace restored;
The saints with solemn shouts proclaimed the new accord.

When at your second coming you appear,
(For I foretell that millenary year)
The sharpened share shall vex the soil no more,
But earth unbidden shall produce her store;
The land shall laugh, the circling ocean smile,
And Heaven's indulgence bless the holy isle.

Heaven from all ages has reserved for you
That happy clime, which venom never knew;
Or if it had been there, your eyes alone
Have power to chase all poison, but their own.

Now in this interval, which Fate has cast
Betwixt your future glories and your past,
This pause of power, 'tis Ireland's hour to mourn;
While England celebrates your safe return,
By which you seem the seasons to command,
And bring our summers back to their forsaken land.

The vanquished isle our leisure must attend,
Till the fair blessing we vouchsafe to send;
Nor can we spare you long, though often we may lend.
The dove was twice employed abroad, before
The world was dried, and she returned no more.

Nor dare we trust so soft a messenger,
New from her sickness, to that northern air;
Rest here awhile your lustre to restore,
That they may see you, as you shone before;
For yet, the eclipse not wholly past, you wade
Through some remains and dimness of a shade.

A subject in his prince may claim a right,
Nor suffer him with strength impaired to fight;
Till force returns, his ardour we restrain,
And curb his warlike wish to cross the main.

Now past the danger, let the learned begin
The inquiry, where disease could enter in;
How those malignant atoms forced their way,
What in the faultless frame they found to make their prey,

Where every element was weighed so well,
That Heaven alone, who mixed the mass, could tell

Which of the four ingredients could rebel;
And where, imprisoned in so sweet a cage,
A soul might well be pleased to pass an age.

And yet the fine materials made it weak;
Porcelain by being pure is apt to break.
Even to your breast the sickness durst aspire,
And forced from that fair temple to retire,
Profanely set the holy place on fire.
In vain your lord, like young Vespasian, mourned,
When the fierce flames the sanctuary burned;
And I prepared to pay in verses rude
A most detested act of gratitude:
Even this had been your Elegy, which now
Is offered for your health, the table of my vow.

Your angel sure our Morley's mind inspired,
To find the remedy your ill required;
As once the Macedon, by Jove's decree,
Was taught to dream an herb for Ptolemy:
Or Heaven, which had such over-cost bestowed
As scarce it could afford to flesh and blood,
So liked the frame, he would not work anew,
To save the charges of another you;
Or by his middle science did he steer,
And saw some great contingent good appear,
Well worth a miracle to keep you here,
And for that end preserved the precious mould,
Which all the future Ormonds was to hold;
And meditated, in his better mind,
An heir from you who may redeem the failing kind.

Blessed be the power which has at once restored
The hopes of lost succession to your lord;
Joy to the first and last of each degree,
Virtue to courts, and, what I longed to see,
To you the Graces, and the Muse to me.

O daughter of the Rose, whose cheeks unite
The differing titles of the Red and White;
Who heaven's alternate beauty well display,
The blush of morning and the milky way;
Whose face is Paradise, but fenced from sin;
For God in either eye has placed a cherubin.

All is your lord's alone; even absent, he Employs the care of chaste Penelope.
For him you waste in tears your widowed hours,
For him your curious needle paints the flowers;
Such works of old imperial dames were taught,
Such for Ascanius fair Elisa wrought.

The soft recesses of your hours improve
The three fair pledges of your happy love:
All other parts of pious duty done,
You owe your Ormond nothing but a son,
To fill in future times his father's place,
And wear the garter of his mother's race.

The Duchess to whom Dryden dedicated Palamon and Arcite, his version of Chaucer's 'Knight's Tale,' was the second wife of the second Duke of Ormond, son of the Earl of Ossory, who died before his father, the first Duke. The Duchess was daughter of the Duke of Beaufort. The traditional—and fabulous—story of the founding of the Order of the Garter confounds Joan, granddaughter of Edward I., who was betrothed (but not married) to the second Earl of Salisbury, with the (non-royal) Countess of the first Earl. For the Platonic year, see note above at Butler, page 741. Fatal, fated, destined. Portunus, guardian deity of harbours; Pales, of sheep-walks. The Duchess had just recovered from fever; Dr Morley was her doctor. Titus Vespasian wept at the destruction of the Temple of Jerusalem. Alexander the Great dreamt of a remedy for the poisoned wound of Ptolemy Soter. Cherubin and cherubim, both plural forms, are often used interchangeably with 'cherub.' Dido was also called Elissa or Elisa.

Theodore and Honoria.

Of all the cities in Romanian lands,
The chief and most renowned Ravenna stands,
Adorned in ancient times with arms and arts,
And rich inhabitants with generous hearts.
But Theodore the brave, above the rest,
With gifts of fortune and of nature blessed,
The foremost place for wealth and honour held,
And all in feats of chivalry excelled.

This noble youth to madness loved a dame
Of high degree ; Honoria was her name ;
Fair as the fairest, but of haughty mind,
And fiercer than became so soft a kind.
Proud of her birth (for equal she had none),
The rest she scorned, but hated him alone.
His gifts, his constant courtship, nothing gained ;
For she, the more he loved, the more disdained.
He lived with all the pomp he could devise,
At tilts and tournaments obtained the prize,
But found no favour in his lady's eyes :

• Relentless as a rock, the lofty maid
Turned all to poison that he did or said ;
Nor prayers, nor tears, nor offered vows, could move ;
The work went backward ; and the more he strove
T' advance his suit, the farther from her love.

Wearied at length, and wanting remedy,
He doubted oft, and oft resolved to die.
But pride stood ready to prevent the blow,
For who would die to gratify a foe ?
His generous mind disdained so mean a fate ;
That passed, his next endeavour was to hate.
But vainer that relief than all the rest ;
The less he hoped, with more desire possessed ;
Love stood the siege, and would not yield his breast.

Change was the next, but change deceived his care ;
He sought a fairer, but found none so fair.
He would have worn her out by slow degrees,
As men by fasting starve the untamed disease :
But present love required a present ease.
Looking, he feeds alone his famished eyes,
Feeds lingering death, but looking not, he dies.
Yet still he chose the longest way to fate,
Wasting at once his life and his estate.

His friends beheld, and pitied him in vain,
For what advice can ease a lover's pain ?
Absence, the best expedient they could find,
Might save the fortune, if not cure the mind :
This means they long proposed, but little gained,
Yet, after much pursuit, at length obtained.

Hard you may think it was to give consent,
But struggling with his own desires he went,
With large expense, and with a pompous train,
Provided as to visit France or Spain,
Or for some distant voyage o'er the main.
But Love had clipped his wings, and cut him short ;
Confined within the purlieus of the court,
Three miles he went, no farther could retreat ;
His travels ended at his country-seat :
To Chassi's pleasing plains he took his way,
There pitched his tents, and there resolved to stay.

The spring was in the prime ; the neighbouring grove
Supplied with birds, the choristers of love,
Music unbought, that ministered delight
To morning walks, and lulled his cares by night :
There he discharged his friends, but not the expense
Of frequent treats and proud magnificence.

He lived as kings retire, though more at large
From public business, yet with equal charge ;
With house and heart still open to receive ;
As well content as love would give him leave :
He would have lived more free ; but many a guest,
Who could forsake the friend, pursued the feast.

It happened one morning, as his fancy led,
Before his usual hour he left his bed,
To walk within a lonely lawn, that stood
On every side surrounded by the wood :
Alone he walked, to please his pensive mind,
And sought the deepest solitude to find ;
'Twas in a grove of spreading pines he strayed ;
The winds within the quivering branches played,
And dancing trees a mournful music made.
The place itself was suiting to his care,
Uncouth and savage, as the cruel fair.
He wandered on, unknowing where he went,
Lost in the wood, and all on love intent :
The day already half his race had run,
And summoned him to due repast at noon,
But love could feel no hunger but his own.

Whilst listening to the murmuring leaves he stood,
More than a mile immersed within the wood,
At once the wind was laid ; the whispering sound
Was dumb ; a rising earthquake rocked the ground :
With deeper brown the grove was overspread ;
A sudden horror seized his giddy head,
And his ears tingled, and his colour fled ;
Nature was in alarm ; some danger nigh
Seemed threatened, though unseen to mortal eye.
Unused to fear, he summoned all his soul,
And stood collected in himself—and whole ;
Not long : for soon a whirlwind rose around,
And from afar he heard a screaming sound,
As of a dame distressed, who cried for aid,
And filled with loud laments the secret shade.

A thicket close beside the grove there stood,
With briars and brambles choked, and dwarfish wood ;
From thence the noise, which now, approaching near,
With more distinguished notes invades his ear ;
He raised his head, and saw a beauteous maid,
With hair dishevelled, issuing through the shade ;
Stripped of her clothes, and even those parts revealed
Which modest nature keeps from sight concealed.
Her face, her hands, her naked limbs were torn,
With passing through the brakes and prickly thorn ;
Two mastiffs gaunt and grim her flight pursued,
And oft their fastened fangs in blood imbrued :
Oft they came up, and pinched her tender side ;
'Mercy, O mercy, Heaven !' she ran, and cried ;
When Heaven was named, they loosed their hold again,

Then sprung she forth, they followed her amain.

Not far behind, a knight of swarthy face,
High on a coal-black steed pursued the chase ;
With flashing flames his ardent eyes were filled,
And in his hands a naked sword he held :
He cheered the dogs to follow her who fled,
And vowed revenge on her devoted head.

As Theodore was born of noble kind,
The brutal action roused his manly mind ;
Moved with unworthy usage of the maid,
He, though unarmed, resolved to give her aid.
A saplin pine he wrenched from out the ground,
The readiest weapon that his fury found.

Thus furnished for offence, he crossed the way
Betwixt the graceless villain and his prey.

The knight came thundering on, but, from afar,
Thus in imperious tone forbade the war :
'Cease, Theodore, to proffer vain relief,
Nor stop the vengeance of so just a grief ;
But give me leave to seize my destined prey,
And let eternal justice take the way :
I but revenge my fate, disdained, betrayed,
And suffering death for this ungrateful maid.'

He said, at once dismounting from the steed ;
For now the hell-hounds with superior speed
Had reached the dame, and, fastening on her side,
The ground with issuing streams of purple dyed ;
Stood Theodore surprised in deadly fright,
With chattering teeth, and bristling hair upright ;
Yet armed with inborn worth : 'Whate'er,' said he,
'Thou art, who know'st me better than I thee ;
Or prove thy rightful cause, or be defied ;'
The spectre, fiercely staring, thus replied :

'Know, Theodore, thy ancestry I claim,
And Guido Cavalcanti was my name.
One common sire our fathers did beget ;
My name and story some remember yet :
Thee, then a boy, within my arms I laid,
When for my sins I loved this haughty maid ;
Not less adored in life, nor served by me,
Than proud Honoria now is loved by thee.
What did I not her stubborn heart to gain ?
But all my vows were answered with disdain :
She scorned my sorrows, and despised my pain.
Long time I dragged my days in fruitless care ;
Then, loathing life, and plunged in deep despair,
To finish my unhappy life, I fell
On this sharp sword, and now am damned in hell.

'Short was her joy ; for soon the insulting maid
By Heaven's decree in the cold grave was laid.
And as in unrepenting sin she died, [pride ;
Doomed to the same bad place is punished for her
Because she deemed I well deserved to die,
And made a merit of her cruelty.
There, then, we met ; both tried, and both were cast,
And this irrevocable sentence passed :
That she, whom I so long pursued in vain,
Should suffer from my hands a lingering pain :
Renewed to life, that she might daily die,
I daily doomed to follow, she to fly ;
No more a lover, but a mortal foe,
I seek her life (for love is none below) :
As often as my dogs with better speed
Arrest her flight, is she to death decreed :
Then with this fatal sword, on which I died,
I pierce her opened back or tender side,
And tear that hardened heart from out her breast,
Which, with her entrails, makes my hungry hounds a
Nor lies she long, but, as her fates ordain, [feast.
Springs up to life, and fresh to second pain,
Is saved to-day, to-morrow to be slain.'

This, versed in death, the infernal knight relates,
And then for proof fulfilled their common fates ;
Her heart and bowels through her back he drew
And fed the hounds that helped him to pursue ;
Stern looked the fiend, as frustrate of his will,
Not half sufficed, and greedy yet to kill.
And now the soul, expiring through the wound,
Had left the body breathless on the ground,

When thus the grisly spectre spoke again :
'Behold the fruit of ill-rewarded pain :

As many months as I sustained her hate,
So many years is she condemned by Fate
To daily death ; and every several place,
Conscious of her disdain and my disgrace,
Must witness her just punishment, and be
A scene of triumph and revenge to me !
As in this grove I took my last farewell,
As on this very spot of earth I fell,
As Friday saw me die, so she my prey
Becomes even here, on this revolving day.'

Thus, while he spoke, the virgin from the ground
Upstart fresh, already closed the wound,
And unconcerned for all she felt before,
Precipitates her flight along the shore :
The hell-hounds, as ungorged with flesh and blood,
Pursue their prey, and seek their wonted food :
The fiend remounts his courser, mends his pace,
And all the vision vanished from the place.

Long stood the noble youth oppressed with awe,
And stupid at the wondrous things he saw,
Surpassing common faith, transgressing Nature's law.
He would have been asleep, and wished to wake,
But dreams, he knew, no long impression make,
Though strong at first ; if vision, to what end,
But such as must his future state portend,
His love the damsel, and himself the fiend ?
But yet, reflecting that it could not be
From Heaven, which cannot impious acts decree,
Resolved within himself to shun the snare
Which hell for his destruction did prepare ;
And, as his better genius should direct,
From an ill cause to draw a good effect.

Inspired from Heaven, he homeward took his way,
Nor palled his new design with long delay :
But of his train a trusty servant sent
To call his friends together at his tent.
They came, and, usual salutations paid,
With words premeditated thus he said :
'What you have often counselled, to remove
My vain pursuit of unregarded love,
By thrift my sinking fortune to repair,
Though late, yet is at last become my care :
My heart shall be my own ; my vast expense
Reduced to bounds by timely providence ;
This only I require ; invite for me
Honoria, with her father's family,
Her friends and mine ; the cause I shall display
On Friday next, for that 's the appointed day.'

Well pleased were all his friends, the task was light ;

The father, mother, daughter, they invite ;
Hardly the dame was drawn to this repast ;
But yet resolved, because it was the last.
The day was come, the guests invited came,
And with the rest the inexorable dame :
A feast prepared with riotous expense,
Much cost, more care, and most magnificence.
The place ordained was in that haunted grove
Where the revenging ghost pursued his love :
The tables in a proud pavilion spread,
With flowers below, and tissue overhead :
The rest in rank, Honoria chief in place,
Was artfully contrived to set her face
To front the thicket, and behold the chase.

The feast was served, the time so well forecast,
That just when the dessert and fruits were placed,
The fiend's alarm began ; the hollow sound
Sung in the leaves, the forest shook around,
Air blackened, rolled the thunder, groaned the ground.

Nor long before the loud laments arise
Of one distressed, and mastiffs' mingled cries ;
And first the dame came rushing through the wood,
And next the famished hounds that sought their food,
And griped her flanks, and oft essayed their jaws in
Last came the felon on his sable steed, [blood.
Armed with his naked sword, and urged his dogs to
She ran, and cried, her flight directly bent— [speed.
A guest unbidden—to the fatal tent,
The scene of death, and place ordained for punish-
Loud was the noise, aghast was every guest. [ment.
The women shrieked, the men forsook the feast ;
The hounds at nearer distance hoarsely bayed ;
The hunter close pursued the visionary maid ;
She rent the heaven with loud laments, imploring aid.

The gallants, to protect the lady's right,
Their fauchions brandished at the grisly sight ;
High on his stirrups he provoked the fight.
Then on the crowd he cast a furious look,
And withered all their strength before he strook :
'Back, on your lives ! let be,' said he, 'my prey,
And let my vengeance take the destined way :
Vain are your arms, and vainer your defence,
Against the eternal doom of Providence :
Mine is the ungrateful maid by Heaven designed :
Mercy she would not give, nor mercy shall she find.'
At this the former tale again he told
With thundering tone, and dreadful to behold :
Sunk were their hearts with horror of the crime,
Nor needed to be warned a second time,
But bore each other back : some knew the face,
And all had heard the much-lamented case
Of him who fell for love, and this the fatal place.

And now the infernal minister advanced,
Seized the due victim, and with fury lanced
Her back, and, piercing through her inmost heart,
Drew backward, as before, the offending part.
The reeking entrails next he tore away,
And to his meagre mastiffs made a prey.
The pale assistants on each other stared,
With gaping mouths for issuing words prepared ;
The still-born sounds upon the palate hung,
And died imperfect on the faltering tongue.
The fright was general ; but the female band,
A helpless train, in more confusion stand :
With horror shuddering, on a heap they run,
Sick at the sight of hateful justice done ;
For conscience rung the alarm, and made the case their

So, spread upon a lake with upward eye, [own.
A plump of fowl behold their foe on high ;
They close their trembling troop ; and all attend
On whom the sowing eagle will descend.

But most the proud Honoria feared the event,
And thought to her alone the vision sent.
Her guilt presents to her distracted mind
Heaven's justice, Theodore's revengeful kind,
And the same fate to the same sin assigned ;
Already sees herself the monster's prey,
And feels her heart and entrails torn away.
'Twas a mute scene of sorrow, mixed with fear ;
Still on the table lay the unfinished cheer :

The knight and hungry mastiffs stood around ;
The mangled dame lay breathless on the ground :
When on a sudden, re-inspired with breath,
Again she rose, again to suffer death ;
Nor stayed the hell-hounds, nor the hunter stayed,
But followed, as before, the flying maid :
The avenger took from earth the avenging sword,
And mounting light as air, his sable steed he spurred :
The clouds dispelled, the sky resumed her light,
And Nature stood recovered of her fright.

But fear, the last of ills, remained behind,
And horror heavy sat on every mind.
Nor Theodore encouraged more his feast,
But sternly looked, as hatching in his breast
Some deep designs ; which, when Honoria viewed,
The fresh impulse her former fright renewed ;
She thought herself the trembling dame who fled,
And him the grisly ghost that spurred the infernal
steed :

The more dismayed, for when the guests withdrew,
Their courteous host, saluting all the crew,
Regardless passed her o'er ; nor graced with kind
That sting infix'd within her haughty mind [adieu ;
The downfall of her empire she divined,
And her proud heart with secret sorrow pined.
Home as they went, the sad discourse renewed,
Of the relentless dame to death pursued,
And of the sight obscene so lately viewed.
None durst arraign the righteous doom she bore ;
Even they who pitied most, yet blamed her more ;
The parallel they needed not to name,
But in the dead they damned the living dame.

At every little noise she looked behind,
For still the knight was present to her mind :
And anxious oft she started on the way,
And thought the horseman-ghost came thundering for Returned, she took her bed with little rest, [his prey.
But in short slumbers dreamt the funeral feast :
Awaked, she turned her side, and slept again ;
The same black vapours mounted in her brain,
And the same dreams returned with double pain.

Now forced to wake, because afraid to sleep,
Her blood all fevered, with a furious leap
She sprung from bed, distracted in her mind,
And feared at every step a twitching sprite behind.
Darkling and desperate, with a staggering pace,
Of death afraid, and conscious of disgrace ;
Fear, pride, remorse, at once her heart assailed ;
Pride put remorse to flight, but fear prevailed.
Friday, the fatal day, when next it came,
Her soul forethought the fiend would change his game,
And her pursue, or Theodore be slain,
And two ghosts join their packs to hunt her o'er the

This dreadful image so possessed her mind, [plain.
That, desperate any succour else to find,
She ceased all farther hope ; and now began
To make reflection on the unhappy man,
Rich, brave, and young, who past expression loved ;
Proof to disdain, and not to be removed :
Of all the men respected and admired ;
Of all the dames, except herself, desired :
Why not of her ? preferred above the rest
By him with knightly deeds, and open love professed ?
So had another been, where he his vows addressed.
This quelled her pride, yet other doubts remained,
That once disdaining, she might be disdained.

The fear was just, but greater fear prevailed ;
 Fear of her life by hellish hounds assailed :
 He took a lowering leave ; but who can tell
 What outward hate might inward love conceal ?
 Her sex's arts she knew ; and why not then
 Might deep dissembling have a place in men ?
 Here hope began to dawn ; resolved to try,
 She fixed on this her utmost remedy :
 Death was behind, but hard it was to die.
 'Twas time enough at last on death to call,
 The precipice in sight, a shrub was all
 That kindly stood betwixt to break the fatal fall.

One maid she had, beloved above the rest ;
 Secure of her, the secret she confessed ;
 And now the cheerful light her fears dispelled ;
 She with no winding turns the truth concealed,
 But put the woman off, and stood revealed :
 With faults confessed, commissioned her to go,
 If pity yet had place, and reconcile her foe ;
 The welcome message made, was soon received ;
 'Twas what he wished, and hoped, but scarce believed ;
 Fate seemed a fair occasion to present ;
 He knew the sex, and feared she might repent,
 Should he delay the moment of consent.
 There yet remained to gain her friends (a care
 The modesty of maidens well might spare) ;
 But she with such a zeal the cause embraced
 (As women, where they will, are all in haste),
 The father, mother, and the kin beside,
 Were overborne by fury of the tide ;
 With full consent of all, she changed her state ;
 Resistless in her love, as in her hate.

By her example warned, the rest beware ;
 More easy, less imperious, were the fair ;
 And that one hunting, which the devil designed
 For one fair female, lost him half the kind.

(From Boccaccio.)

Enjoy the Present Hour.

Enjoy the present smiling hour,
 And put it out of Fortune's power :
 The tide of business, like the running stream,
 Is sometimes high and sometimes low,
 A quiet ebb or a tempestuous flow,
 And always in extreme.
 Now with a noiseless gentle course
 It keeps within the middle bed ;
 Anon it lifts aloft the head,
 And bears down all before it with impetuous force ;
 And trunks of trees come rolling down ;
 Sheep and their folds together drown :
 Both house and homestead into seas are borne ;
 And rocks are from their old foundations torn ;
 And woods, made thin with winds, their scattered honours mourn.

Happy the man, and happy he alone
 He who can call to-day his own :
 He who, secure within, can say,
 To-morrow, do thy worst, for I have lived to-day.
 Be fair or foul, or rain or shine,
 The joys I have possessed in spite of fate are mine.
 Not heaven itself upon the past has power ;
 But what has been, has been, and I have had my hour !

Fortune, that with malicious joy
 Does man, her slave, oppress,

Proud of her office to destroy,
 Is seldom pleased to bless :
 Still various and inconstant still,
 But with an inclination to be ill,
 Promotes, degrades, delights in strife,
 And makes a lottery of life.
 I can enjoy her while she's kind ;
 But when she dances in the wind,
 And shakes her wings, and will not stay,
 I puff the prostitute away :
 The little or the much she gave is quietly resigned :
 Content with poverty, my soul I arm ;
 And virtue, though in rags, will keep me warm.

What is't to me,
 Who never sail in her unfaithful sea,
 If storms arise, and clouds grow black ;
 If the mast split, and threaten wreck ?
 Then let the greedy merchant fear
 For his ill-gotten gain ;
 And pray to gods that will not hear,
 While the debating winds and billows bear
 His wealth into the main.
 For me, secure from Fortune's blows,
 Secure of what I cannot lose,
 In my small pinnace I can sail,
 Contemning all the blustering roar ;
 And running with a merry gale,
 With friendly stars my safety seek,
 Within some little winding creek,
 And see the storm ashore.

(From Horace, Odes, iii. 29.)

From Song in 'The Conquest of Granada.'

Beneath a myrtle's shade,
 Which love for none but happy lovers made,
 I slept, and straight my love before me brought
 Phyllis, the object of my waking thought.
 Undressed she came my flame to meet,
 While love strewed flowers beneath her feet,
 Flowers which, so pressed by her, became more sweet.

From the bright vision's head
 A careless veil of lawn was loosely shed,
 From her white temples fell her shaded hair,
 Like cloudy sunshine, not too brown nor fair.
 Her hands, her lips, did love inspire,
 Her every grace my heart did fire,
 But most her eyes, which languished with desire.

Song from 'Cleomenes.'

No, no, poor suffering heart, no change endeavour,
 Choose to sustain the smart, rather than leave her ;
 My ravished eyes behold such charms about her,
 I can die with her, but not live without her ;
 One tender sigh of hers to see me languish,
 Will more than pay the price of my past anguish :
 Beware, O cruel fair, how you smile on me,
 'Twas a kind look of yours, that has undone me.

Love has in store for me one happy minute,
 And she will end my pain, who did begin it ;
 Then no day void of bliss, of pleasure, leaving,
 Ages shall slide away without perceiving :
 Cupid shall guard the door, the more to please us,
 And keep out time and death, when they would seize us ;
 Time and death shall depart, and say in flying
 Love has found out a way to live by dying.

II. From Dryden's Dramas.—Prefixed to the two specimen scenes given here from Dryden's dramas are a few shorter passages of exceptional poetic interest.

Freedom.

No man has more contempt than I of breath ;
But whence hast thou the right to give me death ?
Obeyed as sovereign by thy subjects be,
But know that I alone am king of me.
I am as free as Nature first made man,
Ere the base laws of servitude began,
When wild in woods the noble savage ran.

(From The Conquest of Granada, Part i.)

Timidity.

As some fair tulip, by a storm oppress,
Shrinks up, and folds its silken arms to rest ;
And bending to the blast, all pale and dead,
Hears from within the wind sing round its head :
So shrouded up your beauty disappears ;
Unveil, my love, and lay aside your fears :
The storm that caused your fright is past and done.

(From the same, Part i.)

Forgiveness.

A blush remains in a forgiven face,
It wears the silent tokens of disgrace.
Forgiveness to the injured does belong,
But they ne'er pardon who have done the wrong.

(From Part ii.)

Love.

Love is that madness which all lovers have ;
But yet 'tis sweet and pleasing so to rave.
'Tis an enchantment, where the reason's bound ;
But Paradise is in the enchanted ground.
A palace void of envy, cares, and strife ;
Where gentle hours delude so much of life.
To take those charms away, and set me free,
Is but to send me into misery.
And prudence, of whose care so much you boast,
Restores those pains which that sweet folly lost.

(From the same, Part ii.)

That friendship which from withered love doth shoot,
Like the faint herbage on a rock, wants root ;
Love is a tender amity, refined :
Grafted on friendship, it exalts the mind ;
But when the graft no longer does remain,
The dull stock lives, but never bears again.

(From Part ii.)

So Venus moves when to the Thunderer
In smiles or tears she would some suit prefer.
When with her cestus girt
And drawn by doves, she cuts the liquid skies,
To every eye a goddess is confest ;
By all the heavenly nations she is blest,
And each with secret joy admits her to his breast.

(From Part ii.)

Fair though you are

As summer mornings, and your eyes more bright
Than stars that twinkle on a winter's night ;
Though you have eloquence to warm and move
Cold age and fasting hermits into love ;
Though Almahide with scorn rewards my care,
Yet than to change 'tis nobler to despair.

My love's my soul, and that from fate is free,
'Tis that unchanged and deathless part of me.

(From Part ii.)

Love various minds does variously aspire :
He stirs in gentle natures gentle fire,
Like that of incense on the altars laid ;
But raging flames tempestuous souls invade—
A fire which every windy passion blows,
With pride it mounts, and with revenge it glows.

(From Tyrannic Love)

A change so swift what heart did ever feel !
It rushed upon me like a mighty stream,
And bore me in a moment far from shore.
I've loved away myself ; in one short hour
Already am I gone an age of passion.
Was it his youth, his valour, or success ?
These might perhaps be found in other men.
'Twas that respect, that awful homage paid me ;
That fearful love which trembled in his eyes,
And with a silent earthquake shook his soul.
But when he spoke, what tender words he said !
So softly that, like flakes of feathered snow,
They melted as they fell.

(From The Spanish Friar.)

Midnight.

All things are hushed, as Nature's self lay dead ;
The mountains seem to nod their drowsy head,
The little birds in dreams their songs repeat,
And sleeping flowers beneath the night-dew sweat ;
Even lust and envy sleep, yet love denies
Rest to my soul and slumber to my eyes.

It was these famous lines on midnight that Wordsworth pronounced to be 'vague, bombastic, and senseless.'

Tears.

What precious drops are those
Which silently each other's track pursue,
Bright as young diamonds in their infant dew !

(From The Conquest of Granada, Part ii.)

Mankind.

Men are but children of a larger growth ;
Our appetite's as apt to change as theirs,
And full as craving too, and full as vain ;
And yet the soul shut up in her dark room,
Viewing so clear abroad, at home sees nothing ;
But, like a mole in earth, busy and blind,
Works all her folly up, and casts it outward
To the world's open view.

(From All for Love.)

Man is but man ; unconstant still, and various ;
There's no to-morrow in him like to-day.
Perhaps the atoms rolling in his brain
Make him think honestly this present hour ;
The next, a swarm of base ungrateful thoughts
May mount aloft ; and where's our Egypt then ?
Who would trust chance ? since all men have the seeds
Of good and ill, which should work upward first.

(From Cleomenes.)

Life.

When I consider life, 'tis all a cheat ;
Yet, fooled with hope, men favour the deceit,
Trust on, and think to-morrow will repay.
To-morrow's falser than the former day ;

Lies worse ; and while it says we shall be blest
 With some new joys, cuts off what we possessed.
 Strange cozenage ! None would live past years again,
 Yet all hope pleasure in what yet remain ;
 And from the dregs of life think to receive
 What the first sprightly running could not give.
 I'm tired with waiting for this chymic gold,
 Which fools us young, and beggars us when old.
 —'Tis not for nothing that we life pursue ;
 It pays our hopes with something still that's new :
 Each day's a mistress unenjoyed before ;
 Like travellers, we're pleased with seeing more.
 Did you but know what joys your way attend,
 You would not hurry to your journey's end.

(From Aurengzebe.)

Fear of Death.

Berenice. Now death draws near, a strange perplexity
 Creeps coldly on me, like a fear to die :
 Courage uncertain dangers may abate,
 But who can bear the approach of certain fate ?

St Catherine. The wisest and the best some fear may show,

And wish to stay, though they resolve to go.

Ber. As some faint pilgrim, standing on the shore,
 First views the torrent he would venture o'er,
 And then his inn upon the farther ground,
 Loath to wade through, and loather to go round :
 Then dipping in his staff, does trial make
 How deep it is, and sighing pulls it back :
 Sometimes resolved to fetch his leap ; and then
 Runs to the bank, but there stops short again.

So I at once

Both heavenly faith and human fear obey ;

And feel before me in an unknown way.

For this blest voyage I with joy prepare,

Yet am ashamed to be a stranger there.

(From Tyrannic Love.)

Scene from 'All for Love.'

[This was the only play Dryden wrote for himself, he said ; all the rest were given to the people ; the scene quoted he thought the best he had written in that kind. The play, avowedly in imitation of Shakespeare, is founded on the story of Antony and Cleopatra ; the dialogue quoted, like that from Don Sebastian, given below, is obviously founded on the quarrel of Brutus and Cassius in Julius Caesar. Ventidius was Antony's general.]

Antony. They tell me 'tis my birthday, and I'll keep it
 With double pomp of sadness.

'Tis what the day deserves which gave me breath.

Why was I raised the meteor of the world,

Hung in the skies, and blazing as I travelled,

Till all my fires were spent, and then cast downward

To be trod out by Cæsar ?

Ventidius. [Aside.] On my soul

'Tis mournful, wondrous mournful !

Ant. Count thy gains,

Now, Antony : wouldst thou be born for this ?

Glutton of fortune, thy devouring youth

Has starved thy wanting age.

Vent. [Aside.] How sorrow shakes him !

So now the tempest tears him by the roots,

And on the ground extends the noble ruin.

[Antony throws himself down.]

Ant. Lie there, thou shadow of an emperor ;

The place thou pressest on thy mother-earth

Is all thy empire now : now it contains thee ;

Some few days hence, and then 'twill be too large,
 When thou'rt contracted in thy narrow urn,
 Shrunk to a few cold ashes ; then Octavia
 (For Cleopatra will not live to see it),
 Octavia then will have thee all her own,
 And bear thee in her widowed hand to Cæsar.
 Cæsar will weep, the crocodile will weep,
 To see his rival of the universe
 Lie still and peaceful there. I'll think no more on't.
 Give me some music ; look that it be sad ;
 I'll soothe my melancholy till I swell,
 And burst myself with sighing.
 'Tis somewhat to my humour. Stay, I fancy
 I'm now turned wild, a commoner of nature ;
 Of all forsaken, and forsaking all ;
 Live in a shady forest's silvan scene ;
 Stretched at my length beneath some blasted oak,
 I lean my head upon the mossy bark,
 And look just of a piece, as I grew from it ;
 My uncombed locks, matted like mistletoe,
 Hang o'er my hoary face ; a murmuring brook
 Runs at my foot——

Vent. Methinks I fancy

Myself there too.

Ant. The herd come jumping by me,

And fearless quench their thirst, while I look on,

And take me for their fellow-citizen.

More of this image ; more ; it lulls my thoughts.

Vent. I must disturb him. I can hold no longer.

[Stands before him.]

Ant. [Starting up.] Art thou Ventidius ?

Vent. Are you Antony ?

I'm liker what I was, than you to him

I left you last.

Ant. I'm angry.

Vent. So am I.

Ant. I would be private. Leave me.

Vent. Sir, I love you,

And therefore will not leave you.

Ant. Will not leave me !

Where have you learned that answer ? Who am I !

Vent. My emperor ; the man I love next heaven.

If I said more, I think 'twere scarce a sin :

You are all that's good and godlike.

Ant. All that's wretched.

You will not leave me, then ?

Vent. 'Twas too presuming

To say I would not : but I dare not leave you ;

And 'tis unkind in you to chide me hence

So soon, when I so far have come to see you.

Ant. Now thou hast seen me, art thou satisfied ?

For, if a friend, thou hast beheld enough,

And, if a foe, too much.

Vent. Look, emperor ; this is no common dew ;

I have not wept this forty years ; but now

My mother comes afresh into my eyes ;

I cannot help her softness.

Ant. By heaven, he weeps ; poor good old man, he weeps !

The big round drops course one another down

The furrows of his cheeks. Stop 'em, Ventidius,

Or I shall blush to death ; they set my shame,

That caused 'em, full before me.

Vent. I'll do my best.

Ant. Sure there's contagion in the tears of friends ;

See, I have caught it too. Believe me, 'tis not

For my own griefs, but thine—— Nay, father.

Vent. Emperor! Emperor!

Ant. Emperor! Why, that's the style of victory.
The conquering soldier, red with unfelt wounds,
Salutes his general so: but never more
Shall that sound reach my ears.

Vent. I warrant you.

Ant. Actium, Actium! Oh——

Vent. It sits too near you.

Ant. Here, here it lies; a lump of lead by day;
And in my short, distracted nightly slumbers,
The hag that rides my dreams——

Vent. Out with it; give it vent.

Ant. Urge not my shame—
I lost a battle.

Vent. So has Julius done. [think'st;

Ant. Thou favour'st me, and speak'st not half thou
For Julius fought it out, and lost it fairly;
But Antony——

Vent. Nay, stop not.

Ant. Antony——

Well, thou wilt have it—like a coward, fled,
Fled while his soldiers fought; fled first, Ventidius.
Thou long'st to curse me, and I give thee leave.
I know thou can'st prepared to rail.

Vent. I did.

Ant. I'll help thee—I have been a man, Ventidius.

Vent. Yes, and a brave one; but——

Ant. I know thy meaning.

But I have lost my reason, have disgraced
The name of soldier with inglorious ease;
In the full vintage of my flowing honours
Sat still, and saw it pressed by other hands.
Fortune came smiling to my youth, and wooed it.
And purple greatness met my ripened years.
When first I came to empire, I was borne
On tides of people, crowding to my triumphs.
The wish of nations, and the willing world,
Received me as its pledge of future peace.
I was so great, so happy, so beloved,
Fate could not ruin me; till I took pains,
And worked against my fortune, chid her from me,
And turned her loose: yet still she came again.
My careless days and my luxurious nights
At length have wearied her, and now she's gone:
Gone, gone, divorced for ever. Help me, soldier,
To curse this madman, this industrious fool,
Who laboured to be wretched. Prythee, curse me.

Vent. No.

Ant. Why?

Vent. You are too sensible already
Of what you have done; too conscious of your failings.
And like a scorpion, whipt by others first
To fury, sting yourself in mad revenge.
I would bring balm, and pour it in your wounds,
Cure your distempered mind, and heal your fortunes.

Ant. I know thou wouldst.

Vent. I will.

Ant. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Vent. You laugh.

Ant. I do, to see officious love
Give cordials to the dead.

Vent. You would be lost, then?

Ant. I am.

Vent. I say you are not. Try your fortune.

Ant. I have to the utmost. Dost thou think me desperate

Without just cause? No; when I found all lost
Beyond repair, I hid me from the world,
And learned to scorn it here; which now I do
So heartily, I think it is not worth
The cost of keeping.

Vent. Caesar thinks not so:

He'll thank you for the gift he could not take.
You would be killed like Tully, would you? Do
Hold out your throat to Caesar, and die tamely.

Ant. No, I can kill myself, and so resolve.

Vent. I can die with you, too, when time shall serve;
But fortune calls upon us now to live,
To fight, to conquer.

Ant. Sure thou dream'st, Ventidius!

Vent. No; 'tis you dream; you sleep away your hours

In desperate sloth, miscalled philosophy.
Up, up, for honour's sake; twelve legions wait you,
And long to call you chief. By painful journeys
I led 'em patient both of heat and hunger,
Down from the Parthian marches to the Nile.
'Twill do you good to see their sunburnt faces,
Their scarred cheeks, and chopt hands; there's virtue in 'em:
They'll sell those mangled limbs at dearer rates
Than yon trim bands can buy.

Ant. Where left you them?

Vent. I said in Lower Syria.

Ant. Bring 'em hither;

There may be life in these.

Vent. They will not come.

Ant. Why didst thou mock my hopes with promised aids,
To double my despair? They're mutinous.

Vent. Most firm and loyal.

Ant. Yet they will not march

To succour me. Oh, trisler!

Vent. They petition

You would make haste to head 'em.

Ant. I'm besieged.

Vent. There's but one way shut up. How came I hither?

Ant. I will not stir.

Vent. They would perhaps desire

A better reason.

Ant. I have never used

My soldiers to demand a reason of My actions. Why did they refuse to march?

Vent. They said they would not fight for Cleopatra.

Ant. What was't they said?

Vent. They said they would not fight for Cleopatra.

Why should they fight, indeed, to make her conquer,
And make you more a slave? To gain her kingdoms
Which, for a kiss, at your next midnight feast
You'll sell to her? Then she new-names her jewels,
And calls this diamond such or such a tax;
Each pendant in her ear shall be a province.

Ant. Ventidius, I allow your tongue free licence
On all my other faults; but, on your life,
No word of Cleopatra; she deserves
More worlds than I can lose.

Vent. Behold, you powers,

To whom you have intrusted humankind;
See Europe, Afric, Asia put in balance,
And all weighed down by one light worthless woman!
I think the gods are Antonies, and give,
Like prodigals, this nether world away
To none but wasteful hands.

Ant. You grow presumptuous.

Vent. I take the privilege of plain love to speak.

Ant. Plain love! plain arrogance! plain insolence!
Thy men are cowards, thou an envious traitor;
Who, under seeming honesty, hast vented
The burden of thy rank o'erflowing gall.
Oh, that thou wert my equal; great in arms
As the first Cæsar was, that I might kill thee
Without stain to my honour!

Vent. You may kill me.
You have done more already, called me traitor.

Ant. Art thou not one?

Vent. For shewing you yourself,
Which none else durst have done. But had I been
That name which I disdain to speak again,
I needed not have sought your abject fortunes,
Come to partake your fate, to die with you.
What hindered me to have led my conquering eagles
To fill Octavius' bands? I could have been
A traitor then, a glorious happy traitor,
And not have been so called.

Ant. Forgive me, soldier;
I've been too passionate.

Vent. You thought me false;
Thought my old age betrayed you. Kill me, sir;
Pray kill me; yet you need not; your unkindness
Has left your sword no work.

Ant. I did not think so;
I said it in my rage; prythee, forgive me.
Why didst thou tempt my anger, by discovery
Of what I would not hear?

Vent. No prince but you
Could merit that sincerity I used;
Nor durst another man have ventured it;
But you, ere love misled your wandering eyes,
Were sure the chief and best of human race,
Framed in the very pride and boast of nature,
So perfect that the gods who formed you wondered
At their own skill and cried, A lucky hit
Has mended our design. Their envy hindered,
Else you had been immortal and a pattern,
When Heaven would work for ostentation sake,
To copy out again.

Ant. But Cleopatra—
Go on; for I can bear it now.

Vent. No more.

Ant. Thou dar'st not trust my passion; but thou mayst;
Thou only lov'st, the rest have flattered me.

Vent. Heaven's blessing on your heart for that kind word.
May I believe you love me? Speak again.

Ant. Indeed I do. Speak this, and this, and this.

[Hugging him.]

Thy praises were unjust; but I'll deserve 'em,
And yet mend all. Do with me what thou wilt;
Lead me to victory; thou know'st the way.

Vent. And will you leave this—

Ant. Prythee, do not curse her,
And I will leave her; though, Heaven knows, I love
Beyond life, conquest, empire, all but honour:
But I will leave her.

Vent. That's my royal master.
And shall we fight?

Ant. I warrant thee, old soldier;
Thou shalt behold me once again in iron,
And, at the head of our old troops, that beat
The Parthians, cry aloud, Come, follow me.

Vent. Oh, now I hear my emperor! In that word

Octavius fell. Gods, let me see that day,
And, if I have ten years behind, take all;
I'll thank you for the exchange.

Ant. Oh, Cleopatra!

Vent. Again?

Ant. I've done. In that last sigh she went;
Cæsar shall know what 'tis to force a lover
From all he holds most dear.

Vent. Methinks you breathe
Another soul; your looks are more divine;
You speak a hero, and you move a god.

Ant. Oh, thou hast fired me; my soul's up in arms,
And mans each part about me. Once again
That noble eagerness of fight has seized me;
That eagerness with which I darted upward
To Cassius' camp. In vain the steepy hill
Opposed my way; in vain a war of spears
Sung round my head, and planted all my shield;
I won the trenches, while my foremost men
Lagged on the plain below.

Vent. Ye gods, ye gods,
For such another honour!

Ant. Come on, my soldier!
Our hearts and arms are still the same. I long
Once more to meet our foes; that thou and I,
Like Time and Death, marching before our troops,
May taste fate to 'em, mow 'em out a passage,
And, entering where the foremost squadrons yield,
Begin the noble harvest of the field.

(From Act I.)

Scene from 'Don Sebastian.'

[Don Sebastian of Portugal, defeated and taken prisoner by the Moors, is saved from death by Dorax, a noble Portuguese, then a renegade in the court of the Emperor of Barbary, but formerly Don Alonzo of Alcazar. Attendants being dismissed, Dorax takes off his turban, and assumes his Portuguese dress and manner.]

Dorax. Now do you know me?

Sebastian. Thou shouldst be Alonzo.

Dor. So you should be Sebastian;
But when Sebastian ceased to be himself,
I ceased to be Alonzo.

Seb. As in a dream
I see thee here, and scarce believe mine eyes.

Dor. Is it so strange to find me where my wrongs
And your inhuman tyranny have sent me?
Think not you dream: or, if you did, my injuries
Shall call so loud, that lethargy should wake,
And death should give you back to answer me.
A thousand nights have brushed their balmy wings
Over these eyes; but ever when they closed,
Your tyrant image forced them ope again,
And dried the dews they brought.
The long-expected hour is come at length,
By manly vengeance to redeem my fame:
And that once cleared, eternal sleep is welcome.

Seb. I have not yet forgot I am a king,
Whose royal office is redress of wrongs:
If I have wronged thee, charge me face to face;
I have not yet forgot I am a soldier.

Dor. 'Tis the first justice thou hast ever done me;
Then though I loathe this woman's war of tongues,
Yet shall my cause of vengeance first be clear;
And, Honour, be thou judge.

Seb. Honour befriend us both.
Beware, I warn thee yet, to tell thy griefs
In terms becoming majesty to hear:

I warn thee thus, because I know thy temper
Is insolent and haughty to superiors :
How often hast thou braved my peaceful court,
Filled it with noisy brawls and windy boasts ;
And with past service, nauseously repeated,
Reproached even me thy prince ?

Dor. And well I might, when you forgot reward,
The part of heaven in kings ; for punishment
Is hangman's work, and drudgery for devils.
I must and will reproach thee with my service,
Tyrant ! It irks me so to call my prince ;
But just resentment and hard usage coined
The unwilling word, and, grating as it is,
Take it, for 'tis thy due.

Seb. How, tyrant ?

Dor. Tyrant !

Seb. Traitor ! that name thou canst not echo back :
That robe of infamy, that circumcision,
Ill hid beneath that robe, proclaim thee traitor ;
And if a name
More foul than traitor be, 'tis renegade.

Dor. If I'm a traitor, think and blush, thou tyrant,
Whose injuries betrayed me into treason,
Effaced my loyalty, unhinged my faith,
And hurried me from hopes of heaven to hell ;
All these and all my yet unfinished crimes,
When I shall rise to plead before the saints,
I charge on thee, to make thy damning sure.

Seb. Thy old presumptuous arrogance again,
That bred my first dislike and then my loathing ;
Once more be warned, and know me for thy king.

Dor. Too well I know thee, but for king no more :
This is not Lisbon, nor the circle this,
Where like a statue thou hast stood besieged
By sycophants and fools, the growth of courts ;
Where thy gulled eyes, in all the gaudy round,
Met nothing but a lie in every face ;
And the gross flattery of a gaping crowd,
Envious who first should catch and first applaud
The stuff or royal nonsense : when I spoke,
My honest homely words were carped and censured
For want of courtly style : related actions,
Though modestly reported, passed for boasts :
Secure of merit, if I asked reward,
Thy hungry minions thought their rights invaded,
And the bread snatched from pimps and parasites.
Henriquez answered, with a ready lie
To save his king's, the boon was begged before.

Seb. What say'st thou of Henriquez ? Now, by Heaven,
Thou' mov'st me more by barely naming him,
Than all thy foul, unmannered, scurril taunts.

Dor. And therefore 'twas to gall thee that I named him ;
That thing, that nothing but a cringe and smile ;
That woman, but more daubed ; or if a man,
Corrupted to a woman ; thy man-mistress.

Seb. All false as hell or thou.

Dor. Yes ; full as false
As that I served thee fifteen hard campaigns,
And pitched thy standard in these foreign fields :
By me thy greatness grew ; thy years grew with it,
But thy ingratitude outgrew them both.

Seb. I see to what thou tend'st ; but tell me first,
If those great acts were done alone for me :
If love produced not some, and pride the rest ?

Dor. Why, love does all that's noble here below :

But all the advantage of that love was thine :
For, coming fraughted back, in either hand
With palm and olive, victory and peace,
I was indeed prepared to ask my own
(For Violante's vows were mine before) ;
Thy malice had prevention, ere I spoke ;
And asked me Violante for Henriquez.

Seb. I meant thee a reward of greater worth.

Dor. Where justice wanted, could reward be hoped ?
Could the robbed passenger expect a bounty
From those rapacious hands who stripped him first ?

Seb. He had my promise ere I knew thy love.

Dor. My services deserved thou shouldst revoke it.

Seb. Thy insolence had cancelled all thy service ;
To violate my laws, even in my court,
Sacred to peace, and safe from all affronts ;
Even to my face, and done in my despite,
Under the wing of awful majesty
To strike the man I loved !

Dor. Even in the face of heaven, a place more sacred,
Would I have struck the man who, propt by power,
Would seize my right, and rob me of my love :
But, for a blow provoked by thy injustice,
The hasty product of a just despair,
When he refused to meet me in the field,
That thou shouldst make a coward's cause thy own !

Seb. He durst : nay more, desired and begged with tears,
To meet thy challenge fairly : 'twas thy fault
To make it public ; but my duty then
To interpose, on pain of my displeasure,
Betwixt your swords.

Dor. On pain of infamy
He should have disobeyed.

Seb. The indignity thou didst was meant to me :
Thy gloomy eyes were cast on me with scorn,
As who should say the blow was there intended ;
But that thou didst not dare to lift thy hands
Against anointed power : so was I forced
To do a sovereign justice to myself,
And spurn thee from my presence.

Dor. Thou hast dared
To tell me what I durst not tell myself :
I durst not think that I was spurned, and live ;
And live to hear it boasted to my face.
All my long avarice of honour lost,
Heaped up in youth, and hoarded up for age :
Has honour's fountain then sucked back the stream ?
He has ; and hooting boys may dry-shod pass,
And gather pebbles from the naked ford.
Give me my love, my honour ; give them back ;
Give me revenge, while I have breath to ask it.

Seb. Now, by this honoured order which I wear,
More gladly would I give than thou dar'st ask it.
Nor shall the sacred character of king
Be urged to shield me from thy bold appeal.
If I have injured thee, that makes us equal :
The wrong, if done, debased me down to thee :
But thou hast charged me with ingratitude ;
Hast thou not charged me ? Speak.

Dor. Thou know'st I have
If thou disown'st that imputation, draw,
And prove my charge a lie.

Seb. No ; to disprove that lie, I must not draw :
Be conscious to thy worth, and tell thy soul
What thou hast done this day in my defence ;
To fight thee after this, what were it else

Than owning that ingratitude thou urgest ?
That isthmus stands between two rushing seas,
Which, mounting, view each other from afar,
And strive in vain to meet.

Dor. I'll cut that isthmus :
Thou know'st I meant not to preserve thy life,
But to reprieve it, for my own revenge.
I saved thee out of honourable malice :
Now draw ; I should be loath to think thou dar'st not :
Beware of such another vile excuse.

Seb. Oh, patience, Heaven !

Dor. Beware of patience too ;
That's a suspicious word : it had been proper,
Before thy foot had spurned me ; now 'tis base :
Yet, to disarm thee of thy last defence,
I have thy oath for my security :
The only boon I begged was this fair combat :
Fight or be perjured now ; that's all thy choice.

Seb. Now can I thank thee as thou wouldst be thanked : [Drawing.

Never was vow of honour better paid,
If my true sword but hold, than this shall be.
The sprightly bridegroom, on his wedding night,
More gladly enters not the lists of love.
Why, 'tis enjoyment to be summoned thus.
Go ; bear my message to Henriquez' ghost ;
And say his master and his friend revenged him.

Dor. His ghost ! then is my hated rival dead ?

Seb. The question is beside our present purpose ;
Thou seest me ready ; we delay too long.

Dor. A minute is not much in either's life,
When there's but one betwixt us ; throw it in,
And give it him of us who is to fall. [take him.

Seb. He's dead : make haste, and thou mayst yet o'er-

Dor. When I was hasty, thou delay'dst me longer.
I prithee, let me hedge one moment more
Into thy promise : for thy life preserved,
Be kind ; and tell me how that rival died,
Whose death, next thine, I wished.

Seb. If it would please thee, thou shouldst never know.
But thou, like jealousy, inquir'st a truth,
Which found, will torture thee : he died in fight :
Fought next my person ; as in concert fought :
Kept pace for pace, and blow for every blow ;
Save when he heaved his shield in my defence,
And on his naked side received my wound :
Then, when he could no more, he fell at once,
But rolled his falling body cross their way,
And made a bulwark of it for his prince.

Dor. I never can forgive him such a death !

Seb. I prophesied thy proud soul could not bear it.
Now judge thyself who best deserved my love.
I knew you both ; and, durst I say, as Heaven
Foreknew among the shining angel host
Who should stand firm, who fall.

Dor. Had he been tempted so, so had he fallen ;
And so, had I been favoured, had I stood.

Seb. What had been is unknown ; what is appears ;
Confess he justly was preferred to thee.

Dor. Had I been born with his indulgent stars,
My fortune had been his, and his been mine.
Oh, worse than hell ! what glory have I lost,
And what has he acquired by such a death !
I should have fallen by Sebastian's side ;
My corpse had been the bulwark of my king.
His glorious end was a patched work of fate,

Ill-sorted with a soft effeminate life :
It suited better with my life than his
So to have died : mine had been of a piece,
Spent in your service, dying at your feet.

Seb. The more effeminate and soft his life,
The more his fame, to struggle to the field,
And meet his glorious fate : confess, proud spirit —
For I will have it from thy very mouth —
That better he deserved my love than thou.

Dor. Oh, whither would you drive me ! I must grant,
Yes, I must grant, but with a swelling soul,
Henriquez had your love with more desert :
For you he fought and died ; I fought against you ;
Through all the mazes of the bloody field
I hunted your sacred life ; which that I missed,
Was the propitious error of my fate,
Not of my soul ; my soul's a regicide.

Seb. Thou mightst have given it a more gentle name ;
Thou meant'st to kill a tyrant, not a king.
Speak ; didst thou not, Alonzo ?

Dor. Can I speak ?

Alas ! I cannot answer to Alonzo :
No, Dorax cannot answer to Alonzo :
Alonzo was too kind a name for me.
Then when I fought and conquered with your arms,
In that blest age I was the man you named ;
Till rage and pride debased me into Dorax,
And lost, like Lucifer, my name above.

Seb. Yet twice this day I owed my life to Dorax.

Dor. I saved you but to kill you : there's my grief.

Seb. Nay, if thou canst be grieved, thou canst repent ;
Thou couldst not be a villain though thou wouldst :
Thou own'st too much in owning thou hast erred ;
And I too little, who provoked thy crime.

Dor. Oh, stop this headlong torrent of your goodness ;
It comes too fast upon a feeble soul
Half-drowned in tears before ; spare my confusion :
For pity spare, and say not first you erred.
For yet I have not dared, through guilt and shame,
To throw myself beneath your royal feet.

[Falls at his feet.

Now spurn this rebel, this proud renegade :
'Tis just you should, nor will I more complain.

Seb. Indeed thou shouldst not ask forgiveness first ;
But thou prevent'st me still, in all that's noble.

[Taking him up.

Yes, I will raise thee up with better news :
Thy Violante's heart was ever thine ;
Compelled to wed, because she was my ward,
Her soul was absent when she gave her hand :
Nor could my threats, or his pursuing courtship,
Effect the consummation of his love :
So, still indulging tears, she pines for thee,
A widow and a maid. [me ?

Dor. Have I been cursing Heaven, while Heaven blest
I shall run mad with ecstasy of joy :
What, in one moment to be reconciled
To Heaven, and to my king, and to my love !
But pity is my friend, and stops me short,
For my unhappy rival. Poor Henriquez !

Seb. Art thou so generous, too, to pity him ?
Nay, then, I was unjust to love him better.
Here let me ever hold thee in my arms ; [Embracing him.
And all our quarrels be but such as these,
Who shall love best, and closest shall embrace :
Be what Henriquez was : be my Alonzo.

Dor. What! my Alonzo, said you? My Alonzo?
Let my tears thank you; for I cannot speak;
And if I could,

Words were not made to vent such thoughts as mine.

Seb. Thou canst not speak, and I can ne'er be silent.

Some strange reverse of fate must sure attend

This vast profusion, this extravagance

Of Heaven to bless me thus. 'Tis gold so pure,

It cannot bear the stamp, without alloy.

Be kind, ye powers, and take but half away:

With ease the gifts of fortune I resign;

But let my love and friend be ever mine.

(Last Scene of Act iv.)

III. Dryden's Prose.—Scott was as enthusiastic as Johnson in his praise of Dryden's Essays and Prefaces. 'The prose of Dryden,' says Sir Walter, 'may rank with the best in the English language. It is no less of his own formation than his versification; is equally spirited, and equally harmonious. Without the lengthened and pedantic sentences of Clarendon, it is dignified when dignity is becoming, and is lively without the accumulation of strained and absurd allusions and metaphors, which were unfortunately mistaken for wit by many of the author's contemporaries.' Malone recorded that Dryden's prose writings were held in high estimation by Burke, who carefully studied them on account equally of their style and matter, and is thought to have in some degree taken them as the model of his own diction. Dryden himself acknowledged that he had made Tillotson his model. In so saying he must have referred to the easy modern style of the composition; in all other respects the copy immensely surpasses the model. Besides his Prefaces and Essays, Dryden published several translations from the French, including Bouhours' Life of Francis Xavier (1687) and Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting (1695); also a Life of Plutarch, contributed to a translation, and a character of Polybius, produced in a like connection. Dryden's Essay of Dramatic Poesy, which, according to Johnson, 'was the first regular and valuable treatise on the art of writing,' opens with the following graphic exordium:

It was that memorable day in the first summer of the late war when our navy engaged the Dutch; a day wherein the two most mighty and best appointed fleets which any age had ever seen disputed the command of the greater half of the globe, the commerce of nations, and the riches of the universe: while these vast floating bodies on either side moved against each other in parallel lines, and our countrymen, under the happy command of his Royal Highness [the Duke of York, afterwards James II.], went breaking, little by little, into the line of the enemies; the noise of the cannon from both navies reached our ears about the city. So that all men being alarmed with it and in a dreadful suspense of the event which they knew was then deciding, every one went following the sound as his fancy led him; and leaving the town almost empty, some took towards the Park, some cross the river, others down it; all seeking the noise in the depth of silence. Amongst the rest it was the fortune of Eugenius, Crites, Lisideius, and Neander to be in company together. . . .

Taking then a barge, which a servant of Lisideius had provided for them, they made haste to shoot the bridge, and left behind them that great fall of waters which hindered them from hearing what they desired: after which having disengaged themselves from many vessels which rode at anchor in the Thames, and almost blocked up the passage towards Greenwich, they ordered the watermen to let fall their oars more gently; and then, every one favouring his own curiosity with a strict silence, it was not long ere they perceived the air to break about them like the noise of distant thunder, or of swallows in a chimney: those little undulations of sound, though almost vanishing before they reached them, yet still seeming to retain somewhat of their first horror which they had betwixt the fleets. After they had attentively listened till such time as the sound by little and little went from them, Eugenius, lifting up his head and taking notice of it, was the first who congratulated to the rest that happy omen of our nation's victory, adding that we had but this to desire in confirmation of it, that we might hear no more of that noise which was now leaving the English coast.

The Essay concludes thus:

Neander was pursuing this discourse so eagerly, that Eugenius had called to him twice or thrice ere he took notice that the barge stood still, and that they were at the foot of Somerset Stairs, where they had appointed it to land. The company were all sorry to separate so soon, though a great part of the evening was already spent; and stood a-while looking back on the water, which the moon-beams played upon, and made it appear like floating quick-silver: at last they went up through a crowd of French people, who were merrily dancing in the open air, and nothing concerned for the noise of guns which had alarmed the town that afternoon. Walking thence together to the Piazza, they parted there; Eugenius and Lisideius to some pleasant appointment they had made, and Crites and Neander to their several lodgings.

Neander was Dryden himself; Lisideius, Sir Charles Sedley (an anagram of Sidleius); Crites, Sir Robert Howard, Dryden's brother-in-law; Eugenius, the Earl of Dorset.

The following finely-drawn characters of the great Elizabethan dramatists are also from the Essay of Dramatic Poesy:

Shakespeare.

To begin then with Shakespeare. He was the man who, of all modern, and perhaps ancient poets, had the largest and most comprehensive soul. All the images of nature were still present to him, and he drew them not laboriously, but luckily. When he describes anything, you more than see it, you feel it too. Those who accuse him to have wanted learning, give him the greater commendation. He was naturally learned; he needed not the spectacles of books to read nature; he looked inwards, and found her there. I cannot say he is everywhere alike; were he so, I should do him injury to compare him with the greatest of mankind. He is many times flat, insipid; his comic wit degenerating into clenches [puns, word-plays], his serious swelling into bombast. But he is always great when some great occasion is presented to him; no man can say he ever had a fit subject for his wit and did not then raise himself as high above the rest of poets,

'Quantum lenta solent inter viburna cupressi.'

The consideration of this made Mr Hales of Eton say that there was no subject of which any poet ever writ, but he would produce it much better done in Shakespeare ; and however others are now generally preferred before him, yet the age wherein he lived, which had contemporaries with him Fletcher and Jonson, never equalled them to him in their esteem. And in the last king's court, when Ben's reputation was at highest, Sir John Suckling, and with him the greater part of the courtiers, set our Shakespeare far above him.

Beaumont and Fletcher.

Beaumont and Fletcher, of whom I am next to speak, had, with the advantage of Shakespeare's wit, which was their precedent, great natural gifts, improved by study ; Beaumont especially being so accurate a judge of plays that Ben Jonson, while he lived, submitted all his writings to his censure, and, 'tis thought, used his judgment in correcting if not contriving all his plots. What value he had for him appears by the verses he writ to him, and therefore I need speak no farther of it. The first play that brought Fletcher and him in esteem was their Philaster ; for before that they had written two or three very unsuccessfully : as the like is reported of Ben Jonson before he writ Every Man in his Humour. Their plots were generally more regular than Shakespeare's, especially those which were made before Beaumont's death ; and they understood and imitated the conversation of gentlemen much better ; whose wild debaucheries and quickness of wit in repartees no poet before them could paint as they have done. Humour, which Ben Jonson derived from particular persons, they made it not their business to describe ; they represented all the passions very lively, but above all, love. I am apt to believe the English language in them arrived to its highest perfection : what words have since been taken in are rather superfluous than ornamental. Their plays are now the most pleasant and frequent entertainments of the stage ; two of theirs being acted through the year for one of Shakespeare's or Jonson's : the reason is because there is a certain gaiety in their comedies and pathos in their more serious plays, which suits generally with all men's humours. Shakespeare's language is likewise a little obsolete, and Ben Jonson's wit comes short of theirs.

Ben Jonson.

As for Jonson, to whose character I am now arrived, if we look upon him while he was himself (for his last plays were but his dotages) I think him the most learned and judicious writer which any theatre ever had. He was a most severe judge of himself, as well as others. One cannot say he wanted wit, but rather that he was frugal of it. In his works you find little to retrench or alter. Wit, and language, and humour also in some measure we had before him ; but something of art was wanting to the drama till he came. He managed his strength to more advantage than any who preceded him. You seldom find him making love in any of his scenes, or endeavouring to move the passions ; his genius was too sullen and saturnine to do it gracefully, especially when he knew he came after those who had performed both to such a height. Humour was his proper sphere ; and in that he delighted most to represent mechanic people. He was deeply conversant in the ancients, both Greek and Latin, and he borrowed boldly from them ; there is scarce a poet or historian among the Roman authors of those times whom he has not translated in Sejanus and Catiline. But he has done his robberies so openly, that one may see he fears not to be taxed by any law. He invades authors like a monarch ; and what would be theft in other poets is only victory in him. With the spoils of these writers he so represents old Rome to us in its rites, ceremonies, and customs, that if one of their poets had written either of his tragedies, we had seen less of it than in him. If there was any fault in his language 'twas that he weaved it too closely and laboriously, in his comedies especially : perhaps too he did a little too much Romanise our tongue, leaving the words which he translated almost as much Latin as he found them ; wherein though he learnedly followed their language, he did not enough comply with the idiom of ours. If I would compare him with Shakespeare, I must acknowledge him the more correct poet, but Shakespeare the greater wit. Shakespeare was the Homer, or father of our dramatic poets : Jonson was the Virgil, the pattern of elaborate writing ; I admire him, but I love Shakespeare. To conclude of him : as he has given us the most correct plays, so in the precepts which he has laid down in his Discoveries, we have as many and profitable rules for perfecting the stage as any wherewith the French can furnish us.

Dramatic Dialogue after the Restoration.

I have always acknowledged the wit of our predecessors with all the veneration which becomes me ; but I am sure their wit was not that of gentlemen ; there was ever somewhat that was ill-bred and clownish in it, and which confessed the conversation of the authors.

And this leads me to the last and greatest advantage of our writing, which proceeds from conversation. In the age wherein those poets lived there was less of gallantry than in ours ; neither did they keep the best company of theirs. Their fortune has been much like that of Epicurus in the retirement of his gardens ; to live almost unknown, and to be celebrated after their decease. I cannot find that any of them had been conversant in courts except Ben Jonson ; and his genius lay not so much that way as to make an improvement by it. Greatness was not then so easy of access, nor conversation so free, as it now is. I cannot, therefore, conceive it any insolence to affirm, that by the knowledge and pattern of their wit who writ before us, and by the advantage of our own conversation, the discourse and raillery of our comedies excel what has been written by them. And this will be denied by none but some few old fellows who value themselves on their acquaintance with the Black Friars ; who, because they saw their plays, would pretend a right to judge ours. . . .

Now, if any ask me whence it is that our conversation is so much refined, I must freely and without flattery ascribe it to the court, and in it particularly to the king, whose example gives a law to it. His own misfortunes and the nation's afforded him an opportunity which is rarely allowed to sovereign princes, I mean of travelling and being conversant in the most polished courts of Europe ; and thereby of cultivating a spirit which was formed by nature to receive the impressions of a gallant and generous education. At his return, he found a nation lost as much in barbarism as in rebellion : and as the excellency of his nature forgave the one, so the excellency of his manners reformed the other. The desire of imitating so great a pattern first awakened the dull and heavy spirits of the English from their natural reservedness, loosened them from their stiff forms of conversation, and made them easy and pliant to each other in discourse. Thus insensibly our way of living became more free; and the fire of the English wit, which was before stifled under a constrained melancholy way of breeding, began first to display its force by mixing the solidity of our nation with the air and gaiety of our neighbours. This being granted to be true, it would be a wonder if the poets, whose work is imitation, should be the only persons in the three kingdoms who should not receive advantage by it; or if they should not more easily imitate the wit and conversation of the present age than of the past.

The Conquest of Granada.)

On Translation.

Translation is a kind of drawing after the life; where every one will acknowledge there is a double sort of likeness, a good one and a bad. It is one thing to draw the outlines true, the features like, the proportions exact, the colouring itself perhaps tolerable; and another thing to make all these graceful, by the posture, the shadowings, and chiefly by the spirit which animates the whole. I cannot without some indignation look on an ill copy of an excellent original; much less can I behold with patience Virgil, Homer, and some others, whose beauties I have been endeavouring all my life to imitate, so abused, as I may say, to their faces by a botching interpreter. What English readers unacquainted with Greek or Latin will believe me or any other man when we commend these authors, and confess we derive all that is pardonable in us from their fountains, if they take those to be the same poets whom our Oglebies have translated? But I dare assure them that a good poet is no more like himself in a dull translation, than his carcass would be to his living body. There are many who understand Greek and Latin, and yet are ignorant of their mother-tongue. The proprieties and delicacies of the English are known to few; it is impossible even for a good wit to understand and practise them without the help of a liberal education, long reading, and digesting of those few good authors we have amongst us; the knowledge of men and manners, the freedom of habitudes and conversation with the best company of both sexes; and, in short, without wearing off the rust which he contracted while he was laying in a stock of learning. Thus difficult it is to understand the purity of English, and critically to discern not only good writers from bad, and a proper style from a corrupt, but also to distinguish that which is pure in a good author, from that which is vicious and corrupt in him. And for want of all these requisites, or the greatest part of them, most of our ingenious young men take up some cried-up English poet for their model; adore him, and imitate him, as they think, without knowing wherein he is defective, where he is boyish and trifling, wherein either his thoughts are improper to his subject, or his expressions unworthy of his thoughts, or the turn of both is unharmonious.

Thus it appears necessary that a man should be a nice critic in his mother-tongue before he attempts to translate in a foreign language. Neither is it sufficient that he be able to judge of words and style, but he must be a master of them too: he must perfectly understand his author's tongue, and absolutely command his own; so that to be a thorough translator he must be a thorough poet. Neither is it enough to give his author's sense in good English, in poetical expressions, and in musical numbers; for though all these are exceeding difficult to perform, yet there remains a harder task; and it is a secret of which few translators have sufficiently thought. I have already hinted a word or two concerning it; that is the maintaining the character of an author which distinguishes him from all others, and makes him appear that individual poet whom you would interpret. For example, not only the thoughts but the style and versification of Virgil and Ovid are very different; yet I see even in our best poets who have translated some parts of them, that they have confounded their several talents; and by endeavouring only at the sweetness and harmony of numbers, have made them both so much alike that if I did not know the originals, I should never be able to judge by the copies which was Virgil and which was Ovid. It was objected against a late noble painter that he drew many graceful pictures, but few of them were like. And this happened to him because he always studied himself more than those who sat to him. In such translators I can easily distinguish the hand which performed the work, but I cannot distinguish their poet from another. Suppose two authors are equally sweet; yet there is as great distinction to be made in sweetness as in that of sugar and that of honey. I can make the difference more plain, by giving you (if it be worth knowing) my own method of proceeding, in my translations out of four several poets in this volume: Virgil, Theocritus, Lucretius, and Horace. In each of these, before I undertook them, I considered the genius and distinguishing character of my author. I looked on Virgil as a succinct and grave majestic writer; one who weighed not only every thought, but every word and syllable; who was still aiming to crowd his sense into as narrow a compass as possibly he could; for which reason he is so very figurative, that he requires, I may almost say, a grammar apart to construe him. His verse is everywhere sounding the very thing in your ears whose sense it bears; yet the numbers are perpetually varied, to increase the delight of the reader, so that the same sounds are never repeated twice together. On the contrary, Ovid and Claudian, though they write in styles differing from each other, yet have each of them but one sort of music in their verses. All the versification and little variety of Claudian is included within the compass of four or five lines, and then he begins again in the same tenor, perpetually closing his sense at the end of a verse, and that verse commonly which they call golden, or two substantives and two adjectives, with a verb betwixt them to keep the peace. Ovid, with all his sweetness, has as little variety of numbers and sound as he; he is always, as it were, upon the hand-gallop, and his verse runs upon carpet ground. He avoids like the other all synalephas, or cutting off one vowel when it comes before another in the following word; so that, minding only smoothness, he wants both variety and majesty. But to return to Virgil: though he is smooth where smoothness is required, yet he is so far from affecting it, that he seems rather to disdain it; frequently makes use of synalephas, and concludes his sense in the middle of his verse. He is everywhere above conceits of epigrammatic wit and gross hyperboles; he maintains majesty in the midst of plainness; he shines but glares not; and is stately without ambition, which is the vice of Lucan. . . .

He who excels all other poets in his own language, were it possible to do him right, must appear above them in our tongue, which, as my Lord Roscommon justly observes, approaches nearest to the Roman in its majesty; nearest indeed, but with a vast interval betwixt them. There is an inimitable grace in Virgil's words, and in them principally consists that beauty which gives so inexpressible a pleasure to him who best understands their force. This diction of his, I must once again say, is never to be copied; and since it cannot, he will appear but lame in the best translation. The turns of his verse, his breakings, his propriety, his numbers and his gravity, I have as far imitated as the poverty of our language and the hastiness of my performance would allow. I may seem sometimes to have varied from his sense; but I think the greatest variations may be fairly deduced from him; and where I leave his commentators, it may be I understand him better; at least I writ without consulting them in many places.

(From the Preface to the Second Miscellany, 1685.)

Spenser and Milton.

[In epic poetry] the English have only to boast of Spenser and Milton, who neither of them wanted either genius or learning to have been perfect poets, and yet both of them are liable to many censures. For there is no uniformity in the design of Spenser; he aims at the accomplishment of no one action, he raises up a hero for every one of his adventures, and endows each of them with some particular moral virtue, which renders them all equal, without subordination or preference: every one is most valiant in his own legend; only we must do him that justice to observe that Magnanimity, which is the character of Prince Arthur, shines throughout the whole poem, and succours the rest when they are in distress. The original of every knight was then living in the court of Queen Elizabeth; and he attributed to each of them that virtue which he thought was most conspicuous in them: an ingenious piece of flattery, though it turned not much to his account. Had he lived to finish his poem, in the six remaining legends, it had certainly been more of a piece, but could not have been perfect, because the model was not true. But Prince Arthur, or his chief patron, Sir Philip Sidney, whom he intended to make happy by the marriage of his Gloriana, dying before him, deprived the poet both of means and spirit to accomplish his design. For the rest, his obsolete language and the ill choice of his stanza, are faults but of the second magnitude; for notwithstanding the first, he is still intelligible, at least after a little practice; and for the last, he is the more to be admired that, labouring under such a difficulty, his verses are so numerous, so various, and so harmonious, that only Virgil, whom he professedly imitated, has surpassed him among the Romans, and only Mr Waller among the English.

As for Mr Milton, whom we all admire with so much justice, his subject is not that of a heroic poem, properly so called. His design is the losing of our happiness; his event is not prosperous, like that of all other epic works; his heavenly machines are many, and his human persons are but two. But I will not take Mr Rymer's work out of his hands: he has promised the world a critique on that author, wherein, though he will not allow his poem for heroic, I hope he will grant us that his thoughts are elevated, his words sounding, and that no man has so happily copied the manner of Homer, or so copiously translated his Grecisms, and the Latin elegancies of Virgil. It is true he runs into a flat of thought sometimes for a hundred lines together, but it is when he has got into a track of Scripture. His antiquated words were his choice, not his necessity; for therein he imitated Spenser, as Spenser did Chaucer. And though perhaps the love of their masters may have transported both too far in the frequent use of them, yet in my opinion obsolete words may then be laudably revived, when either they are more sounding or more significant than those in practice; and when their obscurity is taken away by joining other words to them which clear the sense, according to the rule of Horace for the admission of new words. But in both cases a moderation is to be observed in the use of them; for unnecessary coinage, as well as unnecessary revival, runs into affectation: a fault to be avoided on either hand. Neither will I justify Milton for his blank verse, though I may excuse him by the example of Hannibal Caro and other Italians who have used it; for whatever causes he alleges for the abolishing of rhyme (which I have not now the leisure to examine), his own particular reason is plainly this, that rhyme was not his talent; he had neither the ease of doing it, nor the graces of it, which is manifest in his Juvenilia, or verses written in his youth, where his rhyme is always constrained and forced, and comes hardly from him, at an age when the soul is most pliant, and the passion of love makes almost every man a rhymers, though not a poet.

(From the Discourse on the Original and Progress of Satire, 1693.)

Dryden's plays appeared in two folio volumes in the year of his death, and were afterwards re-edited by his friend Congreve, in six duodecimos. The Fables, supplemented by most, though not all, of his earlier non-dramatic verse, make another folio volume of the same date. One or two somewhat imperfect editions of his poems appeared during the eighteenth century; and Malone gave an admirable collection of the prose in four volumes. But all editions were superseded by that of Sir Walter (then Mr) Scott in 1808. This was reprinted in 1821, and in 1883-93 re-edited (in 18 vols.) by the present writer. Scott's Life is the standard. The editions of Bell, Milford, Christie, and Sargeaunt (1910) are useful. The Aldine edition (by Hooper, 1892) is in 5 vols. Churton Collins edited the Satires in 1893, and Prof. W. P. Ker selected Essays in 1900. See Dryden in the 'Men of Letters' series (1881; 1902; 1925) by the present writer, Johnson's Lives, Hazlitt's English Poets, Lowell's Among my Books, Garnett's Age of Dryden (1896), the Cambridge History of Literature (vol. viii. 1912), Verrall's Lectures on Dryden (1914), and books by Pendlebury (1923), Allardyce Nicoll (1923), T. GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

SCOTTISH LITERATURE.

From the Civil War On.

page 505 and elsewhere it has been sufficiently insisted on that alike in volume and in quality Scottish literary production had declined to a low ebb during the troublous seventeenth century, when Scotland was truly a most distressful country, rent by factions and antipathies, tyranny and persecution, intrigue and war. Most of what came from the printing-presses, and what chiefly absorbed the interest of the nation, was not literature in the stricter sense at all, but theology, mainly polemical, and controversial politics. Yet of the small number of the second series of Scottish seventeenth-century writers it may at least be said that they are wonderfully representative of the most opposite tempers and parties: the royalist Montrose who made so much of the Highlanders, the Cameronian colonel who jeered at them in verse and foiled them in the field; Rabelaisian Urquhart and ultra-Puritan Gillespie; the sainted Archbishop Leighton and the irreconcilable Presbyterian mystic Rutherford face to face with the Sempills, delincators of rude and vulgar merriment; the persecutor of the heroes of the Covenant and their panegyrist; and Fletcher, a whole party in himself. Some wrote in English almost as Englishmen understood it, some in the broadest west-country vernacular, some in parti-coloured transition between the two, while one at times wielded a language known to himself alone. Most were men of mark in their time, but none of them great men of letters. Meanwhile home-keeping Scotsmen were becoming more and more familiar with that larger literature—now no longer foreign—to which their own was contributory; English books of all kinds, religious as well as secular, were standard reading in Scotland, where Paradise Lost and the Pilgrim's Progress were not read as the work of aliens.

The Marquis of Montrose (JAMES GRAHAM; 1612–50), the brilliant royalist soldier, whose loyalty, after six meteoric victories, brought him disastrous defeat and death on the scaffold, was an apt scholar of St Andrews University, an accomplished man of the world, and the author of a few passionately loyal poems. Unhappily, by far the most memorable—containing two thrice-famous verses—was not definitely ascribed to him till 1711, when it was printed in Watson's Collection of Scots Poems, and cannot be proved his. At most it is an adaptation of an old English song.

Napier, Montrose's biographer, interprets what seems to be a spirited love-poem as a political allegory, in which King Charles I. is the lover and the kingdom the mistress.

I'll Never Love Thee More.

My dear and only love, I pray
That little world of thee
Be governed by no other sway
Than purest monarchy;
For if confusion have a part,
Which virtuous souls abhor,
And hold a synod in thine heart,
I'll never love thee more.

As Alexander I will reign,
And I will reign alone;
My thoughts did ever more disdain
A rival on my throne.
He either fears his fate too much,
Or his deserts are small,
That dares not put it to the touch
To gain or lose it all.

But I will reign and govern still,
And always give the law,
And have each subject at my will,
And all to stand in awe;
But 'gainst my batteries if I find
Thou kick, or vex me sore,
As that thou set me up a blind,
I'll never love thee more.

And in the empire of thine heart,
Where I should solely be,
If others do pretend a part,
Or dare to vie with me;
Or committees if thou erect,
And go on such a score,
I'll laugh and sing at thy neglect,
And never love thee more.

But if thou wilt prove faithful, then,
And constant of thy word,
I'll make thee glorious by my pen,
And famous by my sword;
I'll serve thee in such noble ways
Was never heard before;
I'll crown and deck thee all with bays,
And love thee more and more.

Lines written after Sentence of Death.

Let them bestow on every airt a limb, quarter of heaven
Then open all my veins, that I may swim
To Thee, my Maker, in that crimson lake;
Then place my par-boiled head upon a stake,
Scatter my ashes, strew them in the air:
Lord! since Thou know'st where all those atoms are,
I'm hopeful Thou 'lt recover once my dust,
And confident Thou 'lt raise me with the just!

See selections by R. S. Rait (1901), and Life by John Buchan (1913; new ed. 1928). 'I'll never love thee more' is an old Northern English tune of the reign of James I., and the oldest set of words—one of many sets to the same air—belongs to the early years of the seventeenth century:

'My dear and only love, take heed
How thou thyself expose;
And let not longing lovers feed
Upon such looks as those.
I'll marble thee around about,
And build without a door;
But if my love doth once break out,
I'll never love thee more.'

Simion Grahame, son of an Edinburgh burgess, was a competent scholar, a soldier and traveller of dissolute life, and ultimately an austere Franciscan brother. He must have been born about 1570; Dempster—a poor authority—fixes the end of his very varied career in 1614, probably too early. He spent the last years of his life in Italy. He dedicated to his patron, James VI., a collection of verses called The Passionate Sparke of a Relenting Mind in 1604, and in 1609 to the Earl of Montrose (father of the famous Marquis) his Anatomic of Humors—a dedication which may justify us in introducing him in this section along with his patron's son. The most notable thing about the Anatomic is that it has been conjectured to have given Burton more than a suggestion for his Anatomic of Melancholy. The work, interspersed with verse, gives striking pictures of typical characters—quacks, parasites, and many others—somewhat in the fashion of the 'characters' of Hall and Overbury. He wrote in what is approximately English of the period; but undisguised and unmistakable Scotticisms in words, spellings, and construction appear constantly. Love is, as usual, the humour most elaborately anatomised, and was especially fair game for a friar. This is a fragment on the lover:

Being alone in their retearing [retiring] walks they surfat the solitarie deserts with the sorrowful voice of a discontented minde, with weeping eies in splaine [spleen, a fit] of passion. O, saiethe he,

The furious force of love's consuming fire
No tyme can quench, nor thought can not expell:
Such is the restles rage of my desire,
Which makes my wits within myselfe rebell:
Thus am I wrongd and ever saikles slaine, blameless
I shift my place but cannot shift my paine.

They ever esteeme their paines worse than the paines of hell; such are the sort of penitentiall lovers, who are alwaies anatomisd with humorous follie: and yet how often it comes to passe that they who taks most pains to please are most displeasd, for it is knowne be unfallable experience that the duetifull lover in a respected persute is often rejected with many ingratfull disdains. . . . How perrillous it is to beleeve a Lover, how tempting their words will be, and how they will straine them selves to speak with vehemencie. Lady Rethorick ever hants the mouth of a Lover, and with borrowed speeches of braver wits doeth enlarge their deceit, his perjured promises, his oathes, his vows, his protestations, his waiting-on, and all his iron sences drawn to feed upon the attractive humors of her Adamantall beautie. . . . Her smile is his heaven, and her frowne is his hell: she is the only idoll of his minde, for when he should serve God, he worships her; if he comes to Church, his looking on her behaviour takes away his hearing, robs him of devotion, and makes him a sencelesse blocke; with staring on her face he learns the arte of Physiognomie, his vain apprehensions will reade a woman's thought in her visage; and when he looks on her hands, O then hee becomes a rare Palmister, for he will not spare to reade her fortunes by lynes, for heere (says hee) is the true score of death, and there goes the score of life. . . . Hee spendes the time in his Chamber with no other thing but with a great Looking-glasse, how to take off his hatt, how to make his gesture, and in a discourse how to frame the motion of his hands, to kisse his finger, to make courtesie with his legge, to set his arme, to smile, to looke aside, to walke; and then he stands gazing on the full proportion of his own bodie, which I sweare is not else but the very true image of superstitious vanitie.

There are two forms of a poem written from Italy, thus beginning, and addressed

To Scotland his Soyle.

To thee, my Soyle, where first
I did receive my breath,
These obsequies I sing
Before my Swan-like death.
My love by nature bound,
Which spotlesse love I spend,
From treasure of my hart
To Thee I recommend.

And he praised the United Kingdom in another, much longer and more elaborate, in which he takes opportunity to congratulate and compliment the king as the good genius of the now united realm:

With nine-voyc'd mouth my Delphin song I sound;
Of all the world blest bee thou, Brittaines Ile!
Thou, onely thou, within this mortall round,
On whom the heav'ns have lov'd so long to smile:
For Phoenix-like thou hast renew'd thy kinde,
In getting that which lay for thee inshrin'de.

Robert Sempill of Beltrees in the Renfrewshire parish of Lochwinnoch (1595?–1659), humorous poet, was the son of Sir James Sempill of Beltrees, himself son of Lord Sempill, and so distantly related to the older Robert Sempill, author of the Sempill Ballates (see page 232). Sir James was contemptuously called by Knox 'the dancer' from his various social accomplishments; was conspicuous at the court of James VI., whom he assisted in the preparation of the Basili-con Doron; and wrote controversial works on the Presbyterian side, as well as the satirical poem against the R. C. Church, The Packman's Paternoster. Sir James's son Robert continued this satire, wrote various pieces, but is remembered as author of the Life and Death of Habbie Simson, Piper of Kilbarchan, which gives a graphic and humorous account of old Scottish amusements. Both Ramsay and Burns were influenced by this poem, and copied the form of verse, which became characteristic of Scottish vernacular poems, especially those of facetious type.

From 'Habbie Simson.'

Kilbarchan now may say 'Alas !'
 For she hath lost her game and grace,
 Both Trixie and the Maiden Trace ; bridal march
 But what remead ? remedy
 For no man can supply his place—
 Hab Simson's dead !

Now who shall play 'The Day it daws,'
 Or 'Hunts up,' when the cock he craws ?
 Or who can for our kirk-town cause
 Stand us in stead ?
 On bagpipes now naebod blaws
 Sin' Habbie's dead. . . .

So kindly to his neighbours neist, next
 At Beltane and Saint Barchan's feast
 He blew, and then held up his breast,
 As he were weid ; wood, mad
 But now we need not him arrest,
 For Habbie's dead.

At fairs he played before the spearmen, halberdiers
 All gaily graithed in their gear, men, clad
 Steel bonnets, jacks, and swords so clear then,
 Like any bead.
 Now wha will play before such weir-men, warriors
 Sin' Habbie's dead ?

At clerk-plays, when he wont to come, stage plays
 His pipe played trimly to the drum,
 Like bykes of bees he gart it bum, hives—hum
 And tuned his reed :
 Now all our pipers may sing dumb
 Sin' Habbie's dead.

And at horse races many a day
 Before the black, the brown, the grey,
 He gart his pipe, when he did play,
 Baith skirl and screed ;
 Now all such pastime's quite away
 Sin' Habbie's dead.

He counted was a waled wight-man, picked champion
 And fiercely at football he ran ;
 At every game the gree he wan first place
 For pith and speed ;
 The like of Habbie wasna then,
 But now he's dead.

Francis Sempill (1616?–82), Robert's son, was also a vernacular poet, who, like his father, forms a link in the almost broken chain of humorous popular Scottish poetry, a link between Pebblis to the Play and Sir David Lyndsay and the vernacular revival under Allan Ramsay. Francis Sempill was also of the court party, inherited heavily burdened estates, and though he alienated some of his properties, welcomed the relief of the debtors' sanctuary at Holyrood—as recorded in his autobiographical 'Banishment of Poverty,' dedicated (with thanks rather for expected favours, apparently) to the Duke of York. He was ultimately Sheriff-Depute of Renfrewshire. He unquestionably wrote a good deal of verse ; but many of the things attributed to him are so credited on slender evidence. 'She rose and let me in' is, as we have seen, Tom Durfey's, though Sempill may have made the Scots version. The song 'Maggie Lauder,' found in most Scottish song-books, is very probably his. 'The Blythsome Bridal,' claimed also for Sir William Scott of Thirlestane, an accomplished writer of Latin verse, is more likely Sempill's. The first verse is :

Fy, let's a' to the bridal,
 For there will be liltin there,
 For Jockie's to be married to Maggie,
 The lass wi' the gowden hair.
 And there will be lang kail and pottage,
 And bannocks of barley meal,
 And there will be good salt herring
 To relish a cog of good ale.

The nine stanzas of this song, rough, rude, and vulgar though they be in tone, rhymes, and words, are only more uncouth than some of Fergusson's, and are in the humour of Pebblis to the Play and Christis Kirk of the Grene. The same is true of 'Hallow Fair,' generally credited to Sempill, and quite distinct in plan and rhyme from the much later poem of the same name by Fergusson. The earlier one thus begins :

There's mony braw Jockies and Jennies
 Comes weel buskit into the fair,
 Wi' ribbons on their cockernonies, topknots of hair
 And fouth o' braw flowers in their hair. wealth
 Maggie sae brawly was buskit
 When Jockie was tied to his bride,
 The pownie was ne'er better whiskit pony—whacked
 Wi' a cudgel that hung by his side.
 Sing fal de ral la de.

The following much less uncouth verses from 'The Banishment of Poverty' describe his first occupations in Edinburgh while still dogged by that unwelcome comrade, and show the Scots equivalent for 'dining with Duke Humphrey' :

We held the Lang-gate to Leith Wynd, now Princes Street
 Where poorest purses use to be ;
 And in the Calton lodgèd syne,
 Fit quarters for such company.

Yet I the High-town fain would see,
 But my comrade did me discharge ;
 He willed me Blackburn's ale to pree, taste
 And muff my beard that was right large. trim

The morn I ventured up the Wynd,
 And slunk in at the Netherbow,
 Thinking that troker for to tyne, familiar—lose
 Who does me damage what he dow. can

His company he doth bestow
 On me to my great grief and pain ;
 Ere I the thrang could wrestle through
 The loun was at my heels again. rascal

I greined to gang on the plain-stanes, longed—pavement
 To see if comrades wad me ken :
 We twa gaed pacing there our lanes,
 The hungry hour 'twixt twelve and ane.

Then I kenned no way how to fen ; send, make shift
 My guts rumbled like a hurl-barrow ; wheel-barrow
 I dined with saints and noblemen,
 Even sweet Giles and Earl of Murray.

Samuel Rutherford (1600?–61), a pectoral theologian (to use Neander's phrase) if ever there was one, was born at Nisbet, near Jedburgh, and passed M.A. at Edinburgh in 1621. In 1623 he was appointed Professor of Humanity; the scandal created by his falling into disgrace with the girl he afterwards married caused his resignation in 1626; but next year he received Episcopal ordination and was settled as minister of Anwoth. Here from the first he was a zealous student and devoted and beloved pastor; and here, within a year after his disgrace, he began that correspondence with his godly friends which has been called 'the most seraphic book in our literature.' He seems never to have fully conformed to the Perth articles, which were utterly obnoxious to all Presbyterians. Exercitationes pro divina Gratia (1636) was written against the Arminians, and brought him an invitation to a Divinity chair in Holland and a summons before the High Commission Court in July 1636, when he was forbidden to preach, and banished to Aberdeen; and there he wrote many of his most spiritual letters to his parishioners and friends in the south. There he was also free to debate with the Episcopalian-Arminian 'Aberdeen doctors.' The national uprising and the Covenant gave him the welcome opportunity of returning to his parish; but under the Covenant he was appointed Professor of Divinity at St Andrews in 1639, and in 1647 Principal of the New College; in 1643 he was sent to the Westminster Assembly. He wrote many works of controversial divinity and devotional theology, combining high Presbyterian divine right, Calvinistic orthodoxy, and fervid religion. His Due Right of Presbyteries (1644), Lex Rex (1644), Trial and Triumph of Faith (1645), Christ Dying and Drawing Sinners to Himself (1647), belong to this period. His Free Disputation against Pretended Liberty of Conscience was pronounced by Bishop Heber as 'perhaps the most elaborate defence of persecution which has ever appeared in a Protestant country; Milton included him amongst the 'new forcers of conscience' named in his sonnet. After the Restoration his Lex Rex was burned by the hangman in Edinburgh in 1661, and its author deposed and summoned for high-treason; but he received the citation on his death-bed. Livingston said 'he had most sharp piercing wit and fruitful invention and solid judgment.' But it is by the infectious fervour of his Letters that he remained for nearly two centuries a power amongst his countrymen; the work was eminently popular in all ranks of Scotsmen, and cherished in Scotland the less conspicuous graces of Presbyterian faith and love. To many the succession of highly sensuous images under which Rutherford expresses the ecstatic mood of an exalted sense of communion with Christ and God is non-natural, extravagant, and repellent. The letters are largely a catena of scriptural fragments and phrases, a tangle of mixed metaphors, Hebraic and Scottish. Yet the command of apt words is as remarkable as the fertility in imagery. Though the letters are conceived in sound English, Rutherford makes frequent, skilful, and very effective use of peculiarly Scottish words and phrases, and does not always avoid homely and even grotesque figures. Thus he adjures an afflicted friend 'to be faithful to Him that can ride through hell and death on a windlestrae and His horse never stumble'—a windlestrae being a stalk of grass. He not merely conceives the relation of Christ to the Church according to the old allegorical interpretation of the Song of Solomon, but uses the same language of Christ and the individual believer. There is, accordingly, perpetual iteration of Christ's kisses, wooing, 'love-embracements,' of marriage with Him, even of being dandled on His knee, of the smell of His breath and of His garments; too great love of one's children is thus adultery, and the Catholic Church is 'Rome's brothel-house.' It is characteristic that in a long letter to the Countess of Kenmure, daughter of the Earl of Argyll and wife of the patron who presented him to Anwoth, Rutherford mentions as it were casually in the very last short paragraph: 'My wife now after long disease and torment for the space of a year and a month is departed this life. The Lord hath done it; blessed be His name.' The following are extracts from letters to the same Countess, of date 1628, 1630, and 1631:

Ye have lost a child: nay, she is not lost to you who is found to Christ. She is not sent away, but only sent before, like unto a star, which going out of our sight doth not die and evanish, but shineth in another hemisphere. Ye see her not, yet she doth shine in another country. If her glass was but a short hour, what she wanteth of time that she hath gotten of eternity; and ye have to rejoice that ye have now some plenishing up in heaven. Build your nest upon no tree here; for ye see God hath sold the forest to death; and every tree whereupon we would rest is ready to be cut down, to the end we may fly and mount up, and build upon the Rock, and dwell in the holes of the Rock. . . .

For this is the house of wine, where ye meet with your Well-Beloved. Here it is where He kisseth you with the kisses of His mouth, and where ye feel the smell of His garments; and they have indeed a most fragrant and glorious smell. Ye must, I say, wait upon Him, and be often communing with Him, whose lips are as lilies, dropping sweet-smelling myrrh, and by the moving thereof He will assuage your grief; for the Christ that saveth you is a speaking Christ; the Church knoweth Him by His voice, and can discern His tongue amongst a thousand. . . .

It is God's mercy to you, madam, that He giveth you your fill, even to loathing, of this bitter world, that ye may willingly leave it, and, like a full and satisfied banqueter, long for the drawing of the table. And at last, having trampled under your feet all the rotten pleasures that are under sun and moon, and having rejoiced as though ye rejoiced not, and having bought as though ye possessed not, ye may, like an old crazy ship, arrive at our Lord's harbour, and be made welcome, as one of those who have ever had one foot loose from the earth, longing for that place where your soul shall feast and banquet for ever and ever upon a glorious sight of the incomprehensible Trinity, and where ye shall see the fair face of the man Christ, even the beautiful face that was once for your cause more marred than any of the visages of the sons of men, and was all covered with spitting and blood. Be content to wade through the waters betwixt you and glory with Him, holding His hand fast, for He knoweth all the fords. Howbeit ye may be ducked, but ye cannot drown, being in His company; and ye may all the way to glory see the way bedewed with His blood who is the Forerunner. Be not afraid, therefore, when ye come even to the black and swelling river of death, to put in your foot and wade after Him. The current, how strong soever, cannot carry you down the water to hell: the Son of God, His death and resurrection, are stepping-stones and a stay to you; set down your feet by faith upon these stones, and go through as on dry land. If ye knew what He is preparing for you, ye would be too glad. He will not (it may be) give you a full draught till you come up to the well-head and drink, yea, drink abundantly, of the pure river of the water of life, that proceedeth out from the throne of God and of the Lamb. Madam, tire not, weary not; I dare find you the Son of God caution, when ye are got up thither, and have cast your eyes to view the golden city, and the fair and never-withering Tree of Life, that beareth twelve manner of fruits every month, ye shall then say, 'Four-and-twenty hours' abode in this place is worth threescore and ten years' sorrow upon earth.' If ye can but say that ye long earnestly to be carried up thither (as I hope you cannot for shame deny Him the honour of having wrought that desire in your soul), then hath your Lord given you an earnest. And, madam, do ye believe that our Lord will lose his earnest, and rue of the bargain, and change His mind, as if He were a man that can lie, or the son of man that can repent?

George Gillespie (1613-48), who was born and died at Kirkcaldy, studied at St Andrews, and in 1638 was ordained minister of Wemyss, was, like Rutherford, one of the heroes of the Covenant. He showed characteristic fearlessness at the Glasgow Assembly that same year; was in 1642 translated to Greyfriars Church in Edinburgh; in 1643 was sent up to the Westminster Assembly, where he took a great part in the debates on discipline and dogma, and was accounted a foeman worthy to meet Selden in debate. He represented the highest type of Covenanting theology and church government. Almost all his publications, including most of his sermons, are controversial, impartially confuting Erastians, Arminians, Independents, Episcopalians, Papists, and right and left hand defectors amongst his own brethren of the household of faith; though there is at times a lofty tone of sincerity and fervour that redeems even the barrenness of dead controversies. He had an important share in drafting the admirably clear and well-worded definitions and statements of the Westminster Confession of Faith and Shorter Catechism. His Aaron's Rod Blossoming (1646) is a masterly statement of the high Presbyterian claim for spiritual independence. In 1648 he was Moderator of the famous General Assembly. For his death, see the extract from Wodrow, page 830. The following is a fragment of his sermon in 1645 before the House of Lords in Westminster Abbey; which is diversified with scraps of Chaldee and Hebrew as well as Greek and Latin, and with quotations from authorities as well known as Cajetan, Grotius, Socinus, Gualterus, and Bullinger, as difficult to identify as Aricularius and Ribera:

If it were not so, there should be no sure evidence of our closing in covenant with Christ; for then, and never till then, doth the soul give itself up to Christ to be his, and closeth with him in a covenant, when it renounceth all other lovers, that it may be his only. Shall a woman be married to a husband with the reservation of another lover, or upon condition that she shall ever stay in her father's house? So the soul cannot be married to Christ except it not only renounce its bosom sins, lusts, and idols, but be content also to part with the most lawful creature-comforts for his sake: 'Forget also thine own people, and thy father's house,' Psal. xlv. 10. The repudiating of creature-comforts and a covenant with Christ go hand in hand together, Isa. lv. 2, 3. Nahash would not make a covenant with the men of Jabesh-Gilead, unless they would pluck out their right eyes, intending (as Josephus gives the reason) to disable them from fighting or making war; for the buckler or shield did cover their left eye when they fought, so that they had been hard put to it, to fight without the right eye. This was a cruel mercy in him; but it is a merciful severity in Christ, that he will make no covenant with us, except the right eye of the old man of sin in us be put out.

From 'Aaron's Rod Blossoming.'

I have often and heartily wished that I might not be distracted by, nor engaged into, polemic writings, of which the world is too full already, and from which many more learned and idoneous have abstained; and I did accordingly resolve that in this controversial age I should be slow to write, swift to read and learn. Yet there are certain preponderating reasons which have made me willing to be drawn forth into the light upon this subject; for beside the desires and solicitations of divers Christian friends, lovers of truth and peace, seriously calling upon me for an answer to Mr Prynne's Vindication of his Four Questions concerning excommunication and suspension, the grand importance of the Erastian controversy and the strong influence which it hath into the present juncture of affairs doth powerfully invite me.

Among the many controversies which have disquieted and molested the Church of Christ, those concerning ecclesiastical government and discipline are not the least, but among the chief, and often managed with the greatest animosity and eagerness of spirit, whence there have grown most dangerous divisions and breaches, such as this day there are, and for the future are to be expected, unless there shall be (through God's mercy) some further composing and healing of these church-consuming distractions, which, if we shall be so happy as once to obtain, it will certainly contribute very much toward the accommodation of civil and state-shaking differences; and, contrariwise, if no healing for the church, no healing for the state. Let the Gallios of this time (who care for no intrinsical evil in the church) promise to themselves what they will, surely he that shall have cause to write with Nicolaus de Clemangis a book of lamentation, de corrupto ecclesie statu, will find also cause to write with him de lapsu et reparatione justitie.

As the thing is of high concernment to these so much disturbed and divided churches, so the elevation is yet higher by many degrees. This controversy reacheth up to the heavens, and the top of it is above the clouds. It doth highly concern Jesus Christ himself, in his glory, royal prerogative, and kingdom, which he hath and exerciseth as Mediator and Head of his church. The crown of Jesus Christ, or any part, privilege, or pendicle thereof, must needs be a noble and excellent subject. This truth, that Jesus Christ is a king, and hath a kingdom and government in his church distinct from the kingdoms of this world, and from the civil government, hath this commendation and character above all other truths, that Christ himself suffered to the death for it, and sealed it with his blood; for, it may be observed from the story of his passion, this was the only point of his accusation, which was confessed and avouched by himself, was most aggravated, prosecuted, and driven home by the Jews, was prevalent with Pilate as the cause of condemning him to die, and was mentioned also in the superscription upon his cross.

Nicolaus de Clemangis, a pupil and friend of Gerson, wrote books with the titles cited in 1474 and 1421 respectively. There are some fifteen publications set to Gillespie's account; but his Works (1843-46) were comprised in two volumes. The use of the word 'creature-comforts' in the first extract is much earlier than the earliest recorded in the great Oxford Dictionary.

Archbishop Leighton (1611-84) was the son of a Scottish physician settled in London, Alexander Leighton, who was barbarously treated by the Star Chamber of Charles I. A tract against Catholicism and Episcopacy (1624) brought the Scots doctor into trouble, and going abroad, he was ordained to the English Church in Utrecht, a post he soon resigned, returning to London in 1630. In Holland he had published (1628) an intemperate and virulent Appeal to the Parliament; or Sion's Plea against the Prelacie, for which he was now sentenced to be publicly whipped and set in the pillory; to have his nostrils slit, his ears cut off, and his cheeks branded with a hot iron; to pay a fine of £10,000, and to suffer perpetual imprisonment in the Fleet—an imprisonment from which, after eleven years' confinement, he was liberated by the Long Parliament. His son Robert, educated at the University of Edinburgh, resided for some time at Douay, where his intercourse with French friends and relations amongst the Catholic clergy not merely taught him perfect French, but broadened his theological views. He became also an accomplished Latinist, Hellenist, and Hebraist. In December 1641 he was ordained minister of Newbattle, near Edinburgh, and there he delivered the sermons composing his celebrated Commentary on the First Epistle of St Peter. In 1653 he resigned his parish of Newbattle to become Principal of the University of Edinburgh. Soon after the Restoration Leighton was induced by the king himself to become one of the new bishops; chose Dunblane, the poorest of all the dioceses; and for the next ten years he laboured to build up the shattered walls of the Church. His aim was to preserve what was best in Episcopacy and Presbytery as a basis for comprehensive union; but he succeeded only in being misunderstood by both sides—to both he seemed incomprehensibly latitudinarian on doctrines of vital interest. Neither Wodrow nor Row conceals his dislike of Leighton's policy and suspicion of his designs; and Leighton, too, spoke of the extreme Covenanters at times with considerable asperity. Weary at length of his uncomfortable position, he went to London in 1665 to resign his see, but Charles persuaded him to return. Again in 1669 he went to London to advocate his scheme of 'accommodation,' and immediately after accepted the archiepiscopal see of Glasgow, his predecessor being deprived for opposing the 'indulgence.' Next followed his fruitless conferences at Edinburgh (1670-71) with leading Presbyterians. In despair of success he begged for permission to retire, and at length in 1674 was allowed to lay down his archbishopric. His last ten years he spent at Broadhurst Manor, Sussex, the home of his sister, often preaching in the church of Horsted Keynes, where he lies. He died in a London inn, 25th June 1684. His often-expressed wish to die in an inn is recorded by Bishop Burnet (in whose arms he died) in his sketch of Leighton's character, quoted on page 32, Vol. II. Burnet said of him that he had 'the greatest elevation of soul, the largest compass of knowledge, the most mortified and most heavenly disposition that he ever saw in mortal.' The famous reply to zealous brethren asking whether he preached to the times, that surely they might 'permit a poor brother to preach Jesus Christ and eternity,' is quite in his spirit, but does not seem well authenticated. Coleridge held him, among all our theologians, as best deserving 'the title of a spiritual divine;' and based the Aids to Reflection on aphorisms culled from Leighton—surely a remarkable compliment to the modest divine. In one passage in the first chapter of the Commentary, Coleridge says we have 'religion, the spirit: the philosophy, the soul; and poetry, the body and drapery, united; Plato glorified by St Paul!' The pregnant passage is this:

As in religion, so in the course and practice of men's lives the stream of sin runs from one age into another, and every age makes it greater, adding somewhat to what it receives, as rivers grow in their course by the accession of brooks that fall into them; and every man when he is born, falls like a drop into the main current of corruption, and so is carried down with it, and this by reason of its strength and his own nature, which willingly dissolves unto it and runs along with it.

The sermon on Psalm cxii. 7, called 'The Believer a Hero,' was read 'very often, and always with pleasure,' by Carlyle's friend, Erskine of Linlathen, who earnestly commended it to his friends. The following are extracts:

The Fear of God a Resting in His Love.

All the passions are but several ebbings and flowings of the soul, and their motions are the signs of its temper; which way it is carried, that is mainly to be remarked by the beating of its pulse. If our desires and hopes and fears be in the things of this world and the interest of flesh, this is their distemper and disorder: the soul is in a continual fever. But if they move God-wards, then is it composed and calm in a good temper and healthful point, fearing and loving Him, desiring Him and nothing but Him, waiting for Him and trusting in Him. And when any one affection is right, and in a due aspect to God, all the rest are so too; for they are radically one, and He is the life of that soul that is united to Him; and so in Him it moves in a peculiar spiritual manner, as all do naturally in the dependence of their natural life on Him that is the Fountain of Life.

Thus we have here this fear of God, as often elsewhere, set out as the very substance of holiness and evidence of happiness. And, that we may know there is nothing either base or grievous in this fear, we have joined with it delight and trust; Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord, that delighteth greatly in His commandments, which is that badge of love to Him, to observe them, and that with delight, and with great, exceeding delight. So then, the fear is not that which love casts out, but that which love brings in. This fear follows and flows from love, a fear to offend, whereof nothing so tender as love, and that, in respect of the greatness of God, hath in it withal a humble reverence. . . .

The fear of God is not, you see, a perplexing doubt and distrust of His love; on the contrary, 'tis a fixed resting and trust on His love. Many that have some truth of grace are, through weakness, filled with disquieting fears; so possibly, though they perceive it not, it may be in some a point of wilfulness, a little latent undiscerned affectation of scrupling and doubting, placing much of religion in it. True, where the soul is really solicitous about its interest in God, that argues some grace; but being vexingly anxious about it, it argues that grace is low and weak. A sparkle there is even discovered by that smoke; but the great smoke still continuing and nothing seen but it, argues there is little fire, little faith, little love. And this as it is unpleasant to thyself, so to God, as smoke to the eyes. . . .

This is the blessed and safe estate of believers. Who can think they have a sad, heavy life? Oh! it is the only lightsome, sweet, cheerful condition in the world! The rest of men are poor, rolling, unsteady things, every report shaking them as the leaves of trees are shaken with the wind, yea, lighter than so, as the chaff that the wind drives to and fro at its pleasure. Would men but reflect and look in upon their own hearts, 'tis a wonder what vain childish things the most would find there, glad and sorry at things as light as the toys of children, at which they laugh and cry in a breath; how easily puffed up with a thing or word that pleaseth us, bladder-like, swelled with a little air, and it shrinks again in discouragements and fear upon the touch of a needle point, which gives that air some vent. What is the life of the greatest part but a continual tossing betwixt vain hopes and fears, all their days spent in these? Oh! how vain a thing is a man even in his best estate, while he is nothing but himself, his heart not united and fixed on God, disquieted in vain! How small a thing will do it; he needs no other but his own heart, it may prove disquietment enough to itself; his thoughts are his tormentors.

I know some men are, by a stronger understanding and moral principles, somewhat raised above the vulgar, and speak big of a constancy of mind; but these are but flourishes, an acted bravery. Somewhat there may be that will hold out in some trials, but far short of this fixedness of faith. Troubles may so multiply as to drive them at length from their posture, and come on so thick with such violent blows, as will smite them out of their artificial guard, disorder all their Seneca and Epictetus, and all their own calm thoughts and high resolves. The approach of death, though they make a good mien and set the best face on it, or if not, yet some kind of terror, may seize on their spirits, which they are not able to shift off. But the soul trusting in God is prepared for all, not only for the calamities of war, pestilence, famine, poverty, or death, but in the saddest apprehensions of soul, above hope believes under hope; even in the darkest night casts anchor in God, reposes on Him, when he sees no light. Yea, though He slay me, says Job, yet will I trust in Him; not only though I die, but though He slay me, when I see His hand lifted up to destroy me, yet from that same hand will I look for salvation. . . .

Well, choose you; but, all reckoned and examined, I had rather be the poorest believer than the greatest king on earth. How small a commotion, small in its beginning, may prove the overturning of the greatest kingdom! But the believer is heir to a kingdom that cannot be shaken. The mightiest and most victorious prince, that hath not only lost nothing, but hath been gaining new conquests all his days, is stopt by a small distemper in the middle of his course. He returns to his dust, then his vast designs fall to nothing, in that very day his thoughts perish. But the believer in that very day is sent to the possession of his crown; that is his coronation day; all his thoughts are accomplished. . . .

'Tis the godly man alone who by this fixed consideration in God looks the grim visage of death in the face, with an unappalled mind. It damps all the joys, and defeats all the hopes of the most prosperous, proudest, and wisest worldlings. . . . Though riches, honours, and all the glories of this world are with a man, yet he fears, yea, he fears the more for these, because here they must end. But the good man looks death out of countenance, in the words of David: Though I walk through the valley and shadow of death, yet will I fear no evil, for Thou art with me.

None of Archbishop Leighton's writings were published during his lifetime. They consist of the Commentary on St Peter's Sermons, preached at Newbattle; Lectures and Addresses, delivered (mostly in Latin) before the University of Edinburgh; and Spiritual Exercises, Letters, &c. There are editions of his works by Fall (1692-1708), Doddridge (1748), Jerment (1805-8), Pearson (1825), Aikman (1831), and West (6 vols. 1869-75, unfinished). There are Selections (1883) by Blair; and the Aids to Reflection contain very many short passages most admired by Coleridge.

John Ogilby (1600-76) attained a sad eminence as a bad poet not so much from the extraordinary demerit of his verses as from the sneers of Dryden (who groups him with Flecknoe) and—later—of Pope in the Dunciad. He was born near Edinburgh, and, while his father lay in the Fleet Prison, reached perfection in the art of dancing-master, figured as a dancer in court-masques, but becoming lame, was employed by Strafford when Lord Deputy in Ireland to teach his children and serve him in his house as amanuensis. The Civil War ruined his prospects, but after 1641 he acquired Latin and Greek, and took to translating. At the Restoration fortune became kinder, and he was made Master of the Revels in Ireland for a year or two; but before the Great Fire of 1666, by which he suffered, was a printer and publisher—apparently prosperous—in London. He produced a series of handsome folios on China, Japan, Africa, America, Britannia (Part i.), &c., with maps and fine illustrations by Hollar. His principal poetic achievements were translations of Virgil in heroic verse, and of the Iliad and the Odyssey; also a rhyming paraphrase of Æsop, and some imitations of his own. Of these also magnificent folio editions were issued with engravings by Hollar and others. A play and three epic or narrative poems by him seem never to have been printed. Pope tells us he read Homer in this form with joy when a schoolboy. Ogilby's verses are utterly unpoetic, but they scan tolerably, and are perhaps hardly bad enough to justify the place that has been assigned him in the very lowest depths of the poetical inferno. As poor poetasters have been more leniently judged.

Thus Ogilby renders the Odyssey's picture (Book vi.) of the island king's daughter Nausicaa and her companions, on their washing expedition (a sort of 'Caledonian washing') to the river by the shore, just before the shipwrecked Ulysses presents himself to them:

When to the pleasant Fountain they drew near
Where they might wash all seasons of the year,
Where cleansing streams like purest Crystal spout;
'There they alight and sweating Mules take out,
And on the Margents of the purling Flood
Drove to sweet Grass; their Chariot next unload,
And foul Weeds throw into the Crystall Spring,
Which in full Troughs they trample in a ring,
Each the Buck plying with a tab'ring Foot.
All clear from Spots, discolouring Stains and Smut,
They spread them forth in order near the Shore,
Where they small Stones and Gravel 'spy most store.
Themselves then bath'd, perfum'd, and neatly deckt
To Dinner went, where sitting they expect,
Until the Sun whiten their Weeds and dry.
When feasted well, they lay their Chaplets by,
To play at Ball. Amidst her virgin-train
The Princess first warbled a pleasant Strain.

Sir Thomas Urquhart of Cromarty (1611–60), the translator of Rabelais, was a man of somewhat remarkable accomplishments and not a little curious learning, but eminently conceited and eccentric, if not on some points hopelessly crazed. He traces the genealogy of his family up to Adam, from whom he was the 153rd in descent, and by the mother's side he ascends to Eve. The first of the family who settled in Scotland was one Nomostor, married to Diosa (daughter of Alcibiades), who took his farewell of Greece and arrived at Cromarty, or Portus Salutis, in 389 B.C. The preposterous succession of fabulous personages, if not expressly and deliberately invented, seems to have come from the same sources as the fictitious lists of old Celtic Scottish kings. Sir Thomas, having studied at King's College, Aberdeen, and travelled in France, Spain, and Italy, continued strenuously to support the court and oppose the Covenant. He was knighted by Charles I. in 1641, and even after he succeeded to his father (also Sir Thomas), in the same year, was much plagued by creditors—for Sir Thomas the elder had recklessly and hopelessly embarrassed the family property, and, probably on that account, had been violently seized and imprisoned 'within ane upper chalmers [chamber] callit the Inner Dortour' by his undutiful sons. The second Sir Thomas accompanied Charles II. into England, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester (1651). He is said to have died of an inordinate and unrestrainable fit of joyful laughter on hearing of the Restoration.

It is often said that the heaven-born translator must be a spiritual brother and compeer of his original, that it needs a profound humourist to render another profound humourist, and that Urquhart was the northern Rabelais. Had we nothing but the translation of Rabelais to judge by, we might have been unable to dispute this so far as Urquhart is concerned. But he left us other works, and in none of them is there a single gleam of real humour, but abundance of the very contrary. Fantastical they are, eccentric, quaint, sometimes clever, copious, apt in vocables, and pointedly satirical; but usually merely verbose, magniloquent, pretentious, and tedious, save where the author's vanity and perverse foolishness make us laugh at him rather than with him. In truth, he is precisely one of the types Rabelais most constantly makes fun of—Rabelais, Cervantes, and all the humourists—an inaccurate pedant, full of ill-digested learning, whose conceit, vanity, and vaingloriousness lay him open to incessant ridicule and satire, and rise to the level of sheer hallucination. No doubt Urquhart had some points in common with the creator of Gargantua and Pantagruel—hatred of the conventional, contempt for ascetic ideals, an affinity for mythical genealogies and exhaustive lists of nearly synonymous words, and a prodigious command of language, especially of out-of-the-way words, very familiar and very unfamiliar slang, archaisms, and neoterisms, not to speak of a free exercise of the privilege of coining. But the copiousness in Urquhart's case is not from spontaneous suggestion; it is rather the outcome of the laborious or quasi-scientific imagination, and a painful dependence on the synonyms of Cotgrave's Dictionary, which he discharges at the reader in sheaves and armfuls. He makes odd mistakes, wholly missing the meaning of his original, and trying very wild shots. He constantly takes extraordinary liberties with the text—abridges, alters, and greatly expands. Thus, in a famous list of animal-cries, where Rabelais had been content with nine, his translation gives us no less than seventy-one, and suggests that he knew the Complaynt of Scotlande (page 215). His style, though far from perfect, is comparatively free from Scotticism, though Scots words (such as laird and lairdship) and idioms do at times appear. His continuator, Motteux, follows him in this, making fiers comme Escossois 'as stout as any Scotch laird.' Motteux, whose translation is naturally more accurate, also arrogates to himself Urquhart's freedom in introducing locutions quite unknown to France of the sixteenth century; referring freely in the translation to Poor Pilgarlick, to Hans Carvel, and other characters equally unknown to the curé of Meudon.

Besides his unparalleled translation of (part of) Rabelais, the eccentric knight was author of a treatise on Trigonometry (1650); Epigrams, Divine and Moral (1646); Logopandectision, or an Introduction to the Universal Language (1653); Ekskubalauron, or the Discovery of a most exquisite Jewel, which is described on the title-page as 'more precious than Diamonds incased in Gold, the like whereof was never seen in any age; found in the Kennel of Worcester Streets the day after the Fight and six before the Autumnal Equinox, anno 1651.' This Jewel is a vindication of the honour of Scotland from the 'infamy' cast upon it by the rigid Presbyterian party, and from all false accusations of whatever sort, and is a panegyric on the Scots nation; it records the exploits of the Scot abroad—of learned doctors in foreign universities, and of gallant colonels who earned renown in France, Spain, Italy, Flanders, Holland, Dutchland, Denmark, Pole, Hungary, Swedland, and elsewhere, under 'Gustavus Cæsaromastix' and other equally glorious commanders. This affords him a chance of giving at great length the (highly embellished) adventures of the Admirable Crichton and others. He set himself to show that it is the 'kirkomanetick philarchaists' of the Covenant who by their malignancy and narrow-mindedness have brought on the nation the charge of covetousness. There are others, too, who are to blame! and of them he speaks with a vehemency evidently bred of personal affliction at their hands, in a breathless (but quite grammatical) paragraph of one huge denunciatory sentence:

Another thing there is that fixeth a grievous scandal upon that nation in matter of philargyrie or love of money, and it is this: there hath been in London and repairing to it for these many years together a knot of Scottish bankers, collybists, or coine-coursers, or traffickers in merchandize to and againe, and of men of other professions who by hook and crook, fas et nefas, slight and might, all being as fish their net could catch, having feathered their nests to some purpose, look so idolatrously upon their Dagon of wealth, and so closely, like the earth's dull center, hug all unto themselves, that for no respect of vertue, honor, kinned, patriotism, or whatever else, be it never so recommendable, will they depart from one single penny, whose emission doth not, without any hazard of loss, in a very short time superlucrate beyond all conscience an additional increase to the heap of that stock which they so much adore; which churlish and tenacious humor hath made many that were not acquainted with any else of that country to imagine all their compatriots affected with the same leprosie of a wretched peevishness, whereof these quomodocunquizing cluster-fists and rapacious varlets have given of late such cannibal-like proofs, by their inhumanity and obdurate carriage towards some whose shoestrings they are not worthy to untie, that were it not that a more able pen than mine will assuredly not fail to jerk them on all sides, in case by their better demeanor for the future they endeavour not to wipe off the blot wherewith their native country by their sordid avarice and miserable baseness hath been so foully stained, I would this very instant blaze them out in their names and surnames, notwithstanding the vizard of Presbyterian zeal wherewith they maske themselves, that like so many wolves, foxes, or Athenian Timons, they might in all times coming be debarred the benefit of any honest conversation.

The following paragraph, apologising for the plainness of his style in the Jewel, suddenly breaks away from comparative verbal reasonableness, and displays Urquhart in his most fantastic mood as phrase-maker. It illustrates the same perverse fecundity of words, pedantic and otiose rather than witty or amusing, put to happier use in the Rabelais:

I could truly, having before mine eyes some known treatises of the authors whose muse I honour and the straine of whose pen to imitate is my greatest ambition, have enlarged this discourse with a choicer variety of phrase, and made it overflow the field of the reader's understanding, with an inundation of greater eloquence; and that one way, tropologically, by metonymical, ironical, metaphorical, and synecdochical instruments of elocution, in all their several kinds, artificially affected, according to the nature of the subject, with emphatical expressions in things of great concernment, with catachrestical in matters of meaner moment; attended on each side respectively with an epilectick and exegetick modification; with hyperbolical, either epitatically or hypocoristically, as the purpose required to be elated or extenuated, with qualifying metaphors, and accompanied by apostrophes; and lastly, with allegories of all sorts, whether apologetical, affabulatory, parabolary, enigmatick, or paremial. And on the other part, schematologically adorning the proposed theam with the most especial and chief flowers of the garden of rhetoric, and omitting no figure either of diction or sentence, that might contribute to the ear's enchantment, or perswasion of the hearer. I could have introduced, in case of obscurity, synonymal, exargastick, and pallogetick elucidations; for sweetness of phrase, antimetathetick commutations of epithets; for the vehement excitation of a matter, exclamation in the front, and epiphonemas in the rear. I could have used, for the prompter stirring up of passion, apostrophal and propopœial diversions; and, for the appeasing and settling of them, some epanorthotick revocations, and aposiopetick restraines. I could have inserted dialogismes, displaying their interrogatory part with communicatively psmatick and sustentative flourishes; or proleptically, with the refutative schemes of anticipation and subjection, and that part which concerns the responsory, with the figures of permission and concession. Speeches extending a matter beyond what it is, auxetically, digressively, transitiously, by ratiocination, aetiology, circumlocution, and other ways, I could have made use of; as likewise with words diminishing the worth of a thing, tapinotically, periphrastically, by rejection, translation, and other means, I could have served myself.

His verse is cumbrous and commonplace, the following being a fair specimen :

The way to vertue's hard, uneasie, bends
Aloft, being full of steep and rugged alleys;
For never one to a higher place ascends,
That always keeps the plaine, and pleasant valleys:
And reason in each human breast ordaines
That precious things be purchased with paines.

Only the first two books of the History of Gargantua and Pantagruel were translated by Sir Thomas Urquhart in 1653. These were published in his lifetime; and Peter Anthony Motteux (1660-1718)—by birth a French Huguenot, but known as a dramatic writer in English—republished them in 1693, and added the third from Urquhart's papers. In 1708 he published a complete translation, the fourth and fifth books being his own. This joint production was again published in 1737 by John Ozell (d. 1743), with corrections and notes. The standard edition is that in the 'Tudor Translations' (3 vols. 1900), by Charles Whibley. The Maitland Club published Urquhart's original works (2 vols. 1834); there is an excellent monograph on Urquhart's life and works (1899) by the Rev. John Willcock.

Sir George Mackenzie (1636-91) was a native of Dundee, nephew of the Earl of Seaforth. He was educated at St Andrews and Aberdeen, and studied civil law at Bourges, in France. In 1660 he published Aretine; or the Serious Romance, a tedious Egyptian story in a stilted style. He seems to have been almost the only learned man of his time in Scotland who maintained an acquaintance with the lighter departments of contemporary English literature. He was a friend of Dryden, by whom he is mentioned with great respect; and he himself composed poetry, which, if it has no other merit, is at least in good English, and appears to have been fashioned after the best models of the time. He also wrote some moral essays, and deserves to be remembered as one of the first Scots authors to write English with purity. In 1665 he published at Edinburgh A Moral Essay, preferring Solitude to Public Employment, which drew forth an answer from John Evelyn. The writer who contended for solitude was busily employed in public life, being the principal law-officer of the crown, the King's Advocate for Scotland; while Evelyn, whose pursuits were principally those which ornament retirement—who longed to be 'delivered from the gilded impertinences of life'—stood forward as the champion of public and active employment. Other essays deal with the religion of the Stoic, moral gallantry, the moral history of frugality, reason, and the like. The literary efforts of 'the noble wit of Scotland,' as Dryden called him, were but holiday recreations—his business was law and politics. He was author of Institutions of the Law of Scotland, and Laws and Customs in Matters Criminal; Jus Regium, treatises against the Covenanters, and a vindication of the government of Charles II. in its severe treatment of them; also A Defence of the

Antiquity of the Royal Line of Scotland, in which he gravely supports the story of the forty fabulous kings deduced from Gathelus, son-in-law of Pharaoh, and his spouse Scota (see page 256). His work on Heraldry was long a standard; but an important historical work, entitled Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland, from the Restoration of Charles II., lay in manuscript till 1821. Mackenzie, who in 1661 defended the Marquis of Argyll, unhappily disgraced himself by subservience to the court, and by the inhumanity and cruelty with which, as Lord Advocate (after 1677), he conducted the prosecutions and persecutions of the Covenanters; and he lives in the memory of the Scottish people as 'Bluidy Mackenzie.' There is, it need hardly be said, no bloodthirstiness in his poems, essays, or even law-books; he appears as an accomplished gentleman, a kindly philosopher, and an orthodox and even earnest Christian; and all his moral arguments were in favour of sweet reasonableness, though somewhat strenuous against fanatics and fanaticism. He was a friend of the pious Robert Boyle, to whom he dedicated his Essay on Reason. Yet as a name of evil omen for cruelty, the accomplished advocate and public prosecutor ranks as the Scottish counterpart of Judge Jeffreys. He himself said none had screwed the king's prerogative higher than he; and he is mainly responsible for directing the savage persecution which Claverhouse had the ignoble task of seeing carried out. He it was who founded the Library of the Faculty of Advocates in Edinburgh—now the National Library of Scotland; and so all workers in literature in Scotland owe Sir George Mackenzie a deep debt of gratitude. At the Revolution he retired to England. In one of his few poems he thus chaunted the

Praise of a Country Life.

O happy country life, pure like its air;
Free from the rage of pride, the pangs of care.
Here happy souls lie bathed in soft content,
And are at once secure and innocent.
No passion here but love: here is no wound
But that by which lovers their names confound
On barks of trees, whilst with a smiling face
They see those letters as themselves embrace.
Here the kind myrtles pleasant branches spread;
And sure no laurel casts so sweet a shade.
Yet all these country pleasures, without love,
Would but a dull and tedious prison prove.
But oh! what woods [and] parks [and] meadows lie
In the blest circle of a mistress' eye!
What courts, what camps, what triumphs may one find
Displayed in Cælia, when she will be kind!
What a dull thing this lower world had been,
If heavenly beauties were not sometimes seen!
For when fair Cælia leaves this charming place,
Her absence all its glories does deface.

Against Envy.

We may cure envy in ourselves either by considering how useless or how ill these things were for which we envy our neighbours; or else how we possess as much or as good things. If I envy his greatness, I consider that he wants my quiet: as also I consider that he possibly envies me as much as I do him; and that when I begun to examine exactly his perfections, and to balance them with my own, I found myself as happy as he was. And though many envy others, yet very few would change their condition even with those whom they envy, all being considered. And I have oft admired why we have suffered ourselves to be so cheated by contradictory vices, as to condemn this day him whom we envied the last; or why we envy so many, since there are so few whom we think to deserve as much as we do. Another great help against envy is, that we ought to consider how much the thing envied costs him whom we envy, and if we would take it at the price. Thus, when I envy a man for being learned, I consider how much of his health and time that learning consumes: if for being great, how he should flatter and serve for it; and if I would not pay his price, no reason I ought to have what he has got. Sometimes, also, I consider that there is no reason for my envy: he whom I envy deserves more than he has, and I less than I possess. And by thinking much of these, I repress their envy, which grows still from the contempt of our neighbour and the overrating ourselves. As also I consider that the perfections envied by me may be advantageous to me; and thus I check myself for envying a great pleader, but am rather glad that there is such a man, who may defend my innocence: or to envy a great soldier, because his valour may defend my estate or country. And when any of my countrymen begin to raise envy in me, I alter the scene, and begin to be glad that Scotland can boast of so fine a man; and I remember, that though now I am angry at him when I compare him with myself, yet if I were discoursing of my nation abroad, I would be glad of that merit in him which now displeases me. Nothing is envied but what appears beautiful and charming; and it is strange that I should be troubled at the sight of what is pleasant. I endeavour also to make such my friends as deserve my envy; and no man is so base as to envy his friend. Thus, whilst others look on the angry side of merit, and thereby trouble themselves, I am pleased in admiring the beauties and charms which burns [sic] them as a fire, whilst they warm me as the sun.

The True Path to Esteem.

I have remarked in my own time that some, by taking too much care to be esteemed and admired, have by that course missed their aim; whilst others of them who shunned it, did meet with it, as if it had fallen on them whilst it was flying from the others; which proceeded from the unfit means these able and reasonable men took to establish their reputation. It is very strange to hear men value themselves upon their honour, and their being men of their word in trifles, when yet that same honour cannot tie them to pay the debts they have contracted upon solemn promise of secure and speedy repayment; starving poor widows and orphans to feed their lusts; and adding thus robbery and oppression to the dishonourable breach of trust. And how can we think them men of honour, who, when a potent and foreign monarch is oppressing his weaker neighbours, hazard their very lives to assist him, though they would rail at any of their acquaintance, that, meeting a strong man fighting with a weaker, should assist the stronger in his oppression?

The surest and most pleasant path to universal esteem and true popularity is to be just; for all men esteem him most who secures most their private interest, and protects best their innocence. And all who have any notion of a Deity, believe that justice is one of His chief attributes; and that, therefore, whoever is just, is next in nature to Him, and the best picture of Him, and to be revered and loved. But yet how few trace this path! most men choosing rather to toil and vex themselves in seeking popular applause, by living high and in profuse prodigalities, which are entertained by injustice and oppression; as if rational men would pardon robbers because they feasted them upon a part of their own spoils; or did let them see fine and glorious shows, made for the honour of the giver upon the expence of the robbed spectators. But when a virtuous person appears great by his merit, and obeyed only by the charming force of his reason, all men think him descended from that heaven which he serves, and to him they gladly pay the noble tribute of deserved praises.

(From the Essay on Reason.)

Mackenzie's works were edited by Ruddiman. See his Life and Times by Andrew Lang (1909); also Thomson's edition of the Memoirs (1821); Omond, The Lord Advocates of Scotland (1883); and Taylor Innes, Studies in Scottish History (1892).

Andrew Fletcher, born in 1655, succeeded early to the family estate of Saltoun, was educated mainly by Bishop Burnet (then minister of Saltoun), and represented the shire of Lothian in the Scottish Parliament in the reign of Charles II. He opposed the arbitrary designs of the Duke of York, afterwards James II., and retired to Holland. Here he formed a close friendship with the English refugee patriots, and he returned to England with the Duke of Monmouth in 1685. Happening, in a personal quarrel, to kill another member of the expedition (one Dare), Fletcher again went abroad, travelled in Spain, and in Hungary fought with distinction against the Turks. He returned at the Revolution, and took an active part in Scottish affairs. His opinions were republican, and he was of a haughty, unbending temper; 'brave as the sword he wore,' according to a contemporary, 'and bold as a lion: a sure friend, and an irreconcilable enemy: would lose his life readily to serve his country, and would not do a base thing to save it.' Fletcher opposed the union of Scotland with England in 1707, believing, with many zealous but narrow-sighted patriots of that day, that it would eclipse the glory of ancient Caledonia. He strove for a federative, not an incorporating union, and sketched out an ingenious but doctrinaire scheme for partitioning the three kingdoms into provinces or states, each with a local capital and a large measure of home rule. So little was he merely a fanatical Conservative Scot, that Scotland was to fall into two provinces, of neither of which was Edinburgh to be capital; he thought Edinburgh very awkwardly situated for a metropolis, as being neither central, nor on the sea, nor on a navigable river. After the Union he retired from public life in disgust, and devoted himself to promoting improvements in agriculture; and he died at London in 1716.

Like his somewhat older contemporary, Sir

George Mackenzie, Fletcher wrote only in English (not Scots), and did succeed in writing a vigorous style wonderfully free from Scottish peculiarities. His Discourse of Government appeared in 1698, his Two Discourses concerning the Affairs of Scotland in the same year. The Discorso delle Cose di Spagna (1698 also) was printed only in Italian. His Speeches in the Scottish Parliament are both eloquent and sincere, though his political ideals were perverse and unpractical. An Account of a Conversation concerning a Right Regulation of Governments for the common Good of Mankind (1703) is forcibly written, and contains much sound sense amidst its strong appeals in favour of Scottish independence. In this letter occurs the famous saying, so constantly quoted and so universally misinterpreted, about ballads. The conversation was supposed to be between the Earl of Cromarty, Sir Edward Seymour, Sir Christopher Musgrave, and Fletcher himself, and had nothing in the world to do with ballads such as 'Chevy Chase' or the Robin Hood series, but the unholy songs of the day, Tom Durfey's no doubt included; 'ballad' as used of romantic poems like the Border ballads is essentially a modern usage, the older custom always implying some kind of song. Fletcher's argument was on the utter inefficiency of all government regulations, according to Sir Christopher Musgrave, to put down the corruptions of London society in those days—the luxury of women, the number of prostitutes, and the debauchery of the poor of both sexes, who are daily tempted to all manner of lewdness by the infamous ballads sung in every corner of the streets. "One would think," said the Earl, "this last were of no great consequence." I said I knew a wise man so much of Sir Christopher's sentiment, that he believed if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws of a nation. And we find that most of the antient legislators thought they could not well reform the manners of any city without the help of a lyric, and sometimes of a dramatic, poet. But in this city [London] the dramatic poet no less than the ballad-maker has been almost wholly employed to corrupt the people, in which they have had most unspeakable and deplorable success.'

Enthusiastic admiration of the Greek and Roman republics led Fletcher to praise even slavery as maintained by them. He represents the condition of the slaves as happy and useful, and by way of contrast paints the state of the lowest class in Scotland in colours that (even if they be somewhat too dark) show how frightfully disorganised the country was at that period. In the Second Discourse on the Affairs of Scotland occurs this lurid picture:

There are at this day in Scotland (besides a great many poor families very meanly provided for by the church-boxes, with others who, by living on bad food, fall into various diseases) two hundred thousand people begging from door to door. These are not only noway advantageous, but a very grievous burden to so poor a country. And though the number of them be perhaps double to what it was formerly, by reason of this present great distress, yet in all times there have been about one hundred thousand of those vagabonds, who have lived without any regard or subjection either to the laws of the land, or even those of God and nature. . . . No magistrate could ever be informed or discover which way one in a hundred of these wretches died, or that ever they were baptized. Many murders have been discovered among them; and they are not only a most unspeakable oppression to poor tenants (who, if they give not bread, or some kind of provision, to perhaps forty such villains in one day, are sure to be insulted by them), but they rob many poor people who live in houses distant from any neighbourhood. In years of plenty many thousands of them meet together in the mountains, where they feast and riot for many days; and at country-weddings, markets, burials, and the like public occasions, they are to be seen, both men and women, perpetually drunk, cursing, blaspheming, and fighting together. These are such outrageous disorders, that it were better for the nation they were sold to the galleys or West Indies than that they should continue any longer to be a burden and curse upon us.

But better than sending them to the plantations would be to keep them at home, utilising their services, and drilling them into a higher moral condition. The scheme of setting native vagabonds to work as serfs was not, as is commonly supposed, a novelty in Fletcher; it was fully recognised by a long series of Scottish laws from 1579 to 1661, and partially enforced too. Fletcher, however, went beyond the highest flight of Scots law in this department, and argued in favour of compelling all Scottish landlords to take white slaves in proportion to the size of their holdings. Fletcher's scheme may well have suggested a similar one to Defoe for London vagrants, expounded in Everybody's Business. Carlyle's views on the beneficence of the whip as a stimulus to honest industry at home and abroad have also points of affinity.

Fletcher's Political Works appeared, 'with a character of the author,' in 1732, and was reprinted in 1737, 1747, and later. There is a short and rather meagre Life by G. Omond (1897), which passes too lightly over many of Fletcher's most pregnant ideas and interesting characteristics. On Serfdom in Scotland, see the Edinburgh Review for January 1899.

William Cleland (1661?–89) showed less to advantage as a poet than as the heroic defender of Dunkeld in 1689, when the Cameronian regiment under his command stemmed and turned backward the rush of four thousand Highlanders flushed with the victory of Killiecrankie. The son of the Marquis of Douglas's gamekeeper, Cleland studied at St Andrews, became a zealous Covenantanter, fought at Drumclog and Bothwell Brig (where he was a captain), and as a refugee in Holland studied law at Utrecht, and helped to negotiate the Prince of Orange's expedition. He was the first lieutenant-colonel of the regiment raised after the Revolution from amongst the westland Cameronians (afterwards the 26th), and he fell, still under thirty years of age, in the grim and bloody struggle round Dunkeld Cathedral. Scott wrongly assumed him to have been the father of Pope's friend Cleland.

But for the low ebb of literature in Scotland, Cleland would never be named amongst poets. Still, his uncouth verses—mainly satirical—record the temper of the times, and have a considerable linguistic interest. What he wrote was not old Scots, nor the Scots of Ramsay and Burns, but an imperfect English stuffed full of Scots words, forms, and locutions—gaunt (yawn), spear (ask), thir (these), kenn, lith, swerff; thou's (thou art), thou wear's (thou wearest), sawen (sown), crub'd (curbed), leugh (laughed). Further, words spelt as English ones must be pronounced as Scots in order to rhyme—thus, wool rhymes with true, dissecting with checking, enacts them with takes them (pronounced enacks them, taks them), guard with laird. Snizeing (sneeshing) is already used for snuff; in coarch his coots for 'grip his ankles' we have an odd combination of Scottish Ciceronianism and the mere vernacular; and 'makes the thrush bush [tuft of rushes] keep the cow' is an interesting echo of the famous vow of James I. (of Scotland).

Cleland's Poems and Verses appeared in a small volume in 1697, and contain nine stanzas written by him as 'An Addition to the Lines of "Hollow my Fancie" when he was a student at St Andrews.' The anonymous poem so named was well known before the middle of the century, and Cleland's addition falls far below the humble literary level of the original. The first two stanzas given below are from the earliest set of words.

From 'Hallo, my Fancy.'

When I look before me,
There I do behold
There's none that sees or knows me;
All the world's a-gadding,
Running madding;
None doth his station hold.

He that is below envieth him that riseth,
And he that is above, him that's below despiseth,
So every man his plot and counter-plot deviseth.

Hallo, my fancy, whither wilt thou go?

Look, look, what bustling

Here I do espy;
Each another jostling,
Every one turmoiling,
Th' other spoiling,

As I did pass them by.

One sitteth musing in a dumpish passion,
Another hangs his head because he's out of fashion,
A third is fully bent on sport and recreation.

Hallo, my fancy, whither wilt thou go?

In conceit like Phaeton,
I'll mount Phoebus' chair,
Having ne'er a hat on,
All my hair a-burning
In my journeying,
Hurrying through the air.

Fain would I hear his fiery horses neighing,
And see how they on foamy bits are playing;
All the stars and planets I will be surveying!

Hallo, my fancy, whither wilt thou go? . . .

Hallo, my fancy, hallo,

Stay thou at home with me;

I can thee no longer follow,

Thou hast betrayed me,

And bewrayed me;

It is too much for thee.

Stay, stay at home with me; leave off thy lofty soaring;
Stay thou at home with me, and on thy books be poring;
For he that goes abroad lays little up in storing;
Thou's welcome home, my fancy, welcome home to me.

From Cleland's pen (less dexterous than his sword) we have also one or two elegies—as on the famous Covenanter M'Ward—rhymed epistles, and other occasional verses, but the bulk of the book is occupied with two 'mock poems' or satires, one 'Upon the Expedition of the Highland Host, who came to destroy the Western Shires in Winter 1678,' and another on the Episcopal clergy who 'met to consult about the Test in 1681.' The Highlanders, regarded then by all Lowlanders as savages on the level of the mere Irish, were—in spite of the earnest protest of the landed gentlemen of the west—let loose on the Covenanting shires to suppress conventicles, and to this end had free quarters amongst the country-folk, and were empowered to seize horses and ammunition, and, if necessary, 'to kill, wound, apprehend, and imprison' Nonconformists. The following (in which the 'she'll' and the 'nainsell' show that the jokes against the Highlander trying to speak Lowland Scots were early stereotyped) describes

The Highland Host.

But those who were their chief commanders,
As such who bore the pirnie standarts; parti-coloured
Who lead the van and drove the rear, led
Were right well mounted of their gear;
With brogues, and trews, and pirnie plaides,
And good blew bonnets on their heads,
Which on the one side had a flipe, fold
Adorn'd with a tobacco pipe;
With durk, and snap-work, and snuff-mill, snaphance, pistol
A bagg which they with onions fill,
And, as their strick observers say, strict
A tupe-horn filled with usquebay; ram's-horn
A slashed-out coat beneath their plaides,
A targe of timber, nails, and hides;
With a long two-handed sword,
As good's the country can afford—
Had they not need of bulk and bones,
Who fights with all these arms at once?
It's marvelous how in such weather,
Ov'r hill and hope they came together; valley
How in such stormes they came so farr;
The reason is they're smeared with tar,
Which doth defend them heel and neck,
Just us it doth their sheep protect.
But least ye doubt that this is true, lest
They're just the colour of tar'd wool. pron. 'oo

Nought like religion they retain,
 Of moral honesty they're clean;
 In nothing they're accounted sharp,
 Except in bagpipe and in harpe.
 For a misobliging word
 She'll durk her neighbour ov'r the boord; board
 And then she'll flee like fire from flint,
 She'll scarcely ward the second dint;
 If any ask her of her thrift,
 Forsooth, her nainsell lives by theft. theft

Robert Wodrow (1679–1734), Scottish Church historian, was born at Glasgow and studied in its university, where his father was Professor of Divinity; in 1703 he became minister of Eastwood. His History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland 1660–88 (1721–22) was dedicated to George I. He was a zealous Presbyterian, an indefatigable collector, and an honest recorder, though not free from partisanship and credulousness; and his work is of very high value for his period. Not till next century were published his Lives of the Scottish Reformers (Maitland Club, 1834–45); Analecta, or a History of Remarkable Providences (Maitland Club, 1842–43); Correspondence (Wodrow Soc., 1842–43); and Biographical Collections (New Spalding Club, 1890). The following passages are both from the Analecta:

The Divil and the Divinity Student.

When Mr Robert Blair was minister of St Andrews, there was a youth who applied to that presbtry to be admitted to tryals. Though he was very unfit, the presbtry appoints him a text, and after he had been at all the pains he could in consulting help, yet he got nothing done, so that he turned very melancholy; and one day, as he was walking all alone in a remote place from St Andrews, there came up to him a stranger, in habite like a minister, with black coat and band, and who addressed the youth very courteously, and presently falls into discourse with him after this manner: 'Sir, you are but a young man, and yet appear to be very melancholy; pray, why so pensive?' He answered, 'It's to no purpose to communicat my mind to yow, seeing yow cannot help me.' 'How know you that? Pray let me know the cause of your pressure.' Says the youth, 'I have got a text from the presbtry. I cannot for my life compose a discourse on it, so I shall be affronted.' The stranger replied, 'Sir, I am a minister; let me hear the text.' He told him, 'O, then, I have an excellent sermon on that text here in my pocket, which yow may peruse and commit to your memory. I engage, after yow have delivered it before the presbtry, yow shall be greatly approven and applauded;' so pulls it out and gives it to him, which he received very thankfully. Then says the stranger, 'As I have obliged yow now, sir, so yow will oblige me again in doing any peece of kindness or service when my business requires it;' which the youth promises. 'But, sir,' says the stranger, 'yow and I are strangers, and therefore I would require of yow a written promise, subscribed with your hand, in case yow forget the favour which I have done yow;' which he granted likewise, and delivered it to him subscribed with his blood. And thus they parted.

Upon the presbtry day the youth delivered an excellent sermon upon the text appointed him, which pleased and amazed the presbtry to a degree; only Mr Blair smelt out something in it which made him call the youth aside to a corner of the church, and thus he began with him: 'Sir, yow have delivered a nate sermon, every way well pointed. The matter was profound, or rather sublime; your stile was fine and your method clear; and no doubt young men at the beginning must make use of helps, which I doubt not but yow have done.' The young man acknowledged he had. 'But,' says Mr Blair, 'besydes the use of books, I know sometimes they are obliged to consult men that are scholars and well versed in divinity, to help them in their composours. Have yow not done soe?' He said he had. Mr Blair says, 'Yow may use all freedome with me; I intend yow no hurt. Did yow not get the whole of this discourse written and ready to your hand from one who pretended to be a minister?' He acknowledged the same. Mr Blair says, 'No doubt but yow would give him thanks for his favour, and promise to do him any peece of service he called for, when his business [doth] lye in yowr way?' He answered 'Yes.' 'But yowr verbal promises would not be sufficient: did yow not give him a written promise subscribed with your blood?' All which he confessed with fear, blushing, and confusion. Then Mr Blair, with an awful seriousness appearing in his countenance, began to tell the youth his hazard, and that the man whom he took for a minister was the Divil, who had trepanned him and brought him into his net: advised him to be earnest with God in prayer, and likewise not to give way to despair, for there was yet hope.

In the meantime the youth was so overcome with fear and terror that he was like to fall down. Mr Blair exhorts him to take heart, and brings him in with him into the presbtry: and when all except the ministers were removed, Mr Blair recalls the whole story to them. They were all strangely affected with it, and resolved unanimously to dispatch the presbtry business presently, and to stay all night in town, and on the morrow to meet for prayer in one of the most retired churches of the presbtry, acquainting none with there busines, but taking the youth alongst with them, whom they kepted alwise close by them. Which was done, and after the ministers had prayed all of them round, except Mr Blair, who prayed last, in time of his prayer then came a violent rushing of wind upon the church, so great that they all thought the church should have fallen down about there ears, and with that the youth's paper and covenant droops down from the roof of the church among the ministers. I heard no more of the story.

Gillespie's End.

It came to that, he kept his chamber still to his death, wearing and wasting, hoasting [coughing] and sweating. Ten dayes before his death his sweating went away, and his hoasting lesned, yet his weaknes still encreased. His wife seeing the time draw near, spake to him and said, 'The time of your releife is nou near and hard at hand!' He answered, 'I long for that time! O happy they that are there!' This was the last word he was heard sensibly to speak. Mr Frederick Carmichael being there, they went to prayer, expecting death so suddenly. In the midst of prayer he left his ratling, and the pangs and fetches of death began; thence his senses went away. Wherupon they rose from prayer, and beheld till in a very gentle manner the pinns of his tabernacle wer loosened.

WELSH, IRISH, AND COLONIAL CONTRIBUTIONS.

IN the first section, the influence of the Celtic temperament and culture has been recognised as stimulating and modifying the trend of early English intellectual life ; but in this work it is not possible directly to take cognisance of the literatures of the races other than Anglic who have contributed essential elements to the mixed people now inhabiting the British Islands. Besides English in its various dialects and successive stages, at least five languages have been spoken by those at home within this area even if we arrange the Celtic tongues in two groups only—Irish, Manx, and Scottish Gaelic ; Welsh and Cornish. The lingua Latina rustica was spoken in the Roman colonies for four centuries at least ; and in the Middle Ages Church and Law Latin was the literary vehicle of some of the greatest Englishmen, and practically the vernacular of synods and of monasteries. From the Norman Conquest to the days of Edward III., as we have seen, Norman French was the language of literature. And it should be remembered that for generations the old Norse in some shape was spoken and written not merely in Shetland and Orkney and at the court of the Jarls of Caithness, but in the Western Islands of Scotland, in the Danelagh of England, and in the Danish kingdoms of Dublin, Limerick, and Waterford : good authorities hold that considerable portions of the collection called the Corpus Poeticum Boreale were written by the Scandinavians of Ireland. Other languages were doubtless spoken in Britain before the arrival of the first Celtic invaders, those of the Ivernian or other prehistoric inhabitants ; and some Celtic philologists now trace the peculiarities of Irish, Welsh, and the neo-Celtic tongues to the old pre-Aryan language, characteristics they share with other languages of the old Mediterranean stock, ancient Egyptian and modern Berber. In Wales, as in France, the best authorities hold that the vast majority of the present inhabitants are sprung—not from the Celts or any of the successive invaders—but from the race or races who held the land before the coming of the Aryans. A fortiori, this is even truer of Ireland and the Highlands. The first Celts to invade Britain were the Goidels, who became incorporated with their non-Aryan subjects ; a like process took place when the later Brythonic conquerors established themselves in Britain. Nowhere in the ‘Celtic fringe’ are the people of pure Celtic descent ; and it may well be that what is especially characteristic of Irish literature and is interpreted as the true ‘Celtic note’ is not of Celtic origin at all, but reflects the moods of the earlier non-Aryan inhabitants of Erin, from whom the conquering Gael, invaders from Britain, learnt the manner of the gods of the land, the really autochthonous legends and folklore.

The Cymric literature of Wales has a history of nine or ten centuries and still flourishes ; and for three or four hundred years men of Welsh blood have been contributors to English literature. Such Welshmen have not been very numerous nor of the first importance. They have not been regarded as wholly aliens in England ; and as they wrote in the literary English of their time, it has not been thought necessary to treat them in a separate division of this work. Vaughan the Silurist and his brother are amongst the most unmistakable ; James Howell, cosmopolitan though he was in temper, was Welsh by birth as he was in name and blood. John Davies of Hereford was a Welshman born just outside the principality ; Sir John Davies may have been of Welsh blood. The Pembroke Herberts were a great Welsh house, and Lord Herbert of Cherbury and George Herbert were apparently both born at their father’s home of Montgomery Castle. John Donne, a power in English literature, was said to be of Welsh descent ; and the great Puritan, John Owen, is known, apart from his Welsh name, to have been of an old Welsh family. Roger Williams—in Milton’s words, ‘that noble confessor of religious liberty,’ and founder of Rhode Island—was a fiery Welshman. And earlier, Asser, Geoffrey of Monmouth, Walter Map, and the rationalist Bishop Pecock by their writings left their mark deep enough on mediæval Latin, Anglo-French, and English thought. These are all notable figures in the history of our literature before the end of the seventeenth century, and are treated in their proper chronological places. Guillim, in virtue of his great folio Display of Heraldrie (1610), the eponym of the science, was born at Hereford of Welsh family. And dozens of others might be named, from the voluminous Giraldus Cambrensis to John Owen the Latin epigrammatist, whose interest as authors, however great, is inconsiderable in connection with the story of English letters.

From the Anglo-Norman Conquest of Ireland—which was both the continuation and the completion of the Norman Conquest of England—there had been much writing from Ireland and about Ireland by Englishmen for a longer or shorter time resident in Ireland, but not much that ranks as literature. Spenser wrote his book on Ireland and most of the Faerie Queene at Kilcolman, his home from 1589 on, but his connection with Ireland is wholly external. Sir John Davies, Sir William Temple, and Sir William Petty were Englishmen who lived for a time in Ireland and wrote about Ireland. Richard Stanyhurst, on the other hand, was born at Dublin (1547; see page 332) of a family settled in Ireland for three centuries; he was but a feeble forerunner of the glorious company which was in the eighteenth century to include Steele and Swift, Burke and Goldsmith. Stanyhurst's nephew, Archbishop Ussher, is a noble representative of Anglo-Irish Churchmanship, and was also born in Dublin (1581). Sir John Denham was born (1615) at Dublin, the son of an Irish judge, but was in no other sense an Irishman. But the Hon. Robert Boyle (born at Lismore Castle in 1627) bears the name of a great Anglo-Irish house. Roger Boyle (page 787), Earl of Cork and dramatist, was also born at Lismore. The Earl of Roscommon was Irish born, but lived most of his life out of Ireland. Tate and Brady both, as well as the dramatists Southerne and Farquhar, were Irishmen born and bred; but their work, like that of other notable Anglo-Irishmen—Swift, Toland, Steele, Parnell, and Berkeley—born before the Revolution, belongs mainly to the next period, and will be dealt with in the next volume. Of the Irish contributors to English literature before the Revolution it may be said generally that though some of them, like Ussher, thoroughly identified themselves with the land of their birth, the Irish tone and temper is rather conspicuous by its absence. The growth of that temper and the beginning of the Irish question are associated with the name of William Molyneux (died 1698), whose Case of Ireland being bound by Acts of Parliament passed in England, published in the same year, and burned by the order of the English House of Commons, marks him as the forerunner of Swift and Grattan.

In the English colonies in North America there was hardly any literature of consequence till about the middle of the eighteenth century. The books of travel, poems, sermons, and the like in the seventeenth century were largely the work of men and women English born, and, except for their change of residence, to all intents and purposes Britons of the native type. Captain John Smith, who told—if he did not also invent—the tale of Pocahontas, was a grown man when in 1605 he joined the Virginia expedition, spent only a small part of his life on American soil, and died in London. But his True Relation of Occurrences in Virginia (1608) ranks as the first book in American literature, though judged from the point of literature it has no great value. In Virginia, George Sandys

(see page 450) completed that translation of Ovid which he dedicated to King Charles I. Richard Ligon in his History of the Barbadoes (1657) furnished the materials out of which Richard Steele spun his famous novelette of Inkle and Yarico; but Ligon was a broken London merchant of sixty when in 1647 he sailed to begin life anew in the West Indies. Roger Williams, though he became heart and soul a colonial, was a Welshman, and was also thirty years of age ere he arrived (1631) on the shores where he was to found the state of Rhode Island, and to be remembered for his vehement discourse against The Bloody Tenent of Persecution. John Eliot, 'the apostle of the Indians,' who went to America in the same year, was four years younger when he left his native Hertfordshire. Anne Bradstreet (1612-72), 'the first professional poetess of New England,' was a woman grown ere she left her home in Old England. The works of all these authors were sent to England to be published. The Bay Psalm Book, printed at Cambridge in Massachusetts in 1640, was the first book in English that issued from the press in America; it was largely the production of John Eliot and of Richard Mather, a Lancashire Puritan, who emigrated to the colony in 1635, and was father of Increase Mather and grandfather of Cotton Mather.

Such were the slender beginnings of the vast and varied American literature, now one of the two great branches of literature in the English tongue. For a century and a half it has uttered the thoughts and feelings of a nation of marked characteristics, of strong originality, in which the English element has been the dominant constituent; and its history must be traced in another volume of this work. Written in English—though English with a difference—the daughter literature in some respects rivals the parent, and has in many ways influenced, both in substance and in form, what is said and sung on the other side of the Atlantic. The people of the United States are now by far the largest section under one government of those who speak English. In America some English books find their widest circle of readers. The older English literature is by Americans justly regarded as an inheritance common to them with us; and much helpful work towards the better understanding of the English language and of the triumphs of English letters has been done by American writers and in the United States.
